(a) a party to the proceeding; or

(b) any other person;

the party or other person is taken not to have had reasonable grounds for making the representation, unless evidence is adduced to the contrary.

(3) To avoid doubt, subsection (2) does not:

(a) have the effect that, merely because such evidence to the contrary is adduced, the person who made the representation is taken to have had reasonable grounds for making the representation; or

(b) have the effect of placing on any person an onus of proving that the person who made the representation had reasonable grounds for making the representation.

(4) Subsection (1) does not limit by implication the meaning of a reference in [the ACL] to:

(a) a misleading representation; or

(b) a representation that is misleading in a material particular; or

(c) conduct that is misleading or is likely to mislead;

and, in particular, does not imply that a representation that a person makes with respect to any future matter is not misleading merely because that person has reasonable grounds for making the representation.

Promises

[33.145] The making of a misleading contractual promise may, in certain circumstances, also be a form of misleading conduct. Section 2(2)(a) of the ACL provides:

A reference to engaging in conduct is a reference to doing or refusing to do any act, including:

(i) the making of, or the giving effect to a provision of a contract or arrangement; or

(ii) the arriving at, or the giving effect to a provision of an understanding; or

(iii) the requiring of the giving of, or the giving of, a covenant [emphasis added].

A party may need to rely on the ACL where a promise is not contractual in nature (because, for example, it is not supported by consideration – see Chapter 4). It may also be necessary to rely on the ACL to enforce a contractual promise if that promise is unenforceable (because, for example, it does not comply with statute of frauds requirements – see Chapter 7) or if a third party (who will be precluded from enforcing the contractual promise by the doctrine of privity – see Chapter 11) wishes to enforce the promise.

A contractual promise may purport to affirm a presently existing state of affairs. A contractual promise as to an existing fact or state of affairs is sometimes called a warranty. A promisor may, for example, warrant that the promisor's house is free of termites, or that the promisor is the sole beneficial owner of copyright in a computer programme. If the promised state of affairs does not exist, the making of the promise may result in liability for misleading conduct (see Accounting Systems 2000 (Developments) Pty Ltd v CCH Australia Ltd (1993) 42 FCR 470, at [33.150]).

However, it is more common that contractual promises will relate to future conduct. The making of a promise or commitment to do something in the future can be analysed in one of two ways. First, whether or not a promise to do something in the future can be analysed by deriving implied representations of current fact from the making of the promise (for example, that at the time of making the promise the promisor intends to honour the promise and has the capacity to honour the promise) but see Forrest v Australian Securities and Investments Commission [2012] HCA 39; (2012) 247 CLR 486, at [33.162]. Secondly, the making of the promise may represent that it will be honoured in the future. In Futuretronics International Pty Ltd v Gadzhis [1992] 2 VR 217 (at [33.155]) Ormiston J considered when the making of a promise to do something in the future will constitute misleading or deceptive conduct.

Accounting Systems 2000 (Developments) v CCH Australia

[33.150] Accounting Systems 2000 (Developments) Pty Ltd v CCH Australia Ltd (1993) 42 FCR 470 (Federal Court of Australia, Full Court) – Appeal from a single judge of the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: Accounting Systems 2000 (Developments) Pty Ltd (Developments) carried on business as a developer of computer software. It entered into a contract with Castle Douglas Pty Ltd (Castle Douglas) on 23 December 1988 (the Castle Douglas agreement). Under this agreement, Developments claimed to be the proprietor of certain computer systems and as assignor purported to assign all interest in the copyright in those systems (including a system known as the AS system) to Castle Douglas as assignee. Under cl 3.1 of the contract the assignor warranted (a) that it was the sole beneficial owner of the copyright in the systems; (b) that it was entitled to assign such copyright to the assignee without the consent of any other person; and (c) that there was no claim or potential claim against the assignor for infringement or breach of copyright. CCH Australia Ltd (CCH), in the belief that copyright had been assigned to Castle Douglas, took a licence from Castle Douglas in respect of the computer systems and expended money under that licence. Another company, Focus Business Systems Pty Ltd, claimed that Developments, in developing the AS system, had infringed an earlier system which it owned (the Focus system). CCH and Castle Douglas brought proceedings against Developments.

O'Loughlin J held the AS system infringed the Focus system and that there was a breach, by Developments, of warranties (b) and (c). (There was no breach of (a) because a work which infringes the copyright in its predecessor may, if not a slavish copy, still attract its own copyright. Thus the licensee of a new work, such as CCH, could escape the risk of suit only if a licence were given by the owners of both copyrights.) He held further that the breadth of the provision in s 4(2) of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (TPA) [now ACL, s 2(2)] as to the meaning of the phrase "engaging in conduct" was such that the term "conduct" would embrace the giving of warranties in an agreement without any anterior representation or other conduct. If those warranties were inaccurate at the time when given, the giving of them could be capable of constituting misleading or deceptive conduct within the meaning of s 52 of the TPA [now ACL, s 18] and attracting remedies under ss 82 and 87 [now ACL, ss 236 and 237 respectively].

The judge made an order under s 87, declaring the Castle Douglas agreement void ab initio. He held further that CCH, although not itself a party to that agreement, was entitled to recover damages under s 82. This was because, in the belief that copyright had been assigned to Castle Douglas, it took a licence from Castle Douglas, so that the conduct of Developments was a direct cause of CCH's expenditure under its licence. Developments appealed to the Full Court.]

LOCKHART AND GUMMOW JJ: [380] It will be recalled that the phrase in subs 52 (1) is "engage in conduct" and that the concluding words, "or is likely to mislead or deceive" were inserted by the Trade Practices Amendment Act 1977 (the 1977 Act). The 1977 Act also substituted a new s 45 and added ss 45A, 45B, 45C, 45D as well as making other significant changes to the legislation. [Their Honours set out s 4(2)(a) and continued:]

[496] In our view, there was a breach of both … warranties on the date they were given 23 December 1988 if there was infringement of the Focus system by the AS system. It will be noted from the terms of para 6 of the pleading that the representations relied upon are said to have been made "prior to 23 December 1988", and to have been made not only to Castle Douglas, the party to the Castle

Douglas agreement, but also to CCH. However, the particulars indicate that the representations were said to have been made in the agreement itself …

The trade practices issue

[470] In our view, the primary judge reached the correct result on this issue.

We reach this conclusion by the following steps:

(1) As is the case with Part IV of the TPA, the evident purpose and policy underlying Part V, which includes s 52, recommends a broad construction of its constituent provisions, the legislation being of a remedial character so that it should be construed so as to give the fullest relief which the fair meaning of its language will allow …

(2) [504] Section 52 should be construed against the background of the general law, but the Court should not be inhibited from giving effect to what on its proper construction is provided for in the legislation by the consideration that to do so may result in the imposition of liabilities and the administration of remedies which differ from those supplied by the general law …

(3) Whilst s 52 speaks of "conduct", many of the decided cases have dealt with that species of conduct which involves what at general law would be classified as "representations" as to a present state of affairs. But it is necessary to keep steadily in mind when dealing with the statute that "representation" is not co-extensive with "conduct".

(4) Various provisions of Div 2 of Part V imply conditions and warranties in certain consumer transactions and the application thereof may be excluded or modified; see ss 68, 69, 70, 71, 72. Where these implied conditions are breached, a special right of rescission is given by s 75A: Australian Guarantee Corporation Ltd v Jennings [1981] 1 NSWLR 50. Here, the complaint concerns an express not an implied "warranty" and Div 1 of Part V and the remedies in Part VI are relied upon.

(5) There is a particular risk in the present case with the immediate transfer of common law concepts to the construction of the statute. It arises from a misconception as to the nature of the general law. Representations are generally perceived as extra-contractual, that is to say if fraudulent, as tortious, and whether innocent or fraudulent, as providing a ground in equity of rescission of the transaction entered into as a consequence hereof …. On the other hand, the term "warranty" generally is perceived as identifying (i) a species of contractual affirmation of fact or promise or, alternatively, (ii) not as a promise but as a representation of fact, the truth of which is a condition precedent to the obligation of the other party to perform the contract. (As to this latter use of "warranty", see McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377 at 407–10; Corbin on Contracts, 1963, para 14.) As to the former use of "warranty", Williston points out, after giving several definitions:

> It should be observed that under these definitions, a warranty is not necessarily a promise or contract. The law of warranty is older by a century than special assumpsit, and the action on the case on a warranty was in part the foundation of the action of assumpsit. An action on a warranty was regarded for centuries as an action of deceit, and it was not until the second half of the eighteenth century that the first reported decision occurs of an action in assumpsit on a warranty. And it is still generally possible where a [470] distinction of procedure is observed between actions of tort and of contract to frame the declaration for breach of warranty in tort. It is probable that most persons instinctively think of a warranty as necessarily a contract or promise, but though frequently warranties are true promises and contracts, in other cases they are merely representations which induce a sale … (Williston on Contracts, 3rd ed, 1964, section 970).

(6) … [T]he terms of cl 3.1 of the Castle Douglas agreement in paras (b) and (c) contains what are therein described as two warranties by Developments in favour of Castle Douglas. Each warranty speaks as to a present state of affairs. It follows from what has been said above that the Court should resist the temptation to reason that (i) s 52 is concerned with representations (rather than the larger concept of "conduct"), and (ii) cl 3.1 of the Castle Douglas agreement is concerned with what are therein identified as "warranties" and "warranty" is a concept distinct from "representation", so as to take cl 3.1 outside s 52.

(7) The text of para 4(2)(a) of the TPA, which was inserted by the 1977 Act, has been set out. In terms, the paragraph includes, within the sense of conduct "in this Act", the making of or giving effect to of a provision of a contract. The 1977 Act is to be construed with the TPA and as part thereof, in the absence of a contrary intention: Acts Interpretation Act 1901, s 15. The word "conduct" appears elsewhere than in s 52, in particular in various provisions of Part IV which were added or amended by the 1977 Act. Examples are found in sub-s 45(6), sub-s 45B(2) and s 45D. The 1977 Act also introduced into Part V s 55A. This is a provision proscribing certain "conduct". Paragraph 4(2)(a) should not be read as confined in its application to Part IV. Other provisions of Part V, for example ss 52 and 55, already operated by reference to certain "conduct". And, as we have indicated, s 52 was in another respect (the addition of the words "or is likely to mislead or deceive") amended by the 1977 Act. Essential provisions of Part VI, dealing with remedies, ss 80 and 87, have been from the introduction of the legislation so drawn as to refer to "conduct". Section 82 in dealing with contraventions of Part IV and Part V, originally spoke of persons suffering loss or damage "by an act of another person". The 1977 Act introduced a new s 82 which gave an action for damages for persons suffering loss or damage "by conduct …".

(8) The result of this examination of the provisions of the legislation before and after the 1977 Act is that para 4(2)(a), in dealing with "conduct" operates generally, in its terms, so that the TPA after the 1977 Act, was to be read as "one connected and combined statement of the will of Parliament …": Sweeney v Fitzhardinge (1906) 4 CLR 716 at 735. So understood, para 4(2)(a) provides significant support for the conclusion reached in this case by the primary Judge, and for the general proposition that the making of a statement as to a presently existing state of affairs, if false, may be the engaging in misleading or deceptive conduct, where the statement is embodied as a provision of a contract. In many cases, there will have been pre-contractual conduct which itself contravenes s 52. The present case is a striking one because it was [506] presented on a narrower basis, and concerned the giving of the warranties in the contract itself.

(9) Where the conduct relied upon involves not a statement as to presently existing state of affairs, but a presentation with respect to a future matter, which is contained purely in a contractual promise, then a case for contravention of s 52 will involve consideration of the extra steps spelled out in s 51A of the TPA …

(10) In the present litigation, the significance of the contravention of s 52 was to enliven the powers of the Court under ss 82 and 87. This emphasises that s 52 does not purport to create liability, nor to vest in any party any cause of action in the ordinary sense of that term; rather, it establishes a norm of conduct and failure by those to whom it is addressed, in its various operations, to observe that norm has the consequences provided for in the remedial provisions which found primarily in Part VI: Tobacco Institute of Australia Ltd v Australian Federation of Consumer Organisations Inc (1988) 19 FCR 469 at 473–4.

(11) Where contravention of s 52 is linked with a claim for damages under s 82 and the representation complained of was a contractual warranty, it may be necessary to consider whether the measure of damages that would be recoverable under s 82 would differ from that available at common law for breach of the warranty ….

(12) It also needs to be borne in mind that, in a case such as the present, standing to seek remedies under Part VI, such as those provided for in ss 82 and 87, is not limited to parties in contractual relations with the party which contravened s 52 …. It is no objection to relief under these provisions that the misleading conduct is found in the making of a contractual provision, and the complainant does not have contractual privity with the defendant. This may be contrasted with the uncertain (and perhaps unsatisfactory) state of the general law disclosed in Trident General Insurance Co Ltd v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (1988) 165 CLR 107; there the plaintiff did not plead any count alleging contravention of s 52.

(13) The orders made by the primary judge in this case proceeded upon the footing described above. Consistently with what has been said, the applicants for the relief included not only Castle Douglas, the party to the Castle Douglas agreement, but also CCH, which controlled Castle Douglas, and the relief under ss 82 and 87 was obtained not only against Developments but its confederate, Systems 2000.

For these reasons, we conclude that the primary judge correctly decided the trade practices issue ….

The question then is whether his Honour is correct in deciding the copyright infringement in such a way as to involve breaches of paras (b) and (c) of cl 3.1 of the Castle Douglas agreement.

[Their Honours proceeded to find that the primary judge was also correct on the copyright infringement issue.]

[395] The appeal should be dismissed.

[NORTHROP J delivered a dissenting judgment in which he held that the words of inclusion in s 4(2)(a) applied only to the making of a contract or arrangement or an understanding of the kind referred to in Pt IV of the TPA and had no application to s 52.]

Appeal dismissed.

Futuretronics International v Gadzhis

[33.155] Futuretronics International Pty Ltd v Gadzhis [1992] 2 VR 217 (Supreme Court of Victoria).

[FACTS: The plaintiff (Futuretronics) put up a commercial building for sale by public auction. The conditions of sale stated that the successful bidder should pay the deposit and sign the contract of sale immediately the property was knocked down to her or him. If this was not done within 20 minutes, the vendor could recommence the auction or sell by other means to another person. The conditions also provided that the vendor or his representative could bid. In fact bids were made on behalf of the vendor, but the twelfth and final bid of $2.25 million was made by the defendant, Mr Gadzhis. Shortly after the property was knocked down to him, the defendant informed the auctioneer (Mr Sweet) that he did not intend to sign the contract of sale. The auctioneer attempted to persuade Mr Gadzhis that he was obliged to sign but to no avail. The plaintiff sued the defendant for breach of a collateral contract to sign the contract of sale, and for contravention of s 11 of the Fair Trading Act 1985 (Vic) [now ACL, s 18].]

ORMISTON J: [The judge first found that although the defendant at the time of making the bid intended to be bound by the auction conditions, and although an oral contract including a term requiring signature was formed when the defendant's bid was accepted, this contract was unenforceable for failure to satisfy the Instruments Act 1958 (Vic). The judge then turned to the claim under the Fair Trading Act 1985.]

[233] The alternative claim pleaded by the plaintiff relied on the provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1985. In particular the plaintiff asserted that the defendant's bid "constituted a representation to the plaintiff, and the defendant thereby warranted, that the bid was genuine and that he intended to be bound by the auction conditions." The plaintiff further asserted that the representation was untrue and "at the time of making the representation the defendant did not believe, and there was no reasonable grounds to believe, that he would comply with the auction conditions by paying the said deposit and signing the said contract of sale." It should be added that the plaintiff also alleged that it had, "in reliance on the defendant's said bid, instructed the auctioneer to conclude the auction, sought no further bids and did not negotiate with any prospective purchasers for the sale of the land to them." Reliance by the plaintiff was disputed but it was not seriously suggested in argument that the plaintiff, through his agent the auctioneer, "had sought no further bids" at the auction. It is clear that the auction took the usual course in that, when Mr Gadzhis's bid was made, it was announced that the property was "on the market" and then the auctioneer sought further bids from those present, although he was unsuccessful in obtaining any response.

Returning to the alleged representations, it should be noted that they are confined to the genuineness of the bid and the defendant's intention to be bound by the auction conditions. Nevertheless in final address the plaintiff argued that the defendant falsely represented by his bid "that he would sign the auction contract if it was accepted." Of course, the factual basis relied upon was the same for the representation whether as pleaded or argued, namely the single bid made by Mr Gadzhis at the auction by raising his hand when the price reached $2.25 million. The defendant had said nothing at the relevant time and his only other relevant conduct was to remain silent and not retract or deny his bid when Mr Sweet said the property was "on the market" and unsuccessfully sought further bids from those present. That conduct amounted to an offer by Mr Gadzhis to purchase the property which was accepted by the plaintiff's auctioneer on knocking the property down to him. Thereby in law the defendant impliedly agreed to purchase the property, although enforcement of that agreement was in practice and in law restricted by the absence of the required memorandum in writing. The plaintiff contended that the defendant, at the time of the offer or the acceptance thereof, did not believe, and there was no reasonable ground to believe, that he would comply with the auction conditions by paying the deposit and signing the said contract of sale. It was thus argued that the making of the defendant's offer in those circumstances constituted in itself misleading or deceptive conduct. But, as I have already held, Mr Gadzhis had no belief or intention that he would not comply with the auction conditions when he made his bid. Only afterwards, that is after the property was knocked down to him, did he change his mind and refuse to sign.

It might be argued that the relevant misleading and deceptive conduct extended beyond the implicit representation made [234] in the bid and that, in the case of promissory conduct, both the promise and the breach may be characterised as constituting the relevant conduct. So, it appears, argue Greig and Davis in their work The Law of Contract (1987) at pp 813–15, a passage which obtained qualified approval from Kearney J in his consideration of the provisions of the equivalent New South Wales legislation, the Fair Trading Act 1987, in Holt v Biroka Pty Ltd (1988) ASC 55-674 at 58, 104-58, 105; (1988) 13 NSWLR 629 at 635–6. In the present case, however, the plaintiff pleaded no claim in terms of a representation as to future conduct and confined its allegation to two representations (a) that the bid was genuine and (b) that Mr Gadzhis intended to be bound by the auction conditions. Neither was expressed and must be implied from the nature of the bid, if those representations are to be made out. It is not necessarily obvious that what amounts to a bid, and thus in law an offer, must amount also to a representation, whether as to the genuineness of that bid or as to the bidder's current intention to be bound if the bid is accepted. It clearly amounts to an offer which, if accepted has certain legal consequences, at least in normal circumstances. As the Full Federal Court said in considering s 52 of the Trade Practices Act:

> The non-fulfilment of a promise when the time for performance arrives does not of itself establish that the promisor did not intend to perform it when it was made or that the promisor's intention lacked any, or any adequate, foundation. Similarly, that a prediction proves inaccurate does not of itself establish that the maker of the prediction did not believe that it would eventuate or that the belief lacked any, or any adequate, foundation.

Those observations were made, however, in relation to proceedings to which s 51A of the Trade Practices Act, the equivalent of s 10A of the Fair Trading Act, was not applicable.

Both ss 51A and 10A [now ACL, s 4] have been thought to expand the potential scope of each Act in relation to promissory conduct, but the language of each section is specific and is directed to representations as to "future" matters.

[His Honour then set out s 10A of the Fair Trading Act.]

Notwithstanding that each section has been enacted for some years there is surprisingly little authority as to their precise meaning and none was cited in argument. See, however, Adelaide Petroleum NL v Poseidon Ltd (1988) ATPR 49,695 at 49,700; Wheeler Grace and Pierucci Pty Ltd v Wright (1989) [235] ATPR 40-940 at 50,254–5; Wright v TNT Management Pty Ltd (1989) ATPR 40-929 at 50,060–2; (1989) 15 NSWLR 679 at 689–90; and compare French J, "A Lawyer's Guide to Misleading or Deceptive Conduct" (1989) 63 ALJ 250 at 259–61. The relatively brief discussion therein of the new section leaves it by no means clear whether the incurring of a contractual obligation of itself should be taken as amounting to a representation as to future conduct.

It is not difficult to see that particular promises may be expressed in terms which can properly be characterised as representations as to future conduct, albeit that the promises form part of the process of making a contract. It is another matter to take obligations arising under a contract and imply from them representations from each side that it will perform the agreed obligations. Ordinarily each party is thereby bound, so any further representation as to the performance of the contractual obligations is superfluous, unless sought for some special reason. However, it is important to examine with some care Wright v TNT Management, where the alleged representation was that the respondent employer would provide in the future a reasonably safe system of work and reasonably competent staff for the appellant employee. The appellant's difficulty was that such a term was not expressly agreed but arose only by implication of law. As Clarke JA said (at 50,066; 697):

> The case must be distinguished from one in which an employer makes an express representation or makes statements which give rise to the implication that it is representing that a certain state of affairs exists or that a certain course of conduct will be followed in future. Putting to one side the problems which arise when statements as to future intentions are made there is a reasonable argument that statements made by an employer, whether constituting an express representation or as giving rise to an implied one, constitute an engagement in conduct which, if the representation is incorrect, was misleading or likely to mislead.

After discussing the various categories of implied terms and in particular those which are implied as a matter of law, his Honour concluded on this subject (at 50,068; 698): "But where the only conduct of the respondent was the entry into a contract in which, as a matter of law, a term or warranty was implied I am unable to accept that because the warranty was later breached any question of misleading conduct arises."

Mahoney JA took a similar view treating, as I understand it, the word "warranty" as the equivalent of "representation". His Honour made these observations (at 50,057; 684):

> A warranty as to what an employer will or may do for his worker may come into existence in at least three ways. It may be given expressly by the employer; it may be given by him by implication, in the sense that, though the words of warranty are not expressed, there is to be inferred from what the employer did the actual giving of the warranty; or, though the employer had no actual intention or purpose to give the warranty, it may be imputed to him by law. And, of course, that imputation may occur by force only of the common law or because of the statutory stipulations to that effect.
> Where the warranty arises because, expressly or by implication, the employer intended it to be given, the circumstances may warrant the worker taking from the making of the contract of employment that the employer will do what he warrants. The warranty, in the > circumstances, may give the worker to understand that that will be so. In such a case, the conclusion will be open that, from the conduct of the employer in doing what he did, the [236] worker was to take it that the employer would act in a particular way. And, if the employer had, for example, no intention or no provision for doing so, then the conclusion may be open that that which the worker took from the contract of employment would mislead.

> But, in my opinion, this does not follow where the warranty arises by imputation. If, for example, there be nothing more than that, absent actual intention, the law imputes or imposes on the employer the relevant warranty, it by no means follows that the worker may, in the relevant sense, take from the making of the contract of employment that the employer will, or will be able to, do what the warranty requires.

It is interesting to note that the analysis in both Mahoney and Clarke JJA's judgments depended upon s 52 of the Trade Practices Act and not upon s 51A which was not expressly pleaded. On the other hand the opposite conclusion was reached by the dissenting member of the court, McHugh JA. Although he reached that conclusion, he did not do so by reason of the direct application of s 52 but only in reliance on s 51A and he would have allowed an amendment to be made for that section to be raised. Moreover, he did not take the view that a contractual promise automatically imputed a representation by the promisor of a kind that would constitute misleading or deceptive conduct. He pointed out that s 52 had received an interpretation which had led to the conclusion that a promise of future conduct was not actionable unless it implied a representation as to an existing or past fact: 50,060; 688. He referred with approval to the analysis (of different legislation) by MacKenna J in R v Sunair Holidays Ltd [1973] 1 WLR 1105 at 1110, in which his Lordship said:

> A statement that a fact exists now, or that it existed in the past, is either true or false at the time when it is made. But it is not the case with a promise or a prediction about the future. A prediction may come true or it may not. A promise to do something in the future may be kept or it may be broken. But neither the prediction nor the promise can be said to have been true or false at the time when it was made.

After referring to the conclusion of the Federal Court in Global Sportsman Pty Ltd v Mirror Newspapers Pty Ltd at ATPR 45,344; FCR 88, he said that "to overcome this difficulty" s 51A had been enacted in the Trade Practices Act: at 50,061; 689. Having set out that section in full he concluded (at 50,061; 698): "The plaintiff contended that a promise by an employer to provide a reasonably safe system of work and reasonably competent staff is a representation that they will be provided in the future for the purposes of s 51A. I think that this submission is correct in principle."

Later his Honour explained his conclusion (at 50,061; 690):

> At common law a representation outside a contract would only give rise to legal consequences if it was in respect of an existing or past fact; a contractual promise as to the future did have legal consequences. But for the purposes of Pt V, s 51A must be taken to have abolished the distinction between a promise and a representation with respect to a future event. A promise to do something in the future is to be regarded as a representation that it will be performed. It will be deemed misleading, therefore, unless the corporation proves that it had reasonable grounds for making the promise.

It can thus be seen that s 51A was critical to his Honour's conclusions and it is by no means clear that he would have agreed with the general observations of the members of the majority as to the nature and effect of a [237] contractual promise for the purposes of s 52 except in so far as the operation of that section has been modified by the passing of s 51A. As all relevant legislation now contains the new section or an equivalent thereto, being s 10A of the Fair Trading Act of 1985 in Victoria, perhaps the differences are not as significant as they may appear, for the end result is that each of their Honours considered that certain contractual promises might give rise to a claim for misleading or deceptive conduct.

No final view emerges for present purposes from Wright v TNT Management Pty Ltd, as the majority denied liability in respect of an alleged representation arising out of merely an imputed obligation. No member of the court, however, took a narrow view of the applicability of the Trade Practices Act to contractual promises.

A more cautious approach might appear in Lee J's judgment in the Federal Court in Wheeler Grace and Pierucci Pty Ltd v Wright 40-940 at 50,254 where his Honour made the following observations:

> Section 51A(1) has the effect of either stating the law as it stood prior to the amendment or extending it. Section 51A(3) makes it clear that the reference to a misleading representation is not to be taken to limit the meaning of misleading conduct. It is to be noted that s 51A(1) is concerned only with misrepresentations and not with the broader concept of conduct. It, therefore, has direct relevance to s 53, for example, but indirect operation upon s 52. The section provides that a representation with respect to any future matter "shall be taken to be misleading" if the corporation does not have reasonable grounds for making the representation. It does not deem such a representation to be misleading conduct. It provides that representations "shall be taken to be misleading" which indicates that there is a matter of judgment or decision remaining to be exercised as to the quality of the representation.

However his Honour thought that the appeal should be dismissed without the necessity to consider finally the operation and construction of s 51A. The other members of the court (Neaves and Burchett JJ) did not discuss the new section. Likewise in Adelaide Petroleum NL v Poseidon Ltd, a pleading summons, it was not necessary for French J to reach any conclusion as to its operation, his comments being confined to the possibility of giving particulars of a plea relying on the new section. His Honour, however, in the paper I have cited, makes detailed comments on its intended operation, not entirely inconsistent with the views to which I have referred of McHugh J and Kearney J. At p 260 of his article, he said:

> The requirement that the misleading character of a statement be determined at the time it is made may nevertheless be consistent with the proposition that leads its hearer to form a presently mistaken view of the future. Although it may be seen by some as an approach to the problem more at home in the general theory of relativity than in the law, it is not inconsistent with the way that the words "mislead" and "deceive" and related terms are applied in ordinary usage. The disappointed promisee may properly say "You misled me when you said you would do X". And if I predict rain tomorrow and it is fine I can quite reasonably be told — "your prediction was wrong." For both promises and predictions are statements about future events. If the represented events do not occur, it is arguable that the statements are wrong at the time they were made. On this view it [238] may take the passage of time to disclose that fact but an incorrect statement of future events always was and remains wrong.

The view so expressed was said by the author to depend on the proper interpretation of s 52 itself not upon s 51A. As to that he said (at 261):

> Every representation with respect to any future matter is thereby misleading unless there are reasonable grounds for making it at the time that it is made. The onus of showing the existence of such grounds lies on the representor. The fact that the representor intended to perform the promise or believe that the prediction will be fulfilled does not shift that burden.

Likewise Greig and Davis in their work on the Law of Contract take a broad view of the operation of s 52 and treat s 51A as merely altering the onus of proof: at 813. The learned authors contend (814–15):

> So too in the case of promissory statements, it is arguable that the necessary conduct can consist of both the initial promise and its subsequent breach. It will be recalled that the High Court (in the Hornsby Building Centre case (1978) 140 CLR 216 and Parkdale v Puxu > (1982) 149 CLR 191) had said that a contravention of s 52 is constituted by conduct which reasonably leads the applicant into error. If the respondent makes a contractual promise, the applicant may reasonably believe that it will be performed; when the promise is not performed, the applicant's belief is found to be erroneous, and it may fairly be said that the respondent's original promise, together with a subsequent repudiation thereof, is conduct which led the applicant into error. The essential question is the nature of the error into which the applicant has been led.

I find the latter observations difficult to follow, as I find the earlier comments in the paper by French J. If a promissory statement is to be the subject of complaint, it is also necessary to ask how did it amount to misleading or deceptive conduct. It is wrong to view every contractual obligation as an unqualified promise to perform the stipulated act. Indeed it is rare that a contractual promise is not in some way qualified by some reciprocal obligation to be performed by the promisee or by some other circumstance. If the promise induced the other party to enter into the agreement, as one can readily accept it would, then it is that promise and the circumstances then surrounding it which must be examined. The promise can only be said to be misleading or deceptive if it was in some way inaccurate; otherwise every mutual contractual promise will constitute misleading or deceptive conduct, a consequence which I cannot believe those who drafted the Act intended. If intention be relevant, the promise may be misleading if the promissor had no intention to fulfil it at the time it was made and accepted. If intention be irrelevant, then the promise may be misleading if the promisor had no ability to perform it at that time. If one were to go to the breach to determine whether there has been misleading or deceptive conduct, the breach may, but only may, provide some evidence from which one could infer that the promisor never intended or never had the ability to fulfil his obligation. Otherwise, if one combines promise and breach, the question must arise: in what way has the plaintiff been deceived or led into error? If it is said that he was misled into entering into the contract, then the breach is irrelevant, for that breach could have played no part in misleading him. If one moves to the later stage, it is possible that the two events might induce the other party to take some [239] further step, but the promisor's combined actions could not be characterised as misleading or deceptive at the time the promisee was induced to accept the promise because the breach had not occurred at that stage. In my opinion the mere acceptance of the promise by a promisee cannot ordinarily be characterised as being led into error. In the usual case the consequence would be that the promisee has enforceable rights. It is hard to believe that normally any promisee with ordinary contractual rights would then describe himself as having been deceived or misled. It is only when it becomes apparent that the promise cannot be enforced, because, for example, it is either unenforceable or the promisee's rights are valueless or diminished, that one may return to the original promise to inquire whether that promise was of so little substance that it can be concluded that the promisee was indeed misled or deceived in the first place, at the time of his acceptance of the promise. Thus it may then be seen that the promisor originally had no intention to perform his promise or that he originally had no capacity or ability to perform it. Now, however, by reason of s 10A (and s 51A) the inquiry is apparently broader for one must also inquire whether at the relevant time the promisor had reasonable grounds for making any implicit representation (where relevant) that he intended in the future to perform his contractual promise, and for this purpose the onus of proof is reversed. Nevertheless the section does not say in what circumstances a representation as to a future matter shall be implied from a contractual promise ….

The present issue as to promissory statements remains unresolved by authority, so far as I have been able to determine, some four years after s 51A was passed in the federal Parliament and three years after s 10A of the Fair Trading Act was passed in the State Parliament. No authority yet binds me to reach one conclusion or the other. I have expressed my doubts whether a contractual promise of itself carries with it any representation as to fact or conduct. Wright v TNT Management Pty Ltd suggests that it is only the imputed obligation which is excluded from the possible operation of s 52, although the logic of excluding obligations implied by law is not so obvious if all other terms are to be treated as implying a representation as to future conduct. It would seem on the authorities that, at the least, a contractual promise would amount to an implied representation that the promisor then had an intention to carry out that promise. If it can be shown that he had no such intention, he would be guilty of misleading or deceptive conduct. Likewise it would seem that such a representation connotes a present ability to fulfil that promise which, if shown to be untrue at the time of making, would likewise characterise the implied representation as misleading or deceptive.

[240] It is not easy to fit ss 51A and 10A into the scheme of each Act if the broader view should prevail. One of the principal difficulties is subs (3) in each case which says that subs (1) shall be deemed not to limit by implication the meaning of any reference in the Division to, inter alia, "conduct that is misleading or is likely … to mislead". One can understand that the section should not be treated as qualifying by implication the types of conduct which can be characterised as misleading or deceptive. It is another to say that the section does not show in what way a defendant can establish that a representation as to the future which is "taken to be misleading" does not amount to a contravention of s 52 or s 11, as the case may be; for subs (2), by negative implication, says that, if a person adduces evidence that he had "reasonable grounds for making the representation" as to future conduct, then the representation shall no longer be taken to be misleading. If those who maintain that implied promise plus breach are sufficient to constitute misleading conduct are correct, then the question whether the promisor had reasonable grounds for making the representation would be irrelevant. It would be sufficient, on that hypothesis, to show that the promisee was "led into error" by reason of the promise subsequently broken, regardless of the promisor's having reasonable grounds for making the representation. Thus, despite the apparently restrictive words of subs (3), the basis for holding that a promise amounts to misleading conduct must be that it carries with it an implication that the promisor had no reasonable grounds for making the representation, that is, the promise. If he overcomes the section's presumption against him, by proof to the contrary, then it follows that his representation and thus his conduct was not misleading, for present purposes. Otherwise each of the inserted sections would be pointless in so far as it purports to qualify, or expand, s 52 and s 11.

In my opinion, therefore, accepting that ss 51A and 10A each assumes that a promise may give rise to an implied representation that the promisor will perform an act in the future, namely the promised act, then the promisee is not, in proceedings under s 52 or 11, bound to show that the promisor had no intention or no ability to perform the promise at the time of its making. The promisor will be deemed not to have reasonable grounds for making the representation or promise, unless he satisfies the court by evidence to the contrary that he had reasonable grounds for making that representation. He may achieve this, in part, by showing that he had a genuine intention to perform his promise and that he had the ability at the time to perform it, but in the end he must show objectively that he had reasonable grounds for making the representation. For present purposes I am not prepared to accept that the plaintiff can make out its case by showing merely promise and breach. In my opinion, that evidence, on its own, is insufficient to show that the promisee was "led into error" unless the plaintiff can rely on s 10A or 51A. If there is no element of actual or deemed misrepresentation then the promisee can have been led into no error, nor can it be said to have been misled, by reason of some subsequent breach which causes it harm or loss. If the facts connote no error or misrepresentation, nothing thereby led it to take a course which was erroneous.

It follows from what has been said that I am not persuaded that one should treat every contractual promise as giving rise to an implied [241] representation of the kind referred to in s 10A and s 51A. However, I am persuaded that if there be an unconditional promise which forms part of the contractual obligations, then it is proper to treat the giving of that promise, at least in the ordinary case, as the making of a representation as to a future matter, being either the doing of an act or the refusing [sic] to do an act, being in each case the subject of the promise. Perhaps conditional promises may also be treated as the making of a representation as to future conduct, but in each case the qualified terms of the promise would usually lead to the conclusion that the maker had reasonable grounds therefor, unless it could be shown that under no circumstances would the promisor have fulfilled his promise. It is, however, not necessary to determine this latter point.

In the present case the plaintiff by its statement of claim alleged that the making of the defendant's bid amounted to a representation that the bid was genuine and that he intended to be bound by the auction conditions. My earlier fact findings would deny the claim that the bid was not genuine at the moment it was made, but for the purposes of s 10A the allegation as to intention to be bound amounted in my opinion to a representation by Mr Gadzhis as to his future conduct. I say nothing as to the other conditions in the contract of sale, as they would depend on signature of that contract, but as to the obligation to sign the contract and pay the deposit, they are implicitly to be treated as the subject of a representation by the defendant that he intended to carry them out. Those obligations were effectively unconditional, certainly upon the knocking down of the property to the defendant. The only qualification might exist in the need for the vendor to submit a copy of the contract in proper form for him to sign, but there is no doubt that subject to the completion of name, address, price etc such an agreement was there in the theatrette to be signed. I am therefore prepared, in the light of my understanding of the intended operation of s 10A, to treat Mr Gadzhis as making a representation as to his future conduct, namely that he intended to sign that contract.

If that be correct, then the question arises whether Mr Gadzhis adduced evidence that he had reasonable grounds for making the representation, contrary to the allegation specifically made in the statement of claim. I have already found that at the time the property was knocked down to him he intended to buy the property and that he had no immediate purpose not to sign the contract. Is that sufficient to satisfy subs (2) of s 10A? An immediate difficulty arises in the sense that Mr Gadzhis did not himself "adduce evidence to the contrary". Indeed his version was that he never intended to be bound and that the vendor and Mr Sweet knew that, but that is a version I have rejected. In those circumstances it was not possible for the defendant to have a "fall-back" version to meet the allegation, but the question arises whether the court is entitled, on the whole of the evidence, to reach an affirmative conclusion at the relevant time he had reasonable grounds for his implied representation.

Certainly Mr Gadzhis was a successful investor in property. He may not have had his cheque book at the auction, but that would be a difficulty easily overcome in the circumstances if he had wished to pay. Moreover, at the time of the bid and at the time it was accepted, he intended, as I have found, to purchase the property. Although he later changed his mind because he wished to negotiate the terms of the sale, I have no reason to believe that he could not have fulfilled the required obligations. It must, however, be said [242] that no evidence was led as to this matter of his ability to pay the full consideration within 90 days of the sale as laid down in the contract conditions announced at the auction. Moreover, para 24 of his amended defence, the defendant admitted that "he did not believe … that the defendant would comply with the auction conditions by paying the deposit and signing the contract of sale." In these circumstances I cannot be satisfied, even if I were to look at the whole of the evidence, that Mr Gadzhis had reasonable grounds for making the implied representation. As he has failed to adduce evidence to the contrary, taking those words in their broadest sense, he is deemed by subs (2) of s 10A not to have reasonable grounds for making the representation and thus by subs (1) must be taken to have been misleading.

Nevertheless, what follows from his finding of misleading conduct is not obvious. The primary contention of the defendant was that the plaintiff had not relied on this misleading conduct. For present purpose I must accept that reliance is critical to the making out of the case under the Fair Trading Act ….

It is perhaps implicit rather than explicit that the need for reliance relates to the availability of any remedy to the person misled or deceived rather than to the fact of contravention. The conduct proscribed by s 11 (and s 52) includes conduct that is misleading or deceptive but also that which is likely to mislead or deceive …

The defendant argued that the plaintiff had in no way relied upon the implicit representation contained in the bid. It pointed to the fact that immediately after the auction was completed Mr Gadzhis indicated clearly his intention not to sign the auction contract. Thereafter it was fully aware of his position and of the fact that it had no written memorandum by which to enforce the agreement against him. However, I think the correct analysis is that in relation to the representation pleaded, namely a representation contained in the bid itself that he intended to be bound by the auction conditions and thus impliedly represented that he would sign the contract, there was reliance by the plaintiff on his acts. For this purpose the auctioneer was the vendor's agent and although the allegation that he sought no further bids was wrong, he certainly acted upon the assumption that Mr Gadzhis intended to make a genuine bid and thereby was led to announce that the property was on the market and thereafter to knock it down to Mr Gadzhis. To that extent the vendor by its agent relied on the implicit representation that he would sign the contract once his bid was accepted. Thereafter, however, I see no basis for saying that the plaintiff relied upon the defendant's misleading conduct, for it was fully aware within a few minutes of the end of the auction that the defendant was no longer representing expressly or impliedly that he intended to sign the contract of sale. Its actions from that time were not carried out in reliance upon any representation of the defendant but only in reliance on its own assessment of its legal rights.

Thus it follows that there was some reliance by the plaintiff on the defendant's implied representation to this limited extent, limited in that it related to the offer, by way of bid, but not to the contractual promise implicit in its acceptance. To this I would add the rider that it could also be said that the auctioneers caused the theatrette to be cleared of the audience who had attended the auction. If there had been the slightest evidence that anyone present would have bid if the auction had been recommenced, that may have had some significance, but it is clear that every bid was either false or invented or made by or on behalf of Mr Gadzhis. The tenants made no bid, as had been hoped, and indeed any other bid below $2.25 million would not have been accepted. Moreover, the plaintiff's auctioneer chose to clear the theatrette and did not wait the required 20 minutes, after which the vendor would have had the right to resubmit the property for sale. Further there is no evidence that the plaintiff believed that the defendant would [244] waive its legal rights under the Instruments Act or that it was induced to act on the assumption that those rights would not be relied upon.

What follows from this finding of reliance, limited as it is? The plaintiff claimed that it was entitled to an order for specific performance of the promise contained in the bid as a remedy to which it was entitled pursuant to s 41 of the Fair Trading Act. By its counsel it specifically abandoned any claim for damages, except in so far as they might be claimed in lieu of specific performance, if it should eventuate that that remedy should be refused only on discretionary grounds.

Thus the plaintiff sought in respect of this misleading conduct that it should have a remedy by enforcing the promise which gave rise to the implied representation. There lay its difficulties, for it appears that this kind of legislation is primarily directed to compensating a party by reason of the fact that he has been misled or deceived. Thus in the leading case on damages under the Trade Practices Act, the High Court said the appropriate measure of damages in this type of case, at least, was reliance loss, not expectation loss; in other words the plaintiff is not normally allowed to claim for loss of his bargain: Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) ATPR 40-666; (1986) 160 CLR 1 …

The disappointed expectations of a person induced by misrepresentation to believe erroneously that his insurance policy entitles him to the payment of benefits on maturity or on the happening of a certain event are sometimes so great as to encourage the thought that compensation on the basis of lost expectations would be appropriate. However, neither authority nor principle offer support for adopting this approach. In all the cases in which a plaintiff has sought to recover damages on the footing that a representation amounts to a collateral contract, a fraudulent misrepresentation or a negligent misstatement, damages for expectation loss have only been awarded where the representation amounted to a collateral contract. Neither the fact that the representation induces entry into a contract nor the fact that it is a statement of the benefits to which the plaintiff will be entitled under that contract is enough to justify compensation for expectation loss.

It follows that under both the Trade Practices Act and the Fair Trading Act the remedies are designed to compensate for misleading or deception, not as a substitute means of enforcing promises. By looking at the error into which the plaintiff has been led and enquiring what is needed to remedy the loss flowing from that error one may determine the form of orders, wide though they may be, which will be appropriate to compensate that loss.

[245] Here the deception led to the knocking down of the property to Mr Gadzhis and the conclusion of the auction, but nothing more. If it could be shown that the error into which the plaintiff's auctioneer had been led had resulted in the loss of a sale to a genuine bidder, then all available remedies would have been appropriate to compensate the plaintiff. Of course, the obvious remedy in those circumstances would be damages, but rescission is a common remedy if a plaintiff desires to extract himself from a contract or other transaction into which he has been misled, so as to deal freely with the subject matter of the dispute. Here such a remedy is quite inappropriate as no enforceable contract arose, and the plaintiff was free to sell, and knew or should have known that it was free to sell within a few minutes of the auction. Thus it is clear from what occurred at the auction that there was no available alternative purchaser willing to bid. Even if there had been, the plaintiff had available to it a clause (the 20 minutes clause) of which it or at least its auctioneer was well aware, which would have enabled the auction soon to be restarted; so it might be argued that the plaintiff failed thereby to mitigate its loss. Once the defendant made his position clear, the plaintiff had been free to sell if any other purchaser had wished to buy. Because the plaintiff chose to commence and persist in the present action, it has only itself to blame if some offer could have been obtained but was not accepted; again it could be said that thereby it failed to mitigate its loss. No question as to mitigation in fact arose in argument, for damages were not pursued, but these matters show how limited is the harm flowing from the alleged representation. For all practical purposes the error caused by the representation was quickly dispelled and the plaintiff was not thereby entrapped by any obligation from which it was necessary to free itself. Essentially the remedies provided by the Fair Trading Act, especially those in s 41, are there to restore those affected by misleading or deceptive conduct to the position in which they were before any contravention of the Act take place.

There is thus, as counsel conceded, no relevant loss incurred or damage suffered in the present case, unless the plaintiff could have enforced the inchoate agreement or be compensated for its loss of bargain. The plaintiff is in law, and has been since a few minutes after the conclusion of the auction, in exactly the same position as it was immediately before the auction commenced and the short delay before the defendant made his position clear did not lead to any other loss. There is not even any suggestion that the cost of the auction was thrown away, for indeed there otherwise would have been no purchaser and the same expenditure incurred. No authority was cited for the proposition that specific performance of the promise could be obtained and the only relevant authority (under the Trade Practices Act) Milchas Investments Pty Ltd v Larkin (1989) ATPR 40-956, esp at 50,441, suggests the contrary. I am not persuaded that there is power to make an order that a promise, especially a promise of this kind, should be specifically performed. Certainly it is not here appropriate to make such an order. It should be remembered that the powers under s 41 may be exercised only if the court considers that the order "will compensate the (plaintiff) in whole or in part for the loss or damage or will prevent or reduce the loss or damage". As the relevant loss or damage is confined in the manner I have suggested above, so an order [246] akin to an order for specific performance would not appropriately compensate for that loss, but would give a different and wider remedy, not contemplated by the Act.

For these reasons the plaintiff's claim under the Fair Trading Act should be dismissed.

Judgment for the defendant.

Statements of opinions, belief and law

[33.160] The fact that a statement is expressed as an opinion does not prevent it from being a form of misleading conduct. However, an opinion cannot be characterised as misleading simply because subsequent events show that the opinion was incorrect.

Before the introduction of a statutory prohibition against misleading or deceptive conduct, statements of opinion, belief or law were actionable under the common law doctrine of misrepresentation (see Chapter 32), even though the doctrine only applied to representations of fact. The courts overcame this limitation by finding representations of fact implicit in the making of the statement. For example, if I stated that an agreement was contractually binding (a statement of law), I would be viewed as impliedly representing that I genuinely believed the agreement in question to be contractual and that there was a reasonable basis for my opinion, perhaps I have a legal qualification or have received legal advice on the matter.

Global Sportsman Pty Ltd v Mirror Newspapers Pty Ltd (1984) 2 FCR 82, 88 provides an example of the courts employing the common law approach to determine whether the statutory prohibition against misleading conduct had been breached. The Full Federal Court set out the principles that apply when determining whether the giving of an opinion is misleading:

> An expression of opinion which is identifiable as such conveys no more than that the opinion expressed is held and perhaps that there is a basis for the opinion. At least if those conditions are met, an expression of opinion, however erroneous, misrepresents nothing.

Courts have also analysed statements of belief by deriving implied statements of fact that the statement of belief was genuine and had a reasonable foundation at the time it was made. In Havyn Pty Ltd v Webster [2005] NSWCA 182, the purchaser of a block of six flats alleged that a statement in a brochure that each flat was approximately 63 square metres in area was misleading because it overstated the average size of the flats by approximately 5 per cent. The statement was analysed as a statement of belief. The real estate agent arrived at the estimation in question by "pacing out" one of the units. As the method of estimation was so crude, it was held that there was no adequate foundation upon which the real estate agent could have had a rational belief that each flat was approximately 63 square metres in area. The statement of belief was therefore held to be misleading.

A misstatement of law may constitute misleading conduct. The courts again tend to focus on statements implied by the making of the statement. The expertise or the knowledge of the person making the statement will be relevant to determining whether a misstatement of law constitutes misleading or deceptive conduct. In Inn Leisure Industries Pty Ltd v DF McCloy Pty Ltd (1991) 28 FCR 151, the purchaser of a boating launch told the vendor erroneously that its intended use of the launch for game fishing attracted an exemption from sales tax. An audit by the Australian Tax Office resulted in the vendor being obliged to pay tax and a penalty. The vendor sought to recover the amounts paid on the basis that the purchaser's statement was misleading or deceptive. In the course of his judgment, French J said (at 167):

> A representation of law may be made in different ways which send different messages to the recipient. It may do no more than convey what is, on the face of it, the untutored opinion of the representor. As such it would be unlikely, if wrong, to constitute misleading or deceptive conduct … Expert advice as to the law may convey the representation that it is based upon an underlying body of knowledge, experience or expertise possessed by the person proffering it or to which that person has access. The situations in which advice, expert or otherwise, as to > the law may be misleading or deceptive for the purposes of s 52 [now ACL, s 18] will depend upon the context and circumstances in which it is proffered and the representations implied or expressed that accompany it.

French J held that the purchaser had done no more than express an inexpert opinion. Although the opinion was incorrect, the conduct was not misleading. The purchaser gave evidence that its statement was based on advice it received from its accountants. There was nothing to suggest that the opinion was not honestly held or that the advice had not been given. Therefore, although the opinion turned out to be inaccurate, the conduct was held not to breach the prohibition against misleading or deceptive conduct.

In Forrest v Australian Securities and Investments Commission [2012] HCA 39; (2012) 247 CLR 486 (at [33.162]) French CJ, Gummow, Hayne and Kiefel JJ were critical of classifying and analysing statements of the kind under discussion according to some preordained taxonomy. Instead, the court suggested that the analysis should be more closely focussed on what the impugned statements conveyed to their audience.

Forrest v ASIC

[33.162] Forrest v Australian Securities and Investments Commission [2012] HCA 39; (2012) 247 CLR 486 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Full Court of the Federal Court.

[FACTS: The Australian Securities and Investments Commission (ASIC) alleged that Fortescue Metals Group Ltd breached s 1041H of the Corporations Act 2001 (Cth). Section 1041H prohibits misleading and deceptive conduct in relation to financial products or services. Mr Forrest, the first appellant, was Fortescue's chairman and chief executive. He was said to be knowingly involved in the breach. ASIC identified 13 different communications said to have involved contravention of s 1041H. However ASIC's case was treated in argument as sufficiently identified by reference only to Fortescue's letter to the Australian Stock Exchange (ASX) and a media release, both sent on 23 August 2004. The media release and letter in question announced that Fortescue had entered into "binding contracts" with the Chinese Railway Engineering Corporation (CREC) to build and finance the railway component of one of Fortescue's proposed mining projects. The statements also contained a summary of what had been agreed. The agreements in fact lacked the requisite degree of certainty to be binding in law. They did not provide for the subject matter, scheduling or price for the works to be done, nor a mechanism to determining such matters. ASIC alleged that communications in question represented a false statement of fact, namely that binding, legal contracts were in existence at the time the statements were made. ASIC also pleaded that Fortescue had implicitly, but still falsely, represented it had a "genuine and reasonable basis" for making the statement. ASIC explained the inclusion of this argument in its pleadings as a pre-emptive strike against an argument it believed the appellants may make, namely that the statements in question were statements of opinion. On the approach prevailing at the time, if the statement were to be treated as an opinion, whether the giving of the opinion amounted to misleading conduct would be determined by considering whether Fortescue had a genuine or reasonable basis for making the statement.

Fortescue and Mr Forrest lost at first instance as the trial judge found that Fortescue had neither a genuine or reasonable basis for making the claim that the contracts were binding. Fortescue was successful on appeal to the Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia who refused to find that the genuine and reasonable basis findings resolved the issue. Fortescue and Mr Forrest appealed to the High Court].

FRENCH CJ, GUMMOW, HAYNE AND KIEFEL JJ:

[8] These reasons will demonstrate that the impugned statements were not misleading or deceptive or likely to mislead or deceive …

ASIC's claims

[20] Although there were variations in the way in which ASIC pleaded its case in respect of each of the 13 communications which it alleged were misleading or deceptive, there were important common elements. Having identified the relevant communication, ASIC pleaded in respect of each communication that (in the circumstances in which those communications were made "and against the background" of certain matters ASIC identified as information previously made available to the market or more generally) Fortescue "represented to, further or alternatively, created the impression for, reasonable investors in the ASX's financial market and persons obtaining access to [Fortescue's] website" that:

(a) Fortescue "had entered a binding contract" with CREC, CHEC or CMCC "obliging" that company to build and finance the relevant elements of infrastructure, and

(b) that Fortescue "had a genuine and reasonable basis for making" the relevant statement …

[24] ASIC sought to explain and justify the inclusion in its statement of claim of a plea that Fortescue had no genuine or reasonable basis for making the statements as a plea that anticipated Fortescue alleging that the impugned statements were expressions of opinion not fact. But it was neither necessary nor appropriate for ASIC to attempt to use its statement of claim to meet an answer that had not been made …

A "binding contract"

[32] Three possibilities must be considered: first, that the statements conveyed a message about what the agreements said; second, that they conveyed some message about "legal enforceability"; and third, that they conveyed a message which was a mixture of elements drawn from the first two possible constructions of what was said. It is the first possibility that is decisive of these appeals: the statements conveyed to their intended audience what the parties to the framework agreements had done and said they had done.

[33] As has already been noted, ASIC's argument in this Court hinged on the proposition that the impugned statements conveyed to their intended audience a view about the legal enforceability of the framework agreements. ASIC sought to describe what was conveyed as a matter of fact, submitting that "the words 'agreement' or 'binding agreement' convey that it is an agreement containing all of the essential elements that would constitute a contract under Australian law". While it is to be doubted that the proposition which ASIC identified is accurately, or at least sufficiently, described as a statement of "fact", it is ultimately unprofitable to attempt to classify the statement according to some taxonomy, no matter whether that taxonomy adopts as its relevant classes fact and opinion, fact and law, or some mixture of these classes. It is necessary instead to examine more closely and identify more precisely what it is that the impugned statements conveyed to their audience.

[34] It is convenient to begin that examination by noticing how the Full Court dealt with the issue. The Full Court concluded, first, that the impugned statements would have been understood as conveying the historical fact that agreements containing terms accurately summarised in the announcements had been made between the parties. Second, regardless of the subjective intentions of the parties, the question of whether the parties had made contracts of the kinds described was to be determined by taking an objective view of the agreements. Third, objectively assessed, the agreements would be held by an Australian court to be incomplete, because they did not provide for the subject matter, scheduling and price of the work to be done or any mechanism for determining those matters. And fourth, because the Full Court concluded that the agreements were incomplete in these respects, it was misleading or deceptive, or likely to mislead or deceive, to describe them each as a "binding contract".

[35] The critical step taken by the Full Court was from the first to the second. The Full Court did not conclude that the impugned statements had not accurately summarised what the framework agreements said. Rather, the Full Court moved from the identification of what the impugned statements conveyed about what had been said and done by the parties (properly described as matters of "historical fact") to an examination of the legal consequences that were to be attached to what those parties had said and done. The Full Court took this step on the basis that the examination of that question was necessary in order to decide whether what was said and done amounted to the making of "contracts". That is, the Full Court treated the references in the impugned statements to the parties having made a "binding contract" as conveying more than the message that the parties had made an agreement which they described as a "binding contract". Importantly, the Full Court treated the references to "binding contract" as conveying more than the message that the parties had made an agreement which the commercial community (or some relevant section or sections of it, such as "investors") would describe in the terms Fortescue had used in its statements. And critically, the Full Court assumed that the impugned statements conveyed the message to the intended audience that the parties had made what an Australian court would decide to be a binding contract. That is, the Full Court found, in effect, that it would be (and in this case was) misleading or deceptive or likely to mislead or deceive to say that the parties to the framework agreements had made "binding contracts" unless the parties had made bargains that could be and would be enforced by action in an Australian court.

[36] There are at least two difficulties in the Full Court's analysis. Both stem, ultimately, from the need to identify the intended audience for the impugned statements and the message or messages conveyed to that audience. The intended audience can be sufficiently identified as investors (both present and possible future investors) and, perhaps, as some wider section of the commercial or business community. It is not necessary to identify the audience more precisely. When that audience was told that Fortescue had made binding contracts with identified Chinese state owned entities, what would they have understood?

[37] Would they, as the Full Court assumed, ask a lawyer's question and look not only to what the parties had said and done but also to what could or would happen in a court if the parties to the agreement fell out at some future time? Or would they take what was said as a statement of what the parties to the agreements understood that they had done and intended would happen in the future? The latter understanding is to be preferred.

[38] The Full Court's conclusion hinged on the use of the word "contract" or "agreement" in each of the impugned statements. The Full Court assumed that, by using one or other of those terms, the impugned statements conveyed to their intended audience a message about the legal quality (as determined by reference to Australian law) of the contract or agreement referred to in the relevant communication. And the relevant legal quality was identified as future enforceability in the event of a dispute between the parties. That is, the Full Court assumed that the words "contract" and "agreement" necessarily conveyed a message about legal enforceability in an Australian court. But that is too broad a proposition. First, it is necessary to examine the whole of the impugned statements to see the context in which reference was made to the making of a contract or agreement. Second, it is necessary to undertake that task without assuming that what is said must be put either into a box marked "fact" (identified according to whether an Australian court would enforce the agreement) or into a box marked "opinion" (identified according to whether the speaker thought that an Australian court could or would enforce the agreement).

[39] There was no evidence led at trial to show that investors or other members of the business or commercial community (whether in Australia or elsewhere) would have understood the references in the impugned statements to a "binding contract" as conveying not only that the parties had agreed upon what they said was a bargain intended to be binding, but also that a court (whether in Australia or elsewhere) would grant relief of some kind or another to one of the parties if, in the future, the opposite party would not carry out its part of the bargain.

[40] The very words of the impugned statements made two points abundantly clear. First, there can be no doubt that the impugned statements conveyed to their intended audience that the parties had made agreements. Second, there can be no doubt that the impugned statements conveyed what the parties to the framework agreements had said in those agreements. And the provisions of the framework agreements showed (and ASIC expressly accepted at trial) that the parties intended their agreements to be legally binding …

[41] ASIC submitted that, despite the parties' stated intention to make a legally binding contract, it was misleading or deceptive or likely to mislead or deceive to announce to investors, or some wider business or commercial audience, that the parties had made a contract (or binding contract) unless the agreement they had made would withstand legal challenge in an Australian court …

[43] Once it is accepted, as it must be, that the parties genuinely intended to make a legally binding agreement, the breadth of ASIC's submission (and the Full Court's conclusion) becomes apparent. For the submission was that, although the impugned statements accurately recorded that the parties to each framework agreement had made an agreement which said that the bargain was, and was intended by the parties to be, legally binding, the impugned statements were misleading or deceptive or likely to mislead or deceive because they also conveyed to their intended audience a larger message. This was that the agreements the parties had made were not open to legal challenge in an Australian court. That broader proposition should not be accepted. The impugned statements conveyed to their intended audience what the parties to the framework agreements had done and said they had done. No further message was shown to have been conveyed to an "ordinary or reasonable" member of that audience …

[45] The intended audience for the impugned statements would have recognised from the very content of the statements that the agreements to which they referred had important international features. Although it may readily be assumed that many, perhaps most, in that audience had some immediate association with Australia or the Australian share market, it by no means follows that such an audience would have understood the impugned statements as inviting any attention to what the courts of Australia could or would do if a party to one of the agreements did not perform its part of the bargain …

[47] Both the place of the signing ceremonies and the status of Fortescue's counter parties as state owned entities point to the real and lively possibility that the formal and essential validity of the agreements might be governed by the law of the People's Republic of China, not Australia. It would have been neither extreme nor fanciful for those who read or heard the impugned statements either to consider the possibility or even to assume that the law of the People's Republic of China governed the agreements. And regardless of whether questions about the validity of the framework agreements were governed by the law of Australia, there was an immediate question of the manner and extent of enforceability presented by the fact that Fortescue's counter parties were state owned enterprises. In Australia that question would be governed by the Foreign States Immunities Act 1985 (Cth), but no attempt was made by any party to explore whether there may have been some relevant and applicable Chinese law.

[48] It is, however, necessary to bear firmly in mind that the impugned statements were made to the business and commercial community. What would that audience make of the statement that Fortescue had made a binding contract with an entity owned and controlled by the People's Republic of China?

[49] It is surely relevant to ask whether the public expression of acceptance by such a state owned entity of what were described as "binding" obligations may not have been a much more powerful spur to performance of its obligations than any possible legal action instituted by Fortescue. Again, for that audience to form such an understanding would be far from "extreme or fanciful" (Campomar (2000) 202 CLR 45 at 86-87 [105]). But these issues were not explored, because the Full Court and ASIC incorrectly assumed, rather than demonstrated, that an inquiry into the "effect" of the agreements required an inquiry into their legal effect under Australian law …

[60] Having regard to the way in which ASIC presented its argument in this Court, it is not necessary to consider separately the other impugned statements to which ASIC referred in its statement of claim. It is also unnecessary to give separate consideration to the "likely to mislead or deceive" limb of s 1041H. In the Full Court, Emmett J expressly based his reasons on this ground. His Honour concluded [(2011) 190 FCR 364 at 430 [215]] that the statements "were, at least, likely to mislead or deceive an ordinary and reasonable member of the investing public who read the [impugned statements]". But the inquiry into how an ordinary or reasonable member of the intended audience would receive a message is of its nature hypothetical. That inquiry is therefore apt to answer both whether conduct is misleading or deceptive and whether it is likely to mislead or deceive. Separate consideration of this limb of s 1041H is therefore not necessary once it is decided that an ordinary or reasonable member of the audience would not have understood the impugned statements to have conveyed anything other than what the parties did and intended, and that the statement made about those matters was neither misleading nor deceptive.

ASIC did not establish that Fortescue engaged in misleading or deceptive conduct contrary to s 1041H of the Corporations Act.

Appeal allowed.

[HEYDON J gave a separate judgment, also allowing the appeal.]

REMEDIES UNDER STATUTES

[33.165] A range of remedies are available for breach of s 18 of the ACL. The same remedies are available to remedy unconscionable conduct in breach of ss 20, 21 and 22 (see Chapter 38). Under s 236 a person who has suffered loss as a result of a contravention is entitled to damages to compensate him or her for that loss. Under s 237 the court is given power to grant any other orders it thinks fit to prevent loss that has been suffered or is likely to be suffered as a result of a contravention. Section 243 sets out a non-exhaustive list of the types of orders that can be made under s 237. Included on the list are declarations that a contract is void, or is to be varied, or that a person should refund money or return property.

In order to be entitled to a remedy under s 236 or s 237 for misleading or deceptive conduct, it is necessary to establish:

1. that there has been a breach of s 18 (see [33.05]–[33.160]);
2. that "loss or damage" has been (or is likely to be) suffered (see [33.170]–[33.260]); and
3. that there is a causal connection between the "loss or damage" suffered or likely to be suffered and the breach (see [33.265]–[33.290]).

Damages under s 236

[33.170] Section 236(1) of the ACL provides as follows:

> If
> (a) a person (the claimant) suffers loss or damage because of the conduct of another person; and
>
> (b) the conduct contravened a provision of Chapter 2 or 3;
> the claimant may recover the amount of the loss or damage by action against that other person, or against any person involved in the contravention.

Section 18 is found in Ch 2 of the ACL. Chapter 2 also contains the provisions which prohibit unconscionable conduct (see Chapter 38). The phrase "involved in a contravention" is defined by s 2(1) to include persons who have aided or abetted, or have been knowingly concerned in, a contravention.

In order to determine whether or not the claimant is entitled to damages under s 236, it is necessary to determine whether the claimant has suffered "loss or damage" within the meaning of the provision. In most cases, the requisite causal connection is established by showing that the claimant suffered loss because he or she acted or failed to act in reliance on the misleading conduct. Where the causal connection is established in this way, "loss or damage" is often calculated on a reliance basis by drawing analogies with damages that would have been available in an action for deceit or negligent misstatement (see Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 1, 11 (at [33.180])). However, the causal link may be established despite the fact that the claimant has not relied on the respondent's conduct. For example, where the respondent makes an untrue statement about the applicant's products which results in the applicant losing sales, the applicant's "loss or damage" will be determined by reference to the consequent loss of profits (see eg Janssen-Gilag Pty Limited v Pfizer Pty Limited (1992) 37 FCR 526, 529). Furthermore, the decision in Murphy v Overton Investments Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 3; (2004) 216 CLR 388 (at [33.200]) demonstrates that in certain circumstances, the court may well be prepared to recognise expectation loss as a compensable form of loss under s 236.

Tort analogy

[33.175] The "amount of the loss or damage" caused by a contravention of s 18 will often coincide with the compensatory damages typically awarded for as compensatory damages in an action at common law for deceit or negligent misstatement. A person induced by deceit to purchase a business will receive as common law damages the difference (if any) between the price paid and the fair or real value of the business, plus an amount for loss consequential on running an unprofitable business (if any), provided such loss is reasonably mitigated. The application of this measure under s 236, as at common law, means that in some cases, no damages will be awarded even though there has been a finding that misleading or deceptive conduct has been engaged in. The following case is illustrative.

Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society

[33.180] Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 1 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court, Full Court.

[FACTS: Mr Gates (the appellant) alleged that before he applied for a total disability clause to be added to his two existing life policies with City Mutual Life Assurance Society (CML, the respondent), Mr Rainbird, the agent of the respondent, assured him that the policy benefits would apply if he could not attend to his occupation for 90 days. In fact the clause added to each policy denied benefits to the appellant if he was able to attend to any gainful occupation, not just his occupation. The appellant sustained injury and could not attend to his occupation as a builder for 90 days. The respondent refused to pay the policy benefits, on the basis that the conditions of the disability clause were not satisfied.

The appellant brought proceedings in the Federal Court. His case was that the respondent was liable in damages because it was bound by the assurance given by Mr Rainbird and the assurance amounted to: (1) a collateral contract; (2) misleading or deceptive conduct within s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (TPA) [now ACL, s 18]; and (3) a false statement within s 53(g) of the same Act [now ACL, s 29(m)]. The trial judge (Ellicott J) concluded that the agent's assurance amounted to misleading or deceptive conduct and a false statement within the relevant provisions of the Act as well as to a collateral contract. The appellant was entitled to payment by the respondent of the amounts payable under the policies as damages for breach of contract: $66,003. No damages were awarded for contraventions of the TPA because the judge considered that in most, if not all, claims for damages for conduct breaching ss 52 and 53 the measure of damages was that applicable in tort. On this footing, the appellant was entitled to the difference between the value of what he paid and had to pay by way of premiums and the value of the total disability clause in the relevant policies. There being no evidence that the cover was not worth what he paid for it – $2.09 per month on a $20,000 policy – the appellant was not entitled to damages on this score. An alternative method of compensating the appellant was to rescind the policies and to direct a refund of the premiums paid, but the appellant did not claim compensation on this basis. Instead, he claimed the benefits that were payable according to the representations made by Mr Rainbird. This was held to be the measure of damages appropriate to breach of contract, not to breach of ss 52 and 53(g).

The Full Court of the Federal Court (Fox, Lockhart and Fitzgerald JJ), to which each party appealed, concluded that the assurance given by Mr Rainbird was not contractual in character, that therefore the award of damages for breach of contract could not be sustained and that Ellicott J was correct in refusing to award damages for the contraventions of ss 52 and 53(g). The Full Court accordingly allowed the respondent's appeal. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

MASON, WILSON AND DAWSON JJ: [11] Mr Rainbird's assurance … was not contractual in character and in any event effect could not be given to it as a promise because it was inconsistent with the main contracts: Hoyt's Pty Ltd v Spencer (1919) 27 CLR 133 at 139, 147–8; Cutts v Buckley (1933) 49 CLR 189 at 201; Maybury v Atlantic Union Oil Co Ltd (1953) 89 CLR 507 at 518 …

The Act does not prescribe the measure of damages recoverable by a plaintiff for contravention of the provisions of Pts IV and V. Accordingly, it is for the courts to determine what is the appropriate measure of damages recoverable by a plaintiff who suffers loss or damage by conduct done in contravention of the relevant provisions. Two established measures of damages, those applicable in contract and tort respectively, compete for acceptance. In contract, damages are awarded with the object of placing the plaintiff in the [12] position in which he would have been had the contract been performed – he is entitled to damages for loss of bargain (expectation loss) and damage suffered, including expenditure incurred, in reliance on the contract (reliance loss). In tort, on the other hand, damages are awarded with the object of placing the plaintiff in the position in which he would have been had the tort not been committed (similar to reliance loss).

The differences and the similarities between the two approaches are best illustrated by contrasting the damages recoverable for breach of contractual warranty on a purchase of goods with those recoverable for a fraudulent misrepresentation inducing entry into a contract for the purchase of goods on the assumption that the contracts are identical except that in one case the representation amounts to a warranty and in the other it is merely a non-contractual representation. For breach of warranty the plaintiff is prima facie entitled to recover the difference between the real value of the goods and the value of the goods as warranted. In deceit the measure of damages is the difference at the time of purchase between the real value of the goods, and the price paid: Potts v Miller (1940) 64 CLR 282 at 289, 297; Toteff v Antonas (1952) 87 CLR 647 at 650–1, 654; Gould v Vaggelas (1984) 58 ALJR 560 at 561; 56 ALR 31 at 34. But this has been treated as a prima facie measure only, the true measure being reflected in the proposition stated by Dixon J in Toteff v Antonas (at 650) in these terms: "In an action of deceit a plaintiff is entitled to recover as damages a sum representing the prejudice or disadvantage he has suffered in consequence of his altering his position under the inducement of the fraudulent misrepresentations made by the defendant."

As his Honour then pointed out, it is a question of determining how much worse off the plaintiff is as a result of entering into the transaction which the representation induced him to enter than he would have been had the transaction not taken place. This entitles the plaintiff to all the consequential loss directly flowing from his reliance on the representation (Potts v Miller at 297–8; Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd [1969] 2 QB 158), at least if the loss is foreseeable: see Gould v Vaggelas at 563; 37 …

[13] Because the object of damages in tort is to place the plaintiff in the position in which he would have been but for the commission of the tort, it is necessary to determine what the plaintiff would have done had he not relied on the representation. If that reliance has deprived him of the opportunity of entering into a different contract for the purchase of goods on which he would have made a profit then he may recover that profit on the footing that it is part of the loss which he has suffered in consequence of altering his position under the inducement of the representation. This may well be so if the plaintiff can establish that he could and would have entered into the different contract and that it would have yielded the benefit claimed: compare Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] QB 801 at 820–1, 828–9; Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd at 167. The lost benefit is referable to opportunities foregone by reason of reliance on the misrepresentation. In this respect the measure of damages in tort begins to resemble the expectation element in the measure of damages in contract save that it is for the plaintiff to establish that he could and would have entered into the different contract.

So in the present case if the appellant were able to establish that, but for his reliance on Mr Rainbird's representation, he could and would have entered into policies of insurance containing a disability clause of the kind represented by Mr Rainbird, he might then succeed in obtaining an award of damages equal to the benefits which would have been payable under such policies less the premiums paid or payable in respect of them.

Unfortunately for the appellant the evidence does not support this basis for an award of damages. First, it was Mr Rainbird who [14] persuaded the appellant to take out disability insurance. There is nothing to suggest that the appellant would have been minded to obtain insurance of this type had it not been for Mr Rainbird arousing his interest in it. Likewise, there is nothing to suggest that, had he known that the respondent did not offer disability insurance on the terms suggested by Mr Rainbird, he would have sought out some opportunity of taking out the insurance with another company. There was no evidence from the appellant that this is what he would have done. And, as we have already pointed out, there was no evidence that another company at that time offered disability insurance on those or similar terms ….

The question then is whether it is appropriate to apply the contract measure of damages to the contraventions found to have taken place. The courts are not bound to make a definitive choice between the two measures of damages so that one applies to all contraventions to the exclusion of the other. However, there is much to be said for the view that the measure of damages in tort is appropriate in most, if not all, Pt V cases, especially those involving misleading or deceptive conduct and the making of false statements. Such conduct is similar both in character and effect to tortious conduct, particularly fraudulent misrepresentation and negligent misstatement.

The disappointed expectations of a person induced by a misrepresentation to believe erroneously that his insurance policy entitles [15] him to the payment of benefits on maturity or on the happening of a certain event are sometimes so great as to encourage the thought that compensation on the basis of lost expectations would be appropriate. However, neither authority nor principle offer support for adopting this approach. In all the cases in which a plaintiff has sought to recover damages on the footing that a representation amounts to a collateral contract, a fraudulent misrepresentation or a negligent misstatement, damages for expectation loss have only been awarded when the representation amounted to a collateral contract. Neither the fact that the representation induces entry into a contract nor the fact that it is a statement of the benefits to which the plaintiff will be entitled under that contract is enough to justify compensation for expectation loss. Just as it is impossible to suppose that there is any difference in the measure of damages in deceit depending upon the nature of the contract into which the plaintiff is induced to enter (Clark v Urquhart [1930] AC 28 at 67–8), so there can be no variation in the measure of damages awarded under the Act for contraventions of ss 52 and 53(g) depending on the nature of the contract.

This conclusion involves no element of injustice to a plaintiff who is entitled to damages reflecting the loss of benefits he would have obtained under a contract which he could and would have entered into but for his reliance on the contravening conduct of the defendant. Of course he must prove such loss but there is nothing unfair in requiring him to do so …

[GIBBS CJ delivered a concurring judgment.]

Appeal dismissed.

Loss of opportunity

[33.185] Damages may be claimed under s 236 for loss of an opportunity to obtain a commercial benefit or advantage such as entering or continuing a profitable contract with another party. The problems of proof of damage and assessment of damages in such claims were considered by the High Court in the following case.

Sellars v Adelaide Petroleum NL

[33.190] Sellars v Adelaide Petroleum NL (1992) 179 CLR 332 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: Early in 1988, Adelaide Petroleum NL (Adelaide), an oil and minerals exploration company, had insufficient working capital and faced heavy expenditure commitments. Adelaide's directors entered into two parallel negotiations with two different companies with the object of persuading one of them to acquire the directors' shareholdings in Adelaide as an element in a restructuring arrangement. One company was Poseidon Ltd (Poseidon); the other was Pagini Resources NL (Pagini). By the middle of May 1988, Adelaide's directors had come close to an agreement with Pagini and, on 27 May 1988, a draft contract was submitted by Pagini to Adelaide for consideration. This draft contract contained seven paragraphs of conditions precedent. In June 1988 Adelaide's directors decided not to pursue the negotiations with Pagini, and entered into an agreement with Poseidon instead. This agreement involved the sale to Poseidon of the directors' shares in Adelaide. However, about three weeks after the agreement was signed Poseidon informed Adelaide that the agreement had been procured by an executive of Poseidon, Sellars, who had exceeded his authority. Poseidon indicated that it would comply with the agreement if desired, but would not assume management control of Adelaide; nor would two key directors of Poseidon consent to act as directors of Adelaide. Adelaide took the view that Poseidon's conduct amounted to repudiation, and on 29 July 1988, accepted that repudiation. It then entered into fresh negotiations with Pagini and subsequently entered into an agreement with Pagini (the Pagini contract) for a restructuring of Adelaide, but on terms less favourable than those which would have resulted if the original Pagini negotiations had been pursued to a conclusion.

Adelaide commenced actions against Poseidon and Sellars seeking damages under s 82 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 [now ACL, s 236]. Adelaide alleged that it did not proceed to the conclusion of the original draft Pagini agreement as a result of misrepresentations, in contravention of s 52 of the Act [now ACL, s 18], made to them by Sellars and Poseidon that Poseidon intended upon completion of the proposed agreement with it to acquire control of and to assume management of Adelaide and to nominate and support the election of three Poseidon directors to the board of Adelaide.

French J was persuaded on the balance of probabilities that the original Pagini agreement would have been entered into but for the misrepresentations of Poseidon, but he was not persuaded, according to that standard of proof, that all the various conditions precedent to its performance would have been satisfied. He held that there was more than a speculative possibility that the Pagini agreement would have been concluded and that Adelaide would have derived benefits from it. Poseidon's loss was the loss of the benefit of the original agreement with Pagini less the benefit obtained by the subsequent agreement with Pagini. The judge then discounted the resulting figure to 40 per cent to allow for the probability that the agreement would not have proceeded and allowing for certain additional discounts in relation to particular items, awarded Adelaide damages for the lost commercial opportunity and interest, totalling $1,212,193. Poseidon and Sellars appealed to the Full Court of the Federal Court, and their appeals were dismissed. They then appealed to the High Court.]

MASON CJ, DAWSON, TOOHEY AND GAUDRON JJ: [339] The primary question is whether, in the circumstances of this case, loss of an opportunity to obtain a commercial advantage or benefit amounts to "loss or damage" within s 82(1). Is it necessary for the applicant to prove on the balance of probabilities that a benefit would have been derived from the opportunity had it not been lost and, if so, the extent of that benefit? Or is it sufficient for the [340] applicant to show, not on the balance of probabilities but by reference to the degree of possibilities and probabilities, that there were some prospects of deriving a benefit from the opportunity had it not been lost and, if so, then to ascertain the value of the opportunity or benefit by reference to such possibilities and probabilities? The question whether the applicant has sustained loss or damage is necessarily related to the ascertainment or measurement of that loss or damage. In the discussion which follows, we have dealt with those matters together without distinguishing between them before reaching our ultimate conclusion … [348]

Section 82(1) of the Act

… In the context of contraventions of s 52(1) in the form of misleading conduct constituted by misrepresentations, acts done by the representee in reliance upon the misrepresentations amount to a sufficient connexion to satisfy the concept of causation. And, if those acts result in economic or financial loss, it will ordinarily be recoverable under s 82(1). So, in a case such as the present, the applicant is entitled to recover "a sum representing the prejudice or disadvantage [the applicant] has suffered in consequence of his altering his position under the inducement" (Toteff v Antonas (1952) 87 CLR 647, at 650; Wardley Australia (1992) 175 CLR, at 526).

The prejudice or disadvantage which the respondents suffered in the present case was the loss of the opportunity or chance of securing commercial benefits which entry into the Pagini agreement and completion of it would have brought. The lost opportunity or chance, assuming it to have value, is a form of economic loss. The question, therefore, is: how is the value of that lost opportunity or chance to be measured?

The appellants argue that, on the civil standard of proof and the findings made by the trial judge, the opportunity or chance of which [349] the respondents were deprived was worth nothing. That is because it was more likely than not that the Pagini agreement would not be completed.

In the realm of contract law, the loss of a chance to win a prize in a competition resulting from breach of a contract to provide the chance is compensable, notwithstanding that, on the balance of probabilities, it is more likely than not that the plaintiff would not win the competition (Chaplin v Hicks [1911] 2 KB 786; McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377, at 411–12). As the contract contained a promise to provide the chance, the breach of the contract resulted in the loss of the chance and that loss was for relevant purposes an actual loss, in the sense in which Dixon and McTiernan JJ used that expression in Fink v Fink (1946) 74 CLR 127, at 143. And, where there has been an actual loss of some sort, the common law does not permit difficulties of estimating the loss in money to defeat an award of damages ((1946) 74 CLR 127, at 143). The damages will then be ascertained by reference to the degree of probabilities, or possibilities, inherent in the plaintiff's succeeding had the plaintiff been given the chance which the contract promised.

This approach is not confined to contracts relating to games of chance, sporting contests or other competitions. Fink v Fink concerned a contract to provide an opportunity for a reconciliation, breach of which was held to entitle the wife to damages. And there can be no doubt that a contract to provide a commercial advantage or opportunity, if breached, enables the innocent party to bring an action for damages for the loss of that advantage or opportunity (The Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64). So, in The Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd, Mason CJ and Dawson J (at p 92), Brennan J (at 102–4) and Deane J (at 118–19) concluded that a lost commercial advantage or opportunity was a compensable loss, even though there was a less than 50 per cent likelihood that the commercial advantage would be realised. Damages for breach of contract were assessed by reference to the probabilities or possibilities of what would have happened.

Damages in tort have also been assessed by reference to the probabilities or possibilities of what will happen or what would have [350] happened. That approach has been frequently adopted in the assessment of damages for personal injuries where a court has been called upon to assess future possibilities and past hypothetical situations. In Malec v JC Hutton Pty Ltd (1990) 169 CLR 638, this Court drew a distinction between, on the one hand, proof of historical facts – what has happened – and, on the other hand, proof of future possibilities and past hypothetical situations. The civil standard of proof applies to the first category but not to the second, particularly when it is necessary to determine future possibilities and past hypothetical situations for the purpose of assessing damages (ibid, at 639–40, per Brennan and Dawson JJ; 642–3, per Deane, Gaudron and McHugh JJ).

In Malec, Deane, Gaudron and McHugh JJ explained the way in which the matter is to be approached in these terms (ibid, at 643):

> If the law is to take account of future or hypothetical events in assessing damages, it can only do so in terms of the degree of probability of those events occurring … But unless the chance is so low as to be regarded as speculative — say less than 1 per cent — or so high as to be practically certain — say over 99 per cent — the court will take that chance into account in assessing the damages. Where proof is necessarily unattainable, it would be unfair to treat as certain a prediction which has a 51 per cent probability of occurring, but to ignore altogether a prediction which has a 49 per cent probability of occurring. Thus, the court assesses the degree of probability that an event would have occurred, or might occur, and adjusts its award of damages to reflect the degree of probability.

The same approach has been adopted in England (Mallett v McMonagle [1970] AC 166, at 174; Davies v Taylor [1974] AC 207, at 212, 219) and Canada (Janiak v Ippolito [1985] 1 SCR 146; (1985) 16 DLR (4th) 1).

Neither in logic nor in the nature of things is there any reason for confining the approach taken in Malec concerning the proof of future possibilities and past hypothetical situations to the assessment of damages for personal injuries. The reasons which commended the adoption of that approach in assessments of that kind apply with equal force to the assessment of damages for loss of a commercial opportunity, as the judgments in Amann acknowledge.

But Amann concerned damages for breach of contract. The question here is whether the same approach is to be adopted in determining whether an applicant has suffered loss or damage under s 82(1) for a contravention of s 52 and, if so, in assessing damages. [351] Unlike contract, loss or damage is the gist of the action for contravention of s 52. Is this a convincing point of distinction? That, it seems to us, is the critical question.

The adoption of the Malec principle in the assessment of damages for personal injury for negligence would seem to deny the validity of such a distinction. But, in cases of that kind, the fact that the plaintiff has suffered some damage and therefore has a complete cause of action is normally established by evidence which satisfies the civil standard of proof.

More to the point are authorities in Australia … which suggest that, in some hypothetical fact situations, causation and the incurring of some loss or damage must be established according to the civil standard of proof … [T]here are two decisions of this Court which, on the appellants' argument, might be taken to indicate that the incurring of consequential loss (and causation) are to be established in accordance with the general standard of proof in civil actions. In Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 1, the case on ss 52(1) and 82(1) to which the trial judge referred, the appellant entered into a policy of insurance, induced by the misrepresentation that it would entitle him to benefits if he were totally disabled from following his occupation as a builder. In fact the policy entitled him only to benefits if he was disabled from following any occupation, so that he was not entitled to benefits when disabled only from following his occupation as a builder. The Court held that, if the appellant had been able to establish that he [352] could and would have entered into a policy of insurance containing a disability clause of the kind represented to him had it not been for his reliance on the representation, he might have been awarded damages equal to the benefits that would have been payable under that policy less the premiums paid or payable. Having failed to establish that matter, the appellant was not entitled to damages on that account.

However, Gates is not a decision on the question now under consideration. There was no evidence as to what the appellant would have done had he known that the respondent insurance company did not offer insurance on the terms he wanted; nor was there any evidence that insurance was available on those terms elsewhere ((1986) 160 CLR, at pp 7, 14). Consequently, there was no evidence to show that there was a chance of making alternative arrangements for insurance in Gates. What is more, the observations on which the appellants in the present case rely (ibid, at 13, per Mason, Wilson and Dawson JJ) are directed to a hypothetical situation in which a plaintiff seeks to recover as damages for misrepresentation the profit the plaintiff would have made on another contract had he or she not been deprived of the opportunity of doing so as a result of the misrepresentation sued on.

The second case, Norwest Refrigeration Services Pty Ltd v Bain Dawes (WA) Pty Ltd (1984) 157 CLR 149, is more significant because it seems to require past hypothetical facts to be proved on the balance of probabilities and because it treated the opportunity to avoid loss as not being compensable. In that case, the plaintiff's fishing vessel, the Sonoma, was destroyed by fire. The insurer refused to accept liability under the policy, relying on an exclusion clause in the policy.

The plaintiff sued the broker and the fishing co-operative which had offered the policy to the plaintiff, alleging that they had negligently failed to warn the plaintiff that the policy contained an unusual exclusion clause. The co-operative was held to be in breach of a duty of care and damages were awarded. On appeal to this Court the award of damages was not disturbed.

Gibbs CJ, Mason, Wilson and Dawson JJ said (at 160):

> Of course the onus of proving its damage rests upon Norwest. Therefore, in order to sustain the judgment of the Full Court, it must point to evidence showing that, on the balance of probabilities, had the Co-operative discharged its duty of care Norwest could have secured at no higher cost [353] effective insurance cover against the risk that ultimately destroyed the Sonoma.

Brennan J said ((1984) 157 CLR, at 171–2):

> The Co-operative's negligent failure to inform [Norwest] that it had not obtained effective insurance for the Sonoma caused Norwest to lose an opportunity of applying elsewhere to obtain a policy which would have given it effective cover pending the obtaining of a survey certificate, or an opportunity of trying to have the machinery and equipment survey completed and a survey certificate issued so as to satisfy the conditions of the fleet policy. But the damage which Norwest suffered was the absence of effective insurance, at the time when the Sonoma was lost. The onus was on Norwest to prove that damage was caused by the Co-operative's negligence … Before Norwest's cause of action was established it had to prove that it could have and that it would have taken steps which would have resulted in effective insurance of the Sonoma at the time of her loss.

The comments quoted above were not critical to the decision in the case as the award of damages was upheld.

It may be that … Gates and Norwest are to be treated as cases which turn primarily on the issue of causation which is ordinarily governed by the general civil standard of proof. The distinction between proof of causation and damages was emphasised in Hotson v East Berkshire Area Health Authority [1987] AC 750. There Lord Ackner stated that the first issue that fell to be determined was that of causation. This was to be determined on the balance of probabilities. Once liability was established, the assessment of the plaintiff's loss could proceed, taking into account any reductions arising from the uncertainty of future events (ibid, at 792–3; see also at 782–3, per Lord Bridge of Harwich). When the issue of causation turns on what the plaintiff would have done, there is no particular reason for departing from proof on the balance of probabilities notwithstanding that the question is hypothetical.

In Johnson v Perez (1988) 166 CLR 351, Brennan J (dissenting) adopted an approach similar to that suggested by Norwest. In Johnson, the plaintiff sued his solicitor for negligence in allowing the plaintiff's cause of action against a third party to become statute barred. His Honour said (at 372):

> [T]he court must find whether or not he has lost something of value. If he would have failed in the original action, he has lost [354] nothing; if he would have succeeded, he has lost what he would have received at the time he would have received it …. Or, if it is doubtful whether or not he would have succeeded in the action and it is not probable that the action would have been compromised, the court assessing the damages must determine as best it can on the balance of probabilities whether the plaintiff would have succeeded (and, if so, to what extent) or failed.

On the other hand, in a similar situation, the English Court of Appeal, in Kitchen v Royal Air Force Association [1958] 1 WLR 563; [1958] 2 All ER 241, concluded that the plaintiff had been deprived of a cause of action which had some value. Parker LJ observed (at 576; 252): "If the plaintiff can satisfy the court that she would have had some prospect of success, then it would be for the court to evaluate those prospects, taking into consideration the difficulties that remained to be surmounted."

In Amann (1991) 174 CLR, at 119, Deane J expressed a similar view, saying:

> [A] plaintiff whose action against a third party has become statute-barred by reason of the defendant solicitor's breach of contract may recover damages by reference to the court's assessment of what the chance of success in the action against the third party would have been even though that assessment is 50 per cent or less.

Of course, Johnson, Kitchen and the example given by Deane J are cases of breach of contract.

[355] … Notwithstanding the observations of this court in Norwest, we consider that acceptance of the principle enunciated in Malec requires that damages for deprivation of a commercial opportunity, whether the deprivation occurred by reason of breach of contract, tort or of contravention of s 52(1), should be ascertained by reference to the court's assessment of the prospects of success of that opportunity had it been pursued. The principle recognized in Malec was based on a consideration of the peculiar difficulties associated with the proof and evaluation of future possibilities and past hypothetical fact situations, as contrasted with proof of historical facts. Once that is accepted, there is no secure foundation for confining the principle to cases of any particular kind.

On the other hand, the general standard of proof in civil actions will ordinarily govern the issue of causation and the issue whether the applicant has sustained loss or damage. Hence the applicant must prove on the balance of probabilities that he or she has sustained some loss or damage. However, in a case such as the present, the applicant shows some loss or damage was sustained by demonstrating that the contravening conduct caused the loss of a commercial opportunity which had some value (not being a negligible value), the value being ascertained by reference to the degree of probabilities or possibilities. It is no answer to that way of viewing an applicant's case to say that the commercial opportunity was valueless on the balance of probabilities because to say that is to value the commercial opportunity by reference to a standard of proof which is inapplicable.

The conclusion which we have reached on this question finds support in other considerations. The approach results in fair compensation whereas the all or nothing outcome produced by the civil standard of proof would result in the vast majority of cases in over-compensation or under-compensation to an applicant who has been deprived of a commercial opportunity. Furthermore, it is an [356] approach which conforms to the long-standing practice of taking into account contingencies in the assessment of damages.

On the findings made by the trial judge, the Pagini contract would have been entered into but for the contraventions of s 52(1). Although, on the probabilities, it would not have been completed, there was a significant chance that it would be completed. It follows that the Full Court of the Federal Court were not in error in dismissing the appeals.

[BRENNAN J delivered a separate judgment in which he held that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

Contract analogy: expectation loss

[33.195] In Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd [1998] HCA 69; (1998) 196 CLR 494, [38] (at [33.250]) McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ said:

> [T]here is nothing in s 82 [now ACL, s 236] … which suggests … that the amount that may be recovered under s 82(1) … should be limited by drawing some analogy with the law of contract, tort or equitable remedies. Indeed, the very fact that [the section] may be applied to widely differing contraventions of the Act, some of which can be seen as inviting analogies with torts such as deceit (eg s 52) [now ACL, s 18] or with equity (eg s 51AA) [now ACL, s 20] but others of which find no ready analogies in the common law or equity, shows that it wrong to limit the apparently clear words of the Act by reference to one or other of these analogies.

Despite the logical difficulties associated with allowing expectation damages under s 236 for misleading conduct (see Colvin, "Tales of the Unexpected: Damages for Lost Expectations" (1997) 5 Trade Practices Law Journal 17) the High Court was prepared to depart from measuring loss on a reliance basis in Murphy v Overton Investments Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 3; (2004) 216 CLR 388, at [33.200]. The decision in Murphy v Overton seems to contradict much of what was said by the High Court in Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd [1998] HCA 69; (1998) 196 CLR 494, at [33.250].

Murphy v Overton Investments

[33.200] Murphy v Overton Investments Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 3; (2004) 216 CLR 388 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: In 1992, the appellants purchased a leasehold interest in a unit in a retirement village operated by the respondent. The leases of units in the village required the tenants to pay, each month, a proportion of the "outgoings" of the village (ie, the costs of owning, operating and maintaining the village). Before the appellants entered into the transaction the respondent provided them with an estimate of the amount they were likely to be charged in relation to outgoings. The estimate was misleading because it did not take into account all of the outgoings then being incurred in the operation of the village, which the respondent was entitled to charge under the terms of the lease. In 1996 the respondent announced that it would begin charging the full amount of outgoings payable under the terms of the lease. The appellants sought relief under the Trade Practices Act 1974 (now ACL).]

GLEESON CJ, MCHUGH, GUMMOW, KIRBY, HAYNE, CALLINAN AND HEYDON JJ: [402]

Conclusions at trial

The trial judge concluded that the appellants had not proved that they had suffered any loss or damage. There were two steps taken to reach that conclusion. First, his Honour said that:

> When a claimant is induced by a misrepresentation to enter into an agreement that proves to be to his or her disadvantage, the claimant sustains a detriment, in a general sense, on entry into the agreement. That is because the agreement subjects the claimant to [403] obligations and liabilities that exceed the value or worth of the rights and benefits that it confers upon the claimant. However, detriment in that general sense is not universally equated with the legal concept of "loss or damage" —Wardley Australia Ltd v Western Australia (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 527 …. Where a misrepresentation induces a claimant to enter into an agreement to purchase property, the claimant's loss, apart from any question of consequential damage, is measured by the difference between the price paid or payable under the agreement and the value of the property at the date of the agreement —Potts v Miller (1940) 64 CLR 282 at 297–299.

As has been said above, there was no evidence of any difference between price paid under the agreement and the value of the property at the date of the agreement.

Secondly, it was said that, because the lease obliged the appellants to pay the sums claimed as outgoings, and there was no evidence that the appellants were "not receiving value for the maintenance fees that they [were] paying", they suffered no loss "by reason of the level of maintenance fees that they [were] liable to pay". It was said that the appellants had done nothing to their detriment after the respondent indicated that it intended to charge all that it was entitled to charge under the lease for outgoings. Their obligation to make those payments was undertaken when they took their lease and that obligation was not "contingent in the sense that was referred to in Wardley".

Two comments about this reasoning may be made at once. First, the difference between price and value will often be an important element in assessing the damage suffered by a person who, by a misrepresentation, has been induced to buy an item of property. As the trial judge said, there may also be questions of consequential damage. It would be wrong, however, to assume that in every case of misrepresentation (leave aside other forms of misleading or deceptive conduct) the only kind of damage which may be suffered, and compensated or redressed by orders under Pt VI of the Act, is any difference between price and value or any consequential losses. In particular, care must be exercised before seeking to apply what it described as the "rule in Potts v Miller" to claims made for relief under Pt VI of the Act. This is especially so when it is recalled that while the only monetary remedy for the tort of deceit is damages, a far wider range of remedies is available where contravention of the Act has caused or is likely to cause loss or damage to a party to the proceeding.

[404] Secondly, while the trial judge rightly pointed out that there was no evidence that the appellants did not receive value for the maintenance fees they paid, it does not necessarily follow that there was no loss incurred by the appellants if the outgoings for which they were liable included sums of a kind which had not been taken into account in forming the estimate they were given …

The Full Court decision

[33.205] [405] In the Full Court, the majority (Branson and R D Nicholson JJ) held that the trial judge was right not to make any award of damages to either appellant. That conclusion depended upon the following steps in reasoning. First, the critical question was identified as being what would the appellants have done had the respondent not engaged in contravention of a provision of Pt V of the Act. Secondly, because it was known that in that event the appellants would have entered another, identified, retirement village, the question became what would the appellants' position have been had they not entered the lease they did, but entered the other village. Thirdly, because no evidence was led to establish what would have been the appellants' position had they entered the other village, the majority held that the claim to damages under s 82 or s 87 or other relief under s 87 had been rightly held to fail for want of proof of loss or damage. …

[406] It is … clear that the arguments about relief advanced to the Full Court were, as might be expected, shaped by the course of evidence at trial. In particular, the arguments were shaped having regard to the fact that the only evidence led at trial which sought to quantify the loss suffered by the appellants was evidence about the capital value of their leases assessed at different times and on different assumptions about the extent of the obligation to meet outgoings ….

What is clear is that the reasons of the majority in the Full Court focused upon whether the appellants had proved an entitlement to damages. The majority held that they had not ….

This abbreviated description of the reasons of the Full Court reveals that the majority of the Court focused upon what might be described as the capital consequences to the appellants of the respondent's misleading or deceptive conduct. The majority confined attention to whether the appellants had paid too much for the lease they had acquired …. This division of opinion in the Full Court was understood to raise a fundamental question about what the Act means by "loss or damage" and how loss or damage is to be identified. Particular attention was [407] given, both in the reasons of the Full Court and in the arguments advanced in this Court, to analysing this Court's reasons in Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd (1998) 196 CLR 494 concerning the identification of loss or damage. In the end, however, the resolution of this appeal does not depend upon identifying the nature or extent of any differences there may be between the separate reasons given in Marks. It depends upon the application of the Act according to its terms.

Some general principles affecting remedies under Pt VI

[33.210] This Court has now said more than once (Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd (1998) 196 CLR 494 at 503–504 [17] per Gaudron J, 510 [38] per McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ, 529 [103] per Gummow J, 549 [152] per Kirby J; Henville v Walker (2001) 206 CLR 459 at 501–502 [130]–[131] per McHugh J; I & L Securities Pty Ltd v HTW Valuers (Brisbane) Pty Ltd (2002) 210 CLR 109 at 124–125 [42]–[48] per Gaudron, Gummow and Hayne JJ) that it is wrong to approach the operation of those provisions of Pt VI of the Act which deal with remedies for contravention of the Act by beginning the inquiry with an attempt to draw some analogy with any particular form of claim under the general law. No doubt analogies may be helpful, but it would be wrong to argue from the content of the general law that has developed in connection, for example, with the tort of deceit, to a conclusion about the construction or application of provisions of Pt VI of the Act. To do so distracts attention from the primary task of construing the relevant provisions of the Act. In the present case, analogies with the tort of deceit appear to have led to an assumption, at least at trial, that a person can suffer only one form of loss or damage as a result of a contravention of Pt V of the Act.

The Act's references to "loss or damage" can be given no narrow meaning. Section 4K of the Act provides that loss or damage includes a reference to injury. It follows that the loss or damage spoken of in ss 82 and 87 is not confined to economic loss [Marks (1998) 196 CLR 494 at 513 [46] per McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ, 526–527 [93]–[96] per Gummow J]. What kinds of detriment constitute loss or damage, when a detriment is to be identified as occurring or likely to occur, and what remedies are to be awarded, may all raise further difficult questions. Especially is that so when it is recalled that remedies may be awarded to compensate, prevent or reduce loss or damage that has been or is likely to be suffered by conduct in contravention of the Act.

In Wardley Australia Ltd v Western Australia (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 526–527, a case about the application of s 82 of the Act, not s 87, a majority of the Court held that risk of loss is not itself a category of loss, and that, if a [408] plaintiff enters a contract which exposes the plaintiff to a contingent loss or liability, that plaintiff "sustains no actual damage until the contingency is fulfilled and the loss becomes actual" [(1992) 175 CLR 514 at 532]. Wardley illustrates that it is necessary to identify the detriment which is said to be the loss or damage which has occurred (or, when considering the application of s 87, has occurred or is likely to occur). In that case, the mere entry into obligations which might, but need not, have had detrimental consequences in the future was held not to have occasioned loss or damage to the party making the contract.

The appellants' loss

[33.215] No doubt the appellants' disclaimer of any contention that they had suffered loss when they entered the lease in 1992 must be understood in the light of the three year limitation period then prescribed by the Act in ss 82(2) and 87(1CA)(b). It was important for the appellants to demonstrate that they had suffered loss or damage only when the respondent first said, in 1996, that it would recover from tenants all amounts that it was entitled to under the lease. If that were established, no limitation defence could be made out. It by no means follows, however, from the fact of disclaimer of any contention that damage was suffered by the appellants when they took the lease, that they did not suffer loss later.

In the present case, the finding that the appellants had been induced to enter the lease by a statement of estimated outgoings that was misleading, because it did not take account of all amounts that could properly be charged as outgoings, meant that the appellants undertook an obligation which may, but need not, have proved to be larger or more costly than they had been led to believe. There may be cases in which a person misled in this way suffers loss upon entering the agreement. That may be so if it could be shown that the sum paid exceeded the market value. But that was not this case. No evidence at trial suggested that they had paid more than market value. There was no misrepresentation about the nature or quality of the property being [410] acquired. The first appellant knew and understood that the lease obliged the appellants, as tenants, to pay outgoings in amounts which the lessor was to determine.

What the appellants did not know was that the estimate of outgoings they were given did not provide for all the outgoings that were then being incurred. Here, therefore, the appellants suffered no loss as a result of undertaking the obligations they did unless and until the contingency which the misrepresentation hid (that items other than those used to form the estimate were then being incurred and could be charged as outgoings) was first realised. That was a contingency in the sense that the adverse risk might never have eventuated. When the lease was entered in 1992, the respondent was charging levies in relation only to limited categories of the overall outgoings. The respondent might have chosen to continue to charge the appellants only for those limited categories. On the other hand, it was possible that after 1992 it might decide to charge for wider categories. It was only from the time when it in fact decided to depart from the 1992 position and charge for the wider categories that the adverse risk eventuated. When it did, but only then, the appellants suffered loss and damage. And this Court's decision in Wardley (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 532–533 requires the conclusion, on the evidence in this case, that it was only when the contingency came to pass that the appellants sustained loss or damage. It follows that no limitation defence was available.

The appellants' case in this Court

[33.220] Although the claim for relief under s 87 was not abandoned, the chief weight of the appellants' case in this Court (as it had been in the Full Court) was placed on their claim to damages. They maintained their contentions that the loss or damage they had sustained was reflected in a diminution in value of their leasehold interest and submitted that the diminution in value of the unit due to increased future contributions (said by the appellants to be but one aspect of their loss) could be awarded as damages. In addition, however, it was said that the loss or damage they had suffered was reflected in "the increase in levies above those paid prior to the inclusion of all expenditure".

… [412] What must be shown is that the appellants had suffered or were likely to suffer loss or damage by conduct of the respondent engaged in contravention of a relevant provision of the Act. For the reasons given earlier, that was established.

Three points should be made, however, about the particular formulation of the appellants' claim to damages. First, the claim for alleged difference in value of the lease must deal with the fact that the trial judge preferred the evidence of a valuer called by the respondent (to the effect that there was no substantial diminution in value of the appellants' property as a result of the increase in outgoings after November 1996) to the evidence given on that topic by the appellants' valuer…. There is no reason to set aside that finding …. Secondly, if the appellants confine their claim, as they did in this Court, to a claim for damages, and if, further, they intend to retain ownership of the lease, the obligations under which are not to be reformed by Court order, the property which they retain is identical with the property they bought. If they are entitled to recover damages assessed by reference to the amount by which the obligation to meet outgoings is larger than the estimate led them to anticipate, it would be [413] to give the appellants double compensation to award an additional sum said to represent the difference in value of the lease of the unit. It would be double compensation because the assertion of difference in value seeks to compare the value of the lease of the unit assessed on the assumption that the representation made by the respondent was true (and the estimate did take full account of outgoings incurred) and the value assessed on the assumption that the representation was not true. Yet the damages which the appellants seek to be allowed for past and future outgoings would make good the position they would have been in had the misrepresentation not been made. It is neither necessary nor appropriate to award some further sum.

The third point [is] that the contention that the appellants' damages should be assessed as the present value of anticipated increased payments for outgoings appears to be wholly new. The evidence led at trial did not quantify the amount by which it was alleged that future payments for outgoings would increase due to the falsity of the representation. The weight of the appellants' argument at trial was directed to questions of affordability. That being so, argument at trial appears to have focused upon the allegation that increases in amounts charged for outgoings should be limited by reference to changes in the Aged Pension. In addition, however, there was argument directed to demonstrating that certain kinds of charge imposed in the past (particularly legal and accounting costs) could not be recovered as outgoings.

In argument in this Court we were taken to no evidence about the likely period for which the appellants would be exposed to the obligation to pay outgoings and to no evidence about the way in which the present value of that future stream of expenditures should be valued. So far as the appeal books reveal, no evidence of that kind was adduced at trial.

Quantifying the appellants' loss

[33.225] The appellants had been induced by the respondent's conduct to undertake an obligation which may, but need not, have been more onerous than the respondent's representation led them to believe. When the respondent started to charge all the outgoings it was entitled to charge, the appellants suffered a loss. The amount of that loss was not to be determined, as the majority of the Full Court held, only by comparing the financial position of the appellants according to whether they entered this lease or took some other accommodation. The appellants did not contend that they had suffered loss in that way. The appellants suffered loss because the continuing financial obligations they undertook when they took the lease proved to be larger than they had been led to believe. The question then became: how much larger was that burden?

Answering that question is not easy. It would be necessary to take account of a number of considerations. First, the appellants knew that outgoings might increase. When they took the lease they knew, or at [414] least must be taken to have known, that unexpected outgoings could occur in the future: unexpected both as to the subject-matter of the expense and the amount. It would be wrong to compensate them for their incurring outgoings of that kind, but how is proper account to be taken of that fact?

The nature of this difficulty (and its resolution) may be illustrated by reference to the legal and accounting costs which the respondent incurred in connection with the dispute about fixing outgoings. Those could be described as unexpected outgoings. But had the respondent not engaged in the misleading or deceptive conduct it did, these outgoings would not have been incurred. The incurring of them was, therefore, caused by the conduct of which complaint was made and, being part of the sums for which the appellants are liable under the [43] judgments entered in the Supreme Court, are prima facie to be allowed in assessing the damage they have suffered.

As for other kinds of unexpected outgoings (for example, for the early repair of some piece of capital equipment in the village that could reasonably have been expected to have given longer service) the relevant question would be whether, when the original estimate of outgoings was given, such an amount had been incurred or foreseen as likely to be incurred and could then have been included in the estimate. If it could have been included, but was not, the later inclusion of similar amounts in levies for outgoings is prima facie reason to consider those sums to be a part of the damage the appellants have suffered. But if those amounts had not been incurred and could not have been included, then, unless more is shown, they are not part of the appellants' loss or damage.

Secondly, once the contingency which had been hidden by the misrepresentation came to pass, it may be necessary to consider whether it was then reasonable for the appellants to continue to remain in the village rather than attempt to sell their interest and move elsewhere …. The inquiry would, no doubt, have to give due weight to the then age of the appellants, their state of health and other matters affecting whether it was reasonable to expect them to confront the turmoil, cost and burdens associated with selling their residence, buying or renting another, and shifting to it …. [415] [I]f it were found that it was, or would at some later time become, unreasonable for the appellants not to sell their interest in the lease, the point at which they could be expected to sell the lease would mark the outer limit to the period for which they would be exposed to the obligation to pay more outgoings than they were led to anticipate.

Thirdly, as has been mentioned earlier, it would in the circumstances of this particular case, in which the appellants accepted that there could be no claim in relation to the period after their deaths, have been necessary to estimate how long this larger financial burden would likely be borne by the appellants. This would be a matter for the appellants to establish. It would require estimates of life expectancy and the making of adjustments to take account of possibilities like the decline in health of the second appellant which necessitated her moving to other accommodation.

Conclusion and orders

[33.230] The reasoning employed by the Full Court in reaching the conclusion that the appellants proved no loss or damage was erroneous. The appellants did establish that they had undertaken an [416] obligation which, in the events that happened, proved to be larger than the respondent's misleading conduct led them to believe. Though at the end of the day the appellants may fail to prove any loss or damage, it is possible that they will demonstrate that they have suffered loss or damage. The matter should be remitted to the trial judge to assess the damages, if any, to be allowed to the appellants.

[33.235] Notes

1. Some footnote references have been omitted from this extract.
2. In subsequent decisions, some courts have relied on Murphy v Overton Investments Pty Ltd to award damages for expectation loss (see eg Dalecoast Pty Ltd v Guardian International Pty Ltd [2004] WASC 82; Callander v Ladang Jalong (Australia) Pty Ltd [2005] WASC 159). However, in several other cases the courts have resisted recognising expectation loss as a compensable form of loss under s 236 and have confined Murphy v Overton Investments Pty Ltd to its facts (see eg Warwick Entertainment Centre Pty Ltd v Alpine Holdings Pty Ltd [2005] WASCA 174; (2005) 224 ALR 134; Slinger v Southern White Pty Ltd [2005] SASC 267; (2005) 92 SASR 303; Sumy Pty Ltd v Southcorp Wines Pty Ltd [2004] NSWSC 1000; Bonnett v Baron & Dowling Property Group (2006) 67 NSWLR 475).

Orders under s 237

[33.240] Subsection 237 permits the courts to make a wide variety of orders. It provides that:

(1) A court may:

(a) on application of a person (the injured person) who has suffered, or is likely to suffer, loss or damage because of the conduct of another person that:

(i) was engaged in a contravention of a provision of Chapter 2, 3 or 4; or

(b) on the application of the regulator made on behalf of one or more such injured persons;

make such order or orders as the court thinks appropriate against the person who engaged in the conduct, or a person involved in that conduct.

(2) The order must be an order that the court considers will:

(a) compensate the injured person, or any such injured persons, in whole or in part for the loss or damage; or

(b) prevent or reduce the loss or damage suffered, or likely to be suffered, by the injured person or any such injured persons.

Before setting out the "orders" a number of points should be noted. First, s 18 is found in Ch 2 of the ACL. Chapter 2 also contains the provisions prohibiting unconscionable conduct (see Chapter 38). Secondly, the phrase "a person who was involved in the contravention" is defined by s 2(1) to include persons who have aided or abetted, or have been knowingly concerned in a contravention. Thirdly, unlike s 236, which is concerned only with compensation for actual loss or damage, s 237 extends to the prevention and reduction of loss or damage which is "likely to be suffered". Fourthly, the orders granted under s 237 are in the court's discretion, whereas under s 236 there is an entitlement to compensation for loss or damage caused by a contravention. Finally, the relief for which s 237 makes provision is available as a stand-alone remedy.

Section 243 sets out a non-exhaustive list of the types of orders that can be made under s 237. The orders mentioned in s 243 are to the following effect:

(a) declaring a contract void in whole or in part;
(b) varying a contract;
(c) refusing to enforce all or any of the provisions of the contract;

(d) directing refund of money or return of property;
(e) directing payment to the person who suffered loss or damage of the amount of the loss or damage;
(f) directing repair of, or provision of spare parts for, goods;
(g) directing the supply of specified services; and
(h) directing variation of, or termination of, an instrument creating or transferring an interest in land.

Loss or likely loss

[33.245] A person who is induced to enter a contract by misleading conduct will normally suffer loss or likely loss as a result, and so qualify for relief under s 237. Such loss or likely loss is not inevitable, as Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd [1998] HCA 69; (1998) 196 CLR 494 (at [33.250]) illustrates. However, Marks v GIO must now be treated with caution because it is arguably inconsistent with Murphy v Overton Investments Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 3; (2004) 216 CLR 388, at [33.200].

Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd

[33.250] Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd [1998] HCA 69; (1998) 196 CLR 494 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court, Full Court.

[FACTS: The appellants (the borrowers) entered into loan facilities identified as the Asset Accumulator Account (the AAA facility) with the respondent (GIO), a public company financier. They relied on a misleading written representation in a brochure that the interest would be at a specified base rate plus a margin "set" at 1.25 per cent per annum. They drew down funds under the facilities. However, contrary to the representations that had been made, the loan contract itself enabled GIO to vary the margin on giving 90 days' notice, and on 21 April 1992 it notified the borrowers that in 90 days time (on 1 August 1992) the margin would be varied to 2.25 per cent per annum. GIO gave the borrowers an opportunity to withdraw from the loan contracts without penalty, but they did not take up this opportunity. Instead, they brought proceeding against the respondent alleging misleading conduct in breach of the statutory prohibition. They sought an order under s 87 [now ACL, s 237] varying the loan contracts to make good the representation or damages under s 82 [now ACL, s 236].

At trial, the borrowers did not claim that if they had known the truth about the variation clause, they would not have borrowed at all or would have sought to make alternative arrangements. In fact, they conceded that even with the increased margin, the loan facility was more beneficial to them than any other such facility in the market.

The trial judge (Einfeld J) awarded damages calculated on the difference between the interest payable where a margin of 1.25 per cent prevailed and the interest payable if the margin were 2.25 per cent. This award was overturned on appeal. It was held by the Full Court that the borrowers were seeking nothing less than an order making good their expectations as represented in the brochure, and that s 87 could not be used for that purpose. The court held that the normal measure of damages for misrepresentation was the difference at the time of purchase between the real value of what was acquired, and the price paid. The borrowers' inability to prove that a preferable alternative facility (with a "set" margin) could have been obtained on the market meant that no damages were recoverable under s 82. Section 87 was said to be unavailable to circumvent this result. The appellants appealed to the High Court.]

McHUGH, HAYNE AND CALLINAN JJ: [Their Honours set out ss 82 and 87 and continued:] [510] It can be seen … that both ss 82 and 87 require examination of whether a person has suffered (or, in the case of s 87, is likely to suffer) loss or damage "by conduct of another person" that was engaged in the contravention of one of the identified provisions of the Act. That inquiry is one that seeks to identify a causal connection between the loss or damage that it is alleged has been or is likely to be suffered and the contravening conduct. But once that causal connection is established, there is nothing in s 82 or s 87 (or elsewhere in the Act) which suggests either that the amount that may be recovered under s 82(1), or that the orders that may be made under s 87, should be limited by drawing some analogy with the law of contract, tort or equitable remedies. Indeed, the very fact that ss 82 and 87 may be applied to widely differing contraventions of the Act, some of which can be seen as inviting analogies with torts such as deceit (for example, s 52) or with equity (for example, s 51AA) but others of which find no ready analogies in the common law or equity, shows that it is wrong to limit the apparently clear words of the Act by reference to one or other of these analogies.

Gates did not hold to the contrary … [512] Although Gibbs CJ held ((1986) 160 CLR 1 at 6–7) that the measure of damages in tort, not contract, should apply in the assessment of damages under s 82 where there has been a contravention of ss 52 and 53, the other members of the Court said expressly that "[t]he courts are not bound to make a definitive choice between the two measures of damages so that one applies to all contraventions to the exclusion of the other" (at 14 per Mason, Wilson and Dawson JJ). Further, none of the members of the Court in Gates considered the circumstances in which relief under s 87 should be granted.

Nor do the later decisions of this Court in Wardley Australia Ltd v Western Australia (1992) 175 CLR 514 or Kizbeau Pty Ltd v WG & B Pty Ltd (1995) 184 CLR 281 hold that the remedies provided by ss 82 and 87 are to be confined by analogies, whether with tort or otherwise.

This is not to say that no help can be had from the common law in deciding what damages may be allowed under s 82 in cases of conduct contravening s 52. Very often, the amount of the loss or damage caused by a contravention of s 52 will coincide with what would have been allowed in an action for deceit. But that is because the inquiry in both cases is to find out what damage flowed from (in the sense of being caused by) the deceit or contravention. Leaving aside questions of remoteness of damages in assessing damages for deceit (a question that was left unresolved in Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215 at 223–4 per Gibbs CJ), the damages for deceit will be the sum representing the loss suffered by the plaintiff because the plaintiff altered its position in reliance on the defendant's misrepresentation …

But the analogy cannot be pressed too far. It should not be pressed to the point of concluding that the only damages that may be allowed under s 82 are those that would be allowed in an action for deceit. The question presented by s 82 is not what would be allowed in deceit, it is what loss or damage has been caused by the conduct contravening the Act.

It follows, then, that a comparison must be made between the position in which the party that allegedly has suffered loss or damage is and the position in which that party would have been but for the contravening conduct. And even this inquiry may not conclude the question. Analysing the question of causation only by reference to what is, in essence, a "but for" test has been found wanting in other contexts (see March v Stramare (E & MH) Pty Ltd (1991) 171 CLR 506) and it may well be that it is not an exclusive test of [513] causation in this area either. But that is not a question which we need to consider in this case. For the moment it is enough to say that s 82 requires identification of a causal link between loss or damage and conduct done in contravention of the Act: Wardley Australia Ltd v Western Australia (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 525 per Mason CJ, Dawson, Gaudron and McHugh JJ.

If loss or damage is shown to have been suffered or to be likely to be suffered, orders of the kind prescribed by s 87 may be made. Proof of loss or damage (actual or potential) is therefore the gateway to the s 87 remedies. But the identification of loss or damage is important in the operation of s 87 not only for this reason but also because the power to make orders under s 87 is limited to making orders "if the Court considers that the order or orders concerned will compensate … in whole or in part for the loss or damage or will prevent or reduce the loss or damage …" (ss 87(1) and (1A). That is, the Court can make orders under s 87 only in so far as those orders will compensate (or will prevent or reduce) the loss or damage that is identified.

In Wardley the majority of the Court held ((1992) 175 CLR 514 at 526 per Mason CJ, Dawson, Gaudron and McHugh JJ) that "[u]nder s 82(1), as under the common law, a plaintiff can only recover compensation for actual loss or damage incurred, as distinct from potential or likely damage (Swingcastle Ltd v Gibson [1990] 1 WLR 1223 at 1236; [1990] 3 All ER 463 at 473 per Sir John Megaw; see also [1991] 2 AC 223 at 232 per Lord Lowry, referring to the words of Sir John Megaw on the appeal to the House of Lords)" although, as their Honours noted "[t]he Act draws a clear distinction in Pt VI between loss or damage which may be recovered under s 82 and the likelihood of loss or damage which may be prevented or, if not prevented, reduced by one of the remedies under s 87": Wardley (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 527.

Thus, under s 87, actual loss or damage need not have been suffered before an order is made. Nevertheless, although " [s]87 of the Act confers a wide discretionary power on courts to make remedial orders in appropriate cases to ensure a fair result" (Kizbeau Pty Ltd v WG & B Pty Ltd (1995) 184 CLR 281 at 298 per Brennan, Deane, Dawson, Gaudron and McHugh JJ), that power may be exercised only if a person has suffered or is likely to suffer loss or damage as a result of a contravention.

The loss or damage spoken of in ss 82 and 87 is not confined to economic loss. Section 4K makes that clear. But loss or damage caused by a contravention of the Act will often be economic loss. As was said in Wardley (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 527 per Mason CJ, Dawson, Gaudron and McHugh JJ, "[e]conomic loss may take a variety of forms". But central to them all, when it is said that the loss was, or will probably be, caused by misleading or deceptive conduct, is that the plaintiff has sustained (or is likely to sustain) a prejudice or disadvantage as a result of [514] altering his or her position under the inducement of the misleading conduct.

The bare fact that a contract has been made which confers rights or imposes obligations that are different from what one party represented to be the case does not demonstrate that the party that was misled has suffered loss or damage. The contrary view (which had been adopted by the Full Court of the Federal Court in Jobbins v Capel Court Corp Ltd (1989) 25 FCR 226 was rejected by the majority in Wardley (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 527 per Mason CJ, Dawson, Gaudron and McHugh JJ.

A party that is misled suffers no prejudice or disadvantage unless it is shown that that party could have acted in some other way (or refrained from acting in some way) which would have been of greater benefit or less detriment to it than the course in fact adopted. Thus, the party that is misled will have suffered loss if a chose in action which was acquired was worth less than the amount paid for it. There may well be other ways in which it might suffer loss or damage. For example, consequential loss may be suffered. But no loss of that kind was alleged in this case and, putting that kind of loss to one side, we focus only on loss said to be suffered by the making of the contract.

It is necessary, then, to determine whether the value of what was acquired is less than what was paid. How is value to be assessed? It is to be assessed objectively, not according to what either or both of the parties to the contract believed that it would obtain from the contract. That is, the value of what in fact was acquired is to be identified according to what price freely contracting, fully informed parties would have offered and accepted for it (cf Spencer v The Commonwealth (1907) 5 CLR 418 at 431–2 per Griffith CJ, 441 per Isaacs J). It is only by comparison with the value assessed in this way that there can be an assessment of whether the party that is misled could have obtained some greater benefit or incurred less detriment. What is important is what that party could have done, not what it might have hoped for or expected. Some examples may serve to illustrate the point.

If a person agrees to pay $50,000 for goods which the vendor falsely represents are worth $100,000 but which are, in fact, worth $50,000, what loss has the purchaser who is misled suffered by agreeing to buy (assuming no more is known)? If a person agrees to pay interest at the rate of 10% for a loan which the lender falsely represents would ordinarily command interest at a rate of 15% but which, in fact, would ordinarily command interest at 12%, what loss has the borrower who is misled suffered by agreeing to borrow (again, assuming no more is known)? And so the examples could be multiplied.

The reason that neither of these persons suffers a loss is that viewed [515] objectively each obtained rights having a value (a value determined objectively) at least equal to what it paid for those rights. It is only if some alternative (less detrimental or more beneficial course) were available, that it can be said that the contract which was made was less valuable to the party that was misled than had been represented – for it is only then that a comparison of value can be made.

The fact that each of the misled parties in the examples given may have thought that it was to obtain some advantage from the transaction is not to the point. The contravening conduct has left the party that was misled no worse off than it was before the contravention occurred.

Nor do we accept that the extension by s 4K of loss or damage to "injury" leads to any different conclusion. It may be that "injury" in s 4K is intended to refer to injury to the person but we do not need to decide if that is so. Even if "injury" is to be given some wider meaning than personal injury, we do not accept that a person suffers injury simply because a hoped for advantage does not materialise. The central inquiry is what consequence has the contravention of the Act had on the party in question. That requires comparison between the position in fact of the party which alleges loss and the position that would have obtained had there been no contravention.

This is not to be taken as confining the operation of s 87 to cases where loss or damage has been sustained. It is not confined in that way; it applies to cases in which it is shown that a person is likely to suffer loss or damage. But the inquiry remains an inquiry about whether it is likely that as a result of the contravention the party concerned will suffer some prejudice or disadvantage. If, as we consider to be the case, the bare fact that making a contract different from what was represented is not loss or damage, something more must be shown to be likely to occur in the future before it can be said that it is likely that loss or damage will be suffered.

Ordinarily this will present the plaintiff with no difficulty. It will be rare that the difference between what was represented and what was given will not be reflected in some difference in value or other manifestation of actual loss to the party that was misled either now or in the future. But if it does not, we consider that neither s 82 nor s 87 relief is available. To the extent that the contrary was held in Demagogue Pty Ltd v Ramensky (1992) 39 FCR 31, we consider it to be wrong.

In reaching the conclusion that we do, we are mindful that the object of the Act is said to be "to enhance the welfare of Australians through the promotion of competition and fair trading and provision for consumer protection" (s 2). No narrow construction of the Act should be adopted. But neither should the words of the Act be stretched beyond their limit. It may be said, as a matter of abstract or intuitive assessment, that it is "wrong" if a party that has been found to have engaged in misleading or deceptive conduct does not "pay a [516] price" for its misleading. But the question is what does the Act provide?

Contraventions of Pt V of the Act are not made subject to pecuniary penalties under s 76 and contravention of s 52 is not a criminal offence under s 79. That being so, we do not consider that it runs contrary to the object of the Act to conclude that the remedies given by ss 82 and 87 should be available only to those who are worse off as a result of a contravention of the relevant parts of the Act. Some contraventions invite pecuniary penalty, others invite criminal prosecution as well. Some invite neither pecuniary penalty nor criminal prosecution. If the intention of s 87 had been to provide any of the remedies mentioned on any and every contravention of the relevant parts of the Act, there would have been no reference to loss or damage as a condition of granting relief and as the limit of the relief granted.

It follows, therefore, that the borrowers' concession that … the GIO loan at the increased margin was more beneficial to the borrowers than any other loan that was available is critical to the determination of these proceedings. It was not submitted (and there was no evidence to suggest) that any further increase in margin was to be considered. The matter was argued, at trial and on appeal both to the Full Court and to this Court, on the basis that the only relevant variation to the margin was the variation that was implemented on 1 August 1992, the borrowers having been given the opportunity to leave the arrangement without penalty.

Accordingly, the position of the borrowers is that they were misled into taking a loan which cost them more than was represented to them but which, even so, cost less than any other loan available to them in the market. They suffered and will suffer no loss or damage as a result of the misleading and deceptive conduct of the respondents. No order can be made under ss 82 or 87.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

GAUDRON J: … [502] The distinction between "expectation" loss and "reliance" loss for the purposes of the law of contract is well recognised … However, it is a distinction that is apt to mislead if transposed into other contexts. Contrary to what might be thought, the term "expectation" loss does not indicate that damages are payable simply for thwarted expectations. Rather, damages are payable for the loss involved in non-performance of the contract. Even if a contract is not susceptible of specific performance, the other party is legally entitled to expect its performance. Hence the expression "expectation loss"! (See The Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64 at 80 per Mason CJ and Dawson J where it is said: "The award of damages for breach of contract protects a plaintiff's expectation of receiving the defendant's performance. That expectation arises out of or is created by the contract. Hence, damages for breach of contract are often described as 'expectation damages'.")

The matter may be put another way. Non-performance is, in effect, the loss of a contractual promise which, itself, is a valuable right. That loss must be compensated by an award of damages in the sum that represents the value of that right (see The Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64 at 134 per Toohey J). Moreover, other losses may be sustained in consequence of the breach and, if so, they, too, must be compensated by an award of damages. On the other hand, the law of tort confers no right over and above a right to recover damages for loss sustained in consequence of the wrongful act involved.

When regard is had to the different nature of contractual and tortious liability it is apparent that the so-called different "measure of damages" in contract and tort is no more than a convenient way of indicating that the wrong involved and, thus, the loss occasioned by a breach of contract is of a different kind from that involved in and [503] occasioned by the commission of a tort. The position is explained in McGregor on Damages (16th ed (1997) at 543–4; see also Hill v Van Erp (1997) 188 CLR 159 at 211–12 per McHugh J …:

> In contract … the wrong consists not in the making but in the breaking of the contract and therefore the plaintiff is entitled to be put into the position he would have been in if the contract had never been broken, or in other words, if the contract had been performed (referring to Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex 850 at 855 per Parke B; 154 ER 363 at 365). The plaintiff is entitled to recover damages for the loss of his bargain. In tort, on the other hand, no question of loss of bargain can arise: the plaintiff is not complaining of failure to implement a promise but of failure to leave him alone.

Once it is appreciated that references to the "established measures of damages … [for] contract and tort", as in Gates (1986) 160 CLR 1 at 11 per Mason, Wilson and Dawson JJ, signify different kinds of loss and not different methods by which loss is measured, it is irrelevant to inquire as to the appropriate measure of damages for the purposes of ss 82 and 87 of the Act. Rather, the task is simply to identify the loss or damage suffered or likely to be suffered and, then, to make orders for recovery of that amount under s 82 or to compensate for or prevent or reduce that loss or damage under s 87 of the Act.

Moreover, once it is appreciated that, for the purposes of the law of contract "expectation" loss signifies the loss of a valuable right, namely, the contractual promise, it is irrelevant and quite misleading to ask whether, in the case of misleading and deceptive conduct under s 52 of the Act, ss 82 and 87 allow for "expectation" loss or "consequential" loss. It is irrelevant, because, if the misrepresentation is not contractual, there can be no loss of a contractual promise. It is misleading because it tends to suggest that if "expectation" loss is not recoverable, the claimant can never be compensated in an amount equivalent to that which would be payable if the representation were contractual.

Not only is it misleading to speak of "expectation" loss and "reliance" loss in the context of s 82, but there is no basis for thinking that relief under s 82 is to be confined by analogy either with actions in contract or in tort. With regard to that last matter, all [504] members of the Court are agreed. We differ only in our approach to the question whether, in the circumstances, the appellants suffered or were likely to suffer loss or damage.

In the view taken by McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ, the appellants did not establish that they were worse off as a result of entering into loan agreements with the GIO. Gummow J is of the view that it may be assumed that they would or would likely have been worse off but for the GIO's allowing them to elect to refinance without penalty, while Kirby J is of the view that the appellants were worse off and are thereby entitled to recovery … I am in substantial agreement with the approach taken by Gummow J …

[T]he appellants failed to establish that they had suffered any loss or damage and were, thus, not entitled to any remedy under s 82 of the Act. However, the appellants' entitlement to relief under s 87 does not [505] depend on proof of actual loss or damage. Relief may be granted under that section if a person is "likely to suffer" loss or damage. And as a matter of ordinary language, the expression "likely to suffer" imports only that loss or damage is a real chance or possibility, not that it is more likely than not …

It may be that the appellants could have put a case that, if held to their arrangements with the GIO, they either suffered or were likely to suffer loss or damage of a kind that should attract relief under s 87 of the Act. In this regard, it might have been put, for example, that it was likely that the margin might be increased so that interest was payable at a rate so much in excess of prevailing commercial rates that the appellants would then say that, had they appreciated that at the time, they would either have entered into more beneficial arrangements with other finance providers or, perhaps, not have entered into any loan arrangement at all.

It is apparent from its terms that s 87 allows for relief which is tailored to the particular case and is not confined by notions drawn from equity although, as Gummow J points out in this case, the principles which govern equitable remedies may provide guidance as to the appropriate order in a particular case (referring to Henjo Investments Pty Limited v Collins Marrickville Pty Limited (No 1) (1988) 39 FCR 546 at 564; Munchies Management Pty Ltd v Belperio (1988) 58 FCR 274 at 282–3, 288; Akron Securities Ltd v Iliffe (1997) 41 NSWLR 353 at 367). Had the appellants been held to their contracts, s 87 may well have authorised orders preventing loss or damage in the event that the margins were to be varied so that the interest payable exceeded prevailing rates. However … the appellants were given the opportunity to refinance without penalty. They elected not to. Not having been held to their contracts, they are not entitled to relief on the basis indicated. And as already pointed out, nor was it sought.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

GUMMOW J: [523] GIO provided to the borrowers what Foster J identified as "the opportunity of leaving the contract without penalty": (1996) 70 FCR 559 at 571. Those borrowers upon whom after 1 August 1992 the increased margin was imposed in a real sense suffered that state of affairs as a direct consequence of their election not to avail themselves of the opportunity provided by GIO. Their position thus differed significantly from that of the purchasers in Demagogue Pty Ltd v Ramensky (1992) 39 FCR 31, an authority referred to in the Full Court. There, even at the trial, the vendor, by cross-claim, sought to hold the purchasers fully to their contractual obligations and sought specific performance against them (at 36) …

[529] [W]hat was said by this Court in Gates (1986)160 CLR 1 at 11–12, 14–15 (and Kizbeau Pty Ltd v WG & B Pty Ltd (1995) 184 CLR 281 at 290) does not determine that the measure of compensation which is recoverable in an action under s 82 is confined by analogies with tort or otherwise. The measure of damages recoverable in actions of a varied nature for which s 82 provides is not to be determined on the basis that the appropriate guide in most cases will be found by asking what would have been the measure if the common law did what it does not do, namely treat as a tort any facts which happen to give rise to an action under s 82. Analogy, like the rules of procedure, is a servant not a master.

There was obvious difficulty in classifying entry into the contracts themselves as "loss or damage" sustained at that stage by the borrowers and in providing monetary compensation for that injury as if there had been the loss of a bargain. At the times when the contracts [530] were made, there was no cheaper financing on the market … None of the borrowers suggested that he or she would not have borrowed at all if the AAA facility had been other than as represented … None said that, had the truth of the matter been told, he or she would have entered into alternative financial arrangements. At this factual level, the present case thus is to be distinguished from the situation in authorities such as Demagogue Pty Ltd v Ramensky (1992) 39 FCR 31 and Akron Securities Ltd v Iliffe (1997) 41 NSWLR 353. In those cases (where relief was obtained under s 87, not s 82), there had been a finding that, if prior to their entry into the transactions in question the applicants had been aware of the true situation, they would not have entered into the transactions …

Further, in the present litigation, it was conceded that, even with the increase in the margin, the AAA facility was more beneficial to the borrowers than any other available loan facility … Nevertheless, the focus of the borrowers' complaints with respect to the contractual terms of the AAA facility was the presence of cl 11.1 in the Conditions of Use. This did not immediately subject them to any contractual liability to pay more than a margin of 1.25 per cent. Such a liability would arise, and did in fact arise, only upon the expiration of 90 days after a notice had been served consequent upon the exercise of the power given by cl 1 1.1 to GIO. No doubt the contravention of s 52 occurred before entry by the borrowers into their respective contracts. But any injury which would found their actions under s 82, and for which it would provide a measure of compensation, was contingent or prospective until GIO acted to increase the margin rate and that increase became legally binding upon the borrowers to expand what previously had been their contractual liabilities to GIO. It follows that, on any footing, the expanded liabilities would not have crystallised until 1 August 1992 when the increased 2.25 per cent became effective …

[532] In the present case, a cause of action under s 82 would not have accrued in favour of the borrowers before 1 August 1992. However, before that date, they had been given by GIO an opportunity to escape the imposition of what otherwise would have been an increased contractual liability upon them by taking the steps specified in the GIO letter dated 21 April 1992. As a practical matter, the imposition of the higher rate upon the borrowers was the sequel to their exercise of choice not to accept the proposal made by GIO.

The "common sense" answer to the question of causation which arises under a provision such as s 82 cannot be given, as Lord Hoffmann recently has stated (Environment Agency (formerly National Rivers Authority) v Empress Car Co (Abertillery) Ltd [1998] 2 WLR 350 at 356–8; [1998] 1 All ER 481 at 487–8; see also Chappel v Hart (1998) 156 ALR 517 at 534–5, 550–1) "without knowing the purpose and scope of the rule" enacted by s 82. The borrowers appear to have approached the matter upon the footing that, there having been contravention of s 52 which induced their entry into the AAA facilities, the remedial provisions of the TPA might be utilised to put them in the same position as if the representations were terms of the facilities. It is true that the discretionary remedies provided by s 87 are of sufficient width that, in an appropriate case, contractual terms themselves may be varied. Section 82 stands in a different light. It confers a right of action not a discretionary remedy. The purpose and scope of s 82 is to provide compensation for the injuries sustained by contravention, in the present case, of s 52. The measure of compensation will not necessarily reflect that which would have been [533] the position of the borrowers if the AAA facility had not included the broad power of variation conferred by cl 11.1.

The primary judge fell into error in (a) applying s 82 to the facts of the present case on the footing that the borrowers had been justified in refusing to take advantage of the opportunity provided by GIO; and (b) providing a remedy, the effect of which was, up to the time of judgment and notwithstanding the intervening events, to treat GIO as obliged to make good its representations.

In reaching these conclusions, I have assumed that, in an appropriate case, the exercise by one party of a contractual power to increase the legal obligations of another may be an injury to the second party, which answers the description of "loss or damage" in the first sense in which that phrase is used in s 82. It will be for the second party, as an applicant under s 82, to establish the necessary causal link with the contravention of Pts IV or V and to prove the measure of compensation. In the present case, that causal link could not be demonstrated …

[536] The application of s 87 to the present case may be approached on the footing that, as indicated earlier in these reasons, the borrowers would have sustained loss or damage when the increased margin came into operation on 1 August 1992. However, in giving notice by letter dated 21 April 1992, GIO did not, in Sir George Jessel's words (Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 220 Ch D 1 at 13) "seek to take advantage of [its] own false statements" nor, having obtained the contracts by misleading and deceptive conduct, did GIO insist upon keeping the borrowers to those contracts. Moreover, even with the increase in the margin, the AAA facility was more beneficial to the borrowers than any other available loan facility.

In those circumstances, in respect of borrowers who declined the GIO offer, an order adding a term to their AAA facilities to the effect that the margin was fixed at 1.25 per cent for the life thereof would not be a proper exercise of the discretion conferred upon the court by s 87(1A). It would not be an appropriate measure to prevent or reduce loss or damage suffered or likely to be suffered by the borrowers by reason of the increase of the margin to 2.25 per cent with effect from 1 August 1992. The increased contractual liability of the borrowers would be the product of their own exercise of choice, not the taking by GIO of advantage of its misleading or deceptive conduct by insisting upon keeping the borrowers to the terms of their facilities.

The borrowers did not make out a case for relief, whether under s 82 or s 87(1A) of the TPA … The result is that the appeal to this court should be dismissed with costs.

[KIRBY J dissented.]

Discretion

[33.251] As noted, the remedies under s 237 are in the court's discretion. Henjo Investments Pty Ltd v Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (1988) 39 FCR 546 (at [33.252]) provides examples of the factors the courts take into account when exercising their discretion under s 237. There is no reference in the section to common law or equitable forms of relief, or to the bars to rescission that exist under general law. However, in exercising its discretion, the court may seek guidance in general law principles: see Henjo Investments Pty Ltd v Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (1988) 79 ALR 83. In Chint Australasia Pty Limited v Cosmoluce Pty Limited [2008] NSWSC 635, [130], Einstein J said that "[t]he power of the Court to make orders in the nature of rescission under the Trade Practices Act is guided (but not controlled by) the same considerations as affect the availability of rescission in equity". These principles are discussed in Chapter 39.

Henjo Investments v Collins Marrickville

[33.252] Henjo Investments Pty Ltd v Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (1988) 39 FCR 546 (Federal Court of Australia, Full Court) – Appeal from a single judge of the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: Henjo Investments Pty Ltd (Henjo) owned a licensed restaurant business known as "The New York Deli". Henjo was lessee of the premises in which the restaurant was conducted. The seating capacity of the restaurant, as approved by the local council and stipulated in the liquor licence, was limited to 84 people. The liquor licence did not allow for seating in the bar area. However, after the opening of the restaurant, the number of seats was increased to 128, and the bar area was used as a service area with eight stools. This was done without authority from the local council or the licensing authorities. Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (Collins Marrickville) negotiated to purchase the restaurant business from Henjo. The negotiations were conducted on Collins Marrickville's behalf by Mr Collins (a director) and Mr James (a chartered accountant), and on Henjo's behalf by Mr Saade (a director) and Mr Le May (a business agent). When Saade retained Le May, he signed a card, on the reverse side of which Le May had written the words "seats 128" and immediately under this the word "Licensed". Le May had received the figure of 128 seats from Saade. Later, when Collins and James went to Le May's office, he showed them the instruction card with the reference to 128 seats. At the restaurant itself Collins and James observed 128 seats, and that there were eight stools at the bar. Collins retained a solicitor, Mr Tadd, who was instructed to confirm that all council by-laws were complied with and to check the liquor licence. The solicitor, however, failed to make any inquiries. Collins Marrickville subsequently purchased the business for $500,000, on 2 April 1985. It only then became aware that the restaurant was being operated in a manner not permitted by law.

Clauses 6 and 7 of the contract of purchase contained an acknowledgment by the purchaser that it had not relied upon any statement, representation or warranty given on behalf of the vendor, and a provision that provided that the document constituted the whole of the contract. Clause 6 read as follows:

> The purchaser acknowledges that it accepts the premises in their present condition and state of repair, subject to any infestation and dilapidation and as a result of its own inspection of the premises. In entering into this agreement the purchaser acknowledges that it has not relied on any statement, representation or warranty by or on behalf of the vendor whether express or implied as to:
> (a) the premises;
>
> (b) the neighbourhood in which the premises are situated and adjoining properties;
>
> (c) the suitability for any use or purpose of the premises or any improvements erected thereon;
>
> (d) the rights and privileges (if any) pertaining to the premises;
>
> (e) any matter having or which might have an effect beneficial or otherwise on the premises.
> The purchaser acknowledges that the only statements, representations and warranties on behalf of the vendor are such as are expressly set out in this agreement.

Clause 7 read:

> Notwithstanding and without limiting the provisions of any other clause or special condition of this agreement the parties hereto agree that the agreement constitutes the whole of any promises, representations, warranties and undertakings and also the whole of the conditions of the sale. The parties hereto further agree that no promise, representations, warranties, > undertakings or conditions shall be deemed to be implied herein or to arise between the parties hereto by way of collateral or other agreement or by reason of any promise, representation, warranty or undertaking given or made by any party thereto to the other on or prior to the making of this agreement. The existence of any such implication or collateral or other agreement is hereby expressly negatived.

Collins Marrickville operated the restaurant business, but the business fared badly. The company commenced proceedings in the Federal Court on 5 August 1985, claiming that Henjo had engaged in misleading or deceptive conduct contrary to s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) [now ACL, s 18]. During the hearing, which commenced on 11 March 1986, Collins Marrickville sought an adjournment and tried to obtain approval from the authorities to increase the approved seating. There was considerable delay, and the operation of the business was significantly changed. At the hearing before Wilcox J, which commenced on 16 April 1987, there was an absence of evidence as to the value of the business with its original restriction such as would facilitate a calculation of damages. Collins Marrickville had by then sought relief under s 87 of the TPA. Wilcox J held that Henjo had infringed s 52, ordered that the contract of sale be declared void ab initio, made other consequential orders, and an order that judgment be entered for damages, but made no provision for interest. He also held that Saade was involved in Henjo's conduct under s 75B of the Act [now ACL, s 2(1)]. Henjo and Saade appealed to the Full Court against the orders. Collins Marrickville appealed as to damages and the failure to include interest.]
LOCKHART J:

Section 52

[554] The Compact Edition of the Oxford English Dictionary (1987) defines the word "mislead" in its transitive sense as: "to lead astray in action or conduct; [553] to lead into error; to cause to err". "Deceive" is defined as: "to ensnare; to take unawares by craft or guile; to overcome, overreach, get the better of by trickery; to beguile or betray into mischief or sins; to mislead." This approach to determining the meanings of the terms appearing in s 52 is consistent with the approach adopted by Franki J in Weitmann v Katies Ltd (1977) ATPR 40-041, 17,444; (1977) 29 FLR 336, 343.

The two words, "misleading" and "deceptive", are plainly not synonymous. That is not to say that each word may not catch some of the same conduct and that there may not be some degree of overlap. "Mislead" does not necessarily involve an element of intent and it is a word of wider reach than "deceive". However, it is difficult, in my opinion, to read the word "deceive" in s 52 other than as involving some degree of moral turpitude as it does in ordinary English usage. Trickery, craft and guile, though not essential elements of liability, are typically at the heart of this [93] second element of the statutory provision directed to the protection of the public from unfair trading practices.

Misleading or deceptive conduct generally consists of representations, whether express or by silence; but it is erroneous to approach s 52 on the assumption that its application is confined exclusively to circumstances which constitute some form of representation. The section is expressed briefly, indeed tersely, in plain and simple words which, if I may be forgiven for repeating them, say simply: "a corporation shall not, in trade or commerce, engage in conduct that is misleading or deceptive or is likely to mislead or deceive." There is no need or warrant to search for other words to replace those used in the section itself. Dictionaries, one's own knowledge of the developing English language and ordinary experience are useful touchstones, but ultimately in each case it is necessary to examine the conduct, whether representational in character or not, and ask the question whether the impugned conduct of its nature constitutes misleading or deceptive conduct. This will often, but not always, be the same question, as whether the conduct is likely to mislead or deceive.

Whether there was a representation that the restaurant was licensed to seat 128 people

[33.253] [556] The card contained on its back the statement "Seats 128" and immediately underneath the word "Licensed". These statements were seen on the back of the card by both

Mr James and Mr Collins. It must also be remembered that the words "Fully Licensed" appeared in bold print on the front window of the restaurant and were seen by both men. In my opinion the showing of the card to Mr James and Mr Collins was not conveying two discrete items of information; but was a clear statement in the circumstances that "The New York Deli" was a restaurant licensed to seat 128 people. In that sense Mr Le May communicated to Mr James and Mr Collins that the restaurant was licensed to seat 128 people.

Representation by silence

In my opinion the real complaint against the conduct of Henjo and Mr Saade in this case arises from their silence in not informing Collins Marrickville of the true position with respect to the limitations on seating capacity and the use to which the bar area could be put.

The trial judge found that Henjo owed a duty to inform Collins Marrickville, before the sale was effected, as to the true position about the number of tables and seats permitted by the council and the Licensing Court and about the bar service area and that this duty was breached …

[557] At common law, silence can give rise to an actionable misrepresentation where there is a duty upon the representor to reveal a matter if it exists, and where the other party is therefore entitled to infer that matter does not exist from the silence of the representor: W Scott Fell & Co Ltd v Lloyd (1906) 4 CLR 572, 577 per Griffith CJ; Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed), vol 31, para 1052. The circumstances in which silence may constitute misleading conduct under the Act were referred to in Rhone-Poulenc Agrochimie SA v UIM Chemical Services Pty Ltd (1986) ATPR (Digest) ¶46-010; (1986) 12 FCR 477. That case established that silence may be relied on in order to show a breach of s 52 when the circumstances give rise to an obligation to disclose relevant facts: see at 53,047; 490 per Bowen CJ; at 53,048; 504 per Lockhart J; and at 53,049; 508 per Jackson J. The duty to disclose is not confined to cases where there are particular relationships, such as trustee and beneficiary or solicitor and client, principal and agent and guardian and ward. There is no useful purpose in seeking to analyse the circumstances in which the duty to disclose will arise as this must depend on the facts of each case.

In the present case the vendor sold a business knowing that it was subject to serious limitations upon its lawful seating capacity, limitations imposed by both the licensing authorities and the local council which vitally affected the business, its goodwill, takings and profitability and knowing that in fact the restaurant was being conducted contrary to law with a substantial element of overseating. The vendor's agent had given the purchaser to understand that the limitations upon the seating capacity and the limitations arising from the licensing of the restaurant were less restrictive than was in fact the case, while the manner in which the business was conducted at the time of sale supported this understanding. In my opinion these circumstances gave rise to a duty on the part of Henjo as vendor to reveal the true position to Collins Marrickville, the potential purchaser, before any contract was signed.

[558] It is no answer to say that Collins Marrickville should have made its own inquiries and that, if it had done so, it would have found out the true position: see Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1, 14, 17 per Jessel MR; at 23 per Baggallay LJ, in the context of the equitable right to rescind for innocent misrepresentation. It is true that Mr Collins recognised the importance of verifying the material given to him by Mr Le May about the seating capacity of the restaurant and that, had his solicitor done what he should have done, the true position would have emerged and the sale probably would not have proceeded. But these circumstances did not negate the duty to disclose which the circumstances otherwise imposed.

Reliance upon the misleading conduct

[33.254] The trial judge dealt with the defence of Henjo that no reliance was placed by Collins Marrickville upon the misleading conduct of Henjo and [96] Mr Saade. His Honour accepted that Mr Collins thought it important to check that the facts in relation to approvals of statutory authorities were as he understood them to be, that he wanted a thorough check to be made and relied upon his solicitor to make that check. His Honour found that this state of mind was not inconsistent with

Mr Collins having also been influenced by the information originally conveyed to him by Mr Le May on behalf of Henjo which had caused him to instruct Mr James to do further work and retain Mr Tadd. His Honour said it was true that this influence would have been negated if Mr Tadd had carried out his instructions and reported the true facts; but, notwithstanding Mr Tadd's omission, the original influence, supplemented by a report of Mr James to Mr Collins, continued to operate.

It is broadly true that an applicant in an action under s 52 cannot recover damages unless he establishes that he acted on or was influenced by the conduct contravening the section: Mister Figgins Pty Ltd v Centrepoint Freeholds Pty Ltd (1981) ATPR 40-226, 43,059; (1981) 36 ALR 23, 48 per Northrop J. The issue of the applicant's reliance upon such conduct is however more complex than such a formulation indicates. The trial judge noted the similarity between conduct constituting deceit at common law and conduct contravening s 52, and referred to the principles which determine whether there has been inducement in actions for deceit. These principles were reviewed by Wilson J in Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215 at 236. His Honour there observed that the inference that the applicant relied upon a material representation calculated to induce him to enter a contract might be rebutted by showing that "whether he knew the true facts or not he did not rely upon the representation." His Honour noted that the representation made "need not be the sole inducement. It is sufficient so long as it plays some part even if only a minor part in contributing to the formation of the contract." In Neilsen v Hempston Holdings Pty Ltd (1986) ATPR 40-686, 47,545; (1986) 65 ALR 302, 313, a case which concerned an action for damages under s 52 where misleading statements had been made to the applicant as to the occupancy rate of a motel, Pincus J held that the causal chain allowing recovery of damages under s 52 of the Trade Practices Act was not broken even where the applicant had failed to take reasonable care of his own interests by undertaking a proper investigation of the figures presented. These decisions support the view that recovery under s 52 is founded by the applicant's actual reliance upon the misleading or deceptive conduct of the respondent although that conduct was not the only factor in the applicant's decision to [559] enter a particular agreement, and although the applicant did not seek to verify the representations or did so inadequately and so failed to discover their falsity.

The circumstances of this case do not support the conclusion that Collins Marrickville did not in fact rely upon the misleading conduct of Mr Saade and Henjo. Their conduct not only played some part in contributing to the purchase of the business but was in fact, the major inducement. It matters not that the solicitor's failure to carry out his client's instructions prevented what may or indeed would, more likely than not, have been a different result. The fact is that reliance was placed by the purchaser upon what it assumed to be the true position as a result of the conduct of the vendor and the absence of knowledge of the true facts …

Special conditions 6 and 7

[33.255] [560] I turn now to the two Special Conditions, 6 and 7. The trial judge considered the effect of Special Conditions 6 and 7 of the contract for sale [98] and found that they did not operate to defeat a claim under s 52, whatever effect they may have in the law of contract, because an exclusion clause of that kind cannot oust the effect of the Act or deprive an applicant of remedies under it. If in fact there was misleading conduct by Henjo which induced Collins Marrickville to enter into the contract, that inducement was not negated because in the agreement itself the parties may have said to the contrary ….

[561] Irrespective of the construction of these two Special Conditions it does not matter ultimately whether the impugned conduct with which this case is concerned falls literally within them or not. Section 52 is a section in the consumer protection provisions of an Act concerned to protect the public from misleading or deceptive conduct and unfair trade practices which may result in contravention of the Act. It has been held that exclusion clauses, of which Special Conditions 6 and 7 are examples, cannot operate to defeat claims under s 52. It may be, as the judgment of Sweeney J in PJ Berry Estates Pty Ltd v Mangalore Homestead Pty Ltd (1984) ATPR 40-489, 45,638 suggests, that such exclusion clauses will generally be ineffective because they cannot break the nexus between the conduct in contravention of s 52 and the making of the agreement in issue. Where the conduct of the defendant is alleged to be fraudulent in character, then an exclusion clause will be no more effective if the action were brought in the tort of deceit in relation to conduct antecedent to the contract: Commercial Banking Co of Sydney Ltd v RH Brown & Co (1972) 126 CLR 337, 344, per Menzies J; Petera Pty Ltd v EAJ Pty Ltd (1985) ATPR 40-605 at 46,887 per Wilcox J; see also Terry, "Disclaimers and Deceptive Conduct" (1986) ABLR 478 at 486.

There are wider objections to allowing effect to such clauses. Otherwise the operation of the Act, a public policy statute, could be ousted by private agreement. Parliament passed the Act to stamp out unfair or improper conduct in trade or in commerce: it would be contrary to public policy for special conditions such as those with which this contract was concerned to deny or prohibit a statutory remedy for offending conduct under the Act. There are various judgments of judges of this court where this approach has been adopted …

Mr Saade and s 75B

[33.256] Mr Saade plainly was aware of the true position with respect to the licences and the limited numbers of tables and seats permitted by law and of the fact that the actual number of tables and seats substantially exceeded the legal limit. He was also aware of the facts relating to the bar service area and the limitations on the use to which it could be put. Mr Saade concealed these matters from Collins Marrickville, he was in control of the premises, he was responsible for all relevant licences being obtained, he signed the instructions to Mr Le May and he was responsible for the conduct of the restaurant business. He had knowledge of the relevant matters which constituted the contravention and therefore was correctly found by his Honour to have been involved in the contravention within the meaning of s 75B of the Act.

Relief

[33.257] I turn to the most difficult question in the case, namely, relief …. The primary issue is whether restitution or damages is the appropriate relief.

It is not disputed that this court has power to make orders of the kind made by his Honour in this case. The issue is whether in all the circumstances of the case it was appropriate that they be made. Five matters are central to the question of relief. First, the trial judge found that the [562] trading losses of the restaurant sustained by Collins Marrickville, except to the extent that they were increased by the loss of the bar stools, were occasioned by factors in connection with which there was no misrepresentation and that most of the losses were caused by factors which had nothing to do with the misrepresentations as to seating capacity. His Honour found that they were not "directly attributable" to the misrepresentations and ought not to be allowed.

Secondly, the trial judge found that the removal of the bar stools had an adverse effect upon the restaurant's takings and consequently upon [100] profitability but an effect that was relatively minor. His Honour assessed the contribution of the loss of the bar stools to the trading losses as being 10 per cent of the whole.

These two findings were challenged by Henjo in argument; but there is evidence to support them and no ground for disturbing them was established.

Thirdly, notwithstanding the restrictions in law upon the seating capacity of the restaurant, it has in fact been conducted, not only before, but since, the acquisition of the business by Collins Marrickville (1 May 1985), with about 128 seats. The losses which have in fact been sustained by Collins Marrickville since it took over the business cannot, therefore, be attributed to the fact that the lawful seating capacity is substantially less than 128 seats.

Fourthly, substantial changes have occurred to The New York Deli restaurant, its staff and management and the manner in which the restaurant business has been conducted by Collins Marrickville since May 1985. The changes introduced by Collins Marrickville to the conduct of the restaurant and its method of operation include the following:

(a) the principle of self-serve from attractive display cabinets has been replaced by full waiter service;

(b) the number of staff has increased considerably, thus increasing wages;

(c) lavish displays of food have been replaced by table menu service; and

(d) food display cabinets have been removed to increase seating space.

Henjo argues that these changes are irreversible but his Honour rejected a similar submission. He accepted that the changes had occurred but did not think they afforded in themselves sufficient reason for refusing an order for restitution. I see no warrant for interfering with these findings of the trial judge; but they are matters which must be taken into account in deciding whether restitution is appropriate and must be viewed in the light of all other relevant circumstances. The business of the New York Deli has run down since its ownership passed to Collins Marrickville and the business has changed from one that was making a substantial profit into one with losses between $14 000 [and] $15 000 per month. The number of customers has declined during the past two years and the goodwill of the business must have been adversely affected. Restitution involves the handing back to the former owner of a business which has for some two years or so been in other hands and conducted in a different way, some of the differences being quite substantial. The restaurant trade is notoriously volatile.

Fifthly, Collins Marrickville did not actively prosecute this proceeding after its commencement in August 1985, and changed its course in midstream from claiming damages as its primary relief to seeking restitution.

[His Honour traced the history of the proceedings.]

[564] In my opinion it is therefore plain that the delays which have attended this case have been due principally to Collins Marrickville. Had the proceedings been prosecuted with diligence it would have been easier for the court to restore the parties to their position before the making of the contract if this had otherwise been appropriate … I have carefully considered his Honour's reasons for ordering restitution, but I have come to the conclusion that those orders cannot stand and that Collins Marrickville should be left to pursue its claim for damages …

In granting a remedy under s 87, the court is not restricted by the limitations under the general law of a party's right to rescind for breach of contract or misrepresentation. Nevertheless, in exercising its discretion under s 87, the court will consider the conduct of the parties after they had knowledge of the misleading quality of the conduct: Mister Figgins Pty Ltd v Centrepoint Freeholds Pty Ltd at 43,068; 60 per Northrop J. Such an approach is consistent with that adopted by the Privy Council in Senanayake v Cheng [1966] AC 63, 83, observing that at general law the questions for the court in determining whether to allow restitution are "whether restitutio in integrum is substantially possible and whether rescission is timely and just and fair". On this approach the court must consider all the circumstances before it in the exercise of its discretion ….

[565] It was argued on behalf of Collins Marrickville that damages would not be an adequate remedy for various reasons of which I shall mention the principal ones. It was said that damages would not protect Collins Marrickville as the wronged purchaser in respect of its continuing liability for rental outstanding under the lease and the continuing liability of Mr Collins as the guarantor of that liability. The term of the lease is for six years from 20 May 1984 terminating on 20 May 1990. The lease provides for a base rental of $157 500 for the 18 month period commencing 20 May 1984 with provision for reviews of rent at intervals of 18 months to reflect changes in the "all groups consumer price index". For the financial year ended 30 June 1987 the rent payable by Collins Marrickville was $173 643. It is plain that the remaining obligations of Collins Marrickville and of Mr Collins with respect to the remaining two years or so of the lease are substantial; but due to the time the matter has taken to reach the present position only a little over two years of the six year lease remains to run. This is a circumstance which, in my view, can adequately be taken into account in an assessment of damages.

It was argued that, upon the making of restitution orders, inquiries could be directed or other steps taken to ensure that proper allowances are given by Collins Marrickville to Henjo for any changes which have taken place to the running of the business and which may have adversely affected its profitability or goodwill or altered its nature. Allowances of this kind would, to some extent, diminish the detriment that Henjo would otherwise suffer if it were to receive back The New York Deli; but so long has passed since [556] Collins Marrickville took over the business and so many adverse changes have occurred to the business that I do not think allowance of the kind suggested would adequately protect Henjo.

In my opinion there is no inherent problem in the court awarding damages in this case to adequately compensate Collins Marrickville for its losses.

I have considered whether the award of damages made by his Honour should stand and this litigation thus be brought to an end. There is something to be said for this view, but on balance I think that the interests of justice require that the question of damages be remitted to the trial judge or other single judge of this court for reassessment …

In support of its cross-appeal Collins Marrickville argued that the trial judge failed to allow by way of damages trading losses for the period 1 July 1986 to 20 October 1987 and failed to order that there be included in the sum for which judgment was given interest on any part of that sum. I discern no error in the approach adopted by his Honour in declining to allow the whole of the trading losses of Collins Marrickville …

It does appear that his Honour did not include in the amount for which judgment was entered any component by way of interest pursuant to s 51A of the Federal Court of Australia Act 1976. The effect of that section, where (as here) the cause of action is one arising after the commencement of the section, is that interest shall be awarded unless good cause is shown to the contrary. As his Honour made no contrary findings an amount should have been awarded by way of interest. As damages are to be reassessed, any entitlement can be attended to then.

In the result Collins Marrickville succeeds on the issues of liability, Henjo succeeds on the question of relief in so far as it should be confined to damages and not extended to orders for restitution; but Henjo fails in its [567] argument that there should be no retrial on the question of damages and that the damages should stand as presently assessed. Collins Marrickville fails in its cross-appeal except on the question of interest.

[BURCHETT J delivered a short judgment in which he agreed with Lockhart J. FOSTER J delivered a judgment in which he expressed agreement with Lockhart J on the issues relating to liability but dissented on the issue of relief.]

1. It is arguable that Henjo Investments' conduct (ie the handing over of the card by Mr La May) was misleading even if one does not consider Henjo Investments silence in not informing Collins Marrickville of the true position with respect to the limitations on seating capacity and the use to which the bar area could be put. However, the fact that the two statements contained on the card were literally true led the court to consider Henjo Investments' silence regarding the licensed capacity. In the recent High Court case of Miller & Associates Insurance Broking Pty Ltd v BMW Australia Finance Limited [2010] HCA 31; (2010) 241 CLR 357 French CJ noted, at [23]:

> Reasonable expectation analysis is unnecessary in the case of a false representation where the undisclosed fact is the falsity of the representation. A party to precontractual negotiations who provides to another party a document containing a false representation which is not disclaimed will, in all probability, have engaged in misleading or deceptive conduct. When a document contains a statement that is true, non-disclosure of an important qualifying fact will be misleading or deceptive if the recipient would be misled, absent such disclosure, into believing that the statement was complete. In some cases it might not be necessary to invoke non-disclosure at all where a statement which is literally true, but incomplete in some material respect, conveys a false representation that it is complete.

2. Section 137B of the CCA (which is contained in the Part of the CCA that applies the ACL as a law of the Commonwealth) requires the reduction of an award of damages under s 236(1) where the loss or damage in question has been caused partly by the claimant's failure to take reasonable care and partly by conduct that contravenes s 18. Section 137B only applies to claims for damages in respect of economic loss or damage to property caused by a contravention of s 18 (s 137B(a), (b)). The provision does not apply where the respondent intentionally or fraudulently caused the loss or damage (s 137B(d)).

   Where the criteria are met, and the loss has been caused partly by the claimant's failure to take reasonable care and partly as a result of conduct in contravention of s 18, then:

   > [T]he amount of loss or damage that the claimant may recover under subsection 236(1) of the Australian Consumer Law is to be reduced to the extent to which a court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the loss or damage.

   Where those criteria are not met, and the claimant's failure to take reasonable care does not sever the causal connection between the misleading conduct and the loss, the claimant will be entitled to recover the full amount of the loss from the respondent.

   If Henjo were heard today, s 137B would not affect the outcome because it does not apply where the respondents intentionally or fraudulently caused the loss or damage. However, even if Henjo Investments had not acted fraudulently, s 137B may still not have affected the outcome. The predecessor to s 137B was only enacted in 2004 and its scope remains unclear. The provision is clearly applicable where the applicant's failure to take care is independent of the misleading conduct. It remains to be seen whether the applicant's damages will be reduced where he or she has failed to take reasonable care to discover the falsity of a respondent's representation.

3. The application laws of the States and Territories do not contain a provision equivalent to s 137B of the CCA. Thus, damages cannot be reduced in the manner described under the State and Territory application laws. An applicant concerned about the possibility of having his or her damages reduced on the basis of a failure to take reasonable care would therefore be advised to bring a claim under the State or Territory application laws.

4. Part VIA of the CCA provides for the apportionment of damages awarded under s 236 of the ACL where economic loss or damage to property has been caused by the acts or omissions of two or more persons acting independently or jointly. Similar provisions apply to actions for damages under the State and Territory application laws.

These provisions would not apply on the facts of Henjo because the misleading conduct was intentional. However, if Henjo were heard today and Collins Marrickville had innocently engaged in the misleading conduct, Collins Marrickville could argue that the losses suffered by Henjo should be apportioned between itself and the negligent solicitor.

CAUSATION

[33.265] An applicant for relief under s 236 or s 237 must establish a causal link between the contravening conduct and the loss suffered (or the likelihood of loss under s 237). Both sections refer to loss "by conduct" in contravention of a provision of the ACL. The word "by" connotes a causal requirement and means in effect "by reason of" or "as a result of". Most of the cases dealing with causation concern applicants who enter contracts following misleading conduct. In that context, as under the general law relating to misrepresentation, causation is established by proving actual reliance on the misleading conduct in entering into the contract. In interpreting and applying this statutory notion of causation, the courts have drawn by way of analogy on common law principles of causation, subject to the context and purpose of the statute: see Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd [1998] HCA 69; (1998) 196 CLR 494, at [33.250]. The "but for" test of causation may be invoked however it is no longer regarded as a comprehensive or an exclusive test.

As in the case of misrepresentation and duress at common law (see [32.90] and [34.40] respectively), the wrongful conduct under the ACL need not be the sole cause of the loss. A person who establishes loss suffered in actual reliance on misleading conduct, for example, will not be denied relief simply because other influences were at work, or because he or she would have incurred the loss even in the absence of the misleading conduct. It is, however, possible for an established chain of causation to be severed by a subsequent significant cause – sometimes termed a novus actus interveniens.

Henville v Walker

[33.270] Henville v Walker [2001] HCA 52; (2001) 206 CLR 459 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Western Australia, Full Court.

[FACTS: The appellant (Mr Henville, an architect) purchased land in Albany (the View Street property) with the aim of developing a block of three units. In deciding to purchase the land and undertake the project he was influenced by two factors. Firstly, he relied on representations by the respondent, the vendor's agent (Mr Walker), regarding "a huge void" in the market for quality units in Albany and the anticipated selling price of the units within six months of going on the market as $250,000 per unit realising a total of $750,000. These representations involved a substantial overestimation and constituted misleading conduct. Secondly, the appellant relied on his own feasibility study for an estimate of the cost of the proposed development. This estimate was careless and substantially underestimated the cost of the development. He estimated the total cost of the project would be $552,000, of which $315,000 was referable to the cost of construction of the units and $12,000 referable to interest payments on bank loans.

The appellant would not have proceeded with the project unless he believed that it was likely to realise a profit of at least $100,000. In fact, the construction costs turned out to be $461,000, and the interest payments $160,000. The overall cost came to $864,846. When the units were sold, although they were well designed and built, they realised only $545,000. After this sum was subtracted from the total expenditures incurred by the appellant, an overall loss of $319,846.51 was revealed. The appellant claimed this sum from the respondent, bringing his claim under s 82 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 for contraventions of s 52 [now ACL, s 236 and s 18 respectively].

The trial judge (Anderson J) allowed recovery, but not of $319,846.51 He assessed damages at $205,000, being the difference between the represented sale price ($750,000) and the actual sale price ($545,000). The Full Court allowed an appeal. It held that no damages were recoverable as there was no causal connection between the respondent's misleading conduct and the appellant's loss: the appellant was the author of his own misfortune. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

MCHUGH J: [489] This Court's decision in Wardley Australia Ltd v Western Australia (1992) 175 CLR 514 established that the term "by" in s 82 invokes the common law concept of causation. In Wardley, Mason CJ, Dawson and Gaudron JJ and I said (at 525):

> The statutory cause of action arises when the plaintiff suffers loss or damage "by" contravening conduct of another person. "By" is a curious word to use …. But the word clearly expresses the notion of causation without defining or elucidating it. In this situation, s 82(1) should be understood as taking up the common law practical or common-sense concept of causation recently discussed by this Court in March v Stramare (E & M H) Pty Ltd (1991) 171 CLR 506, except in so far as that concept is modified or supplemented expressly or impliedly by the provisions of the Act. Had Parliament intended to say something else, it would have been natural and easy to have said so.

But this does not mean that common law conceptions of causation should be rigidly applied without regard to the terms or objects of the Act. Section 82 now applies to the contravention of any provision of Pts IV, IVB or V, or s 51AC of the Act. In Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd, Hayne and Callinan JJ and I pointed out that the section can apply to many different kinds of cases, not just those where a breach of s 52 is alleged: (1998) 196 CLR 494 at 509 (see also at 528 per Gummow J). Moreover, the objects of the Act indicate that a court should strive to apply s 82 in a way that promotes competition and fair trading and protects consumers (s 2 of the Act states that the objective of the Act is "to enhance the welfare of Australians through the promotion of competition and fair trading and provision for consumer protection"). The width of the potential application of s 82 and the objects of the Act tell against a narrow, inflexible construction of the section (Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd (1998) 196 CLR 494 at 515 per McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ, 528–9 per Gummow J, where his Honour referred to statements of Lockhart J in Janssen-Cilag Pty Ltd v Pfizer Pty Ltd (1992) 37 FCR 526 at 529–30, to the effect that there was a need for flexibility in the rules laid down regarding s 82).

No doubt in most cases, applying common law conceptions of causation will be sufficient to answer the issues posed by s 82 in its application to [490] contraventions of the Act. But care must be taken to avoid a mechanical application of those conceptions to issues arising under the section. In Elna Australia Pty Ltd v International Computers (Aust) Pty Ltd (No 2) (1987) 75 ALR 271 at 279–80, Gummow J pointed out:

> [I]t would be an error to translate automatically to the particular statute what appeared the closest analogue from the common law "rules" as to causation. It is rather a question of statutory construction … Thus, in construing s 82 it is appropriate to bear in mind such matters as the scope and purpose of Pts IV and V … [and] the wide range of subject-matters dealt with in Pts IV and V but all linked to s 82 …

The common law concept of causation recognises that conduct that infringes a legal norm may be causally connected with the sustaining of loss or damage even though other factors may have contributed to the loss or damage: Grant v Sun Shipping Co Ltd [1948] AC 549 at 563; Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215 at 236, 250–1; March v Stramare (E & M H) Pty Ltd (1991) 171 CLR 506 at 513; Medlin v State Government Insurance Commission (1995) 182 CLR 1 at 7. Every event is the product of a number of conditions that have combined to produce the event. Some philosophers draw a distinction between a condition that is necessary only and a cause that is both necessary and sufficient to produce the event: Anderson, Studies in Empirical Philosophy (1962), at 128–31.

The common law has avoided the technical controversies inherent in the logic of causation. Unlike science and philosophy, the common law is not concerned to discover universal connections between phenomena so as to enable predictions to be made. The common law concept of causation looks backward because its function is to determine whether a person should be held responsible for some past act or omission. Out of the many conditions that combine to produce loss or damage to a person, the common law is concerned with determining only whether some breach of a legal norm was so significant that, as a matter of common sense, it should be regarded as a cause of damage. As Lord Wright pointed out: "The law cannot take account of everything that follows a wrongful act … In the varied web of affairs, the law must abstract some consequences as relevant not perhaps on grounds of pure logic but simply for practical reasons": Liesbosch Dredger (Owners of) v Owners of SS Edison [1933] AC 449 at 460; see also Windeyer J in Kavanagh v The Commonwealth (1960) 103 CLR 547 at 584: "Law must, for its purposes, extract one or more circumstances out of the whole complex of antecedent conditions of an event as its cause."

[491] More than once in recent years, judges have pointed out that the issue of causation cannot be divorced from the legal framework that gives rise to the cause of action: Environment Agency v Empress Car Co (Arbertillery) Ltd [1999] 2 AC 22 at 29; Chappel v Hart (1998) 195 CLR 232 at 255. In Barnes v Hay (1988) 12 NSWLR 337 at 353, Mahoney JA said:

> [T]he determination of a causal question involves, in my opinion, a normative decision as to whether, for the purposes of the case, the precedent act for which the defendant is responsible should be seen as causal of the plaintiff's loss. And, in my opinion, that evaluation is made, not by a "test" or "guide" such as the "but for" test, but by a functional evaluation of the relationship and the purposes and policy of the relevant part of the law …

In Environment Agency v Empress Car Co (Arbertillery) Ltd [1999] 2 AC 22 at 29, Lord Hoffmann pointed out that common sense answers to questions of causation will differ according to the purpose for which the question is asked. Furthermore, not only may there be different answers to questions regarding causation when attributing responsibility to different people under different rules, but there may be different answers when attributing responsibility to different people under the same rule: at 30. In Chappel v Hart, Gummow J referred to his Lordship's statements in order to highlight the fact that the making of value judgments and the infusion of policy considerations may temper issues of causation: (1998) 195 CLR 232 at 256; see also at 238 per Gaudron J, 243 per McHugh J, 269–70 per Kirby J.

In some situations, the legal framework may require a finding that, despite a causal connection in a physical sense between the breach and damage, no causal connection exists for legal purposes. In other situations, the legal framework may require a finding that a causal connection exists even though no more appears than that the damage followed after breach of a legal norm.

In the first class of case, some act of the defendant may have set in train, or some omission of the defendant may have failed to set in train, a series of physical events that resulted in or could have avoided damage to another person or property. In this situation, the damage occurred because, given the act or omission, the laws of nature dictated the result. The physical connection between the defendant's act or omission and the damage suffered, and the materiality of the [492] connection is usually apparent, although often enough it will require expert evidence to demonstrate the connection. In this situation, questions of causation usually present no difficulty, although questions of remoteness of damage may do so. Exceptionally, however, the policy or rationale of the legal norm that has been breached will require the court to disregard the physical connection and to make a finding of no causal connection.

Thus in Gorris v Scott (1874) LR 9 Ex 125, in the course of a voyage on the defendant's ship, the plaintiff's sheep were washed overboard because the defendant neglected his statutory duty to provide pens on the deck of the ship. The action was dismissed because the statute was aimed at preventing disease and was not directed to the events that had happened. Thus in spite of the existence of a breach of duty that resulted in damage to the plaintiff, there was no relevant causal connection because the damage was outside the contemplation of the statute. Similarly, in Close v Steel Company of Wales Ltd [1962] AC 367, the defendant, in breach of its duty, had failed to fence a dangerous drilling machine. The plaintiff was injured when the drill bit fragmented. His action failed because the House of Lords held that the duty to fence was limited to keeping the worker from coming into contact with the dangerous machinery and did not extend to protecting the worker from injury caused by ejected pieces of the machine (cf Lord Simmonds in Nicholls v F Austin (Leyton) Ltd [1946] AC 493 at 505: "The fence is intended to keep the worker out, not to keep the machine or its product in.").

In the second class of case, the damage will not have occurred because of the laws of nature but because a person has acted to his or her detriment by reason of or following some conduct of the defendant. The conduct may be an act, an omission, a statement or a suggestion. But it will not be regarded as causally connected with the detriment if it provides no more than the reason why the person acted to his or her detriment. If the defendant intended the person suffering a detriment to act in the general way that he or she did, the common law will invariably hold that a causal connection existed between the conduct and the detriment. But if the conduct merely provides the reason why the person acted, it will not be sufficient to establish a causal connection unless the purpose of the legal norm that the defendant has breached is to prevent persons suffering detriment in circumstances of the kind that occurred. If a broker negligently advises a client to retain shares because they are a good investment, the broker will be liable for the loss sustained in retaining those shares. But if, having received that advice, the client decides to buy more shares, the broker will not be liable for the further losses unless the terms of the [493] original retainer imposed a duty on the broker to advise in respect of further purchases.

If Mr Henville had purchased the View Street land merely because he had heard that Mr Walker was claiming that there was a big demand for quality home units, a difficult question of causation would arise. Its answer would depend on the purpose of ss 52 and 82 of the Act. Are they intended to provide a remedy for any person who acts to his or her detriment after hearing of a false or misleading statement made in trade or commerce? Or are they directed to providing a remedy only in respect of conduct that is directed at individuals or a section of the public (cf Peek v Gurney (1873) LR 6 HL 377 at 412–13 per Lord Cairns; Commercial Banking Co of Sydney Ltd v RH Brown & Co (1972) 126 CLR 337 at 343 per Menzies J).

The corollary of the "common sense" approach to causation, as Mahoney JA pointed out in Barnes, is that it is not reducible to a "test" that can be applied across the spectrum of factual situations that arise from case to case. Nevertheless, the course of judicial reasoning in this area has produced certain principles that assist tribunals of fact in deciding causation issues.

If the defendant's breach has "materially contributed" (Bonnington Castings Ltd v Wardlaw [1956] AC 613 at 620 per Lord Reid) to the loss or damage suffered, it will be regarded as a cause of the loss or damage, despite other factors or conditions having played an even more significant role in producing the loss or damage. As long as the breach materially contributed to the damage, a causal connection will ordinarily exist even though the breach without more would not have brought about the damage. In exceptional cases, where an abnormal event intervenes between the breach and damage, it may be right as a matter of common sense to hold that the breach was not a cause of damage. But such cases are exceptional.

Of particular importance to the present case is the long-standing recognition of the possibility that two or more causes may jointly influence a person to undertake a course of conduct: Macleay v Tait [1906] AC 24; De la Bere v Pearson Ltd [1908] 1 KB 280; McGhee v National Coal Board [1973] 1 WLR 1; [1972] 3 All ER 1008; Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215; Hart & Honore, Causation in the Law, 2nd ed (1985) at 193. In separate judgments in Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215, Wilson and Brennan JJ emphasised that a representation need not be the sole inducement in sustaining the loss. If "it plays some part even if only a minor part", in contributing to the course of action taken – in that case the formation of a contract – a causal connection will exist: (1985) 157 CLR 215 at 236 per

Wilson J, 250–1 per Brennan J. See also San Sebastian Pty Ltd v The Minister (1986) 162 CLR 340 at 366 per Brennan J.

This principle has been applied in cases where a complicating factor [494] is the intervention of some act or decision of the plaintiff or a third party that allegedly constitutes a more immediate cause of the loss or damage. Thus, in Medlin v State Government Insurance Commission (1995) 182 CLR 1 at 66–7 Deane, Dawson, Toohey and Gaudron JJ said:

> The ultimate question must, however, always be whether, notwithstanding the intervention of the subsequent decision, the defendant's wrongful act or omission is, as between the plaintiff and the defendant and as a matter of commonsense and experience, properly to be seen as having caused the relevant loss or damage. Indeed, in some cases, it may be potentially misleading to pose the question of causation in terms of whether an intervening act or decision has interrupted or broken a chain of causation which would otherwise have existed. An example of such a case is where the negligent act or omission was itself a direct or indirect contributing cause of the intervening act or decision. (Emphasis added)

Similarly, in respect of claims under s 82, courts have accepted that loss or damage is causally connected to a contravention of the Act if a misrepresentation was one of the causes of the loss or damage sustained by the claimant …

In evidence, Mr Henville admitted that, if he had believed that the project would make a profit of less than about $100 000, he probably would not have gone ahead with it because "it wouldn't have been worth it, risk or anything else". His belief that the project would make a profit of more than $100 000 was the product of two errors. First, he erroneously miscalculated the cost of constructing the units. Secondly, he was induced by Mr Walker's misrepresentations to believe erroneously that the units would be sold reasonably quickly for not less than $750 000. Both errors were fundamental to his belief that the [495] project would return a handsome profit. Mr Walker's misrepresentations, therefore, directly induced Mr Henville to proceed with the project and its resultant loss. Without them, the project would not have gone ahead …

The fact that Mr Henville chose a design that was ultimately too expensive did not deny or neutralise the operative effect of Mr Walker's misrepresentations. The misrepresentations remained operative at all material times. Indeed, they were obviously operating after the units had been completed and played a decisive part in the initial price for which the units were marketed.

Contrary to the conclusion of the Full Court, Mr Walker's misrepresentations were causally connected with the loss sustained by Mr Henville.

The Full Court agreed with the trial judge that Mr Walker's misleading conduct continued to play a part in inducing Mr Henville to proceed with the development of the View Street property even after he … had completed the feasibility study. Yet it allowed Mr Walker's appeal on the basis that the feasibility study was the sole inducement of Mr Henville's decision to go ahead. The Full Court's decision therefore appears to contain a logical inconsistency between the facts as found and its ultimate conclusion …

[501] This Court has addressed the question of assessment of damages under s 82 on several occasions: see for example Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 1; Wardley Australia Ltd v Western Australia (1992) 175 CLR 514; Kizbeau Pty Ltd v W G & B Pty Ltd (1995) 184 CLR 281; (1998) 196 CLR 494. The Court has concluded that in most cases the Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd measure of damages in tort is the appropriate guide in determining an award of damages under s 82: Kizbeau Pty Ltd v WG & B Pty Ltd (1995) 184 CLR 281 at 290. However, in assessing damages under s 82, courts are not bound to choose between the measure of damages in deceit or other torts or contract: Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society (1986) 160 CLR 1 at 14. In Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd (1998) 196 CLR 494, the Court said that the central issue under s 82 is to establish a causal connection between the loss claimed and the contravening conduct (see Wardley Australia Ltd v Western Australia (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 525). Once such a connection is found to exist, nothing in s 82 suggests that the recoverable amount should be limited by drawing an analogy with contract, tort or equitable remedies although they will usually be of [502] great assistance: (1998) 196 CLR 494 at 503–4 per Gaudron J, 510 per McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ, 529 per Gummow J, 549 per Kirby J. As Gummow J said in Marks (at 529), "[a]nalogy, like the rules of procedure, is a servant not a master".

Indeed, general principles for assessing damages may have to give way altogether in particular cases to solutions best adapted to give the injured claimant an amount which will most fairly compensate for the wrong suffered: Johnson v Perez (1988) 166 CLR 351 at 355–6 per Mason CJ.

In this case, the most appropriate approach is to identify what Mr Henville has suffered by way of prejudice or disadvantage in consequence of altering his position by reason of the breach of the Act: Toteff v Antonas (1952) 87 CLR 647 at 650; referred to, inter alia, in Wardley Australia Ltd v Western Australia (1992) 175 CLR 514 at 526; Marks v GIO Australia Holdings Ltd (1998) 196 CLR 494 at 512. The measure of that loss is not determined by reference to what he would have received if Mr Walker's representations had been true. As the New Zealand Court of Appeal pointed out in Cox & Coxon Ltd v Leipst [1999] 2 NZLR 15, a case concerned with s 43(1) of the Fair Trading Act 1986 (NZ), a representation can give rise to a claim for a lost benefit or loss of expectation only where there is an obligation to perform the representation. The Court of Appeal held that s 43(1) was directed against the making of a false representation, as opposed to the failure to perform it. Similarly, the wrong which s 52 of the Act prohibits is the making of, not the failure to honour, the false representation. By entering upon the project, Mr Henville has lost $319 846.51. If Mr Walker had not made representations in breach of the Act, none of this loss would have occurred. The loss suffered is therefore directly attributable to a contravention of the Act even though other factors played their part in bringing about the loss.

If the action were one of deceit at common law, I see no reason why, subject to the issue of remoteness, the whole of the loss of $319 846.51 would not be recoverable. At common law, the established rule is that in an action for deceit, the plaintiff "is entitled to recover as damages a sum representing the prejudice or disadvantage he [or she] has suffered in consequence of his [or her] altering his [or her] position under the inducement of the fraudulent misrepresentations": Toteff v Antonas (1952) 87 CLR 647 at 650. In an action for damages for deceit, the damages are measured by reference to how much worse off the plaintiff is as a result of being fraudulently induced to take the course of action that he or she did: Toteff v Antonas (1952) 87 CLR 647 at 650; Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 1 at 12. The loss that the plaintiff can recover [503] includes consequential losses flowing directly from the misrepresentation (Potts v Miller (1940) 64 CLR 282 at 297–8; see also Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd [1969] 2 QB 158 at 167; Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 1 at 12) including losses from opportunities forgone: Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd [1969] 2 QB 158 at 167; Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Mardon [1976] QB 801 at 820–1, 828–9; Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 1 at 13.

Here the misrepresentations induced Mr Henville to enter into a contract and to construct units under the belief that the project would produce a substantial profit. If there had been no misrepresentations, Mr Henville would not have embarked on the course that he did and the loss that he suffered would have been avoided. That being so, his loss was a direct result of the misrepresentations and would have been recoverable in an action for damages for deceit. Moreover, I think that in a general way the loss was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the misrepresentations. Although Mr Henville badly underestimated the cost of constructing the units, nothing in the findings of Anderson J or the Full Court demonstrates that any of the costs were unreasonably incurred. Matters such as the project being delayed with a consequential increase in costs and interest rates rising are matters that in the ordinary course of a development are reasonably foreseeable.

Nor do I see any reason why the principles applicable in an action for deceit at common law should not be applied in the present case. The purposes of the Act include promoting fair trading and protecting consumers from contraventions of the Act. Those purposes are more readily achieved by ensuring that consumers recover the actual losses they have suffered as the result of contraventions of the Act. Where a person contravenes the Act and induces a person to enter upon a course of conduct that results in loss or damage, an award of damages that compensates for the actual losses incurred in embarking on that course of conduct best serves the purposes of the Act and should ordinarily be awarded. In Elna Australia Pty Ltd v International Computers (Aust) Pty Ltd (No 2) (1987) 16 FCR 410 at 418–19, Gummow J said, correctly in my opinion:

> Wrapped up within s 82 are … concepts the common law would describe by the terms "causation" and "remoteness" and "measure of damages" …. [I]t would be an error to translate automatically to the particular statute what appeared the closest analogue from the common law "rules" as to causation. It is rather a question of statutory construction …. Thus, in construing s 82 it is appropriate to bear in mind such matters as the scope and purpose of Pts IV and V … the wide range of subject-matters dealt with in Pts IV and V but all linked to s 82 … the absence of any direct provision to [504] apportion responsibility for loss or damage … and the apparent telescoping of what to the common law would be issues of causation, remoteness and measure of damages.

Given the long history of the common law's recognition of the concept of remoteness in assessing damages in contract and tort and its relationship with the issue of causation, it seems proper to read the term "by" in s 82 as including the concept of remoteness. By remoteness, I mean that the loss or damage was not reasonably foreseeable even in a general way by the contravener. Remoteness in this sense is very different from the concept of remoteness formulated by Winn LJ in Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd [1969] 2 QB 158 at 168 and cited and apparently approved by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Smith New Court Securities Ltd v Citibank NA [1997] AC 254 at 264. In Doyle, Winn LJ said (at 168) that in an action for fraud "no element in the consequential position can be regarded as attributable loss and damage if it be too remote a consequence". But he then went on to say (at 168): "[I]t will be too remote not necessarily because it was not contemplated by the representor, but in any case where the person deceived has not himself behaved with reasonable prudence, reasonable common sense, or can in any true sense be said to have been the author of his own misfortune."

With great respect, this passage with its references to "reasonable prudence" and "reasonable common sense" confuses remoteness with contributory negligence and causation.

There was a time in the common law when contributory negligence was seen as negativing the causal connection between the breach of duty and the damage suffered. That is why, at common law before the enactment of the Hilary Term Rules of 1834, contributory negligence could be raised under the plea of not guilty: Astley v Austrust (1999) 197 CLR 1 at 33. Moreover, until the enactment of the apportionment statutes, the common law illogically, and for no justifiable reason in legal principle or policy, treated contributory negligence as a complete defence to some actions in tort. Despite that rule, it has long been established that "contributory negligence is concerned with the failure of the plaintiff to protect his or her person or property against damage and not with whether the failure contributed to the accident" (at 11, original emphasis). There may, of course, be cases where the injured person's failure to take care is such that it can be characterised as the sole cause of the loss or damage suffered. In that event, there will be no causal connection between the breach of [505] the Act and the "loss or damage" to which s 82 refers. But it has nothing to do with remoteness of damage.

In my opinion, the remarks of Winn LJ in Doyle are wrong in principle. They should not be followed even in actions for fraud, the class of action with which Doyle was concerned. And they certainly should not be regarded as having any authority in respect of actions concerned with s 82 of the Act.

Nothing in the common law, in s 52 or 82 or in the policy of the Act supports the conclusion that a claimant's damages under s 82 should be reduced because the loss or damage could have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable care on the claimant's part. There is no ground for reading into s 82 doctrines of contributory negligence and apportionment of damages. No doubt, if part of the loss or damage would not have occurred but for the unreasonable conduct of the claimant, it will be appropriate in assessing damages under s 82 to apply notions of reasonableness in assessing how much of the loss was caused by the contravention of the Act: Tefbao Pty Ltd v Stannic Securities Pty Ltd (1993) 118 ALR 565 at 575 per Hodgson J. But that proposition is concerned with the items that go to the computation of the loss. As I have pointed out, nothing in the judgments of the courts below shows that there was any unreasonable conduct on the part of Mr Henville in incurring costs or raising revenue.

Underlying the notion that Mr Henville should not recover the actual loss that he incurred by reason of Mr Walker's contravention of the Act seems to be the assumption that he was partly to blame for his misfortune. Given that assumption, Anderson J appears to have concluded that Mr Henville should not recover all the actual loss because, even if the representation had been true, he would still have sustained loss. Rather than compensate Mr Henville for his actual loss, Anderson J assessed the "loss" as if the claim was one for breach of warranty. His Honour said:

> A representation that a development will be worth a certain amount when completed has no capacity to cause losses at large …. Losses which are really down to extravagant design, to the lack of a proper costing of the proposed design, to the lack of financial resources to complete the development embarked on and to the failure to get the project finished in a reasonable time are not losses suffered by a misrepresentation as to the market value which the development will have on completion.

His Honour ruled out the amount that the units actually cost to build as an appropriate basis on which to measure Mr Henville's recoverable loss. Instead, his Honour found that the upper limit of the primary loss should be calculated by reference to a price of $250 000 per unit. Mr Henville had proceeded with the development because he had been [506] told, and believed, that the units would each fetch at least that amount. His Honour thought that limiting the primary loss in this way brought to account in Mr Walker's favour matters such as careless costing, inadequate planning, insufficient funding and excessive delays. It also placed at Mr Henville's feet: "the losses occasioned by the weaknesses in the plaintiff's own feasibility study pursuant to which the plaintiff judged that the particular development which he designed could be undertaken profitably on a gross selling price of $250 000 per unit."

Anderson J, therefore, awarded damages against Mr Walker of $205 000, being the difference between $750 000 and the aggregate sale prices achieved at auction ($545 000). His Honour also awarded interest to be calculated only from 1 June 1997 in order to allow a reasonable period for the sale of the units at the represented price to elapse.

Given its findings as to causation, it was strictly unnecessary for the Full Court to address the issue of damages. Nevertheless, it held that the approach of Anderson J had no justifiable basis in law. In my opinion, the Full Court was correct in so holding. With respect, the approach of Anderson J overlooks one of the fundamental purposes of the Act – which is to protect consumers from being induced to enter into agreements and transactions by false or misleading conduct. The loss to a consumer from acting on such an inducement will usually be greater than the amount recoverable by treating the representation as a warranty. An award of damages under s 82 will therefore ordinarily be inadequate to achieve one of the main purposes of the Act unless the claimant is compensated for what he or she has "suffered in consequence of his [or her] altering his [or her] position under the inducement of the fraudulent misrepresentations": Toteff v Antonas (1952) 87 CLR 647 at 650.

Mr Henville's loss was not confined to the difference between what was represented as the selling prices of the units and their sale prices. Mr Walker's contravention of the Act induced Mr Henville to enter upon a course of conduct that resulted in a greater loss than that difference. To fail to compensate him for that loss does not accord with the purposes of the Act.

[507] However, the approach of the Full Court was also erroneous. Their Honours said that the cost overruns and delays were cumulative causes of Mr Henville's overall loss in the sense that each independently contributed thereto. Since it was not impossible to segregate the effect of those losses, it was necessary for Mr Henville to prove their quantum. In the absence of evidence enabling such losses to be identified and assessed, there was no way to establish the amount of the loss that was attributable to Mr Walker's misleading conduct. Mr Henville had therefore failed to prove any entitlement to damages.

However, in the absence of evidence that the cost overruns and delays were unreasonable or reasonably unforeseeable, the lack of evidence enabling these costs to be identified could not affect Mr Henville's right to be compensated for his actual loss. It is unnecessary, therefore, to determine whether Mr Henville was correct in contending that in any event Mr Walker bore at least an evidentiary onus of proving the costs of the overruns and delays: Vyner v Waldenberg Bros Ltd (1945) 61 TLR 545 at 546; Betts v Whittingslowe (1945) 71 CLR 637 at 648–9; Watts v Rake (1960) 108 CLR 158 at 160; Medlin v State Government Insurance Commission (1995) 182 CLR 1 at 22; Chappel v Hart (1998) 195 CLR 232 at 273.

Arguably, once a plaintiff demonstrates that a breach of duty has occurred that is closely followed by damage, a prima facie causal connection will be established. It is then for the defendant to show that the plaintiff should not recover damages. In the words of Dixon CJ in Watts v Rake (1960) 108 CLR 158 at 160 it is the defendant who must disentangle, so far as possible, the various contributing factors.

In this Court, Mr Walker has put forward two amounts as representing the damages to which Mr Henville was entitled if he succeeded on the causation issue – (1) $125 000 and (2) $200 512.51. It is unnecessary to refer to the details of these claims. Both of them were variations of the general approach of the trial judge and the reasoning that gave rise to each figure was incorrect in principle.

In my opinion, Mr Henville was entitled to damages for his actual loss. However in this Court, he sought no more than that the award of damages made by Anderson J should be reinstated. Since that was a lesser sum than that to which I think he was entitled, it is proper to reinstate his Honour's award.

The appeal should be allowed and the orders of Anderson J reinstated.

[33.275] HAYNE J: … [509] [I]t is necessary to recognise that, on its face, the section permits recovery of the whole of the loss sustained by a person who demonstrates that a contravention of Pt V of the Act was a cause of that loss. Neither the words of s 82(1) nor anything in the intended scope and context of the Act suggest some narrower conclusion.

In particular, nothing in the text of s 82(1) (or any of the other provisions of the Act) suggests that the carelessness of the person who [510] suffers loss or damage as the result of contravention of the Act should be taken into account in deciding what was the amount of loss or damage actually suffered. Nor is some such limitation to be derived from considering the intended purposes of the Act. The very simplicity of the language used in s 82(1) appears to confine attention to the limited question of the historical relevance of the contravening conduct to the loss or damage sustained. It does not provide a basis for concluding that notions of contributory fault are to be given a place in its operation.

There may be cases where some of the loss suffered by a person following – and I use the word "following" in a neutral sense – the conduct of another in contravention of the Act may not be loss suffered by that person by the contravening conduct. Had the appellants chosen, for wholly extraneous reasons, to change the design of the units, part way through their construction, in such a way as to waste some costs of construction already incurred, it might be said that the extra costs incurred were not caused by the respondents' contravention. Whether, as Gaudron J suggests, it would be for the contravener to demonstrate in such a case that part of the loss suffered was not attributable to the contravention is a point I need not decide. For the moment, it is enough to say that it seems to me that such questions must find their answers within the Act rather than in analogies with common law. Thus, if notions of remoteness of damage or reasonableness are to find reflection in s 82(1) it seems probable that they may do so only through consideration of the causation question which the sub-section poses …

I agree with McHugh J that the appellants were entitled to recover the whole amount lost. Nevertheless, the appellants having limited their claim as they have, the appeal should be allowed with costs, the orders of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Western Australia set aside …

[33.280] GLEESON CJ: … [475] Anderson J said:

> I am satisfied that the plaintiff proceeded with this particular development because he had been told and believed that the three units would fetch at least $250 000 each. I find that he was willing to proceed with the project on the basis of that selling price, albeit in the hope that higher prices might be obtained. That being so, the upper limit of his primary loss should be calculated not on what the plaintiff ended up spending to complete the units but on $250 000 per unit. It seems to me that this approach brings properly to account in the defendants' favour all matters which the defendants say should go against an award of damages to the plaintiff, such as careless costings, inadequate planning, insufficient funding, inept project management, excessive delays and so on. In particular, it does, I think, place at the plaintiff's feet the losses occasioned by the weaknesses in the plaintiff's own feasibility study pursuant to which the plaintiff judged that the particular development which he designed could be undertaken profitably on a gross selling price of $250 000 per unit.

He concluded: "I am therefore of the opinion that the capital loss which should be included in the award of damages is the difference between $750 000 (being three times $250 000) and the aggregate sale prices achieved at auction; ie, $545 000." The loss thus calculated was $205 000.

Having found that there were such supervening causes partly responsible for the ultimate loss suffered on the development project (which was alleged to be $319 846.51), Anderson J was neither obliged, nor able, to make a precise calculation of the extent of such responsibility. That is apparent from a consideration of the nature of the factors in question. But he was obliged to make a reasonable assessment. The appellants, as plaintiffs, established substantial financial loss flowing directly from the respondents' contravention of s 52. It was the respondents who (at this point of the case) were seeking to have the loss or damage attributed to their contravention of the Act diminished by reference to supervening causes. If there had [476] been a failure of proof in that respect, it would have been to the disadvantage of the respondents.

Anderson J set out to make a reasonable assessment of the loss or damage suffered "by" the respondents' contravention of the Act, bearing in mind the supervening causes which contributed to the ultimate loss suffered on the development project, and bearing also in mind the nature and context of the contravention (a representation related primarily to gross revenue, made for use in conjunction with the appellants' own estimation of costs). He attempted to isolate the causative effect of the misleading conduct from that of extraneous factors.

Although he did not put his reasoning on this basis, the result produced by Anderson J appears to be the same as if he had set out to award expectation rather than reliance damages. What he was seeking to do was to measure the causative effect of the misleading representation made by the respondents; and the method he employed, in practical effect, bound the respondents to make good those representations by awarding the appellants the difference between what the units would have sold for if the representations were true and the amount for which the units were actually sold.

The question is whether the respondents have shown that the method used by Anderson J resulted in over-compensation of the appellants. The representation having been that the units would sell for between $250 000 and $280 000 each, he decided to award the appellants what he called their capital loss on the project, but to measure that loss on the basis of a notional, rather than the actual cost. He treated $250 000 per unit as the upper limit of the cost. The actual cost was substantially more, but he treated costs in excess of that amount as "down to" what he regarded as extraneous factors. This was not intended to be anything other than an expedient, albeit obviously inexact, method of isolating the causative effect of those factors from the entire loss. The respondents did not demonstrate any better way of doing it. And they have not shown, in this Court, that the appellants were over-compensated.

The appeal should be allowed with costs. The orders of the Full Court should be set aside.

[33.285] GAUDRON J: … [482] It was held in Marks v GIO Australia Holdings that the relief available under s 82(1) of the Act is not to be confined by analogy either with actions in contract or in tort: (1998) 196 CLR 494 at 503–4 per Gaudron J, 510 per McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ, 528–9 per Gummow J, 549 per Kirby J. Rather, the task under that sub-section is to ascertain the loss suffered by the contravening conduct and to assess the amount necessary to compensate for that loss. Once that is accepted, it follows, in my view, that considerations of foreseeability and contributory negligence are irrelevant to the exercise required by s 82(1). However, that does not mean that, where the loss is the result of two or more acts or events, causation is irrelevant to the task of identifying the loss or the amount of the loss recoverable. To treat causation as irrelevant would be to ignore the requirement in s 82(1) that a person suffer loss or injury by contravening conduct.

The question posed by the Full Court's conclusion that Mr Henville failed to prove his damages is really a question as to who bears the onus of proof, and on what issue, in a case where contravening conduct is the cause of some but not all the loss in issue. The precise question is whether, in a case where loss results from two or more acts or events, s 82(1) requires a claimant to prove only the total loss that he or she suffered leaving it to the person whose conduct is in question to prove that some aspect of that loss is referable to other acts or events or whether, on the other hand, it requires a claimant to prove that a particular component or particular components of his or her loss are referable to the contravening conduct in question.

Just as the relief available under s 82(1) is not to be confined by analogy either with the actions in tort or in contract, it should not be confined by imposing an unduly strict burden of proof on the claimant. As already indicated, s 82 provides for the recovery of loss or damage that a person suffers by contravening conduct. To require a claimant to prove which component of his or her loss or damage is referable to the contravening conduct would be to impose limitations on relief which the terms of that sub-section do not require.

At the very least, to require that a claimant under s 82(1) of the Act [483] prove which component of his loss or damage is referable to contravening conduct would be to confine recoverable loss to that directly resulting from that conduct, and, thus, to impose a gloss on the words of the sub-section. At the other extreme, it would be to deny any remedy at all in those cases where loss results from two or more acts or events but the claimant is unable to identify the precise component or components of the loss referable to contravening conduct. That consequence is inconsistent with the concept of causation upon which s 82(1) is predicated, namely, that the contravening conduct should only have materially contributed to the loss or damage suffered.

It follows that, under s 82(1) of the Act, it is for the person whose contravening conduct materially contributed to the loss or damage to establish what component of that loss or damage is referable to some act or event other than his or her contravening conduct and not for the person who suffers loss or damage to establish the precise component or components referable to that conduct. The Full Court erred in holding otherwise …

The respondents could have proved that particular components of Mr Henville's loss were directly referable to his own conduct. They did not. Alternatively, it was open to them to limit their liability on the basis that the loss or damage he suffered could not have been greater than would have been the case if their representations were true. If their representations had been true, Mr Henville would have received $750 000 on sale of the units. In the result, he received only $545 000. Accordingly, the loss referable to the respondents' conduct could not have been more than $205 000. Having established that and no more, the respondents were not entitled to further limit their liability.

The appeal should be allowed with costs, the orders of the Full Court set aside and, in lieu, the appeal to that Court should be dismissed with costs.

[GUMMOW J agreed with McHugh and Hayne JJ.]

[33.290] Notes and Questions

1. In the past, the courts have stated that the "but-for" test must be applied in a common-sense way. It had also been recognised that the outer bounds of liability may be determined by normative considerations based on broad policy considerations such as whether the respondent ought to be held to have caused the loss (March v Stramare Pty Ltd (1991) 171 CLR 506; Chappel v Hart [1998] HCA 55; (1998) 195 CLR 232, [22]–[26]). However, the recent High Court decision of Travel Compensation Fund v Tambree [2005] HCA 69; (2005) 224 CLR 627 calls into question the common sense qualification and the relevance of broad policy considerations when determining causation under the ACL. Gummow and Hayne JJ expressed doubt as to whether there is any "common sense" notion of causation that can provide a useful legal norm (at [45]). Gummow and Hayne JJ also rejected the relevance of broader policy considerations, such as whether the respondent ought to be held liable (at [46]–[47]). Whilst policy is relevant, it is only the policy underpinning the particular cause of action that should be considered. Gleeson CJ also noted that when determining whether "loss or damage is 'by' misleading or deceptive conduct … it is in the purpose of the statute, as related to the particular circumstances of the case, that the answer to the question of causation is to be found" (at [30]). Although Callinan J opined that it would be "delusion to think that a disputed question of causation can be resolved according to an invariable scientific formula, and without acknowledgement of common sense" (at [81]), he agreed that the scope and objects of the statute are of critical importance to determining causation. Kirby J did not oppose the consideration of broader policy questions and believed that common sense must also have a role to play in determining causation.
2. In Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 257 CLR 215, 236, a deceit case, Wilson J stated that "[i]f a material representation is made which is calculated to induce the representee to enter into a contract and that person in fact enters into the contract there arises a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the representation". In Ricochet Pty Ltd v Equity Trustees Executor & Agency Co Ltd (1993) 41 FCR 229, 234, the Full Federal Court applied Wilson J's statement and noted that it "provides a practical guide to the way in which inferences can and should be drawn in" misleading conduct cases. In Como Investments Pty Ltd v Yenald Nominees Pty Ltd [1997] ATPR ¶41-550, 43,619, the Full Court of the Federal Court applied this principle to a claim for damages for misleading conduct. The court stated the position as follows:

> Where a representation is relevant to the decision in question, and in its nature persuasive to induce the making of the decision, it accords with legal notions of causation to hold that it has a causative effect. And where a respondent, who may be taken to know his own > business, has thought it was in his interests to misrepresent the situation in a particular respect, the Court may infer that the misrepresentation was persuasive. These inferences arise from the making of the representation followed by the respondent doing the thing it was calculated to induce him to do. All this is a matter of common sense.

Comments made in the recent High Court case of Campbell v Backoffice Investments Pty Ltd [2009] HCA 25; (2009) 238 CLR 304, cast doubt on the automatic applicability of such principles in misleading conduct cases. Gummow, Hayne, Heydon and Keifel JJ made three points about the proposition set out in Gould v Vaggelas:

> First, it is a proposition expressed in relation to the law of deceit, not the operation of statutory provisions for the award of damages suffered by contravention of consumer protection provisions proscribing misleading or deceptive conduct. Secondly, the proposition carries within it a number of subsidiary questions, such as what is a "material" representation, and when is a material representation "calculated" to induce entry into a contract. Thirdly, because the proposition is directed to the drawing of inferences, consideration of its application must always attend closely to all of the evidence that is adduced that bears upon the question being examined.

Their Honours then went on to note:

> What is important in the present case is that the evidence that was given by Mr Weeks about what he would have done if he had known more than he did was expressed in a way that distinguished between cases where knowledge of either of two matters would have meant he would not proceed and cases where he attached significance to knowledge of both of two matters. This being the only direct evidence on the subject it was not open to the Court of Appeal to infer, from its own assessment of the materiality of the representation and its own assessment of whether the representation was calculated to induce entry into a contract, that Mr Weeks would not have proceeded with the share purchase.

However, in Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v TPG Internet Pty Ltd French CJ, Crennan, Bell and Keane JJ stated: "[i]t has long been recognised that, where a representation is made in terms apt to create a particular mental impression in the representee, and is intended to do so, it may be inferred that it has had that effect": [2013] HCA 54; (2013) 250 CLR 64.

In Lord Buddha Pty Ltd (in liq) v Harpur [2013] VSCA 101; (2013) 41 VR 159, Vickery AJA (Weinberg JA and Tate JA agreeing) provided the following useful summary of principles as to the practical application of the guide provided by Gould v Vaggelas:

1. In cases of deceit or cases brought under s 52 and s 82 of the Act (or under equivalent State legislation) if a material representation is made which is calculated (which is to say, objectively likely (Ricochet; Henderson v Amadio Pty Ltd (No 1) [1995] FCA 1300; (1995) 62 FCR 1) to induce the representee to enter into a contract, and where the representation is of a kind that it is likely to provide an inducement, and that person in fact enters into the contract, an inference may be drawn that the representation operated as an inducement for the person to do so ((Gould v Vaggelas at 238-9 (Wilson J) and 250-1 (Brennan J)).
2. However, an inference of inducement is no more than an inference of fact, which may be rebutted on the facts of the case. In order to rebut the inference, the representor assumes an evidentiary onus to point to facts inconsistent with the inference arising (Gould v Vaggelas at 238-9 (Wilson J)). Those facts, when weighed alongside the inference which is otherwise open to be drawn, may be sufficient to rebut it. For example, a rebuttal may be established by showing that the representee, before he entered into the contract, either was possessed of actual knowledge of the true facts and knew them to be true or alternatively made it plain that whether he knew the true facts or not he did not rely on the representation (Gould v Vaggelas at 238-9 (Wilson J)). A possible inference may also be rebutted by the direct evidence called, for example, where the direct evidence is inconsistent with the inference of reliance which may otherwise have been open to be drawn.

3. The representation need not be the sole inducement. It is sufficient so long as it plays some part in inducing the representee to enter the contract, thereby acting as a real inducement, or one of the real inducements to him to do what caused his loss (Gould v Vaggelas at 205-1 (Brennan J).
4. The inference may be drawn where commonsense would demand the conclusion that the false representation(s) played at least some part in inducing the representee to enter into the contract (Hanave (1999) 43 IPR 545, [45].
5. The drawing of the inference, on application of these principles, is but part of the fact-finding which must be undertaken on the whole of the evidence to determine the ultimate question on the issue of material inducement leading to reliance, namely whether or not the representee has satisfied the trier of fact on the balance of probabilities that the representation(s) in question contributed to the representee's decision to enter into the contract such that, whether alone, or with or notwithstanding other things that accompanied it, the representation(s) operated as a real inducement or one of the real inducements, to the representee to do so. The task of the court is to examine the relevant course of conduct as a whole. It is determined by reference to the alleged conduct in the light of the relevant surrounding facts and circumstances. The effect of any relevant statements or actions or any silence or inaction occurring in the context of a single course of conduct must be deduced from the whole course of conduct (MWH Australia Pty Ltd v Wynton Stone Australia Pty Ltd (in liq) (2010) 31 VR 575, [32] per Warren CJ).
6. The fulcrum of the inquiry in relation to misrepresentation and reliance is the need to identify contravening conduct (the making of the misrepresentation) and a causal connection between that conduct and the loss and damage allegedly suffered, in the sense that the representation(s) played at least some part in inducing the representee to enter into the contract. This must be found on the balance of probabilities before liability can be established. The mere possibility that a misrepresentation might have induced a course of action by the representee is not sufficient to attach liability under s 82 to the making of it (Ricochet at 235; MWH at [33] (Warren CJ).
7. In the application of these principles, the drawing of inferences pursuant to Gould v Vaggelas, is not per se precluded because there is no direct evidence as to reliance upon the alleged representation, nor is it precluded by reason that direct evidence was called, even if the thrust of the direct evidence is rejected. An inference as to reliance may be open to be drawn, or it may not. In each case the totality of the evidence in its context, including any possible inference to be drawn when assessed against the effect of any direct evidence, needs to be examined.

EXCLUSION CLAUSES AND DISCLAIMERS

[33.295] A variety of devices have been employed in an attempt to avoid the statutory prohibition against misleading or deceptive conduct including merger or entire agreement clauses, acknowledgment clauses and disclaimers. It is not possible to exclude the statutory liability that arises from a contravention of s 18 of the ACL by force of contractual provision or disclaimer alone (Bowler v Hilda (1998) 80 FCR 191, 207). A disclaimer or contractual provision can only affect statutory liability if:

(a) it has the effect that the relevant conduct cannot be properly characterised as misleading or deceptive; or
(b) it has the effect that the claimant cannot successfully establish that he or she reasonably relied on the misleading or deceptive conduct and, therefore, is unable to prove that the conduct caused the loss.

In the application legislation of some jurisdictions, attempts to exclude liability are expressly rendered ineffective: see Fair Trading Act 1989 (Qld), s 107; Fair Trading Act 1987 (SA), s 96; Fair Trading Act 2010 (WA), s 13 (but see s 105). Note also that s 50 of the Fair Trading Act 1990 (Tas), which applies to conduct predating the introduction of the ACL as a law of Tasmania, prohibits contracting out of the prohibition against misleading conduct contained in s 14.

An appropriately worded disclaimer, if sufficiently prominent and contemporaneous with the allegedly misleading conduct may prevent that conduct from being misleading, or make it difficult for a fully informed person to show actual reliance (see eg Butcher v Lachlan Elder Realty Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 60; (2004) 218 CLR 592 (at [33.65]) cf McHugh J [33.75] and Kirby J [33.80]).

Byers v Dorotea Pty Ltd (1986) 69 ALR 715 (at [33.300]) illustrates how an exclusion clause that would be effective under the general law will not preclude liability under the ACL. Lockhart J also considered the effect of disclaimer and entire agreement clauses in Henjo Investments Pty Ltd v Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (1988) 39 FCR 546 (see [33.252]).

Byers v Dorotea Pty Ltd

[33.300] Byers v Dorotea Pty Ltd (1986) 69 ALR 715 (Federal Court of Australia) – Trial of action.

[FACTS: Three sets of applicants, including Mrs Byers (the applicants), entered into contracts to purchase new units on Queensland's Gold Coast. Following a slump in demand for such units, the applicants claimed that they were induced to enter the contracts by misleading statements made nearly six years earlier by a Mr Ian McLeod on behalf of the respondent. They purported to rescind the contracts, and brought proceedings under ss 52 and 53A(1)(b) of the Trade Practices Act 1974 [ACL, s 18 and s 30 respectively], and also under the general law. The misleading statements were to the effect that there was to be an indoor swimming pool and that the new units would be "bigger and better" than those the applicants already owned in a nearby building.]

PINCUS J: [His Honour first found that the misleading statements were established, and that even though the contracts were not made until seven months after the statements, the contracts were induced by the statements. He then proceeded to deal with other issues.] [721]

Delay and affirmation

The applicants were confronted with a substantial obstacle in that they … asked for an extension of time to complete, but rescinded instead of doing so … [722] It was argued on behalf of the respondent that the request for an extension of time amounted to an affirmation. There is authority in support of that proposition: Arvier v Watson (1888) 14 VLR 771; see also the notes to Stonham's "Vendor and Purchaser" at p 694. As I understand the evidence of Mrs Byers on the point, the sequence of events was that the final inspection took place before the original due date for settlement (20 December 1982). A decision was then made by the applicants to endeavour to "get out of the units" and the extension of time was requested to enable investigation in that direction to be further pursued.

It is not suggested in the applicants' case that they gained any further knowledge after the extension was sought and obtained. In my view, under the general law, the request for extension would in those circumstances have amounted to an affirmation, precluding a right of rescission. However, it is my opinion that the right to grant relief under the Trade Practices Act is not necessarily brought to an end by an affirmation of the contract. That point is further discussed at the conclusion of these reasons. I should add that I have not found it necessary to deal with the assertion that there was fraud.

Exclusion clause

[33.305] It was argued for the applicants that, apart from the Trade Practices Act, their rescission was good under the general law. It appears to me desirable to determine that point, in case the conclusion that there was an affirmation is erroneous.

[723] An answer made to the applicants' claim, so far as it relied upon misrepresentation, is clause 8(c)(i) of each contract: "The purchaser acknowledges that he has not relied on any representations by the vendor, the vendor's agent or any other person or persons or corporation in and about entering into this contract other than as set out herein, and that the conditions and stipulations hereof constitute the only agreement between the purchaser and the vendor."

It will be noted that the clause has two distinct parts: the first is an admission of fact, and the second is an agreement as to the content of the contract. The latter does not affect the present issue, as it is not contended by the applicants that the agreement includes any condition or stipulation not set out in the formal writing. The first part of the clause, however, poses a more difficult question.

There are decisions of the Queensland Supreme Court, mentioned below, which unequivocally favour the respondents. It was contended, however, that these decisions are incorrect and that I should not follow them.

In my opinion, the relevant defence is estoppel and that species of estoppel which is sometimes called estoppel by convention. In the well-known passage in Thompson v Palmer (1933) 49 CLR 507 at 547, Dixon J referred to it as one of the bases of estoppel in pais. His Honour began by explaining that: "The object of estoppel in pais is to prevent an unjust departure by one person from an assumption adopted by another as the basis of some act or omission which, unless the assumption be adhered to, would operate to that other's detriment."

One of the reasons his Honour gave for the estopped party's being "required to abide by the assumption" was "because it formed the conventional basis upon which the parties entered into contractual or other mutual relations …" His Honour applied those remarks in a case of alleged estoppel by convention, Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641 at 676, which was mentioned by Lord Denning MR in Amalgamated Investment and Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] 1 QB 84 at 121. Lord Denning MR there emphasised that the doctrine is rooted in considerations of justice, as of course did Dixon J. Eveleigh LJ, at 126, and Brandon LJ, at 131, also treated the case before them as one of estoppel by convention.

One thing which is clear about this sort of estoppel is that it is not created by every admission in a contract. According to Lord Maugham in Greer v Kettle [1938] AC 156 at 171, there is a "well known rule of the Chancery Court in regard to a receipt clause in a deed" that it does not effect an estoppel if the money has not in fact been paid. That rule has been applied by the High Court in Petersen v Moloney (1951) 84 CLR 91 and again in Mackay v Brice (1979) 25 ALR 597 at 603.

In the judgment of Lord Maugham just referred to, there is discussion of the doctrine of estoppel by deed, said in the work by Spencer Bower and Turner, Estoppel by Representation, (3rd Ed, p 158) to be a sub-class of estoppel by convention. Lord Maugham, speaking of the "principle that a solemn and unambiguous statement or engagement in a deed must be taken as binding between parties and privies" asserted that the position in equity is different from that at law. He thought it clear that: "… in equity a party to a deed could not set up an estoppel in reliance on a deed in relation to [724] which there is an equitable right to rescission or in reliance on an untrue statement or an untrue recital induced by his own representation, whether innocent or otherwise, to the other party." Lord Maugham treated the rule about the receipt clause in a deed, applied in the High Court cases just mentioned, as a "good illustration of the equity view".

It appears to me that there is a significant difference in principle between an admission of fact in a contract relied on as creating an estoppel, and a contractual promise expressly excluding a particular defence. In the latter case, the excluded defence may not be given effect to by the Court without its sanctioning a breach of contract. It is partly for that reason that I cannot accept that the decision of the High Court in Life Insurance Co of Australia Ltd v Phillips (1925) 36 CLR 60 is decisive of the present point, although apparently thought to be so in the Queensland Supreme Court decision referred to below, Dorotea Pty Ltd v Christos Doufas Nominees Pty Ltd (1986) Qd R 91. In Phillips' case, a "canvassing agent" for an insurance company made a representation as to the effect of a proposed transaction and two of the judges in the High Court thought it could not be relied on against the insurance company because of a clause in the proposal reading as follows: "I also agree that no statement, promises or information made by or given by the person canvassing for or taking this proposal, or by any other person, shall be binding on the company or affect its rights in any way whatsoever, except insofar as such statements or promises are contained in the printed tables of the company or included in writing on this proposal."

Isaacs J appeared to think that it was the inferior status of the agent which made the difference: "I am far from saying that that clause would be read and applied so widely as to shield the Company if a superior responsible officer representing the company misled the insured. But in such a case as the present, I think it fairly applies."

Starke J at 87 referred to the clause and to the fact that there was no fraud, but did not say anything as to the status of the representor, nor refer his view to any wider principle.

It is thus seen, in my respectful opinion, that Life Insurance Co v Phillips is not decisive of the point for two reasons: Phillips' case dealt with a contractual promise and not a mere admission of fact; secondly, the representor here was one of the owners of the vendor company and not an inferior agent.

Were the matter free from direct authority, I would be inclined to hold that the clause constituted no defence to a claim to rescind based upon misrepresentation, fraudulent or otherwise. Applying the test set out in Thompson v Palmer and reiterated by Dixon J in Grundt's case, the part taken by the applicants in occasioning the adoption of the assumption was not such as to render a departure from it unjust. What the applicants did was to sign a standard printed form of contract prepared by the vendor containing the clause; as they were induced to do so by a misrepresentation, I find it difficult to see any injustice in permitting them to prove that fact.

I note also the general unwillingness of courts exercising equitable jurisdiction to allow claims to rescind land sale contracts, based on innocent [725] misrepresentation, to be defeated by contractual provisions, exemplified by Laurence v Lexcourt Holdings Ltd [1978] 1 WLR 1128 and Walker v Boyle (1982) 1 All ER 634.

But the applicants were faced with a number of adverse decisions of the Queensland Supreme Court, of which the most recent appears to be Dorotea Pty Ltd v Christos Doufas Nominees Pty Ltd (1986) 2 Qd R 91. There Carter J regarded himself as bound by a decision of the Full Court of the Supreme Court in Brisbane Unit Development Corporation Pty Ltd v Robertson (1983) 2 Qd R 105. According to the judgment in that case, the point went by concession, but as Carter J pointed out, the Full Court clearly agreed that the concession was correctly made.

Although my mind has fluctuated, I have come, in the end, to the opinion that I should apply the views of the Queensland Supreme Court. It seems to me probable that the matter is regarded as practically settled in this State, and it would be inconvenient to act on a different opinion. Thus, while by no means convinced that it is in accordance with the principles laid down by Dixon J and referred to above so to hold, I act on the basis that the clause is effective to defeat a claim based upon innocent misrepresentation.

It should be added that it is clear enough that the clause is ineffective against a claim under the Trade Practices Act. For reasons akin to those discussed in Beckford Nominees Pty Ltd v The Shell Company of Australia Limited (unreported, 1 October 1986) the applicants cannot, in my view, be prevented by estoppel by convention from asserting that there was a breach of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act. See also Petera Pty Ltd v EAJ Pty Ltd (1985) ATPR 40-605 and Dibble v Aidan Nominees Pty Ltd (1986) ATPR 40-693 …

Exercise of discretion under the Trade Practices Act

[33.310] [730] I have concluded that the respondent, through the agency of McLeod, has breached s 52 of the Trade Practices Act by making statements which induced the applicants to enter into the contracts. I have also concluded, however, that under the general law the applicants' rescission, regarded as being based on innocent misrepresentation, would be held unlawful, by reason that the applicants affirmed the contracts and also by reason of cl 8(c)(i) of each contract. I deferred consideration of the question whether, in exercise of the Court's jurisdiction under s 87 of the Trade Practices Act, that affirmation is fatal. In case I am in error in the conclusions reached under the last two headings, I return to that point.

In my opinion, the power given by s 87 is wide enough to justify an order that the deposits be returned. I am of the view that in determining what relief, if any, should be granted on account of a breach of s 52 which has caused loss, the court is not necessarily precluded by an affirmation. Here, the factual circumstances discussed under the last two headings may, in my view, be taken into account in determining whether, on the whole, it is fair to require the deposits to be returned on the ground of breach of s 52.

Another consideration which points in the same direction is that, on the findings, the applicants would have been entitled to damages for the breaches of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act, on the basis indicated in Gates v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1986) 63 ALR 600 at 607 and 609 – ie on the basis of the difference between the prices to be paid and the value of the units. It is true that not only has no such claim been made, but there is no evidence on which the damages could be assessed with absolute precision. But the units were resold very shortly after the settlement date, for losses of (respectively) $45 545.05, $40 268.10 and $18 751.11. If the contracts which I have held to have been induced by misleading statements had been completed, then approximately those sums would have had to be paid by the respondent as damages, instead of being recoverable by it.

Orders accordingly.

[34.05] Judge-made law does not provide a general principle of relief in respect of contracts brought about by unfair means. Nevertheless there are many grounds for providing relief from a contract on the basis that the contractual consent of one of the parties was impaired by virtue of some form of wrongful inducement. As discussed in Part XIA, those induced to enter into a contract by some form of misinformation may in certain circumstances obtain relief from the courts. This part looks at certain categories of cases in which one of the parties (the defendant) enjoyed an ascendant position vis-à-vis the other party (the plaintiff) and abused that position by subjecting the plaintiff to threats (duress) or undue pressure (undue influence) or by taking advantage of the plaintiff's position of special disadvantage (unconscionable dealing).

The concept of unfairness is often analysed as having two aspects: procedural unfairness (ie, unfairness in the way in which the contract was brought about) and substantive unfairness or "contractual imbalance" (ie, unfairness in the terms of the contract itself). Judge-made law has generally been concerned with procedural unfairness only. As Toohey J pointed out in Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621, 654, the courts "are not armed with a general power to set aside bargains simply because, in the eyes of the judge, they appear to be unfair, harsh or unconscionable". Nevertheless, substantive unfairness may be evidence of procedural unfairness. In the words of Lord Brightman: "Contractual imbalance may be so extreme as to raise a presumption of procedural unfairness, such as undue influence or some other form of victimisation": Hart v O'Connor [1985] 1 AC 1000, 1018. Chapter 16 deals with the statutory regime that addresses substantively unfair contract terms.

BASIC ELEMENTS OF DURESS

[34.10] This chapter deals with the situation where one of the parties, in procuring the making of a contract, or in obtaining a payment of money, has brought pressure to bear on the other party, in the form of threats. The governing principles are the common law principles of "duress" and "compulsion" and the equitable principles of "coercion". The main remedy available to a plaintiff in a case of duress is rescission. This form of relief, and the bars to it, is considered in more detail in Chapter 39.

There are two elements involved in assessing duress:

1. "whether any applied pressure induced the victim to enter into the contract"; and
2. "whether that pressure went beyond what the law is prepared to countenance as legitimate". Cresendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 19 NSWLR 40, 46 (McHugh JA, Samuels and Mahoney JJA agreeing).

Different views have been expressed as to whether duress also requires the absence of a reasonable alternative available to the defendant: compare Heydon, Heydon on Contract (2019), [16.10]; Seddon and Bigwood, Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract (11th Aust ed, 2017), [13.1] and Edelman and Bant, Unjust Enrichment (2nd ed, 2016), p 207. Even if the absence of a reasonable alternative is not an element of duress, it may provide relevant evidence of the effect of the pressure applied. Thus, an absence of a reasonable alternative may strongly suggest that the pressure applied by the defendant influenced the decision of the plaintiff. Conversely, the presence of a reasonable alternative available to the plaintiff may support the conclusion that that the pressure applied by the defendant was not an operative reason affecting his or her decision.

Universe Tankships Inc of Monrovia v International Transport Workers Federation

[34.15] Universe Tankships Inc of Monrovia v International Transport Workers Federation [1983] 1 AC 366 (House of Lords) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: The defendant trade union (the ITF) had "blacked" the plaintiffs' (the owners') ship by ensuring that portworkers would not service it with tugs. In order to secure the lifting of the blacking and thereby avoid the disastrous financial consequences that would ensue if the ship was stranded in port, the plaintiffs acceded to various demands made by the defendant, including the payment of $6,480 to the ITF's welfare fund. The plaintiffs later claimed return of the money on the basis of having paid it under "economic duress". Parker J allowed the claim, but the Court of Appeal disallowed it. On appeal to the House of Lords, the ITF conceded it was guilty of economic duress but claimed immunity by virtue of provisions in the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 which provide protection in respect of "trade disputes" as defined in the Act. The House of Lords ruled, by a majority, that the Act did not provide immunity in the circumstances of this case. Hence the appeal was allowed. The views of Lord Scarman on the nature of duress are extracted below.]

LORD SCARMAN: [400] The authorities … reveal two elements in the wrong of duress:

(1) pressure amounting to compulsion of the will of the victim; and

(2) the illegitimacy of the pressure exerted.

There must be pressure, the practical effect of which is compulsion or the absence of choice.

Compulsion is variously described in the authorities as coercion or the vitiation of consent. The classic case of duress is, however, not the lack of will to submit but the victim's intentional submission arising from the realisation that there is no other practical choice open to him. This is the thread of principle which links the early law of duress (threat to life or limb) with later developments when the law came also to recognise as duress first the threat to property and now the threat to a man's business or trade. The development is well traced in Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution (2nd ed, 1978), ch 9.

The absence of choice can be proved in various ways, for example, by protest, by the absence of independent advice, or by a declaration of intention to go to law to recover the money paid or the property transferred: see Maskell v Horner [1915] 3 KB 106. But none of these evidential matters goes to the essence of duress. The victim's silence will not assist the bully, if the lack of any practicable choice but to submit is proved. The present case is an excellent illustration. There was no protest at the time, but only a determination to do whatever was needed as rapidly as possible to release the ship. Yet nobody challenges the judge's finding that the owner acted under compulsion. He put it thus: [1981] ICR 129 at 143:

> It was a matter of the most urgent commercial necessity that the plaintiffs should regain the use of their vessel. They were advised that their prospects of obtaining an injunction was minimal, the vessel would not have been released unless the payment was made, and they sought recovery of the money with sufficient speed once the duress had terminated.

The real issue in the appeal is, therefore, as to the second element in the wrong duress: Was the pressure applied by the ITF in the circumstances of this case one which the law recognises as legitimate? For, as Lord Wilberforce and Lord Simon of Glaisdale said in Barton v Armstrong [1976] AC 104 at 121D: "the pressure must be one of a kind which the law does not regard as legitimate."

As the two noble and learned Lords remarked at 121D, in life, including the life of commerce and finance, many acts are done "under [401] pressure, sometimes overwhelming pressure", but they are not necessarily done under duress. That depends on whether the circumstances are such that the law regards the pressure as legitimate.

In determining what is legitimate two matters may have to be considered. The first is as to the nature of the pressure. In many cases this will be decisive, though not in every case. And so the second question may have to be considered, namely, the nature of the demand which the pressure is applied to support.

The origin of the doctrine of duress in threats to life or limb, or to property, suggests strongly that the law regards the threat of unlawful action as illegitimate, whatever the demand. Duress can, of course, exist even if the threat is one of lawful action: whether it does so depends upon the nature of the demand. Blackmail is often a demand supported by a threat to do what is lawful, for example, to report criminal conduct to the police. In many cases, therefore: "What [one] has to justify is not the threat, but the demand": see Thorne v Motor Trade Association [1937] AC 797 at 806 per Lord Atkin.

The present is a case in which the nature of the demand determines whether the pressure threatened or applied, that is the blacking, was lawful or unlawful. If it was unlawful, it is conceded that the owner acted under duress and can recover. If it was lawful, it is conceded that there was no duress and the sum sought by the owners is irrecoverable. The lawfulness or otherwise of the demand depends upon whether it was an act done in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute. If it was, it would not be actionable in tort: s 13(1) of the Act. Although no question of tortious liability arises in this case and s 13(1) is not, therefore, directly in point, it is not possible, in my view, to say of acts which are protected by statute from suit in tort that they nevertheless can amount to duress. Parliament having enacted that such acts are not actionable in tort, it would be inconsistent with legislative policy to say that, when the remedy sought is not damages for tort but recovery of money paid, they become unlawful.

In Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corp (1988) 19 NSWLR 40, 45, McHugh JA said:

> In my opinion the overbearing will theory of duress should be rejected. A person who is the subject of duress usually knows only too well what he is doing. But he chooses to submit to the demand or pressure rather than take an alternative course of action.

THREATS TO PERSON

[34.25] A threat to harm the plaintiff or his or her family unless the plaintiff enters into a contract or pays over money is the archetype example of illegitimate pressure giving rise to duress: Barton v Armstrong [1976] AC 104; Al Nehayan v Kent [2018] EWHC 333 (Comm).

Barton v Armstrong

[34.30] Barton v Armstrong [1976] AC 104 (Privy Council) – Appeal from New South Wales Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: The plaintiff Barton alleged that the defendants (including Armstrong) had coerced him into executing a deed relating to the sale of certain companies by threatening to have him murdered. Street J found that on many occasions Armstrong had threatened Barton with death, that Barton was justified in taking those threats seriously and did in fact take them seriously. He also found that there were compelling business reasons why Barton executed the deed and that the threats did not coerce him. The Court of Appeal adopted, with some variations, Street J's findings of fact, but Mason JA and Taylor AJA held that the plaintiff-appellant could not succeed unless he established that, but for the threats, he would not have executed the deed and that this he had failed to do. Jacobs JA dissented. Barton appealed to the Privy Council.]

The majority judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA … [118]

Their Lordships turn now to consider the question of law which provoked a difference of opinion in the Court of Appeal Division. It is hardly surprising that there is no direct authority on the point, for if A threatens B with death if he does not execute some document and B, who takes A's threats seriously, executes the document it can be only in the most unusual circumstances that there can be any doubt whether the threats operated to induce him to execute the document. But this is a most unusual case and the findings of fact made below do undoubtedly raise the question whether it was necessary for Barton in order to obtain relief to establish that he would not have executed the deed in question but for the threats. In answering this question in favour of Barton, Jacobs JA relied both on a number of old common law authorities on the subject of "duress" and also — by way of analogy — on later decisions in equity with regard to the avoidance of deeds on the ground of fraud. Their Lordships do not think that the common law authorities are of any real assistance for it seems most unlikely that the authors of the statements relied on had the sort of problem which has arisen here in mind at all. On the other hand they think that the conclusion to which Jacobs JA came was right and that it is supported by the equity decisions. The scope of common law duress was very limited and at a comparatively early date equity began to grant relief in cases where the disposition in question had been procured by the exercise of pressure which the Chancellor considered to be illegitimate — although it did not amount to common law duress. There was a parallel development in the field of dispositions induced by fraud. At common law the only remedy available to the man defrauded was an action for deceit but equity in the same period in which it was building up the doctrine of "undue influence" came to entertain proceedings to set aside dispositions which had been obtained by fraud: see Holdsworth, A History of English Law, vol V (1924), pp 328-329. There is an obvious analogy between setting aside a disposition for duress or undue influence and setting it aside for fraud. Had Armstrong made a fraudulent misrepresentation to Barton for the purpose of inducing him to execute the deed of January 17, 1967, the answer to the problem which has arisen would have been clear. If … Barton relied on the misrepresentation Armstrong could not have defeated his claim by showing that there were other more weighty causes which contributed to his decision to execute the deed, for in this field the court does not allow an examination into the relative importance of contributory causes.

"Once make out that there has been anything like deception, and no contract resting in any degree on that foundation can stand": per Lord [119] Crawworth LJ in Reynell v Sprye (1852) 1 De GM&G

660, 708 … Their Lordships think that the same rule should apply in cases of duress and if Armstrong's threats were "a" reason for Barton's executing the deed he is entitled to relief even though he might well have entered into the contract if Armstrong had uttered no threats to induce him to do so.

It remains to apply the law to the facts…. [120] If Barton had to establish that he would not have made the agreement but for Armstrong's threats then their Lordships would not dissent from the view that he had not made out his case. But no such onus lay on him. On the contrary it was for Armstrong to establish, if he could, that the threats which he was making and the unlawful pressure which he was exerting for the purpose of inducing Barton to sign the agreement and which Barton knew were being made and exerted for this purpose in fact contributed nothing to Barton's decision to sign. The judge has found that during the ten days or so before the documents were executed Barton was in genuine fear that Armstrong was planning to have him killed if the agreement was not signed. His state of mind was described by the judge as one of "very real mental torment" and he believed that his fears would be at end when once the documents were executed … It is true that on the facts as their Lordships assume them to have been Armstrong's threats may have been unnecessary, but it would be unrealistic to hold that they played no part in making Barton decide to execute the documents. The proper inference to be drawn from the facts found is, their Lordships think, that though it may be that Barton would have executed the documents even if Armstrong had made no threats and exerted no unlawful pressure to induce him to do so the threats and unlawful pressure in fact contributed to his decision to sign the documents and to recommend their execution by … the other parties to them ….

In the result therefore the appeal should be allowed and a declaration made that the deeds in question were executed by Barton under duress and are void so far as concerns him.

[34.35] LORD WILBERFORCE and LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE: [121] The action is one to set aside an apparently complete and valid agreement on the ground of duress. The basis of the plaintiff's claim is, thus, that though there was apparent consent there was no true consent to the agreement: that the agreement was not voluntary. This involves consideration of what the law regards as voluntary, or its opposite; for in life, including the life of commerce and finance, many acts are done under pressure, sometimes overwhelming pressure, so that one can say that the actor had no choice but to act. Absence of choice in this sense does not negate consent in law; for this the pressure must be one of a kind which the law does not regard as legitimate. Thus, out of the various means by which consent may be obtained – advice, persuasion, influence, inducement, representation, commercial pressure – the law has come to select some which it will not accept as a reason for voluntary action: fraud, abuse of relation of confidence, undue influence, duress or coercion. In this the law, under the influence of equity, has developed from the old common law conception of duress – threat to life and limb – and it has arrived at the modern generalisation expressed by Holmes J: "subjected to an improper motive for action": Fairbanks v Snow 13 NE Reporter 596 at 598.

In an action such as the present, then, the first step required of the plaintiff is to show that some illegitimate means of persuasion was used. That there were threats to Barton's life was found by the judge, though he did not accept Barton's evidence in important respects … The next necessary step would be to establish the relationship between the illegitimate means used and the action taken. For the purposes of the present case (reserving our opinion as to cases which may arise in other contexts) we are prepared to accept, as the formula most favourable to the appellant, the test proposed by the majority, namely, that the illegitimate means used was a reason (not the reason, nor the predominant reason nor the clinching reason) why the complainant acted as he did. We are also prepared to accept that a decisive answer is not obtainable by asking the question whether the contract would have been made even if there had been no threats because, even if the answer to this question is affirmative, that does not prove that the contract was not made because of the threats ….

[124] Street J found that Barton was motivated to enter into the agreement by sheer commercial necessity. By this he meant that the company would survive and be profitable without Armstrong, but not with him, and that the likelihood and extent of such profit justified the price to be paid to get rid of Armstrong …. The finding and the evidence supporting it was carefully scrutinised by the Court of Appeal and, in the end, endorsed. [After quoting the relevant passage in the judgment of Mason JA they continued.] The judge's findings were also accepted, after careful examination by Taylor AJA "… the conclusion," he finds, "that Barton entered into this agreement because he wanted to and from commercial motives only is, I think, undoubtedly correct."

The appeal cannot succeed unless these most explicit findings are overturned. We consider that no basis exists for doing so.

In Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corp (1988) 19 NSWLR 40, 46, McHugh JA made the following statement:

> It is unnecessary, however, for the victim to prove that the illegitimate pressure was the sole reason for him entering into the contract. It is sufficient that the illegitimate pressure was one of the reasons for the person entering into the agreement. Once the evidence establishes that the pressure exerted on the victim was illegitimate, the onus lies on the person applying the pressure to show that it made no contribution to the victim entering into the agreement.

Given that illegitimate conduct need only be a cause of entry into the contract, it appears that the real issue in duress cases is the nature of the illegitimate conduct rather than the extent to which consent is impaired.

THREATS TO GOODS

[34.45] Money actually paid under compulsion for the release of chattels can be claimed back in an action in restitution for unjust enrichment; the action for money had and received:

> If a person pays money which he is not bound to pay, under compulsion of urgent and pressing necessity or of seizure actual or threatened of his goods, he can recover it as money had and received: Maskel v Horner [1915] 3 KB 106, 118.

If a person promised to pay money (as distinct from actually paying it) in order to obtain the release of goods unlawfully taken or retained, there was some authority for the view that provided consideration was given, such a promise was enforceable and the contract could not be avoided on the basis of duress. In Skeate v Beale (1841) 11 Ad & El 983; 113 ER 688, Lord Denman CJ said that "an agreement is not void because made under duress of goods … the fear that goods may be taken or injured does not deprive anyone of his free agency". However, Lord Denman's opinion stood uneasily with the recognised right to recover back money paid to prevent unlawful seizure of goods or to obtain goods actually seized: see Astley v Reynolds (1731) 2 Str 915; 93 ER 939 (an action in restitution for money had and received). Logic and principle demanded that the threatened detention of goods should be within the scope of duress if the promisor had no real alternative but to submit. The modern approach is illustrated by the following case.

Hawker Pacific v Helicopter Charter

[34.50] Hawker Pacific Pty Ltd v Helicopter Charter Pty Ltd (1991) 22 NSWLR 298 (New South Wales Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Brownie J.

[FACTS: In 1986, Helicopter Charter Pty Ltd (the respondent) had a helicopter which needed repainting. It agreed to pay Hawker Pacific Pty Ltd (the appellant) $5,200 for the repainting. The painting was done, but not to the satisfaction of Mr Barnao who was in charge of the respondent's business. Further work was done by the appellant on the basis that the price became $5,550. No money was paid. Following further complaints about defects in the work, the helicopter was redelivered to the appellant for rectification work. On 5 March 1987, Mr Barnao and Mr Hough (the respondent's pilot) went to pick up the helicopter. They spoke to the appellant's manager Mr Bartlett. Mr Barnao left, and Mr Bartlett had a document typed which he asked Mr Hough to sign. Mr Hough phoned Mr Barnao who told him to sign. Mr Hough and Mr Bartlett signed the following document.

> This letter is to confirm our agreement in which it has been agreed that Helicopter Charter Pty Ltd will pay Hawker Pacific Pty Ltd the sum of $4 300.00 being for a paint job carried out to Bell 206B VH-AHV, Job No PAA-217 and PAA-219.
> This payment releases Hawker Pacific Pty Ltd from any encumbrances or liability as it relates to the paint job.
> Helicopter Charter Pty Ltd agrees that the payment will be made on delivery of the helicopter.

The respondent took the helicopter away but did not pay $4,300. The respondent commenced proceedings in which it submitted that the agreement in the document was voidable on the grounds of duress. Brownie J upheld this submission and set aside the agreement. The appellant appealed.]

PRIESTLEY JA: [301] In his reasons, Brownie J set out in detail the evidence of what happened between Messrs Barnao, Hough and Bartlett on 5 March 1987. Upon that evidence he reached the following factual conclusions. The respondent urgently needed the helicopter for charter work that day. Mr Barnao believed that Mr Bartlett would prevent the helicopter being taken away unless the agreement proposed by Mr Bartlett as later embodied in the document signed by Messrs Hough and Bartlett was entered into by the respondent. Mr Bartlett did not make a threat to that effect in words, but the surrounding circumstances were such as to justify Mr Barnao in his belief. Because he believed that the only practical way of getting possession of the helicopter for the respondent that day was by agreeing to Mr Bartlett's proposal, Mr Barnao did so. Brownie J also noted that it was common ground before him that Messrs Barnao and Hough had conveyed to Mr Bartlett, before Mr Barnao left Mr Bartlett's office and before the document was signed, that the respondent needed the helicopter urgently, that day. Brownie J further found that Mr Barnao's conduct on behalf of the respondent after 5 March 1987 did not amount to an affirmation of the agreement made on that day.

In the appeal, the appellant did not challenge the trial judge's primary findings of fact. The argument went to the complexion to be put on those findings. This submission needs to be measured against the legal principle concerning duress in commercial situations such as that in question. The general law on the subject was reviewed by Isaacs J in Smith v William Charlick Ltd (1924) 34 CLR 38. In that case the plaintiff sought to recover money paid to the defendant, by action for money had and received, in circumstances in which, the plaintiff claimed, the law implied a promise to repay by the defendant to the plaintiff. Isaacs J stated the law as follows (at 56):

> It is conceded that the only ground on which the promise to repay could be implied is "compulsion". The payment is said by the respondent not to have been "voluntary" but "forced" from it within the contemplation of the law. Leaving aside, for the present, the question whether in law the payment was "forced" from the respondent by some undue advantage taken of its situation having regard to the Wheat Harvest legislation, the point is whether the Board's insistence was what is regarded as "compulsion" from the simple standpoint of common law. "Compulsion" in relation to a payment of which refund is sought, and whether it is also variously called "coercion", "extortion", "exaction", or "force", > includes every species of duress or conduct analogous to duress, [302] actual or threatened, exerted by or on behalf of the payee and applied to the person or the property or any right of the person who pays or, in some cases, of a person related to or in affinity with him. Such compulsion is a legal wrong, and the law provides a remedy by raising a fictional promise to repay.

This passage was adopted by Long Innes J as correct in Nixon v Furphy (1925) 25 SR (NSW) 151 at 160. The Full Court adopted as correct the portion of the passage commencing "'compulsion' in relation to a payment" in TA Sundell & Sons Pty Ltd v Emm Yannoulatos (Overseas) Pty Ltd [1956] SR (NSW) 323 at 328; 73 WN (NSW) 556 at 569–70. The court in the T A Sundell case (Roper CJ in Equity, Hardie J and Manning AJ) also noted (at 328; 570) that Isaacs J's formulation was in substance to the same effect as the opinion expressed by Fullagar J in Re Hooper and Grass' Contract [1949] VLR 269. An interesting observation made by Fullagar J in that case was that "the withholding of another's legal right" (which I take to be analogous to Isaacs J's "duress … applied to … any right" of the opposing party) may be treated as "practical compulsion", a term used in English cases decided since Smith v William Charlick Ltd.

Isaacs J's statement refers in terms only to situations where payment has been made under duress, not to contracts made under duress. I do not see why the underlying idea should not apply to both situations. That is, the sentence in his statement beginning "'compulsion' …" could just as well be written "'compulsion' in relation to a contract which is sought to be set aside, includes every species of duress or conduct analogous to duress, actual or threatened, exerted by or on behalf of the promisee and applied to the person or the property or any right of the person who promises". A similar conclusion was reached by Mocatta J in North Ocean Shipping Co Ltd v Hyundai Construction Co Ltd [1979] QB 705 at 719 and by Lord Diplock in the House of Lords in Universe Tankships Inc of Monrovia v International Transport Workers Federation [1983] 1 AC 366 at 384. The course of authority in New South Wales seems to me to warrant the same conclusion.

Brownie J's finding seems to me to fall within the proposition stated by Isaacs J. Brownie J said that the appellant's conduct on 5 March 1987, viewed objectively, amounted to a holding out to the respondent that the helicopter would not be released unless the respondent first promised to pay $4 300 to the defendant and signed the document of 5 March 1987: see p 14 of his reasons. In the language of Isaacs J, this represented a finding of conduct by the appellant analogous to threatened duress by the appellant applied to either or both of the respondent's helicopter or the respondent's right to take its helicopter away from the appellant's premises …

The respondent was entitled to take away its helicopter from the appellant's premises on 5 March 1987. The appellant's conduct showed, and Mr Barnao believed, that the appellant would not permit it to be taken away unless the respondent did what the appellant wanted. On Brownie J's findings, in my [303] opinion fully supported by the evidence, the respondent's need for the helicopter for business purposes that day was so urgent that recourse to legal proceedings for its recovery clearly would not have solved the company's practical problem.

The appellant's submission on this aspect of the case was that it was wrong to conclude from all the circumstances that its conduct was analogous to threatened duress to the helicopter or the right of the respondent to take away the helicopter. The chief points made in support of this general submission were that the threat that the appellant would not permit the respondent to take away the helicopter was never expressed, and that the respondent's subsequent behaviour showed that it did not regard itself as having been threatened as was later alleged on its behalf.

On the first of these arguments, it does not seem to me to be sufficient for the appellant's purposes to show that no express threat was made. If circumstances for which the appellant was responsible conveyed the threat to the respondent, then the threat of duress would operate as forcefully as if it were put into words. Brownie J accepted that Messrs Barnao and Hough believed that the threat was being made; in light of the materials upon which Brownie J made this finding, it was not seriously open to challenge in this court, and was not challenged by the appellant. The appellant's submission was rather that the circumstances could not reasonably have given rise to the apprehension actually felt by the respondent's director and employee. However, in my opinion the circumstances were such as to make it reasonable for Messrs Barnao and Hough to believe that the appellant would withhold the helicopter from them unless the promise to pay were made. In this respect I adopt Brownie J's statement of fact justifying such a view:

> the helicopter was not physically ready for delivery at the time promised, they [that is Messrs Barnao and Hough] were told they had to see Bartlett before being able to take delivery, and Bartlett presented himself to them as being ready to argue what defects were or were not the responsibility of the defendant, this being rather different to what he had said to Barnao on an earlier occasion, and as not being prepared to release the helicopter without the payment or promise of payment.

The very last matter mentioned in the summary just quoted was criticised by counsel for the appellant, but as Mr Bartlett had told Messrs Barnao and Hough, according to para 6 of a written statement of his evidence, that "I don't expect you to pay cash, but it is company policy to require payment before releasing the helicopter", it seems to me that the inference drawn by Brownie J was justified. In short, I agree with Brownie J that the factual situation on 5 March 1987 presented a threat of duress by the appellant to Messrs Barnao and Hough. The other branch of the appellant's argument on this part of the appeal was the fact, in my opinion accurately found by Brownie J, that Mr Barnao fobbed off the appellant for some time, amounting to a matter of weeks, after 5 March 1987, with excuses for not paying the $4 300 and without making any contention that the agreement between the parties had been reached in circumstances of duress or threatened duress to the appellant. It was submitted that this state of affairs should be taken into account in considering whether there had in fact been duress or threat of duress on 5 March 1987. The failure to complain once what was later alleged to be [304] duress ceased to operate provided, it was submitted, a reason for not accepting the claim that duress or threat of duress had in fact been operative. However, I do not see how this consideration can help the appellant in the present case where the trial judge made positive findings of fact, which were open to him on the evidence and were of a kind which this court will not ordinarily interfere with, that both Messrs Barnao and Hough had believed on 5 March 1987 that the helicopter would not be released until the agreement was made and signed. In reaching that finding of fact, Brownie J seems to me to have had well in mind the argument based on the later fobbing-off period; on that basis, I do not think that the circumstances which occasionally lead this court into coming to different findings of fact from a trial judge, which arise when a clear error of some kind can be seen to have led to a wrong finding, exist in the present case.

In my opinion, the court should not interfere with Brownie J's finding that the document of 5 March 1987 was signed on behalf of the respondent as a result of conduct which was analogous to actual or threatened duress.

The other principal submission made for the appellant was that even if the period of fobbing-off was of no assistance to the appellant's contention concerning the fact of duress or threatened duress, the conduct of the respondent had affirmed the transaction embodied in the document of 5 March 1987. Reliance was placed on North Ocean Shipping, where (at 720) Mocatta J adopted as the relevant rule that because a contract entered into under duress was voidable and not void, a person who had entered into such a contract might either affirm or avoid it after the duress had ceased, and that acting under such a contract with full knowledge of the circumstances after escaping from the duress and taking no steps to set aside the transaction, a person might be found to have affirmed it. One question which this statement of the rule raises is whether "affirmation" is an intelligible legal category in its own right. In my opinion it is not but rather covers situations governed by two particular legal theories, election and estoppel. That is, in my opinion, to make a case of affirmation the appellant here needs to show either that the respondent elected not to avoid the contract or became estopped from asserting its right to avoid the contract.

So far as election is concerned, two considerations appear from Sargent v ASL Developments Ltd (1974) 131 CLR 634, a case in which the High Court surveyed the doctrine of election in some detail. One is that the party which has the election is not bound to elect immediately. The party "may keep the question open so long as the delay does not cause prejudice to the other side": per Mason J at 656. The other consideration is that "The words or conduct ordinarily required to constitute an election must be unequivocal in the sense that it is consistent only with the exercise of one of the two sets of rights and inconsistent with the exercise of the other": see Stephen J at 646.

In the present case I doubt whether the fobbing-off period found by Brownie J caused any significant prejudice to the appellant. Thus the first of the two considerations mentioned would appear to me to favour the conclusion that the respondent did not elect to affirm the transaction of 5 March 1987. However, rather than base my conclusion on that view, I reach the same conclusion by reference to and base my opinion on the [305] second of the two considerations; that is, I do not think the respondent's conduct during the fobbing-off period was unequivocal in the necessary sense. The words being spoken on the respondent's behalf taken by themselves might be regarded as unequivocal in that they recognised the existence of the transaction of release, without protest about it; but, accompanying the fair words was the conduct of non-payment. If there had been nothing said during the fobbing-off period, and no payment had been made and then there had been a refusal to pay, I do not think it would have been arguable for the appellant that there had been any election to affirm the transaction. In the actual circumstances it seems to me Mr Bartlett would have been more likely to think that the respondent was trying to get out of the arrangement it had made than indicating an intention to carry it out.

When these considerations are taken together with his Honour's apparent acceptance of Mr Barnao's statement that during the fobbing-off period what he was doing "was buying time and attempting to ascertain where I stood regarding the fact that the helicopter had not been improved upon" (at 19 of transcript, and see Brownie J's finding at 16 of his reasons), I do not think that the excuses given by the respondent for non-payment are consistent only with the exercise of the rights which would flow from the transaction of 5 March 1987 and inconsistent with the exercise of the right to have that transaction avoided. Turning to estoppel, I note first that the type of situation where an estoppel may operate even although the doctrine of election does not is where the latter doctrine does not apply because the party with the right of election did not know his legal rights regarding election but nevertheless acted in such a way as to represent to the other party that the contract was being affirmed and that the other party then acted to that party's detriment on the basis of the representation.

In the present case the view I have arrived at concerning election does not depend upon the respondent's not being aware of its rights in that respect, although it may have been possible to reach such a conclusion. Assuming however that this is a case where the estoppel question is not decided by the same considerations that decide the election question, it seems to me to be sufficient to say that the respondent did not make any representation to the appellant clear enough to attract the operation of an estoppel nor can it be seen from the evidence that the appellant acted on any representation to its material detriment in a way attracting the doctrine.

My conclusion therefore is that the second branch of the appellant's argument also fails.

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

[34.55] CLARKE JA: I agree with the orders proposed by Priestley JA and, subject to a reservation which I express below on the affirmation issue, with his Honour's reasons for proposing those orders and wish only to add a few observations on two aspects of the case. It is well settled that money paid in order to get possession of goods wrongfully detained, or to avoid their wrongful detention, may be recovered in an action for money had and received (Astley v Reynolds (1731) 2 Str 915; 93 ER 939; Maskell v Horner [1915] 3 KB 106, at 118, where Lord Reading CJ said that the money was recoverable because although it was not [306] paid under duress in the strict sense (not being duress of the person) it was paid under conditions analogous to duress; Smith v William Charlick Ltd (1924) 34 CLR

38 at 56). On the other hand the traditional view, according to Chitty on Contracts (26th ed, 1989), para 505, pp 337–8, is that the unlawful detention, or threatened detention of a person's goods, is not duress which will at common law enable the owner of the goods to avoid an agreement obtained by it. Skeate v Beale (1841) 11 Ad & El 983; 113 ER 688, is the authority cited in support of that view.

This distinction, if correct, leads to the absurd result that if A paid money under duress of goods he could recover the money paid but if he entered into a contract to pay money under similar duress he could not avoid the contract and would be obliged to pay the moneys due thereunder.

In my opinion the distinction is not supportable and to the extent that Skeate is authority for the so called traditional view it should not be followed. This is the view expressed in Goff & Jones, The Law of Restitution (2nd ed, 1978), p 170 (see also Beatson, "Duress as a Vitiating Factor in Contract" (1974) 33 Cambridge Law Journal 97 at 108) and by Kerr J in The Siboen and The Sibotre [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep 293 and accords with the authorities cited by Priestley JA. The second aspect is affirmation on which I am content to adopt the approach of Brownie J and pose the question whether the respondent had subsequently affirmed the contract. In this respect I am of opinion that, while there is considerable force in the appellant's submissions, his Honour correctly concluded that in the particular circumstances of this case the respondent had not affirmed the contract.

[HANDLEY JA delivered a judgment in which he agreed that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

In Occidental Worldwide Investment Corps v Skibs A/S Avanti (The "Siboen" and The "Sibotre") [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep 293, referred to in the principal case, Kerr J said, at 335:

> If I should be compelled to sign a lease or some other contract for a nominal but legally sufficient consideration under an imminent threat of having my house burnt down or a valuable picture slashed, though without any threat of physical violence to anyone, I do not think that the law would uphold the agreement. I think that a plea of coercion or compulsion would be available in such cases. The latter is the term used in a line of Australian cases of strong persuasive authority: Nixon v Furphy (1925) 25 SR (NSW) 151 and in the High Court of Australia in (1925) 37 CLR 161, in Re Hooper and Grass' Contract [1949] VLR 269, and TA Sundell & Sons Pty Ltd v Emm Yannoulatos (Overseas) Pty Ltd [1956] SR (NSW) 323. These judgments also state that the degree of compulsion or duress is not necessarily limited to cases of threats to the person or duress in relation to goods. Further, I think that there are indications in Skeate v Beale itself and in other cases that the true question is ultimately whether or not the agreement in question is to be regarded as having been concluded voluntarily; but it does not follow that every agreement concluded under some form of compulsion is ipso facto to be regarded as voluntary with the solitary exception of cases involving duress to the person. In Wakefield v Newbon (1844) 6 QB 276; 115 ER 107, Lord Denman referred to cases such as Skeate v Beale as: "that class where the parties have come to a voluntary settlement of their concerns, and have chosen to pay what is found due".
> Skeate v Beale may perhaps be regarded as a case in which the victim of the threat had a real alternative to submission and "room for appeal to the law for a remedy".

Where a person is withholding a chattel under a bona fide claim of right, a contract to pay for its return may constitute a valid compromise of the claim.

THREATS TO BREACH A CONTRACT

[34.65] Drawing on the restitution cases of compulsion and the equitable doctrine of coercion, the courts have recognised a concept of "economic duress". This category most commonly associates with threats to discontinue performance of an existing contract unless some concession is given. It has been recognised as a possible form of illegitimate pressure, even though the promise extracted is supported by consideration. The question posed is whether the new or varied contract that has been procured under pressure should be regarded as voidable or whether it should be regarded as a valid compromise or settlement of a claim. Much will depend on whether there was a threat by the defendant not to perform as opposed to a mere statement of position and whether that threat was a factor caused the plaintiff to renegotiate the contract.

TA Sundell & Sons Pty Ltd v Emm Yannoulatos (Overseas) Pty Ltd (1955) 56 SR (NSW) 323, at [10.90], illustrates the application of the concept of duress to threats to discontinue performance of an existing contract. For further discussion of the concept of economic duress, see the judgment of Lord Scarman in Pao On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] AC 614 at [4.150]. In Australia, the most frequently cited statement of what amounts to economic duress is that of McHugh JA in Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 19 NSWLR 40, 45–6:

> The rationale of the doctrine of economic duress is that the law will not give effect to an apparent consent which was induced by pressure exercised upon one party by another party when the law regards that pressure as illegitimate. … Pressure will be illegitimate if it consists of unlawful threats or amounts to unconscionable conduct. But the categories are not closed. Even overwhelming pressure, not amounting to unconscionable conduct, however, will not necessarily constitute economic duress.

See also Beerens v Bluescope Distribution Pty Ltd [2012] VSCA 209; (2012) 39 VR 1, [46]; Electricity Generation Corporation t/a Verve Energy v Woodside Energy Ltd [2013] WASCA 36, [30], [184], appeal allowed on different issue in Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640.

LAWFUL ACT DURESS

[34.70] Lawful threats may in some, albeit unique, instances give rise to duress. It has been said that if "the pressure is lawful, it may still be illegitimate if there is no reasonable or justifiable connection between the nature of the pressure being applied and the demand which that pressure supports": Universe Tankships Inc of Monrovia v International Transport Workers Federation [1983] 1 AC 366, 401 per Lord Scarman; R v Her Majesty's Attorney-General for England and Wales (New Zealand) [2003] UKPC 22, [15]–[20]; Electricity Generation Corporation t/a Verve Energy v Woodside Energy Ltd [2013] WASCA 36, [25] but cf [176], appeal allowed on different issue in Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd [2014] HCA 7; (2014) 251 CLR 640. See also CTN Cash & Carry Ltd v Gallaher [1994] 4 All ER 714; Times Travel (UK) Ltd v Pakistan International Airlines Corporation [2019] EWCA Civ 828.

It has sometimes also been suggested that lawful act duress might better be seen as part of the doctrines of undue influence and unconscionable dealing, see Australia & New Zealand

Banking Group v Karam [2005] NSWCA 344; (2005) 64 NSWLR 149, [66]–[67]. In Thorne v Kennedy the High Court declined to address the questions about whether duress required an unlawful act or whether lawful act duress added anything to the existing doctrine of unconscionable conduct: [2017] HCA 49; (2017) 263 CLR 85, [29] (Kiefel CJ, Bell, Gageler, Keane and Edelman JJ), see also [71]–[74] (Nettle J expressing a preference for including illegitimate pressure through a lawful act within the concept of duress).

CHAPTER 35

Undue influence

[35.10] RELATIONSHIPS OF INFLUENCE 1047
[35.15] Johnson v Buttress 1048
[35.20] Thorne v Kennedy 1051

[35.05] As discussed in Chapter 34, a party (the plaintiff) wanting to avoid a contract on the basis of duress must prove that he or she was coerced by illegitimate pressure by the other party (the defendant) into making or varying the contract. This chapter considers the situation where the plaintiff has been subjected to a more subtle form of influence. It covers the situation where a plaintiff, by virtue of reliance on and confidence in the defendant, suffers from impaired judgment as to her or his own best interests. The main remedy available to a plaintiff in case of undue influence, as of duress, is rescission. This form of relief, and the bars to it, are considered in more detail in Chapter 39.

[35.10] Undue influence is concerned with "the quality of the consent or assent" of the plaintiff in circumstances in which the defendant occupies a position of ascendency of influence.[1] Undue influence may be established through the circumstances of the particular transaction. Relief may also be available if the plaintiff can prove that a relationship of influence existed between the parties, that is, a relationship characterised by the ascendancy of one party over the other. In such a case, the courts in equity recognise that there is a presumption that undue influence was exercised by the defendant over the plaintiff. It is the defendant who must rebut this presumption by proving that the contract (or gift) was not the result of abuse of influence but was entered into only after full free and informed thought.

Equity deems certain relationships to be relationships of influence: parent and child, guardian and ward, religious advisor and disciple, solicitor and client, doctor and patient. The relationship of accountant (or financial adviser) and client is not such a relationship. Relationships of a fiduciary kind do not per se fall within the category, as not all fiduciary relationships are relationships of influence. No presumption of influence arises from the relationship of husband and wife, although in Yerkey v Jones (1940) 63 CLR 649, 675 Dixon J stated that the relationship had never been divested completely of "equitable presumptions of an invalidating tendency", as discussed further in Chapter 37.

Even if a relationship is not deemed to be one of influence, a plaintiff may nevertheless prove that it is in fact such a relationship, for example by presenting evidence that he or she placed trust and confidence in the other and relied on the other for guidance. If a relationship of influence is neither proved nor deemed, then as noted, the plaintiff in seeking to avoid the contract has the burden of proving actual undue influence. Thus, in Allcard v Skinner (1887)

1 Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447, 474; Bridgewater v Leahy (1998) 194 CLR 457, [74].

36 Ch D 145, 171 Cotton LJ, speaking in the context of gifts, distinguished two categories of equitable intervention:

> First, where the court has been satisfied that the gift was the result of influence expressly used by the donee for the purpose; second, where the relations between the donor and donee have at or shortly before the execution of the gift been such as to raise a presumption that the donee had influence over the donor.

The following cases illustrate the second category.

[35.15] Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: A suit was brought in the equitable jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of New South Wales by the plaintiff, administrator cum testamento annexo of the will of his deceased father (Buttress), against Mary Elizabeth Johnson, the defendant. The plaintiff sought to set aside a document signed by Buttress on 24 March 1931, whereby he transferred to the defendant a piece of land near Sydney, on which was erected a cottage in which Buttress had lived for many years. Buttress was illiterate and unstable in his relations with other persons. He was dependent for his living upon the rent he received from the cottage, and had practically no other assets save a small quantity of furniture and personal effects and a life policy of about £50. The action arose in the following way.

The defendant and her husband had known Buttress for more than 20 years and notwithstanding their completely different modes of life, the defendant kept up a familiarity with Buttress and his wife during this time. During an illness from which Buttress's wife ultimately died, the defendant rendered such aid and comfort as she was able to provide. After the death of his wife, Buttress made a will in favour of his stepson's child. The will which it superseded constituted his son as the sole beneficiary, but his son had long since ceased to please him. Buttress left the cottage, having found tenants for it, and visited one of his sisters, a Mrs Job, in Melbourne. On his return, he made another will leaving the property to Mrs Job for life and after her death to Mrs Hart, a daughter of another sister. Buttress had visited the defendant a number of times and ultimately expressed a wish to make a will in her favour, stating that he desired that his son should get nothing. In due course the will was made. From this time on the frequency of Buttress's visits to the defendant's home increased and finally he said that he wished to transfer the property to her. The transfer was handled by the defendant's solicitor. According to the account given by the managing clerk, the defendant said that Buttress wished to transfer the property to her. In an answer to a question Buttress confirmed the statement. He produced the certificate of title and said that that was the property. To a question whether he was selling it, he replied, no, that he was giving it, that he wanted the witness to deed it over to her. The witness asked if he understood that the defendant was not paying anything for it and could he tell him if there was any reason for it. Buttress answered that he wanted her to have it; she was very good to his wife and he was very fond of her. The transfer was then prepared and the consideration was given as natural love and affection. Buttress lived with the defendant for about three weeks and then went to live, at first in a tent and later in a shack which he built, on land owned by the defendant. Arrangements were made for him to receive supplies of milk and the like and the defendant sent him clothes and other necessaries from time to time as well as the net amount of the rent from the cottage. He was visited by the defendant regularly and visited her occasionally. He lived thus for some three years. Eventually he became ill, and on his way to hospital gave another will which he had lately made to Mrs Hart. Under it Mrs Hart was the sole beneficiary. The transfer to the defendant and the will in her favour were not made known to any of Buttress's relatives until after his death, but the defendant's evidence was that Buttress himself forbade any disclosure.

Nicholas J found that Buttress was a man of less than average intelligence; that he had little or no experience of or capacity for business; that when he executed the transfer he did not understand that he had parted with the land and cottage irrevocably. The primary judge held that, upon the evidence, the transfer could not stand and must be set aside.

From that decision the defendant appealed to the High Court.]

DIXON J [stated the facts and continued]: [133] This narrative of facts includes no circumstances or combination of circumstances positively inconsistent with the existence in Buttress when he transferred the land of a full understanding of the consequences of his act and a judgment freely exercised in favour of the object of his bounty, whether based on gratitude, esteem or confidence in her future help protection and solicitude, or on a mixture of these motives. Nicholas J did not believe that the transaction originated in the old man's mind, or that he understood its final character. His Honour thought that the purpose with which the transaction had been suggested to him was to render the gift already made by will irrevocable and to prevent an application under the Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act. No doubt these are reasonable explanations of the conduct of the parties and arise upon the facts themselves. But it is difficult to find enough in the evidence to establish them as affirmative conclusions. If the circumstances of the transaction are such as to throw upon the donee the burden of justifying it as an independent act resolved upon by a free and understanding mind, the burden could not be discharged unless such a view of the origin and purpose of the transfer were negatived by satisfactory evidence. But, on the other hand, if positive proof is required that [134] the transfer was procured by the improper exercise of an actual ascendancy or domination gained over the donee, and the case cannot rest on presumption, then, in my opinion, that requirement is not satisfied.

The basis of the equitable jurisdiction to set aside an alienation of property on the ground of undue influence is the prevention of an unconscientious use of any special capacity or opportunity that may exist or arise of affecting the alienor's will or freedom of judgment in reference to such a matter. The source of power to practise a domination may be found in no antecedent relation but in a particular situation, or in the deliberate contrivance of the party. If this be so, facts must be proved showing that the transaction was the outcome of such an actual influence over the mind of the alienor that it cannot be considered his free act. But the parties may antecedently stand in a relation that gives to one an authority or influence over the other from the abuse of which it is proper that he should be protected. When they stand in such a relation, the party in the position of influence cannot maintain his beneficial title to property of substantial value made over to him by the other as a gift, unless he satisfies the court that he took no advantage of the donor, but that the gift was the independent and well understood act of a man in a position to exercise a free judgment based on information as full as that of the donee. This burden is imposed upon one of the parties to certain well known relations as soon as it appears that the relation existed and that he has obtained a substantial benefit from the other. A solicitor must thus justify the receipt of such a benefit from his client, a physician from his patient, a parent from his child, a guardian from his ward and a man from the woman he has engaged to marry.

The facts which must be proved in order to satisfy the court that the donor was freed from influence are, perhaps, not always the same in these different relationships, for the influence which grows out of them varies in kind and degree. But while in these and perhaps one or two other relationships their very nature imports influence, the doctrine which throws upon the recipient the burden of justifying the transaction is confined to no fixed category. It rests upon a principle. It applies whenever one party occupies or assumes [135] towards another a position naturally involving an ascendancy or influence over that other, or a dependence or trust on his part. One occupying such a position falls under a duty in which fiduciary characteristics may be seen. It is his duty to use his position of influence in the interest of no one but the man who is governed by his judgment, gives him his dependence and entrusts him with his welfare. When he takes from that man a substantial gift of property, it is incumbent upon him to show that it cannot be ascribed to the inequality between them which must arise from his special position. He may be taken to possess a peculiar knowledge not only of the disposition itself but of the circumstances which should affect its validity; he has chosen to accept a benefit which may well proceed from an abuse of the authority conceded to him, or the confidence reposed in him; and the relations between him and the donor are so close as to make it difficult to disentangle the inducements which led to the transaction. These considerations combine with reasons of policy to supply a firm foundation for the presumption against a voluntary disposition in his favour. But, except in the well recognised relations of influence, the circumstances relied upon to establish an antecedent relation between the parties of such a nature as to necessitate a justification of the transaction will be almost certain to cast upon it at least some measure of suspicion that active circumvention has been practised. This often will be so even when the case falls within the list of established relations of influence. Because of the presence of circumstances which might be regarded as presumptive proof of express influence, cases outside the list but nevertheless importing a special relationship of influence sometimes are treated as if they were not governed by the presumption but depended on an inference of fact. Scrutton LJ has remarked on the inclination of common law judges:

> to rely more on individual proof than on general presumption, while considering the nature of the relationship and the presence of independent advice as important, though not essential, matters to be considered on the question whether the transaction in question can be supported: Lancashire Loans Ltd v Black [1934] 1 KB 404.

Further, when the transaction is not one of gift but of purchase or other [136] contract, the matters affecting its validity are necessarily somewhat different. Adequacy of consideration becomes a material question. Instead of inquiring how the subordinate party came to confer a benefit, the court examines the propriety of what wears the appearance of a business dealing. These differences form an additional cause why cases which really illustrate the effect of a special relation of influence in raising a presumption of invalidity are often taken to decide that express influence which is undue should be inferred from the circumstances.

The decision of the present appeal depends, I think, altogether on the question whether, before the transfer, Mrs Johnson, or possibly the Johnson family collectively, stood in a special relation of influence to Buttress. The suggested relation has not its exact counterpart in any decided case. But this is of little weight. The rule must not be narrowed; the risk must not be run of fettering the exercise of the jurisdiction by an enumeration of persons against whom it should be exercised; the relief stands upon a general principle applying to all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another …

The first and most important consideration affecting the question is the standard of intelligence, the equipment and character of Buttress. No doubt, once it is established that a relation of influence exists, the presumption arises independently of these matters. It [137] has been said that it is an error to treat the subjects of capacity and of influence as if they were separate elements … But, in any case, in this peculiar case it is the man's illiteracy, his ignorance of affairs, and his strangeness in disposition and manner that provide the foundation for the suggested relation. For many years he had leant upon his wife, and it is evident that, after her death, he was at a loss for guidance and support. He turned first to one and then to another for a prop. His affairs of business were in reality few and simple. But to him they seem to have loomed large. A claim that his deceased wife owed money for some cash orders threw him into a state of great excitement. The question whether he could obtain an old-age pension troubled him …. In making a will in favour of his stepson's child, and then a second will in favour of Mrs Job, he showed how unstable his attachments were. It is possible that he regarded will-making as a means of securing that help and support which he so much needed. After his return from Melbourne, he began to place increasing reliance upon Mrs Johnson and the members of her family. Then the difficulties with his tenants developed. Whether Mrs Johnson's advice on her visit to the premises or his own temperament was the cause of the trouble, it is clear that the attempt to get his tenants out became the source of great concern and difficulty to him. It was a matter with which he could not cope. He relied on the Johnsons to manage it for him …. Little doubt can be felt that ultimately he came so to depend upon Mrs Johnson that a full relation of influence over him subsisted …. [138] It is not, I think, illogical to consider as an additional piece of evidence bearing upon this question the significance of the transfer itself. Whether its purpose was to prevent an application under the Testator's Family Maintenance and Guardianship of Infants Act, or simply to confer an immediate benefit upon Mrs Johnson in the confident expectation that she would look after him for the rest of his life, the fact that Buttress was prepared to make over to her his sole property shows how far his trust in her had advanced ….

I think that when the circumstances of the case are considered with the character and capacity of Buttress they lead to the conclusion that an antecedent relation of influence existed which throws upon Mrs Johnson the burden of justifying the transfer by showing that it was the result of the free exercise of the donor's independent will. This, in my opinion, she has quite failed to do. Her appeal should, therefore, be dismissed.

[LATHAM CJ and McTIERNAN J delivered a similar judgment. STARKE J agreed that the appeal should be dismissed on the ground that the evidence justified the finding of the primary judge that the transfer was proved to be the result of actual undue and unfair pressure on the part of the donee. EVATT J agreed with Dixon J.]

Appeal dismissed.

Thorne v Kennedy

[35.20] Thorne v Kennedy [2017] HCA 49; (2017) 263 CLR 85 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from Family Court of Australia.

[FACTS: The facts are set out in the judgement of Kiefel CJ, Bell, Gageler, Keane and Edelman JJ.]

KIEFEL CJ, BELL, GAGELER, KEANE AND EDELMAN JJ:

[90] [1] This appeal concerns two substantially identical financial agreements, a pre-nuptial agreement and a post-nuptial agreement which replaced it, made under Pt VIIIA of the Family Law Act 1975 (Cth). The agreements were made between a wealthy property developer, Mr Kennedy, and his fiancée, Ms Thorne. The parties met online on a website for potential brides and they were soon engaged. In the words of the primary judge, Ms Thorne came to Australia leaving behind "her life and minimal possessions … If the relationship ended, she would have nothing. No job, no visa, no home, no place, no community" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [91]). The pre-nuptial agreement was signed, at the insistence of Mr Kennedy, very shortly before the wedding in circumstances in which Ms Thorne was given emphatic independent legal advice that the agreement was "entirely inappropriate" and that Ms Thorne should not sign it.

[2] One of the issues before the primary judge, Judge Demack, was whether the agreements were voidable for duress, undue influence, or unconscionable conduct. The primary judge found that Ms Thorne's circumstances led her to believe that she had no choice, and was powerless, to act in any way other than to sign the pre-nuptial agreement. Her Honour held that the post-nuptial agreement was signed while the same circumstances continued, with the exception of the time pressure. The agreements were both set aside for duress, although the primary judge used that label interchangeably with undue influence, which is a better characterisation of her findings. The Full Court of the Family Court of Australia (Strickland, Aldridge and Cronin JJ) allowed an appeal and dismissed a notice of contention by Ms Thorne, concluding that the agreements had not been vitiated by duress, undue influence, or unconscionable conduct. For the reasons [91] which follow, the findings and conclusion of the primary judge should not have been disturbed. The agreements were voidable due to both undue influence and unconscionable conduct.

[3] The names, and some details, of the parties were suppressed during the course of this litigation. That approach was generally followed on this appeal, including the use of pseudonyms to describe the parties.

Background

[4] The parties met over the internet in 2006. At the time, Ms Thorne, who was an Eastern European woman, was living in the Middle East. She was 36 years old. She had no substantial assets. She previously had been married and divorced and was subsequently in a four year de facto relationship which ended when her partner moved to Kuwait for work. Mr Kennedy was a 67 year old Greek Australian property developer. He had assets worth between $18 million and $24 million. He was divorced with three adult children.

[5] Ms Thorne's profile on the website on which they met described her as a single woman with no children, of the Greek Orthodox religion, who spoke a little English and Greek. She shared the same religion with Mr Kennedy and generally conversed with him in Greek. Mr Kennedy travelled overseas to meet Ms Thorne very shortly after meeting her online. He told her that if he liked her then he would marry her but that "you will have to sign paper. My money is for my children" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [33]).

[6] During their courtship phase, Mr Kennedy travelled overseas twice to meet Ms Thorne. He took her on an extended holiday around Europe, during which he met her family. He bought her expensive jewellery. In February 2007, about seven months after Mr Kennedy and Ms Thorne met, they moved to Australia to live in Mr Kennedy's expensive penthouse with the intention of getting married.

[7] The wedding between Ms Thorne and Mr Kennedy was set for 30 September 2007. On 8 August 2007, Mr Kennedy had instructed a solicitor to prepare a pre-nuptial agreement. It is unclear whether Ms Thorne was, at this time, aware of the agreement but she was certainly not aware of its contents. Around 19 September 2007, Mr Kennedy told Ms Thorne that they were going to see solicitors about the signing of an agreement. Ms Thorne asked Mr Kennedy whether he required her to sign the agreement. He replied that if she did not sign it then the wedding would not go ahead. On 20 September 2007, Mr Kennedy took Ms Thorne and her sister to see an independent solicitor, Ms Harrison, who was an accredited family law specialist. Mr Kennedy waited in the car outside. It was during this [92] appointment that Ms Thorne first became aware of the contents of the agreement. By this time, Ms Thorne's parents and sister had been flown to Australia from Eastern Europe and accommodated for the wedding by Mr Kennedy. Guests had been invited to the wedding. Ms Thorne's dress had been made. The wedding reception had been booked.

[8] The day after the meeting, Ms Harrison produced a written advice to Ms Thorne which she subsequently explained to Ms Thorne. There was no dispute that Ms Harrison's advice was accurate. Some of the key features of Ms Harrison's advice were as follows:

(1) The agreement provided for Ms Thorne to receive maintenance during the marriage of the greater of (i) $4,000 per month or (ii) 25% of the net income from the management rights of a proposed development. Ms Harrison observed that the $4,000 per month contained no provision for increase and was a very poor provision from someone in Mr Kennedy's circumstances.

(2) Ms Thorne would be permitted to live rent free in a penthouse located in the proposed development and her family would be permitted to live rent free in a unit located in that development. Ms Harrison noted, however, that Ms Thorne had informed her that the local council had refused planning permission for the proposed development.

(3) If Ms Thorne and Mr Kennedy separated within the first three years of marriage, with or without children, then Ms Thorne would get nothing. The rights described above would also cease.

(4) If Ms Thorne and Mr Kennedy separated after three years, without children, Mr Kennedy would only have an obligation to pay a single lump sum of $50,000 to Ms Thorne. This payment was indexed to the Consumer Price Index if the separation occurred after 1 July 2011. Ms Harrison described this amount as "piteously small".

(5) If Mr Kennedy died while they were living together and while they had not separated then the agreement provided that Ms Thorne would be entitled to (i) a penthouse in the proposed > development or, if that were not possible, a unit she chose in the same city not exceeding a market value of $1.5 million; (ii) 40% of the net income of the management rights of the proposed development or $5,000 per month, indexed annually, whichever was the greater; and (iii) the Mercedes Benz car that was presently in her possession or a replacement vehicle of the same or higher value.

> I believe that you are under significant stress in the lead up to your wedding and that you have been put in a position where you must sign this Agreement regardless of its fairness so that your wedding can go ahead. I also understand from what you have told me that you are longing to have a child and you see your relationship with [Mr Kennedy] as the opportunity to fulfil what may well be a long held desire. I hold significant concerns that you are only signing this Agreement so that your wedding will not be called off. I urge you to reconsider your position as this Agreement is drawn to protect [Mr Kennedy's] interests solely and in no way considers your interests.

[10] On 21 September 2007, the same day that Ms Harrison had produced her written advice, the solicitors for Mr Kennedy wrote to Ms Harrison. The solicitors referred to amendments to the agreement that Ms Harrison had sought which had been incorporated. The solicitors then said that since the wedding was scheduled for 30 September it was Mr Kennedy's preference that the agreement be signed that day, ie on 21 September 2007.

[11] The amendments made to the agreement at Ms Harrison's suggestion were relatively minor amendments concerning the provision for Ms Thorne if Mr Kennedy died while they were married and co-habiting. The provision concerning Ms Thorne's entitlement to a penthouse initially provided for the penthouse to be in the proposed development or in the same city if the development did not proceed. The amendment added the words "or if for any other reason the penthouse cannot be transferred to [Ms Thorne]". The second amendment concerned the mechanics of Mr Kennedy's undertaking to execute a will containing provision for Ms Thorne. The amendment added the words "if necessary a testamentary trust" and it was also provided that Mr Kennedy "will ensure that any further testamentary dispositions are drawn to contain these provisions and [Mr Kennedy] shall not execute any further testamentary dispositions without these provisions". No issue was raised in this proceeding about the enforceability of this provision.

[12] On 24 September 2007, Ms Harrison explained her advice to Ms Thorne. Ms Thorne understood Ms Harrison's oral advice to be that the agreement was the worst agreement that Ms Harrison had ever seen. Ms Harrison's evidence was that the agreement was entirely inappropriate and that she told Ms Thorne that Ms Thorne should not sign it. Although Ms Thorne was advised by Ms Harrison about the effect of the agreement if Mr Kennedy chose to separate from her, Ms Thorne did not even turn her mind to the possibility that Mr Kennedy would separate from her, or the consequences about [94] which she was advised. Ms Thorne also believed that she would never leave Mr Kennedy. Her concerns were focused only upon her rights under the agreement if Mr Kennedy should predecease her.

[13] The first agreement was signed by Ms Thorne on 26 September 2007, four days before her wedding. The agreement contained a recital that within 30 days Mr Kennedy and Ms Thorne would sign another agreement in similar terms.

[14] The terms of the second agreement were substantially identical to the first. On 5 November 2007, Ms Thorne met with Ms Harrison to get advice on the second agreement. As Ms Harrison had done in relation to the first agreement, Ms Harrison again urged Ms Thorne not to sign the second agreement. During this meeting, Ms Thorne received a phone call from Mr Kennedy asking how much longer she was going to be. Ms Harrison gained the impression that Ms Thorne was being pressured to sign the document. Again, Ms Thorne ignored Ms Harrison's advice and signed the second agreement on the same day, 5 November 2007.

[15] On 16 June 2011, slightly less than four years after the marriage, Mr Kennedy signed a separation declaration. Mr Kennedy and Ms Thorne separated, without children, in August 2011. Ms Thorne commenced this proceeding in April 2012. She sought orders, including orders setting aside the two agreements, an adjustment of property order in the amount of $1.1 million, and a lump sum spousal maintenance order of $104,000. Mr Kennedy died in May 2014, during the trial. He was substituted as a party by the executors and trustees of his estate, who were two of his adult children.

The statutory context

[16] In 1929, the House of Lords held that an agreement could not exclude the power of the courts, which had existed since 1857, to make financial adjustment between the parties following the breakdown of a marriage (Hyman v Hyman [1929] AC 601). The agreement might be taken into account when the court quantifies the amount of maintenance but it would not be binding (Hyman v Hyman [1929] AC 601 at 609 per Lord Hailsham LC). Section 87(1)(k) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1959 (Cth) modified that principle by empowering a court to "sanction" pre-nuptial or post-nuptial agreements concerning property distribution or maintenance (Shaw v Shaw (1965) 113 CLR 545; [1965] HCA 39). That Act was repealed and replaced by the Family Law Act, which introduced a regime for registration of certain types of maintenance agreements and a regime for certain other maintenance agreements to be approved by the court.

[95] [17] On 27 December 2000, the Family Law Act was amended to "encourage people to agree about the distribution of their matrimonial property and thus give them greater control over their own affairs, in the event of marital breakdown" (Australia, House of Representatives, Family Law Amendment Bill 2000, Further Revised Explanatory Memorandum at 6). The amendments to the Family Law Act introduced Pt VIIIA, which allows couples to make regulated financial agreements. These agreements include financial agreements before marriage and after marriage, commonly described as pre-nuptial and post-nuptial agreements.

[18] Part VIIIA of the Family Law Act imposes various requirements before a financial agreement will be binding and restrictions upon the content of those agreements. One restriction, in s 90G(1) (the effect of which has since been modified by the insertion of s 90G(1A)), is a requirement that the financial agreement contain a statement from each party that the party was provided with independent legal advice concerning the effect of the agreement on the party's rights and the advantages and disadvantages of making the agreement.

[19] Another restriction upon pre-nuptial and post-nuptial agreements is s 90F, which, by ss 90F(1) and 90F(1A), prohibits the agreement from excluding or limiting the power of a court to make an order in relation to the maintenance of a party if:

> when the agreement came into effect, the circumstances of the party were such that, taking into account the terms and effect of the agreement, the party was unable to support himself or herself without an income tested pension, allowance or benefit.

[20] Despite Ms Thorne's extremely limited personal means, the agreements purported to provide for an "acknowledgement" that Ms Thorne was able to support herself without an income tested pension, allowance or benefit. It seems that this clause was an attempt to oust the operation of s 90F of the Family Law Act. However, no submissions were made about s 90F before the primary judge or before the Full Court. In this Court, it assumed significance only as a matter for contextual construction after it was drawn to the attention of the parties by the Court.

[21] The restriction upon the validity of financial agreements which is central to this appeal is contained in ss 90K and 90KA. Section 90K(1) provides that a court may make an order setting aside a financial agreement if the court is satisfied of matters including, in s 90K(1)(b), "the agreement is void, voidable or unenforceable" and, in s 90K(1)(e), "a party to the agreement engaged in conduct that was, in all the circumstances, unconscionable". Section 90KA then provides, in part, that the question whether a financial agreement is valid, enforceable or [96] effective "is to be determined by the court according to the principles of law and equity that are applicable in determining the validity, enforceability and effect of contracts and purported contracts".

The issues in this case

[22] The issues raised by the notice of appeal in this case concerned whether the Full Court erred in finding error in the primary judge's conclusion that the agreements should be set aside. The only issues were whether the agreements should be set aside because Ms Thorne was subject to any of the vitiating factors of duress, undue influence, or unconscionable conduct in her entry into each of the agreements and whether the reasons of the primary judge were adequate.

[23] At all stages in this litigation it was assumed that each of the vitiating factors applied according to the principles of common law and equity as described in s 90KA. There were no submissions made concerning how the statutory prohibition against unconscionable conduct in s 90K(1)(e) might differ, if at all, from the equitable doctrine concerning unconscionable conduct. Further, although, in written submissions in this Court, Ms Thorne initially appeared to submit that the statutory context of ss 90K and 90KA might somehow have affected these principles, in oral submissions in this Court, counsel for Ms Thorne accepted that the principles were not altered although the particular circumstances of the marital context would be taken into account. This latter point was, properly, common ground.

[24] Two other issues do not arise. First, although the issue of causation was raised in oral argument in this Court, there was no ground of appeal in this Court or in the Full Court which alleged that causation was absent because Ms Thorne would have entered into either agreement in any event. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether, as the oral submission assumed, but for any vitiating factor Ms Thorne would have entered into the agreements in any event (Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Aboody [1990] 1 QB 923 at 970-971. Cf Barton v Armstrong [1976] AC 104 at 120 per Lord Cross of Chelsea; Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 19 NSWLR 40 at 46 per McHugh JA, Samuels and Mahoney JJA agreeing). It can be observed, however, that the failure to raise any ground of appeal alleging an absence of either causation or contribution is unlikely to have been an oversight. Where duress, undue influence, or unconscionable conduct is otherwise shown, an inference of the necessary causation or contribution is readily drawn if the particular transaction cannot reasonably be accounted for by "ordinary motives" (Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch D 145 at 185 per Lindley LJ), as clearly appears from the circumstance that [97] Ms Thorne understood the advice of her solicitor to be that the agreements were the worst that the solicitor had ever seen.

[25] Secondly, this case concerns only the presence of a vitiating factor between parties to an agreement. It is not concerned with the circumstances in which a person can take the benefit of a transaction procured by the duress, undue influence, or unconscionable conduct of a third party. Where the recipient is not a volunteer (Bridgeman v Green (1757) Wilm 58 at 64-65 [97 ER 22 at 25]), the duress, undue influence, or unconscionable conduct of a third party raises additional issues (Bainbrigge v Browne (1881) 18 Ch D 188 at 198-199 per Fry J; Smith v William Charlick Ltd (1924) 34 CLR 38 at 56 per Isaacs J; [1924] HCA 13; Bank of New South Wales v Rogers (1941) 65 CLR 42 at 51-52 per Starke J, 60-61 per McTiernan J, 85 per Williams J; [1941] HCA 9).

Duress, undue influence, and unconscionable conduct

Duress

[26] The vitiating factor of duress focuses upon the effect of a particular type of pressure on the person seeking to set aside the transaction (Westpac Banking Corporation v Cockerill (1998) 152 ALR 267 at 289 per Kiefel J, Lindgren J agreeing). It does not require that the person's will be overborne (Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 19 NSWLR 40 at 45 per McHugh JA, Samuels and Mahoney JJA agreeing; Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland v Lynch [1975] AC 653 at 695). Nor does it require that the pressure be such as to deprive the person of any free agency or ability to decide. The person subjected to duress is usually able to assess alternatives and to make a choice. The person submits to the demand knowing "only too well" what he or she is doing

(Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 19 NSWLR 40 at 45-46 per McHugh JA, Samuels and Mahoney JJA agreeing). As Holmes J said in Union Pacific Railroad Co v Public Service Commission of Missouri 248 US 67 at 70 (1918):

> It always is for the interest of a party under duress to choose the lesser of two evils. But the fact that a choice was made according to interest does not exclude duress. It is the characteristic of duress properly so called.

[27] Historically, the primary constraint upon an action based on duress was the threats that were recognised as sufficient for an action. The early common law rule was that the duress which was necessary to set aside an agreement required an unlawful threat or conduct in relation to the person's body, such as loss of life or limb (Sumner v Ferryman (1708) 11 Mod 201 [88 ER 989]; Skeate v Beale (1841) 11 Ad & E 983 [113 ER 688]; Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, (1765), bk 1, c 1 at 126-127). Even duress in relation to a person's goods was not a basis upon which an agreement [98] could be avoided at common law (Skeate v Beale (1841) 11 Ad & E 983 [113 ER 688]), although it was a basis for restitution of a payment of money (Astley v Reynolds (1731) 2 Str 915 [93 ER 939]). The abandonment of this common law restriction (Occidental Worldwide Investment Corp v Skibs A/S Avanti (The Siboen and The Sibotre) [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep 293) introduced a difficult question. This question is whether duress should be based on any unlawful threat or conduct or, alternatively, whether other illegitimate or improper, yet lawful, threats or conduct might suffice (Beatson, "Duress by Threatened Breach of Contract", (1976) 92 Law Quarterly Review 496 at 497-498). In 1947, Dawson described that question as one "which has chiefly arrested the modern development of the law of duress" (Dawson, "Economic Duress – An Essay in Perspective", (1947) 45 Michigan Law Review 253 at 287).

[28] A significant focus of the submissions by Mr Kennedy's executors was that a conclusion of duress was not open to the primary judge because any pressure exerted by Mr Kennedy upon Ms Thorne did not involve any unlawful threat or conduct. Senior counsel relied upon a decision of the New South Wales Court of Appeal which held, consistently with the older common law cases, that duress at common law requires proof of threatened or actual unlawful conduct (Australia & New Zealand Banking Group v Karam (2005) 64 NSWLR 149 at 168 [66]). He submitted that Ms Thorne had not set out any "justifiable formulation" by which lawful act duress could apply.

[29] It was not necessary for the primary judge to consider common law duress. As will be explained later in these reasons, the sense in which the primary judge in this case described the pressure on Ms Thorne was to focus on Ms Thorne's lack of free choice (in the sense used in undue influence cases) rather than whether Mr Kennedy was the source of all the relevant pressure, or whether the impropriety or illegitimacy of Mr Kennedy's lawful actions might suffice to constitute duress. Nor did this Court receive any substantial submissions concerning when illegitimacy or impropriety might be established for duress at common law including in light of the statutory policy of the Family Law Act and, in that context, how the actions of Mr Kennedy should be characterised. In these circumstances, it is not necessary to address the arguments in favour of or against the conclusion of the New South Wales Court of Appeal that duress at common law requires proof of [99] threatened or actual unlawful conduct (Australia & New Zealand Banking Group v Karam (2005) 64 NSWLR 149 at 168 [66]). Nor is it necessary to consider whether the recognition of lawful act duress adds anything to the doctrine concerned with unconscionable conduct (Compare Bigwood, "Throwing the Baby Out with the Bathwater? Four Questions on the Demise of Lawful-Act Duress in New South Wales", (2008) 27(2) University of Queensland Law Journal 41).

Undue influence

[30] In Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch D 145 (at 183), Lindley LJ said that "no Court has ever attempted to define undue influence". One reason for the difficulty of defining undue influence is that the label "undue influence" has been used to mean different things (Swadling, "Undue Influence: Lessons from America?", in Mitchell and Swadling (eds), The Restatement Third: Restitution and Unjust Enrichment: Critical and Comparative Essays, (2013) 111 at 113). It has been used to include abuse of confidence (Yerkey v Jones (1939) 63 CLR 649 at 675; [1939] HCA 3), misrepresentation (Royal Bank of Scotland plc v Etridge (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 773 at 820 [103] per Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough), and the pressure which amounts to common law duress (Royal Bank of Scotland plc v Etridge (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 773 at 820 [103] per Lord Hobhouse of Woodborough). Each of those concepts is better seen as distinct. Nevertheless, the boundaries, particularly between undue influence and duress, are blurred (Westpac Banking Corporation v Cockerill (1998) 152 ALR 267 at 290 per Kiefel J, Lindgren J agreeing). One reason why there is no clear distinction is that undue influence can arise from widely different sources (Royal Bank of Scotland plc v Etridge (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 773 at 795 [7] per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead), one of which is excessive pressure. Importantly, however, since pressure is only one of the many sources for the influence that one person can have over another, it is not necessary that the pressure which contributes to a conclusion of undue influence be characterised as illegitimate or improper (American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law Third, Restitution and Unjust Enrichment, (2011), §15, comment a; Burrows, A Restatement of the English Law of Contract, (2016) at 201-202, discussing Langton v Langton [1995] 2 FLR 890, Killick v Pountney [2000] WTLR 41, and Daniel v Drew [2005] EWCA Civ 507).

[31] In 1836, in a passage which was copied verbatim by Snell thirty years later (Snell, The Principles of Equity, Intended for the use of Students and the Profession, (1868) at 370), Story said that a person can be subjected to undue influence where the effect of factors such as pressure is that the person "has no [100] free will, but stands in vinculis [in chains]" (Story, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, as Administered in England and America, (1836), vol 1 at 243). He explained that "the constant rule in Equity is, that, where a party is not a free agent, and is not equal to protecting himself, the Court will protect him" (Story, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, as Administered in England and America, (1836), vol 1 at 243). In 1866, this approach was applied in equity by the House of Lords, recognising undue influence in a case of pressure that deprived the plaintiff of "free agency" (Williams v Bayley (1866) LR 1 HL 200 at 215-216 per Lord Chelmsford). In 1868, in probate, Sir James Wilde also described undue influence as arising where a person is not a "free agent" (Hall v Hall (1868) LR 1 P & D 481 at 482). In Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 (at 134; [1936] HCA 41), Dixon J described how undue influence could arise from the "deliberate contrivance" of another (which naturally includes pressure) giving rise to such influence over the mind of the other that the act of the other is not a "free act". And, in Bank of New South Wales v Rogers (1941) 65 CLR 42 at 61, citing Bainbrigge v Browne (1881) 18 Ch D 188 at 196, 197 per Fry J and Yerkey v Jones (1939) 63 CLR 649 (at 677), McTiernan J characterised the absence of undue influence as a "free and well-understood act" and Williams J referred to "the free exercise of the respondent's will" (Bank of New South Wales v Rogers (1941) 65 CLR 42 at 85).

[32] The question whether a person's act is "free" requires consideration of the extent to which the person was constrained in assessing alternatives and deciding between them. Pressure can deprive a person of free choice in this sense where it causes the person substantially to subordinate his or her will to that of the other party (American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law Third, Restitution and Unjust Enrichment, (2011), §15). It is not necessary for a conclusion that a person's free will has been substantially subordinated to find that the party seeking relief was reduced entirely to an automaton or that the person became a "mere channel through which the will of the defendant operated" (Tufton v Sperni [1952] 2 TLR 516 at 530 per Jenkins LJ. See also Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Aboody [1990] 1 QB 923 at 969). Questions of degree are involved. But, at the very least, the judgmental capacity of the party seeking relief must be "markedly sub-standard" (Birks and Chin, "On the Nature of Undue Influence", in Beatson and Friedmann (eds), Good Faith and Fault in Contract Law, (1995) 57 at 67) as a result of the effect upon the person's mind of the will of another.

[33] An example which illustrates the characterisation by a court of a lack of free will sufficient to amount to undue influence is the decision [101] of this Court in Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113. In that case, Mr Buttress was a 67 year old man, who was "wholly illiterate, not very intelligent, and of little or no experience or capacity in business" (Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 at 124). He made a voluntary transfer of land to a relative of his wife. The land was his only property and his only means of livelihood. When he made the transfer he did not understand that he had parted with the land irrevocably. After Mr Buttress died, the administrator of his estate brought an application to set aside the transfer. The trial judge set aside the transfer on the basis of undue influence. This decision was upheld in this Court. Although other members of the Court relied upon a presumption of undue influence, which is considered below, one member of the Court, Starke J, concluded that it was open to the trial judge to find that undue influence arose without any presumption. His Honour upheld the conclusion of the trial judge that the circumstances of the transfer invited the inference that it was "not the result of the free and deliberate judgment of the deceased" (Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 at 126).

[34] There are different ways to prove the existence of undue influence. One method of proof is by direct evidence of the circumstances of the particular transaction. That was the approach relied upon by the primary judge in this case. Another way in which undue influence can be proved is by presumption. This presumption was relied upon by Ms Thorne in this Court as an alternative. A presumption, in the sense used here, arises where common experience is that the existence of one fact means that another fact also exists (Calverley v Green (1984) 155 CLR 242 at 264 per Murphy J; [1984] HCA 81). Common experience gives rise to a presumption that a transaction was not the exercise of a person's free will if (i) the person is proved to be in a particular relationship, and (ii) the transaction is one, commonly involving a "substantial benefit" (Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 at 134 per Dixon J) to another, which cannot be explained by "ordinary motives" (Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch D 145 at 185 per Lindley LJ), or "is not readily explicable by the relationship of the parties" (Royal Bank of Scotland plc v Etridge (No 2) [2002] 2 AC 773 at 798 [21] per Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead). Although the classes are not closed, in Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 (at 119. See also Bank of New South Wales v Rogers (1941) 65 CLR 42 at 51 per Starke J). Latham CJ described the relationships that could give rise to the presumption as including parent and child, guardian and ward, trustee and beneficiary, solicitor and client, physician and patient, and cases of religious influence. Outside [102] recognised categories, the presumption can also be raised by proof that the history of the particular relationship involved one party occupying a similar position of ascendency or influence, and the other a corresponding position of dependency or trust (Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 at 134-135 per Dixon J). In either case, the presumption is rebuttable by the other party proving that the particular transaction or transfer, in its particular circumstances, was nevertheless the result of the weaker party's free will (Spong v Spong (1914) 18 CLR 544 at 549 per Griffith CJ; [1914] HCA 52; Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 at 123 per Latham CJ).

[35] Ms Thorne submitted that she was entitled to the benefit of a presumption of undue influence because the relationship of fiancé and fiancée should be recognised as one to which the presumption attaches. This submission was concerned with a presumption of undue influence (that a transaction was the result of a lack of free will) and not with the different doctrine concerning the possibility of an abuse of confidence in any relationship of intimacy (Garcia v National Australia Bank Ltd (1998) 194 CLR 395; [1998] HCA 48). The submission should not be accepted.

[36] Although the relationship of fiancé and fiancée was first seen as falling within the recognised categories by Lord Langdale MR in 1848 (Page v Horne (1848) 11 Beav 227 at 235 [50 ER 804 at 807]), and although it was also recognised in this Court by Dixon J in 1936 (Johnson v Buttress (1936) 56 CLR 113 at 134) and 1939 (Yerkey v Jones (1939) 63 CLR 649 at 675), in 1961 in England Lord Evershed MR refused to apply the established presumption, saying that "this is 1961 and what might have been said of the position, independence, and the like, of women in 1848 would have to be seriously qualified to-day" (Zamet v Hyman [1961] 1 WLR 1442 at 1446; [1961] 3 All ER 933 at 937-938). In 1992 in Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621 (at 630; [1992] HCA) Brennan J observed that it "may no longer be right to presume that a substantial gift made by a woman to her fiancé has been procured by undue influence". Common experience today of the wide variety of circumstances in which two people can become engaged to marry negates any conclusion that a relationship of fiancé and fiancée should give rise to a presumption that either person substantially subordinates his or her free will to the other.

Unconscionable conduct

[37] There was no controversy on this appeal concerning the principles of unconscionable conduct in equity. Those principles were recently restated by this Court in Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd (2013) 250 CLR 392; [2013] HCA 25.

[103] [38] A conclusion of unconscionable conduct requires the innocent party to be subject to a special disadvantage "which seriously affects the ability of the innocent party to make a judgment as to [the innocent party's] own best interests" (Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 462 per Mason J). The other party must also unconscientiously take advantage of that special disadvantage (Cory v Cory (1747) 1 Ves Sen 19 [27 ER 864]; Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 462; Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 398 [6]). This has been variously described as requiring "victimisation" (Hart v O'Connor [1985] AC 1000 at 1028; Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621 at 638; Bridgewater v Leahy (1998) 194 CLR 457 at 479 [76]; [1998] HCA 66; Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 401 [18], 402 [22], 403 [26], 439-440 [161]), "unconscientious conduct" (Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 461 per Mason J, 474 per Deane J; Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v C G Berbatis Holdings Pty Ltd (2003) 214 CLR 51 at 64 [15]; [2003] HCA 18), or "exploitation" (Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621 at 626; Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v C G Berbatis Holdings Pty Ltd (2003) 214 CLR 51 at 63 [9], 64 [14]; Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 439-440 [161]). Before there can be a finding of unconscientious taking of advantage, it is also generally necessary that the other party knew or ought to have known of the existence and effect of the special disadvantage (Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 462 per Mason J).

[39] In Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 (at 474), Deane J said that the equitable principles concerning relief against unconscionable conduct are closely related to those concerned with undue influence. The same circumstances can result in the conclusion that the person seeking relief (i) has been subject to undue influence, and (ii) is in a position of special disadvantage for the purposes of the doctrine concerned with unconscionable conduct. For instance, in Diprose v Louth (No 1) (1990) 54 SASR 438 (at 448-449), the trial judge, King CJ, observed that both doctrines were satisfied where the defendant "was in a position of emotional dominance which gave her an influence over the [plaintiff] which she exercised unconscientiously to procure the gift of the house". Before the High Court in that case, Mr Diprose relied only upon the ground of unconscionable conduct.

[40] Although undue influence and unconscionable conduct will overlap, they have distinct spheres of operation. One difference is that although one way in which the element of special disadvantage for a finding of [104] unconscionable conduct can be established is by a finding of undue influence, there are many other circumstances that can amount to a special disadvantage which would not establish undue influence. A further difference between the doctrines is that although undue influence cases will often arise from the assertion of pressure by the other party which might amount to victimisation or exploitation, this is not always required. In Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 (at 461), Mason J emphasised the difference between unconscionable conduct and undue influence as follows:

> In the latter the will of the innocent party is not independent and voluntary because it is overborne. In the former the will of the innocent party, even if independent and voluntary, is the result of the disadvantageous position in which he is placed and of the other party unconscientiously taking advantage of that position.

The proper appellate approach to findings concerning vitiating factors

[41] In any case where a transaction is sought to be impugned by the operation of vitiating factors such as duress, undue influence, or unconscionable conduct, it is necessary for a trial judge to conduct a "close consideration of the facts … in order to determine whether a claim to relief has been established" (Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 400 [14]). On appeal, it is also essential for the appellate court to scrutinise the trial judge's findings and assess any challenge to the trial judge's conclusions in light of the advantages enjoyed by that judge.

[42] In Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd (2013) 250 CLR 392 (at 434-435 [144]), quoting with approval from the judgment of Dawson, Gaudron and McHugh JJ in Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621 (at 639-641), this Court described how the "proof of the interplay of a dominant and subordinate position in a personal relationship depends, 'in large part, on inferences drawn from other facts and on an assessment of the character of each of the parties' ". As Rich J said, in the context of a claim to set aside a transaction, the advantage of the trial judge "of seeing the parties and estimating their characters and capacities is immeasurable" (Wilton v Farnworth (1948) 76 CLR 646 at 654, Dixon J agreeing; [1948] HCA 20). These matters led Toohey J, in Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621 (at 649-650), to say that the "formidable obstacles" involved in an attack on findings of fact by a trial judge "may be enhanced where issues of undue influence and unconscionability are involved".

[105] [43] Related to the fact finding advantage of the trial judge is the evaluative nature of the judgment involved in determining whether the vitiating factors have been established. For example, in undue influence there will be questions of evaluative judgment involved in assessing whether the extent to which a person's will has been subordinated to another's is sufficient to characterise the person as lacking free will. The same evaluative exercise was described by this Court in Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd (2013) 250 CLR 392 (at 426 [122]. See also at 401 [18]) in relation to unconscionable conduct, quoting from Dixon CJ, McTiernan and Kitto JJ in a passage from Jenyns v Public Curator (Q) (1953) 90 CLR 113 at 118-119; [1953] HCA 2 which emphasised how the application of these equitable principles:

> calls for a precise examination of the particular facts, a scrutiny of the exact relations established between the parties and a consideration of the mental capacities, processes and idiosyncrasies of the [other party]. Such cases do not depend upon legal categories susceptible of clear definition and giving rise to definite issues of fact readily formulated which, when found, automatically determine the validity of the disposition. Indeed no better illustration could be found of Lord Stowell's generalisation concerning the administration of equity: 'A court of law works its way to short issues, and confines its views to them. A court of equity takes a more comprehensive view, and looks to every connected circumstance that ought to influence its determination upon the real justice of the case'.

The primary judge's decision

[44] The primary judge posed the hypothetical question of why Ms Thorne would sign an agreement when she understood the advice of her solicitor to be that the agreement was the worst that the solicitor had ever seen (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [85]). The primary judge also asked why, despite the advice of her solicitor, Ms Thorne failed to conceive of the notion that Mr Kennedy might end the marriage. The primary judge found that the answer to these questions did not lie in Ms Thorne's lack of proficiency in English. Instead, the primary judge attributed Ms Thorne's beliefs and actions to matters of duress or undue influence.

[45] The primary judge described duress as "a form of unconscionable conduct" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [68]). This description was not subsuming the vitiating factor of duress within the doctrine of unconscionable transactions, which would require a finding of special disadvantage and an unconscientious [106] taking advantage of that special disadvantage. Her Honour was using "unconscionable" in the sense described by Gaudron, McHugh, Gummow and Hayne JJ in Garcia v National Australia Bank Ltd (1998) 194 CLR 395 (at 409 [34]) as "to characterise the result rather than to identify the reasoning that leads to the application of that description".

[46] The critical findings of the primary judge concerning duress and undue influence were based primarily upon Ms Thorne's evidence. Although the primary judge described Mr Kennedy's evidence as having "many difficulties" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [23]), she had no such concerns about Ms Thorne's evidence. The primary judge concluded that Ms Thorne was powerless to make any decision other than to sign the first agreement. The primary judge referred to an inequality of bargaining power and a lack of any outcome for Ms Thorne that was "fair or reasonable" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [94]). However, her Honour also explained that Ms Thorne's situation was "much more than inequality of financial position" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [93]).

[47] The primary judge set out six matters which, in combination, led her to the conclusion that Ms Thorne had "no choice" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [97]) or was powerless (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [93]): (i) her lack of financial equality with Mr Kennedy; (ii) her lack of permanent status in Australia at the time; (iii) her reliance on Mr Kennedy for all things; (iv) her emotional connectedness to their relationship and the prospect of motherhood; (v) her emotional preparation for marriage; and (vi) the "publicness" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [93]) of her upcoming marriage. These six matters were the basis for the vivid description by the primary judge of Ms Thorne's circumstances (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [91]-[92]):

> She was in Australia only in furtherance of their relationship. She had left behind her life and minimal possessions … She brought no assets of substance to the relationship. If the relationship ended, she would have nothing. No job, no visa, no home, no place, no community. The consequences of the relationship being at an end would have significant and serious consequences to Ms Thorne. She would not be entitled to remain in Australia and she had nothing to return to anywhere else in the world.
> [107] Every bargaining chip and every power was in Mr Kennedy's hands. Either the document, as it was, was signed, or the relationship was at an end. The husband made that clear.

[48] As to the second agreement, the primary judge held that it was "simply a continuation of the first – the marriage would be at an end before it was begun if it wasn't signed" (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [96]). In effect, her Honour's conclusion was that the same matters which vitiated the first agreement, with the exception of the time pressure caused by the impending wedding (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [95]), also vitiated the second agreement.

The Full Court's decision

[49] The approach taken by the parties on appeal was to raise so many grounds of appeal that the essential point of the appeal – whether a vitiating factor had been established – was concealed. The Full Court was confronted with 13 grounds of appeal and a notice of contention with eight grounds. As the Full Court held, many of those grounds went nowhere or had no merit. For instance, Mr Kennedy's executors and trustees challenged many of the findings of fact by the primary judge despite there being a solid foundation for all of those findings. With one exception, discussed below, each of those challenges properly failed.

[50] However, the Full Court upheld the grounds of appeal in two respects. First, the Full Court held that the primary judge's reasons were inadequate because in the list of six matters relied upon by the primary judge, it was not possible to determine which of the factors were fundamental, and which were subsidiary, to the decision concerning either the first or the second agreement. The Full Court considered that the lack of financial equality might have been determinative, although "a finding of financial inequality could never provide a reasoned basis for duress" (Kennedy & Thorne (2016) FLC ¶93-737 at 81,807 [62]).

[51] Secondly, relying upon the decision of the New South Wales Court of Appeal in Australia & New Zealand Banking Group v Karam (2005) 64 NSWLR 149 (at 168 [66]), the Full Court held that the primary judge had erred in the test for duress which she had applied (Kennedy & Thorne (2016) FLC ¶93-737 at 81,809 [71]). The Full Court held that duress required threatened or actual unlawful conduct but that the primary judge had not concluded that the pressure was "illegitimate" or "unlawful" (Kennedy & Thorne (2016) FLC ¶93-737 at 81,809 [71]). The Full Court also overturned the finding by the primary judge, which had been a factor in her assessment that the [108] agreements were vitiated, that there was no outcome available to Ms Thorne that was fair or reasonable. In effect, the Full Court considered the agreements to be fair and reasonable because (i) Mr Kennedy had told Ms Thorne at the outset of their relationship, and she had accepted, that his wealth was intended for his children, and (ii) Ms Thorne's interest, which was provided for in the agreements, concerned only the provision that would be made for her in the event Mr Kennedy predeceased her.

[52] The Full Court also dismissed a notice of contention by Ms Thorne which, amongst other matters, sought to uphold the primary judge's conclusions on the basis that the agreements were vitiated by either undue influence or unconscionable conduct.

[53] The Full Court held that Ms Thorne could not have been subject to undue influence because she acquiesced in Mr Kennedy's desire to protect his assets for his children and because she had no concern about what she would receive on separation (Kennedy & Thorne (2016) FLC ¶93-737 at 81,817 [132]-[134]). The Full Court held that Mr Kennedy's conduct was not unconscionable because he did not take advantage of Ms Thorne. The Full Court referred to: (i) its findings of the lack of any misrepresentation by Mr Kennedy about his financial position; (ii) Mr Kennedy's early statements to Ms Thorne that made clear that she would not receive any part of his wealth on separation; (iii) Ms Thorne's staunch belief that Mr Kennedy would never leave her and her lack of concern about her financial position while Mr Kennedy was alive; and (iv) Mr Kennedy's acceptance of handwritten amendments to the agreements that were made by Ms Thorne's solicitor (Kennedy & Thorne (2016) FLC ¶93-737 at 81,815-81,816 [111]-[122], 81,817-81,818 [138]-[139]).

The agreements were vitiated by undue influence

[54] Any assessment of whether the agreements were vitiated by undue influence must begin by consideration of the findings of the primary judge, with due regard for the advantages enjoyed by the primary judge and the evaluative exercise involved in the primary judge's consideration.

[55] With one exception, none of the findings of fact by the primary judge was overturned by the Full Court. That exception was the Full Court's rejection of the primary judge's finding that there was no outcome available to Ms Thorne that was fair or reasonable. The Full Court erred in rejecting this finding. It was open to the primary judge to conclude that Mr Kennedy, as Ms Thorne knew, was not prepared to amend the agreement other than in minor respects. Further, the [109] description of the agreements by the primary judge as not being "fair or reasonable" was not merely open to her. It was an understatement. Ms Harrison's unchallenged evidence was that the terms of the agreements were "entirely inappropriate" and wholly inadequate "[i]n relation to everything". She said that the agreements did not show any consideration for Ms Thorne's interests. Even without Ms Harrison's evidence, it is plain that some of the provisions of the agreements could not have operated more adversely to Ms Thorne. For instance, the agreements purported to have the effect that if Ms Thorne and Mr Kennedy separated within three years then Ms Thorne was not entitled to anything at all.

[56] The primary judge was correct to consider the unfair and unreasonable terms of the pre-nuptial agreement and the post-nuptial agreement as matters relevant to her consideration of whether the agreements were vitiated. Of course, the nature of agreements of this type means that their terms will usually be more favourable, and sometimes much more favourable, for one party. However, despite the usual financial imbalance in agreements of that nature, it can be an indicium of undue influence if a pre-nuptial or post-nuptial agreement is signed despite being known to be grossly unreasonable even for agreements of this nature. In other words, what the Full Court rightly recognised as the significant gap between Ms Thorne's understanding of Ms Harrison's strong advice not to sign the "entirely inappropriate" agreement and Ms Thorne's actions in signing the agreement was capable of being a circumstance relevant to whether an inference should be drawn of undue influence.

[57] The Full Court also mischaracterised the effect of the primary judge's reasons. As explained above, the primary judge found that Ms Thorne was "powerless" and that Ms Thorne believed that she had "no choice" to do anything other than sign the agreements as presented. The primary judge's finding was, in effect, that Ms Thorne was deprived of the ability to bring a free choice to the decision as to whether to sign the agreements. Ms Thorne's choices about entering the agreements on Mr Kennedy's terms were subordinated to the will of Mr Kennedy. Despite the strong advice from Ms Harrison, Ms Thorne accepted the terms of the agreements in part due to her "reliance on Mr Kennedy for all things". Although the primary judge described her conclusion as one of "duress", for the reasons explained above her conclusion is more aptly described as one of undue influence. It was, therefore, unnecessary for the primary judge to assess the extent to which the pressure upon Ms Thorne came from Mr Kennedy as might be required for the doctrine of duress. It was also unnecessary for the primary judge to consider whether, for the purposes of the doctrine of duress, the pressure that Mr Kennedy [110] exerted upon Ms Thorne was improper or illegitimate. These are matters within the domain of duress rather than undue influence. Contrary to the reasoning of the Full Court, the failure of the primary judge to reach these conclusions was not an error.

[58] Mr Kennedy's executors also relied upon the Full Court's reasoning that the primary judge had based her conclusion only upon an inequality of bargaining power. That submission cannot be accepted. Contrary to the reasoning of the Full Court, the primary judge carefully set out the six factors which, together with the lack of a fair or reasonable outcome, led her to the conclusion that Ms Thorne had no choice but to enter the agreements (Thorne & Kennedy [2015] FCCA 484 at [97]).

[59] The primary judge's conclusions were open to her on the evidence. Each of the factors which the primary judge considered was a relevant circumstance in the overall evaluation of whether Ms Thorne had been the subject of undue influence in her entry into the agreements. In combination, it was open to the primary judge to conclude that Ms Thorne considered that she had no choice or was powerless other than to enter the agreements. In other words, the extent to which she was unable to make "clear, calm or rational decisions" (NA v MA [2007] 1 FLR 1760 at 1785 [114] per Baron J) was so significant that she could not aptly be described as a free agent. In the Restatement of the Law Third, Restitution and Unjust Enrichment (American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law Third, Restitution and Unjust Enrichment, (2011), §15, comment c), the Reporter said that:

> Circumstances universally relevant to the proof of undue influence include the relation of the parties; the nature and terms of the transfer in question; the susceptibility of the transferor to the influence of the other; the opportunity of the other to exert undue influence; and the extent to which the transferor acted on the basis of independent advice.

[60] In the particular context of pre-nuptial and post-nuptial agreements, some of the factors which may have prominence include the following: (i) whether the agreement was offered on a basis that it was not subject to negotiation; (ii) the emotional circumstances in which the agreement was entered including any explicit or implicit threat to end a marriage or to end an engagement (Thompson, Prenuptial Agreements and the Presumption of Free Choice: Issues of Power in Theory and Practice, (2015) at 115); (iii) whether there was any time for careful reflection; (iv) the nature of the parties' relationship; (v) the [111] relative financial positions of the parties; and (vi) the independent advice that was received and whether there was time to reflect on that advice.

The primary judge's reasons were not inadequate

[61] As French CJ and Kiefel J said in Wainohu v New South Wales (2011) 243 CLR 181 at 213 [54]; [2011] HCA 24, "[t]he centrality, to the judicial function, of a public explanation of reasons for final decisions and important interlocutory rulings has long been recognised". The content of that judicial duty to give adequate reasons will depend upon the circumstances of the matter being considered. Importantly, it is not necessarily the case that reasons be lengthy or elaborate in order to be adequate (Beale v Government Insurance Office of NSW (1997) 48 NSWLR 430 at 443 per Meagher JA).

[62] The reasons given by the primary judge for her conclusion of undue influence were not inadequate. Those reasons assessed, evaluated, and characterised all of the circumstances before reaching the conclusion that Ms Thorne was powerless and believed that she had no choice to do anything other than sign the agreements. Contrary to the reasoning of the Full Court, an assessment of whether undue influence arises in the circumstances does not require, and may not even permit, a trial judge to assign some weight to each of the factors upon which the trial judge relies. Nor is a trial judge necessarily required to identify which factors are fundamental and which are subsidiary. An assessment of the will-power of a person is not an exercise of mathematical precision. Further, as was the case here, the factors which lead to a conclusion of undue influence might not be independent of each other. That was likely to be the case in relation to the six matters relied upon by the primary judge. For instance, Ms Thorne's "lack of financial equality" with Mr Kennedy and her "lack of permanent status in Australia" would likely have contributed to her "reliance on Mr Kennedy for all things" and may have affected her "emotional connectedness to their relationship and the prospect of motherhood" or "her emotional preparation for marriage".

The agreements were also vitiated by unconscionable conduct

[63] This appeal should be allowed on the basis that the Full Court erred in concluding that the primary judge's reasons were not adequate and erred in overturning the primary judge's conclusion that, in effect, Ms Thorne was subject to undue influence. As we have explained, it is not necessary to consider the operation of the vitiating factor of duress. This is particularly so in the absence of any detailed argument about the operation of a criterion for duress that the conduct of the dominant [112] party is improper or illegitimate, and the absence of any findings by the primary judge or the Full Court on these matters. In contrast, the issues concerning unconscionable conduct were fully argued. For the reasons which follow, the Full Court also erred in its conclusion that Ms Thorne's entry into the agreements was not procured by unconscionable conduct.

[64] The Full Court recognised that Ms Thorne was labouring under a disadvantage (Kennedy & Thorne (2016) FLC ¶93-737 at 81,817 [138]), although the Court did not add the adjective "special", which, as Mason J in Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 (at 462) explained, is used to emphasise that the disadvantage is not a mere difference in the bargaining power but requires an inability for a person to make a judgment as to his or her own best interests. The findings by the primary judge that Ms Thorne was subject to undue influence – powerless, with what she saw as no choice but to enter the agreements – point inevitably to the conclusion that she was subject to a special disadvantage in her entry into the agreements.

[65] Ms Thorne's special disadvantage was known to Mr Kennedy. Her special disadvantage had been, in part, created by him. He created the urgency with which the pre-nuptial agreement was required to be signed and the haste surrounding the post-nuptial agreement and the advice upon it. While Ms Thorne knew Mr Kennedy required her acknowledgement that his death would not result in her receiving a windfall inheritance at the expense of his children, she had no reason to anticipate an intention on his part to insist upon terms of marriage that were as unreasonable as those contained in the agreements. Further, Ms Thorne and her family members had been brought to Australia for the wedding by Mr Kennedy and his ultimatum was not accompanied by any offer to assist them to return home. These matters increased the pressure which contributed to the substantial subordination of Ms Thorne's free will in relation to the agreements. Mr Kennedy took advantage of Ms Thorne's vulnerability to obtain agreements which, on Ms Harrison's uncontested assessment, were entirely inappropriate and wholly inadequate. Even within that class of agreement, the agreements which Ms Thorne signed involved "gross inequality" (Gartside v Isherwood (1778) 1 Bro CC 558 at 560-561 per Lord Thurlow LC [28 ER 1297 at 1298]).

Conclusion

[66] For these reasons, the appeal should be allowed. In the Full Court there was also a ground of appeal that the primary judge had failed to afford procedural fairness to Mr Kennedy's executors before making [113] orders for costs against his estate (Kennedy & Thorne (2016) FLC ¶93-737 at 81,811 [85]). That ground was conceded by Ms Thorne, although she argued that costs would follow in any event if the agreements were rescinded. Since Mr Kennedy's executors were successful in the Full Court, the costs orders of the primary judge were set aside. In this Court, Mr Kennedy's executors did not submit that the primary judge's costs orders should be disturbed if the appeal were allowed and the orders of the Full Court set aside.

[NETTLE J agreed with the orders proposed by the plurality. GORDON JJ held that the agreements had been procured by unconscionable conduct but not undue influence.]

(1) Appeal allowed.

(2) Set aside the orders of the Full Court of the Family Court of Australia made on 26 September 2016 and, in their place, order that the appeal to that Court be dismissed with costs.

(3) The respondent pay the appellant's costs of the appeal to this Court.

BACKGROUND

[36.05] The equitable doctrine of unconscionable dealing "looks to the conduct of [the defendant] in attempting to enforce, or retain the benefit of, a dealing with a person under a special disability [the plaintiff] in circumstances where it is not consistent with equity or good conscience that he should do so": Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio [1983] HCA 14; (1983) 151 CLR 447, 474 (Deane J). Unconscionable dealing protects against the "exploitation by one party of another's position of special disadvantage": Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio [1983] HCA 14; (1983) 151 CLR 447, 489 (Dawson J); Blomley v Ryan (1956) 99 CLR 362, 415 (Kitto J). On unconscionable dealing, see also Thorne v Kennedy [2017] HCA 49; (2017) 263 CLR 85, at [35.20] and Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2019] HCA 18 at [38.50].

The courts originally developed the doctrine to protect "expectant heirs" (ie, persons who expected to succeed to property on the death of another). The courts then also gave relief against contracts characterised by exorbitant terms entered into by impecunious, sick, weak-minded or inexperienced persons who lacked the advantage of independent advice.

In Fry v Lane (1888) 40 Ch D 312, 322, Kay J said:

> The result of the decisions is that where a purchase is made from a poor and ignorant man at a considerable undervalue, the vendor having no independent advice, a court of equity will set aside the transaction … The circumstances of poverty and ignorance of the vendor, and absence of independent advice, throw upon the purchaser, when the transaction is impeached, the onus of proving, in Lord Selborne's words, that the purchase was "fair, just, and reasonable".

The main remedy available in cases of unconscionable dealing is rescission. This form of relief, and the bars to it, are considered in more detail in Chapter 39.

SCOPE OF THE DOCTRINE

Blomley v Ryan

[36.10] Blomley v Ryan (1956) 99 CLR 362 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from Taylor J.

[FACTS: The plaintiff, Blomley, a resident of Queensland, brought an action in the original jurisdiction of the High Court seeking specific performance or, alternatively, damages, in respect of a written contract made on 21 April 1953 in which the defendant/respondent, Ryan, a resident of New South Wales, agreed to sell to the plaintiff a grazing property for £25,000. The defendant at the time of making the contract was aged 78 years. He alleged that at the time of signing the contract and the time of the negotiations preceding it he was, to the knowledge of the plaintiff, "an old man, lacking in education, suffering from the effects of intoxication, mentally and physically weak, without proper advice, unable to protect himself and on unequal terms with the plaintiff", and that the plaintiff had acted with undue haste and procured the agreement at a great undervalue and upon terms highly favourable to the plaintiff. The defendant's defences were that the agreement was voidable because he had lacked the requisite contractual capacity, and alternatively that the court in its discretion should not decree specific performance. The defendant also counterclaimed to have the contract set aside.

Taylor J who heard the action found:

1. that over a number of years the defendant had engaged in heavy drinking bouts and that the contract was signed during the period over which one of these drinking bouts extended;
2. that on 20 April, when the contract was negotiated, the defendant's condition was such that he was incapable of considering the question of the sale with any real degree of intelligent appreciation of the matters involved and that this must have been reasonably apparent to those who acted on behalf of the plaintiff. Indeed a colleague of the defendant brought a bottle of rum to the negotiations to share with the already inebriated defendant;
3. that at the time of his signing the contract on 21 April the defendant was capable of understanding the general purport of the instrument, but his participation in the transaction was not accompanied by any reasonably intelligent consent to it;
4. that the defendant's failing mental equipment left him at a distinct disadvantage in negotiating; and
5. that the sale was at an undervalue of some £8,000 or £9,000.

Taylor J dismissed the plaintiff's claim and decreed rescission of the contract upon the counterclaim. The plaintiff appealed to the Full Court.]

FULLAGAR J [stated the nature of the proceedings and continued]: [401] The case is not one of that comparatively rare class where a man's faculties, whether from age or natural infirmity or drink or any other cause, are so defective that he does not really know what he is doing – that his mind does not go with his deed. In such a case his instrument is void even at law – non est factum. Nor is it a case like Gore v Gibson (1845) 13 M & W 623; 153 ER 260, as to which see Gibbons v Wright (1954) 91 CLR 423 at 441–3. It is a case, I think, in which relief could be obtained by the defendant, if at all, only in equity. And, when we look for the principle on which equity did grant relief in such cases, we find as so often in equity, only very wide general expressions to guide us. There was, I think, a typical difference in approach between equity and the common law. To the common law the transaction in question might be void or voidable, but the primary question was as to the reality of the assent of the persons resisting enforcement of the contract. Equity traditionally looked at the matter rather from the point of view of the party seeking to enforce the contract [402] and was minded to inquire whether, having regard to all the circumstances, it was consistent with equity and good conscience that he should be allowed to enforce it.

[His Honour then examined a number of cases.]

[404] The real effect of the cases on the subject was, I think, stated by Sir William Grant MR in Cooke v Clayworth (1811) 18 Ves Jun 12; 34 ER 222, in a passage which has been quoted in several later cases. The Master of the Rolls said:

> I think, a court of equity ought not to give its assistance to a person, who has obtained an agreement, or deed, from another in a state of intoxication; and on the other hand ought not to assist a person to get rid of any agreement, or deed, merely upon the ground of his having been intoxicated at the time: Dunnage v White (1818) 1 Swans 137; 36 ER 329. I say merely upon that ground; as, if there was, as Lord Hardwicke expresses it in Cory v Cory (1747) 1 Ves Sen 19; 27 ER 864, any unfair advantage made of his situation, or as Sir Joseph Jekyll says in Johnson v Dedlicott

> (1731) 3 P Wms 131; 24 ER 998, any contrivance or management to draw him into drink, he might be a proper object of relief in a court of equity. As to that extreme state of intoxication, that deprives a man of his reason, I apprehend, that even at law it would invalidate a deed, obtained from him while in that condition: (1811) 18 Ves Jun 15, 16; 34 ER 223.

This statement of equitable principle was referred to and acted upon in Nagle v Baylor (1842) 3 Dr & W 60 (where gross inadequacy of consideration was alleged but not proved), in the case … of Shaw v Thackery (1853) 17 Jur 1045; 65 ER 235 and in Wiltshire v Marshall (1866) 14 LT (NS) 396. In the first of these cases specific performance was decreed. In the second a bill to set aside was dismissed. The third is the only reported case I have succeeded in finding in which a transaction has actually been set aside by a court of equity on the ground that one party was intoxicated but not so far intoxicated as to make his deed void even at law. Sir William Page Wood VC put the principle on which he acted in this way. He said:

> And now, having shortly considered what is the state of the law upon this subject, the first thing I have to do is … to determine … whether it was so entered into as to display absence of judgment in the person making it, and a degree of unfairness in the person accepting it: (1866) 14 LT (NS) 397.

The authorities which I have cited show, I think, that, when a court of equity is asked to refuse specific performance of, or to set aside, a contract at the instance of a party who says that he was drunk at the time of making it, the principles applied do not differ in substance from those applied in such cases as Clark v Malpas (1862) 31 Beav 80; 54 ER 1067; 4 De GF & J 401; 45 ER 1238; [405] Fry v Lane (1888) 40 Ch D 312; and the other cases cited by Taylor J. But they show also that cases in which an allegation of intoxication is a main feature are approached with great caution by courts of equity. That is, I think, not so much because intoxication is a self-induced state and a reprehensible thing, but rather because it would be dangerous to lend any countenance to the view that a man could escape the obligation of a contract by simply proving that he was "in liquor" when it was made. So we find it said again and again that mere drunkenness affords no ground for resisting a suit to enforce a contract. Where, however, there is real ground for thinking that the judgment of one party was, to the knowledge of the other, seriously affected by drink, equity will generally refuse specific performance at the suit of that other, leaving him to pursue a remedy at law if he so desires. And, where the court is satisfied that a contract disadvantageous to the party affected has been obtained by "drawing him in to drink", or that there has been real unfairness in taking advantage of his condition, the contract may be set aside.

One other general observation may be made before proceeding to the facts of the present case. The circumstances adversely affecting a party, which may induce a court of equity either to refuse its aid or to set a transaction aside, are of great variety and can hardly be satisfactorily classified. Among them are poverty or need of any kind, sickness, age, sex, infirmity of body or mind, drunkenness, illiteracy or lack of education, lack of assistance or explanation where assistance or explanation is necessary. The common characteristic seems to be that they have the effect of placing one party at a serious disadvantage vis-á-vis the other. It does not appear to be essential in all cases that the party at a disadvantage should suffer loss or detriment by the bargain. In Cooke v Clayworth (1811) 18 Ves Jun 12; 34 ER 222, in which specific performance was refused, it does not appear that there was anything actually unfair in the terms of the transaction itself. But inadequacy of consideration, while never of itself a ground for resisting enforcement, will often be a specially important element in cases of this type. It may be important in either or both of two ways; firstly, as supporting the inference that a position of disadvantage existed, and secondly, as tending to show that an unfair use was made of the occasion. While, as here, intoxication is the main element relied upon as creating the position of disadvantage, the question of adequacy or inadequacy of consideration is, I think, likely to be a matter of major, and perhaps decisive, importance. It will almost always, [406] I think, be "an important ingredient in considering whether a person did exercise any degree of judgment in making a contract, or whether there is a degree of unfairness in accepting the contract": Wiltshire v Marshall (1866) 14 LT 396 at 397 per Page Wood VC.

In the present case it is impossible to doubt that the defendant sold his station property, "Worrah", at a gross undervalue …

But the wide discrepancy between price and value is not the only interesting feature of this transaction. There are two others. In the first place, the deposit on a contract of sale for £25 000 was £5. In the second place, the sale was on terms, which provided for payment of the price over a period of more than four years, and the rate of interest on unpaid purchase money was 4 per cent. The bank rate of interest current at the time was 5 per cent. It may be said that the deposit was a matter of small practical importance, but the only thing that can save it from being justly [407] described as ridiculous is the fact that a purchaser at so very low a price would be likely to move heaven and earth rather than default. It is obviously an additional abnormal element in the transaction itself, as is also, of course, the low rate of interest payable under the contract. The rate of interest was an important matter, because the defendant was proposing to "retire", and presumably to live on the interest of his capital.

The learned trial judge found the explanation of this remarkable transaction in the facts that the defendant was an old man, whose health and faculties had been impaired by habitual drinking to excess over a long period, who was at the material time in the middle of a prolonged bout of heavy drinking of rum, and who was utterly incapable of forming a rational judgment about the terms of any business transaction. Having carefully read and considered the evidence, I agree with this view. His Honour also held that the defendant's condition must have been patent to the plaintiff's father, who acted as the plaintiff's agent, and to Stemm, who acted (ostensibly) as the defendant's agent, and that these persons took such an unfair advantage of that condition that a court of equity could not allow the contract to stand. I agreed with this view also …

The plaintiff himself, who is a young man, took little or no part in the proceedings at any stage: the negotiations were conducted by his father. Stemm, an employer of Dalgety … Co Ltd, acted as "agent" for the sale of the property. Ostensibly he was acting in that capacity for the defendant, to whom his firm would look for their commission. But it is obvious that he was, so to speak, "in the plaintiff's camp" throughout; his concern was simply to procure a sale, and nothing seems to have been further from his mind than the idea that it was his duty to obtain the best price he could for the defendant, and generally to look after the defendant's interests …

[409] His Honour expressed his general finding by saying that the defendant's condition was such that: "he was incapable of considering the question of the sale of his property with any real degree of intelligent appreciation of the matters involved": (1955) 99 CLR at p 370.

More specifically, he said that he had:

> no doubt that the defendant's drinking bout on this occasion extended from some little time before Saturday, 18 April until at least towards the end of the following week and that there were many occasions during this period when he was quite incapable … of transacting the simplest forms of business: (1955) 99 CLR at p 368.

I take his Honour to have thought that on these "occasions" any instrument signed by the defendant must have been held to be void even at law, and that throughout the period he was incapable of making an intelligent decision or forming a rationally considered judgment on a matter of business. During the night of the 20th or 21st he became again, as his Honour found, "grossly intoxicated" ((1955) 99 CLR at p 372) and early on the 21st he was "barely sensible of what was going on around him" (at p 373), though his condition "may have improved a little" (at p 373) during the drive (about 40 miles) to Goondiwindi …

[411] [I]t is important to bear in mind exactly what was the view of Taylor J with regard to the state of the defendant's mind [at the time of signing the contract]. It is not to be supposed that he was in that condition of helplessness and semi-imbecility into which he appears to have drunk himself at times during the period of his "bout". The general nature of the transaction was not beyond his comprehension on 21 April.

> But [said his Honour] whilst I feel that this is the proper conclusion upon the evidence, I am satisfied that at no time was his participation in the transaction accompanied by any reasonably intelligent consent to it (at p 374) …

It was argued that the defendant had by conduct affirmed the contract after regaining a normal state of mind. It has been said that, in cases of this type, equity will not relieve unless there has been a prompt repudiation after a cessation of any vitiating circumstances. The defendant did not repudiate the contract until 22 July. In the meantime he had bought another property, in which he proposed to reside, and he had allowed certain stock to be placed on "Worrah" by the plaintiff or his father. But [the solicitor] had not supplied him with a copy of the contract, and I do not think, on the evidence, that he had any real understanding of the position until early in July, when he obtained a copy of the document, and, after a conversation with the witness Barden, consulted a firm of solicitors at Moree. After obtaining their advice he acted promptly enough. His drinking bout continued for some days after 21 April and Taylor J thought that at its conclusion he had, at the [412] best, only a hazy recollection of what had actually happened. When (to use his own expressive phrase) the "booze got out of his system" he seems to have begun to think seriously about the position, but there is nothing to suggest that he was aware that the transaction might be successfully challenged, or even alive to what he had really done in April. In all the circumstances it would be wrong, in my opinion, to hold that there was any affirmation of the contract or any failure to repudiate in due time a transaction which, even when he became sober, he did not fully understand and appreciate until the document was in his hands.

I felt pressed at first by the argument based on the evidence of [the solicitor]. But after full consideration of the whole case, I am satisfied that we have here an example of a thoroughly unconscionable transaction, which no court of equity could possibly enforce itself, or allow to be enforced at law. I would regard specific performance as out of the question, and to let the contract be enforced at law would, in this particular case, be, in effect, to allow the overreaching party to reap the full reward of his inequitable conduct. The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed.

[KITTO J dissented on the ground that the evidence did not provide a sufficient foundation for the findings on which the relief had been granted.]

Appeal dismissed with costs

Commercial Bank of Australia v Amadio

[36.20] Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia, Full Court.

[FACTS: In March 1977, Mr and Mrs Amadio (the respondents) were aged 76 and 71 respectively. They had both been born in Italy but had lived in Australia for over 40 years. Neither had received much formal education. Mr Amadio had a limited grasp of written English but could speak it reasonably well; Mrs Amadio had some understanding of spoken English but gave evidence through an interpreter. She had no business experience, but her husband, who had retired after many years working as a market gardener, had engaged in a number of land transactions, with most of which he had received the assistance of their son, Vincenzo Amadio. Vincenzo carried on business as a land developer and builder through a number of companies which he controlled, including V Amadio Builders Pty Ltd (Amadio Builders). He appeared to be very successful. The annual turnover of these companies amounted to millions of dollars. He lived in an opulent style. In 1976 he held a Christmas party which was attended by over 2,000 people, including his father, Mr Amadio, and Mr Virgo, who was the manager of the branch of the appellant bank (the bank) at which Amadio Builders had its account. His parents had every reason to believe that he was a wealthy man. But by October 1976, Amadio Builders had proved unable to keep within its overdraft limit ($80,000). Its application to increase the limit by $45,000 was granted on condition that the advance was to be cleared by 31 December 1976, but when that date arrived, the account was $130,000 in debit. The bank required this to be reduced to $125,000, but by 17 March 1977, the debit exceeded $193,000. Moreover, from about the beginning of 1977, it had been necessary for Amadio Builders to arrange with the bank to selectively dishonour cheques drawn on its account and presented for payment. Vincenzo and Mr Virgo would meet almost daily and would decide which cheques should be paid and which should not. The bank maintained this tolerant attitude towards Amadio Builders because Vincenzo was an important customer who brought business to the bank, but also because the company was engaged in building houses in a joint venture with General Credits Ltd, a subsidiary of the bank. On 18 March 1977, the bank decided to stop further operations on the overdraft account and required Amadio Builders to open a second account which was to be kept in credit. In a few days this second account was also overdrawn. Vincenzo informed the State Manager, Mr Statton, that his parents were prepared to give security over an office building they owned to the bank if it would allow him to continue to operate with an increased overdraft limit. In fact he had not spoken to his parents on the subject. The State Manager informed him that the bank would take a mortgage over the parents' property, and would allow Amadio Builders to operate on the account which had been frozen, with an overdraft limit of $270,000, the limit to be reduced at specified weekly intervals. Vincenzo called on his parents on 25 March 1977, and asked them to give a guarantee for around $50,000 for about six months. In fact the State Manager had not mentioned such limits. Mr Virgo also went to the home of the respondents, later on 25 March, and obtained their signatures to a memorandum of mortgage. By that instrument the respondents agreed to pay to the bank on demand all moneys owing or that thereafter became owing by Amadio Builders to the bank, together with interest, and mortgaged the office property as security for the payment. There was very little discussion before the document was signed. The respondents, who were in the kitchen, did not read the document and Mr Virgo did not explain its effect to them, but when Mr Amadio said that the mortgage was only for six months, Mr Virgo pointed out that there was no such limitation of time.

Thereafter Amadio Builders again operated on the account, but the state of the account continued to deteriorate, and at the beginning of 1978, the company went into liquidation. The bank made demand on the respondents and served notice that it would exercise its power of sale. The respondents issued proceedings attacking the validity of the mortgage. The bank counterclaimed for the amount due under the guarantee contained in the mortgage. The primary judge gave judgment for the bank for $239,830. The Full Court allowed an appeal by Mr and Mrs Amadio. The bank appealed to the High Court.]

MASON J: [461] I agree with Deane J's comprehensive statement of the facts and with his conclusion that the respondents are entitled to relief on the ground that the bank was guilty of unconscionable conduct in procuring the execution of the mortgage guarantee by the respondents.

Historically, courts have exercised jurisdiction to set aside contracts and other dealings on a variety of equitable grounds. They include fraud, misrepresentation, breach of fiduciary duty, undue influence and unconscionable conduct. In one sense they all constitute species of unconscionable conduct on the part of a party who stands to receive a benefit under a transaction which, in the eye of equity, cannot be enforced because to do so would be inconsistent with equity and good conscience. But relief on the ground of "unconscionable conduct" is usually taken to refer to the class of case in which a party makes unconscientious use of his superior position or bargaining power to the detriment of a party who suffers from some special disability or is placed in some special situation of disadvantage, eg, a catching bargain with an expectant heir or an unfair contract made by taking advantage of a person who is seriously affected by intoxicating drink. Although unconscionable conduct in this narrow sense bears some resemblance to the doctrine of undue influence, there is a difference between the two. In the latter the will of the innocent party is not independent and voluntary because it is overborne. In the former the will of the innocent party, even if independent and voluntary, is the result of the disadvantageous position in which he is placed and of the other party unconscientiously taking advantage of that position.

There is no reason for thinking that the two remedies are mutually exclusive in the sense that only one of them is available in a particular situation to the exclusion of the other. Relief on the ground of unconscionable conduct will be granted when unconscientious advantage is taken of an innocent party whose will is overborne so that it is not independent and voluntary, just as it will be granted when such advantage is taken of an innocent party who, though not deprived of an independent and voluntary will, is unable to make a worthwhile judgment as to what is in his best interest.

It goes almost without saying that it is impossible to describe definitively all the situations in which relief will be granted on the ground of unconscionable conduct. As Fullagar J said in Blomley v Ryan (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 405:

> [462] The circumstances adversely affecting a party, which may induce a court of equity either to refuse its aid or to set a transaction aside, are of great variety and can hardly be satisfactorily classified. Among them are poverty or need of any kind, sickness, age, sex, infirmity of body or mind, drunkenness, illiteracy or lack of education, lack of assistance or explanation where assistance or explanation is necessary. The common characteristic seems to be that they have the effect of placing one party at a serious disadvantage vis-á-vis the other.

Likewise Kitto J (1956) 99 CLR 362, at 415 spoke of it as "a well-known head of equity" which – … applies whenever one party to a transaction is at a special disadvantage in dealing with the other party because illness, ignorance, inexperience, impaired faculties, financial need or other circumstances affect his ability to conserve his own interests, and the other party unconscientiously takes advantage of the opportunity thus placed in his hands.

It is not to be thought that relief will be granted only in the particular situations mentioned by their Honours. It is made plain enough, especially by Fullagar J, that the situations mentioned are no more than particular exemplifications of an underlying general principle which may be invoked whenever one party by reason of some condition of circumstance is placed at a special disadvantage vis-á-vis another and unfair or unconscientious advantage is then taken of the opportunity thereby created. I qualify the word "disadvantage" by the adjective "special" in order to disavow any suggestion that the principle applies whenever there is some difference in the bargaining power of the parties and in order to emphasize that the disabling condition or circumstance is one which seriously affects the ability of the innocent party to make a judgment as to his own best interests, when the other party knows or ought to know of the existence of that condition or circumstance and of its effect on the innocent party.

Because times have changed new situations have arisen in which it may be appropriate to invoke the underlying principle. Take, for example, entry into a standard form of contract dictated by a party whose bargaining power is greatly superior, a relationship which was discussed by Lord Reid and Lord Diplock in A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay [1974] 1 WLR 1308; [1974] 3 All ER 616 at 1314–5, 1316 (WLR), 622–3, 624 (All ER). See also Clifford Davis Management Ltd v WEA Records Ltd [1975] 1 WLR 61; [1975] 1 All ER 237 at 64–5 (WLR), 240 (All ER). In situations of [463] this kind it is necessary for the plaintiff who seeks relief to establish unconscionable conduct, namely that unconscientious advantage has been taken of his disabling condition or circumstances.

Of course the relationship between the present parties and the transaction into which they entered were by no means novel, viewed as a situation to which the general principle can apply. That the principle might justify the setting aside of a guarantee is established by decisions such as Owen and Gutch v Homan (1853) 14 HL Cas 997 at 1034–5 [10 ER 752, at 767] and Bank of Victoria Ltd v Mueller [1925] VLR 642 at 649.

To say this involves no contradiction of the well-entrenched proposition that a guarantee is not a contract uberrimae fidei, that is, a contract which of itself calls for full disclosure. However, it is accepted that the principal creditor is under a duty –

> … to disclose to the intending surety anything which has taken place between the bank and the principal debtor "which was not naturally to be expected", or as it was put by Pollock MR, in Lloyds Bank Ltd v Harrison (1925); Unreported, cited in Paget's Law of Banking, 7th ed (1966), p 583 "the necessity for disclosure only goes to the extent of requiring it where there are some unusual features in the particular case relating to the particular account which is to be guaranteed" (Goodwin v National Bank of Australasia Ltd (1968) 117 CLR 173 at 175, per Barwick CJ).

It has been said that this duty to disclose does not require a bank to give information as to matters affecting the credit of the debtor or of any circumstances connected with the transaction in which he is about to engage which will render his position more hazardous (Wythes v Labouchere (1859) 3 De G & J 593 at 609 [44 ER 1397 at 1404], per Lord Chelmsford LC). No surety is entitled to assume that the debtor has not been overdrawing, the proper presumption being in most instances that he has been doing so and wishes to do so again (London General Omnibus Co Ltd v Holloway [1912] 2 KB 72 at 83–4, 87).

But the fact that a bank's duty to make disclosure to its intending surety, arising from the mere relationship between principal creditor and surety, is so limited has no bearing on the availability of equitable relief on the ground of unconscionable conduct. A bank, though not guilty of any breach of its limited duty to make disclosure to the intending surety, may none the less be considered [464] to have engaged in unconscionable conduct in procuring the surety's entry into the contract of guarantee.

It is to be hoped that the respondents' amended statement of claim does not find its way into the precedent books. It leaves much to be desired. It alleges unconscionable conduct and alternatively undue influence on the part of the bank. It does not, as it might have done, allege undue influence on the part of the respondents' son Vincenzo, with notice on the part of the bank. The findings, and indeed the evidence, contradict or fail to support the alleged case of undue influence on the part of the bank. The critical issue then is whether, in accordance with the principle already explained, the respondents are entitled to relief on the ground of unconscionable conduct.

There are a number of factors which go to establish that there was a gross inequality of bargaining power between the bank and the respondents, so much so that the respondents stood in a position of special disadvantage vis-á-vis the bank in relation to the proposed mortgage guarantee. By way of contrast to the bank, the respondents' ability to judge whether entry into the transaction was in their own best interests, having due regard to their desire to assist their son, was sadly lacking. The situation of special disadvantage in which the respondents were placed was the outcome of their reliance on and their confidence in their son who, in order to serve his own interests, urged them to provide the mortgage guarantee which the bank required as a condition of increasing the approved overdraft limit of his company, V Amadio Builders Pty Ltd ("the company"), from $80 000 to $270 000 and misled them as to the financial position of the company. Their reliance on their son was due in no small degree to their infirmities – they were Italians of advanced years, aged 76 and 71 respectively, having a limited command of written English and no experience of business in the field or at the level in which their son and the company engaged. They believed that the company's business was a flourishing and prosperous enterprise, though temporarily in need of funds. In reality, as the bank well knew, the company was in a perilous financial condition ….

[466] In deciding whether the bank took unconscientious advantage of the position of disadvantage in which the respondents were placed, we must ask, first, what knowledge did the bank have of the respondents' situation?

Mr Virgo was aware that the respondents were Italians, that they were of advanced years and that they did not have a good command of English. He knew that Vincenzo had procured their agreement to sign the mortgage guarantee. He had no reason to think that they had received advice and guidance from anyone but their son. In cross-examination he conceded that he believed that Vincenzo had acted in the "role of adviser/explainer" in relation to the transaction and referred to him as acting "in his capacity as dominant member of the family". Mr Virgo also knew that, in the light of the then financial condition of the company, it was vital to Vincenzo to secure his parents' signature to the mortgage guarantee so that the company could continue in business. It must have been obvious to Mr Virgo, as to anyone else having knowledge of the facts, that the transaction was improvident from the viewpoint of the respondents. In these circumstances it is inconceivable that the possibility did not occur to Mr Virgo that the respondents' entry into the transaction was due to their inability to make a judgment as [467] to what was in their best interests, owing to their reliance on their son, whose interests would inevitably incline him to urge them to sign the instrument put forward by the bank.

Indeed, the inquiry by Mr Amadio senior as to the duration of the arrangement should have alerted Mr Virgo to the likelihood that Vincenzo had not adequately or accurately explained the intended transaction to them, let alone the possible or probable consequences which attended it.

Whether it be correct or incorrect to attribute to Mr Virgo knowledge of this possibility, the facts as known to him were such as to raise in the mind of any reasonable person a very real question as to the respondents' ability to make a judgment as to what was in their own best interests. In Owen and Gutch v Homan (1853) 4 HLC at 1035 [10 ER at 767], Lord Cranworth LC said:

> … it may safely be stated that if the dealings are such as fairly to lead a reasonable man to believe that fraud must have been used in order to obtain [the concurrence of the surety], he is bound to make inquiry, and cannot shelter himself under the plea that he was not called on to ask, and did not ask, any questions on the subject. In some cases wilful ignorance is not to be distinguished in its equitable consequences from knowledge.

The principle there stated applies with equal force to this case. The concept of fraud in equity is not limited to common law deceit; it extends to conduct of the kind engaged in by the respondents' son when he took advantage of the confidence and reliance reposed in him to induce his parents to enter into a transaction in order to serve his ends, thereby depriving them of the ability to make a judgment as to what is in their interests.

As we have seen, if A having actual knowledge that B occupies a situation of special disadvantage in relation to an intended transaction, so that B cannot make a judgment as to what is in his own interests, takes unfair advantage of his (A's) superior bargaining power or position by entering into that transaction, his conduct in so doing is unconscionable. And if, instead of having actual knowledge of that situation, A is aware of the possibility that that situation may exist or is aware of facts that would raise that possibility in the mind of any reasonable person, the result will be the same.

The knowledge of Mr Virgo was the knowledge of the bank. Whether we treat Mr Virgo as having knowledge of the possibility already discussed or as having knowledge of facts which [468] would raise that possibility in the mind of any reasonable person the inevitable conclusion is that the bank was guilty of unconscionable conduct by entering into the transaction without disclosing such facts as may have enabled the respondents to form a judgment for themselves and without ensuring that they obtained independent advice.

I agree with Deane J that it matters not that the respondents have not offered to do equity. In the result I am of opinion that the respondents were entitled to an order setting aside the mortgage guarantee and that the appeal to this Court should be dismissed.

[36.25] DEANE J: [474] The jurisdiction of courts of equity to relieve against unconscionable dealing developed from the jurisdiction which the Court of Chancery assumed, at a very early period, to set aside transactions in which expectant heirs had dealt with their expectations without being adequately protected against the pressure put upon them by their poverty: see O'Rorke v Bolingbroke (1877) 2

App Cas 814 at 822. The jurisdiction is long established as extending generally to circumstances in which:

(1) a party to a transaction was under a special disability in dealing with the other party with the consequence that there was an absence of any reasonable degree of equality between them; and

(2) the disability was sufficiently evident to the stronger party to make it prima facie unfair or "unconscientious" that he procure, or accept, the weaker party's assent to the impugned transaction in the circumstances in which he procured or accepted it. Where such circumstances are shown to have existed, an onus is cast upon the stronger party to show that the transaction was fair, just and reasonable: "the burthen of shewing the fairness of the transaction is thrown on the person who seeks to obtain the benefit of the contract": see O'Rorke v Bolingbroke at 823 per Lord Hatherley; Fry v Lane (1888) 40 Ch D 312 at 322; Blomley v Ryan (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 428–9.

The equitable principles relating to relief against unconscionable dealing and the principles relating to undue influence are closely related. The two doctrines are, however, distinct. Undue influence, like common law duress, looks to the quality of the consent or assent of the weaker party: see Union Bank of Australia Ltd v Whitelaw [1906] VLR 711 at 720; Watkins v Combes (1922) 30 CLR 180 at 193–4; Morrison v Coast Finance Ltd (1965) 55 DLR (2d) 710 at 713. Unconscionable dealing looks to the conduct of the stronger party in attempting to enforce, or retain the benefit of, a dealing with a person under a special disability in circumstances where it is not consistent with equity or good conscience that he should do so. The adverse circumstances which may constitute a special disability for the purposes of the principles relating to relief against unconscionable dealing may take a wide variety of forms and are not susceptible to being comprehensively catalogued. In Blomley v Ryan, Fullagar J listed some examples of such disability (at 405): "poverty or need of any kind, sickness, age, sex, infirmity of body or mind, drunkenness, illiteracy or lack of education, lack of assistance or explanation where assistance or explanation is necessary."

[475] As Fullagar J remarked, the common characteristic of such adverse circumstances "seems to be that they have the effect of placing one party at a serious disadvantage vis-á-vis the other".

In most cases where equity courts have granted relief against unconscionable dealing, there has been an inadequacy of consideration moving from the stronger party. It is not, however, essential that that should be so: see Blomley v Ryan at 405; Harrison v National Bank of Australasia Ltd [1928] Tas LR 1; but compare Lloyds Bank v Bundy [1975] QB 326 at 337 and Cresswell v Potter [1978] 1 WLR 255 at 257. Notwithstanding that adequate consideration may have moved from the stronger party, a transaction may be unfair, unreasonable and unjust from the view point of the party under the disability. An obvious instance of circumstances in which that may be so is the case where the benefit of the consideration does not move to the party under the disability but moves to some third party involved in the transaction. Thus, it is established that the jurisdiction extends, in an appropriate case, to relieve a guarantor of the burden of a guarantee of existing and future indebtedness: see Owen and Gutch v Homan (1853) 4 HLC 997; 10 ER 752 at 1034–5 (HLC), 767 (ER). Such a guarantee is properly to be viewed in the terms enunciated by Cussen J in Bank of Victoria Ltd v Mueller [1925] VLR 642 at 649:

> In the first place, it is obvious that a large benefit is conferred both on the creditor and the debtor, which, so far as an advantage to the guarantor is concerned, is voluntary, though no doubt "consideration" exists so far as the creditor is concerned, so soon as forbearance is in fact given or advances are in fact made. It is, I think, to some extent by reference to the rule or to an extension of the rule that, in the case of a large voluntary donation, a gift may be set aside in equity if it appears that the donor did not really understand the transaction, that such a guarantee may be treated as voidable as between the husband and wife.

Cussen J's analysis was made in the context of a guarantee procured by a husband from his wife in favour of the husband's bank. There is, however, no basis in principle or in policy for confining the process of reasoning therein contained to cases of the relief of female spouses. It is appropriate to the circumstances of the present case.

I turn to consider the question whether, at the time they executed the guarantee-mortgage, Mr and Mrs Amadio were under a relevant disability in dealing with the bank. [His Honour compared the relative positions of the bank and the Amadios, and continued:] [476] It is apparent that Mr and Mrs Amadio, viewed together, were the weaker party to the transaction between themselves and the bank. Their weakness may be likened to that of the defendant in Blomley v Ryan (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 392, of whom McTiernan J said:

> His weakness was of the kind spoken of by Lord Hardwicke [in Earl of Chesterfield v Janssen (1751) 2 Ves Sen, 125 at 155–6; 28 ER 82 at 100] in defining the fraud characterised as taking surreptitious advantage of the weakness, ignorance or necessity of another. The essence of such weakness is that the party is unable to judge for himself.

That weakness constituted a special disability of Mr and Mrs Amadio in their dealing with the bank of the type necessary to enliven the equitable principles relating to relief against unconscionable dealing. Put more precisely, the result of the combination of their age, their limited grasp of written English, the circumstances in which the bank presented the document to them for their signature and, most importantly, their lack of knowledge and understanding of the contents of the document was that, to adapt the words of Fullagar J quoted above, they lacked assistance and advice where assistance and advice were plainly necessary if there were to be any reasonable degree of equality between themselves and the bank.

The next question is whether the special disability of Mr and Mrs Amadio was sufficiently evident to the bank to make it prima facie unfair or "unconscientious" of the bank to procure their execution of the document of guarantee and mortgage in the circumstances in which that execution was procured. In procuring it, the bank acted through Mr Virgo; his actions were the actions of the bank and his knowledge was the knowledge of the bank. His evidence indicates that he was not unacquainted with the personal circumstances of Mr and Mrs Amadio and their reliance on Vincenzo whom he described as the "dominant member of the family". He was aware of the inability of Amadio Builders to pay its debts as they fell due and must also have been aware of the potential consequences to Mr and Mrs Amadio of the unlimited guarantee in the document which he tendered to them for their immediate execution.

It has not been argued on behalf of the bank that Mr Virgo was so unaware of the circumstances in which Mr and Mrs Amadio executed the document that he was entitled to believe that the transaction was one where no advice, independent or otherwise, was called for. The argument for the bank has been to the effect that, at relevant times, Mr Virgo honestly and reasonably relied upon a representation made to him, by Vincenzo, that the latter had discussed the transaction with his parents, informed them of its nature and effect, explained it fully to them and duly obtained their consent to it.

The evidence that Vincenzo made any such representation to Mr Virgo is unimpressively sparse. Upon analysis, it consists of Mr Virgo's own evidence that he assumed that Mr and Mrs Amadio's "agreement or offer to give this mortgage was a result of a family conference of some sort". When it was suggested to him that there was nothing upon which he could base that [478] assumption apart from the fact that Vincenzo had told him that he had spoken to his parents about the transaction and that the bank could proceed with it, Mr Virgo answered:

> That is right. The whole thing had come to me as a fait accompli, not only from the bank's point of view but also having then been informed by Vin Amadio that the matter had been agreed within the family and all that required to be done was for the execution of the document.

The references to "a family conference" and to the matter being "agreed within the family" are explained in a later passage in the evidence where Mr Virgo described an allegedly well known Italian custom of submitting business propositions to penetrating and exhaustive familial discussion presided over by "the head of the family group". When asked whether he believed that Vincenzo occupied the role of "adviser–explainer" in respect of the transaction between his parents and the bank, Mr Virgo replied:

> I suppose you could say that; but really I just assumed that the matter had been discussed. Now, whether any direction had been given by Mr Amadio Jnr in his capacity as dominant member of the family or not, I really have no idea. I certainly was led to believe that the matter was a fait accompli and had been discussed.

It must, in fairness, be stressed that there is no suggestion that Mr Virgo or any other officer of the bank has been guilty of dishonesty or moral obliquity in the dealings between Mr and Mrs Amadio and the bank. The evidence does, however, demonstrate that there was no proper basis at all for any assumption that Mr and Mrs Amadio had received adequate advice from Vincenzo as to the effect of the document which Mr Virgo presented to them for their signature. Even if that were not the case, it would be difficult to accept as reasonable a belief that Vincenzo had successfully explained to his parents the content and effect of a document which embodied 18 separate covenants of meticulous and complicated legal wording in circumstances where, to Mr Virgo's knowledge, Vincenzo had himself never seen the document at the time when any such suggested explanation must have taken place. If there were otherwise room for doubt, what transpired when Mr Virgo called on Vincenzo in his office and on Mr and Mrs Amadio in their kitchen makes clear that Mr Virgo simply closed his eyes to the vulnerability of Mr and Mrs Amadio and the disability which adversely affected them.

Mr Virgo gave evidence that Vincenzo did not trouble even to read the document before agreeing that Mr Virgo should take it to Mr and Mrs Amadio for execution. He also gave evidence that [479] Mr and Mrs Amadio did not read it. In other words, in a situation where it was apparent to him that advice and assistance were necessary, he knew that no one who might have rendered such advice and assistance to Mr and Mrs Amadio had even read the document to ascertain whether its terms imposed no greater potential liability upon Mr and Mrs Amadio than that which they were prepared to undertake. In the circumstances, the only comment which either Mr or Mrs Amadio made as to the contents of the guarantee/mortgage on the occasion when they executed it, namely Mr Amadio's comment that it was only for six months, was of unmistakable significance. That statement revealed that Mr Amadio and, it must be assumed, Mrs Amadio were seriously misinformed as to a basic term of the transaction. It would, at least by that stage, have been plain to any reasonable person, who was prepared to see and to learn, that he was put on inquiry. The stage had been reached at which the bank, through Mr Virgo, was bound to make a simple inquiry as to whether the transaction had been properly explained to Mr and Mrs Amadio. The bank cannot shelter behind its failure to make that inquiry. The case is one in which, "wilful ignorance is not to be distinguished in its equitable consequences from knowledge": Owen and Gutch v Homan 997 at 1035; 752 at 767 per Lord Cranworth LC.

Mr and Mrs Amadio's disability and the inequality between themselves and the bank must be held to have been evident to the bank and, in the circumstances, it was prima facie unfair and "unconscientious" of the bank to proceed to procure their signature on the guarantee/mortgage. With that conclusion, the onus is cast upon the bank to show that the transaction was "in point of fact fair, just, and reasonable": Fry v Lane (1888) 40 Ch D 312 at 321.

Mr and Mrs Amadio were not wholly misinformed as to the terms and effect of the guarantee/mortgage. The learned trial judge found that they correctly understood that the document which they were signing was a guarantee supported by a mortgage of their Wicks Avenue land. In that regard, it is relevant to mention that the evidence discloses that Mr and Mrs Amadio had, on a number of previous occasions, provided a guarantee, supported by a mortgage of that land, to secure borrowing by a company associated with one or other of their sons. While it is true that Mr and Mrs Amadio were initially led to believe that the guarantee/mortgage was limited in duration to six months, they were disabused of that notion by the clear indication given by Mr Virgo, [480] prior to execution of the document, that the guarantee/mortgage was a "continuing" one and unlimited in point of time. They executed the document to assist their son's company in obtaining credit from the bank. Acting on the basis of that execution, the bank extended Amadio Builders' overdraft limit and advanced further money to that company. If Mr and Mrs Amadio's potential liability had been limited to a maximum of $50 000, and if they had been informed as to the true financial position of Amadio Builders, it would be strongly arguable that the guarantee/mortgage could not properly be said either to have resulted from their special disability or to be other than fair, just and reasonable.

As has been said however, the guarantee/mortgage did not contain any such limit upon potential liability and Mr and Mrs Amadio were under a complete misapprehension as to the financial stability of the company whose indebtedness to the bank they were guaranteeing. The learned trial judge found that had they known of the financial trouble Amadio Builders was then experiencing, they would not have executed the guarantee/mortgage. That finding has not been challenged on the appeal. In the circumstances, the execution of the guarantee/mortgage by Mr and Mrs Amadio flowed from the position of special disability in which they were placed. From Mr and Mrs Amadio's point of view, the great difference between a potential liability of up to $50 000 under a guarantee of a financially successful company and a potential liability under a guarantee of a financially troubled company in whatever amount that company might become indebted to its bank requires little elaboration. The one would have been within their means to incur to assist their son. The other represented their potential financial ruin. In the circumstances in which it was procured, the guarantee/mortgage was unfair, unjust and unreasonable. Indeed, in fairness to the bank, I did not understand the contrary to be submitted on its behalf.

Relief against unconscionable dealing is a purely equitable remedy. The concept underlying the jurisdiction to grant the relief is that equity intervenes to prevent the stronger party to an unconscionable dealing acting against equity and good conscience by attempting to enforce, or retain the benefit of, that dealing. Equity will not, however:

> restrain a defendant from asserting a claim save to the extent that it would be unconscionable for him to do so. If this limitation on the power of equity results in giving to a plaintiff less than what on some general ideal of fairness he might be considered entitled to, that cannot be helped: Re Diplock [1948] 1 Ch 465 at 532 per Lord Greene [481] MR, Wrottesley and Evershed LJJ.

Where appropriate, an order will be made which only partly nullifies a transaction liable to be set aside in equity pursuant to the principles of unconscionable dealing: see Bank of Victoria Ltd v Mueller [1925] VLR 642 at 659, and the cases there cited. Where an order is made setting aside the whole of a transaction on the ground of unconscionable dealing, the order will, in an appropriate case, be made conditional upon the party obtaining relief doing equity.

While the matter was not raised in the bank's Notice of Appeal, I was, at one stage, inclined to think that the appropriate relief in the present case would be an order setting aside the guarantee/mortgage only to the extent to which it imposed upon Mr and Mrs Amadio a potential liability in excess of $50 000 or that any order wholly setting aside the guarantee/mortgage should be conditional upon Mr and Mrs Amadio paying to the bank the amount of $50 000 which represents the amount of the potential liability which they intended to undertake. Ultimately, I have come to the view that Mr and Mrs Amadio are entitled to have the whole transaction set aside unconditionally. It is true that it is not ordinarily encumbent upon a bank to bring to the attention of a potential guarantor of a customer's account details of a type which are ordinarily to be expected: see Goodwin v National Bank of Australasia Ltd (1968) 117 CLR 173 at 175. In the present case, however, it was, as has been said, evident to the bank that Mr and Mrs Amadio stood in need of advice as to the nature and effect of the transaction into which they were entering. It is apparent that any such advice would have included the importance to a guarantor of ascertaining from the bank the state of the customer's account which was being guaranteed and any unusual features of the account. If such information had been obtained by Mr and Mrs Amadio, they would not, on the evidence and in the light of the learned trial judge's finding, have entered into the guarantee/mortgage at all. The whole transaction should properly be seen as flowing from the special disability which was evident to the bank and as being unfair, unjust and unreasonable.

[WILSON J delivered a judgment concurring with Deane J. DAWSON J dissented. GIBBS CJ delivered a judgment in which he expressed the view that the bank had not taken unfair advantage of the respondent's disabilities. His Honour nevertheless concurred in the dismissal of the appeal on the ground that although a contract of guarantee is not uberrimae fidei, a bank which takes a guarantee is bound to reveal to the surety anything which has taken place between the bank and the principal debtor which the surety would not expect to exist. In this case, this would include:

1. the arrangement that the overdraft limit of $270,000 was especially temporary; and
2. the participation of the bank in selective dishonouring of cheques.]

Appeal dismissed.

Louth v Diprose

[36.35] Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia, Full Court.

[FACTS: Mary Louth (the appellant) and Louis Diprose (the respondent) met at a party in Launceston in November 1981. The appellant was married but her marriage was about to end, and her husband left her shortly afterwards. There were two children of her marriage; she had custody of them. The respondent, a practising solicitor, was married. His first marriage had ended in divorce and the final separation from his second wife was about to take place. The parties became friendly and began to go out together fairly regularly. Intercourse took place shortly after their first meeting and again about eight months later. During a relationship which continued for about seven years, intercourse took place on those two occasions only. Feelings were much stronger on the respondent's side. Over the years he composed many poems which he called "The Mary Poems". These were variously sentimental, passionate, and on the theme of unrequited love.

On 23 August 1982, the appellant left Launceston for Adelaide. She was in straitened financial circumstances following the breakdown of her marriage and she hoped for help from her sister and her sister's husband, Mr and Mrs Volkhardt. The respondent tried to persuade her to stay in Launceston. His proposal of marriage was rejected.

In January 1983 the respondent visited Adelaide. The appellant said she could not go out with him because she had met another man. The respondent returned to Launceston but decided to move to Adelaide permanently, mainly because the appellant was there. He moved to Adelaide in February 1983. At first he made no contact with the appellant, being concerned that she might think he was harassing her. He did send her a partly completed volume of "The Mary Poems" in April 1983. Later he called at her home but did not see her. Mr Volkhardt contacted the respondent to say that the appellant did not wish to see him.

In May 1983, the appellant telephoned the respondent twice but refused to give him her telephone number. In July 1983, she rang again to say that she was depressed and that the respondent might like to take her to lunch the next day. They did in fact lunch together. At first the appellant was in a very bright mood but later she said that "life was very bad" and that a few nights earlier she had put a Stanley knife to one of her wrists and had thought of slashing it. She did not show the respondent a scar at that time though she did so later, in 1984 and again in 1985. The respondent drove the appellant home after lunch and said that his attitude to her had not changed. The appellant replied: "Oh well, if you don't try and hassle me, I would probably let you sleep with me occasionally, but I don't want any commitment." Nevertheless, the appellant did not give the respondent her telephone number until November 1983 although she telephoned him a couple of times during that period.

Thereafter the respondent telephoned and called on the appellant regularly. He continued to express the depth of his feelings for her. The appellant made it clear that she did not feel the same way about him but that she was happy to treat him as a friend. The pattern of their relationship continued as before until the middle of 1985. The respondent made many gifts to the appellant, some of jewellery and others of a less personal nature such as a television set and a washing machine. From time to time he picked up unpaid household bills lying around and paid them.

In September 1984 the Volkhardts separated; they were later divorced. Mr Volkhardt owned a house in Tranmere in which the appellant was living with her children and for which she paid a low rent. The Volkhardts' matrimonial home was in their joint names. Shortly after the separation Mr Volkhardt said to the appellant, speaking of the house at Tranmere, that: she should be paying more rent or maybe it would be a good idea to put her name down on the housing list because she couldn't assume she would live there forever. The conversation as reported to the respondent by the appellant was that she had been told by her brother-in-law that her sister was seeking a property settlement from him and that, among other things, the house at Tranmere would have to be sold. She told the respondent she would commit suicide if she were forced to leave.

The respondent agreed to buy the Tranmere house from Mr Volkhardt for $58,000, expenses being $933. The purchase money came from a mortgage investment of his which was to be paid out at the end of June 1985. In the respondent's presence and by arrangement between them, the appellant signed the contract of sale as purchaser and the land was transferred directly to her.

For the remainder of 1986, 1987 and into 1988 the relationship between the parties was much as it had always been. The respondent continued to telephone the appellant and to call on her. He brought food to the home and paid bills from time to time. The appellant's children moved to private schools and the respondent met their fees for a while. The respondent's ardour continued unabated; the appellant's generally offhand approach to the respondent did not alter.

However, in mid-1988 the situation changed. The respondent bought a house at Crafers, borrowing the entire purchase price from his mother and a building society. He had to vacate the house he was renting before he was able to take possession of his new home. By arrangement, the respondent's son moved into the house at Tranmere and in August 1988 the appellant permitted the respondent to do likewise, in both cases pending settlement of the Crafers purchase. The respondent was there for two to three weeks, during which time his relations with the appellant deteriorated. She had a male friend and she resented the respondent's presence. There was a quarrel. The respondent told the appellant he wanted her to transfer the Tranmere house to him and to pay some rent for her occupation of it. The appellant refused on both counts, saying that the house was hers. On 21 September 1988, solicitors acting for the respondent wrote to the appellant saying that they had been instructed to lodge a caveat against the appellant's title.

On 24 October 1988, the respondent commenced proceedings in the Supreme Court of South Australia, claiming that he was beneficially entitled to the land and seeking an order that the appellant transfer the land to him. The pleading asserted that it was an express term of the agreement or a common intention that the appellant would hold the land on trust for the respondent, and would transfer legal ownership of the land to him. The statement of claim pleaded, by way of an alternative, that if it were held that the respondent made a gift to the appellant, the appellant should not have the benefit of the agreement on the grounds of unconscionable conduct or undue influence.

The trial judge, King CJ, accepted the respondent's rather than the appellant's account of events leading to the purchase of the land in the appellant's name. However, he did not accept that the respondent stipulated that the appellant would be under an obligation to retransfer the house to him, and he accepted the appellant's evidence that the respondent told her the house was a gift. King CJ found for the respondent on the ground of the appellant's unconscionable conduct: the respondent was emotionally dependent on the appellant and she manipulated his infatuation so that he would provide money for the purchase by manufacturing a false atmosphere of crisis in relation to the house and threatening suicide. Accordingly, the Chief Justice ordered the appellant to transfer the house to the respondent.

The appellant appealed to the Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia. The Full Court (Jacobs ACJ and Legoe J, Matheson J dissenting) dismissed the appeal. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

DEANE J: [635] [T]he appellant attacked the learned trial judge's acceptance of the respondent's evidence that the appellant had told him that she would commit suicide because she was required to leave the house in which she was living, in a context where his Honour rejected the respondent's evidence that the appellant had agreed that the house which was ultimately purchased in her name would subsequently be transferred to the respondent. The learned trial judge was fully conscious of a possible appearance of inconsistency in that regard. Indeed, he expressly explained (Diprose v Louth (No 1) (1990) 54 SASR, 448):

> I have reached certain conclusions on the basis of accepting the plaintiff's (ie the present respondent's) evidence in preference to that of the defendant as to the circumstances and events leading to the house transaction. I have given careful consideration to the question of the plaintiff's credibility in relation to those matters in the light of my rejection of his evidence that he stipulated for a right to have the house retransferred, but I am quite satisfied that on those matters his evidence is truthful and reliable and to be preferred to that of the defendant.

In other words, as Legoe J observed (Diprose v Louth (No 2) (1990) 54 SASR, 450, 463) in the Full Court:

> Although the learned Chief Justice placed little reliance upon the evidence of the appellant where it served her own interest, he concluded that the other evidence in the case so strongly confirmed that the respondent made a gift of the house to the appellant: "… (that) I have no hesitation in holding that there was such a gift. The presumption of trust arising from the provision of the purchase money by the plaintiff is therefore rebutted".

The fact that the learned trial judge generally preferred the evidence of the respondent to that of the appellant clearly did not preclude him, as a matter of logic or common sense, from rejecting the [636] respondent's evidence on a particular matter in respect of which other evidence "strongly confirmed" a contention by the appellant … The quotations in the following summary of relevant facts are from the judgment of the trial judge (see Diprose v Louth (No 1) (1990) 54 SASR 438, 447–8). In 1985, the respondent, who is a solicitor, was in his early forties. After two unsuccessful marriages, he was living in rented accommodation in Adelaide with the three children of his first marriage. Putting to one side an old car, a Chipmunk aeroplane (worth less than $30 000) and a share in a house owned with other members of his family in Tasmania, his net assets totalled less than $100 000. The appellant, who had been married and divorced, was living in Adelaide with her two children in a rented house owned by her sister's husband. She had few assets of her own and was living in straitened circumstances. The relationship between the respondent and the appellant went back to an initial relationship between them in Tasmania some years earlier. There was an extreme contrast between their respective attitudes to one another. For his part, the respondent was "utterly infatuated" by the appellant. He was "completely in love" with her. In contrast, the appellant had become "quite indifferent to" the respondent. The motives for her continued association with him "were of a material nature". His infatuation placed the respondent "in a position of emotional dependence upon the appellant and gave her a position of great influence on his actions and decisions".

The appellant's sister and the sister's husband, who owned the house which the appellant was renting, separated. The appellant "knew that ultimately she would have to go into a Housing Trust home to enable the house to be sold". There was, however, no immediate pressure upon her to leave the house. At the time, the respondent's main asset consisted of moneys lent on mortgage in a total amount of $91 000. The time for repayment of these moneys was about to fall due. The appellant

"was aware in general terms that (the respondent) had only limited assets, that the mortgage moneys were his principal asset and that he had to work as an employee solicitor for a living. Moreover she was aware that he had three children who had natural claims upon his bounty."

The appellant set out on a planned course of conduct aimed at [637] persuading the respondent to provide the money necessary to enable her to purchase the house from her brother-in-law. She "deliberately manufactured" a false "atmosphere of crisis in order to influence the (respondent) to provide the money (to purchase) the house". She falsely told the respondent that she was required to leave the house. She said that, if forced to vacate the house, she would commit suicide. The respondent, who was aware that the appellant had cut her wrists on a previous occasion, believed her. By "a process of manipulation to which (the respondent) was utterly vulnerable by reason of his infatuation", the appellant obtained from the respondent a gift of $59 206.55, being the purchase price of the house and associated conveyancing fees. The process of manipulation included refusal of "offers of assistance (by the respondent) short of full ownership of the house knowing that (the respondent's) emotional dependence upon her was such as to lead inextricably to the gratification of her unexpressed wish to have him buy the house for her". On the basis of his findings about the appellant's purpose and conduct, the learned trial judge not surprisingly expressed the view that her conduct "smacked of fraud" …

On the findings of the learned trial judge in the present case, the relationship between the respondent and the appellant at the time of the impugned gift was plainly such that the respondent was under a special disability in dealing with the appellant. That special disability arose not merely from the respondent's infatuation. It extended to the extraordinary vulnerability of the respondent in the false "atmosphere of crisis" in which he believed that the woman with whom he was "completely in love" and upon whom he was emotionally dependent was facing eviction from her home and suicide unless he provided the money for the purchase of the house. The appellant was aware of that special disability. Indeed, to a significant extent, she had deliberately created it. She manipulated it to her advantage to influence the respondent to make the gift of the money to purchase the house. When asked for restitution she refused. From the respondent's point of view, the whole transaction was plainly a most improvident one.

In these circumstances, the learned trial judge's conclusion that the appellant had been guilty of unconscionable conduct in procuring and retaining the gift of $59 206.55 was not only open to him. In the context of his Honour's findings of fact, it was inevitable and plainly correct. On those findings, the case was not simply one in which the respondent had, under the influence of his love for, or infatuation with, the appellant, made an imprudent gift in her favour. The case was one in which the appellant deliberately used that love or infatuation and her own deceit to create a situation in which she could unconscientiously manipulate the respondent to part with a large proportion of his property. The intervention of equity is not merely to relieve the plaintiff from the consequences of his own foolishness. It is to prevent his victimisation (see, eg, Allcard v Skinner (1887) 36 Ch D 145, 182; Nichols v Jessup [1986] 1 NZLR 226, 227–9; The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 440) … [639] Accordingly, the appeal should be dismissed.

[36.40] TOOHEY J [dissenting]: [651] Now, there can be no doubt as to the strength of the respondent's feelings for the appellant and the lengths, including the financial lengths, to which he was prepared to go to express those feelings. But equally, while the appellant was content to accept the many benefits she received from the respondent, there can be no doubt that she made her position in the relationship quite clear. It was the respondent who continued to seek her out. She did not mislead him in regard to her position; she did not hold out any false hopes to him. They were both adults; each had been married before (the respondent twice); and the respondent was a practising solicitor who must have appreciated fully the consequences that the law would ordinarily attach to the gifts he made to the appellant, including the money involved in the purchase of the Tranmere house. It was the respondent's idea to buy the house, not the appellant's. In those circumstances, there is much force in the appellant's criticism of certain expressions used by the trial judge, such as "unrequited love", "pathetic devotion", "utter infatuation", "feeding the flames of the (respondent's) passion" and "bizarre behaviour". The expressions, while colourful, are not necessarily inaccurate, although they assume that a "normal" standard of conduct in such circumstances is readily discernible, an assumption which is questionable. Rather, as the appellant complained, such expressions tend to give an unbalanced picture of the relationship between the parties by placing undue emphasis on one of them.

With all its limitations and apparent disadvantages, the relationship was one the respondent was prepared to accept and to foster over about seven years. As unusual as it may have been, it was one which the respondent must have seen as having something to offer him. Apart from the two incidents mentioned, the relationship had no sexual aspect, at any rate physically. Whether the respondent sublimated through "The Mary Poems" can only be a matter of speculation though there are precedents in history and in literature for the sort of relationship that existed here. And, although he may not have been content with the limitations imposed on him by the appellant, the respondent continued as a constant visitor, involved in various aspects of the appellant's domestic life. To take one illustration, it might seem strange that the appellant's children were, in the words of King CJ, "transferred from a State school to fee-paying schools at the (respondent's) expense" (Diprose v Louth (No 1) (1990) 54 SASR 438, 442). At the same time, the children of the two families seem to have had a close [652] relationship, the appellant's children staying overnight from time to time with the respondent's children.

There is one aspect of the facts that requires particular attention, that relating to the purchase of the Tranmere house. Reference has already been made to the Chief Justice's finding that the appellant manufactured an atmosphere of crisis to influence the respondent to provide the money for the purchase and her threats of suicide in that regard. This was a finding which played a prominent part in his Honour's conclusion of unconscionability; in particular, he said that the manufacture of a crisis where none existed "was dishonest and smacked of fraud" (ibid, 448).

With respect, the evidence does not support that finding. In seeking to make good that proposition, it is necessary to put to one side the evidence of the appellant herself for the Chief Justice found her testimony as to the circumstances leading to the purchase to be "quite unimpressive" (ibid, 444). But his Honour did find Mr Volkhardt, on this matter and indeed generally, to be "an honest and accurate witness" (ibid). It is true that the respondent testified to a conversation in which the appellant spoke of the lack of security in her life and said that she did not think she could face the prospect of moving from the Tranmere house, adding (ibid, 443): "Look, if it comes to that, I'll just kill myself. I'll make a good job of it this time." But regard must be had to the whole of the evidence, particularly that of Mr Volkhardt. His evidence is set out at length in the judgment of Matheson J (Diprose v Louth (No 2) (1990) 54 SASR, 479–80).

According to Mr Volkhardt, when the respondent told him that he wanted to buy the Tranmere house for the appellant, he (Mr Volkhardt) said he was very surprised and asked to see the respondent. They met. The respondent accepted the fact that the appellant would never marry him. Nevertheless, he wanted her to be happy and secure, which is why he bought the house for her. Mr Volkhardt said that he had no immediate intention to sell the house and added: "Certainly there was no great pressure to sell." Now, there is some ambiguity in the record of this part of Mr Volkhardt's evidence. It is not clear beyond argument that at this point he was continuing his account of his conversation with the respondent or was simply giving evidence of his own state of mind. But, in the light of the whole of his evidence, the conclusion reached by Matheson J is irresistible. His Honour said (ibid, 480): [653]

> It is convenient to observe here that whatever the appellant had said to the respondent about her sister seeking a property settlement, he must have realised after his conversation with Volkhardt that the appellant was not facing an early crisis over the sale of the house.

It is apparent from what the respondent told Mr Volkhardt that he bought the house for the appellant because she "had been through a lot of … stress and problems" and because he "wanted her to be secure" (ibid, 479). The respondent gave a similar explanation for the purchase of the house to the appellant's mother, Mrs Webb (ibid, 481–2). And, as is apparent from the evidence of these two witnesses and from the evidence generally, he bought the house for her in the clear realisation that she would never marry him. As Matheson J pointed out in his judgment, the respondent took a number of steps in connection with the purchase of the house. He prepared the contract of sale, arranged Land Titles Office searches, obtained an application form under the First Home Owners Scheme and filled in the details, prepared the transfer and prepared the settlement statement. In other words, the respondent did not commit himself by one impulsive or hasty act; he had plenty of time to consider what he was doing and what he did took place over a month.

There is an aspect of the Chief Justice's findings which troubled Matheson J, namely, his disbelief of the respondent on what Matheson J described as "the primary issue whether he paid for the house on the basis that it was to be held in trust for him" (ibid, 480) and yet his belief of the respondent on what Matheson J described as "secondary issues" (ibid). The dilemma exists. This Court cannot resolve it but it does serve to expose the fact finding to greater scrutiny than would ordinarily be the case …

Having regard to King CJ's clear rejection of the respondent's case based on an agreement to transfer the Tranmere house to him, the starting point is, as the Chief Justice expressly found, that there was a gift of the house to the appellant. It was of course a very generous gift in the circumstances; it was a gift that the respondent's children might justifiably have resented; and it was a gift that the [654] respondent himself might well have regretted and later did regret. But the law is clear (Brusewitz v Brown [1923] NZLR 1106, per Salmond J at 1109):

> The mere fact that a transaction is based on an inadequate consideration or is otherwise improvident, unreasonable, or unjust is not in itself any ground on which this Court can set it aside as invalid. Nor is such a circumstance in itself even a sufficient ground for a presumption that the transaction was the result of fraud, misrepresentation, mistake, or undue influence, so as to place the burden of supporting the transaction upon the person who profits by it. The law in general leaves every man at liberty to make such bargains as he pleases, and to dispose of his own property as he chooses. However improvident, unreasonable, or unjust such bargains or dispositions may be, they are binding on every party to them unless he can prove affirmatively the existence of one of the recognized invalidating circumstances, such as fraud or undue influence.

Salmond J's reference to "invalidating circumstances" must now be read in the light of the more general propositions in Blomley and in Amadio.

Although the concept of unconscionability has been expressed in fairly wide terms, the courts are exercising an equitable jurisdiction according to recognised principles. They are not armed with a general power to set aside bargains simply because, in the eyes of the judges, they appear to be unfair, harsh or unconscionable. This is in contrast to some legislation which "permits the courts to exercise a broad discretion to control harsh, oppressive, unconscionable or unjust contracts" (Cope, Duress, Undue Influence and Unconscientious Bargains (1985), p 188. For a review of the relevant statutory powers, see pp 174–208). The equitable jurisdiction exists when one of the parties "suffers from some special disability or is placed in some special situation of disadvantage" (Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447, per Mason J at 461). In some cases, for instance where there is unfamiliarity with written English as in Amadio or unintelligence and deafness as in Wilton v Farnworth (1948) 76 CLR 646, the special situation of disadvantage may be readily apparent. But that is not the present case. Although the appellant's attack on the findings of the trial judge is generally persuasive, it is not necessary to make contrary findings in order to reach a contrary conclusion. For the most part the findings are of a general nature, bearing upon the relationship between the parties. The appellant's complaint that those findings focus unduly on the position of the respondent and fail to pay due regard to the [655] overall relationship of the parties is, I think, well founded. In particular, his Honour's assessment that the appellant's "manufacture of an atmosphere of crisis where no crisis existed was dishonest and smacked of fraud" (Diprose v Louth (No 1) (1990) 54 SASR 438, 448) is not so much a finding as an inference. In either case, it does not find great support in the evidence.

But the important thing is that the respondent failed to make good the proposition that his relationship with the appellant placed him in some special situation of disadvantage so that he should be recognised as the beneficial owner of the Tranmere house. The relationship was one which might be thought to have little to offer him but it was one in which he was content to persist and which the appellant in no way misrepresented or disguised. The respondent was well aware of all the circumstances and of his actions and their consequences. This applies particularly with respect to the purchase of the house. That knowledge and his clear appreciation of the consequences of what he was doing run directly counter to a conclusion that he was suffering from some special disability or was placed in some special situation of disadvantage. It is clear that the respondent was emotionally involved with the appellant. But it does not follow that he was emotionally dependent upon her in any relevant legal sense (see Diprose v Louth (No 2) (1990) 54 SASR 450 per Matheson J at 480).

As appears from the judgment of Matheson J, the respondent accepted that, if he could not make good a case founded on unconscionability, it would be "almost impossible to succeed" (ibid, 482) on the ground of undue influence. And before this Court he did not attempt to sustain a case on that ground.

I would allow the appeal …

[MASON CJ and BRENNAN J delivered judgments in which they held that the appeal should be dismissed. DAWSON, GAUDRON and McHUGH JJ delivered a joint judgment in which they also held that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

[36.45] Notes

The ruling in the principal case has been criticised on the ground that it implicitly adopts inappropriate archetypes such as the "scheming temptress" and the "benign romantic suitor": see Sarmas, "Storytelling and the Law: A Case Study of Louth v Diprose" (1994) 19 Melbourne University Law Review 701. CHAPTER 37

Impropriety by third parties

[37.10] THE RULE IN YERKEY V JONES 1087
[37.15] Garcia v National Australia Bank 1088

THREE-PARTY SITUATIONS

[37.05] The cases considered in Chapters 33–36 involve two parties; one party will have tainted the decision-making process of the other party (the plaintiff) through misleading conduct, or have exerted illegitimate pressure, undue influence or unconscionable conduct so as to justify the plaintiff being released from the resultant contract. In other cases, the consent of the plaintiff in entering into a contract with the defendant may be tainted by a person who is not a party to that contract (sometimes termed a third party). This chapter consider the circumstances in which a plaintiff who has been subject to pressure or exploitation emanating from a third party may obtain relief from a contract with a defendant.

For example, if P is coerced by TP to guarantee TP's debt to D (TP's bank); or if P is misled by TP's misrepresentation to charge P's property in favour of D (TP's bank) to secure TP's overdraft, then in certain circumstances, the guarantee or security can be set aside at the instance of P.

The possible grounds for challenging such a transaction include:

1. agency;
2. unconscionable dealing;
3. notice of undue influence;
4. in Australia, a special principle applying to wives who guarantee their husbands' loans; and
5. under statute, as discussed in Chapter 38.

THE RULE IN YERKEY V JONES

[37.10] In Australia, a special rule to protect wives who guaranteed their husbands' debts was enunciated by Dixon J in Yerkey v Jones (1940) 63 CLR 649 (Yerkey). There are two parts to the rule.

First, Dixon J explained at 678:

> Although the relation of husband to wife is not one of influence, yet the opportunities it gives are such that if the husband procures his wife to become surety for his debt a creditor who accepts her suretyship obtained through her husband has been treated as taking it subject to any invalidating conduct on the part of her husband even if the creditor be not actually privy to such conduct.

Secondly, Dixon J explained at 683 that:

> If a married woman's consent to become a surety of her husband's debts is procured by the husband and, without understanding its effect in essential respects, she executes an instrument of suretyship which the creditor accepts without dealing with her personally, she has a prima facie right to have it set aside.

The rule does not apply if the wife benefits from the transaction. If the debtor is not the husband but a company controlled by him, and the wife does not have a substantial interest in that company, the principle still applies.

To avoid having a guarantee or charge impeached, a lender may be obliged to take steps to ensure that it has reasonable grounds for believing that the consent of the guarantor was fairly obtained and that that consent, with the benefit of independent advice, was adequately informed.

In modern times, a number of issues arise: is special protection for married women consonant with the ideal of social and economic equality for spouses? Should the law countenance in this context a distinction between marital relationships on the one hand and other intimate relationships on the other? Has Yerkey been subsumed under the rule in Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447? Such questions confronted the High Court in the following case.

[37.15] Garcia v National Australia Bank Limited [1998] HCA 48; (1998) 194 CLR 395 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the New South Wales Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: In August 1979, Mrs Garcia (the appellant) and her husband executed a mortgage over their home in favour of the bank (the respondent). The mortgage was an "all-moneys" mortgage. It secured all moneys which the mortgagors might owe the mortgagee, including moneys owing under future guarantees given by either of them to the mortgagee. It was given to secure a loan made to the husband for use in his business and was later used as security for a personal loan made to the appellant and her husband. These loans were repaid, but the mortgage was not discharged.

The appellant's husband conducted a business of buying and selling gold through a company called Citizens Gold Bullion Exchange Pty Ltd (Citizens Gold). Between 1985 and 1987, the appellant signed four guarantees in favour of the respondent. Three of the guarantees guaranteed repayment to the bank of debts owed by Citizens Gold. Of these guarantees, one dated 25 November 1987 was limited to $270,000 plus interest, costs and charges (the November 1987 guarantee).

On 1 September 1988, the appellant and her husband separated. The appellant told the bank of this and asked that the bank account of Citizens Gold be kept within limits. After this, the balance of the Citizens Gold account fluctuated. On 13 October 1989, an order was made for the winding-up of Citizens Gold.

On 30 November 1989, the appellant obtained a decree nisi for dissolution of her marriage; that decree became absolute on 1 January 1990. The Family Court ordered that, subject to the mortgage in favour of the respondent, the appellant's husband transfer to her his interest in their property.

In June 1990, the appellant commenced proceedings in the Supreme Court of New South Wales seeking declarations that the mortgage and the guarantees she had given of the indebtedness of Citizens Gold were of no force or effect. She claimed relief on three bases: the rule in Amadio, the rule in Yerkey and undue influence.

In August 1990, the respondent demanded payment under the November 1987 guarantee and under the mortgage of amounts owing to it by Citizens Gold. It then made a cross-claim, in the proceedings commenced by the appellant, to claim possession of the mortgaged property and the sum which it had demanded.

The appellant had signed the November 1987 guarantee following requests by her husband to do so in order that (as he told her) he might deal in larger amounts of gold than he had been. There was, so the appellant's husband told her, no danger because "if the money isn't there the gold is there". She signed the document at the places to which the bank officer pointed, in a process which took less than a minute and included no explanation of the transaction. She understood at the time she signed that she was executing a guarantee and she believed it was a guarantee of Citizens Gold's overdraft. However, she did not understand that the guarantee was secured by the all-moneys mortgage which she had signed in 1979 and she signed the guarantee thinking that it was quite safe to do so or was "risk proof" because there would either be money there or gold.

The trial judge, Young J, granted a declaration that none of the guarantees which the appellant had given bound her and that there were no moneys owing by the appellant to the respondent under the mortgage in respect of that interest which the appellant had in the mortgage property immediately prior to the making of the order in the Family Court of Australia. This relief was granted to the appellant on the basis of Yerkey. Although the appellant was a director of Citizens Gold and was recorded as being a shareholder of the company, the company was found to be nothing more than Mr Garcia's creation, he being in complete control of it. The appellant was found not to be directly involved in Citizens Gold. Young J held further that the appellant's alternative case founded on Amadio was not made out. He found that, even if the behaviour of the appellant's husband towards her in relation to the execution of the November 1987 guarantee had been unconscionable, the respondent had no notice of that unconscionability when the appellant, an intelligent articulate lady with a professional position as a physiotherapist, called at the bank and appeared to be voluntarily signing a guarantee in respect of an account of which she was a director of the company concerned.

Although the appellant had pleaded a case of actual undue influence by her husband, Young J made no positive finding that the appellant's execution of the November 1987 guarantee had been procured by actual undue influence. He did find, however, that the husband pressured his wife to sign the document and that she appeared to have done so because her husband consistently pointed out what a fool she was in commercial matters whereas he was an expert, and because she was trying to save her marriage.

The respondent appealed to the Court of Appeal and the appellant cross-appealed. The Court of Appeal held that Yerkey no longer stated the law in Australia and that the relevant tests were now to be found exclusively in Amadio. The appeal of the respondent was therefore allowed, and the cross-appeal by the appellant was dismissed. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

GAUDRON, MCHUGH, GUMMOW and HAYNE JJ: [403] The Court of Appeal held ((1996) 39 NSWLR 577, 598 per Sheller JA, with whom Meagher JA agreed) that it was not bound to follow Yerkey v Jones. Sheller JA concluded that what had been said to be the principle in Yerkey v Jones is "a principle to which one judge only adhered", namely Dixon J, and "at its heart … is based upon general assumptions about the capacity of married women rather than upon evidence of the circumstances of the particular case" ((1996) 39 NSWLR 577, 598).

He identified in some recent cases an expression of "doubts about a principle founded on the assumption that a married woman is ipso facto under a special disadvantage in any transaction involving her husband and that the husband is in this context the stronger party" ((1996) 39 NSWLR 577, 593: European Asian of Australia Ltd v Kurland (1985) 8 NSWLR 192, 200 per Rogers J; Warburton v Whiteley (1989) 5 BPR 11,628 at 11,629–30 per Kirby P; cf Atkins v National Australia Bank (1994) 34 NSWLR 155; Teachers Health Investments Pty Ltd v Wynne (1994) 6 BPR 13,499). Accordingly, Sheller JA concluded that "the so-called principle in Yerkey v Jones should no longer be applied in New South Wales" ((1996) 39 NSWLR 577, 598).

We consider the better view to be that the reasons for decision of Dixon J in Yerkey v Jones were not significantly different from the reasons of the other members of the Court … However, we do not base our decision upon some confined analysis of the case intended to identify its ratio decidendi. Rather, we consider that the principles spoken of by Dixon J in Yerkey v Jones are simply particular applications of accepted equitable principles which have as much application today as they did then.

Yerkey v Jones was said, in argument, to reflect outdated views of society generally and the role of women in society in particular. It was submitted that changes in Australian society since 1939, when Yerkey v Jones was decided, require that equitable rules move on to meet these changed circumstances.

That Australian society, and particularly the role of women in that society, has changed in the last six decades is undoubted. But some things are unchanged. There is still a significant number of women in Australia in relationships which are, for many and varied reasons, marked by disparities of economic and other power between the [404] parties. However, the rationale of Yerkey v Jones is not to be found in notions based on the subservience or inferior economic position of women. Nor is it based on their vulnerability to exploitation because of their emotional involvement (Barclays Bank Plc v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180, 198 per Lord Browne-Wilkinson; cf Wilkinson v ASB Bank Ltd [1998] 1 NZLR 674, 689), save to the extent that the case was concerned with actual undue influence.

So far as Yerkey v Jones proceeded on the basis of the earlier decision of Cussen J in The Bank of Victoria Ltd v Mueller [1925] VLR 642, it is based on trust and confidence, in the ordinary sense of those words, between marriage partners. The marriage relationship is such that one, often the woman, may well leave many, perhaps all, business judgments to the other spouse. In that kind of relationship, business decisions may be made with little consultation between the parties and with only the most abbreviated explanation of their purport or effect. Sometimes, with not the slightest hint of bad faith, the explanation of a particular transaction given by one to the other will be imperfect and incomplete, if not simply wrong. That that is so is not always attributable to intended deception, to any imbalance of power between the parties, or, even, the vulnerability of one to exploitation because of emotional involvement. It is, at its core, often a reflection of no more or less than the trust and confidence each has in the other.

It may be that the principles applied in Yerkey v Jones will find application to other relationships more common now than was the case in 1939 – to long term and publicly declared relationships short of marriage between members of the same or of opposite sex – but that is not a question that falls for decision in this case. It may be that those principles will find application where the husband acts as surety for the wife but again that is not a problem that falls for decision here. This case concerns a husband and wife and it is to that relationship that the present decision relates, just as it is concerned only with the circumstance of the wife acting as surety for her husband. The resolution of questions arising in the context of other relationships may well require consideration of other issues. Thus to take one example, if cohabitation is taken as a criterion, what should a lender know or seek to find out about the nature of the relationship between the parties? But those issues did not arise and were not debated on the hearing of this appeal.

In his reasons for decision in Yerkey v Jones, Dixon J dealt with at least two kinds of circumstances: the first in which there is actual undue influence by a husband over a wife and the second, that dealt with in Mueller, in which there is no undue influence but there is a failure to explain adequately and accurately the suretyship transaction which the husband seeks to have the wife enter for the immediate economic benefit not of the wife but of the husband, or the [405] circumstances in which her liability may arise … The former kind of case is one concerning what today is seen as an imbalance of power. In point of legal principle, however, it is actual undue influence in that the wife, lacking economic or other power, is overborne by her husband and goes surety for her husband's debts when she does not bring a free mind and will to that decision. (See eg Howell "'Sexually Transmitted Debt': A Feminist Analysis of Laws Regulating Guarantors and Co-Borrowers" (1994) 4 Australian Feminist Law Journal 93; Fehlberg, "The Husband, the Bank, the Wife and Her Signature — The Sequel" (1996) 59 Modern Law Review 675; Fehlberg "Women in 'Family' Companies: English and Australian Experiences" (1997) 15 Company and Securities Law Journal 348.) The latter case is not so much concerned with imbalances of power as with lack of proper information about the purport and effect of the transaction. The present appeal concerns circumstances of the latter kind rather than the former.

In Yerkey v Jones Dixon J said ((1939) 63 CLR 649, 684):

> But it is clearly necessary to distinguish between, on the one hand, cases in which a wife, alive to the nature and effect of the obligation she is undertaking, is procured to become her husband's surety by the exertion by him upon her of undue influence, affirmatively established, and on the other hand, cases where she does not understand the effect of the document or the nature of the transaction of suretyship. In the former case the fact that the creditor, on the occasion, for example, of the actual execution of the instrument, deals directly with the wife and explains the effect of the document to her will not protect him. Nothing but independent advice or relief from the ascendancy of her husband over her judgment and will would suffice. If the creditor has left it to the husband to obtain his wife's consent to become surety and no more is done independently of the husband than to ascertain that she understands what she is doing, then, if it turns out that she is in fact acting under the undue influence of her husband, it seems that the transaction will be voidable at her instance as against the creditor.

Of the second of the two cases that we have referred to earlier, Dixon J said ((1939) 63 CLR 649, 685–6):

> In the second case, that where the wife agrees to become surety at the instance of her husband though she does not understand the effect of the document or the nature of the transaction, her failure to [406] do so may be the result of the husband's actually misleading her, but in any case it could hardly occur without some impropriety on his part even if that impropriety consisted only in his neglect to inform her of the exact nature of that to which she is willing blindly, ignorantly or mistakenly to assent. But, where the substantial or only ground for impeaching the instrument is misunderstanding or want of understanding of its contents or effect, the amount of reliance placed by the creditor upon the husband for the purpose of informing his wife of what she was about must be of great importance. If the creditor takes adequate steps to inform her and reasonably supposes that she has an adequate comprehension of the obligations she is undertaking and an understanding of the effect of the transaction, the fact that she has failed to grasp some material part of the document, or, indeed, the significance of what she is doing, cannot, I think, in itself give her an equity to set it aside, notwithstanding that at an earlier stage the creditor relied upon her husband to obtain her consent to enter into the obligation of surety. The creditor may have done enough by superintending himself the execution of the document and by attempting to assure himself by means of questions or explanation that she knows to what she is committing herself. The sufficiency of this must depend on circumstances, as, for example, the ramifications and complexities of the transaction, the amount of deception practised by the husband upon his wife and the intelligence and business understanding of the woman. But if the wife has been in receipt of the advice of a stranger whom the creditor believes on reasonable grounds to be competent, independent and disinterested, then the circumstances would need to be very exceptional before the creditor could be held bound by any equity which otherwise might arise from the husband's conduct and his wife's actual failure to understand the transaction: cf per Cussen J (The Bank of Victoria Ltd v Mueller [1925] VLR 642, 649).
> If undue influence in the full sense is not made out but the elements of pressure, surprise, misrepresentation or some or one of them combine with or cause a misunderstanding or failure to understand the document or transaction, the final question must be whether the grounds upon which the creditor believed that the document was fairly obtained and executed by a woman sufficiently understanding its purport and effect were such that it would be inequitable to fix the creditor with the consequences of the husband's improper or unfair dealing with his wife.

Thus, Dixon J was dealing with two kinds of case. In the former, the case of actual undue influence, as Dixon J says, explaining the effect of the document to the surety will not protect the creditor and

"[n]othing but independent advice or relief from the ascendancy of her [407] husband over her judgment and will would suffice" ((1939) 63 CLR 649, 684; cf Bank of New South Wales v Rogers (1941) 65 CLR 42). In the latter, "[i]f the creditor takes adequate steps to inform [the wife] and reasonably supposes that she has an adequate comprehension of the obligations she is undertaking and an understanding of the effect of the transaction, the fact that she has failed to grasp some material part of the document, or, indeed, the significance of what she is doing" ((1939) 63 CLR 649, 685) cannot give her an equity to set the instrument aside.

The term "unconscionable" does not appear in any of the judgments in Yerkey v Jones. In The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 446, Deane J said:

> I prefer the word "unconscientious" to "unconscionable" in this and other areas where equity has traditionally intervened to vindicate the requirements of good conscience. In deference to the generally accepted usage of "unconscionable" and "unconscionability" in this area by judges and writers however, I have thought it preferable to use those words in this judgment.

In Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447, 461 (see also Deane J at 474), Mason J said:

> Historically, courts have exercised jurisdiction to set aside contracts and other dealings on a variety of equitable grounds. They include fraud, misrepresentation, breach of fiduciary duty, undue influence and unconscionable conduct. In one sense they all constitute species of unconscionable conduct on the part of a party who stands to receive a benefit under a transaction which, in the eye of equity, cannot be enforced because to do so would be inconsistent with equity and good conscience. But relief on the ground of "unconscionable conduct" is usually taken to refer to the class of case in which a party makes unconscientious use of his superior position or bargaining power to the detriment of a party who suffers from some special disability or is placed in some special situation of disadvantage … Although unconscionable conduct in this narrow sense bears some resemblance to the doctrine of undue influence, there is a difference between the two. In the latter the will of the innocent party is not independent and voluntary because it is overborne. In the former the will of the innocent party, even if independent and voluntary, is the result of the disadvantageous position in which he is placed and of the other party unconscientiously taking advantage of that position.

It was submitted that Yerkey v Jones has been overruled by Amadio [408] or that the principles applied in Yerkey v Jones had been subsumed in principles applied in Amadio. There are several answers to this contention. First, there is nothing in Amadio that suggests that it was intended to overrule Yerkey v Jones or to subsume the rules applied there in some broader principle enunciated in Amadio.

Secondly, far from anything said in Amadio suggesting that it was intended to mark out the boundaries of the whole field of unconscionable conduct, as Mason J said ((1983) 151 CLR 447, 461): "It goes almost without saying that it is impossible to describe definitively all the situations in which relief will be granted on the ground of unconscionable conduct." Thirdly, Amadio was a case of unconscionable conduct very different from the cases considered in Yerkey v Jones. In Amadio there was actual misconduct on the part of the son of the respondents which affected their entry into the mortgage and guarantee and the bank was on notice of that misconduct. There was no allegation of undue influence by the son with notice on the part of the bank (a situation corresponding to that in Bank of New South Wales v Rogers (1941) 65 CLR 42), nor was the alleged case of undue influence on the part of the bank made out. What Mason J identified as "[t]he critical issue" was whether the plaintiffs were entitled to relief on the ground of unconscionable conduct ((1983) 151 CLR 447, 464). The transaction was not enforced against the respondents because it would have been unconscionable for the bank to do so. And it was unconscionable for the bank to enforce it because the bank's employee had shut his eyes to the vulnerability of the respondents and the misconduct of their son ((1983) 151 CLR 447, 467–8 per Mason J, 477–9 per Deane J). The principles applied in

Yerkey v Jones do not depend upon the creditor having, at the time the guarantee is taken, notice of some unconscionable dealing between the husband as borrower and the wife as surety. Yerkey v Jones begins with the recognition that the surety is a volunteer: a person who obtained no financial benefit from the transaction, performance of the obligations of which she agreed to guarantee. It holds, in what we have called the first kind of case, that to enforce that voluntary transaction against her when in fact she did not bring a free will to its execution would be unconscionable. It holds further, in the second kind of case, that to enforce it against her if it later emerges that she did not understand the purport [409] and effect of the transaction of suretyship would be unconscionable (even though she is a willing party to it) if the lender took no steps itself to explain its purport and effect to her or did not reasonably believe that its purport and effect had been explained to her by a competent, independent and disinterested stranger. And what makes it unconscionable to enforce it in the second kind of case is the combination of circumstances that:

(a) in fact the surety did not understand the purport and effect of the transaction;

(b) the transaction was voluntary (in the sense that the surety obtained no gain from the contract the performance of which was guaranteed);

(c) the lender is to be taken to have understood that, as a wife, the surety may repose trust and confidence in her husband in matters of business and therefore to have understood that the husband may not fully and accurately explain the purport and effect of the transaction to his wife; and yet

(d) the lender did not itself take steps to explain the transaction to the wife or find out that a stranger had explained it to her.

To hold, as Yerkey v Jones did, that in those circumstances the enforcement of the guarantee would be unconscionable represents no departure from accepted principle. Rather, it "conforms to the fundamental principle according to which equity acts, namely that a party having a legal right shall not be permitted to exercise it in such a way that the exercise amounts to unconscionable conduct" (Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406, 444 per Mason and Deane JJ citing Story, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, 12 ed (1877) vol 2 par 1316. See also Thompson v Palmer (1933) 49 CLR 507, 537 per Dixon J; The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) CLR 394, 441 per Deane J).

It will be seen that the analysis of the second kind of case identified in Yerkey v Jones is not one which depends upon any presumption of undue influence by the husband over the wife. As we have said, undue influence is dealt with separately and differently. Nor does the analysis depend upon identifying the husband as acting as agent for the creditor in procuring the wife's agreement to the transaction. Rather, it depends upon the surety being a volunteer and mistaken about the purport and effect of the transaction, and the creditor being taken to have appreciated that because of the trust and confidence between surety and debtor the surety may well receive from the debtor no sufficient explanation of the transaction's purport and effect. To enforce the transaction against a mistaken volunteer when the creditor, the party that seeks to take the benefit of the transaction, has not itself explained the transaction, and does not know that a third party has done so, would be unconscionable … [410] As is implicit in what we have said, we prefer not to adopt the analysis made by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in Barclays Bank plc [411] v O'Brien which proceeded from identifying "the circumstances in which the creditor will be taken to have had notice of the wife's equity to set aside the transaction" ([1994] 1 AC 180, 195). Sir Anthony Mason has pointed out that:

> constructive notice in O'Brien is used in order to ascertain whether a transaction about to be entered into is impeachable, not so as to fix a person who acquires an interest in the property with knowledge of an antecedent interest in property, that being the traditional function of constructive notice

Such an analysis may be required in ordering the priority of competing interests in property but in the present context it may well distract attention from the underlying principle: that the enforcement of the legal rights of the creditor would, in all the circumstances, be unconscionable.

We consider that the only question of notice that arises is whether the creditor knew at the time of the taking of the guarantee that the surety was then married to the borrower. Other questions of notice do not intrude.

As is apparent from what was said in Yerkey v Jones the creditor may readily avoid the possibility that the surety will later claim not to have understood the purport and effect of the transaction that is proposed. If the creditor itself explains the transaction sufficiently, or knows that the surety has received "competent, independent and disinterested" (Yerkey v Jones (1939) 63 CLR 649, 686 per Dixon J) advice from a third party, it would not be unconscionable for the creditor to enforce it against the surety even though the surety is a volunteer and it later emerges that the surety claims to have been mistaken.

What then of the present case? The trial judge found that the appellant did not understand the purport or effect of the transaction. She knew it was a guarantee but she thought it was a guarantee of limited overdraft accommodation to be applied only in the purchase of gold. Nor did she understand that her obligations under the guarantee were secured by the mortgage which she had given over her home. It being found that the bank took no step to explain the transaction to her and knew of no independent advice to her about it (there having been no such independent advice) the conclusion that the appellant was entitled to succeed in her claim to set the transaction aside was inevitable if she was a volunteer.

The trial judge found that the appellant was not "directly involved" in Citizens Gold (1993) 5 BPR 11,996, 12,006. And he made this finding notwithstanding that the surety was shown in records held by the Australian Securities Commission to be both a director of, and a shareholder in, the company. The records of Citizens Gold held at the Australian [412] Securities Commission presented, however, a confusing picture of movements in shareholdings over the years: so confusing that the trial judge said that it could be "seen from the records that the exact beneficial holding in the various companies (including Citizens Gold) is quite obscure" (1993) 5 BPR 11,996, 12,005. Although the trial judge found that from time to time some benefit flowed to the family from the companies, he found that they were companies that were in the "complete control" of the appellant's husband. Taken as a whole, those findings demonstrate that the appellant in fact obtained no real benefit from her entering the transaction; she was a volunteer. The fact that she was a director of the company is nothing to the point if, as the trial judge's findings show, she had no financial interest in the fortunes of the company.

We would therefore allow the appeal.

[37.20] KIRBY J: [His Honour expressed the opinion that the principle stated by Dixon J In Yerkey did not represent a ruling of the High Court. He then proceeded to give reasons why the principle should in any event be rejected.]

[421] [W]hy should this Court, in 1998, endorse a principle expressed to apply specifically to one class of citizens only, namely "married women"? For several reasons it should not. It should instead search for, and identify, a broader principle which is not confined to one group whose members have attributed to them particular needs and vulnerabilities which are certainly not confined to that group and which, in many cases, will not be present in members of that group. The classification is at once too narrow and too broad. Too narrow, for "[i]t is not based on and it inhibits a more developed understanding … of the broad features of social inequality in Australia". Too broad, for it ignores "the diversity of the experiences of women in Australia" (Australian Law Reform Commission, Equality Before the Law: Women's Equality (ALRC 69, Part II), (1994) at 249). It may have accommodated a perceived problem when Dixon J wrote his opinion in Yerkey in 1939. It is inappropriate to Australian circumstances today. It should not now receive the endorsement of this Court.

Historical anachronism

The first reason for rejecting Dixon J's supposed principle in Yerkey is that, even in 1939, it represented an historical anachronism …. Central to Dixon J's statement of principle in Yerkey are the equitable doctrines that arose out of the inability of married women to deal with property at common law … [422] These equitable principles established for the benefit of married women prior to the Married Women's Property Acts, and not, as such, the trust and confidence between marriage [423] partners, form the true basis of the supposed rule in Yerkey. Today, the capacity of a married woman to deal with her property freely as a feme sole is long established …

One particular need for deriving a new principle rather than following the supposed rule in Yerkey is that, since Dixon J expounded the latter in 1939, there have been enormous social changes relevant to women, married women and domestic relationships more generally. The anomalous character of the supposed rule in Yerkey is clear when it is remembered that the presumption does not, as stated, protect other classes of sureties in arguably analogous positions. For example, it gives no protection to a de facto spouse, an unmarried child in a position of dependence, a parent who is vulnerable to pressure from a child or a companion of either sex having a long-term domestic relationship with the borrower, the existence of which might easily have been elicited by acceptable questioning by the credit provider (Lehane, "Undue Influence, Misrepresentation and Third Parties", (1994) 110 Law Quarterly Review 167 at 169) … [424]

Rejecting discriminatory stereotypes

A principle which accords to all married women a "special equity" based on their supposed need for protection rests upon a stereotype of wives to which this Court should give no endorsement. All persons of capacity, including married women, should ordinarily conform to commercial transactions which they enter unless statute or judicial law affords relief. Marriage, and being the female member to a marriage, is not, as such, a relevant reason for relief from legal obligations. Some additional or different basis is required if relief is to be afforded. Whatever may have been the position in Australian society of 1939, it is offensive to the status of women today to suggest that all married women, as such, are needful of special protection supported by a legal presumption in their favour. Other cohabitees of a borrower may, in particular circumstances, be in a position at least as vulnerable as some wives. Some may be more so…. [425]

Marriage is not a suspect category

Given the rejection by our law of the notion that a presumption of undue influence arises from the relationship of marriage, it is inconsistent to persist with a presumption which rests upon the "invalidating tendency" by which a court will be more ready to find that a husband had exercised undue influence over his wife than in other cases ….

Economic arguments

In O'Brien, the House of Lords, after [426] rejecting the reasoning of Dixon J in Yerkey, referred to an additional economic argument ([1994] 1 AC 180, 188):

> Wealth is now more widely spread. Moreover a high proportion of privately owned wealth is invested in the matrimonial home. Because of the recognition by society of the equality of the sexes, the majority of matrimonial homes are now in the joint names of both spouses. Therefore in order to raise finance for the business enterprises of one or other of the spouses, the jointly owned home has become a main source of security. The provision of such security requires the consent of both spouses …. [There is a] need to ensure that the wealth currently tied up in the matrimonial home does not become economically sterile …. It is therefore essential that a law designed to protect the vulnerable does not render the matrimonial home unacceptable as security to financial institutions ….

There is yet another economic reason which Professor Cretney (Cretney, "The Little Woman and the Big Bad Bank", (1992) 108 Law Quarterly Review 534 at 538–9) has mentioned. He described it as a "more disturbing implication" of affording a specially protected status to married women, whatever the facts of their vulnerability or lack thereof. This is, that such a principle is likely to encourage a particular category of borrowers, and those associated with them, to seek to escape their lawful obligations by challenging the adequacy of the explanations given to their wives for the documents they have signed, beyond the protection now amply provided by statute (cf National Westminster Bank plc v Morgan [1985] AC 686, 708 per Lord Scarman) …

Unacceptable discrimination

There is a final reason for rejecting the special equity found by Dixon J in Yerkey. Since 1939, Australian society and its legal systems have moved away from irrelevant discrimination, whether on the ground of sex, matrimonial status or otherwise (Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) ss 5, 6, 7D(1)) … The stereotype underlying Yerkey may hold true for some, perhaps even a significant number of, wives. But this Court should, where possible, refuse to "classify unnecessarily and overbroadly by gender when more accurate and impartial" principles can be stated (Miller v Albright 66 USLW 4266 (1998) per Ginsburg J).

[429] With respect to those who are of the contrary view, I could not agree to endorsing the principle stated by Dixon J in Yerkey, limited as it is to married women. This Court should not adopt such criteria. As a matter of legal authority, it is not bound to do so. As a matter of legal principle, it should not do so …

[430] The majority in their reasons have shown that Amadio was not intended, or aptly expressed, to cover the whole field of unconscionable conduct. The fact that the Amadio principle is incapable of protecting volunteers who, because of the vulnerability of their personal relations with a borrower, and the lack of advice and information, bind themselves to a potentially prejudicial transaction, has been demonstrated several times … I favour a re-formulation of the principle expressed by Lord Browne-Wilkinson in O'Brien. It is my view that the principle should be stated thus: Where a person has entered into an obligation to stand [431] as surety for the debts of another and the credit provider knows, or ought to know, that there is a relationship involving emotional dependence on the part of the surety towards the debtor (in Wilkinson v ASB Bank Ltd [1998] 1 NZLR 6744, 691, the New Zealand Court of Appeal expressed the relationship as involving an emotional tie or dependence on the part of the guarantor towards the principal debtor):

(1) the surety obligation will be valid and enforceable by the credit provider unless the suretyship was procured by the undue influence, misrepresentation or other legal wrong of the principal debtor;

(2) if there has been undue influence, misrepresentation or other legal wrong by the principal debtor, unless the credit provider has taken reasonable steps to satisfy itself that the surety entered into the obligation freely and in knowledge of the true facts, the credit provider will be unable to enforce the surety obligation because it will be fixed with notice of the surety's right to set aside the transaction;

(3) unless there are special exceptional circumstances or the risks are large, a credit provider will have taken such reasonable steps to avoid being fixed with constructive notice if it warns the surety (at a meeting not attended by the principal debtor) of the amount of the surety's potential liability, of the risks involved to the surety's own interests and advises the surety to take independent legal advice. Out of respect for economic freedom, the duty of the credit provider will be limited to taking reasonable steps only …

In this way, equity is capable of affording a principle for relief in cases of this kind which (1) is expressed in non-discriminatory terms; (2) is addressed to the real causes of the vulnerability; and (3) recognises the credit provider's superior powers to insist that volunteers in a vulnerable position are afforded access to relevant information and, where necessary, independent advice. The House of Lords concluded in this general way in O'Brien. This Court should follow and adopt that decision. It is applicable to the circumstances of this case … [T]he credit provider will be fixed with constructive notice if it knows facts sufficient to put it on inquiry as to the possibility of wrongdoing by the debtor and it fails to inquire. In Bank of New South Wales v Rogers (1941) 65 CLR 42, for example, the debtor was the surety's uncle with whom she was in a long-standing relationship of dependency. It was held that the credit provider knew enough about their relationship to put it on inquiry as to the circumstances in which the guarantee was given …

A credit provider will be put on inquiry by a combination of two factors: (1) the transaction is not on its face to the personal financial advantage of the party offering the security; and (2) there is a relationship which is known, or which ought to be known, by the credit provider involving an emotional dependency on the part of the surety towards the debtor (O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 180, 196) …

[434] When I turn to apply the principle in O'Brien, modified in the way that I have re-expressed it, I consider that (although for reasons different than he expressed), the orders of the primary judge were correct. The Bank knew, or could readily have discovered, that [435] Mrs Garcia reposed trust and confidence in her husband in relation to her financial affairs. Mrs Garcia was thus in a position of potential vulnerability to demands that she should act as a surety, even if the Bank had no reasonable means of knowing the details of the particular stresses of her personal relationship. Breakdown of personal relationships is sufficiently common in Australia to have alerted a credit provider, such as the Bank, to the potentiality of this surety's vulnerability. This is particularly so where (as here) a domestic home in which the borrower lived was put at risk by the surety arrangements. The Bank could readily, without unduly intrusive questions, have discovered the nature of the parties' relationship. It was already aware that they were cohabitees. Formalities and public declaration of their relationship (assuming the latter to be possible and appropriate) would not be necessary. Sufficient that basic questioning disclosed a transaction on its face of little or no specific advantage to the proposed surety and that such party stood at high risk in relation to the roof over her head.

Misrepresentation by Mr Garcia to his wife being established, together with constructive notice of the potential vulnerability of the wife, the Bank is unable to enforce the surety obligation against her because it is fixed with constructive notice of her right to set aside the transaction having regard to its failure to take reasonable steps to satisfy itself that she entered the obligation freely and with knowledge of the relevant facts. It is here that the principal weakness in the Bank's case is obvious. As the primary judge found, in this case the Bank's ordinary procedures were not followed. Mrs Garcia was given no advice or explanation of the documents which she was signing. Still less was she told to seek independent advice or that such evidence would be a pre-condition to the Bank's acceptance of her guarantee. The fact that she was a director of the company and that she presented as an "intelligent articulate lady" in a professional position is certainly relevant. But it is not ultimately determinative. To the knowledge of the Bank, the home in which she lived was being placed in jeopardy. The Bank failed to insist that she was made fully aware of that risk. In such circumstances, there being no exceptional reasons to hold otherwise, the Bank was unable to enforce the surety obligation. Although the case is not clear cut and some of the evidence supported the Bank's arguments, I have concluded that the primary judge was right to hold as he did. Banks and other credit providers can protect themselves from this result. Most already do so …

[436] I agree in the orders proposed.

[37.25] CALLINAN J: [His Honour expressed the view that the principles stated by Dixon J in Yerkey had not been dissented from by the other judges in that case, and that those principles, accepted as part of Australian law, had served the ends of justice for a long time. Further, they had not been overruled or subsumed by Amadio.]

[442] As extensive as the changes – perhaps more apparent than real – in sexual and matrimonial relationships may in recent times have been, I would not wish in this case to attempt to state a principle to encompass all cases. Indeed, given the diversity of human relationships, it would not only be imprudent but probably also impossible to do so. I would not, with respect, adopt the principle settled by the House of Lords in Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien, that any exceptional rules formerly applicable to guarantees by wives of husbands' obligations should be extended to co-habitees in cases in which the creditor is aware of an emotional relationship between the co-habitees. Such a principle might, in some circumstances (leaving aside potential difficulties associated with the proof and definition of an emotional relationship) narrow the range of people deserving of protection by reason of their occupation of a special position, or the suffering of a special disability of the kind considered by the Court in Amadio. Indeed, this may, in any event, be an area more fit for legislative than judicial intervention.

The trial judge in this case made two critical findings in favour of the appellant:

> In the instant case, the husband pressured the wife to sign the document. She appeared to have done so because her husband consistently pointed out what a fool she was in commercial matters whereas he was an expert, and because she was trying to save her marriage.

(Garcia v National Australia Bank Ltd (1993) 5 BPR 11,996 at 12,009 per Young J.)

> Accordingly we have here a situation where Mrs Garcia was informed by her husband that there would be no risk, she signed the guarantee on that basis and were it not for something that happened thereafter, there would have been no problem.

(Garcia v National Australia Bank Ltd (1993) 5 BPR 11,996 at 12,011 per Young J.) These two findings as to pressure and misrepresentation are almost precisely within the language used by Dixon J in Yerkey (1939) 63 CLR 649, 686:

> If undue influence in the full sense is not made out but the [443] elements of pressure, surprise, misrepresentation or some or one of them combine with or cause a misunderstanding or failure to understand the document or transaction, the final question must be whether the grounds upon which the creditor believed that the document was fairly obtained and executed by a woman sufficiently understanding its purport and effect were such that it would be inequitable to fix the creditor with the consequences of the husband's improper or unfair dealing with his wife …

Very rarely will such findings as were made here, be open in the case of a wife with the qualifications, experience and other attributes possessed by this appellant. One aspect of the change that has occurred in the enhancement of women's opportunities and relief from discrimination is that in practice, wives may find it more difficult to satisfy a court that they have succumbed to pressure or have been misled by their husbands in financial matters. I do not doubt however that there are likely today to be many married women still in need of the special protection that Yerkey offers. Furthermore I do not think that there is any injustice to a lender in requiring it to be diligent in the way in which Yerkey prescribes in the case of married women who enter into transactions advantageous to husbands or legal personalities controlled by them, but which are disadvantageous or potentially so to the wife. No occasion arises in this case to express any different principles from those stated in Yerkey. On his findings the learned trial judge was bound to apply Yerkey and correctly did so. I would uphold the appeal and agree with the orders of Gaudron, McHugh, Gummow and Hayne JJ.

[37.30] Notes

1. In the principal case, Kirby J declared the importance of gender-neutral principles, whereas Callinan J adopted gender-specific principles. The joint judgment of the remaining judges presents a gender-neutral rationale for the rule in Yerkey. A question arises as to which approach best forwards the cause of equality for women. Some feminists, who support the view that women are "different" from men, and who believe that the law must take that difference into account, might support Callinan J's approach. Other feminists, who support the view that there are no significant differences between men and women, and who believe that legal distinctions between the sexes should be eliminated, might support Kirby J's approach. Yet other feminists might take the view that both these approaches fail to focus on the main reality, which is the subordination of women to men and, in particular, the economic inequality in marriage.

2. The ruling in Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1994] 1 AC 80 (adopted in modified form by Kirby J in the principal case) failed to forestall a substantial amount of litigation in England in subsequent years. However, further guidance for both lenders and solicitors acting for sureties was given by the House of Lords in Royal Bank of Scotland plc v Etridge (No 2) [2001] UKHL 44; [2002] 2 AC 773.

3. Different views have been expressed in the lower courts as to the type of relationships to which the principles in Yerkey might apply. In Kranz v National Australia Bank Ltd [2003] VSCA 92; (2003) 8 VR 310, [24]–[31], the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of Victoria held that the principles would apply where the lender was aware of a relationship of "trust and confidence" between the guarantor and the borrower. See also Agripay Pty Limited v Byrne [2011] QCA 85, [4]; McIvor v Westpac Banking Corporation [2012] QSC 404, [104]. However, in Permanent Mortgages Pty Ltd v Vandenbergh [2010] WASC 10, [197], Murphy J refused to extend the principles to the relationship of aged parent/child. A different view was expressed in State Bank of New South Wales Ltd v Layoun [2001] NSW ConvR 55-984, [74]–[76]; Siglin v Choules [2002] WASCA 9; Australian Regional Credit Pty Ltd v Mula [2009] NSWSC 325, [138]–[139]; McIvor v Westpac Banking Corporation [2012] QSC 404, [104]; Alceon Group Pty Ltd v Rose [2015] NSWSC 868.

Unconscionable conduct under statute

[38.05] THE STATUTORY PROHIBITION ON UNCONSCIONABLE CONDUCT 1101
[38.25] Financial services 1101

[38.33] SECTION 20: UNCONSCIONABLE CONDUCT "WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE UNWRITTEN LAW" 1102

[38.50] Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt 1102

THE STATUTORY PROHIBITION ON UNCONSCIONABLE CONDUCT

[38.05] Part 2-2 of the Australian Consumer Law (ACL) contains broad prohibitions on unconscionable conduct in trade or commerce, replacing those in ss 51AA, 51AB and 51AC of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) (TPA). Under the ACL, and unlike the TPA, the prohibition on unconscionable conduct applies to persons, not merely corporations, in trade or commerce. (The meaning of this phrase is discussed in Chapter 33 in relation to misleading and deceptive conduct.) Case law dealing with the prohibitions on unconscionable conduct under the TPA remains relevant in determining the scope of the prohibition on unconscionable conduct under the ACL.

The prohibitions on unconscionable conduct in the ACL are supplemented in New South Wales by the Contracts Review Act 1980 (Cth), which provides relief against "unjust contracts", which is also considered in this Chapter.

Financial services

[38.25] Section 131A provides that the ACL does not apply "to the supply, or possible supply, of services that are financial services, or of financial products". These transactions are regulated under the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act 2001 (Cth). Sections 12CA, 12CB and 12CC of the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act 2001 replicate ss 20, 21 and 22 of the ACL respectively.

Redress and remedies

[38.30] Remedies available for unconscionable conduct under the ACL include: undertakings (Pt 5-1, Div 1), substantiation notices (Pt 5-1, Div 2), public warning notices (Pt 5-1, Div 2), injunctions (s 232), damages (s 236), compensatory orders (Pt 5-2, Div 4, subdiv A and C), redress for non-parties (Pt 5-2, Div 4, subdiv B and C) and non-punitive orders (Pt 5-2, Div 5, s 246). In addition courts may order the payment of a civil pecuniary penalty for a contravention of the provisions precluding unconscionable conduct (s 224).

The remedies for violation of the prohibitions in Pt 2-2 of the ACL are discussed in Chapter 33 in relation to the prohibition on misleading and deceptive conduct. While there is little case law on this issue, it may be presumed that similar principles would apply to govern the application of the remedial provisions in the ACL to contraventions of the statutory prohibitions on unconscionable conduct.

SECTION 20: UNCONSCIONABLE CONDUCT "WITHIN THE MEANING OF THE UNWRITTEN LAW"

[38.33] Section 20 provides:

> (1) A person must not, in trade or commerce, engage in conduct that is unconscionable, within the meaning of the unwritten law from time to time.

Under subs (2), s 20 does not apply to conduct that is prohibited by s 21. Section 21 applies to sales and acquisitions of goods and services in trade or commerce.

Until 2019 s 21 did not apply to conduct involving a listed public company and a number of business to business claims of unconscionable conduct were brought under this section, such as, for example, Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v CG Berbatis Holdings Pty Ltd [2003] HCA 18; (2003) 214 CLR 51. With the removal of this limitation, there are now very few, if any, transactions to which s 20 will apply.

SECTION 21: STATUTORY UNCONSCIONABLE CONDUCT

[38.45] Section 21 of the ACL provides that:

> A person must not, in trade or commerce, in connection with:
>
> (a) the supply or possible supply of goods or services to a person; or
>
> (b) the acquisition or possible acquisition of goods or services from a person;
> engage in conduct that is, in all the circumstances, unconscionable.

Note that, unlike the provisions in the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth), ss 21, 51AB and 51AC does not distinguish between unconscionable conduct in business to consumer and business to business transactions. Unconscionable conduct under s 21 is not defined. Section 21(4) contains a set of interpretative principles guiding the courts' application of s 21.

Section 22 contains a list of considerations to which the court may have regard in determining whether conduct is unconscionable.

In addition to the case extracted below, the statutory prohibition on unconscionable conduct is considered in Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2016] HCA 28; 258 CLR 525, at [28.85].

Mr Kobelt supplied credit to purchasers at his general store in a remote Aboriginal community, selling goods such as food, groceries, fuel and second-hand cars. Primarily for indigenous customers, the Anangu people, Mr Kobelt provided credit to a "book-up" system. This credit was typically used to fund the purchase of second-hand cars from Mr Kobelt. The customers lacked financial sophistication and were impoverished. The customers supplied Mr Kobelt with a debit card linked to their bank accounts and gave him their personal identification numbers. Mr Kobelt would then access their accounts and withdraw funds. He typically did this early in the morning on the day wages or Centrelink payments were credited to the customers. Mr Kobelt would keep half of the customer's regular income as repayment of their debt and the other half was made available on an informal basis for the customer's use. Generally, customers who had no funds left in their bank accounts were allowed to purchase only milk, bread and meat. If a customer paid for a vehicle in cash, the purchase price was discounted by around $1,000. No records of withdrawals or account statements were given. The appellant brought proceedings against the respondent in the Federal Court of Australia alleging contraventions of s 29(1) of the National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (Cth), engaging in credit activities without a licence, and s 12CB of the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act 2001, pleading a system or pattern of conduct by reference to the supply of book-up credit to 117 of the respondent's Anangu customers.

The primary judge found that Mr Kobelt had contravened s 29(1) and engaged in a system of conduct or pattern of behaviour which was unconscionable. On the respondent's appeal to the Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia, the primary judge's finding of unconscionable conduct was set aside. The sole issue on appeal to the High Court of Australia was whether the respondent's conduct was "in all the circumstances, unconscionable" in contravention of s 12CB(1) of the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act 2001.]

KIEFEL CJ AND BELL J:

Introduction

[1] Residents of some Aboriginal communities located in rural and remote Australia have been accustomed to obtaining credit from storekeepers under arrangements known as "book-up". Under these arrangements, the customer may be required to give the storekeeper the debit card ("keycard") linked to the bank account to which the customer's wages or Centrelink payments are credited, and to disclose the personal identification number ("PIN") for the keycard. The storekeeper is authorised to withdraw funds from the customer's account in reduction of the customer's debt and in return for the supply of goods over the interval between the customer's "pay days".

[2] Book-up credit appears to have developed in association with the extension of social security entitlements to Aboriginal Australians in the late 1950s. Initially, arrangements might have been made for the recipient's social security cheque to be posted to a nominated store in the expectation that it would be cashed in the store and the proceeds applied to the purchase of goods from the store over the course of the succeeding fortnight. The change to the supply of the customer's keycard and PIN is suggested to have come about as the result of changes in the way Centrelink payments and other periodic payments are made.

[3] In 2002, the Australian Securities and Investments Commission ("ASIC") commissioned a report on problems associated with book-up credit ("the Renouf report"). The author observed that, in the absence of alternative appropriate financial services, [749] book-up is often the only means for Aboriginal consumers to obtain access to credit. Book-up credit was described in the Renouf report as "a convenient way of managing money over a fortnightly or weekly payment cycle for consumers who lack financial management skills or are affected by cultural pressure to immediately share resources when they are available".

[4] The issue presented by the appeal is whether the supply of credit to the residents of remote communities in the Anangu Pitjantjatjara Yankunytjatjara Lands ("the APY Lands"), under the book-up system maintained by the respondent, Mr Kobelt, contravened the proscription of unconscionable conduct fixed by s 12CB(1) of the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act 2001 (Cth) ("the ASIC Act").

Sections 12CB and 12CC of the ASIC Act

[5] In the form in which it was in force from 1 January 2012 to 25 October 2018 (The provision was further amended with effect from 26 October 2018 by the Treasury Laws Amendment (Australian Consumer Law Review) Act 2018 (Cth), Sch 2 items 1-2 by omitting the words "(other than a listed public company)" from s 12CB(1)(a)-(b) and omitting s 12CB(5)), s 12CB relevantly provided:

(1) A person must not, in trade or commerce, in connection with:

(a) the supply or possible supply of financial services to a person (other than a listed public company); or

(b) the acquisition or possible acquisition of financial services from a person (other than a listed public company); engage in conduct that is, in all the circumstances, unconscionable.

(3) For the purpose of determining whether a person has contravened subsection (1):

(a) the court must not have regard to any circumstances that were not reasonably foreseeable at the time of the alleged contravention; and

(b) the court may have regard to conduct engaged in, or circumstances existing, before the commencement of this section.

(4) It is the intention of the Parliament that:

(a) this section is not limited by the unwritten law of the States and Territories relating to unconscionable conduct; and

(b) this section is capable of applying to a system of conduct or pattern of behaviour, whether or not a particular individual is identified as having been disadvantaged by the conduct or behaviour; and

(c) in considering whether conduct to which a contract relates is unconscionable, a court's consideration of the contract may include consideration of:

(i) the terms of the contract; and

(ii) the manner in which and the extent to which the contract is carried out; and is not limited to consideration of the circumstances relating to formation of the contract.

[6] Section 12CC(1) contains a non-exhaustive statement of matters to which the court may have regard for the purpose of determining whether a person has contravened s 12CB in connection with the supply, or possible supply, of financial services. Relevantly, these include:

(a) the relative strengths of the bargaining positions of the supplier and the service recipient; and

(b) whether, as a result of conduct engaged in by the supplier, the service recipient was required to comply with conditions that were not reasonably necessary for the protection of the legitimate interests of the supplier; and

(c) whether the service recipient was able to understand any documents relating to the supply or possible supply of the financial services; and

(d) whether any undue influence or pressure was exerted on, or any unfair tactics were used against, the service recipient or a person acting on behalf of the service recipient by the supplier or a person acting on behalf of the supplier in relation to the supply or possible supply of the financial services; and

(e) the amount for which, and the circumstances under which, the service recipient could have acquired identical or equivalent financial services from a person other than the supplier; and

(j) if there is a contract between the supplier and the service recipient for the supply of the financial services:

(i) the extent to which the supplier was [750] willing to negotiate the terms and conditions of the contract with the service recipient; and

(ii) the terms and conditions of the contract; and

(iii) the conduct of the supplier and the service recipient in complying with the terms and conditions of the contract; and

(l) the extent to which the supplier and the service recipient acted in good faith.

[Kiefel CJ and Bell J outlined the procedural history of the case.]

Mr Kobelt's book-up system

[20] Mr Kobelt has had limited education and has lived in a remote community for significant parts of his working life. From the mid-1980s, he operated a general store in Mintabie, South Australia, under the name "Nobbys Mintabie General Store" ("Nobbys"). Mintabie is situated in the far north of South Australia, approximately 1,100 km from Adelaide in an area excised by lease to the Government of South Australia from the APY Lands. A range of goods including food, groceries, fuel and second-hand cars was sold at Nobbys. Almost all of Mr Kobelt's customers were Anangu persons who resided predominantly in two remote communities, Mimili and Indulkana, north-west of Mintabie in the APY Lands. These customers were characterised by their poverty and their low levels of literacy and numeracy which, relevantly, meant that they lacked "financial literacy".

[21] Mr Kobelt supplied credit to his Anangu customers under a book-up system by which payment for goods was deferred in whole or in part subject to the customer supplying Mr Kobelt with the keycard and PIN linked to the account into which the customer's wages or Centrelink payments were credited. Generally, Mr Kobelt retained possession of the keycard until the debt was repaid, although on occasions Mr Kobelt returned a customer's keycard notwithstanding that the debt had not been repaid. This might happen if the customer was travelling away from the APY Lands. On such occasions, the customer returned the keycard to Nobbys on his or her return. There were two other stores in Mintabie and at least one of these stores provided credit to Anangu customers under a book-up scheme that did not materially differ from that provided by Mr Kobelt.

[22] Mr Kobelt, or members of his family who assisted in the running of Nobbys, used the keycard and PIN to access the customer's account and to withdraw the whole or nearly the whole of the available funds ("the withdrawal conduct"). The majority of withdrawals were made early in the morning, before or shortly after Nobbys opened, on the day funds were credited to the account. Withdrawals were made promptly to prevent the customer having any practical opportunity to access the monies in the account by internet or telephone banking. Mr Kobelt did not know the amount in a customer's account and the process of withdrawing funds was one of trial and error. There were occasions when funds had been withdrawn in excess of a limitation placed on Mr Kobelt's authority.

[23] Customers were not required to complete any form of application to obtain book-up credit and additional credit was available under the book-up system without further formality. The withdrawal of funds from Mr Kobelt's customers' accounts was authorised and was subject to an informal understanding that part of the funds would be applied in reduction of the customer's debt and part was in exchange for the provision of future goods and services. Mr Kobelt applied at least 50 per cent of the funds withdrawn from his customers' accounts to reduce their indebtedness to Nobbys. Mr Kobelt said that the remaining 50 per cent of his customers' funds was available for the customer's use. Mr Kobelt did not apply the customers' "entitlement" to 50 per cent of the funds in a literal way; 50 per cent served Mr Kobelt as a guideline for the maximum amount available to the customer's use ("the book-down").

[24] Mr Kobelt exercised control over the amount of the book-down, limiting his customers to amounts of $100, $150 or $200 to ensure that they would have "something" at the end of the week. Mr Kobelt's discretionary control over his book-up customers extended on occasions to the refusal to allow the customer to buy sweets or chips. The primary judge accepted Mr Kobelt's evidence that he had never refused to supply food to a customer from whose account he had withdrawn all the money. Generally, such customers were limited to the purchase of milk, bread and meat.

[25] Anangu customers had to travel a considerable distance to shop at Nobbys. Mr Kobelt issued purchase orders which enabled his book-up customers to purchase goods, or to obtain cash, at other stores. Purchase orders were transmitted by Mr Kobelt to nominated stores and were issued in amounts ranging from $20 to $500. The customer was able to purchase goods, or obtain cash, at the nominated store and Mr Kobelt settled with the store owner. Mr Kobelt charged customers a fee of $5 or $10 for the issue of a purchase order. The fee was less than the fee charged by Australia Post for its express money order service. Mr Kobelt also provided customers with cash advances under the book-up system. At least some customers who were given a cash advance paid a fee for the service.

[26] Most of the book-up credit provided by Mr Kobelt to his Anangu customers was made in connection with the sale of second-hand motor vehicles. The sale of these vehicles formed a significant part of Mr Kobelt's business. The vehicles sold at Nobbys often had been driven in excess of 200,000 km and were not subject to any statutory warranty of repair. In some instances, purchasers paid for a vehicle in cash. In these instances, the purchase price was discounted by around $1,000. More commonly, Anangu customers paid a deposit of between $440 and $3,500 and the balance of the purchase price was repaid under the book-up system.

[27] Mr Kobelt maintained that he did not impose any credit charge on goods sold to his Anangu customers. The primary judge rejected Mr Kobelt's evidence in this respect in relation to the sale of second-hand motor vehicles. His Honour found that cash-paying customers were able to purchase a Nobbys vehicle at a price around $1,000 less than the stated price. In truth, his Honour found that book-up customers purchasing second-hand vehicles at Nobbys, for an average price of $5,600, were paying an expensive credit charge. His Honour's conclusion that Mr Kobelt's conduct was unconscionable took into account the fact that the credit charge had not been made explicit to his book-up customers (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [551]).

[28] The evidence did not establish whether car dealers in Alice Springs and Port Augusta, with whom Mr Kobelt compared the prices for his cars, and whom he regarded as his competitors, sold cars to Anangu persons on credit. The majority of Mr Kobelt's Anangu book-up customers did not own assets which could be pledged as security for a loan. The primary judge recognised that it would have been difficult for Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers to obtain loans from commercial lenders. His Honour acknowledged that an advantage of Mr Kobelt's book-up system was that it provided a relatively simple means by which Anangu persons could obtain credit that would not otherwise be available to them (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [510]).

[29] Mr Kobelt knew most of his Anangu customers and he was aware of their financial circumstances. He did not make inquiries about his Anangu customers' capacity to repay the balance of the purchase price of a second-hand car or other consumer good before entering into book-up credit arrangements with the customer. Over a period of ten years, Mr Kobelt had only refused to extend book-up credit to about 12 to 15 customers. He had a total customer base of 600 Anangu persons, of whom about 200 visited his store each week.

[30] Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers had the capacity to frustrate their book-up credit contracts by cancelling their keycard or by arranging for their Centrelink payments, or wages, to be credited to a different account. Some customers had done so. In those cases, with one exception, Mr Kobelt had chosen not to pursue any avenues of debt recovery. He appreciated that it was not in his commercial or reputational interest to do so.

[31] Mr Kobelt had an unsophisticated approach to many matters, which was manifest in his book-up arrangements. His record-keeping was rudimentary. Such records as he kept of book-up transactions were illegible or only barely legible. Entries were so cramped and chaotic that it was difficult to understand fully the state of the running accounts of the 117 book-up customers at any given time. Customers were not given any record of withdrawals or account statements. There was no evidence that any customer had asked to examine Mr Kobelt's records of book-up transactions. Had such an inquiry been made, the customer would have had considerable difficulty understanding the entries and no means of checking their accuracy. There was no suggestion, however, that Mr Kobelt maintained his records dishonestly, nor was it part of ASIC's system case that the withdrawal of funds from customers' accounts was not authorised. And Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers had a basic understanding of his book-up credit system.

The anthropological evidence

[32] ASIC adduced evidence from Dr Martin, an anthropologist, who at ASIC's request visited Mimili and Indulkana and interviewed a number of Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers. In his report, Dr Martin explained the "intersection between the distinctive Anangu society and culture of the APY Lands, and the wider Australian society and its culture and institutions (including the legal and financial systems)", observing that there are "varying degrees of incommensurability" between Anangu values and practices and those of the wider Australian society. Dr Martin stated that the Anangu have adapted their values and practices to accommodate those of the market economy through the personalisation of financial transactions, that is, Anangu consumers prefer to conduct financial transactions through the use of brokers, such as storekeepers. The face-to-face contact involved in the supply of book-up credit, as distinct from reliance on paperwork, was perceived by Dr Martin's Anangu interviewees as consistent with Anangu customs.

[33] As Dr Martin explained the phenomenon, Anangu customers entrusted Mr Kobelt with their keycards to enable them to exercise "agency" in the sense of the capacity to act and to exercise choice in what was perceived to be the individual's own interests. Several interviewees reported "that they supported book-up in general and were positively disposed to Nobby's Credit Facility in particular". Dr Martin got no sense that any of the individuals whom he interviewed "felt that the terms on which Nobby's provided credit to them were unjust, unfair, or unreasonable".

[34] Dr Martin explained that motor vehicles have come to be central to social, ceremonial and economic life among Aboriginal communities in the APY Lands; they provide access to country necessary for hunting and gathering, visiting kin in other communities, increased shopping opportunities away from communities, attending sporting fixtures, attending medical appointments and, importantly, participation in initiation and funerals. Anangu interviewees told Dr Martin that book-up was the only means by which they could purchase a vehicle.

[35] Apart from enabling impoverished Anangu customers to acquire second-hand motor vehicles and other consumer goods on credit, the anthropological evidence pointed to book-up credit as having two particular advantages in light of Anangu culture and practices. Dr Martin explained that it is common for the Aboriginal residents of remote communities to spend money as it becomes available without regard to the medium- to long-term consequences of the expenditure (the "boom and bust cycle"). The primary judge acknowledged that the limitation that Mr Kobelt placed on the amount which the customer could expend by way of book-down had a beneficial effect in ameliorating the boom and bust cycle.

[36] Dr Martin also explained that an embedded social obligation of the Anangu requires that they share their resources with specific categories of kin ("humbugging" or "demand sharing"). The obligation is a foundational principle of Anangu life: the giver has a responsibility to share and the recipient the right to share, even to the point of demanding a share. The primary judge found that money is the subject of demand sharing and Anangu persons who are believed to have access to money may be importuned to the extent of being bullied and exploited to share it. In this respect his Honour referred to the account of a financial counsellor, Mr Stauner (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [576]):

> Humbug [is an] ongoing problem in communities across the APY Lands, this is where family members or friends pressure other members of the community for cash, food, use of their car or telephone without considering the feelings of the other party. [T]his is also mostly done in the family group where younger members of the family pressure the older members.

[37] Mr Stauner had witnessed residents of the APY Lands being subject to immediate demands to share cash withdrawn from an ATM. The Mimili storekeeper also gave evidence of witnessing behaviour of this description. According to the storekeeper the practice was common and was not confined to the kin of the resident making the withdrawal.

[38] The primary judge acknowledged that Mr Kobelt's book-up system may confer an incidental benefit on Anangu customers by relieving the pressure of demand sharing. Nonetheless, his Honour considered that any such advantage should not be overstated (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [585]). Although all six Anangu witnesses gave evidence of sharing their money with others and of using it to buy goods which were shared with others, none gave evidence of feeling pressured or overborne or of being bullied. Only one witness gave evidence that the desire to avoid demand sharing was the reason for engaging in [755] book-up credit (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [582]). Other Anangu witnesses acknowledged that they had felt an obligation to share and that one of the reasons that they liked shopping at Nobbys was that they could do so away from the gaze of others. Nonetheless, his Honour considered that this evidence fell short of a statement that the reason for engaging in book-up credit was to avoid demand sharing.

[39] A further reason for discounting the significance of demand sharing as an advantage of the book-up system was the primary judge's view that Mr Kobelt's conduct in depriving his customers of access to their own funds increased the likelihood that the customers themselves would engage in a form of demand sharing with those who still had access to funds (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [584]). His Honour noted the availability of financial counselling to Anangu residents of Mimili and Indulkana through the MoneyMob service (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [572]). In the circumstances, the finding was that the avoidance of improvident spending did not justify the withdrawal conduct under Mr Kobelt's book-up arrangements.

[40] Save for two witnesses who had particular grievances, the primary judge found that Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers considered that he had treated them well and they were well-disposed towards him. It was evident that they appreciated the ability to buy food in between their pay days (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [588]). His Honour accepted that many of Mr Kobelt's Anangu book-up customers were satisfied with the book-up arrangement. This was evidenced, among other things, by the fact that several customers had entered into book-up credit arrangements with Mr Kobelt on more than one occasion, returning to Nobbys to hand over their keycards and PINs (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [591]).

[41] The primary judge approached the determination upon an acceptance that "[t]here are undoubtedly features of the Book-up system which several of the Book-up customers find attractive" (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [591]) and "[w]hether rightly or wrongly and whether well informed or not, each [Anangu witness] must have considered [book-up credit] appropriate to their needs" (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [588]).

[42] The primary judge's finding of unconscionability took into account evidence of an occasion when, as the result of the failure of the Commonwealth Bank's computer system, Mr Kobelt had been able to withdraw sums from his customers' accounts which were well in excess of the available balance in those accounts (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [93]). While this incident ("the CBA glitch") did not form part of the book-up system, his Honour considered that it was difficult to avoid the conclusion that Mr Kobelt had "on this occasion prey[ed] on the customers with CBA accounts to his own advantage" (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [550]).

[43] The principal consideration which informed the primary judge's conclusion was that there was no necessity for Mr Kobelt to withdraw the whole of the customer's funds in order to protect Mr Kobelt's legitimate interests (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [522]). The primary judge identified a number of alternative means by which Mr Kobelt might have protected his legitimate interests while permitting his Anangu customers to purchase goods from Nobbys on credit. His Honour accepted that these alternative arrangements may not have been available in all cases, or, even if available, may not have been satisfactory in all cases. Nonetheless, they served to indicate that the book-up system operated by Mr Kobelt went well beyond that which was necessary for the protection of his own legitimate interests (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [525]-[538]).

[44] His Honour found that Mr Kobelt acted with "a degree of good faith" in his dealings with his Anangu customers. However, this did not mean that Mr Kobelt acted in an "altruistic or disinterested way" (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [559]). His Honour observed that Mr Kobelt was at all times pursuing his own interests, and that he had done so even when the pursuit of those interests was [756] to the detriment of his customers (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [559]). While there were aspects of Mr Kobelt's conduct which could be regarded as benevolent, those aspects were, in his Honour's estimate, incidents of arrangements that he put in place for the benefit of his business.

[45] His Honour observed that the book-up system operated to tie customers to Nobbys, which conferred on Mr Kobelt a significant commercial advantage (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [603]). His Honour characterised the tying effect of Mr Kobelt's book-up credit as constituting a form of exploitation and predation (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [606], [609]). While the supply of credit under Mr Kobelt's book-up system could be seen as a benevolent form of paternalism, it prolonged his Anangu customers' dependence on his exercise of discretionary control over their lives (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [607]).

The conduct of the appeal

[47] The conclusion that a supplier of a financial service has engaged in conduct that contravenes the statutory norm of conscience fixed by s 12CB(1) of the ASIC Act is an evaluative judgment. Nonetheless, it is a judgment that is either right or wrong. It was the duty of the Full Court to conduct a "real review" of the evidence and the primary judge's reasons for judgment (Robinson Helicopter Co Inc v McDermott (2016) 90 ALJR 679 at 686 [43]; 331 ALR 550 at 558; [2016] HCA 22, citing Fox v Percy (2003) 214 CLR 118 at 126-127 [25] per Gleeson CJ, Gummow and Kirby JJ; [2003] HCA 22). Their Honours were unanimous in concluding that the primary judge erred in finding that Mr Kobelt's conduct in the supply of credit under his book-up system was unconscionable. That conclusion is challenged on three grounds. Before turning to those grounds, there should be reference to three features of the proceedings that are not the subject of ASIC's appeal.

[48] The first feature is that ASIC's case, below and in this Court, is that unconscionable conduct involves "the existence of a special [dis]advantage of which someone takes … [u]nconscientious advantage" ([2018] HCATrans 252 at 1940-1945) and that Mr Kobelt's conduct in supplying credit under his book-up system took unconscientious advantage of the vulnerability of his Anangu customers. In the circumstances, the appeal does not provide the occasion to consider any suggestion that statutory unconscionability no longer requires consideration of (i) special disadvantage, or (ii) any taking advantage of that special disadvantage ([295] per Edelman J).

[49] Moreover, ASIC made no submission that courts have adopted an unduly restrictive interpretation of the term "unconscionable" contrary to the evident intention of the legislature. The Court was not taken to the legislative history or other extrinsic materials to make good such a suggestion. That is, perhaps, unsurprising since, if the legislative intention were to fix a standard for the supply of financial services in trade or commerce lower than that of conduct that answers the description of being against conscience, it is to be expected that the draftsperson would have employed another term.

[50] Among other values, that of certainty in the conduct of commercial transactions is reflected in the legislative choice to fix the standard of conscience in s 12CB(1) (Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 274-275 [296]-[298] per Allsop CJ). Any consideration of "lowering the bar" from that standard should only be undertaken in a case in which the proposition is squarely raised and argued.

[51] The second feature of the proceedings concerns the significance of the finding that the credit provided by Mr Kobelt on the purchase of second-hand vehicles was of a "very expensive kind" (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [492]). ASIC's pleaded case in connection with the credit charge imposed by Mr Kobelt on the purchase of second-hand motor vehicles was with respect to the alleged contravention of s 29(1) of the NCCP Act. Mr Kobelt's appeal against the primary judge's orders respecting the contravention of s 29(1) was dismissed and special leave to cross-appeal from that dismissal was refused.

[52] ASIC did not particularise the credit charge on the purchase of second-hand vehicles in its pleaded case of unconscionable conduct. Nonetheless, Besanko and Gilmour JJ considered that the amount of the credit charge had been an issue at the trial. The conduct of Mr Kobelt's defence had made it one: Mr Kobelt sought to establish that the terms on which he offered credit were better than the terms which his customers could obtain from traditional financial institutions (Kobelt v Australian Securities and Investments Commission (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 727 [209]). On the hearing in this Court, ASIC acknowledged that the primary judge's finding was that the credit charge on the purchase of a motor vehicle was objectively expensive, not that it was more expensive than credit available from another credit provider. ASIC accepted that, divorced from the fact that it was undisclosed, the finding of the expensive credit charge had "limited" significance to its unconscionability case. As Besanko and Gilmour JJ observed, the lack of disclosure of the high credit charge was not the gravamen of ASIC's unconscionable conduct case. And as their Honours also observed, "[t]here may be an argument here that it is also relevant that [the Anangu customers] were receiving the motor vehicles at or below market value" (Kobelt v Australian Securities and Investments Commission (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 736 [267(3)]).

[53] ASIC's acknowledgment of the limited significance of the expensive credit charge on the purchase of second-hand vehicles to its system case of unconscionable conduct was appropriate. The system case was concerned with the provision of credit under the book-up system. Credit under the book-up system was available for the purchase of second-hand vehicles, food, fuel, general groceries and other services (Kobelt v Australian Securities and Investments Commission (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 701 [60]). The essential features of the book-up system which were said to make the provision of credit unconscionable were the withdrawal conduct and the tendency of the withdrawal conduct to tie customers to dependence on Nobbys.

[54] The third feature of the proceedings is that the primary judge made no findings with respect to Mr Kobelt's conduct in relation to the supply of credit to the four customers identified as A, B, C and D, who were the subjects of the case which ASIC did not press (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [625]-[626]).

The grounds of appeal

[55] Against this background, we now turn to the grounds on which the appeal is brought:

(1) The Full Court failed to give "due weight" to the special disadvantage or vulnerability of Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers and gave "undue or disproportionate weight" to the customers' basic understanding of the book-up system, voluntary entry into the book-up contracts, ability to terminate the contracts (albeit by acting in breach of them), and "agency" or freedom of contract.

(2) The Full Court erred in overturning the primary judge's findings that Mr Kobelt engaged in predation or exploitation; in failing to give "any or due weight" to evidence of Mr Kobelt's "irregular conduct" which, while not part of the "system", was indicative of predation and exploitation; and in giving "undue or disproportionate weight" to the finding that Mr Kobelt acted "with 'a degree of good faith' and not dishonestly or fraudulently".

(3) [758] The Full Court gave "undue or disproportionate weight" to the incidental benefits or advantages of the book-up system arising from historical and cultural norms and practices of the Anangu community, and did not attach "any or due weight" to the primary judge's findings that these historical and cultural norms and practices contributed to or demonstrated the special disadvantage of some of Mr Kobelt's customers.

[56] The legal error that is said to underlie ASIC's first ground is the Full Court's asserted failure to distinguish the principles of undue influence from those of unconscionability under the general law. The argument directs attention to their differing focus: undue influence being concerned with the quality of the consent of the weaker party and unconscionability being concerned with the conduct of the stronger party in taking advantage of the vulnerability of the weaker party. ASIC submits that, while the exertion of undue influence bears on the determination of unconscionability, the absence of undue influence is entirely neutral and the Full Court was wrong to take it into account.

[57] ASIC refers to Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Lux Distributors Pty Ltd (2013) ATPR ¶42-447 as illustrative of the correct approach. The Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia found that Lux Distributors Pty Ltd ("Lux") engaged in conduct in connection with promotion and supply of vacuum cleaners to three elderly customers that was, in all the circumstances, unconscionable contrary to s 51AB of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) and s 21 of the Australian Consumer Law. This was so notwithstanding the customers' voluntary entry into the sale contracts. The normative standard applied in Lux was that of "honest and fair conduct free of deception" (Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Lux Distributors Pty Ltd (2013) ATPR ¶42-447 at 43,467 [41]). Notably, Lux's sales strategy employed a deceptive ruse to gain access to the customer's home and, once entry was gained, a selling technique that was designed to create a sense of obligation to purchase (Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Lux Distributors Pty Ltd (2013) ATPR ¶42-447 at 43,465 [27], 43,467 [39], 43,468 [44]).

[58] Recognition that the supplier of a financial service may engage in conduct that is unconscionable, notwithstanding the recipient's voluntary entry into the contract for the supply of the service (Thorne v Kennedy (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1272 [40]), does not make the absence of the exertion of undue influence an irrelevant consideration. Section 12CC(1)(d) invites the court to consider "whether any undue influence or pressure was exerted on, or any unfair tactics were used against" the recipient of the financial service (emphasis added) as one of the factors to be weighed in determining whether, in all the circumstances, the supplier's conduct is unconscionable. The absence of the exertion of undue influence, pressure or unfair tactics bears on the assessment of whether the commercial advantage obtained by the supplier in connection with the supply of the financial service is an unconscientious advantage.

[59] For the same reasons, ASIC's challenge in its second ground to the weight given by the Full Court to the finding that Mr Kobelt did not act dishonestly must be rejected. ASIC argues that, to the extent that notions of moral tainting or obloquy (Attorney General (NSW) v World Best Holdings Ltd (2005) 63 NSWLR 557 at 583 [121], 584 [124] per Spigelman CJ; Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Lux Distributors Pty Ltd (2013) ATPR ¶42-447 at 43,467 [41], 43,470 [61] per Allsop CJ, Jacobson and Gordon JJ) "suggest a need for dishonesty or something more than the taking advantage of the special disadvantage" of the recipient, they are unhelpful in applying the statutory standard of unconscionability in the ASIC Act and cognate legislation. The submission does not go anywhere. It may be accepted that conduct in the supply of a financial service may be unconscionable in circumstances in which the supplier's conduct does not involve dishonesty. This is not to say that the absence of dishonesty, or other moral taint, is not a material consideration in determining whether, objectively, the supplier's conduct involves such a departure from accepted community standards in the supply of the financial service as to warrant the characterisation that it is unconscionable (Ipstar Australia Pty Ltd v APS Satellite Pty Ltd (2018) 356 ALR 440 at 477 [195] per Bathurst CJ).

[60] The Full Court made clear that it approached the determination upon a view that consideration of moral obloquy had a role to play but was not a substitute for the statutory words (Kobelt v Australian Securities and Investments Commission (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 724 [193] per Besanko and Gilmour JJ, 741 [296] per Wigney J). Their Honours correctly took into account the findings that Mr Kobelt acted with a degree of good faith and not dishonestly as among the circumstances to which it was necessary to have regard in determining whether his conduct fell below the statutory norm of conscience.

[61] On the hearing, ASIC did not press that part of its second ground that contends that the Full Court erred in overturning the primary judge's findings of exploitation and predation. The argument now put is that a supplier may fall below the standard of conscionability fixed by s 12CB(1) without engaging in predatory or exploitative conduct. The primary judge's findings in these respects are said to "really … mean nothing much more than taking advantage of the disadvantage". There is no warrant for treating the primary judge's reasons in these respects as mere surplusage. They were findings which informed his Honour's conclusion that Mr Kobelt took unconscientious advantage of the vulnerability of his Anangu customers and were consistent with what had been said in Kakavas and Thorne v Kennedy, referred to earlier in these reasons.

[62] ASIC's central submission is that the Full Court failed to take into account that conduct may be unconscionable if the innocent party is subject to a "special disadvantage 'which seriously affects the ability … to make a judgment as to [the innocent party's] own best interests' ". The submission is developed in support of the third ground of appeal and focuses on Wigney J's analysis. In ASIC's submission, his Honour was wrong to approach the determination upon a view that "[w]hat the wider Australian society and its culture and institutions might regard as disadvantageous and unfair might be regarded by an Anangu person as in fact advantageous and reasonable" (Kobelt v Australian Securities and Investments Commission (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 747 [329]). The vice in the conclusion, on ASIC's argument, is that it fails to recognise that the Anangu customers' special disadvantage seriously affected their ability to make a judgment as to their own best interests (Thorne v Kennedy (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1272 [38], citing Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 462; [1983] HCA 14). The Anangu customers' lack of financial literacy and choice to enter into book-up credit with Mr Kobelt, in ASIC's submission, result in the maintenance of a system that would be unacceptable in mainstream Australian society.

[63] The submission assumes that, if Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers had not been wanting in financial literacy, they would not have chosen to obtain credit under the book-up system. Implicit in Besanko and Gilmour JJ's analysis, and explicit in Wigney J's analysis, is that the evidence does not support that conclusion.

[64] According to Dr Martin, it was clear "that there is widespread use of book-up, that there is support for this amongst many" members of the community, and:

> that book-up is seen by many Anangu as enabling them to access cash, food and other necessities when they are in the bust segment of the boom and bust cycle, or away from > their home community, and also to circumvent the difficulties in saving for larger capital expenditures on valued consumer goods (most particularly motor vehicles).

[65] Book-up credit provided Mr Kobelt's customers with the ability to purchase goods, including motor vehicles, notwithstanding their low incomes and lack of assets with which to secure a loan. While the primary judge canvassed a number of alternative ways in which Anangu customers might have obtained credit, his Honour did not find that the alternatives would serve in all cases. Not only were alternative forms of credit not necessarily available but, as Wigney J noted, some of the suggested alternatives might not have suited the Anangu. They may have preferred to enter into a book-up contract because it did not require the customer to deal with bureaucracy or to fill out paperwork and because they liked to deal with Mr Kobelt as a trusted broker (Kobelt v Australian Securities and Investments Commission (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 752 [354]). It is a large submission that the provision of book-up credit on terms which suited Mr Kobelt's adult Anangu customers and which enabled them to purchase a consumer good which they valued highly is to be characterised as objectively against their interests.

[66] The Full Court's finding was that book-up credit suited Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers for reasons that stemmed from cultural practices and norms and not from their position of special disadvantage. ASIC's challenge to the weight that the Full Court gave to the advantages of book-up credit is principally directed to the evidence of demand sharing. ASIC embraces the primary judge's view that this advantage should not be overstated.

[67] The circumstance that only one of the six Anangu witnesses identified the avoidance of demand sharing as a reason for entering into book-up credit arrangements is not to deny that book-up credit was supported by Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers because, among other matters, it relieved them of the pressure of [760] demand sharing. Dr Martin commented on the reluctance of his Anangu interviewees to disclose personal views about the "institution" of book-up. He considered it reasonable to infer that within the "Anangu polity" a consensual public account of book-up was to be accorded primacy rather than individual views.

[68] It was Dr Martin's opinion that (Kobelt v Australian Securities and Investments Commission (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 742 [304]):

> By leaving their keycards with the storekeeper, Aboriginal people can avoid the all-pervasive 'humbugging' for cash from relations, particularly on those days when wages or pensions are known to be deposited electronically into accounts, and they may also accumulate savings.

[69] The opinion is in line with the Renouf report, which also identified the avoidance of demand sharing as a benefit of book-up credit. It was open to the Full Court to place weight on the avoidance of demand sharing, together with ameliorating the effects of the boom and bust cycle of expenditure, as advantages of book-up credit which were not the product of the Anangu customers' special disadvantage.

[70] While, as the Full Court acknowledged, the CBA glitch and some instances of other irregular conduct may not have reflected well on Mr Kobelt, their Honours were right to put these instances to one side in considering whether Mr Kobelt's conduct in supplying credit under his book-up system contravened s 12CB(1). Stripped of the findings of predatory and exploitative conduct, ASIC's case relies upon the primary judge's assessment that Mr Kobelt's conduct in withdrawing all of the funds in book-up customers' accounts involved the imposition of a condition that was not reasonably necessary for the protection of his legitimate interests.

[71] The primary judge acknowledged that it suited some customers to have Mr Kobelt take the whole of the available balance from their accounts, that some customers may have requested him to do so, that it may have helped customers to deal with humbugging, and that it may have reduced customers' transaction fees. However, his Honour observed that none of these bore on the reasonable necessity to withdraw the funds for the protection of Mr Kobelt's own interests.

[72] Section 12CC(1)(b) invites the court to have regard to:

> whether, as a result of conduct engaged in by the supplier, the service recipient was required to comply with conditions that were not reasonably necessary for the protection of the legitimate interests of the supplier.

[73] The primary judge's finding was that (Australian Securities and Investments Commission v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [538]):

> I am satisfied, however, that [alternative systems] serve to indicate that Mr Kobelt's requirement that he obtain possession of customers' key cards and PINs and that he be permitted (absent a contrary instruction from a customer) to withdraw the whole of the available balance in the customer's account from time to time, went well beyond what was reasonably necessary for the protection of his own legitimate interests. (Emphasis added)

[74] The finding was not that Anangu customers were required, as a result of Mr Kobelt's conduct, to comply with a condition that Mr Kobelt withdraw the whole of the available balance in the customer's account. The finding was that, under Mr Kobelt's book-up system, credit was supplied on terms which included authorisation to withdraw the whole of the available balance in the customer's account unless the customer placed a limit on the authorisation. In any event, the conclusion of unconscionability requires consideration of the supplier's conduct in all of the circumstances (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2016) 258 CLR 525 at 586 [185], 587 [188] per Gageler J, 620 [294] per Keane J; [2016] HCA 28). Again, the finding that it suited many of his Anangu customers for Mr Kobelt to withdraw all of their funds, for reasons unconnected with the customers' want of financial literacy, bears directly on whether his conduct in supplying book-up credit contravened the statutory norm.

[75] Mr Kobelt was not required to act in an altruistic or disinterested way in his dealings with his customers. Nor was Mr Kobelt required to devise an alternative, superior form of book-up credit. The statutory proscription is on engaging in unconscionable conduct. The difficulty with ASIC's system case of statutory unconscionability lies in identifying any advantage that Mr Kobelt obtained from the supply of book-up credit that can fairly be said to be against conscience.

[76] The only advantage that the primary judge identified was that book-up credit tied Mr Kobelt's customers to dependence on Nobbys. His Honour suggested that had the book-up system not created this dependence, Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers might well have chosen to shop at community stores in the APY Lands or in Marla. Even if true, this would not support a conclusion that the supply of credit on Mr Kobelt's book-up terms took unconscientious advantage of his Anangu customers' vulnerability. And, as Wigney J noted, Dr Martin's evidence was that Anangu residents of Mimili and Indulkana viewed shopping at Mintabie as an exercise of "agency" because there was a wider choice available at the Mintabie stores, prices were cheaper and travel was not viewed as a disincentive for most Anangu. Indeed, travel could be seen as advantageous because it entailed visiting "country" and was a "highly social occasion". There was no evidence that Mr Kobelt's customers considered that they had been exploited because they had had to return to Nobbys.

[77] Contrary to the tenor of ASIC's submission, the Full Court's conclusion that Mr Kobelt's conduct was not unconscionable does not posit a different, lower standard of conscionable conduct in the supply of credit to Anangu consumers than applies to the supply of credit to consumers in mainstream Australian society. It is a conclusion that takes into account, correctly, all of the circumstances (ASIC Act, s 12CB(1)) including the evidence of the cultural norms and practices of the Anangu residents of the APY Lands. Acceptance of this evidence is against the premise of ASIC's central submission, that the supply of book-up credit was objectively contrary to the interests of Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers.

[78] The basic elements of Mr Kobelt's book-up system were understood by Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers, and those who chose to enter into book-up credit contracts with him appear to have done so because it enabled them to purchase goods which they valued and which otherwise they may not have been able to acquire. The terms on which book-up credit was supplied were perceived by the Anangu customers to be appropriate. This perception was not the product of the Anangu customers' lack of financial literacy: it reflected aspects of Anangu culture that are not found in mainstream Australian society.

[79] Book-up credit has a long history in rural and remote Indigenous communities. In this context, Mr Kobelt's supply of book-up credit was not out of the ordinary. No feature of Mr Kobelt's conduct in the supply of book-up credit to his Anangu customers exploited or otherwise took advantage of the customer's lack of education and financial acumen. While Mr Kobelt's book-up credit system was open to abuse, Mr Kobelt did not abuse it. In the circumstances, the Full Court was right to hold that Mr Kobelt's conduct in connection with the supply of credit to his Anangu customers was not unconscionable.

Order

[80] For these reasons, there should be the following order:

Appeal dismissed with costs.

GORDON AND NETTLE JJ:

Unwritten law

[145] The equitable doctrine of unconscionable conduct "looks to the conduct of the stronger party in attempting to enforce, or retain the benefit of, a dealing with a person under a special disability in circumstances where it is not consistent with equity or good conscience that he should do so" (Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 474). The "abiding rationale" of the doctrine is to "ensure that it is fair, just and reasonable for the stronger party to retain the benefit of the impugned transaction" (Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 425 [118]).

[146] Relief under the doctrine of unconscionable conduct requires that the innocent party was subject to a special disadvantage in dealing with the other party (Wilton v Farnworth (1948) 76 CLR 646 at 655; [1948] HCA 20; Blomley v Ryan (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 385, 405, 415, 428; [1956] HCA 81; Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 461, 467, 474; Louth v Diprose (1992) 175 CLR 621 at 637; [1992] HCA 61; Garcia v National Australia Bank Ltd (1998) 194 CLR 395 at 407 [26]; [1998] HCA 48; Bridgewater v Leahy (1998) 194 CLR 457 at 478-479 [75]; [1998] HCA 66; C G Berbatis Holdings (2003) 214 CLR 51 at 80-81 [68]; Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 424-425 [117]-[118]; Thorne v Kennedy (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1272 [38], 1284 [110]) when the transaction was entered into, "which seriously affect[ed] the ability of the innocent party to make a judgment as to [their] own best interests" (Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 462); and that the other party unconscientiously took advantage of that special disadvantage. The existence of those circumstances at the time of the transaction is what "affect[s] the conscience" of the stronger party and renders the enforcement of the transaction, or the taking of the benefit, "unconscientious" or "unconscionable" (Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1284 [110], quoting Jenyns v Public Curator (Q) (1953) 90 CLR 113 at 118; [1953] HCA 2).

[147] It is not possible to identify exhaustively what amounts to a special disadvantage (Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 474; Louth (1992) 175 CLR 621 at 637; C G Berbatis Holdings (2003) 214 CLR 51 at 92 [99]; Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1285 [113]). However, the essence of the relevant weakness is that it "seriously affects" the innocent party's ability to safeguard their own interests (Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1285 [113], quoting Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 425 [118]. See also C G Berbatis Holdings (2003) 214 CLR 51 at 64 [12], citing Blomley (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 392 and Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 476-477). Relevant matters may include, but are not limited to, "poverty or need of any kind, sickness, age, sex, infirmity of body or mind, drunkenness, illiteracy or lack of education, lack of assistance or explanation where assistance or explanation is necessary" (Blomley (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 405); as well as "illness, ignorance, inexperience, impaired faculties, financial need or other circumstances" that affect the innocent or weaker party's ability to protect their own interests (Blomley (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 415, quoted in Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 459 and Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1285 [113]). It is not sufficient that the matters give rise only to an inequality of bargaining power (Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 462).

[148] A party will have unconscientiously taken advantage of an innocent party when the former knew or ought to have known of the existence and effect of the special disadvantage (Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1272 [38], citing Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 462); or, put another way, when the special disadvantage was sufficiently evident at the time of the transaction to make it unconscientious to procure or accept the assent of the innocent party (Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1285 [114]. See also Blomley (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 428; Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 474; Louth (1992) 175 CLR 621 at 637; Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 427 [124], 439 [158]).

[149] Unconscionable conduct does not require a finding of dishonesty (See, eg, Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 478; Bridgewater (1998) 194 CLR 457 at 493 [122]). However, it is not merely concerned with what is "fair" or "just" (See Attorney General (NSW) v World Best Holdings Ltd (2005) 63 NSWLR 557 at 583 [121]). Unconscionable conduct can include the passive acceptance of a benefit in unconscionable circumstances (Hart v O'Connor [1985] AC 1000 at 1024, quoted in Bridgewater (1998) 194 CLR 457 at 479 [76]; see also at 493 [122]). And unconscionable conduct can be found even where the innocent party is a willing participant, the question is how that willingness or intention to participate was produced (Bridgewater (1998) 194 CLR 457 at 491 [118], quoting Huguenin v Baseley (1807) 14 Ves Jun 273 at 299-300 [33 ER 526 at 536]).

[150] As this Court has recognised and restated a number of times, invocation of equitable doctrines, including unconscionable conduct (Jenyns (1953) 90 CLR 113 at 118-119, quoting The "Juliana" (1822) 2 Dods 504 at 521 [165 ER 1560 at 1567] (citation omitted). See also Tanwar Enterprises Pty Ltd v Cauchi (2003) 217 CLR 315 at 325 [23]; [2003] HCA 57; Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 426 [122]-[123]; Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1273 [43]):

> calls for a precise examination of the particular facts, a scrutiny of the exact relations established between the parties and a consideration of the mental capacities, processes and idiosyncrasies of the [weaker party]. Such cases do not depend upon legal categories susceptible of clear definition and giving rise to definite issues of fact readily formulated which, when found, automatically determine the validity of the disposition. … ['']A court of equity takes a more comprehensive view, and looks to every connected circumstance that ought to influence its determination upon the real justice of the case''.

[151] Here, the issue of special disadvantage must be considered as part of the broader question: whether Mr Kobelt's book-up system took advantage of an inability on the part of some of his customers to make worthwhile decisions in their own interests, which inability was sufficiently evident to Mr Kobelt, or should have been, to render his system exploitative (See Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 426-427 [124], citing Louth (1992) 175 CLR 621 at 632).

[152] It is sometimes said that unconscionable conduct entails "moral obloquy" or a "high level of moral obloquy" (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2016) 258 CLR 525 at 587 [188]; [2016] HCA 28, quoting World Best (2005) 63 NSWLR 557 at 583 [121]). So to describe unconscionable conduct, however, reveals little of the requisite character of unconscionability. Such descriptors are better seen as emphatic expressions of conclusion rather than expressions of applicable standards.

[153] The doctrine of unconscionability was recently criticised by the Court of Appeal of Singapore for its vagueness and generality (See BOM v BOK [2018] SGCA 83 at [121]-[125]). The Court applied a distinction between "broad" and "narrow" [775] unconscionability in an effort to address this issue (BOM [2018] SGCA 83 at [140]-[142]). The utility of such distinctions, however, is questionable. Certainly, in any given case, a conclusion as to what is, or is not, against conscience may be contestable: so much is inevitable given that the standard is based on a broad expression of values and norms (Paciocco (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 276 [304]). However, efforts to address the "indeterminacy" (Commonwealth Bank of Australia v Kojic (2016) 249 FCR 421 at 436 [58]) of the doctrine by way of further distillations, categorisations or definitions may risk "disappointment, … a sense of futility, and … the likelihood of error" (Paciocco (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 276 [304]). This is because evaluating whether conduct is unconscionable "is not a process of deductive reasoning predicated upon the presence or absence of fixed elements or fixed rules" (Paciocco (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 276 [304]). Instead, at least in the Australian statutory context, what is involved is an evaluation of business behaviour (conduct in trade or commerce) in light of the values and norms recognised by the statute (Paciocco (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 276 [304]). The problem of indeterminacy is addressed by close attention to the statute and the values derived from it, as well as from the unwritten law (Kojic (2016) 249 FCR 421 at 436 [58]).

Non-exhaustive list of factors

[154] Section 12CB(1) requires that the court have regard to "all the circumstances" (See Paciocco (2016) 258 CLR 525 at 587 [188], 620 [294]. See also Jenyns (1953) 90 CLR 113 at 118-119, quoted in Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 426 [122] and Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1273 [43]) in determining whether conduct is unconscionable. But the ASIC Act also gives "express guidance as to the norms and values that are relevant to inform the meaning of unconscionability and its practical application" (Paciocco (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 270 [279]; see also at 276 [306]; Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Lux Distributors Pty Ltd (2013) ATPR ¶42-447 at 43,463 [23]). That express guidance is found in the non-exhaustive list of factors set out in s 12CC, which assists in setting a framework for the values that lie behind the notion of conscience identified in s 12CB (Paciocco (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 272 [285], 276 [304]; Kojic (2016) 249 FCR 421 at 436 [58], 442-443 [87]).

[155] No one factor (or select group of factors) is primary or determinative. It is, therefore, not appropriate to select particular factors upon which to focus (Paciocco (2016) 258 CLR 525 at 587 [189], 620 [294]). All the relevant factors must be taken into account (See Paciocco (2016) 258 CLR 525 at 587 [188], 620 [294]. See also Jenyns (1953) 90 CLR 113 at 118-119, quoted in in Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 426 [122] and Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1273 [43]).

Voluntariness

[156] At the heart of this appeal is what is said to be a tension between the voluntariness of the customers' entry into the transactions and perceived advantages of the system on the one hand; and their vulnerability and the conduct of Mr Kobelt on the other.

[157] It is important to appreciate, therefore, that considerations of voluntariness need to be assessed in the context of the system of conduct in issue. Conduct can be unconscionable even where the innocent party is a willing participant; the question is how that willingness or intention was produced (Bridgewater (1998) 194 CLR 457 at 491 [118], quoting Huguenin (1807) 14 Ves Jun 273 at 299-300; 33 ER 526 at 536). An innocent party may be capable of making an independent or rational judgment about an advantage in an otherwise bad bargain. However, an advantage, and the capacity of the innocent party to identify that advantage and make a rational choice, cannot operate to transform what is, in all the circumstances, an exploitative arrangement. Nor can the existence of that advantage absolve from liability the stronger party who unconscientiously takes advantage of the weaker party.

[158] To contend otherwise in this case is to use the limited choices available to Mr Kobelt's customers in relation to cars and credit to excuse a system which tied those customers to Nobbys and placed them in a position of dependence in relation to Mr Kobelt. Of course, to be able to purchase a car is better than to have no car; to have access to credit is preferable to having no access to credit. But these propositions say nothing about the terms on which the car and credit are provided.

[159] Voluntariness must be judged against other relevant matters: the power imbalance between the parties; the relative lack of choice available to Mr Kobelt's customers; the fact that customers had a limited understanding of the terms of the arrangement; the lack of transparency of the terms and conditions of the arrangement; and, importantly, Mr Kobelt's exploitative conduct. Many of those matters arose from Mr Kobelt's particular conduct, rather than any particular characteristic of his customers. They arose because Mr Kobelt chose to set up his system of book-up in the way that he did.

[160] Contrary to the view of Wigney J in the Full Court, and notwithstanding that some customers expressed positive views about Nobbys, it is not paternalistic to assess the vulnerability of Mr Kobelt's customers and whether that vulnerability was exploited. It is not paternalistic to take into account that the view of a vulnerable party of a transaction will be shaped by context and circumstance. Equally, it is not paternalistic to look at the transaction and the position of the parties objectively. It is to do no more than engage with the criteria of unconscionability.

[161] Moreover, so to conclude does not ignore that there are perceived to be cultural benefits of book-up generally, in that it can, in some circumstances, address "boom and bust" expenditure and "demand sharing" obligations. Because the focus [777] of s 12CB(1) is on the conduct of the supplier of financial services, those cultural benefits, even if they were being addressed by Mr Kobelt's system, do not relieve a finding of unconscionability with respect to his particular system. Instead, s 12CB(1) requires the supplier to set up a system, a book-up system, that is not unconscionable. The contention that Mr Kobelt's book-up system is "better than nothing" is not good enough. Mr Kobelt's system could, and should, have been better. There were alternative ways to access those benefits without exploitation. Voluntariness of entry into the arrangements, and the perceived advantages of the system, do not prevent Mr Kobelt's conduct from being unconscionable.

Effect of the arrangements – tying conduct

[205] Mr Kobelt's system "tied" book-up customers to Nobbys. The primary judge found that this "tying" effect was a form of "exploitation" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [606]; see also at [620]) and that this, combined with Mr Kobelt's requirement that he have access to the whole of customers' incomes, was a form of "predation" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [609]). The Full Court overturned these conclusions (See Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 735-736 [267]-[268], 756-757 [374]-[379], 758-759 [385]). By its notice of appeal, ASIC contended that the Full Court erred in overturning the findings of the primary judge that Mr Kobelt had engaged in predation or exploitation. At the hearing of the appeal, although counsel for ASIC contended that the words "predation" or "exploitation" meant no more than taking advantage of disadvantage, ASIC did not abandon the contention that the primary judge's findings on predation and exploitation (or that Mr Kobelt had "taken advantage") should be restored. Those findings should be restored.

[206] The system deprived customers of independent means of obtaining the necessities of life. It prevented them from shopping in their own communities. It created a prolonged dependence on Mr Kobelt's exercise of discretion.

[207] By making his customers dependent on a favourable exercise of his goodwill, Mr Kobelt placed them in a position of vulnerability, separate to and different from the vulnerability which existed at the time they entered into the book-up arrangement. The primary judge was right to describe the system as constituting "exploitation" and "predation".

Mr Kobelt's knowledge

[208] The primary judge was satisfied that Mr Kobelt knew of the characteristics of his customers on the basis that it must have been obvious from the interactions he had with them.

[209] ASIC did not contend that Mr Kobelt had adopted forms of undue influence or exerted undue pressure. The primary judge therefore made no finding to that effect.

[210] Despite the illegibility of Mr Kobelt's records, it was not found that he maintained his records dishonestly, or used the key cards and PINs dishonestly. The primary judge said that Mr Kobelt acted with a degree of good faith, but at all times pursued his own interests, even when that was to the detriment of his customers. The primary judge found as a fact that some of the withdrawals from the customers' accounts were not authorised.

Advantages to customers?

[211] In the Full Court, the plurality found that the primary judge had given insufficient weight to, among other things, the advantages to Nobbys' customers in alleviating the disadvantages associated with demand sharing and boom and bust expenditure. Unsurprisingly, in this Court, Mr Kobelt relied upon that finding, and the evidence said to support that finding, in seeking to demonstrate the advantages to customers of his book-up system.

[212] Dr David Martin, a social anthropologist, was retained by ASIC and gave evidence at the trial. Dr Martin was described by the primary judge as having a deep understanding of remote Aboriginal people's relationship with money and financial transactions, including an understanding about "particular mechanisms by which Aboriginal people typically seek to structure and personalise relationships with outsiders in order to access goods and services which they value" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [389]).

[213] The primary judge described Dr Martin's evidence as "generally helpful and reliable" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [416]). However, it is necessary to understand Dr Martin's evidence including the relevant findings made about it by the primary judge and the Full Court. He was retained to provide an opinion concerning certain of Nobbys' Anangu customers in relation to ASIC's (ultimately abandoned) secondary case directed to specific customers rather than the book-up system generally, as well as "any other Aboriginal customers of Nobbys with whom [he spoke] as part of [his] field trip" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [391]). Dr Martin was instructed to assume that for the majority of Nobbys' Anangu book-up customers: periodic payments into their accounts were those customers' only source of income; use of a key card was the primary or exclusive means by which the customers accessed their account; and the customer was a resident of a remote community, in the APY Lands, and had very limited or no assets and very little income.

[214] Dr Martin's initial instructions were to report on, among other things, any facts or circumstances affecting customers' ability or willingness to question or negotiate the terms of book-up and to complain about those terms. Those instructions were later expanded to address an additional question, namely, "[w]hat, if any, social or cultural matters affect the ability or willingness of Aboriginal residents of the APY Lands" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [392]) – that is, persons of the APY Lands generally, not those who identified as Nobbys customers – to understand the nature, terms, advantages and disadvantages of credit arrangements generally and of the specific arrangement provided by Nobbys; question or negotiate the terms of transactions (including credit arrangements) with traders; and complain about the terms of such transactions? Dr Martin conducted three field trips to the APY Lands, during which he spoke to a total of 23 Indigenous residents in Mimili and Indulkana.

[215] Given that Dr Martin was never asked to express an opinion specifically with respect to the 117 customers the subject of ASIC's primary case (that is, directed to the book-up system generally), the primary judge considered that care had to be taken before accepting characterisations of the 117 customers that depended upon inferences drawn from characteristics of the Anangu population generally. Indeed, Dr Martin accepted in cross-examination, and in his report, that it was not reasonable to impute to all of Mr Kobelt's customers all of the characteristics which he had been asked to assume.

[216] The primary judge referred to Dr Martin's description at trial of demand sharing as part of the "foundational principles of reciprocity, exchange and sharing within a hunter gatherer society". Dr Martin considered, however, that while it might be reasonable to come to the view that leaving key cards at Nobbys was part of a strategy to avoid demand sharing, Dr Martin had "no firm evidence to come to that view" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [578]). In the result, the primary judge found that there was "very little evidence from the Anangu customers themselves that they handed over their key cards and PINs to Mr Kobelt in order to achieve … these outcomes. … [W]ith one exception, none [of the Anangu witnesses] said that it was the desire to avoid this kind of sharing which was the reason they engaged in [b]ook-up or that they shopped at Nobbys" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [582]). Mr Kobelt's challenges to the primary judge's findings in respect of avoidance of demand sharing, and the extent to which the primary judge had considered Dr Martin's evidence in respect of this issue, were dismissed by the plurality in the Full Court.

[217] The plurality were right to do so. As was explained in Thorne v Kennedy ((2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1272-1273 [41]), where a transaction is sought to be impugned by the operation of vitiating factors such as, relevantly, unconscionable conduct, it is necessary for a primary judge to conduct a close consideration of the facts; and it is equally necessary for an appellate court to assess any challenge to the primary judge's conclusions in light of the advantages enjoyed by that judge. That is because an assessment of whether unconscionable conduct has been established calls for a precise examination of the particular facts, and the exact relations established between the parties (Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1273 [43], quoting Jenyns (1953) 90 CLR 113 at 118-119). The advantage of a primary judge in seeing the parties and estimating their characters and capacities is "immeasurable" (Wilton (1948) 76 CLR 646 at 654, cited in Louth (1992) 175 CLR 621 at 633).

[218] Moreover, this appeal is concerned with Mr Kobelt's book-up system, not all book-up systems or even the generalised conception of book-up systems described by Dr Martin. It is concerned with the 117 recipients of book-up services identified as part of ASIC's case against Mr Kobelt, not all Anangu people or all Aboriginal people living in remote areas. In particular, there was very little evidence that those 117 customers chose to enter into the book-up system to avoid demand sharing. Therefore, this Court should be slow to go beyond the primary judge's findings of fact, which were upheld on appeal, and conclude, inferring from general information pertaining to the Anangu or remote Aboriginal people, that Mr Kobelt's customers entered into the book-up arrangements for cultural reasons and not due to their position of special disadvantage. The primary judge's factual findings dictate otherwise: due to their vulnerability, the 117 customers had little other choice.

Alternatives to Mr Kobelt's book-up system

[219] The primary judge found that Mr Kobelt's book-up system went beyond what was reasonably necessary to protect his legitimate interests in two fundamental ways: by requiring that customers hand over key cards and PINs and by withdrawing the whole, or nearly the whole, of the available balance in the customer's account on each payday.

[220] The primary judge identified other arrangements that Mr Kobelt could have used, which made the provision of key cards and PINs not reasonably necessary to protect his legitimate interests (While this point was not pleaded by ASIC as a particular of unconscionable conduct, the plurality in the Full Court held that it did not need to be pleaded).

[221] First, Mr Kobelt could have applied to be a "Participant" in the Commonwealth Government's "Centrepay" system. Once a supplier has been accepted as a Participant, Centrelink recipients may authorise Centrelink to pay part of their benefits to that Participant. The Centrepay facility is generally directed to essential services and only a selection of "additional services". Mr Kobelt said at trial that he would take up this option if it were offered to him, despite earlier difficulties he had encountered when he had enquired about participating in Centrepay. That said, doubts were expressed by the primary judge and by Wigney J as to whether the Centrepay facility would encompass the purchase of used cars, although Nobbys as a supplier of food and groceries might have been eligible for acceptance as a Participant.

[222] Second, Mr Kobelt could have agreed on a direct debit arrangement with the purchasers of his cars. Mr Kobelt agreed that this system could work well if the customers could organise it.

[223] Third, for customers who lived nearby, Mr Kobelt accepted that he could have retained possession of the customers' key cards but not their PINs. He could have handed the key card back to the customer when they came to Nobbys, with the expectation that they would do so on or shortly after each payday to effect a transfer to Nobbys in reduction of their debt.

[224] Fourth, Mr Kobelt could have arranged deductions from customers' wages to pay off their debt.

[225] In addition, to mitigate the disadvantages of boom and bust expenditure, some book-up customers could request that Centrelink make pension payments weekly, rather than fortnightly. There was no suggestion that such a facility would not also have been available to those book-up customers who were recipients of Centrelink benefits.

[226] Wigney J in the Full Court questioned whether some of these alternatives were in fact reasonably available or feasible. In his Honour's view, the primary judge's analysis of these various alternatives tended to ignore evidence that suggested that the Anangu may have preferred Mr Kobelt's book-up system to the alternatives because it involved the personalisation of the financial transaction. It is true that the primary judge made limited reference to the personalisation of financial transactions, referring only to that concept in describing the expertise of Dr Martin. However, two further matters should be observed about this aspect of Dr Martin's evidence. Dr Martin's evidence was that there was a tendency for Indigenous APY Lands residents to personalise financial transactions by conducting financial transactions through "brokers" such as storekeepers to better access goods and services. This tendency was based on inferences Dr Martin drew from the assumptions set out in his instructions together with his observations and interviews. The limitations on the extent to which Dr Martin's evidence can be used to establish that the Anangu generally and Mr Kobelt's customers specifically had such a tendency are self-evident. Further, there is nothing to suggest that the alternatives outlined above would result in any reduction, let alone any great reduction, in the personalisation of the transaction. It is plain that each retains some relationship with a local storekeeper including, specifically, that the credit is provided by a person known to the customer; it is simply the method by which book-up or another form of credit – each necessarily personal – is provided that is different.

[227] In addition to the alternative arrangements identified by the primary judge, it is plain that another real alternative was and remains an appropriately functioning form of book-up. The characteristics of such a system are readily identifiable: an assessment of whether customers needed the credit facility and could afford the repayments; the disclosure of all fees and charges to customers; no retention as "security" of a customer's key card, let alone their PIN; the transfer of an agreed amount or proportion of weekly or fortnightly income, rather than the whole of a customer's income; legible and consistent records of the original credit advanced, the payments made, and a running total of the balance outstanding, imposing a discipline to keep these records up to date; and a system where the customers were not "tied" to the credit provider for the provision of other goods and services.

[228] Finally, the Withdrawal Conduct (See [180]-[184] above) is itself illustrative of the problems. That conduct revealed that Mr Kobelt worked actively to avoid some customers having access to the 50 per cent of the income which should have been available to them and that those customers were not content with having 50 per cent of their income available only at Mr Kobelt's discretion and only through his store or purchase orders. That conduct further supports the conclusion that the customers would not necessarily have chosen Mr Kobelt's book-up system if the fact of alternatives was explained and made available.

[229] Alternatives were available. There is nothing to suggest that these alternatives would not have worked and, in fact, in relation to some of them, Mr Kobelt agreed that they could work well.

Mr Kobelt's book-up system was unconscionable

[230] Mr Kobelt accepted that statutory unconscionability was capable of applying to a system of conduct or pattern of behaviour and that his provision of credit to the 117 customers was conduct "in trade or commerce" and was conduct in connection with the supply of "financial services" to individuals. Therefore, the sole issue was and remains whether Mr Kobelt, in the implementation and provision of his book-up system, engaged in a system of conduct or pattern of behaviour that was "unconscionable" contrary to s 12CB(1) of the ASIC Act. For the reasons that follow, the answer is "yes".

[231] ASIC advanced three grounds in respect of the Full Court's finding to the contrary. Those grounds related to the special disadvantage of Mr Kobelt's customers, the predatory and exploitative nature of Mr Kobelt's conduct, and the weight to be given to purported advantages arising from the book-up system in relation to the practices of demand sharing and boom and bust expenditure. Each identifies a matter central to the assessment of unconscionability in the circumstances of this case but none can be viewed in isolation. Accordingly, the issues raised by ASIC will be addressed in the context of assessing Mr Kobelt's conduct against the non-exhaustive list of factors in s 12CC.

[232] The Court's focus must primarily be on the nature of the conduct by the stronger party (See Australia, House of Representatives, Competition and Consumer Legislation Amendment Bill 2011, Explanatory Memorandum at 22 [2.24]). First, s 12CB(4)(b) extends s 12CB(1) unconscionable conduct to a "system of conduct or pattern of behaviour, whether or not a particular individual is identified as having been disadvantaged". It follows from the fact that a specific person need not be identified that special disadvantage of an individual is not a necessary component of the prohibition (See Australia, House of Representatives, Competition and Consumer Legislation Amendment Bill 2011, Explanatory Memorandum at 22 [2.23]). Indeed, Parliament's intention in this respect was explained in the following terms (Australia, House of Representatives, Competition and Consumer Legislation Amendment Bill 2011, Explanatory Memorandum at 21 [2.21]):

> [T]he focus of the provisions is on conduct that may be said to offend against good conscience; it is not specifically on the characteristics of any possible 'victim' of the conduct (though these may be relevant to the assessment of the conduct). (Emphasis in original)

[233] That focus on the conduct of the stronger party reflects the difference between the equitable doctrines of unconscionable conduct and undue influence. The former is concerned with the conduct of the stronger party in unconscientiously taking advantage of the weaker party. The latter is concerned with the quality of the consent or assent of the weaker party (Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1281 [86] and the authorities cited therein). That distinction is also reflected in ss 12CB(1) and 12CC(1), where the prohibition in s 12CB(1) is against unconscionable conduct and "any undue influence or pressure … or any unfair tactics" is only one of several factors to be taken into account if relevant (ASIC Act, s 12CC(1)(d)).

[234] The assessment of whether conduct is unconscionable within the meaning of s 12CB involves the evaluation of facts by reference to the values and norms recognised by the statute, and thus, as it has been said, a normative standard of conscience which is permeated with accepted and acceptable community standards (Lux Distributors Pty Ltd (2013) ATPR ¶42-447 at 43,463 [23], cited in Paciocco (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 275 [298]). It is by reference to those generally accepted standards and community values that each matter must be judged.

Vulnerability or special disadvantage

[235] Vulnerability or special disadvantage may arise from matters including "poverty or need of any kind … [and] illiteracy or lack of education" (Blomley (1956) 99 CLR 362 at 405, quoted in Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 474 and Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 425 [117]. See also Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1285 [113]). Mr Kobelt's customers were vulnerable or at a special disadvantage (See [165]-[171] above). Their vulnerability existed because of the remoteness of their communities, the limitations on their education, their impoverishment, and the limitations on their financial literacy – not as a result of Anangu cultural practices. Both the primary judge and the Full Court accepted that Mr Kobelt's customers were vulnerable (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [620]; Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 702 [67], 736 [268], 755-756 [371]-[372]) and there was no dispute that Mr Kobelt knew of his customers' special disadvantage (see [208] above).

[236] Indeed, as the primary judge noted, the ready willingness of Mr Kobelt's customers to hand over their key cards and their PINs seems to reflect a lack of understanding of the precautions which they should take in their own self-interest (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [620]). As Wigney J observed, the Anangu plainly had a different conception of, and different attitude towards, their key cards and they trusted Mr Kobelt. But that observation, and that trust, do not provide an answer, or defence, to the fact that, in all the circumstances, Mr Kobelt's book-up system was unconscionable contrary to s 12CB of the ASIC Act. Instead, the fact that the Anangu had a different conception of, and different attitude towards, their key cards and that they trusted Mr Kobelt is part of the factual matrix which identifies, and explains, their vulnerability and the voluntariness of their entry into the book-up system as well as the significance of the other relevant factors listed in s 12CC(1), which are addressed next.

Mr Kobelt unconscientiously took advantage of his customers' vulnerability

[237] The Full Court found that Mr Kobelt had not taken advantage of his customers' vulnerability because the customers understood the basic elements of Mr Kobelt's book-up system, including the Withdrawal Conduct (See [169]-[170] and [180]-[184] above; Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 735 [265], 752 [355]); voluntarily entered into the book-up arrangements (Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 735 [266], 752 [355]); had the ability to terminate the contracts (Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 736 [268]); and had agency, which must be respected (Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 743-744 [309]-[310], 750 [348], 751-752 [352], [355], 757 [376]), and their freedom of contract should not be impeded.

[238] There are a number of errors in that analysis. Vulnerable persons may be unable to protect their own interests. If a person, unable to protect their own interests, voluntarily enters into a transaction, this does no more than remove the conduct from it being the subject of relief on the ground of undue influence where the elements, and methods of proof, are quite different (See Thorne (2017) 91 ALJR 1260 at 1281 [86]). It is because it is a transaction that is voluntarily entered into by someone under a special disadvantage that unconscionability, including statutory unconscionability, developed, in order to ensure that persons who are vulnerable and unable to protect their own interests are not the victim of conduct by a stronger party in unconscientiously taking advantage of that vulnerability. And that is what Mr Kobelt's book-up system did.

[239] The unconscionability of Mr Kobelt's conduct was that the 117 customers were at such a special disadvantage relative to Mr Kobelt so as to be unable to make a decision in their own interests, and Mr Kobelt, knowing or in circumstances where he ought to have known of their incapacity to make a decision in their own interests, took advantage of that disadvantage to get them to agree to his terms.

[240] It is irrelevant that some of the customers might have regarded the requirements of Mr Kobelt's system as not unreasonable or considered that it alleviated pressures of demand sharing. The requirements of the system were unreasonable, regardless of any effects on demand sharing. Even if some of his 117 customers might have thought otherwise, the customers were so disadvantaged by their remoteness, the limitations on their education, their impoverishment and the limitations on their financial illiteracy, as well as the limited available alternatives, as to be in a position where they could not demand a superior system.

(i) Power imbalance: s 12CC(1)(a), (e) and (j)(i)

[241] Mr Kobelt held all the power in the relationship. His Anangu customers were vulnerable and unable to protect their own interests. They were limited in their ability to acquire credit on the same terms, or at all, anywhere in reasonable proximity to the APY Lands, meaning that Nobbys had a near-monopoly on the provision of credit. Further, Mr Kobelt did not provide credit to the Anangu on any other terms except book-up; and he was not flexible in relation to the requirement that customers provide their key card and PIN or in relation to certain other terms on which he provided credit (cf Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 755 [367]-[368]).

[242] The fact that there was no indication that the customers wished to bargain with Mr Kobelt is unsurprising. That is often the position with vulnerable persons: they do not know of potential alternatives and often, even if they are aware of such alternatives, lack the ability to negotiate. Moreover, s 12CC(1)(a) requires consideration of the "relative strengths of the bargaining positions" of the relevant parties. It is concerned with the existence of the power imbalance, not the wishes of the weaker party.

[243] As against that, the ability of customers to frustrate the arrangements should be given little, if any, weight. The primary judge found that to frustrate the arrangements would require customers to "act in breach of their agreement with Mr Kobelt, that is, to act in a way which was dishonourable, if not dishonest" (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [513]). Mr Kobelt did not challenge this finding before the Full Court. That reinforced the power imbalance. And, no less importantly, it would be wrong to conclude that the theoretical ability of the weaker party to frustrate the wrongful conduct of the stronger party could ameliorate the wrongful conduct of that stronger party. That is the antithesis of unconscionability.

[244] As has been observed, unequal bargaining power on its own is not sufficient to establish unconscionability (see Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 462). But it provides the context in which the remaining factors are to be assessed.

(ii) Circumstances of entry: s 12CC(1)(c), (i) and (j)(i)

[245] The circumstances in which Mr Kobelt's Anangu customers entered into the book-up arrangements were characterised not only by a power imbalance, but also by a lack of transparency and lack of proper understanding of the arrangements, resulting in an inability of Mr Kobelt's customers to hold him to account.

[246] When customers entered into the arrangements, Mr Kobelt failed to document and disclose properly, or at all, the terms and conditions of the arrangement, the amount and frequency of the withdrawals, the amount of the debt or charges or the price differential for the purchase of the second-hand cars (See [172]-[173], [175], [179], [188]-[189], [194]-[197] and [202]-[203] above). As the primary judge found, Mr Kobelt's customers would not have been able to understand his inadequate and often illegible records (ASIC v Kobelt [2016] FCA 1327 at [544], [546]).

[247] Wigney J considered that these facts and matters did not deserve any significant weight for two reasons: (1) there was a cultural preference for Anangu customers to deal with business matters "face-to-face [rather] than be provided with a sheath [sic] of documents" (Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 747 [330]); and (2) there was no evidence that any customer had sought an account of the transactions (Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 753 [359]). That analysis is incomplete: it interprets s 12CC(1)(c) too narrowly.

[248] The problem was that there was no transparency or accountability under Mr Kobelt's system. Mr Kobelt's "face-to-face" interactions did not enable customers to have a proper understanding of the terms of the book-up arrangement. When customers entered into the book-up arrangement they had only an understanding of the "basic elements" of the arrangement. That meant that the customers did [788] not have a clear understanding of exactly how much Mr Kobelt would withdraw; how often and at what time of day he would withdraw; where their funds would be kept; whether and through what mechanism they were entitled to access their funds; how much they could access at a given time and to what uses it could be put; the fact that book-up for second-hand cars attracted a charge; and the fact that there were alternatives. Put simply, Mr Kobelt's book-up system was characterised by a complete lack of transparency and accountability. A cultural preference for oral communication does not justify exploitation or taking advantage of people without their knowledge or in the absence of full disclosure. Instead, the preference for oral communication demands that the credit provider provide the financial service in a manner which addresses that preference.

(iii) Mr Kobelt's book-up system and its implementation: s 12CC(1)(d), (j)(ii)-(iv) and (l)
[249] Mr Kobelt's book-up system, and his implementation of it, allowed Mr Kobelt to engage in wrongful conduct to obtain a financial benefit to the detriment of his customers.

[250] The primary judge said that Mr Kobelt acted with a degree of good faith, although that statement was qualified with the statement that Mr Kobelt pursued his own interests at all times, even when that pursuit was to the detriment of his customers.

[251] What the unchallenged factual findings established was that Mr Kobelt's book-up system enabled him to abuse his position of power to the detriment of his customers.

[252] As has been explained: the circumstances of entry (see Mr Kobelt's book-up system at [163]-[164], Vulnerability at [165]-[171], Mr Kobelt's actions – taking advantage at [172]-[204], Effect of the arrangements – tying conduct at [205]-[207] and Mr Kobelt's knowledge at [208]-[210] above); requiring customers to hand over their key card and PIN (see [173] above); Mr Kobelt withdrawing the whole, or nearly the whole, of the available funds by trial and error and deliberately before customers could access their funds by other means (see [180]-[184] above); there being no objective justification for withdrawing all or most of the available funds as soon as they were deposited; Mr Kobelt controlling how much of their funds that his customers could access and what they could spend those funds on (see [185]-[193] above); and there being no transparency (meaning that Mr Kobelt's customers could not hold Mr Kobelt to account (see [172]-[173], [175], [179], [188]-[189], [194]-[197], [202]-[203] and [205]-[207] above)), compel that conclusion.

[253] The conclusion is reinforced by the ways Mr Kobelt carried out the arrangements, not always complying with the terms of his arrangement, and making the withdrawals causing overdrafts in connection with the CBA glitch (see Mr Kobelt's actions – taking advantage at [172]-[204], Effect of the arrangements – tying conduct at [205]-[207] and Mr Kobelt's knowledge at [208]-[210] above. See in particular at [182]-[184] above). Contrary to the Full Court's conclusion (cf Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 729 [222], 754 [362]), s 12CC(1)(j)(iv) requires consideration of the post-contractual conduct of the parties.

(iv) Tying
[254] Mr Kobelt's book-up system tied his customers to Nobbys (see [172]-[193], [205]-[207] above). It created a prolonged dependence on Mr Kobelt's exercise of discretion. It placed them in an ongoing and increased position of vulnerability. Mr Kobelt exercised a high degree of control over his customers' funds and expenditure by precluding access to their funds, preventing them from being able to access the necessities of life and making them dependent on his discretion.

[255] "Tying", in various forms, has been the subject of restriction and condemnation for over a century in Australia (see Australian Industries Preservation Act 1906 (Cth), s 4; Australian Industries Preservation Act 1909 (Cth), s 5, inserting s 7A into the Australian Industries Preservation Act 1906; Attorney-General of the Commonwealth v Adelaide Steamship Co Ltd (1913) 18 CLR 30 at 32-39; [1913] AC 781 at 794-801; Heron v Port Huon Fruitgrowers' Co-operative Association Ltd (1922) 30 CLR 315 at 323-327; [1922] HCA 20; Peters American Delicacy Co Ltd v Patricia's Chocolates and Candies Pty Ltd (1947) 77 CLR 574 at 583, 589-591; [1947] HCA 62; Buckley v Tutty (1971) 125 CLR 353 at 373, 375-377; [1971] HCA 71; Queensland Co-operative Milling Association v Pamag Pty Ltd (1973) 133 CLR 260 at 263-264; [1973] HCA 24; Amoco Australia Pty Ltd v Rocca Bros Motor Engineering Co Pty Ltd (1973) 133 CLR 288 at 293-294; [1973] HCA 40; Peters (WA) Ltd v Petersville Ltd (2001) 205 CLR 126 at 138-139 [24]-[27]; [2001] HCA 45. See also Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth), s 47 and Competition and Consumer Act 2010 (Cth), Sch 1, s 47; Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Baxter Healthcare Pty Ltd [No 2] (2008) 170 FCR 16), the United Kingdom (On restraints of trade, see Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co [1894] AC 535 at 552; McEllistrim v Ballymacelligott Co-operative Agricultural and Dairy Society [1919] AC 548 at 571-572; Petrofina (Gt Britain) Ltd v Martin [1966] Ch 146 at 165-166, 173, 177, 180; Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] AC 269. The "Truck Acts" in the United Kingdom also prohibited a form of tying: see, eg, Truck Act 1831 (1 & 2

Gul IV c 37); Truck Amendment Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict c 46); Truck Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict c 44); Truck Act 1940 (UK); Bristow v City Petroleum Ltd [1987] 1 WLR 529 at 532; [1987] 2 All ER 45 at 47-48) and 789 the United States (see Sherman Act of 1890, 15 USC §1; Clayton Act of 1914, 15 USC §14; Federal Trade Commission Act of 1914, 15 USC §45; United Shoe Machinery Corporation v United States (1922) 258 US 451 at 457; International Business Machines Corp v United States (1936) 298 US 131 at 135-136; International Salt Co Inc v United States (1947) 332 US 392 at 395-396; United States v Paramount Pictures Inc (1948) 334 US 131 at 156-159; Northern Pacific Railway Co v United States (1958) 356 US 1 at 5-6; Jefferson Parish Hospital District No 2 v Hyde (1984) 466 US 2 at 12-15; cf Illinois Tool Works Inc v Independent Ink Inc (2006) 547 US 28 at 34-38). That condemnation, for the most part, arose because the parties did not bargain from a "position of equality" (Amoco (1973) 133 CLR 288 at 317; see also at 294. See also Queensland Co-operative (1973) 133 CLR 260 at 264, 268, 276; Paramount Pictures Inc (1948) 334 US 131 at 162) or because the covenant that tied the purchaser to acquire the seller's products was unreasonable or contrary to the public interest (see, eg, Buckley (1971) 125 CLR 353 at 376-378; Queensland Co-operative (1973) 133 CLR 260 at 263-264, 267-269, 275; Amoco (1973) 133 CLR 288 at 295-296, 305-307, 315-316; Peters (WA) (2001) 205 CLR 126 at 139 [27]).

[256] Moreover, the sale of second-hand cars using book-up was itself exploitation (see Mr Kobelt's book-up system at [163]-[164], Vulnerability at [165]-[171], Mr Kobelt's actions – taking advantage at [172]-[204] and Effect of the arrangements – tying conduct at [205]-[207] above). Although he refused to acknowledge the price differential at trial, Mr Kobelt required purchasers of cars on book-up to pay significantly more than purchasers with cash (see [175]-[179] above). The sale of second-hand cars meant customers were caught in a vicious circle of indebtedness to Mr Kobelt and then, once locked into the book-up arrangement, customers had limited options to regain control of their funds (see Mr Kobelt's actions – taking advantage at [172]-[204] and Effect of the arrangements – tying conduct at [205]-[207] above). Their potential options were a cash advance, at Mr Kobelt's discretion and sometimes at a fee of ten per cent, or to request a purchase order, again at Mr Kobelt's discretion, at a cost of $5 or $10 and, even then, several stores in the APY Lands would not accept Mr Kobelt's purchase orders (see [185]-[193] above).

[257] The lack of suggestion of dishonesty on the part of Mr Kobelt does not prevent Mr Kobelt's book-up system being unconscionable. Dishonesty is not required for a finding of unconscionable conduct in equity (see fn 156 and accompanying text). And statutory unconscionability under the ASIC Act is intended to be broader than the unwritten law (see ASIC Act, s 12CB(4)(a) and Australia, House of Representatives, Competition and Consumer Legislation Amendment Bill 2011, Explanatory Memorandum at 21 [2.20]). Dishonesty is not required for a finding of unconscionability under s 12CB(1) (see Paciocco (2015) 236 FCR 199 at 266 [262]).

[258] Unconscionable conduct in equity can include the passive acceptance of a benefit in unconscionable circumstances (Bridgewater (1998) 194 CLR 457 at 479 [76], quoting Hart [1985] AC 1000 at 1024; see also at 493 [122]). Mr Kobelt's conduct went beyond that – he engaged in an active system of conduct that, even if approached without dishonest motives or with a "degree of good faith", had the effect of being exploitative and unfair. The requirement is still "victimisation or exploitation" by a stronger party of a more vulnerable party (Kakavas (2013) 250 CLR 392 at 439-440 [161]). And that was the problem with Mr Kobelt's book-up system.

(v) Values, norms and practices

[259] As Wigney J recognised in the Full Court, the terms, nature and circumstances of Mr Kobelt's book-up system bespoke unconscionability and "[m]any, if not most, members of the broader Australian community would probably find some [790] aspects of the system to be surprising, if not extraordinary" (Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 758 [383]). That understates the position. Putting to one side that the majority of Mr Kobelt's customers were financially illiterate Anangu living in a remote, harsh and impoverished part of northern South Australia, in what other circumstances would a small-scale consumer credit provider require, let alone expect, a borrower's assent to terms that, as security for relatively modest advances, the borrower hand over the right to receive the whole of the borrower's meagre monthly income, with not less than half of it to be applied in reduction of the loan; the borrower confer on the credit provider an untrammelled discretion as to how much, if any, of the other half should be made available to the borrower for the purchase of life's necessities; and the borrower be tied to purchasing all such necessities from the credit provider at the credit provider's prices, or else pay the credit provider for the privilege of a "purchase order"?

[260] Where else and with what other customer would it be regarded as acceptable that the terms of the arrangement go entirely undocumented; that the credit provider not be required to, and not, render invoices, receipts or reconciliations; and that the credit provider not maintain financial accounts sufficient even for two experienced accountants, who gave evidence at trial, to determine how much had been advanced and how much had been paid? Surely, anywhere else with any other customer, such an arrangement would be regarded as unconscionable. It is no answer to say that the customers were Anangu people. It is no answer to say that the customers agreed.

[261] The plurality in the Full Court considered that it was enough that the customers understood the basic elements of the system and entered into it voluntarily and, either serendipitously or otherwise, derived from it the benefits of alleviating the boom and bust expenditure cycle and the burdens of demand sharing. Wigney J added, in effect, that it was not unconscionable to impose those terms of credit on the customers because of the differences between "the values, norms and practices of the Anangu people who comprised Mr Kobelt's book-up customers" (Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 758 [383]) and the norms and practices of "the wider Australian society and its culture and institutions" (Kobelt (FC) (2018) 352 ALR 689 at 747 [329]).

[262] That reasoning should be rejected. It does not alleviate the unconscionability of Mr Kobelt's book-up system that his customers were so disadvantaged as to regard Mr Kobelt's offering as acceptable. As the primary judge held, it was the fact that the customers were so significantly disadvantaged, and that Mr Kobelt knew or should have known it to be so, that rendered his conduct unconscionable. Nor is it to the point that the customers may have entered into the scheme voluntarily and without undue influence. Mr Kobelt's book-up system was unconscionable because it took advantage of the customers' vulnerability and special disadvantage. No doubt, Mr Kobelt was in business to make a profit and it cannot reasonably be expected of him that he should have acted as if he were a charity. It is also apparent that there were other traders in the area who provided book-up credit on similar terms and that, apart from book-up, such other forms of credit as were available to the Anangu were limited. It may be, too, that the Anangu liked to go shopping in Mintabie and preferred dealing face-to-face with people like Mr Kobelt to attempting to arrange credit with mainstream credit providers. And it may also be that participating in book-up gave some customers a degree of control over boom and bust expenditure patterns and an excuse to avoid demand sharing requests. But none of that renders Mr Kobelt's conduct any the less unconscionable.

[263] The freedom to make a profit is not a licence to act unconscionably. Nor is an oligopoly of the kind in which Mr Kobelt participated. And the fact that other traders may have behaved in the same unconscionable manner does not excuse it.

(vi) Mr Kobelt's book-up system was not reasonably necessary to protect his legitimate interests: s 12CC(1)(b)

[264] This issue has been addressed. Book-up is not itself unconscionable. The problems were with Mr Kobelt's book-up system and its particular features. Mr Kobelt's system was not reasonably necessary to protect his legitimate interests – there were alternatives (see [219]-[229] above). It may be that, in circumstances of the kind which existed in Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd, s 12CB(1) would not be enlivened merely by reason of the content of a [791] condition of a consumer credit contract ((2016) 258 CLR 525 at 586 [185]-[186]). But, even then, it would depend on the circumstances of each case whether the consumer was at a relevant disadvantage to the credit provider and in particular whether the credit provider, by stipulating for a particular condition of the credit contract, should be seen to have taken unconscientious advantage of that consumer. Here, for the reasons already given, there can be no doubt that the Anangu were at a material, relevant disadvantage to Mr Kobelt and that Mr Kobelt took unconscientious advantage of them by stipulating for the conditions he did notwithstanding that other, less onerous requirements would have been adequate to protect his legitimate interests. Here, there can be no doubt that s 12CC(1)(b) is applicable and to a significant degree informs the engagement of s 12CB(1).

Conclusion and orders

[265] Mr Kobelt's system of conduct was unconscionable contrary to s 12CB(1) of the ASIC Act.

[39.05] Rescission is a form of relief. The purpose and effect of rescission is to set aside the contract and, generally, restore the parties to the positions they occupied before the contract was made. In other words, the contract is set aside from the beginning (ab initio) and the parties restored to their original positions (restitutio in integrum). Such relief is available, in appropriate circumstances, to the victims of the following vitiating factors: mistake, misrepresentation, breach of fiduciary duty, duress, undue influence, unconscionable dealing; and under the rule in Yerkey v Jones (see Chapters 31, 32 and 34–7). Contracts induced by such factors are said to be voidable. However, if restoration of the status quo ante is impossible, the remedy of rescission is not available. Even if such restoration is possible, there may be other bars to rescission.

Rescission is to be distinguished from termination or discharge for breach of contract (see Chapter 21). In this latter instance, the contract is determined in futuro, but not so as to discharge rights and obligations arising from partial performance or causes of action accruing from breach.

RESTITUTIO IN INTEGRUM

[39.10] As far as the common law was concerned, rescission, as a general rule, was only allowed in cases of fraud, or duress, or where there was a total failure of consideration; and only if precise restitution was possible. Equity, on the other hand, recognised rescission if substantial restitution was possible: it could unravel the contract and restore the status quo by appropriate orders and decrees: see Alati v Kruger (1955) 94 CLR 216, extracted at [39.15]. Equity, moreover, recognised rescission for innocent misrepresentation, as well as for other vitiating factors such as an undue influence.

At common law, damages could be awarded for fraudulent and negligent misrepresentation, but not for purely innocent misrepresentation. Although equity could not award damages for innocent misrepresentation, it could, in granting rescission, award an indemnity, that is, require that the representor indemnify the representee against obligations created by the contract: see Brown v Smitt (1924) 34 CLR 160, extracted at [39.25].

Equity also recognises the possibility of partial rescission: see Vadasz v Pioneer Concrete (SA) Pty Ltd (1995) 184 CLR 102, extracted at [39.35].

Alati v Kruger

[39.15] Alati v Kruger (1955) 94 CLR 216 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: The plaintiff (the respondent) purchased from the defendant (the appellant) a fruit business carried on in leasehold premises at Toowong for the price of £700. The respondent alleged that he had been induced to enter into the contract of purchase by a fraudulent misrepresentation as to the takings of the business made by the appellant. The respondent also alleged, alternatively, that in consideration of his entering into the contract and paying the agreed price, the appellant had warranted that the average takings of the business were £100 per week. He claimed rescission of the contract, the return of the purchase money, and damages.

At the trial, the respondent proved the making of the misrepresentation, and that he had relied upon it. It was in the form of a statement contained in the contract itself that the average takings were £100 per week. The trial judge held that this statement was a representation made by the appellant to the respondent at the time when the form of contract containing it was presented to the respondent for signature, that the statement was false in fact and that the appellant made it either knowing it to be false or recklessly not caring whether it was true or false.

The relief which the trial judge granted as against the appellant, in addition to a declaration that the contract was lawfully rescinded by the respondent and that all executed copies of it be cancelled, was:

1. an order that the respondent reassign to the appellant a lease of the business premises, which the appellant had assigned to the respondent pursuant to the contract, and deliver to the appellant all other property the subject of the contract;
2. an order that upon such reassignment and delivery the appellant repay to the respondent the £700 purchase money together with interest from the date of payment to the date of repayment;
3. an order that the appellant pay to the respondent as damages the amount of certain conveyancing costs and stamp duty incurred by the respondent in consequence of the contract;
4. an order that the respondent pay a reasonable rental for the period of the respondent's possession of the business and property up to the date of delivering the same to the appellant.

The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

DIXON CJ, WEBB, KITTO and TAYLOR JJ: [221] The contract was dated 7 June 1954, though in fact it was executed two days later. It was on a printed form with typewritten additions. By cl 1 the appellant agreed to sell and the respondent agreed to purchase, for the price of £700, what was described as all the right title and interest of the appellant in and to a certain fruit business carried on on premises and situated at High Street, Toowong, together with the goodwill of the business and the stock-in-trade, fixtures, fittings, plant, trade utensils, implements, licences and quotas used by the appellant in connection therewith as set forth in a schedule, on a walk-in walk-out basis. The schedule mentioned only a counter, fixtures and fittings, and scales, without giving details of any of them. By cl 7 the appellant agreed to assign or cause to be assigned to the respondent the lease or agreement for a lease (if any) or tenancy and obtain the landlord's consent thereto. Clause 20 described the term of the lease or tenancy as three years from July 1953, with the option of a further two years, and stated that the rental was £3 5s per week. Clause 21 was headed in print "21. Special Clause", and it proceeded in typewriting: "Vendor states that the average takings are £100 per week."

On 15 June 1954, the appellant executed in favour of the respondent, and with the consent of the landlords, an assignment of the lease referred to in the contract, the assignment being expressed to take effect as from 16 June 1954. On or about the latter date, which was a Wednesday, the respondent took over the running of the business. He had had no previous experience in such a business, and the learned trial judge has found that this fact was in the knowledge and contemplation of the appellant. Moreover, a new competing business, called a "super-market", was about to be opened in premises opposite, and this also, his Honour has found, was a fact known to the appellant. The respondent carried on the business without being guilty of any default, and indeed if anything on his part contributed to the deterioration which subsequently occurred it was only his inexperience.

[222] The takings proved immediately to be much less than £100 per week. The three remaining days of the week in which the respondent commenced to run the business brought in only £24 4s 9d and the following week, ending on 26 June 1954, only £44 12s 1d. At the end of the latter week the respondent consulted his solicitors.

On the footing which must be accepted, that the contract had been induced by a fraudulent representation made by the appellant to the respondent, the latter had a choice of courses open to him. He might sue for damages for breach of the warranty contained in cl 21, for the statement in that clause clearly formed one of the terms of the contract and was not only a representation; but he could not do this and rescind the contract for misrepresentation. Secondly, he might sue to recover as damages for fraud the difference between the price he had paid and the fair value of the property at the time of the contract (Holmes v Jones (1907) 4 CLR 1692), but that again would involve affirming the purchase. Or, thirdly, provided that he was in a position to restore to the appellant substantially that which he had received under the contract, he might avoid the purchase and sue to recover his purchase money back from the appellant, with interest and also with damages for any loss which he may have suffered through carrying on the business in the meantime: compare Salmond and Williams on Contracts (2nd ed, 1945), p 269.

On 29 June 1954, the respondent issued (and presumably served) the writ by which the present proceedings were commenced. Townley J was of opinion that by so doing he elected to adopt the third of the courses available to him. Notwithstanding some ambiguity in the statement of claim indorsed on the writ, this seems clearly enough to be correct … [223] The validity of his rescission depended, therefore, only upon the question whether restitutio in integrum was possible in the circumstances as they existed at the commencement of the action.

Before approaching that question, it will be convenient to mention the events which occurred thereafter. The defence was delivered on 4 August 1954, and issue was joined on the following day. On 10 August 1954, the respondent obtained from the landlords a document under seal whereby they undertook and agreed, for a consideration of 10s, that they would consent to any reassignment of the lease by the respondent to the appellant in the event of the respondent succeeding in his claim for rescission. The trial took place on 29 and 30 September 1954. Up to that time the respondent had continued to carry on the business, languishing though it was, taking never more than £40 in a week and only £7 3s 3d, £11 5s 1d and £14 3s respectively in the last three weeks. In many weeks he made a loss, even without allowing for wages for himself. On 22 November 1954, the judge announced his findings of fact. He then heard further argument on the question of restitutio in integrum and reserved judgment. The respondent still continued to carry on the business for a while, but when the case was called for judgment, on 17 December 1954, the judge was informed before he made his order that the respondent had closed down the business and left the premises, and that the landlord had re-entered. His Honour, however, proceeded to make the order which is the subject of this appeal.

If the case had to be decided according to the principles of the common law, it might have been argued that at the date when the respondent issued his writ he was not entitled to rescind the purchase, because he was not then in a position to return to the appellant in specie that which he had received under the contract, in the same plight as that in which he had received it: Clarke v Dickson (1858) EB & E 148; 120 ER 463. But it is necessary here to apply the doctrines of equity, and equity has always regarded as valid the disaffirmance of a contract induced by fraud even though precise restitutio in integrum is not possible, if the situation is such that, by the exercise of its powers, including the power to take accounts of profits and to direct inquiries as to allowances proper to be made for deterioration, it can do what is practically just between the parties, and by so [224] doing restore them substantially to the status quo: Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co (1878) 3 App Cas 1218 at 1278, 1279; Brown v Smitt (1924) 34 CLR 160 at 165, 169; Spence v Crawford [1939] 3 All ER 271 at 279, 280. It is not that equity asserts a power by its decree to avoid a contract which the defrauded party himself has no right to disaffirm, and to revest property the title to which the party cannot affect. Rescission for misrepresentation is always the act of the party himself: Reese River Silver Mining Co v Smith (1869) LR 4 HL 64 at 73. The function of a court in which proceedings for rescission are taken is to adjudicate upon the validity of a purported disaffirmance as an act avoiding the transaction ab initio, and, if it is valid, to give effect to it and make appropriate consequential orders: see Abram Steamship Co Ltd v Westville Shipping Co Ltd [1923] AC 773. The difference between the legal and the equitable rules on the subject simply was that equity, having means which the common law lacked to ascertain and provide for the adjustments necessary to be made between the parties in cases where a simple handing back of property or repayment of money would not put them in as good a position as before they entered into their transaction, was able to see the possibility of restitutio in integrum, and therefore to concede the right of a defrauded party to rescind, in a much wider variety of cases than those which the common law would recognise as admitting of rescission. Of course, a rescission which the common law courts would not accept as valid cannot of its own force revest the legal title to property which had passed, but if a court of equity would treat it as effectual the equitable title to such property revests upon the rescission.

In the present case, what changes affecting the possibility of restitution had occurred in the short period between 16 June, when the respondent took possession of the business, and 29 June, when he issued the writ? He had had possession of the premises, and although that might have sufficed at common law to preclude rescission (Blackburn v Smith (1848) 2 Ex 783 at 792; 154 ER 707 at 711), it could hardly do so in equity, since a money payment could compensate for any difference there might be between the rental value of the premises and the rent paid by the respondent to the landlord. The title to the term created by the lease had been vested in the respondent by assignment, but that was subject to any right which he had to disaffirm the transaction. The title would revest in equity [225] when he elected to rescind, and he was in a position to make a legal re-assignment with the landlord's consent. He had taken over (as he said in evidence) about £20 worth of stock, but while of course he could not restore that to the appellant in specie he could pay or allow for its value, and nothing more could in justice be required. The business itself had deteriorated but this would not matter, for, as the trial judge has found, it was not due to any fault on the respondent's part, and even at common law the necessity to return property in its original condition was qualified so as to allow for incidents for which the buyer was not responsible, such as those to which the property was liable either from its inherent nature (compare Newbigging v Adam (1886) 34 Ch D 582 at 588; Adam v Newbigging (1888) 13 App Cas 308 at 330) or in the course of the exercise by the buyer of those rights over it which the contract gave: Head v Tattersall (1871) LR 7 Exch 7 at 12. No other change had occurred. The case was therefore typical of the class of cases in which a defrauded purchaser is regarded by a court exercising equitable jurisdiction as entitled to rescind the purchase and obtain a decree, on proper terms, declaring and giving effect to the rescission as an avoidance of the transaction from the beginning.

There remains, however, the question whether the respondent lost his right to such a decree by his conduct in discontinuing the business and leaving the premises before judgment was given in the action. The remedy is discretionary (Story on Equity (3rd English ed, 1920), pp 293, 294, 295), and if the respondent had acted unconscientiously during the pendency of the action, as by causing the loss of a valuable leasehold and goodwill by discontinuing the business and abandoning the premises without giving the appellant a reasonable opportunity to take them back, no doubt the court might refuse relief. But nothing of that kind happened. The term was, of course, still vested at law in the respondent, and it is not impossible that, despite low takings and actual losses, the business had some residual goodwill. But it is impossible to convict the respondent of any unfairness in the circumstances. The service of the writ had given the appellant clear notice that if the case alleged against him were made out at the trial the business and the lease would be held to have been his all along. He knew from the judge's announcement of his findings that in fact the issues of fact in the case had gone against him. He could have applied for the appointment by the court of a receiver and manager to preserve the property pending the determination of the case, but he made [226] no such application. He did not even make any offer to the respondent to take the property back or suggest any modus vivendi. He took his chance, contenting himself with such maintenance of the business as the respondent's continuing conduct of it might afford. But the respondent was under no duty to go on indefinitely, work for nothing and incurring losses, especially after the judge had announced findings of fact in his favour. It does not appear from the material before us whether he gave the appellant any specific warnings of his intention to give up the business and leave the premises, but, even if he did not, the appellant had ample opportunity to protect his interests, and his inaction is far more likely to have been due to an opinion that neither the lease nor the business was worth worrying about, particularly in view of the competition which the "super-market" had created, than to any expectation that the respondent would obligingly continue to act as an unpaid manager.

For these reasons the appeal must fail. It is desirable, however, to make one or two variations in the judgment of the Supreme Court, because, as framed, it makes the respondent's right to be repaid his purchase money conditional upon his re-assigning the lease to the appellant and delivering to the appellant all other property the subject of the contract. The lease cannot now be re-assigned, and the other property referred to would include the stock-in-trade which obviously cannot now be returned, and the chattels referred to in the schedule to the contract which now may or may not be available for redelivery. The judgment should therefore be varied so as to order the plaintiff to return to the defendant Alati such of the chattels mentioned in the schedule to the contract as he is able to return, and to order the defendant to repay to the plaintiff the balance of the purchase money (£700) and interest thereon which shall remain after deducting the value as at the date of the contract of such of the scheduled chattels as the plaintiff cannot return, the value as at that date of the stock-in-trade which the plaintiff received from the defendant under the contract, the damages awarded in the judgment of the Supreme Court, and any amount which ought to be allowed in the defendant's favour in respect of the plaintiff's use of any of the property comprised in the contract …

In the result the judgment of the Supreme Court should be varied in the manner described, and the appeal should be dismissed. The application for special leave to appeal should be refused.

[FULLAGAR J delivered a short judgment in which he reached the same conclusion.]

Judgment of Supreme Court upheld subject to variations; appeal dismissed.

In Kramer v McMahon [1970] 1 NSWR 194 at 207, Helsham J said:

> where the rescinding act of a party to the contract does not for one reason or another bring about restitutio in integrum (and it is necessary to have an order of the court to bring this about) then rescission will not be regarded as effective unless the court through its powers can order that which the party was unable by his own power to effect; by the ability of the court to make an order his duty is discharged. Rescission is the act of the party. It is valid if it effects restitutio or if with the aid of the court when sought it effects restitutio; it is not if the aid of the court is necessary but for one reason or another that aid cannot be summoned.

Brown v Smitt

[39.25] Brown v Smitt (1924) 34 CLR 160 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: Smitt (the plaintiff) commenced an action against Brown (the vendor/defendant) in which he sought to have a contract to sell a farm and buildings rescinded on the ground that Brown had induced him to enter it by making certain false representations. These representations were:

1. that the farm was a first-class dairying property;
2. that the soil was of good quality and was volcanic soil;
3. that 120 acres of the land had been cleared.

Smitt had paid £755 9s under the contract, had gone into possession of the farm and had incurred various expenses in connection with it. These expenses were alleged to amount to some £984 and were in respect of work, labour and materials for working, repairing and improving the farm, loss and depreciation of stock and expenses of moving to the farm and droving. He also had received £130 in income from the farm. Smitt therefore sought to recover the £755 9s and also £854, the balance of expenses incurred over income.

Mann J made an order rescinding the contract and ordered Brown to repay the £755 9s paid under the contract and also the sum of £175 by way of compensation. This sum was arrived at by crediting Smitt with £345 in respect of "compensation for expenditure occasioned by the contract" and debiting him with £130, the gross amount received by him from business conducted on the farm during his occupation, and a further sum of £40 which was allowed to Brown as compensation for the fact that when he got the property back it would be too late to plant a hay crop. Brown appealed.]

KNOX CJ, GAVAN DUFFY and STARKE JJ: [164] No one disputed that the plaintiff is entitled to repayment of the sum of £755 9s if the contract is rescinded, but we have to consider what further relief ought to be granted to him. The parties being relieved of the contractual obligations, each must give back all that he obtained under the contract. Where the property the subject matter of a contract remains unchanged, no difficulty arises. Where it has been wholly or substantially destroyed by the default of the party seeking rescission, there can be no rescission because there can be no restitution. But where the property has been improved or deteriorated by the act of the purchaser, and yet remains in substance what it was before the contract, equity adjusts the rights of the parties by awarding money compensation to one or the other, and so substantially putting each party in the position which he occupied before the contract was made. Lord Blackburn in Erlanger's case (1878) 3 App Cas 1278-9, said:

> It would be obviously unjust that a person who had been in possession of property under the contract which he seeks to repudiate should be allowed to throw that back on the other party's hands without accounting for any benefit he may have derived from the use of the property, or if the property, though not destroyed, has been in the interval deteriorated, without making compensation for that deterioration … And … the practice has always been for a court of equity to give this relief whenever, by the exercise of its powers, it can do what is practically just, though it cannot restore the parties precisely to the state they were in before the contract.

[165] It would be no less unjust, however, that a person whose fraud or misrepresentation had induced the contract should be allowed to take back his property, with permanent and lasting improvements upon it made by the other party, without making any allowance for those improvements, which increased the sale value of the estate in his hands. The decision of Lord Eldon in Edwards v M'Leay (1818) 2 Swans 287; 36 ER 625, is a distinct authority for the proposition that necessary repairs may be allowed in such cases; and the textbooks unanimously, we think, support the view we have taken: see Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers (14th ed), p 254; Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (7th ed), p 811, and Williams' Vendor and Purchaser (3rd ed), p 815, n (u), pp 816–7. This doctrine however, would not justify improving the vendor out of his estate, as is the phrase in the books, or rendering it impossible for him to recover his estate. Rescission in such a case would be impossible, and restitution out of the question. Again, allowances for improvements which were matters of taste or personal enjoyment could not be justified: see Mill v Hill (1852) 3 HLC 828; 10 ER 330; Stepney v Biddulph (1865) 13 WR 576; Kerr on Fraud and Mistake (4th ed), p 372. Nor will allowances be given for improvements made after the party making them knows, or has reasonable notice, of the defect in title. He must then take the risk. And putting the parties in the position they were in before the contract, replacing them in statu quo, does not involve replacing [166] them in the same position in all respects, but only in respect of the rights and obligations created by the contract which is rescinded. A party in case of rescission, cannot ask the court to award him compensation for all collateral losses which he may have sustained by reason of the fact that he entered into the contract, such as losses incurred in carrying on a business (Newbigging v Adam (1886) 34 Ch D 582; Whittington v Seale-Hayne (1900) 82 LT 49), but only such compensation as will restore the status quo ante in relation to the subject matter of the contract. Such losses could, in this case, only be recovered in an action of deceit. That cause of action, if included in the statement of claim, was not relied on below, and in any event it seems to us that it was the contract, and not, in a legal sense, the establishment of the business which the fraudulent representations induced.

Now, it is clear, from the evidence and from the judgment of Mann J that he made allowances for some improvements on the property sold, not permanent in their nature, and also for some collateral losses incurred in connection with a business which the plaintiff carried on upon the property. It is manifest, therefore, that the sum of £175 allowed by the learned judge as compensation is erroneous; and cannot be sustained. We are quite unable, on the evidence, to assess the proper amount, and in any case an account on familiar lines is much more desirable than the method adopted in the court below.

[ISAACS and RICH JJ delivered a joint judgment in which they dissented from the proposition that the purchaser could recover as compensation the value added to the land by reason of permanent improvements.

In the course of their judgment their Honours said (at 170): "True, the vendor gets these improvements without paying for them. But he is not asking for them, and he is not bound to purchase them. Annulling one contract does not justify creating another; and, without another contract, what justification exists for compelling the vendor defendant to pay the value of the improvements?"]

Order of Supreme Court varied.

[39.30] Note

In Newbigging v Adam (1886) 34 Ch D 582, referred to in the principal case, Bowen LJ made the following statement (at 592–3):

> It is said that the injured party is entitled to be replaced in statu quo. It seems to me that when you are dealing with innocent misrepresentation you must understand that proposition that he is to be replaced in statu quo with this limitation, that he is not to be replaced in exactly the same position in all respects, otherwise he would be entitled to recover damages, but is to be replaced in his position so far as regards the rights and obligations which have been created by the contract into which he has been induced to enter.

Vadasz v Pioneer Concrete (SA)

[39.35] Vadasz v Pioneer Concrete (SA) Pty Ltd (1995) 184 CLR 102 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia.

[FACTS: Vadipile Drilling Pty Ltd (Vadipile) carried on the business of a foundation piling contractor. Mr Vadasz (the appellant) and his wife were the only shareholders in the company. Pioneer Concrete (SA) Pty Ltd (Pioneer, the respondent) manufactured ready-mixed concrete and supplied Vadipile with concrete. By July 1992, Vadipile owed Pioneer more than $200 000. In order to avoid the cessation of future supplies of concrete, Vadasz agreed to give Pioneer a personal guarantee, and Pioneer agreed to continue supplying concrete to Vadipile on credit. Before he signed the guarantee in August 1992, Vadasz was told the guarantee would only cover future debts of Vadipile. Pioneer made further deliveries, and Vadipile incurred further debts. The guarantee in fact provided, as Pioneer intended, for the payment of "all monies which are now or may at any time" be owing by Vadipile. In November 1992, Pioneer sued Vadasz on the guarantee for $357 427, representing the total indebtedness of Vadipile. Vadasz defended the claim on the basis that the guarantee was unenforceable because the agreement Vadasz made was that he would guarantee Vadipile's future indebtedness, not past indebtedness.

The trial judge held that Vadasz was entitled to avoid liability, but on the basis that "he who seeks equity must do equity", only in respect of past indebtedness. Vadasz's appeal to the Full Court was dismissed. On appeal to the High Court, the court dealt with the matter on the basis that fraud on the part of Pioneer should be assumed, without making a positive finding in that respect.]

THE COURT: [110] The only question on the appeal to this Court is whether the trial judge was entitled to order rescission on a footing which left the appellant liable to the respondent for the debts incurred by Vadipile after the guarantee was signed.

In this context it should be remembered that the trial judge held that the appellant was "entitled to equitable relief on the ground of the [respondent's] misrepresentation". And his Honour held that the respondent was entitled in equity … to enforce the appellant's liability under the guarantee for future indebtedness. Had the appellant sought to rely on the common law, he would not have been entitled to rescission because the contract did not remain completely executory and "because he was not then in a position to return to the [respondent] in specie that which he had received under the contract, in the same plight as that in which he had [111] received it" (Alati v Kruger (1955) 94 CLR 216 at 223). Complete restitution was not and is not possible in the circumstances of the present case where the consideration which moved from the respondent to the appellant was, in the words of the guarantee, the respondent's "having agreed or agreeing to sell goods … or giving credit" to a company owned by the appellant and his wife and where, in reliance upon the guarantee, the respondent in fact supplied on credit to that company, which was or became insolvent, large quantities of concrete which have been used and cannot be returned. That being so, the assumption of fraud does not avail the appellant at common law.

Thus we are very much in the realm of equity. (Strictly speaking, where there is fraudulent misrepresentation equity is exercising its concurrent jurisdiction and where there is innocent or negligent misrepresentation equity is exercising its auxiliary jurisdiction: see Meagher, Gummow and Lehane, Equity: Doctrines and Remedies, 3rd ed (1992) pp 656-8.) Indeed, as we followed the argument, the appellant did not really seek to attack the conclusion of the trial judge and the Full Court that the appropriate relief in the circumstances of the present case is equitable in its nature in the sense that its origins can be traced to the old Court of Chancery. The appellant's case is that the appropriate equitable relief was the unconditional rescission or setting aside of the guarantee in its entirety. In that respect it is useful to have regard to what was said by Mason J in Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 461:

> Historically, courts have exercised jurisdiction to set aside contracts and other dealings on a variety of equitable grounds. They include fraud, misrepresentation, breach of fiduciary duty, undue influence and unconscionable conduct. In one sense they all constitute species > of unconscionable conduct on the part of a party who stands to receive a benefit under a transaction which, in the eye of equity, cannot be enforced because to do so would be inconsistent with equity and good conscience.

Where, as in this case, the court has granted equitable relief in the shape of rescission of a contract, the result is to set aside the contract ab initio. While equity followed the law in requiring restitution as a condition of rescission where the contract had been wholly or partly executed, it allowed greater flexibility in the basis upon which restitution and accounting between the parties may be ordered. Thus, equity did not require complete restitution of the position which existed before the contract but allowed its remedies, particularly an order for monetary accounts, to be utilised to achieve practical restitution and justice. That point was made by Dixon CJ, Webb, Kitto and Taylor JJ in Alati v Kruger (1955) 94 CLR 216 at 223-4:

> [112] If the case had to be decided according to the principles of the common law, it might have been argued that at the date when the respondent issued his writ he was not entitled to rescind the purchase, because he was not then in a position to return to the appellant in specie that which he had received under the contract, in the same plight as that in which he had received it: Clarke v Dickson (1858) El Bl & El 148;120 ER 463. But it is necessary here to apply the doctrines of equity, and equity has always regarded as valid the disaffirmance of a contract induced by fraud even though precise restitutio in integrum is not possible, if the situation is such that, by the exercise of its powers, including the power to take account of profits and to direct inquiries as to allowances proper to be made for deterioration, it can do what is practically just between the parties, and by so doing restore them substantially to that status quo.

In the present case, the appellant obtained the benefit which he sought as consideration for entering the contract of guarantee, namely, the subsequent supply on credit by the respondent of goods to Vadipile. In those circumstances, a practical restoration of the status quo which existed before the execution of the guarantee and the subsequent supply of goods on credit by the respondent would involve not only a cancellation of the appellant's obligations under the guarantee but either a return of the goods subsequently supplied by the respondent or the actual payment, either by Vadipile or the appellant, of an amount equivalent to the value of the goods which were subsequently supplied in reliance upon the appellant's guarantee of payment of their price.

However, the appellant does not offer to pay the respondent the amount which Vadipile has failed to pay for those subsequently supplied goods. Nor does he offer to submit to terms or conditions which would ensure that the purchase price of those goods, which has not been suggested to exceed their true value, is received by the respondent. As has been said, the appellant seeks to be relieved completely and unconditionally from all liability under the guarantee, leaving the respondent without either its subsequently supplied goods or any payment for them. If such complete and unconditional relief is to be granted, it must be on some basis other than mere entitlement to a practical restoration of the status quo upon rescission or "disaffirmance" of a contract induced by fraud. The only such basis that comes to mind is equity's general jurisdiction, in setting aside contracts and other dealings on equitable grounds, to ensure the observance of the requirements of good conscience and practical justice. Thus in O'Sullivan v Management Agency & Music Ltd [1985] QB 428 an exclusive management agreement made by a young composer was [113] set aside by reason of undue influence because of a fiduciary relationship between the parties. The Court of Appeal upheld rescission even though the parties could not be restored to their original position. In their judgments the members of the Court of Appeal pointed out that a contract may be set aside in equity so long as "the court can achieve practical justice between the parties" (O'Sullivan [1985] QB 428 at 458, per Dunn LJ) and that "the court will do what is practically just in the individual case" (at 466, per Fox LJ) so long as "it is possible to achieve what is practically just by granting rescission and restitution together with orders for accounts" (at 471, per Waller LJ).

In the present case, the consideration provided by the respondent involved the supply of goods upon credit to Vadipile. Any need for restitution arises by reason of Vadipile's insolvency. The respondent points to the fact that goods were supplied on credit in pursuance of its promise given as consideration for the appellant's guarantee and says in effect: "I would not have made further deliveries of concrete to Vadipile and risked non-payment if the appellant had not guaranteed payment for those deliveries." In the way in which the action between the parties was constituted, practical justice is achieved, so the respondent's argument runs, by holding the appellant liable on a money claim for that proportion of Vadipile's debt incurred after the appellant signed the guarantee. As Cussen J noted in Bank of Victoria Ltd v Mueller [1925] VLR 642 at 659, in the context of insisting that equity shall be done as a condition of setting aside a guarantee: "This is, of course, something quite different from rectification, although in some cases its effect may be much the same."

The idea of a Court of Equity using the powers to do "what is practically just" was referred to by Lord Blackburn in Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co (1878) 3 App Cas 1218 well over 100 years ago. In contrasting the relief available in law and in equity on rescission of a contract, in particular the ability of equity to take account of profits and make allowance for deterioration of property, his Lordship said (Erlanger (1878) 3 App Cas 1218 at 1278-9): "And I think the practice has always been for a Court of Equity to give this relief whenever, by the exercise of its powers, it can do what is practically just, though it cannot restore the parties precisely to the state they were in before the contract."

In using the expression "what is practically just", Lord Blackburn may well have adapted the language of Lindsay Petroleum Co v Hurd (1874) LR 5 PC 221 referred to in his judgment. There the Privy Council [114] considered the operation of laches where "it would be practically unjust to give a remedy" (Lindsay Petroleum (1874) LR 5 PC 239, referred to by Lord Blackburn in Erlanger (1878) 3 App Cas 1218 at 1279). And in a contemporary edition of Story's Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, in the context of rescission and specific performance, it was said (Story, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, as Administered in England and America, 12th ed (1877), vol 1, par 693):

> [T]he interference of a court of equity is a matter of mere discretion … And in all cases of this sort … the court will, in granting relief, impose such terms upon the party as it deems the real justice of the case to require … The maxim here is emphatically applied — He who seeks equity must do equity.

Referring to Lord Blackburn's judgment, Lord Wright said in Spence v Crawford (Spence [1939] 3 All ER 271 at 288):

> In that case, Lord Blackburn is careful not to seek to tie the hands of the court by attempting to form any rigid rules. The court must fix its eyes on the goal of doing "what is practically just". How that goal may be reached must depend on the circumstances of the case, but the court will be more drastic in exercising its discretionary powers in a case of fraud than in a case of innocent misrepresentation … The court will be less ready to pull a transaction to pieces where the defendant is innocent, whereas in the case of fraud the court will exercise its jurisdiction to the full in order, if possible, to prevent the defendant from enjoying the benefit of his fraud at the expense of the innocent plaintiff.

Underlying Lord Wright's judgment is the idea that restoration is essential to the idea of restitution and that the "purpose of the relief is not punishment but compensation" (Spence [1939] 3 All ER 271 at 289).

In Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 481, Deane J referred to what was said by Cussen J in Mueller in support of the proposition:

> Where appropriate, an order will be made which only partly nullifies a transaction liable to be set aside in equity pursuant to the principles of unconscionable dealing … [T]he order will, in an appropriate case, be made conditional upon the party obtaining relief doing equity.

Thus unconscionability works in two ways. In its strict sense, it provides the justification for setting aside a transaction. More loosely, it provides the justification for not setting aside the transaction in its entirety or in doing so subject to conditions, so as to prevent one party obtaining an unwarranted benefit at the expense of the other.

[115] In Amadio this Court upheld an order setting aside a mortgage in its entirety where the mortgagors believed they were committing themselves to securing their son's overdraft to a limit of $50 000 and for six months only. The reason for not setting aside the mortgage only to the extent that it involved a liability in excess of $50 000 was that the Amadios would not have entered into the transaction at all, had they known the true financial position of their son (Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 481; see also Alderton v Prudential Assurance Co Ltd (1993) 41 FCR 435 at 449, per Heerey J). In the present case it cannot be maintained that the appellant would not have entered into the guarantee had it been confined to the future indebtedness of Vadipile. Rather, the evidence is that he would have done so, if not happily, because it was the only way to secure future supplies of concrete for Vadipile. And, by reason of the guarantee of future debts, the respondent supplied concrete to the value of $170 929.32. In giving the guarantee, the appellant, who was one of two directors and one of two shareholders, was fully aware of the financial position of Vadipile. He stood to benefit personally from the operations of the company.

The appellant suggested that to set aside the guarantee in the present case only to the extent of past indebtedness was an invitation to others to misrepresent the terms of a contract because they would be no worse off than if they had revealed the true position. But that suggestion misconceives the ordinary function of civil remedies, including equitable relief. It may, depending upon whether the respondent would in fact have supplied its goods on the basis of the more limited guarantee which the appellant was prepared to give, be true to say that the orders made by the trial judge and upheld by the Full Court disadvantage the respondent only to the extent that it is unable to enjoy the benefit of its misrepresentation and is required to bear its own costs of the trial. Such a result would not, however, be either surprising or inappropriate. The concern of equity, in moulding relief between the parties is to prevent, nullify, or provide compensation for, wrongful injury. If it appears that the other party would not have entered into the contract at all if the true position were known, the contract may be set aside in its entirety as in Amadio.

The appellant is "seeking the assistance of a court of equity and he who seeks equity must do equity" (Cheese v Thomas [1994] 1 WLR 129 at 136). The Court must look at what is practically just for both parties, not only the appellant. To enforce the guarantee to the extent of future indebtedness is to do no more than hold the appellant to what he was prepared to undertake independently of any misrepresentation. This approach has been taken in several cases (Barclays Bank plc v O'Brien [1993] QB 109. See also Midland Bank plc v Greene [1994] 2 FLR 827. The view adopted by Nourse LJ in TSB Bank plc v Camfield [1995] 1 WLR 430 at 435-7 to the effect that setting aside is an "all or nothing process" should not be accepted in this country).

[116] … As Olsson J said in the present case (Vadasz (1994) 62 SASR 150 at 156): "the practical approach adopted by the learned trial judge was clearly justified, if not demanded, by the situation revealed by the evidence."

Appeal dismissed.

BARS TO RESCISSION

[39.40] Apart from the requirement of substantial restitution, there are several other potential bars to rescission that must be considered:

1. Views differ as to whether the equitable jurisdiction to rescind for innocent misrepresentation applies to contracts for the sale of goods; see Watt v Westhoven [1933] VLR 458, extracted at [39.45].
2. There has also been controversy as to whether certain contracts can be rescinded, in the absence of fraud, if they have been executed; see [39.60].
3. Rescission will be barred if the contract has been affirmed by the representee; see Coastal Estates Pty Ltd v Melevende [1965] VR 433, extracted at [39.70].
4. The effect of a lapse of time also needs to be considered. Affirmation may be inferred from lapse of time, but it is doubtful whether mere lapse of time is itself an independent bar to rescission. Delay as such will not be a bar to relief in equity but is relevant to the court's exercise of discretion: see JAD International Pty Ltd v International Trucks Australia Ltd (1994) 50 FCR 378, 387–8.
5. There has been some doubt as to whether the right to rescind for misrepresentation survives if the representation becomes a term of the contract. The question is whether the representee in such a case is restricted to her or his rights in respect of the breach of contract. In Academy of Health and Fitness Pty Ltd v Power [1973] VR 254, Crockett J held that the party induced to enter into a contract by an innocent misrepresentation did not lose the equitable right to rescind by reason of the representation having become a term of the contract that was at no time other than a warranty. This approach has been confirmed by statute in South Australia and the Australian Capital Territory: Misrepresentation Act 1972 (SA), s 6(1)(a); Civil Law (Wrongs) Act 2002 (ACT), s 173. For further statutory confirmation, see Sale of Goods Act 1923 (NSW), s 4(2A)(a) (sale of goods); Australian Consumer Law and Fair Trading Act 2012 (Vic), s 24(2) (contracts for the supply of goods).
6. The intervention of third-party rights may also bar rescission, although a monetary remedy may then be granted; see McKenzie v McDonald [1927] VLR 134, [32.55], and Hartigan v International Society for Krishna Consciousness Inc [2002] NSWSC 810.
7. A non-fraudulent representor may be protected by a contractual provision (sometimes called a "merger clause" or "no representations clause"). A clause may say, for example, that the representee has not relied on any pre-contractual statements. As to the effect of such a clause, see Byers v Dorotea Pty Ltd (1986) 69 ALR 715, extracted at [33.300]. In South Australia and the Australian Capital Territory, however, legislation requires that a clause that excludes or restricts liability or remedies arising from misrepresentation must pass a reasonableness test: Misrepresentation Act 1972 (SA), s 8; Civil Law (Wrongs) Act 2002 (ACT), s 176.
8. Rescission will not usually take effect until the representee has notified the representor of the representee's election to rescind. In Car & Universal Finance Co Ltd v Caldwell [1965] 1 QB 525, 551, the English Court of Appeal held that if it is not possible to communicate the decision to the representor, the representee "may still satisfy a judge or jury that he had made a final and irrevocable decision and ended the contract". In that case, the representor was a rogue who had disappeared and it was held to be sufficient that the representee had taken "all possible steps to regain the goods". In Victoria, a statutory provision sets out the circumstances in which a purported rescission of a consumer contract for the supply of goods will take effect: Australian Consumer Law and Fair Trading Act 2012 (Vic), s 26.

9. In some cases, rescission for misrepresentation can be claimed as a defence to an action on the contract. In Academy of Health and Fitness Pty Ltd v Power [1973] VR 254, Crockett J held that the defence of misrepresentation was sufficient, if proved, to sustain an effective rescission of an executory contract without there having been any further plea or act of disaffirmation. His Honour said (at 256–60):

> Rescission for misrepresentation must always be the act of the party himself: Alati v Kruger (1955) 94 CLR 216 at 224. But a disaffirmance may for the first time be stated and communicated to the other party in a writ claiming relief based upon such rescission … But may a defendant for the first time state and communicate his election to disaffirm by a statement of defence written or oral pleaded in an action based upon the contract?
> … Repudiation involves the restoration of the other party to the same condition as he was in before, or as far as possible, or at least an ability to make such restoration. If the contract is executed or partly so, reinstatement as far as possible by the defendant is essential to success of the defence. Restoration in fact or ability to make it must, therefore, be pleaded. As restoration or an assertion of an ability to make it is a consequence of a determination to repudiate, a plea of disaffirmation will also be expected to be found in such a defence. But the position is different if the contract is wholly executory. There is then no reason why the defence that pleads misrepresentation should not of itself be sufficient repudiation.

Can a contract for the sale of goods be rescinded in equity for innocent misrepresentation?

[39.45] Watt v Westhoven [1933] VLR 458 (Supreme Court of Victoria, Full Court) – Case Stated.

[FACTS: The plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant a motor car for £375 and received payment of £300 of the price. In an action in the County Court to recover the remainder of the purchase money, the defendant counterclaimed for a rescission of the sale and repayment of the purchase money already paid, upon the grounds that she was induced to purchase the car by the misrepresentation of the plaintiff's agent as to the age of the car and as to its original cost. The jury found that the representations complained of were false, that they were not fraudulent and that each of them formed part of the inducement to the purchase. They also found that the purchase price was reasonable and that the car was still substantially in the same condition as when purchased. A case stated, reserved by the trial judge for the opinion of the Full Court, asked whether rescission could be ordered.]

MANN ACJ: [461] The facts provide the typical case which for many years has been the subject of controversy amongst text writers dealing with the subject of misrepresentation. Leaving subsidiary questions aside, that controversy is whether the effects of innocent misrepresentation [462] upon contracts for the sale of goods should be governed by the rules of common law as stated, for example in Kennedy v Panama etc Mail Co (1867) LR 2 QB 580, or by the rules of equity as exemplified in Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1 ….

In my opinion a definite answer can be given to the main question, and it is the answer given by the Full Court of New Zealand in the case of Riddiford v Warren (1901) 20 NZLR 572, namely, that the question had been clearly determined by the legislature in these words in s 4 of the Goods Act

1928: "The rules of the common law including the law merchant … and in particular the rules relating to … the effect of misrepresentation … mistake or other invalidating cause shall continue to apply to contracts for the sale of goods."

This language, re-enacted here from time to time, was taken verbatim originally from the English Act of 1893. In my opinion, what the words meant in that Act they mean in the Victorian Acts, and it is idle to suggest that Mr Chalmers the draughtsman, and the distinguished lawyers, including four Law Lords, who formed the select committees upon the English Bill as finally enacted, could in the year 1893 have used the words "the rules of the common law" in any other than their true and technical sense. I adopt with respect all that was said upon this point by the judges of the New Zealand bench in the case abovementioned, and I can give no additional force to their reasons by repeating them.

If the rule of the common law applies to this case, the defendant fails. Unlike the rules in equity, the common law rule is expressed in precise and definite language, and it makes it clear that an innocent misrepresentation by which one party to a contract induces the other party to enter into it is not a ground [463] for rescission at the suit of the latter, unless it was such that there is a complete difference in subject matter between the thing bargained for and that obtained, so as to constitute a failure of consideration: Kennedy v Panama etc Mail Co (1867) LR 2 QB 580.

[39.50] GAVAN DUFFY J: [467] I think the question before us can be answered by a consideration of the Goods Act 1928. Section 4(2) provides: [His Honour read the subsection.] This, I think, is a legislative pronouncement that apart from the statutory provisions of the Act itself the sale of goods is solely governed by "common law", including the law merchant, and I see no reason to suppose that "common law" is used in any other sense than as meaning the body of law so named which was administered in the common law courts before the Judicature Acts. Even if "common law", in s 4 is to be read as meaning all law in force on the matter when the Sale of Goods Act 1896 came into operation, I do not think it is open to this court to make the inquiry, however interesting it might be, as to what principles of law were applicable before the Sale of Goods Act to a contract of sale of goods induced by innocent misrepresentations such as those found by the jury to have been made by the present plaintiff. In 1890, before the legislation now in the Goods Act 1928 was in force in Victoria, the Full Court of this court decided Picturesque Atlas Co Ltd v Phillipson (1890) 16 VLR 675, an action arising out of a contract for the sale of a book in parts; and Higinbotham CJ, delivering the judgment of the court, in stating the law relating to innocent misrepresentation adopted the doctrine as enunciated in Kennedy v Panama etc Mail Co.

[LOWE J delivered a concurring judgment.]

Question answered accordingly.

[39.55] Notes

1. For the equivalent of s 4(2) of the Victorian Goods Act 1958, see: Sale of Goods Act 1954 (ACT), s 62(1); Sale of Goods Act 1923 (NSW), s 4(2); Sale of Goods Act (NT), s 4(2); Sale of Goods Act 1896 (Qld), s 61(2); Sale of Goods Act 1895 (SA), s 59(2); Sale of Goods Act 1896 (Tas), s 5(2); Sale of Goods Act 1895 (WA), s 59(2).
2. In Graham v Freer (1980) 35 SASR 424, the Full Supreme Court of South Australia declined to follow the principal case. The court ruled (in the context of a contract for the sale of a ship) that "common law" in the relevant section included "equity" and that the section did not take contracts for the sale of goods outside the general rule that contracts are voidable for innocent misrepresentation.

3. In some jurisdictions, the relevant legislation specifically provides that it shall not affect any remedy in equity in respect of a misrepresentation: Sale of Goods Act 1923 (NSW), s 4(2A); Sale of Goods Act 1954 (ACT), s 62(2). In Victoria, the Australian Consumer Law and Fair Trading Act 2012 (Vic), s 24 specifically provides for rescission of a consumer contract for the supply of goods on the basis of an innocent misrepresentation.

Can an executed contract be rescinded for innocent misrepresentation?

[39.60] In Vimig Pty Ltd v Contract Tooling Pty Ltd (1986) 9 NSWLR 731, Wood J considered whether a contract for the sale of a business which had been completed could be rescinded for innocent misrepresentation. Wood J said (at 733):

> It was common ground that since the contract had been executed and carried into completion, the plaintiff could only succeed if Seddon v North Eastern Salt Co Ltd [1905] 1 Ch 326 was distinguished or not followed … The rule in Seddon's case, as it is sometimes referred to, was … restated by McCardie J in Armstrong v Jackson [1917] 2 KB 822 at 825:
> > But if the contract has been executed by the completion of a conveyance or lease, or the formal assignment of a chattel, then rescission cannot be obtained on the ground of innocent misrepresentation by the vendor or lessor. When the contract is so completed, fraud must be proved before rescission can be granted: see Wilde v Gibson (1848) 1 HLC 605 at 632, per Lord Campbell; Seddon v North Eastern Salt Co and Angel v Jay [1911] 1 KB 666.

After extensive review of the authorities, Wood J concluded (at 737):

> Although there is a substantial body of academic opinion mounted against the rule in Seddon's case, and judicial doubt has been entertained in relation to it, I share the approach of McLelland J in Kramer v Duggan in concluding that as a judge at first instance I should not depart from it. In particular, I have regard to the fact that some 80 years have now passed since the decision of Joyce J, during which the relevant passage, although criticised, has largely been accepted as representing the law … Accordingly … I conclude that I should approach this aspect of the case on the basis that the rule does exist to preclude rescission for innocent misrepresentation of an executed contract.

1. The rule in Seddon's case is not highly regarded. It has been abolished in South Australia and the Australian Capital Territory and modified in Victoria and New South Wales: Misrepresentation Act 1972 (SA), s 6(1); Civil Law (Wrongs) Act 2002 (ACT), s 173(1)(b)(ii); Australian Consumer Law and Fair Trading Act 2012 (Vic), s 24(1) (consumer contracts for the supply of goods); Sale of Goods Act 1923 (NSW), s 4(2A)(b) (sale of goods).
2. See further Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 extracted at [31.60] and Svanosio v McNamara (1956) 96 CLR 186 extracted at [31.100]. "Absent fraud, equity would not order rescission of the contract of sale after conveyance": in Krakowski v Eurolynx (1995) 183 CLR 563, 585 per Brennan, Deane, Gaudron and McHugh JJ.

Affirmation

Coastal Estates v Melevende

[39.70] Coastal Estates Pty Ltd v Melevende [1965] VR 433 (Supreme Court of Victoria, Full Court) – Appeal from the County Court.

[FACTS: In September 1960, the plaintiff (the purchaser) was induced by fraudulent misrepresentations to purchase land from the defendant (the vendor) by way of an instalment contract. He paid a deposit and instalments. He never in fact entered into possession. Although he became aware of the falsity of some of the representations in early 1961, he made payments under the contract and tried to sell the land or renegotiate with the defendant. He was not aware of the right to rescind until he consulted his solicitor in September 1962. Shortly after, he brought an action in the County Court claiming return of the money. Between consulting the solicitor and commencing action, he paid rates which were due. His action in the County Court succeeded; the defendant appealed.]

ADAM J: [451] What is affirmation which deprives a party of a right of rescission in these circumstances? The right to rescind for misrepresentation may be lost in a variety of ways, some depending on the principle of election, others not. Once a representee has, by discovery of the truth, been put to his election, he will of course lose his right to rescind once he has elected not to rescind. Once he has made his election, he cannot resile from it. But not only will a party lose any right to elect in favour of rescission [452] by reason of his once having elected to affirm, he may apart altogether from this principle of election lose his right to rescind before he has made any election. He may lose his right of avoidance where by reason of his own conduct, or of other circumstances, it would be unjust or inequitable that he retain any right to elect. One example is where third parties have acquired rights under the contract which would be defeated by an avoidance of the contract. Another example is where a rescission would be unjust to the representor because it has become impossible to restore him to the position in which he was at the making of the contract. Restitutio in integrum is not only a consequence of rescission, its possibility is indispensable to the right to rescind. Again delay in electing to rescind may make it unjust to others that the right to elect continue. For this reason the right of rescission for misrepresentation in general must be promptly exercised in transactions regarding company shares.

In my opinion, affirmation as a defence to a claim to rescind a contract rests on the principle that having elected to adhere to a contract after discovery of the falsity of the representations inducing it, the right to rescind is lost. In other words affirmation is the determination of an election by affirming the contract.

Affirmation may take the form of an express communication from the representee that he has elected to treat the contract as binding, or conduct of his in relation to the contract or its subject matter from which the proper inference is that he has so elected. Where in addition to knowing all material facts, which would entitle him to avoid the contract, the representee is aware also that he has the choice open either to avoid or to affirm, it is a question of fact whether his conduct evidences a determination of his election. Before he will be held to have elected his conduct must be unequivocal. More difficult problems arise where the representee, while knowing the facts which in law give him the choice to avoid or affirm, is in fact unaware that he has any choice in the matter. In such a case it would seem on principle that no question can arise of his having made an election. In the nature of things how can one elect between alternative courses, unless one is aware that alternative courses are open? In other branches of the law, where questions of election arise, for example, under the Workers' Compensation Acts (see Dey v Victorian Railway Commissioners (1949) 78 CLR 62) or under the well-known equitable doctrine of election as between estates, actual knowledge of the existence of the right to elect as between alternatives has been considered essential. The relevance of such knowledge where the right of election arises in cases of contracts induced by misrepresentation is more obscure.

There are not wanting in the authorities statements to the effect that a party may effectually elect to affirm a contract, although unaware that he has any option to avoid it, and that knowledge of his right to elect upon discovery of fraud will be conclusively presumed: see, for example O'Connor v SP Bray Ltd (1936) 36 SR (NSW) 248; Evans v Benson & Co [1961] WALR 13; Ewart, Waiver Distributed among the Departments Election, Estoppel, Contract, Release cited in Elder's Trustee and Executor Co Ltd v Commonwealth Estates Pty Ltd (1941) 65 CLR 603 at 618. Furthermore in many of the cases the test whether a representee has affirmed a contract after discovery of the fraud which induced him to enter into it, is stated to be whether he has so acted as to show unequivocally that he elected to treat the contract as binding without any discussion of the relevance of his knowledge or absence of knowledge of his right to elect: see, for example Scarf v Jardine (1882) 7 App Cas 345 at 361; Abram Steamship Co Ltd v Westville Shipping Co Ltd [1923] AC 773; Brown v Smitt [1924] VLR 333; Watson v Burton [1956] 3 All ER 929, and Tropical Traders v Goonan (1964) 37 ALJR 497 at 500.

The conclusion I have reached after considering the foregoing and other authorities which were cited to us – particularly the leading case of Clough v London and North Western Railway Co (1871) LR 7 Exch 26 – is that the ultimate question to be answered in cases where affirmation is relied upon as a defence to a rescission is whether the representee has after discovery of the falsity of the relevant misrepresentations, in truth elected to affirm the contract and thereby elected not to avoid it. Because the making of an election necessarily presupposes a knowledge that a choice between alternative courses is open, in general, no question of affirmation can arise in the absence of such knowledge. There appears, however, to be one important qualification upon this. If a representee, after discovery of the facts which entitle him to avoid a contract, exercises, in an unequivocal manner, rights under the contract adversely to the other party he will in general be deemed to have elected to affirm it, although not aware of his right to elect. In the case of a representee unaware of his right of election there is, I consider, a distinction to be drawn between acts done by him in exercise of rights under the contract adversely to the other party which, were the contract not on foot, could not be justified, and acts which do no more than show that the representee recognised the contract as still subsisting, but are not prejudicial or adverse to the other party. Such a distinction may be explained as an application of the doctrine of estoppel, or of the rule against approbating and reprobating, or perhaps more broadly on general considerations of justice. Strictly speaking I would think that the so-called affirmation without knowledge of any right to elect should be regarded as an example of the loss of a right to rescind apart from the principle of election, and that it tends only to confusion to treat it as of the same species as a true election to affirm …

[454] I do not find these conclusions inconsistent with any of the authorities binding on this court. The foregoing observations are applicable in this case because on the evidence it seems proper to infer that the purchaser was in fact unaware that he had any right to repudiate the contract until he consulted his solicitors in September 1962 just prior to commencement of these proceedings. Indeed if, as I think, the ultimate onus of establishing all elements of the defence of affirmation rests on the representor, it would be sufficient perhaps to say that the evidence fails to establish affirmatively that the purchaser had sufficient knowledge of his rights at any relevant time. This being so the question is not whether the purchaser, after discovery of the facts, did any act which recognised the continued existence of the contract but any act in exercise of his contractual rights adversely to the vendor. The payment of instalments of purchase money merely discharged an obligation which the purchaser supposed to be irrevocably binding on him. It certainly did not amount to the exercise of any contractual right by him adversely to the vendor; the payment of rates stands in no different position. In any case the payment in 1962 was made after the purchaser had elected to rescind, and the negotiations with the vendor for release from or variations of the contract would seem to carry the matter no further.

No doubt had it been proved that the purchaser was actually aware that he could, if he chose, have repudiated the contract for fraud, his conduct after knowledge of the fraud in paying instalments of purchase money would have provided most cogent evidence of a considered affirmation by him of the contract and precluded his later rescinding it; but any such inference of actual election it is impossible to draw in the absence of any such awareness of his rights.

[HERRING CJ and SHOLL J delivered judgments to similar effect.]

Appeal dismissed.

[39.75] Note

Contrary to the approach adopted in the principal case, there is authority for a general rule that where knowledge is necessary to make an election effective, it is knowledge of facts giving rise to the right to elect, not knowledge of the right itself, which must be proved: Re Hoffman (1989) 85 ALR 145. On the other hand, it has been suggested by Priestley JA that where election does not apply because of ignorance of the right, an estoppel may operate against the party with the right of election: see Hawker Pacific Pty Ltd v Helicopter Charter Pty Ltd (1991) 22 NSWLR 298, extracted at [34.50].

[40.55] INVALIDITY ON THE GROUNDS OF PUBLIC POLICY 1165

[40.05] A contract as made, or as performed, may involve violation of provisions of a statute or regulation. Where the statute does not expressly prohibit the making of the contract, but the contract as made or performed involves the violation of a statutory provision, the court must determine whether the contract is impliedly prohibited by the statute. This is a question of construction that turns on the particular provisions and the scope and purpose of the statute. Has the legislation impliedly prohibited the contract? Was the legislature intending merely to penalise specified conduct or was it intending to deprive of legal effect a contract associated with the conduct? If the latter, an action to enforce the contract may be met with the defence of illegality. Should both parties be deprived of a right to enforce the contract, however, or only the party responsible for the violation? This chapter considers examples of how the courts have answered these questions. The consequences of illegality will be further considered in Chapter 42.

THE DRASTIC EFFECT OF PROHIBITION

[40.10] If a contract is held to be prohibited by statute, the drastic consequence follows that the contract is unenforceable by either party. Such drastic consequences are justified on the grounds of public policy, as Lord Mansfield explained in Holman v Johnson (1775) 1 Cowp 341, 343; 98 ER 1120, 1121:

> The objection that a contract is immoral or illegal as between plaintiff and defendant, sounds at all times very ill in the mouth of the defendant. It is not for his sake, however that the objection is ever allowed, but it is founded in general principles of policy, which the defendant has the advantage of contrary to the real justice, as between him and the plaintiff, by accident, if I may say so.

In the following case, the High Court considered whether a statutory prohibition of a particular class of sale had the consequence that a purported sale in breach of it was void.

Bradshaw v Gilbert's (Australasian) Agency (Vic)

[40.15] Bradshaw v Gilbert's (Australasian) Agency (Vic) Pty Ltd (1952) 86 CLR 209 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: In January 1949, Gilbert's Agency (the respondent) agreed to sell to Bradshaw (the appellant) 127 tons of battery scrap lead, together with export licence, at the price of £98 per ton. The parties contemplated that the lead would be exported. At this time battery scrap was a declared commodity within the Prices Regulation Act 1948 (Vic) (the Act). The Act provided that battery scrap could not be sold in Victoria for more than £22 pounds per ton. Within a matter of days of contracting, it became evident to the appellant that the overseas market for this commodity was deteriorating. He thereupon intimated to the respondent that the transaction would proceed no further, assigning as his reason that the contract constituted a breach of s 25(1) of the Act and was illegal. Section 25(1)(a) of the Act provided that no person should sell or offer for sale any declared goods at a greater price than the maximum price fixed in relation thereto. Section 25(2) provided that, in addition to any other penalty which might be imposed for contravention of s 25(1), the court might order the seller to refund to the purchaser of the goods the difference between the maximum price so fixed and the price at which the goods were sold. Ultimately, the respondent sold the lead to another purchaser at a price which was less by £1,861 than the price which the appellant had agreed to pay. The respondent sued the appellant to recover this difference as damages for breach of contract.

The trial judge, Barry J, found that the Act did not, on its true construction, embrace a contract with respect to goods that were intended for export, so that the contract was valid. He gave judgment for the respondent. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

DIXON CJ AND TAYLOR J: [Their Honours held first that the Act on its true construction did apply to the sale of goods that were destined for export. They then proceeded to consider whether the effect of the Act operated to avoid transactions made in breach of its provisions.] [218] [W]e were referred to the observations of Jordan CJ in Bassin v Standen (1945) 46 SR (NSW) 16; 62 WN 238. After referring to the general rule that if a particular class of sale is prohibited by statute a purported sale in breach of the prohibition is void, his Honour referred to sub-reg (1A) of reg 29 of the National Security (Prices) Regulations which, in terms, corresponds to s 25 (2) of the Prices Regulation Act. Sub-section (1) expressly provides that no person shall sell any declared goods at a greater price than the maximum price fixed in relation thereto whilst sub-s (2) provides that, in addition to any other penalty that may be imposed for a contravention of sub-s (1), the court may order the defendant to refund to the purchaser of the goods the difference between the maximum price so fixed and the price [219] at which the goods were sold. Jordan CJ in referring to reg 29(1A) said that: "It may be that this should be regarded as sufficiently indicating an intention that a breach of the regulation shall not avoid the sale, but shall merely subject the vendor to a penalty and to the risk of being ordered to refund to the purchaser the unlawful excess or some part of it" (1945) 46 SR (NSW), at p 19; 62 WN, at p 239. His Honour's observations were, of course, not intended as the expression of a concluded opinion on this point and, indeed, he expressly made this clear. That his Honour correctly stated the prima-facie rule, is quite clear from decisions such as In re Mahmoud and Ispahani [1921] 2 KB 716, Anderson Ltd v Daniel [1924] 1 KB 138, and Montreal Trust Co v Canadian National Railway [1939] AC 613. The prohibition imposed by s 25 is in express terms and the purpose of the prohibition is quite clear, and we have no doubt that, apart from any special problem which may arise because of the terms of sub-s (2), a sale or contract of sale made in breach of s 25 must be regarded as void and as being incapable of giving rise to an action for damages in the present form. Further, we are satisfied that sub-s (2) does not affect this conclusion. It does not seem to us that its provisions operate to displace the presumption that transactions in breach of sub-s (1) should be treated as void. On the contrary, it seems to have been intended, merely, as an additional penalty upon a seller and as a means of reimbursing an innocent purchaser in appropriate circumstances. The very terms of the sub-section itself indicates that it was an obligation which might be imposed upon a vendor as an additional penalty, and they afford a means of relief to a purchaser which would not be available either upon the view that a sale, in contravention of the section is quite valid or upon the view that it is illegal and void. Consequently, it cannot be assumed, from the presence of the sub-section, that it was not intended that sales in contravention of the sub-section should be treated as valid and subsisting. But whatever the effect of the section with respect to completed sales of goods, it is beyond doubt that the terms of the section preclude a party to an agreement for the sale of declared goods at a price in excess of the maximum price from seeking in a court of law to enforce his contract, Accordingly, we are of the opinion that the appeal should be allowed …

McTIERNAN J [His Honour held that the Act did not apply to goods which were destined for export, and concluded]: [220] It is sufficient for me to say that the contract of sale upon which the plaintiff sued was at all times valid. I must not be taken as [221] dissenting from the opinion of the majority upon any of the questions which it became necessary to discuss in the view that the agreement of sale was struck by the Prices Regulation Act. I should dismiss the appeal.

[40.25] Notes

1. In Re Mahmoud and Ispahani [1921] 2 KB 716, a case referred to in the principal case, an order was made by the Food Controller under the Defence of the Realm Regulations to the effect that no person was to sell linseed oil except in accordance with the terms of a licence granted by the Controller. The plaintiff had a licence to sell linseed oil, and the licence required that sales should only be made to persons holding a licence. The plaintiff sold linseed oil to the defendant who said he had a licence to purchase but in fact had no such licence. The plaintiff had thus infringed the order and committed a summary offence. The defendant refused to accept delivery and the plaintiff sued him. The defendant successfully pleaded illegality. The contract, it was held, was prohibited by the statutory order for the public benefit. Accordingly, the plaintiff could not enforce the contract even though he was innocent in the sense that the defendant had fraudulently assured him that he, the purchaser, had a licence to purchase.
2. In Anderson Ltd v Daniel [1924] 1 KB 138, a case referred to in the principal case, the court had to consider the effect of the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act 1906 (Cth) which stated:

   > Every person who sells for use as a fertiliser of the soil any article … which has been imported from abroad, shall give to the purchaser an invoice stating the name of the article and what are the respective percentages, if any, of nitrogen, soluble phosphates, insoluble phosphates, and potash contained in the article.

   The Act went on to impose a penalty on any person who failed to provide an invoice on, before or as soon as possible after, delivery of fertiliser. The plaintiff sold fertiliser and delivered it to the defendant but failed to provide an invoice. The defendant did not pay and pleaded that the contract was illegal. The court upheld this plea, stating that the statute was enacted not just for revenue purposes but to protect the public. Accordingly, the plaintiff could not recover the price.

MODERN RELUCTANCE TO FIND PROHIBITION

[40.30] The cases discussed at [40.15]–[40.25] reflect a strict and relatively inflexible approach to the issue of whether a contract is void or unenforceable as a result of illegality. In modern times the courts have shown an increased reluctance to refuse relief to a plaintiff simply because the contract relied on was in some way associated with conduct which involved violation of a statutory provision. In St John Shipping Corp v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267, Devlin J made the following statement (at 288):

> I think that a court ought to be very slow to hold that a statute intends to interfere with the rights and remedies given by the ordinary law of contract. Caution in this respect is, I think, especially necessary in these times when so much of commercial life is governed by regulations of one sort or another, which may easily be broken without wicked intent. Persons who deliberately set out to break the law cannot expect to be aided in a court of justice, but it is a different matter when the law is unwittingly broken. To nullify a bargain in such circumstances frequently means that in a case — perhaps of such triviality that no authority would have felt it worth while to prosecute — a seller, because he cannot enforce his civil rights, may forfeit a sum vastly in excess of any penalty that a criminal court would impose, and the sum forfeited will not go into the public purse but into the pockets of someone who is lucky enough to pick up the windfall or, astute enough to have contrived to get it.

There are no hard and fast rules about when a contract will be void or unenforceable on the basis of illegality. The courts will consider the object and context of the legislation. If the purpose of the statute can be fulfilled without finding that the contract is prohibited, the contract is more likely to be construed as valid (see Fitzgerald v F J Leonhardt Pty Ltd (1997) 189 CLR 215 at [41.60]). In determining whether the purpose of the statute can be fulfilled without finding that the contract is prohibited, the courts will consider whether the statute said to invalidate the contract provides sanctions for non-compliance. The courts are less likely to hold that the contract is unenforceable where the legislature has provided sanctions for non-compliance with the legislation (see Master Education Services Pty Ltd v Ketchell [2008] HCA 38; (2008) 236 CLR 101 at [40.45]). The courts will also consider whether finding that the contract is unenforceable will have adverse consequences for innocent parties. Where this is the case, the courts are less likely to hold that the contract is unenforceable (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410; Gnych v Polish Club Ltd [2015] HCA 23; (2015) 255 CLR 414, [45]).

Yango Pastoral Co v First Chicago Australia

[40.35] Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from New South Wales Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: First Chicago Australia Ltd (the plaintiff) lent to the Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd (the defendant) the sum of $132,600, repayment of which was secured by a mortgage which incorporated a guarantee given by other defendants. Default was made in repayment, and the plaintiff sued the defendant on the personal covenants in the mortgage and the other defendants upon their guarantee. The appellants pleaded illegality. They argued that the mortgage (including the guarantee) was rendered illegal and void by the provisions of s 8 of the Banking Act 1959 (Cth), or alternatively, that by reason of the provisions of s 8 a court would not assist the respondent to give effect to the transaction. The case was decided in the Supreme Court on agreed assumptions, which were that the plaintiff was, at the time the transaction was entered into, carrying on the business of banking contrary to the prohibition in s 8 on bodies corporate so doing in Australia without being authorised under s 9 of the Act and not being exempted from compliance with the provisions of the Act under s 11, and that the transaction was entered into in the course of carrying on that banking business. In the Supreme Court, the plaintiff obtained judgment which was confirmed on appeal by the Court of Appeal. The defendants appealed to the High Court.]

GIBBS ACJ: [413] There are four main ways in which the enforceability of a contract may be affected by a statutory provision which renders particular conduct unlawful: (1) The contract may be to do something which the statute forbids; (2) The contract may be one which the statute expressly or impliedly prohibits; (3) The contract, although lawful on its face, may be made in order to effect a purpose which the statute renders unlawful; or (4) The contract, although lawful according to its own terms, may be performed in a manner which the statute prohibits.

In the present case we are not concerned with the first of these possible situations. Clearly s 8 does not render it unlawful to borrow or lend money or to give and take a mortgage, supported by guarantees, to secure its repayment. The contract sued upon was therefore not to do anything which s 8 forbids. The principal question in the case is whether s 8, on its proper construction, prohibited the making or performance of the contract. As will be seen, if that question is answered in the negative, it will not be possible to say that the contract cannot be enforced on the ground that it was made in order to effect an unlawful purpose or was performed in an unlawful manner.

It is often said that a contract expressly or impliedly prohibited by statute is void and unenforceable. That statement is true as a general rule, but for complete accuracy it needs qualification, because it is possible for a statute in terms to prohibit a contract and yet to provide, expressly or impliedly, that the contract will be valid and enforceable. However, cases are likely to be rare in which a statute prohibits a contract but nevertheless reveals an intention that it shall be valid and enforceable, and in most cases it is sufficient to say, as has been said in many cases of authority, that the test is whether the contract is prohibited by the statute. Where a statute imposes a penalty upon the making or performance of a contract, it is a question of construction whether the statute intends to prohibit the contract in this sense, that is, to render it void and unenforceable, or whether it intends only that the penalty for which it provides shall be inflicted if the contract is made or performed.

The question whether a statute, on its proper construction, intends to vitiate a contract made in breach of its provisions, is one which must be determined in accordance with the ordinary principles that govern the construction of statutes. "The determining factor is the true effect and meaning of the statute" (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267, 286). "One must have regard to the language used and to the scope and [414] purpose of the statute" (Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglett Ltd [1961] 1 QB 374, 390). One consideration that has been regarded as important in a great many cases, of which Cope v Rowlands (1836) 2 M&W 149 is a notable example, is whether the object of the statute – or one of its objects – is the protection of the public. An antithesis is commonly suggested between an intention to protect the public and an intention simply to secure the revenue, and it is said that when the former intention appears the contract must be taken to be prohibited, whereas if the intention is only to protect the revenue the statute will not be construed as imposing a prohibition on contracts. The question whether the statute was passed for the protection of the public is one test of whether it was intended to vitiate a contract made in breach of its provisions, but I am with respect in full agreement with the views expressed in St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267, 287 and Shaw v Groom [1970] 2 QB 504, 518 that it is not the only test. It would be contrary to reason and principle to allow one circumstance to override all other considerations in the interpretation of a statute. As Devlin J said in St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd (at 287): "The fundamental question is whether the statute means to prohibit the contract. The statute is to be construed in the ordinary way: one must have regard to all relevant considerations and no single consideration, however important, is conclusive." See also Shaw v Groom at 523.

There is no doubt that Pt II of the Banking Act, in which s 8 appears, was enacted partly at least for the protection of depositors, or that one object of s 8 is the protection of the public. Section 8 of course does not expressly prohibit the making or performance of contracts, but the argument advanced on behalf of the appellants was that the prohibition which it imposes on an unauthorized body corporate from carrying on any banking business extends to all activities which go to make up the business of banking, except such as are merely collateral or peripheral. It was said that a contract to lend money on mortgage supported by guarantee is central to the business of banking and that such a contract, when made by a body corporate unlawfully carrying on the business of banking, and in the course of that business, is prohibited by s 8 on its proper construction. However the receipt of money on deposit is equally central to the business of banking, and if the argument put on behalf of the appellants is correct, s 8 would invalidate not only [415] those contracts by which a body corporate carrying on an unauthorized banking business agreed to lend money, but also all contracts pursuant to which it agreed to receive money from depositors. The result of accepting this argument might be that persons who had deposited money with such a body corporate would be unable to seek the assistance of the courts to recover it. Moreover, if a body corporate were unable to recover money that it had lent, it would be disabled from performing its own obligations, including those owed to its depositors. In those circumstances "the avoidance of the contract would cause grave inconvenience and injury to innocent members of the public without furthering the object of the statute" (Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglett Ltd (at 390); Dalgety and New Zealand Loan Ltd v V C Imeson Pty Ltd (1963) 63 SR (NSW) 998, 1004).

Another relevant consideration is the fact that the penalty which s 8 imposes is a pecuniary sum for each day during which the contravention continues. It is immaterial whether, on any day, the body corporate makes one contract, or one hundred; the penalty is the same. This is an indication that the Parliament did not intend to prohibit each contract made in the course of the business, but only to penalize the carrying on of the business without authority – see Smith v Mawhood (1845) 14 M&W 452, 464 and Victorian Daylesford Syndicate Ltd v Dott [1905] 2 Ch 624, 630.

The language of s 8 indicates that it is directed, not at the making or performance of particular contracts, but at the carrying on of any banking business. In the course of carrying on such a business a body corporate may make and perform contracts, many, if not all, of which might be made equally by a bank or by a company which is not carrying on banking business. A contract to lend money on mortgage is one example; a contract of employment is another. Although all of the contracts made by a body corporate in the course of carrying on a banking business are ex hypothesi things which it does in carrying on the business, that is, in doing what is unlawful, it is impossible to accept that the legislature intended to invalidate all such contracts with the result that contracts to pay its employees, or those who provided it with services, would be void. The appellants recognized this by making the submission to which I have already referred, that the effect of the section is that only those contracts are invalidated which are in their nature central to the business of banking. I have already said that even if that argument were accepted the effect of the section would still be [416] gravely inconvenient. However there is not the slightest indication in the Act that the Parliament intended that the validity of contracts made by a body corporate carrying on business in breach of s 8 should depend on whether or not they were central to the business of banking. Such a test would in any event be vague and unsatisfactory …

[417] Having regard to the language of s 8, and to the matters to which I have referred, I conclude that s 8, on its proper construction, does not vitiate contracts made by a body corporate in the course of carrying on a banking business in breach of the section. This conclusion also disposes of the question whether the contract in the present case was unlawfully performed by the respondent and is for that reason unenforceable. Of course s 8 does not proscribe any particular mode of performance for contracts of this kind. It could only be said that the contract was performed in violation of s 8 if that section forbids a body corporate which is carrying on a banking business in contravention of the section to perform such a contract if made in the course of its unauthorized banking business. The reasons that I have given for holding that s 8 does not prohibit the making of contracts of this kind lead also to the conclusion that it does not prohibit their performance. As was pointed out in St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB, 284, the test is the same whether the contract itself, or the manner of its performance, is said to be illegal. The performance of a contract may turn it into the sort of contract that is prohibited by the statute, and the test is whether the contract, as made or as performed, is a contract that is prohibited by the statute.

Further it cannot be said that the contract was performed for any illegal purpose. There is of course no suggestion that the money was borrowed for an illegal purpose, and the fact that the contract was made in the course of the unlawful banking business does not mean that the contract was made in order that the unlawful purpose of carrying on a banking business without authority could be achieved or carried out. Once it is held that neither the making nor the performance of the contract was unlawful, the fact that the contract was made and performed in the course of the conduct of an unlawful business provides no ground for denying relief to the respondent. The illegality then is something merely casual or adventitious. The principle applicable is that stated in Wetherell v Jones (1832) 3 B & Ad 221, 225-226 by Lord Tenterden CJ:

> Where a contract which a plaintiff seeks to enforce is expressly, or by implication, forbidden by the statute or common law, no court will lend its assistance to give it effect; and there are numerous cases in the books where an action on the contract has failed, because either the consideration for the promise or the act to be done was illegal, as being against the express provisions of the law, or contrary to justice, morality and sound policy. But where the consideration and the matter to be performed are both legal, we are not aware that a plaintiff has ever been precluded from recovering by an infringement of the law, not contemplated by the contract, in the performance of something to be done on his part.

This passage was cited and applied in St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd (1957) 1 QB, 286 and Shaw v Groom [1970] 2 QB, 516-517, 520. The crucial question is whether s 8 prohibited the making or performance of the contract, and if it did not the fact that the respondent infringed s 8 does not affect his rights under the contract. The contract was not "nullified for disobedience to a statute", within the rule of public policy discussed by Lord Wright in Vita Food Products Inc v Unus Shipping Co Ltd [1939] AC 277, 293 because the disobedience in the present case was not in the performance of the contract but was something quite collateral.

Judgment was rightly given for the respondent. I would dismiss the appeal.

MASON J: [422] The provisions of the Act, though indirectly providing some safeguard to depositors, are principally designed to ensure that the government and its agencies are equipped with accurate and detailed information as to the financial position of the banks as important financial institutions in the community and with supervisory powers and powers to determine matters relevant to financial policy in the interests of regulating the Australian economy. The Act is not a statute whose primary object is to define and regulate the relationship which exists between banker and customer or to regulate the rights and liabilities of banker and customer inter se. The Act in regulating the carrying on of banking business in Australia does so, not only as a means of protecting the customers of, or the depositors with, banks, the provisions of Div 2 of Pt III having this object in view, but as an element in regulating the Australian economy.

Viewed in this light the prohibition contained in s 8 may not be solely directed to the exclusion from the conduct of banking business of bodies corporate which lack the requisite financial [423] strength and stability to carry on banking business. It may also be directed to the exclusion from the field of banking of foreign banks of which only three currently possess authorities under s 9. Whether those authorities are unconditional we do not know. As the interpretation of s 8 may involve constitutional considerations to which reference has not been made in argument, it is better that I say no more about its interpretation in this respect save that there is no warrant for concluding that the prohibition which it contains is exclusively directed to the protection of customers of, or depositors with, banks.

The principle that a contract the making of which is expressly or impliedly prohibited by statute is illegal and void is one of long standing but it has always been recognised that the principle is necessarily subject to any contrary intention manifested by the statute. It is perhaps more accurate to say that the question whether a contract prohibited by statute is void is, like the associated question whether the statute prohibits the contract, a question of statutory construction and that the principle to which I have referred does no more than enunciate the ordinary rule which will be applied when the statute itself is silent upon the question. Primarily, then, it is a matter of construing the statute and in construing the statute the court will have regard not only to its language, which may or may not touch upon the question, but also to the scope and purpose of the statute from which inferences may be drawn as to the legislative intention regarding the extent and the effect of the prohibition which the statute contains.

The first question is: Does s 8 expressly prohibit the making of a contract of loan? The question must, I think, be answered in the negative. The section makes no reference to contracts or transactions. Consequently, if it contains a prohibition against the making of contracts of loan, that prohibition must be ascertained or identified by a process of implication. The defendants seek to avoid this conclusion by saying that, because the lending of money on mortgage in the course of carrying on what is admittedly banking business itself amounts to the carrying on of banking business, as the lending of money on mortgage is central to that [424] business, the making in the course of such a business of a loan and the taking of a mortgage by which the money is agreed to be repaid themselves fall within the prohibition. It is said that the express prohibition against the carrying on of any banking business is necessarily a prohibition against entry into the very transactions which constitute banking business, at least when they are central to that business. So it is argued that the lending of money on mortgage, though not distinctive of banking business, being one of the transactions central to that business is therefore prohibited. Although this argument provides some support for saying that the lending of money on mortgage falls within the prohibition, it does not in my view establish that the prohibition is express rather than implied. The prohibition against the making of contracts, if there be one, can only arise by way of necessary inference, there being no reference at all in the provisions of the section to contracts as such.

The next question is whether by implication, that is by way of necessary inference, such a prohibition can be discovered in the section. The defendants in support of their argument again rely on the admissions of fact, the contention that the lending of money on mortgage is central to banking business and the circumstance that the lending by a bank of money on mortgage in its banking business itself amounts to the carrying on of that business. They then point to cases in which implied prohibitions against the making of contracts of particular kinds have been discovered in some statutes. Of these cases two examples may be selected. The first is Cope v Rowlands (1836) 2 M & W 149; 150 ER 707, where the statute [6] Anne, c 16 required brokers to be admitted by the court and the mayor of the City of London and upon admission to make prescribed payment with a proviso making it an offence for an unauthorised person to act as a broker, imposing a penalty of £25 for each such offence. It was held that the statute impliedly, though not expressly, prohibited a brokerage contract entered into by an unauthorised person and made it illegal and void. Parke B said (at 157–8, 710):

> And it may be safely laid down, notwithstanding some dicta apparently to the contrary, that if the contract be rendered illegal, it can make no difference, in point of law, whether the statute which makes it so has in view the protection of the revenue, or any other object. The sole question is, whether the statute means to prohibit the contract?

He went on to say:

> the question for us now to determine is, whether the enactment of the statute 6 Anne, c 16, (altered as to the amount of penalty by 57 Geo 3, c 60), is meant merely to secure a revenue to the city, and for that purpose to render the person acting as a broker liable to a penalty if he does not pay it? or whether one of its objects be the protection of the public, and the prevention of improper persons acting as [425] brokers? On the former supposition, the contract with a broker for his brokerage is not prohibited by the statute; on the latter it is: for it cannot be permitted to a person to recover a compensation for an act which the law interdicts him from doing.

As brokerage contracts are distinctive of broking business, the court held that the statute prohibited the carrying on of the business and the making of the contracts.

The second case is Cornelius v Phillips [1918] AC 199. There a registered money-lender entered into a money-lending contract at an hotel some distance away from his registered address. This was held to be in contravention of s 2(1)(b) of the Money-lenders Act 1900 (UK) which prohibited a money-lender from carrying on his money-lending business otherwise than at his registered address.

It was also held that the statutory provision prohibited the contract and made it void, this because the prohibition amounted to a prohibition against a registered money-lender lending money except at his registered address. This conclusion might be thought to have been inescapable, subject to the existence of any contrary intention in the statute, so close is the relationship between the carrying on of a money-lending business and the making of a loan of money. Accordingly, Cornelius v Phillips does not provide illuminating guidance in the present case where the contracts entered into in the course of banking business are so varied and are not necessarily distinctive of the business. Lord Dunedin said (pp 212–13):

> the question always comes to be put, as Parke B put it in Cope v Rowlands (1836) 2 M & W 149, does the statute seek to prohibit the contract? Section 2, subs 1(b), seems to me to prohibit the contract, though it is expressed in words which apply directly to the contractor rather than to the contract. Indeed, if one looks at the mischief sought to be remedied, the case seems to me a stronger one than that of Cope v Rowlands.

These cases do no more than demonstrate that the question whether a statute prohibits contracts is always a question of construction turning on the particular provisions, the scope and purpose of the statute. They also indicate some of the considerations which will influence the court's decision on the question of construction. But the considerations to which they refer are by no means exhaustive or comprehensive and it can scarcely be suggested that the statutes on which the two cases were decided bear a close resemblance to the Banking Act. It is [426] one thing to imply a prohibition against particular contracts which are distinctive of a business from a prohibition against the carrying on of that business. It is quite another thing to imply a prohibition against contracts of various kinds none of which are distinctive of the business which is the subject of the statutory prohibition. And the difficulty in implying the prohibition is not in my opinion overcome by seeking to limit it to those contracts which are said to be central to the business, though it is admitted that they are not distinctive of it.

Where, as here, a statute imposes a penalty for contravention of an express prohibition against carrying on a business without a licence or an authority and the business is carried on by entry into contracts, the question is whether the statute intends merely to penalise the person who contravenes the prohibition or whether it intends to go further and prohibit contracts the making of which constitute the carrying on of the business. In deciding this question the court will take into account the scope and purpose of the statute and the consequences of the suggested implication with a view to ascertaining whether it would conduce to, or frustrate, the object of the statute.

In Re Mahmoud and Ispahani [1921] 2 KB 716, Scrutton LJ (at 730) referred to Bloxsome v Williams (1824) 3 B & C 232; 107 ER 720 in which the defendant, who was a horse dealer, was prohibited by statute from trading on a Sunday, and pointed out that there was nothing illegal in another person making a contract with a horse dealer on a Sunday except that if he knew that the person with whom he was dealing was a horse dealer he might be aiding and abetting him to break the law. Atkin LJ said (at 731): "One may find that the statute imposes a penalty upon an individual, and yet does not prohibit the contract if it is made with a party who is innocent of the offence which is created by the statute."

The prohibition contained in s 8 against carrying on any banking business without an authority is an integral element in the statutory regulation of banking business. As I have said, the object of that regulation is not only to protect depositors with authorised banks but to equip the government, through its agencies, with current and detailed information as to banking operations in Australia and to arm the government and its agencies with supervisory powers and powers to determine matters relevant to financial policy in the interests of regulating the Australian economy.

In this context there is little to be said for the view that the statute intends to prohibit contracts made by unauthorised banks [427] in the course of carrying on banking business. To do so would be to prejudice depositors, not to protect them. The implication of such a prohibition would deny to innocent depositors the right to recover moneys deposited unlawfully with persons carrying on banking business because ex hypothesi the prohibited contract would be illegal and void. To place the defendants' interpretation upon the statute would confer an extraordinary advantage on the wrongdoer in enabling it to resist repayment of moneys deposited with it. In this respect the advantage given to the wrongdoer might conceivably go some distance towards outweighing the punishment imposed upon it by way of penalty under s 8.

It is not rational to suppose that the Parliament intended to inflict such dire consequences on innocent depositors. Nor is it rational to suppose that the Parliament intended to advantage innocent borrowers whilst penalising innocent depositors. Even less is it to be supposed that the Parliament intended to invalidate the wide range of commercial and other securities which are brought into existence in the course of carrying on a banking business and thereby to inflict loss on the many persons acquiring such securities. I therefore conclude that the purpose of the Act is adequately served by the imposition of the very heavy penalty which is prescribed for a contravention of s 8 and that it does not prohibit and thereby invalidate contracts and transactions entered into in the course of carrying on banking business in breach of the section.

However, it is suggested that this conclusion does not dispose of the issues in the present case. Here the party seeking to enforce the contract is not the innocent party but the party in breach of a statutory prohibition, the contract being made in the course of the carrying on of a business which in the circumstances was prohibited, though the contract was not itself prohibited. The question therefore remains whether the court will allow the plaintiff to enforce the contract. The suggestion is that the court will not do so and that its refusal so to do is dictated by the principle ex turpi causa non oritur actio or by the more specific rule that the court will not enforce the contract at the suit of a party who has entered into a contract with the object of committing an illegal act.

The effect of the principle ex turpi causa non oritur actio was expressed by Fry LJ in Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 QB 147, 156:

> no system of jurisprudence can with reason include amongst the rights which it enforces rights directly resulting [428] to the person asserting them from the crime of that person. If no action can arise from fraud, it seems impossible to suppose that it can arise from felony or misdemeanour.

Cleaver's case was cited with approval in Beresford v Royal Insurance Co Ltd [1938] AC 586, 598–9, where Lord Atkin said:

> the principle is that a man is not to be allowed to have recourse to a court of justice to claim a benefit from his crime whether under a contract or a gift. No doubt the rule pays regard to the fact that to hold otherwise would in some cases offer an inducement to crime or remove a restraint to crime, and that its effect is to act as a deterrent to crime. But apart from these considerations the absolute rule is that the courts will not recognise a benefit accruing to a criminal from his crime.

The suggested application of the principle often involves a conflict between competing common law policies. In Beresford's case (at 603) Lord Macmillan identified the conflict between the principle that no court ought to assist a criminal to derive benefit from his crime and the principle that contracts deliberately undertaken by persons of full age ought to be enforced. In Cleaver's case Lord Esher MR prefaced his remarks on the unenforceability of a life insurance contract where the beneficiary murdered the assured with the warning that:

> when people vouch that rule to excuse themselves from the performance of a contract, in respect of which they have received the full consideration, and when all that remains to be done under the contract is for them to pay money, the application of the rule ought to be narrowly watched, and ought not to be carried a step further than the protection of the public requires. (at 151)

In the present case the effect of relieving the defendants from their contractual obligation to repay money to the plaintiff would not be confined to the substantial detriment resulting to the plaintiff.

The ability of the plaintiff to meet its obligations to its investors and other creditors depends, in part if not entirely, on its ability to enforce the terms of repayment of its contracts of loan with persons such as the defendants. To hold the contract unenforceable at the suit of the plaintiff would be to provide a windfall gain to the defendants and other borrowers in a similar position, and, although indirectly, to impose substantial hardship on those who originally made funds available to the plaintiff.

The weighing of considerations of public policy in this case and the decision in favour of enforcing the contract is influenced by [429] the form of the particular legislation. In this case the Act, as I have mentioned, is to a large extent directed to aiding the government in executing its fiscal policy rather than regulating the relationship between banker and customer per se, a feature which lends support for the view that the provision of a large recurrent penalty for offences against s 8 is Parliament's determination of the consequences of breach of the section and as the only legal consequences thereof. There is much to be said for the view that once a statutory penalty has been provided for an offence the rule of the common law in determining the legal consequences of commission of the offence is thereby diminished – see my judgment in Jackson v Harrison (1978) 52 ALJR 474, 479–80. See also the suggestions that the principle cannot apply to all statutory offences: Beresford v Royal Insurance Co Ltd in the Court of Appeal [1937] 2 KB 197, 220 per Lord Wright; Marles v Philip Trant & Sons Ltd [1954] 1 QB 29, 37 per Denning LJ and that it would be a curious thing if the offender is to be punished twice, civilly as well as criminally: St John Shipping Corp v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267, 292 per Devlin J. The main considerations from which the principle ex turpi causa arose can be seen in the reluctance of the courts to be instrumental in offering an inducement to crime or removing a restraint to crime: Beresford's case [1938] AC 586, 599; Amicable Society v Bolland (Fauntleroy's Case) (1830) 4 Bligh (NS) 194, 211; 5 ER 70, 76.

However, in the present case Parliament has provided a penalty which is a measure of the deterrent which it intends to operate in respect of compliance with s 8. In this case it is not for the court to hold that further consequences should flow, consequences which in financial terms could well far exceed the prescribed penalty and could even conceivably lead the plaintiff to insolvency with resultant loss to innocent lenders or investors. In saying this I am mindful that there could be a case where the facts disclose that the plaintiff stands to gain by enforcement of rights gained through an illegal activity far more than the prescribed penalty. This circumstance might provide a sufficient foundation for attributing a different intention to the legislature. It may be that the true basis of the principle is that the court will refuse to enforce a transaction with a fraudulent or immoral purpose: Beresford v Royal Insurance Co Ltd [1937] 2 KB 197, 220 (CA). On this basis the common law principle of ex turpi causa can be given an operation consistent with, though subordinate to, the statutory intention, denying relief in those [430] cases where a plaintiff may otherwise evade the real consequences of a breach of a statutory prohibition.

Nevertheless, the principle that the court will not enforce a contract at the suit of a party who has entered into it with the object of committing an illegal act does not avail the appellant in this case. The considerations to which I have already referred serve to show that the legislative intention expressed by the Act is that a contract made by a corporation carrying on banking business in breach of s 8 is not illegal and void, but rather that it is a valid contract and that the only penalty which the corporation suffers in consequence of its breach of the section is a liability to conviction and fine under the provisions of the section. In my opinion the plaintiff is able to enforce the mortgage against the defendants in this case as the contract is not rendered void, either expressly or impliedly, by the Act and considerations of public policy operate, in the circumstances, so as to make inapplicable the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio.

For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

[AICKIN J agreed with Mason J. JACOBS and MURPHY JJ also delivered judgments in which they held that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

[40.40] Note

In St John Shipping Corp v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267, referred to in the principal case, a shipowner overloaded his ship and its master was fined under the merchant shipping legislation. The owner of some goods on the ship argued that the contract of carriage in respect of the goods had been performed in an illegal way, and that accordingly there was no liability to pay the agreed freight. Devlin J rejected this argument, holding that the contract of carriage, as made or as performed, was not prohibited by the legislation. The legislation prohibited overloading, not contracts of carriage.

Master Education Services v Ketchell

[40.45] Master Education Services Pty Ltd v Ketchell [2008] HCA 38; (2008) 236 CLR 101 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the New South Wales Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: Section 51AD of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) (now s 51ACB of the Competition and Consumer Act 2010 (Cth)) provides that a corporation must not, in trade or commerce, contravene an applicable industry code. The Franchising Code of Conduct (Code) is such a code. Clause 11(1) of the Code provides that a franchisor must not enter into a franchise agreement or receive non-refundable money under a franchise agreement unless the franchisor has received a written statement from the prospective franchisee that acknowledges that the prospective franchisee has received, read and had a reasonable opportunity to understand the disclosure document and the Code. Clause 11(2) provides that the franchisor must also receive a statement from the prospective franchisee that either acknowledges that the franchisee has received independent advice about the proposed franchise agreement or has decided not to seek such advice.

Master Education Services Pty Ltd (Master Education) (the appellant), a franchisor, provided a disclosure statement and a copy of the Code to Ms Ketchell (the respondent) prior to executing the franchise agreement with Ms Ketchell. However, Master Education failed to obtain the statements required by cl 11(1) of the Code. When Master Education sought to enforce the franchise agreement, Ms Ketchell argued that Master Education's failure to comply with cl 11(1) rendered the contract unenforceable. In the Local Court, the Magistrate found for Ketchell on the basis that the court could not require payment as such payment would involve Master Education breaching cl 11(1). On appeal to the Supreme Court of New South Wales, Malpass AsJ overturned the Magistrate's finding. Malpass AsJ's decision was successfully appealed to the New South Wales Court of Appeal. Master Education Services appealed to the High Court.]

THE COURT: [10] The appellant submits that, whilst its failure to comply with cl 11(1) was a contravention which might have attracted Pt VI … it did not result in the illegality and unenforceability of the Franchise Agreement made between them. For the reasons which follow that submission should be accepted and the appeal allowed.

[11] The question on the appeal is whether a franchise agreement is vitiated where it has been entered into by a corporate franchisor which has contravened the Code, by entering into an agreement without receiving the required statement from the franchisee, confirming the receipt of information about the franchise and the franchisor and that the franchisee has had sufficient time to understand that information. It is not to be assumed that the common law sanction is to apply in the case of every contravention of a prohibition directed to one of the parties to a contract unless the statute contradicts or displaces such an effect. The correct approach to such a question was explained in the following passage in Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Baxter Healthcare Pty Ltd (2007) 232 CLR 1, 19 [45]-[46]:

> In Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410, 423, Mason J said: "The principle that a contract the making of which is expressly or impliedly prohibited > by statute is illegal and void is one of long standing but it has always been recognised that the principle is necessarily subject to any contrary intention manifested by the statute. It is perhaps more accurate to say that the question whether a contract prohibited by statute is void is, like the associated question whether the statute prohibits the contract, a question of statutory construction and that the principle to which I have referred does no more than enunciate the ordinary rule which will be applied when the statute itself is silent upon the question."

That passage was cited by Kerr LJ in Phoenix General Insurance Co of Greece SA v Halvanon Insurance Co Ltd [1988] QB 216, 270, where his Lordship said that when a statute contains a unilateral prohibition on entry into a contract, it does not follow that the contract is void ([1988] QB 216, 273). Whether or not the statute has this effect depends upon the mischief which the statute is designed to prevent, its language, scope and purpose, the consequences for the innocent party, and any other relevant considerations. Ultimately, the question is one of statutory construction (See also Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410, 413-414 per Gibbs A-CJ; Australian Broadcasting Corporation v Redmore Pty Ltd (1989) 166 CLR 454, 457 per Mason CJ, Deane and Gaudron JJ).

The statutory provisions and their construction

[15] Section 51AD is not expressed to prohibit entry into a franchise agreement where a franchisor has not complied with the Code. It does not make performance of such an agreement unlawful in that circumstance. Like the statutory provisions in Yango Pastoral Co v First Chicago (1978) 139 CLR 410, it contains no reference to contracts or transactions …

[16] As was pointed out in the passage from Yango Pastoral Co v First Chicago, cited in Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Baxter Healthcare, it does not always follow from a prohibition directed to one party to an agreement that the contract is void. In Yango Pastoral Co v First Chicago the statutory prohibition in question (s 8 of the Banking Act 1958 (Cth)) prohibited a corporation from carrying on any banking business without an authority to do so, and provided a daily penalty for contravention. It was held that securities taken by a corporation which contravened that provision were not rendered void and unenforceable by the Act. Gibbs A-CJ observed that it was directed not at the making or performance of particular contracts, but at the carrying on of any banking business (at 415) …

[18] In the present case, the prohibition in s 51AD is directed to securing compliance by franchisors with the requirements of industry codes, and the consequence of contravention is the grant of remedies provided for in Pt VI of the Act.

[19] In the absence of an express prohibition in the Act, any such prohibition against the making of an agreement, unless there has been compliance with an industry code, must be found by a process of implication, as Mason J observed in Yango Pastoral Co v First Chicago. The Court of Appeal relied upon the terms of cl 11(1) of the Code in concluding that entry into a contract was prohibited by the Act. It may be useful to read together regulations and the Act with which they were made, in order to identify the nature of a legislative scheme which they comprise. That is not a warrant for the use of the Code to construe, and expand, the terms of s 51AD, in particular by reference to the nature of the language of cl 11(1). Regulations are to be construed according to ordinary principles of construction (Brayson Motors Pty Ltd (In liq) v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1985) 156 CLR 651, 652). That requires that they be placed in their statutory context. In the case of regulations that includes the legislation under which they are enacted and with which they are required to be consistent …

[21] In the Explanatory Statement with respect to the regulations which prescribe the Code, it was said that the operation of the franchising sector had been of concern to the Government for many years. The sector was characterised by high levels of dispute, generally arising out of the imbalance of power between franchisors and franchisees. Major problems in the sector included inadequate disclosures by franchisors prior to franchise agreements being entered into …

[25] The purposes of the scheme of Pt IVB and the Code in question are to regulate the conduct of persons in the franchising industry in order to improve business practices, to provide some protection to franchisees proposing to enter into franchise agreements and to decrease litigation. Those purposes are sought to be achieved, in large part, by ensuring that a prospective franchisee is in a position to make an informed decision about the operation of the franchise and is encouraged to take independent advice before entering into a franchise agreement. The scheme is largely directed to the franchisor, who is obliged to provide that information and advice. Section 51AD may be seen to promote compliance with the Code, by providing, in effect, that non-compliance will amount to a contravention, for which there are remedies available under Pt VI. It is no part of the scheme, and unnecessary to the purposes mentioned, to strike down a contract made by a non-complying franchisor. It is sufficient for the purpose of the scheme that a franchisor is aware of the obligations imposed by the Code and that action may be taken by a franchisee under the Act with respect to a contravention of s 51AD.

[26] Section 51AD is not converted into a prohibition upon the making of an agreement where there is non-compliance with the Code because cl 11(1) of the Code is expressed in imperative terms … It is not to be inferred from the language of cl 11(1) that the stated prohibition is to have the result that a contract entered into by a non-complying franchisor is to be void and unenforceable. The use of imperative language in cl 11(1) does not require that conclusion. As was pointed out in Project Blue Sky Inc v Australian Broadcasting Authority (1998) 94 CLR 355, 390-91 [93], it is necessary to ask whether it was a purpose of the legislation that an act done in breach of the provision should be invalid. In determining the question of purpose, regard must be had not only to the language of the relevant provision but also to the scope and object of the whole statute.

[27] It was pointed out in Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglett Ltd [1961] 1 QB 374, 387 that, if a court too readily implies that a contract is forbidden by statute, it takes it out of its power to provide remedies according to the circumstances of the case. Pearce LJ was there referring to the use of public policy to hold a contract unlawful. Such an issue does not arise in the present case. The provision of remedies in Pt VI may be seen as directed to the range of circumstances which may arise in cases where there has been a failure by a franchisor to provide some or any information to a prospective franchisee or to evidence the giving of that information and the receipt of the necessary advices, as cl 11(1) requires. In some cases the non-compliance may be such as to warrant the court striking a contract down on the application of a franchisee. Such a result would not necessarily follow upon any breach of cl 11(1), which may not have involved any failure to give the required information or the franchisee not understanding it.

[28] Part VI of the Act contains a range of remedies for a contravention of s 51AD (and s 51AC). They include the grant of an injunction with respect to conduct engaged in, or which is proposed to be engaged in, which would constitute a contravention of Pt IVB (or Pt IVA) (s 80), damages (s 82), non-punitive orders (s 86C) and the range of orders laid out in s 87(2), including orders varying contracts and refusing to enforce all or any contractual provisions (s 87(2)(b) …

[30] The operation of the Act with respect to a contravention of a provision of the Code therefore stands in marked contrast to a contravention of other statutory regimes which, beyond stating that contravention is an offence, are silent as to the remedial consequences for the relations in the civil law between the parties. That was the difficulty presented by the terms of the legislation in Yango Pastoral Co v First Chicago, which provided only for the imposition of a penalty. The Court was nonetheless able to conclude that the legislative purpose, relating to the business of banking, could be fulfilled without the securities being void or unenforceable …

[35] The fact that the Act contains elaborate provisions with respect to contraventions of Pt IVB was pointed out in Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Baxter Healthcare. As Gleeson CJ, Gummow, Hayne, Heydon and Crennan JJ there observed, the Act is far from being silent upon the question of the consequences of illegality. The intention, that contravention of Pt IVB would attract the range of remedies under the Act, including injunctive relief and damages, is confirmed in the Explanatory Memorandum to the Bill. It is not to be inferred that the more drastic consequences of the common law were intended to follow upon a contravention of a code of conduct …

[38] The detailed provision by the Act for the consequences of non-compliance with an industry code, such as the Franchising Code of Conduct, does not support a conclusion that it was intended that the harsh consequences provided by the common law were to follow upon contravention of s 51AD. The Act provides a more flexible approach. It allows a court to prevent entry into a franchise agreement, to vary the terms of an agreement entered into in breach of the Code, or to terminate such an agreement or provide compensation for loss and damage, if it is shown to have been caused by the contravention. In that regard the extended meaning which may be given to loss and damage by s 82, which is suffered by reason of entry into contractual obligations, may assume significance.

[39] The final matter which supports the non-applicability of the common law sanction for contravention of s 51AD has regard to the position of the franchisee. One of the purposes of the Code is the protection of the position of the franchisee. It is not expressed to prohibit the franchisee from entering into an agreement where a franchisor had not complied with cl 11. As Rares J pointed out in Hoy Mobile Pty Ltd v Allphones Retail Pty Ltd [No 2] [2008] ATPR ¶42-240, 49,299 [103]-[104], it would be an unusual result if, in that circumstance, a franchisee's bargain was struck down in every case, regardless of the position in which it places the franchisee. It is not to be assumed in every case that a franchisee wishes to be relieved of their bargain. To render void every franchise agreement entered into where a franchisor had not complied with the Code would be to give the franchisor, the wrong-doer, an opportunity to avoid its obligations (See also Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410, 426), and at the same time to place the franchisee in breach of obligations to third parties. A preferable result, and one for which the Act provides, is to permit a franchisee to seek such relief as is appropriate to the circumstances of the case. Some cases of non-compliance with cl 11 might involve substantial non-disclosure; others may only involve a failure to obtain the written statement, confirming that the franchisee has read and understood the disclosure document and the Code. This is such a case.

[40] Section 51AD does not in its terms prohibit the making of a franchise agreement where a franchisor has not complied with the Code. That section and the Code are concerned with the regulation of the conduct of participants in the franchising industry; in particular the conduct of franchisors. It is not to be inferred from a purpose which promotes or prescribes better and fairer business practices that contractual relations between parties will be affected. As was pointed out in SST Consulting Services v Rieson (2006) 225 CLR 516, 527 [30], the Act is far from being silent upon the question of the consequences of illegality, but, rather, contains elaborate provision. That is not to say that the express provisions of the Act answer all questions that may arise, but they answer many of them, and set the context in which others are to be answered. The provision made by the Act, in Pt VI, for remedies for contraventions of Pt IVB, and the unconscionability provisions of Pt IVA, tell strongly against an intention that the common law remedy for illegality was to apply. Such a conclusion is reinforced by the disadvantage which may be caused to a franchisee, which would not be consistent with the purposes of Pt IVB and the Code. It follows that s 4L does not apply to require the severance of the respondent's obligation under the Franchise Agreement to pay moneys, as the respondent contended.

INVALIDITY ON THE GROUNDS OF PUBLIC POLICY

[40.55] Even where the court concludes that the contract is not expressly or impliedly prohibited by statute, the court must then consider whether to refuse relief on public policy grounds (see Chapter 41). There is considerable overlap between the factors the court considers when determining whether a contract is impliedly prohibited by statute and when determining whether to refuse to enforce a contract on the basis that it contemplates the commission of a breach of statute and is therefore contrary to public policy. Kirby J's judgment in Fitzgerald v F J Leonhardt Pty Ltd (1997) 189 CLR 215 (extracted at [41.60]) contains a useful discussion of the distinction between contracts found to be prohibited by statute and contracts found to be illegal on the grounds of public policy.

PUBLIC POLICY

[41.05] Judges refuse to allow contractual promises that violate basic community standards and policies to be enforced. It is said that it would be contrary to public policy to enforce such promises. "Public policy", however, is an elusive concept. In Richardson v Melish (1824) 2 Bing 229, 252; 130 ER 294, 303, Burrough J noted that public policy "is a very unruly horse, and when once you get astride it you never know where it will carry you". Nevertheless, in the 19th century and beyond, the courts recognised a variety of heads of policy when the interests of the community were thought to demand it.

During the 20th century, the legislative arm of government played a far more important creative role in the development of the law than was the case when the judges developed heads of public policy. In these changed circumstances, some courts experienced feelings of embarrassment about the creation of new heads of public policy. In Janson v Driefontein Consolidated Mines [1902] AC 484, 491, Lord Halsbury LC said: "I deny that any court can invent a new head of public policy." However, Windeyer J made the following comment in Brooks v Burns Philp Trustee Co Ltd (1969) 121 CLR 432, at 451–2:

> The House of Lords has said that it is not for courts to create new heads of public policy. This warning was expounded by Isaacs J in this court in Wilkinson v Osborne (1915) 21 CLR 89. The proposition continues to excite controversy among those who doubt whether the fertility of courts in the 19th century has now given way to sterility, resulting from senility, in the common law. But the distinction between creating a new head of public policy and defining the scope of heads already formulated by judicial decision is perhaps verbal rather than real. Sir Carleton Allen trenchantly remarked in his Law in the Making (7th ed), p 303, n 2, that "the notion of 'heads' or categories, settled once for all, in a matter like this, is quite artificial and, it is submitted, unprofitable, except for convenience of arrangement and exposition".

> Nevertheless, the influence of categories continues. They provide "pigeon holes", it is said, into one of which an agreement must fit if it is to be held invalid on the ground of public policy: Monkland v Jack Barclay Ltd [1951] 2 KB 252 at 265.

This chapter considers the following heads of public policy by way of example: contracts promoting corruption in public life; contracts prejudicing the administration of justice; contracts involving crime, tort or breach of statute; and contracts which effect a restraint of trade. The consequences of illegality are further considered in Chapter 42.

CONTRACTS PROMOTING CORRUPTION IN PUBLIC LIFE

[41.10] A contract which involves a conflict between the public duty and the private interests of the contractor is contrary to public policy.

Wilkinson v Osborne

[41.15] Wilkinson v Osborne (1915) 21 CLR 89 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Section 4 of the Closer Settlement (Amendment) Act 1907 (NSW) provided that when an Advisory Board reported that any land was suitable to be acquired for closer settlement, the governor could, subject to the Act, purchase it from the owner. Every such purchase was subject to the approval, by resolution, of both Houses of Parliament.

Wilkinson (the appellant) was acting as agent for the owners of a large property which had been offered to the government for £30,000. The matter was delayed and Wilkinson was anxious to have it settled in order to get his commission, which was £1,000. He approached Osborne and Jones (the respondents), who were members of the Legislative Assembly carrying on the business of land agents, and asked them to urge the government to close the deal as quickly as possible. Their fee was £250. The sale was made and Osborne and Jones sued for the fee. They obtained judgment and issued a bankruptcy notice against Wilkinson when it was not satisfied. Wilkinson moved to set aside the notice on the ground, inter alia, that the judgment was based on an illegal contract. Street J dismissed the motion and Wilkinson appealed.]

ISAACS J: [97] In my opinion the "public policy" which a court is entitled to apply as a test of validity to a contract is in relation to some definite and governing principle which the community as a whole has already adopted either formally by law or tacitly by its general course of corporate life, and which the courts of the country can therefore recognise and enforce. The court is not a legislator; it cannot initiate the principle, it can only state or formulate it if it already exists.

The rule of law as to contracts against public policy is constant – namely, that every bargain contrary to such a social governing principle is regarded as prejudicial to the State, or in other words, contrary to "public policy" or, as it is sometimes called, "policy of the law", and the State by its tribunals refuses to enforce it.

But, as was said by the Judicial Committee in Venture v Venture (1874) LR 6 PC 1 at 29:

> the determination of what is contrary to the so-called "policy of the law" necessarily varies from time to time. Many transactions are upheld now by our own courts which a former generation would have avoided as contrary to the supposed policy of the law. The rule remains, but its application varies with the principles which for the time being guide public opinion.

So in Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & Ammunition Co Ltd, the observations of Lord Watson (at 553–4) and Lord McNaughton (at 565) run upon the same lines. But the point to bear in mind is that the principle which is to be the standard of legality must at the time be one which is of general recognition in the community as one essential to its corporate welfare. Some are not the subject of actual law; such as sexual morality and the promotion of marriage. Others are recognised as fundamental principles of the common [98] law; as the protection of the public revenue, the administration of justice, the freedom and inherent duty of the legislature and executive. Others, again, arise by statute directly or indirectly, for whatever a statute enacts is beyond all question, to that extent, the policy of the country. Whatever tends to defeat an enactment is necessarily against public policy.

I apprehend, therefore, the duty of this court is confined to inquiring whether there is at the present moment any governing principle existing in New South Wales, whether as a recognised essential part of the corporate life of the community or as part of the common or statute law of the State, which is infringed by the bargain between the appellant and the respondents by reason of its express terms or the tendency of its operation.

The courts must, to quote Lord Watson's words in the Nordenfelt case (at 554):

> ascertain, with as near an approach to accuracy as circumstances permit, what is the rule of policy for the then present time. When that rule has been ascertained, it becomes their duty to refuse to give effect to a private contract which violates the rule and would if judicially enforced, prove injurious to the community.

The courts refuse to give effect to such a bargain, not for the sake of the defendant, not to protect any interest of his – indeed, they do not fail to notice that his failure to abide by his agreement sometimes adds dishonesty to illegality – but they refuse to enforce the bargain for the sake of the community, who would be prejudiced if such a bargain were countenanced. The existence and nature of the principle or rule here rests upon the effect of the law of the State Constitution read by the light of the doctrine of responsible government, and the further specific effect of the closer settlement legislation.

[His Honour then examined the provisions of the closer settlement legislation and certain principles of constitutional law. He concluded:] [105] [O]n the facts of this case I entertain no doubt that the respondents were bargaining with Wilkinson to use the weight and influence they possessed by virtue of their positions as members of Parliament. How they came to be selected, the nature of the work they performed, the manner in which they performed it, all point unmistakably to the conclusion that it was not their business experience or ability that was wanted by Wilkinson or utilised by them, but their opportunities and ability of influencing the executive to advance the business proposal that hung fire.

It would be disastrous to the community to permit this to be recognised as a legitimate subject of traffic; it would encourage those who are appointed to be sentinels of the public welfare to become – if I may borrow a phrase from another case – the "sappers and miners" of the Constitution. And this court would be doing less than its own duty if it hesitated to denounce such traffic in the most positive terms.

Quacunque via, on the facts of this case the respondents placed their interest in conflict with their duty; and the bargain cannot stand.

There is, therefore, behind the judgment nothing which the law can recognise as a legal foundation, and consequently there is no debt which can form the basis of a bankruptcy notice. The appellant's objection must prevail; and he must succeed, not because he has merits but because the respondents have none.

[GRIFFITH CJ delivered a judgment in which he reached the same result and GAVAN DUFFY J agreed with both judgments.]

CONTRACTS PREJUDICING THE ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

[41.20] A fundamental head of public policy is the public interest in the administration of justice and the enforcement of the criminal law. Violations of this head of public policy can take a variety of forms. A contract which aims at stifling a prosecution in respect of a public offence is one example: see Callaghan v O'Sullivan [1925] VLR 664 and Clegg v Wilson (1932) 32 SR (NSW) 109, at [42.60] and [42.75], respectively. A further example is a contract not to disclose information that would assist in the administration of the criminal law. In the following case, a contract was challenged on this basis.

A v Hayden

[41.25] A v Hayden (1984) 156 CLR 532 (High Court of Australia) – Case stated in actions in the Court.

[FACTS: Five Commonwealth employees (the plaintiffs) took part in 1983 in a security training exercise arranged by the Australian Secret Intelligence Service (ASIS). They were to rescue one of their number, playing the role of hostage, from his "captors" in a room at the Sheraton Hotel in Melbourne. They did so by breaking down the door of the room. The hotel manager, who was not warned of the exercise, went to investigate. The plaintiffs wearing disguises and carrying firearms left hurriedly, one of them jostling the manager in the lift. The Victorian Chief of Police believed that criminal offences had been committed. At his request, the State government asked the Commonwealth to reveal the names of the participants, so that police inquiries could proceed. On the participants' application, Dawson J in the original jurisdiction of the High Court granted interlocutory injunctions restraining the Commonwealth and other parties (the defendants) from disclosing their identities unless it should be determined by pending actions that the confidentiality clauses in the plaintiffs' employment contracts were unenforceable.

The Victorian legislature then passed the Criminal Proceedings Act 1984, a statute of limited duration, which empowered courts determining matters relating to Australian security to sit as closed courts. Further, the Judiciary Amendment Act 1984 (Cth) gave binding effect to orders made by a court pursuant to the Victorian Act in respect of matters arising out of the 1983 ASIS incident at the Sheraton Hotel.

The Commonwealth then applied to have the interlocutory injunctions dissolved upon the ground that the intervening legislation had removed any concern about national security and had left the plaintiffs to seek relief only on the threatened breach of a contractual term which was unenforceable on grounds of public policy. Dawson J refused to dissolve the injunctions and thereafter stated a case for the consideration of the Full Court.]

DEANE J: [592] These five cases illustrate the abiding wisdom of the biblical injunction against putting one's "trust in men in power" (Psalms 146:3; Jerusalem Bible, p 927). The plaintiffs have been described without dissent as "upright, decent men serving their country". The two rocks upon which they founder are however propositions of law which are not to be moved to meet the exigencies of hard cases. Shortly and relevantly stated, those propositions are: (i) that neither the Crown nor the Executive has any common law right or power to dispense with the observance of the law or to authorise illegality and (ii) that the courts of this country will not enforce the terms of a promise not to disclose information in circumstances where such enforcement would obstruct the due administration of the criminal law ….

[593] The five plaintiffs' trust in the Commonwealth and in those who approved the exercise or gave them their directions or instructions was completely misplaced. The "authority or consent necessary to make any act or thing lawful" was not obtained and, in the absence of special statutory provision, was probably not within the power of any person or combination of persons to grant. The "direction" to participate in the exercise, in the manner in which it was carried out, was a direction which the Commonwealth Executive could not lawfully give. To the extent that the five plaintiffs may themselves have been involved in criminal activities, the "Commonwealth exercise cards" which they were "instructed … to show" should they be questioned were completely ineffectual to establish legal justification. The criminal law of this country has no place for a general defence of superior orders or of Crown or Executive fiat.

The concerted action, the breaking open of the door with a sledge hammer, the "jostling" of the hotel manager, the firearms including automatic weapons and the masks combined to raise at least a reasonable apprehension that criminal offences had been committed and to call for investigation by the Victoria Police Force in the ordinary administration of the criminal law of that State … [594] It is common ground that misprision of felony is defunct in Victoria and that none of the defendants is under any legal duty to disclose the relevant information either to the Chief Commissioner of Police or anyone else. In the absence of any such duty, the ordinary position under the law applies and each of the defendants is at liberty to remain silent and to preserve the confidentiality of his or its information (cf Baker v Campbell (1983) 57 ALJR 749 at 773).

The stated case in the first action records that it was a "term" of the "contract of employment" of each of the five plaintiffs "with the Commonwealth" that his identity would be kept confidential and in particular that, except to the extent "necessary for the conduct of the functions of ASIS", there would not be disclosed "to any person" his name, address or any act or thing done by him in the course of his training or work with ASIS. The defendants do not suggest that disclosure of the names of any of the plaintiffs is in any way "necessary for the conduct of the functions of ASIS" …. Their … defence is that that provision of the contract is, to the extent that it would prevent disclosure to the Commissioner of Police of the identity of the relevant plaintiff in the circumstances which have arisen, void and unenforceable ….

[595] [T]he defendants' argument based on public policy must prevail. The relevant proposition of law was shortly stated at the commencement of this judgment. It is that the courts of this country will not lend their aid to enforce a promise not to disclose information where the circumstances are such that enforcement or insistence upon observance of the promise would obstruct the due administration of the criminal law of Australia, whether Commonwealth or State. The rationale of that proposition is that, apart from the exceptional case (such as that of a professional legal adviser) where the overall administration of the law itself requires that confidentiality be maintained, it would be contrary to public policy for the courts to enforce a right on the part of one person to insist that another fail or refuse to disclose relevant information to assist those entrusted with the ordinary administration of the criminal law in the proper investigation and prosecution of criminal activity: the enforcement by the courts of such a private right to insist that another fail or refuse to disclose relevant information would involve the courts in the obstruction of the due administration of the criminal law which is a mainstay both of the rule of law which they exist to serve and of the very existence of effective private rights. For the purposes of that proposition, the investigation of actual or reasonably apprehended criminal activity by a regular law enforcement agency of the Commonwealth or of a State is part of the administration of the criminal law. Whether enforcement or observance of a term of a particular promise of confidentiality would obstruct that administration is a question [596] which must be determined in the context of the circumstances of the particular case. Plainly enough, the enforcement of such a promise by an order forbidding a threatened voluntary disclosure to the Commissioner of a State Police Force of the identity of the participants in joint activity which involved actual or reasonably apprehended offences against the criminal law of that State would involve obstruction of the due administration of that criminal law.

In stating the relevant proposition in terms of unenforceability by the courts, I have avoided the question whether a general contractual promise which, properly construed, requires the maintenance of confidentiality notwithstanding that the administration of the criminal law will be obstructed thereby is wholly or partially "illegal", "void" or "invalid". That question raises problems of terminology and substance, including the nature and effect of any distinctions between "illegal", "void", "invalid" and "unenforceable" (cf Brooks v Burns Philp Trustee Co Ltd (1969) 121 CLR 432 at 458ff; Buckley v Tutty (1971) 125 CLR 353 at 379ff) and the identification of the precise principles governing the residual enforceability (if any) of such a general contractual promise to the extent that the maintenance of confidentiality would not adversely affect the due administration of the criminal law. At one end of the scale is the case where the direct and immediate operation of the contractual promise to preserve confidentiality is to obstruct the due investigation of crime by concealing information about criminal activity and where it would seem clear enough that the promise itself is tainted with illegality and is void. At the other end of the scale is the case where a general promise of confidentiality is innocently given and where it is only in remote and unforeseen circumstances that an adverse effect upon the due administration of the criminal law would result from its observance: in such a case, there is much to be said for the view that the result is superseding unenforceability merely to the extent that observance of the promise would have such an adverse affect. Those questions have not, however, been investigated in argument in the present actions and they are best left to another day …

[597] It was submitted on behalf of the plaintiffs that there should be weighed against any considerations of public interest favouring disclosure of their identity to the Chief Commissioner of Police a variety of countervailing considerations of public interest, including considerations going to national security, which militate against such disclosure. If this Court were required to determine the overall balance of competing considerations of public interest, there would be much force in that submission since the considerations favouring preservation of the confidentiality of the identity of the plaintiffs, though varying from case to case, are substantial and counsel for the plaintiffs have convincingly demonstrated the inadequacies of the Commonwealth-Victorian legislative scheme which offers no effective protection against disclosure of the identity of a plaintiff charged with an offence unless and until the court (be it Supreme Court or Justice of the Peace) before which he is charged is persuaded, in the exercise of a largely unconfined statutory discretion, to order that justice be administered in secret (see Criminal Proceedings Act 1984 (Vic) and Judiciary Amendment Act 1984 (Cth)). In the present actions however, the Court is not concerned to perform the type of balancing exercise which may be involved in deciding whether disclosure or production of documents should be ordered or evidence should be compelled or received (cf Sankey v Whitlam (1978) 142 CLR 1 at 38–9, 56ff, 95–6). While general considerations of public policy, such as considerations of national security, may prevail over a prima facie entitlement to discovery, production or disclosure in the actual course of the administration of justice by the courts (see, eg, Gaming Board of Great Britain v Rogers [1973] AC 388), they provide neither foundation nor justification for the making by a court of a positive order which would obstruct the due administration of the criminal law at the suit of one who is asserting some contractual or other private right. The proposition that the courts of this country will not lend their aid to enforce a promise not to disclose information where the circumstances are such that enforcement or insistence upon observance of the promise would obstruct the due administration of the criminal law which it is a function of the courts to advance is not a provisional one which is subject to being overruled by some [598] perceived balancing of other considerations of public interest. In some cases, of course, a balancing process may be involved in determining whether the enforcement of a promise to maintain confidentiality has the overall effect of advancing, rather than obstructing or adversely affecting, the due administration of the criminal law. The obvious example is where the promise to maintain confidentiality is that of a professional legal adviser and relates to communications which are properly the subject of legal professional privilege (see, eg, Weld-Blundell v Stephens [1919] 1 KB 520 at 544–5, 547; Grant v Downs (1976) 135 CLR 674, at p 688; Baker v Campbell, at 774–5). Once it appears, however, that enforcement or insistence upon observance of such a promise would obstruct the due administration of the criminal law, the principle which precludes enforcement by the courts is operative without any further weighing process being necessary or other considerations of public interest being relevant. Indeed, the position of the ordinary individual under the law would be such as to make non-disclosure the only safe course if he were unable to ascertain whether he was under an enforceable obligation to observe a promise to maintain confidentiality unless and until it was known whether it would ultimately be held that other considerations, such as matters of national security of which he might well be completely unaware, outweighed the obstruction of the due administration of the criminal law which enforcement or observance of the promise would involve. While one would expect the considerations of public interest upon which the plaintiffs rely to weigh heavily with the defendants on the question whether the identity of all or any of the plaintiffs should be disclosed by the Commonwealth to the Commissioner of Police, they are simply not in point in so far as the five actions in this Court are concerned …

[MASON, MURPHY and BRENNAN JJ delivered separate judgments, and WILSON and DAWSON JJ delivered a joint judgment, in which they also held that no enforceable duty was owed by the Commonwealth to the plaintiffs to treat as confidential their identities or the details of their training or work for ASIS and that although such disclosure would be a breach of the term of confidentiality in their respective contracts of employment, that the term was unenforceable. Accordingly, the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendants from disclosing to the Chief Commissioner of Police information as to their identity. GIBBS CJ held the determination of further facts was necessary to decide whether the enforcement of the Commonwealth's duty of confidentiality would in fact tend to obstruct the course of justice.]

[41.30] Note

In the course of their joint judgment in the principal case, Wilson and Dawson JJ said (at 574): "there may be cases where the triviality of the alleged breaches of the criminal law will not lead a court to withhold relief by way of injunction to restrain a threatened breach of a duty of confidentiality …."

CONTRACTS INVOLVING CRIME, TORT OR BREACH OF STATUTE

Contracts requiring or contemplating illegal acts

[41.35] A contract which requires, or contemplates the possibility of, the commission of a crime, tort or breach of statute may be declared void or unenforceable on the basis that it is contrary to public policy. However, the rule against enforcement is not inflexible. Ultimately, whether a contract is declared unenforceable will depend upon the seriousness of the wrong in question and the consequences of declaring the contract unenforceable.

North v Marra Developments

[41.40] North v Marra Developments Ltd (1981) 148 CLR 42 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal Division of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The directors of a public company Marra (the respondent, defendant) considered that the market price of its shares did not reflect the true value of its assets and that the company was vulnerable to a takeover. On the advice of members of North, a stockbroking firm (the appellants, plaintiffs), the directors proposed that the respondent's capital should be reconstructed, that it should make a bonus issue of shares and that it should offer to take over or merge with another company, Scottish Australia Homes Ltd (Scottish). It was considered critical to the success of the proposed takeover that the market price of the respondent's shares should rise to around $16.50. After notice of the proposed reconstruction and bonus share issue was relayed to the Sydney Stock Exchange and made public in the press, but before the announcement of the takeover offer, the appellants, following advice they themselves had given the respondent, bought quantities of shares in the respondent on the stock exchange at $16.50. This was a price higher than that of previous sales and was done to "establish the market". The appellants continued to purchase after the takeover offer was announced. The shares were bought for a company associated with the appellants and for the directors of the respondent. In statements made to the Stock Exchange and the press and in the formal offer to the shareholders of Scottish, $16.50 was referred to as "the sale price", "the market price" or "the market value" of the shares. The takeover was successful. The appellants sued the respondent for reasonable fees in respect of advice and negotiations for the reconstruction of the respondent's capital to reflect more appropriately its asset backing and as a basis of a takeover offer to Scottish. The appellants' claim made no mention of any arrangement to support the price of the respondent's shares on the market. The respondent pleaded illegality, alleging that the transaction between the parties contravened s 70 of the Securities Industry Act 1970 (NSW) and was also illegal at common law. Section 70 provided: "A person shall not create or do anything which is calculated to create, a false or misleading appearance of active trading in any securities on any stock market in the state, or a false or misleading appearance with respect to the market for, or the price of, any securities."

The trial judge, Meares J, dismissed the claim on the ground that the agreement between the parties involved a breach of s 70. On appeal to the Court of Appeal, the judgment was affirmed. Hope and Samuels JJA held that the transaction between the parties was in breach of s 70. Mahoney JA (with whom Hope and Samuels JJA concurred) held that the claim arose out of an agreement that was illegal at common law. The appellants appealed to the High Court.]

MASON J: [55] Mahoney JA found, rightly in my view, that: "… there had been devised by the plaintiffs (appellants) and agreed to by the defendant, a scheme which involved, inter alia, that there would be a reconstruction of the defendant's share capital; that … the plaintiffs and directors of the defendant would, by transactions on the Sydney Stock Exchange, 'establish a market' for Marra shares at $16.50 or thereabouts;" that a takeover offer by Marra for Scottish shares would be made involving an exchange of shares in the two companies; "and that the Stock Exchange price so 'established' for Marra shares would be … utilised in relation to that takeover offer." …

[56] Mahoney JA's finding is criticized because it fails to give effect to the uncontradicted expert evidence of Mr Tilley, that an agreement to buy "at" a nominated price is an agreement to buy "at best" up to that price. Mr Tilley's evidence would be of value if we were concerned to ascertain the effect of a simple agreement between broker and client without a constraining context. Here the substance of the agreement was very different – it was an agreement to buy specifically at $16.50 or thereabouts in order to attain a particular goal. Consequently, I agree with Mahoney JA: "… that it was not the purpose of the plaintiffs to buy the shares that they did at the lowest price reasonably obtainable; that the reason why they bought shares as they did was so that the Stock Exchange price of Marra shares would appear publicly to be $16.50 per share or of that general order; and that they did this so that that price could be used to advantage in connection with, at least, the takeover" of Scottish shares.

His Honour went on to find that the references in the three documents prepared by the appellants to the Stock Exchange price of the shares were misleading. In these documents $16.50 was referred to variously as the "sale price", the "market sale price", "market price" and "market value". These references, unaccompanied by any disclosure of the nature and extent of the appellants' operations in the market, were, he thought, apt to mislead the reader of the documents as to the significance which should be attached to [57] the price. I agree. His Honour also found that the appellants must have realized this, their purpose being to influence those who had occasion to consider Marra's offer to take over Scottish shares. Another criticism made of his Honour's findings is that he failed to take account of the conclusion of the primary judge that he was "not reasonably satisfied that the plaintiffs' activities had the effect of raising the price of the shares above their market value". Meares J thought that the prices paid over the relevant period reflected prices which one would have expected the market to pay. With respect to the primary judge, this view seems to give no weight to the importance which the appellants attached to their action in "establishing" a market, to the marked preponderance of their activity in the market for Marra shares and to the dramatic fall in the price of the shares once the appellants' support and that of Marra directors was withdrawn …

[58] The relevant prohibition in the section is against creating, or causing to create, or doing anything which is calculated to create, "a false or misleading appearance with respect to the market for, or the price of, any securities".

In terms the statutory prohibition is directed against activity which is designed to give the market for securities or the price of securities a false or misleading appearance. In this setting, "calculated" means "designed" or "intended" rather than "adapted" or "suited". It is not altogether easy to translate the generality of this language into a specific prohibition against injurious activity, whilst at the same time leaving people free to engage in legitimate commercial activity which will have an effect on the market and on the price of securities. Purchases or sales are often made for indirect or collateral motives, in circumstances where the transactions will, to the knowledge of the participants, have an effect on the [59] market for, or the price of, shares. Plainly enough it is not the object of the section to outlaw all such transactions.

It seems to me that the object of the section is to protect the market for securities against activities which will result in artificial or managed manipulation. The section seeks to ensure that the market reflects the forces of genuine supply and demand. By "genuine supply and demand" I exclude buyers and sellers whose transactions are undertaken for the sole or primary purpose of setting or maintaining the market price. It is in the interests of the community that the market for securities should be real and genuine, free from manipulation. The section is a legislative measure designed to ensure such a market and it should be interpreted accordingly ….

When purchases have been made of shares in a company at or about a particular level for the purpose of setting and maintaining a market price for those shares there is a breach of the statutory prohibition. At the very least purchases have then been made which are calculated to create "a false or misleading appearance with respect to the market for, or the price of" the shares. In reality the purchases are calculated to create a false market or false price. The false or misleading appearance is that the market, in the absence of any disclosure that a market support operation is on foot, appears to be real or genuine, there being no overt sign of market support or manipulation.

In passing I note that it is enough to breach the section that the activities are calculated to create a false or misleading appearance. It is not necessary that they do in fact create that appearance ….

The question then is whether the contravention of the section results in an illegality so as to prevent the appellants from recovering [60] their remuneration. On the inferences drawn by the Court of Appeal the original agreement between the parties was one which from its inception contemplated the possibility of a breach of s 70 as a means of executing the scheme which the parties agreed should be carried into execution. As events fell out what was a contemplated possibility became an actuality – the appellants carried out their part of the contract by contravening s 70. It makes no difference that Marra acquiesced in what was done. The appellants' performance of the agreement involved an illegality and the agreement itself envisaged this as a possibility. The appellants fail, not because the agreement on which they sue is avoided by s 70, but because the performance on which they rely involved illegal conduct …

Quite apart from contravention of s 70, the inferences drawn establish that the appellants' claim was affected by common law illegality. The appellants' claim for remuneration was based on the commission of fraudulent conduct, the making of statements which were and were known to be misleading with a view to deceiving the Scottish shareholders. A claim for remuneration for fraudulent conduct is defeated by the illegality principle (ET Fisher & Co Pty Ltd v English Scottish and Australian Bank Ltd (1940) 64 CLR 84 at 91, 103). The general principle was expressed by Lindley LJ in Scott v Brown, Doering, McNab & Co [1892] 2 QB 724 at 728–9 in these terms:

> In this case the correspondence put in evidence by the plaintiff in support of the claim he made at the trial shews conclusively that the sole object of the plaintiff in ordering shares to be bought for him at a premium was to impose upon and to deceive the public by leading the public to suppose that there were buyers of such shares at a premium on the Stock Exchange, when in fact there were none but himself. The plaintiff's purchase was an actual purchase, not a sham purchase; that is true, but it is also true that the sole object of the purchase was to cheat and mislead the public. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff must look elsewhere than to a court of justice for such assistance as he may require against the persons he employed to assist him in his fraud, if the claim to such assistance is based on his illegal contract.

As the fraud and illegality (common law and statutory) was a contemplated means of performing the contract and became an integral element in the appellants' performance of the contract there is no basis for treating the fraud and the illegality as collateral only [61] or fraud as severable from the remainder of the work undertaken by the appellants. In the result the appeal should be dismissed.

[MURPHY and WILSON JJ agreed with Mason J. STEPHEN and AICKIN JJ agreed with Mason J and stated that the appeal should be dismissed on the basis that the agreement and its performance involved an offence under s 70. They were unable to agree that the conduct of the parties constituted a conspiracy to deceive.]

Appeal dismissed.

[41.45] Note

If the illegal act contemplated by the contract is of a quite minor nature, the contract may not be held contrary to public policy: see Electric Appliance Pty Ltd v Doug Thorley Caravans (Australia) Pty Ltd [1981] VR 799.

Contracts performed in an illegal manner

[41.50] If a legal contract is performed by one of the parties in an illegal manner, and this was not contemplated by the other party, the innocent party may raise the defence of illegality if sued by the guilty party. In such a case, the innocent party is not saying the contract itself is illegal – as that might rule both parties out of court – but rather that the guilty party cannot rely on an illegal act to obtain relief: ex turpi causa non oritur actio (no action arises from a base cause). The defence of illegality will not, however, necessarily succeed. The court considers public policy reasons for and against the enforcement of the contract, including the aims of any relevant statute. For an example, see Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia (1978) 139 CLR 410, 427–31, extracted at [40.35].

Contracts associated with illegality

[41.55] Where a contract is associated with the contravention of a statute but is not prohibited by the statute, guidelines to assist a court in determining whether the contract should be enforced were stated and applied in the following case.

Fitzgerald v FJ Leonhardt

[41.60] Fitzgerald v FJ Leonhardt Pty Ltd (1997) 189 CLR 215 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Northern Territory Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: Fitzgerald (the owner) owned land in the Northern Territory, which he planned to subdivide. It was a requirement of any proposed subdivision that water be located there with a flow of at least 500 gallons per hour. The owner contracted with FJ Leonhardt Pty Ltd (the driller) for the drilling of a minimum of three bores. The driller drilled seven bores, three of which were successful in producing water. A dispute arose as to how much was owed by the owner to the driller, and the driller brought an action in the Local Court in Darwin claiming $25,540 as money due under the contract.

The owner raised a defence of illegality under Div 3 of Pt 6 of the Water Act 1992 (NT). Under s 56(1) "a person shall not, unless authorised by or under this Act, cause, suffer or permit a bore to be drilled, constructed … or sealed off" (penalty for a first offence was stated to be $5,000). Section 57 empowered the Controller of Water Resources (the Controller) to grant to a person a permit to carry out an operation referred to in s 56(1). In the present instance no permits were issued for any bore to be drilled.

In Div 2 of Pt 6 of the Act, s 48 prohibited a person from drilling a bore unless that person was the holder of a drilling licence issued under s 49 by the Controller. The driller held such a drilling licence.

The Local Court held that the driller was seeking to recover under an illegal contract and disallowed the claim. An appeal by the driller to the Supreme Court was successful. An appeal by the owner to the Northern Territory Court of Appeal was dismissed. The owner appealed to the High Court.]

MCHUGH AND GUMMOW JJ: [226] This is not a case where the statute contained an express prohibition against the making of the contract in question. The Act did prohibit the owner doing or suffering particular acts without the authority of a permit granted by the Controller under s 57(1). An agreement that the owner engage in such activity may have been treated as impliedly prohibited by the Act and as illegal (Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 551–2, 593, 611). However, that is not the owner's case. The contract as framed did not call for the commission of any illegality. Nor did the statute prohibit some particular act that was essential for carrying out the contract. Performance of the work would have answered the requirements of the contract if the owner had obtained licences under s 57. In Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglett Ltd [1961] 1 QB 374 at 391 Devlin LJ said:

> It is a familiar principle of law that if a contract can be performed in one of two ways, that is, legally or illegally, it is not an illegal contract, though it may be unenforceable at the suit of a party who chooses to perform it illegally. That statement of the law is meaningful if the contract is one which is by its terms open to two modes of performance; otherwise it is meaningless.

In the present case, it was possible for the contract to be performed without contravening the Act. In so far as the contract was performed in contravention of the legislation, the contravention was the consequence of failure by the owner to observe requirements imposed upon him. There was no failure by the driller to observe requirements placed upon it by the Act. The driller satisfied the requirements for a drilling licence imposed by Div 2 of Pt 6 and it was for the owner to comply with the requirements of Div 3.

On this appeal, the oral submissions were presented on the footing that in accordance with its terms the contract could have been performed and the bores constructed and drilled with or without the existence of a permit granted under s 57. That may have insufficiently represented the true position. The better view would appear to have been that each party to the contract agreed to do all that was necessary on its part to enable the other party to have the benefit of performance of the contract (Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596 at 607–8), so that there was an implied undertaking by the owner to procure the grant of any bore construction permits required under the Act for the construction and drilling of the bores by the driller (cf Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglett Ltd [1961] 1 QB 374 at 392–3).

The action by the driller to recover moneys owing to it by the owner [227] was not an action by a party to a contract who had chosen to perform it illegally. The penalty imposed by s 56(1) was directed at a party in the position of the owner rather than the driller. Further, it has not been suggested that the driller acted otherwise than in good faith or that the driller had aided and abetted the owner in any offence committed by him, within the meaning of the principles considered in Giorgianni v The Queen (1985) 156 CLR 473 at 487–8, 490–1, 506–7 and Yorke v Lucas (1985) 158 CLR 661 at 667–8, 676 (see also Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglett Ltd [1961] 1 QB 374 at 385, 388).

The question then becomes whether, as a matter of public policy, the court should decline to enforce the contract because of its association with the illegal activity of the owner in, if not causing, then at least suffering or permitting the construction and drilling of bores, within the meaning of s 56(1), without the grant to the owner of permits pursuant to s 57. The refusal of the courts in such a case to regard the contract as enforceable stems not from express or implied legislative prohibition but from the policy of the law, commonly called public policy (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 429–30, 432–3; Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 551–2, 593, 611). Regard is to be had primarily to the scope and purpose of the statute to consider whether the legislative purpose will be fulfilled without regarding the contract as void and unenforceable (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 434).

Section 56 prescribes a penalty. In such a case, the role of the common law in determining the legal consequences of commission of the offence may thereby be diminished because the purpose of the statute is sufficiently served by the penalty (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 429, 433–4; Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 570, 590–1, 614, 616). Here, the imposition of an additional sanction, namely inability of the driller to recover moneys otherwise owing by the owner, would be an inappropriate adjunct to the scheme for which the Act provides. The contrary decision would cause prejudice to an innocent party without furthering the objects of the legislation …

[228] Here, the driller had complied with licensing requirements imposed by Div 2 of Pt 6 for the conduct of its business. This is not the case of an unlicensed driller seeking to recover for work done in contravention of the prohibition imposed by s 48 upon drilling or constructing bores without the grant of a drilling licence. The claim which is made by the driller is insufficiently associated with breach of the requirements of Div 3 by the owner, the party resisting the claim. Put another way, the interest of the Territory in controlling, by the statutory licensing system, the right of owners to take water under s 14 may be maintained without imposing a sanction upon the party in the position of the driller which would deny it payment for the work performed and would leave the other party with the benefit of that work free of charge. The imposition of such a sanction upon the driller by failing to keep the owner to his bargain would be disproportionate to the seriousness of the breaches of s 56 and would be unnecessary to protect the objects or policies of the Act. (See Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 613; Creighton, "The Recovery of Property Transferred for Illegal Purposes" (1997) 60 Modern Law Review 102 at 108.)

In Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 604–5 McHugh J referred to the dictum of Lord Mansfield in Holman v Johnson (1775) 1 Cowp 341; 98 ER 1120 at 343 (Cowp), 1121 (ER) that no court would lend its aid to a plaintiff founding the cause of action upon an immoral or illegal act. In Holman v Johnson itself, the actual holding was that the contract in question was insufficiently associated with or in furtherance of the illegal purpose of the defendant in buying tea to be smuggled into England without payment of customs duties (Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 554–5). McHugh J identified (at 604–5) authorities subsequent to Holman v Johnson which were to be seen as providing four exceptions or qualifications whereby relief was granted despite the presence of illegality. Three of these, those concerned with ignorance or mistake on the part of the claimant; the character of the statutory scheme as one for the benefit of a class of which the claimant is a member; and fraud, oppression or [229] undue influence by the defendant, have been treated as instances of a broader principle. This is said to be that, notwithstanding the illegality, relief may still be available to the plaintiff if the plaintiff not be in equal fault with the defendant, that is to say not in pari delicto. (Palmer, The Law of Restitution, (1978), vol 2, par 8.6. See also Kiriri Cotton Co Ltd v Dewani [1960] AC 192 at 205, where it was said, with respect to legislation forbidding the receipt of premiums from tenants that neither the rich tenant who paid a premium as a bribe in order to "jump the queue" nor the poor tenant at wit's end to find accommodation was as much to blame as the landlord who was using his property rights so as to exploit those in need of a roof over their heads.) However, in the light of the approach taken in Nelson v Nelson to comparable questions arising with respect to trusts, the issues of contract law in this case should not be approached by considering any general in pari delicto doctrine. The preferable course, in cases of contract alike to those involving trusts, is as follows. A case may come within one of the accepted exceptions or qualifications to Holman v Johnson. As indicated above, these are set forth, with examples from authority, in the following passage from the judgment of McHugh J in Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 604–5:

> First the courts will not refuse relief where the claimant was ignorant or mistaken as to the factual circumstances which render an agreement or arrangement illegal (Oom v Bruce (1810) 12 East 225; 104 ER 87; Cowan v Milbourn (1867) LR 2 Ex 230; Branigan v Saba [1924] NZLR 481). Second, the courts will not refuse relief where the statutory scheme rendering a contract or arrangement illegal was enacted for the benefit of a class of which the claimant is a member (Kiriri Cotton Co Ltd v Dewani [1960] AC 192). Third, the courts will not refuse relief where an illegal agreement was induced by the defendant's fraud, oppression or undue influence. (Clarke v Shee (1774) 1 Cowp 197; 98 ER 1041; Smith v Cuff (1817) 6 M & S 160; 105 ER 1203; Williams v Bayley (1866) LR 1 HL 200; Goodfriend v Goodfriend [1972] SCR 640; Weston v Beaufils [No 2] (1994) 50 FCR 476 at 499). Fourth, the courts will not refuse relief where the illegal purpose has not been carried into effect (Payne v McDonald (1908) 6 CLR 208 at 211–12; Perpetual Executors & Trustees Association of Australia Ltd v Wright (1917) 23 CLR 185 at 193–4; Martin v Martin (1959) 110 CLR 297 at 305).

Even if the case does not come within one of those exceptions, the courts should not refuse to enforce contractual rights arising under a contract, merely because the contract is associated with or in furtherance of an illegal purpose, where the contract was not made in breach of a statutory prohibition upon its formation or upon the doing of a particular act essential to the performance of the contract or otherwise making unlawful the manner in which the contract is performed. Rather, the policy of the law should accord with the [230] principles set out by McHugh J in Nelson v Nelson. His Honour said (at 613):

> Accordingly, in my opinion, even if a case does not come within one of the four exceptions to the Holman dictum to which I have referred, courts should not refuse to enforce legal or equitable rights simply because they arose out of or were associated with an unlawful purpose unless: (a) the statute discloses an intention that those rights should be unenforceable in all circumstances; or (b)(i) the sanction of refusing to enforce those rights is not disproportionate to the seriousness of the unlawful conduct; (ii) the imposition of the sanction is necessary, having regard to the terms of the statute, to protect its objects or policies; and (iii) the statute does not disclose an intention that the sanctions and remedies contained in the statute are to be the only legal consequences of a breach of the statute or the frustration of its policies (Elements (ii) and (iii) may often overlap).

As we have indicated, if the present case be approached in that way, the result is that the defence of illegality correctly failed and there was no bar to the full recovery by the driller of the amount claimed.

It may be observed that Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 was decided consistently with these principles. This Court held that s 45 of the Builders Licensing Act 1971 (NSW), whilst it provided that certain building contracts were not enforceable by the builder against the customer, did not prevent the bringing by the builder of an action for the value of the work done and materials supplied. Deane J said (at 262):

> There is no apparent reason in justice why a builder who is precluded from enforcing an agreement should also be deprived of the ordinary common law right to bring proceedings on a common indebitatus count to recover fair and reasonable remuneration for work which he has actually done and which has been accepted by the building owner: cf Johnsons Tyne

> Foundry Pty Ltd v Maffra Corporation (1948) 77 CLR 544 at 565. Nor, upon a consideration of the words of s 45 in their context in the Act, am I able to identify any legislative intent to deprive the builder of that ordinary common law right. The section does not make an agreement to which it applies illegal or void. Nor do its words disclose any legislative intent to penalise the builder beyond making the agreement itself unenforceable by him against the other party.

Special considerations may arise in a case where, for example, the objects or policies of the statute indicate that the association between [231] the plaintiff's contractual or other legal rights and the statutory illegality requires that denial of relief be partial rather than entire. Where the plaintiff seeks equitable relief, whether in aid of a legal or equitable right, equity may impose terms. For example, a borrower coming to equity seeking such equitable relief as orders for cancellation and delivery up of a written contract declared void by statutes against usury, would be put on terms that the defendant be paid what was really bona fide due after deduction of the excessive interest (see Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 562). If the lender already had recovered judgment for the full amount, the borrower may have an equity to restrain enforcement of the judgment in respect of the amount representing excessive interest.

However, the flexibility attending the administration of equitable relief is not so readily available where what is claimed is a legal remedy in aid of a legal right and there is no equity to qualify or displace, wholly or partially, enforcement of that legal right. Nevertheless, as was pointed out in Hurst v Vestcorp Ltd (1988) 12 NSWLR 394 at 445–6 what may now be classified as restitutionary remedies may be available to assist in the striking of a balance. For example, it was held long ago that where a borrower had paid interest in excess of the rate permitted by statute, whilst the debtor could not recover the whole back, an action would lie to recover the surplus (Smith v Bromley, reported as a note to Jones v Barkley (1781) 2 Dougl 684, 697; 99 ER 434, 444; Stoljar, The Law of Quasi-Contract (2nd ed, 1989) at pp 228–9; Palmer, The Law of Restitution, (1978), vol 2 par 9.14). The use of the quantum meruit in Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul may be seen as another example. Set-off may also have a role to play in adjusting the respective final positions of the parties. However, it is unnecessary to consider further any such questions, the present being a plain case. The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

[41.62] KIRBY J: [231] Illegality, and the associated problems of statutory construction and public policy, have been described as a "shadowy" (Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538, 595) and "notoriously difficult" (Ross v Ratcliff (1988) 91 FLR 66, 67) area of the law where there are "many [232] pitfalls" (Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglett Ltd [1961] 1 QB 374 at 393). Many of the authorities on the point are difficult to reconcile (Fitzgerald v F J Leonhardt Pty Ltd (1995) 5 NTLR 76 at 83, per Angel J). Commentators claim that some of them are marked by "obscurities, supposed distinctions and questionable techniques of decision" (Gelborn, "Contracts and Public Policy", Columbia Law Review, vol 35 (1935) 679, at p 679 cited in Stowe, "The 'Unruly Horse' has Bolted: Tinsley v Milligan" (1994) 57 Modern Law Review 441, 442-443). They suggest that this is an area of the law which is "intensely controversial and confused" (Phang, "Of Illegality and Presumptions – Australian Departures and Possible Approaches" (1996) 2 Journal of Contract Law 53, 53). The House of Lords has recently proposed that it is ripe for thorough re-examination by the Law Commission so that it may be subjected to legislative reform (Tinsley v Milligan [1994] 1 AC 340 at 364). Special concern has been expressed about the danger that illegality, in some way connected with a contract, will (unless tightly controlled) let loose the "unruly horse" (Richardson v Mellish (1824) 2 Bing 229 at 252) of public policy to a "blind gallop through the doctrinal forests of [the law]" (Stowe, "The 'Unruly Horse' has Bolted: Tinsley v Milligan" (1994) 57 Modern Law Review 441, 449). Various other equine metaphors are invoked to express the suggested dangers of uncertainty and the potentially harsh and unjust (See Rose, "Confining Illegality" (1996) 112 Law Quarterly Review 545, 545) outcomes that would follow enlargement of court discretions to decline relief on the ground that a contract is somehow touched by illegality (See Shaw v Groom [1970] 2 QB 504 at 523; Forder, "Taming the unruly horse!

Contractual illegality and public policy: Fitzgerald v F J Leonhardt Pty Ltd" (1997) 3 High Court Review 1 at par 82) …

[236] Special leave was granted to the appellant to permit it to argue two legal points raised by the foregoing facts:

1. Whether the Act, properly construed, expressly or impliedly rendered those parts of the contract, as formed or performed, illegal such that they were void and therefore unenforceable: ("The construction point").

2. Whether, even if the Act did not render the contract, as formed or performed, illegal and therefore void, any principle of public policy would stand in the way of the attempted enforcement of the contract: ("The public policy point") …

The construction point – applicable principles

[41.63] [242] The following principles may be derived from past authority to assist in the resolution of the application of the Act to the contract in question here and its performance:

1. The first task of a court is to ascertain the meaning and application of the law which is said to give rise to the illegality affecting the contract. The law in question may be a rule of the common law but nowadays it is much more likely to be a provision of legislation. The substantial growth of legislative provisions affecting all aspects of the society in which contracts are made presents a legal environment quite different from that in which the doctrine of illegality was originally expressed (Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 611). Courts, in this area, are faced with a dilemma. They do not wish to deprive a person of property rights, eg under a contract, least of all at the behest of another person who was also involved in a breach of the applicable law. On the other hand, they do not wish to "condone or assist a breach of statute, nor must they help to frustrate the operation of a statute" (Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 611). That is why the first function of the court, where a breach of a legislative provision is alleged, is to examine the legislation so as to derive from it a conclusion as to whether a relevant breach is established and, if so, what consequences flow either from the express provisions of the legislation or from implications that may be imputed to the legislators (cf Attorney-General (NSW); Ex rel Franklins Stores Pty Ltd v Lizelle Pty Ltd [1977] 2 NSWLR 955 at 964-965). Little, if any, assistance will be derived for the ultimate task of a court from examination of the terms of other statutes or judicial classifications of them or by reference to their meaning as found (Tasker v Fullwood [1978] 1 NSWLR 20 at 23).
2. Occasionally, the legislation in question will expressly provide for the consequence of illegality upon contracts made or performed in breach of its terms. In such a case the entire contract may, depending on the terms of the statute, be void and its performance unlawful as contrary to the express will of Parliament (Anderson Ltd v Daniel [1924] I KB 138 at 149). The duty of a court in such a case is clear. No question of the good faith of the parties or their knowledge or intention is involved (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 283; Colton v Central District Finance Corporation Ltd [1965] NZLR 992 at 996). Public policy is not, as such, raised, unless it be the general public policy that the courts [243] should uphold the law of the land (cf Vita Food Products Inc v Unus Shipping Co Ltd [1939] 1 AC 277 at 292-293). What is presented is a pure question of the interpretation and enforcement of the legislation. This is a familiar task performed by courts with the usual tools of statutory construction.
3. Ordinarily, legislation does not expressly deal with the consequences of conduct in breach of its terms upon a contract which has been fulfilled in some way in breach of a provision of the law. In such a case, where the law in question is (as it typically is) a statutory provision, it is necessary to ask whether the legislation impliedly prohibits such conduct and renders it illegal. Some judges have suggested that courts today are less willing than in the past to derive an implication of illegality from a legislative provision where Parliament has held back from expressly enacting it (Ross v Ratcliff (1988) 91 FLR 66 at 67-68; cf Compass Building Society v Cervara Fifty-Seven Pty Ltd [1992] 1 VR 48 at 54-55). Certainly, there are plenty of judicial dicta to suggest that courts will be slow to imply, where the applicable legislation is silent, a prohibition which interferes with the rights and remedies given to parties by the ordinary law of contract (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 288; John S Chappel Pty Ltd v D K Pett Pty Ltd [1971] 1 SASR 188 at 197; cf Brownbill v Kenworth Truck Sales (NSW) Pty Ltd (1982) 59 FLR 56; 39 ALR 191). This reluctance probably grows out of a recognition of the multitude of legislative provisions, important and unimportant, which may nowadays indirectly impinge upon the contractual relations of parties and, if enforced with full rigour, cause harsh and unwarranted deprivation of rights (See discussion Rose, "Confining Illegality" (1996) 112 Law Quarterly Review 545). In part, this reluctance may be no more than a species of the general rule of statutory construction that legislation will not be interpreted to deprive parties of basic rights at common law without a clear expression of the legislative will to do so (Potter v Minahan (1908) 7 CLR 277 at 304; Bropho v Western Australia (1990) 171 CLR I at 18; Coco v The Queen (1994) 179 CLR 427 at 436). Some academic commentators have discerned in earlier cases a "misplaced judicial zeal" in deriving from the sparse language of legislation a purpose to strike at private contractual arrangements (Greig and Davis, The Law of Contract (1987), p 1117, commenting on In re Mahmoud and Ispahani [1921] 2 KB 716). They criticise the reliance on fictions of "legislative intention" where the legislation in question makes no express provision with respect to contracts (Greig and Davis, The Law of Contract (1987), P 1118; see also pp 1120-1123). They suggest that implied illegality of contracts should be abandoned, obliging Parliament (if that be its purpose) to make express provision in that regard. But this approach would be contrary to long-established doctrine and to the commonplace that legislation, typically expressed in brief language, may contain implications which are to be derived from its [244] express terms. The duty of courts remains, where legislation is involved, to give meaning to the imputed purpose of Parliament as found in the words used (Re Bolton; Ex parte Beane (1987) 162 CLR 514 at 518). It would be artificial to expel implications from the task of legislative construction where they remain an established feature of the interpretation and application of legislation generally.

4. One principle, however, which tends to reinforce the reluctance of courts to imply a prohibition on a contract, the formation or performance of which involves some breach of the law, is the conclusion which will often be derived from the express terms of the legislation itself. Thus, if the legislation provides in a detailed way for sanctions and remedies for breach of its terms, courts will require good reason to add to those express provisions additional civil penalties, such as the deprivation of contractual rights, which Parliament has not chosen to enact. Were it otherwise, the parties would be subject to the penalties (in the present case criminal) expressly provided by the legislation and still more (civil) by the deprivation of their property (contractual) rights (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 429; see also Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410 at 428). In a given case, such lost rights might be enormous, supplementing in a wholly arbitrary way, the defined penalties for which the legislature has expressly provided.

5. A distinction may be drawn between cases where there is nothing illegal in the formation of the contract or necessarily illegal in its performance and those cases where (as here) the performance has in fact involved a breach of the law. The case of a contract which, although lawful according to its own terms, may be performed in a manner which the statute prohibits, was one of the four categories suggested by Gibbs A-CJ in Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd to illustrate the ways in which the enforceability of a contract may be affected by a statutory provision rendering particular conduct unlawful (Yango Pastoral Co (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 413). The distinction of illegality in performance was also recognised in the opinions of Mason J (at 426-427) and Jacobs J (at 433) in the same case. It is a distinction well established in legal doctrine (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 288-290). In such a case, it is not the contract as formed which is illegal. But the performance of the contract may be illegal if it is clear that the law in question prescribes that the contract must be performed in > one way and one way only and that requirement has been breached. To ascertain whether such a breach has occurred it has been said that the illegality must affect the very core or essence of the [245] contract (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 288). The fact that a statute was passed for the protection of the public is one test of whether it was intended to avoid a contract formed, or to be performed, in breach of its provisions. However, that is not the only test because the effect of the legislation is to be derived from its language in the ordinary way (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 287; Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 414).

The construction point – conclusions

[41.65] Angel J [dissenting judge at the Court of Appeal] was correct to identify a secondary question of public policy, affecting the enforcement by a court of the contract in question here. In this respect, as I shall develop, I agree with his Honour's approach in proceeding to the issue of public policy which the other members of the Supreme Court appear to have viewed as involved, in some way, in the ascertainment of the meaning of the Act. Nevertheless, Angel J erred, with respect, in considering that the issue of public policy arose for determination in deciding whether the Act prohibited the contract as performed. It is important to keep the interpretation and public policy questions separate. Logically, the interpretation question arises first. This is because if, as a matter of interpretation, the contract is illegal as formed, or as performed, it is void as to those parts affected by the illegality. The secondary question of unenforceability for public policy reasons does not then arise. The contract is unenforceable but that is because it is void in law.

The questions therefore to be asked are whether the Act invoked to taint the contract with illegality expressly prohibits the contract as formed or because of the way it was performed? If not, the subordinate question is whether the Act, by necessary inference, prohibits the contract as formed or because of the way it was performed? These are the construction questions. Only if the answers to those questions are in the negative does the further question arise whether, as a matter of public policy, the Court will allow the plaintiff to invoke its process to enforce the contract (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 427-428). Even if, as here, it is accepted that there was nothing illegal in the contract as formed, it remains for a court to consider whether, as performed, the contract is so in breach of a legislative provision as, by implication, to attract the operation of the Act, rendering the contract as performed to that extent unlawful and therefore void. Obviously, the issues posed by this question overlap with those relevant to the resolution of the question whether the contract is unenforceable on public policy grounds. But the two questions are not the same. Part of the confusion which has attended many of the authorities in these cases derives from a failure to make clear the distinction between the two issues.

[246] The appellant contended that the core or essence of the contract in this case was the performance of the drilling of bores for ground water. Here, so it was argued, the essence of the statutory provision was drilling without a permit. That was precisely what had occurred. Accordingly, so it was submitted for the appellant, the contract as performed was illegal, being in breach of s 56(1) of the Act. To that extent the case was distinguishable from the circumstances in Yango (1978) 139 CLR 410 where the statutory prohibition had been directed at the carrying on of banking business, not specifically the taking of mortgages or guarantees.

I do not read the Act as having that operation. There is no express provision in it relating to contracts. The Act, in terms, imposes a range of penalties for breaches of its provisions. Specific criminal penalties are imposed for breach of s 56(1). But those penalties, and the scheme of the Act, appear to exhaust the legislative purpose to uphold the requirements of obtaining pre-drilling authority. The necessity to add a sanction depriving parties of their contractual rights otherwise existing by law is not at all clear. This is not a case where it is essential to imply such a consequence into the Act in order to avoid frustration of its operation or the appearance of a court's condonation or assistance to a party in achieving a breach of statute (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 429; Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 611). Here, as the facts found show, both parties were innocent of any deliberate breach of the Act. The duty to secure the requisite permits lay upon the appellant. The permits obtained conformed to the then (erroneous) understanding of the requirements of the Act. This was that only bore construction permits were required, that they could be issued retrospectively and that they were necessary only for successful bores drilled, not for "duds".

In these circumstances the proper classification of the illegality in question was that it was incidentally committed in the course of the performance of the contract (Shaw v Groom [1970] 2 QB 504 at 521-522). It was neither the express purpose of the legislature nor the implied effect of the Act that such an incidental violation as occurred here should deprive the respondent of all remedies under its contract with the appellant. If, as has been decided, there was a breach of s 56(1) by the respondent, it was one sounding in a penalty under that provision, and possibly action upon its drilling licence (eg, ss 50, 51). The additional sanction urged by the appellant ought not to be implied into the Act. The appellant therefore fails on the construction point.

The public policy point – applicable principles

[41.67] [247] This leaves the separate question of whether, as a matter of public policy, a court should refuse a person in the position of the respondent the aid of its process so as to enforce a contract in circumstances where, as performed, illegality has been demonstrated. The rule permitting a court to refuse its assistance to enforce a contract where to do so would be contrary to public policy is an ancient one. It was given expression by Lord Mansfield in Holman v Johnson (1775) 1 Cowp 341 at 343 in these terms:

> The principle of public policy is this … No Court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or an illegal act.

Sometimes the principle is expressed as involving the refusal of a court to enforce a contract where the party seeking such enforcement is obliged to disclose an unlawful consideration in making out the claim (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 291-292). Sometimes it is expressed in the language that courts will not enforce "rights directly resulting to the person asserting them from the crime of that person" (Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 QB 147 at 156; cf Beresford v Royal Insurance Co [1938] AC 586 at 596-597; St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 292-293). But behind the notion is something quite different from the foundation upon which the statutory construction objection rests. There, a court is simply giving effect to the expressed or imputed will of Parliament. When it comes to public policy, the court may inform itself by reference to what Parliament has declared to be illegal. However the fundamental rationale for withholding relief is one essentially of the court's self-regard. It will not (unless required to) lend its authority and assistance to a party seeking to invoke its process in connection with illegal or otherwise seriously reprehensible conduct. This was the "question" which remained in Yango, after the statutory construction point in that case was disposed of favourably to the enforcement of the contract (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 427; cf Scott v Brown, Doering McNab & Co [1892] 2 QB 724 at 728, cited by Windeyer J in Smith v Jenkins (1970) 119 CLR 397 at 412). Mason J explained the question thus Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 427, 429-430):

> The question therefore remains whether the court will allow the plaintiff to enforce the contract. The suggestion is that the court will not do so and that its refusal so to do is dictated by the principle ex turpi causa non oritur actio or by the more specific rule that the [248] court will not enforce the contract at the suit of a party who has entered into a contract with the object of committing an illegal act.
>
> In saying this I am mindful that there could be a case where the facts disclose that the plaintiff stands to gain by enforcement of rights gained through an illegal activity far more than the prescribed penalty. This circumstance might provide a sufficient foundation for attributing a different intention to the legislature. It may be that the true basis of the principle > is that the court will refuse to enforce a transaction with a fraudulent or immoral purpose (Beresford v Royal Insurance Co Ltd [1937] 2 KB 197 at 220). On this basis the common law principle of ex turpi causa can be given an operation consistent with, though subordinate to, the statutory intention, denying relief in those cases where a plaintiff may otherwise evade the real consequences of a breach of a statutory prohibition.

Even more explicitly, Jacobs J (at 443), drawing upon earlier authority (Archbolds (Freightage) Ltd v S Spanglell Ltd [1961] 1 QB 374) asked:

> [W]hether, if the contract was neither expressly or impliedly forbidden, nevertheless on grounds of public policy the courts would not enforce it if it could only be performed in contravention of a statute or was intended to be performed illegally or for an illegal purpose.

Now, it was said long ago, and has been repeated often since, that public policy "is a very unruly horse" (Richardson v Mellish (1824) 2 Bing 229 at 252). Whereas it affords a measure of discretion to the courts to lend, or deny, their authority according to notions of the propriety, or otherwise, of enforcing a contract said to be affected by illegality or reprehensibility, the principle is scarcely conducive to certainty and consistency. Clearly, these are desirable objectives so far as the law of contract is concerned. Although some older authority suggests the classification of cases of public policy in closed categories to which courts will always deny relief, more recent decisions support a principle of greater flexibility. Thus, it has been said that public policy is not to be viewed as a "blunt, inflexible instrument" (Saunders v Edwards [1987] I WLR 1116 , 1132; discussed Starke, Seddon and Ellinghaus, Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract, 6th Aust ed (1992), p 456, fn 78; Stowe, "The 'Unruly Horse' has Bolted: Tinsley v Milligan" (1994) 57 Modern Law Review 441, 443). Nor is the concept static (Gray v Barr [1971] 2 QB 554 at 582; discussed Stowe, "The 'Unruly Horse' has Bolted: Tinsley v Milligan" (1994) 57 Modern Law Review 441, 444). The decision of this Court in Yango rejects the proposition [249] that any prohibited conduct, involved directly or indirectly in the performance of a contract sued upon, denies to the parties the facility of the process of the courts (See Enonchong, "Title Claims and Illegal Transactions" (1995) 111 Law Quarterly Review 135). Whatever may be the position in England following the decision of the House of Lords in Tinsley v Milligan, in Australia it must be accepted, from decisions of this Court (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410; Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538), that the rule against enforcement is not inflexible.

Clearly it should not be so. It would be absurd if a trivial breach of a statutory provision constituting illegality, connected in some way with a contract or contracting parties, could be held to justify the total withdrawal of the facilities of the courts (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 280-281, 288-289, per Devlin J: "It may be questionable … whether public policy is well served by driving from the seat of judgment everyone who has been guilty of a minor transgression"). It would be doubly absurd if the courts closed their doors to a party seeking to enforce its contractual rights without having regard to the degree of that party's transgression, the deliberateness or otherwise of its breach of the law and its state of mind generally relevant to the illegality. Similarly, it would be absurd if a court were permitted, or required, to consider the refusal of relief without careful regard to the relationship between the prohibited conduct and the impugned contract. Thus, different considerations may exist where the contractual rights being enforced arise directly from the illegality, as distinct from those which arise only incidentally or peripherally (St John Shipping Corporation v Joseph Rank Ltd [1957] 1 QB 267 at 284, 289-290, 292-293). It is one thing for courts to respond with understandable disfavour and reluctance to attempts to involve them and their processes in an inappropriate and unseemly way effectively in the advancement of illegality and wrong-doing. It is another to invoke a broad rule of so-called "public policy" which slams the doors of the court in the face of a person whose illegality may be minor, technical, innocent, lacking in seriousness and wholly incidental or peripheral to a contract which that person is seeking to enforce.

Considerations such as these led McHugh J in Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 to explore the ways in which a broad judicial discretion to withhold relief, the grant of which would affront

"the public conscience", could be given greater certainty of content. His Honour suggested that such a sanction would have to be proportionate to the seriousness of the illegality involved and not disproportionate to the seriousness of the breach (at 612-613). It would have to further the purpose of [250] the statute and not impose a sanction for unlawful conduct beyond that which Parliament has expressly condoned (at 613). McHugh J proposed the following general propositions (at 613):

> [C]ourts should not refuse to enforce legal or equitable rights simply because they arose out of or were associated with an unlawful purpose unless: (a) the statute discloses an intention that those rights should be unenforceable in all circumstances; or (b)(i) the sanction of refusing to enforce those rights is not disproportionate to the seriousness of the unlawful conduct; (ii) the imposition of the sanction is necessary, having regard to the terms of the statute, to protect its objects or policies; and (iii) the statute does not disclose an intention that the sanctions and remedies contained in the statute are to be the only legal consequences of a breach of the statute or the frustration of its policies.

Although these remarks may have been obiter, they resonate with similar suggestions in the opinion of Toohey J (at 596-597) who recognised that (at 597):

> Although the public policy in discouraging unlawful acts and refusing them judicial approval is important, it is not the only relevant policy consideration. There is also the consideration of preventing injustice and the enrichment of one party at the expense of the other.

The public policy point – conclusions

[41.68] For the appellant, the application of public policy to the circumstances of this case was as simple as determining the implications of the true construction of the Act. Indeed, one was but the mirror image of the other. The Act established a regime for prior authorisation for the drilling of bores for ground water. It did so for a vital purpose protective of the public interest. In doing so it made illegal the drilling of bores without a prior requisite permit. Unless the courts were effectively to ignore the prohibition on unauthorised drilling (or to confine the sanction solely to the criminal one expressly provided) the public policy was sufficiently declared in the Act. The only way to uphold it effectively was to deny recovery under a contract to a person in the position of the respondent. This could be done conscientiously because the respondent was deemed to know the law. As a licensed driller it had more reason to do so than most. The purpose of Parliament was important, and recognised as such. Upholding it, with this added sanction, would further the attainment of [251] that purpose. It would more effectively sanction the circumvention of the Act than the remote prospect of an occasional criminal prosecution. That was most unlikely in this case because of the mistaken understanding of the Act by the relevant public authority upon which the parties had relied. Even if, on its proper construction, the Act did not render illegal the contract as performed, the appellant urged that the Court retained a residual power to withhold enforcement. It should do so in this case because to afford enforcement would involve courts in the upholding of rights which rested upon a clear breach of the Act.

I trust that putting the matter in this way, I have demonstrated that the arguments of the appellant are not without some force. It is necessary to appreciate fully the importance of the objects of the Act to realise the strength of the appellant's argument that the courts should not, either directly or indirectly, condone conduct performed in breach of the Act's provisions lest by doing so they become involved in, and tainted by, the illegality.

For a number of reasons I have concluded that this is not a case where it would be appropriate to treat the contract between the parties as unenforceable on public policy grounds.

If the criteria mentioned by McHugh J in Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 are applied, it has already been held that the Act did not disclose an intention that the respondent's rights should be unenforceable in all circumstances. To refuse to enforce those rights would be disproportionate to the seriousness of the unlawful conduct in question. This is, in part, because the duty to obtain the necessary permit rested on the appellant. According to the then administration of the Act, both the appellant and the respondent (and the authorities) thought they had done all that was required. It would be disproportionate to the respondent's unlawful conduct to deprive it almost entirely of recovery under the contract, although there was nothing illegal in the contract itself and the performance by the respondent would have been lawful if the appellant had secured the requisite permits. Against the background of the mistaken understanding about the meaning and operation of the Act, the imposition of such a sanction is not necessary to protect the objects or policies of the Act. Other sanctions exist to uphold those ends. The Act being silent on contracts, it is a preferable construction of its terms that, at least in circumstances such as the present, the parties should be able to enforce their legal rights in courts of law and should not be deprived of those rights under the rubric of unenforceability for public policy reasons any more than on the basis of the application to the contract of the suggested construction of the Act.

The position would be quite different if what had been involved had been a specific agreement between the parties deliberately to breach the Act (eg by the use of unlicensed and neglectful drillers or the [252] deliberate refusal to obtain any permit) or to perform the contract in a way clearly damaging to the scarce resource of ground water in the Territory. In such a case, even if the Act did not expressly or impliedly render the contract illegal and void, whether as formed or performed, there would be a strong argument to support the proposition that, on public policy grounds, the Court might refuse relief. To grant relief, in such circumstances, could affront the "public conscience" (Tinsley v Milligan [1992] 1 Ch 310 at 319-320, per Nicholls LJ; cf Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 596, per Toohey J; at 612, per McHugh J). In such a case, to involve a court in the enforcement of the rights of the parties could be to involve it in upholding a seriously anti-social act which was illegal or at least gravely reprehensible.

But that is not this case. On the contrary, were the Court to withhold relief to the respondent, it would result in a windfall gain to the appellant which was unmerited and itself would be an affront to the public conscience. The appellant, a property developer, would have gained three successful water bores for a pittance. The respondent would have been denied recovery precisely on the basis of the failure of the appellant (whose duty it was) to obtain in advance the requisite permits. I do not accept that the rule of public policy, invoked by the appellant, is as inflexible and harsh as to produce such an offensive result (Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 428). The appellant therefore fails on the public policy point …

CONTRACTS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE

[41.70] The common law has always taken a stern attitude towards contracts which impose restrictions on a person's freedom to work or to carry on trade or business in such place and in such manner as he or she sees fit. Up until the beginning of the 17th century, all such restrictions were treated as being void. It was one of the earliest applications of the doctrine of public policy to curb contractual freedom. The attitude of the common law was not primarily based on any notion of fairness. It was based rather on the desirability of encouraging the growth of commerce and thus the strength and wealth of the nation. Privately arranged restraints on economic freedom were regarded as contrary to the public interest.

The present law is fairly easy to state at a general level of abstraction. All covenants in restraint are prima facie void and unenforceable by legal action. They may, however, be held to be valid by a decision of a court that in all the circumstances the particular covenant is reasonable both in the interests of the parties and in the interests of the public or of the community in general.

The burden of establishing that the restraint of trade clause is reasonable as between the parties is on the promisee (the covenantee), that is, the party who receives the benefit of the restraint. If the promisee's burden is discharged, the burden of establishing that the clause is contrary to the public interest is on the promisor (or covenantor), that is, the party who agreed to be restrained.

In determining this question of reasonableness, the courts have found it useful to distinguish between certain generally recurrent types of covenants in restraint of trade. The types of restrictions which are dealt with in this chapter are those that operate between employer and employee (Lindner v Murdock's Garage (1950) 83 CLR 628, extracted at [41.75]), and vendor and purchaser of a business (Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & Ammunition Co Ltd [1894] AC 535, extracted at [41.95]). These are commonly encountered contracts where restraints of one kind or another are imposed and in each case the courts have to decide whether the restriction is reasonable in that it does not impose undue constraints in relation to area, time or subject matter. But there are other categories. As Buckley J said in Petrofina (Gt Britain) Ltd v Martin [1966] Ch 146, 169: "The categories of restraint of trade are not closed. As methods of trading change, so do the areas of restraint. The law, if it is to fulfil its purposes, must keep pace with them."

Employment contracts

Lindner v Murdock's Garage

[41.75] Lindner v Murdock's Garage (1950) 83 CLR 628 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia.

[FACTS: On 10 August 1946, Lindner (the appellant) and Murdock's Garage (the respondents) entered into a written agreement for the employment of the appellant by the respondents. The respondents were carrying on business at Crystal Brook and Wirrabara, two towns in South Australia about 30 miles apart. The agreement described the appellant as a workman and the respondents as motor and general engineers. It did not state in what capacity or at which place the appellant was to be employed. In a schedule, it provided that: "this agreement shall apply to the sales territory for motor cars, trucks and tractors etc of Murdock's Garage; Crystal Brook and Wirrabara."

The territory consisted of two defined areas, one surrounding Crystal Brook and the other surrounding Wirrabara. The two areas were quite separate, their nearest points being not less than ten miles apart. The employment was not for a fixed period but was made determinable by either party on giving 21 days' notice or paying or forfeiting 21 days' wages in lieu of notice. The appellant was employed as a leading hand in the workshop at Crystal Brook from August 1946 until 4th February 1950, when he left the respondents' employ. A few weeks later, he obtained employment at another firm carrying on a business similar to that of the respondents and situated at Crystal Brook some two or three hundred yards from the premises of the respondents. During his employment with the respondents, the appellant had been employed only at Crystal Brook, never at Wirrabara. He had come into contact with a large number of his employers' clients.

The agreement contained a provision which was in the following terms:

> The workman will not during his employment or within one year from the termination thereof in any way carry on or be engaged concerned or interested either personally or as a partner or as a servant or employee of any other person or company in the business of garage proprietors, motor and general engineers, agents for the distribution of or dealers > in motor accessories or in any other similar business now and hereafter carried on by the employers within the same area.

The respondents brought an action against the appellant in which they claimed an injunction to prevent the appellant from engaging as principal or employee in any business similar to their business at or within five miles of Crystal Brook. The trial judge, Napier J, upheld the validity of the contract and made an order restraining the appellant for a period of one year from being employed by any person in any business similar to that of the respondents within five miles from the latter's premises in Crystal Brook. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

KITTO J: [653] The question for decision on this appeal is whether the restrictive provision … should be held invalid as being in unlawful restraint of trade. Any contractual restraint of trade is prima facie unlawful and invalid:

> It is not that such restraints must of themselves necessarily operate to the public injury, but that it is against the policy of the common law to enforce them except in cases where there are special circumstances to justify them. The onus of proving such special circumstances must, of course, rest on the party alleging them. When once they are proved, it is a question of law for the decision of the judge whether they do or do not justify the restraint. There is no question of onus one way or another: Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] 1 AC 688 at 706, 707 per Lord Parker of Waddington; Routh v Jones [1947] 1 All ER 758 at 763 per Lord Greene MR.

The validity of the restraint must be decided as at the date of the agreement imposing it:

> The question is not whether experience gained during the service has shown the restriction to have been excessive or insufficient. The question is whether the covenant was a reasonable one for the parties to agree to at the outset of the service on the best estimate which they could then make of the future: Putsman v Taylor [1927] 1 KB 637 at 643.

The work for which in fact the appellant was employed was variously described in the evidence as that of a mechanic, a mechanic in charge, a working foreman or a working head mechanic. His work might naturally be expected to bring him constantly into close touch with the respondents' customers who came to the place where he would be working from time to time, but it could not be expected to give him any association with or knowledge of the customers who attended only a place of business where he was not working.

In these circumstances it is necessary to consider what it was for which, and what it was against which, the respondents needed [654] protection: Herbert Morris v Saxelby at 708. The answer is that they needed protection for their business connection against the possibility of its being affected by the personal knowledge of and influence over the customers which the appellant might acquire in their employment: at 709. (I put on one side the preservation of trade secrets because on the evidence I do not think that there were any trade secrets that required protection.) To adapt the words of Lord Birkenhead in Fitch v Dewes [1921] 2 AC 158 at 164, the respondents might claim for their protection that that business which was theirs, and to which they were admitting the appellant in the manner defined in the agreement, should continue to be theirs, and that if at any time the contract of employment between themselves and the appellant should come to an end, on such determination the latter should not be in a position to use "the intimacies and the knowledge" which he had acquired in the course of his employment in order to create or assist a competing business in the same area and by doing so undermine the business connection of the respondents. The knowledge referred to does not include the technical knowledge and skill which the appellant might acquire in the employment (Sir WC Leng & Co Ltd v Andrews [1909] 1 Ch 763 at 773; Mason v Provident Clothing & Supply Co [1913] AC 724 at 740; Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] 1 AC 688 at 705, 710, 711) for an employer cannot validly preclude his employee from competition per se, that is competition apart from the divulging or use of trade secrets and enticing away of old customers by solicitation or such other means: per Lord Atkinson in Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby. The knowledge which, because its use may deprive the employer of the business connection which he is entitled to preserve as his own, he may require his employee to abstain from using, is objective knowledge of customers, their peculiarities, their credit and so forth: [1916] 1 AC 688 at 714; compare Routh v Jones. Against the prejudice likely to result from such "intimacies and knowledge" the respondents were entitled to protect their business by means of a contractual restraint of a width reasonable in reference to the interests of both parties: Attorney-General of the Commonwealth of Australia v Adelaide Steamship Co Ltd [1913] AC 781 at 795; Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby at 716. But to be valid, such a restraint "must afford no more than adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed": Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby at 707; Mason v Provident Clothing and Supply Co at 733, 742.

[655] The provisions of the restrictive agreement which the respondents seek to enforce are not directed against the solicitation by the appellant of their customers with whom the appellant dealt while in their employment; other provisions of the agreement cover that and no breach of them is alleged to have been committed or to be feared. The provisions now in question are directed against what Lord Atkinson called enticing away old customers by "such other means", an expression which may, I think, be explained in the language of the Full Court of Victoria in Woodmason's Melrose Dairy Pty Ltd v Kimpton [1924] VLR 475 at 480, 481:

> There are many methods of enticing away customers beside the method of direct solicitation impossible of detection, and only known by results. But, apart altogether from any conscious exercise by the former employee of such knowledge and influence as he may have acquired in his former employment, the employer is entitled to protect himself against loss which may otherwise arise from the mere existence of a personal relation between his customers and his former servant. That relation, when resulting from the employment, is an advantage accruing to the employer and properly exercisable for his benefit so long as the service continues. The same relation would become a source of injury to the employer if the former servant were permitted to accept the custom which might voluntarily flow to him upon his opening an opposition business in the old locality. This danger is quite reasonably met, in our opinion, by a provision against serving the old customers for a limited period. The same reasoning is, we think, fully recognised by the common acceptation of a covenant against carrying on a rival business at all in a given locality. Such a covenant has been repeatedly held to be reasonable, though it obviously has nothing to do with solicitation.

But in order that a restraint may be made reasonable in reference to the interests of the parties by means of a geographical limitation, the limitation must, I think, be such as will fairly approximate to a limitation expressed by reference to the employer's customers of whom the employee is likely to acquire special knowledge or with whom the employee is likely to be brought into a personal relation while in the employment: compare Coote v Sproule (1929) 29 SR (NSW) 578 at 580; 46 WN 180 at 181; Empire Meat Co Ltd v Patrick [1939] 2 All ER 85. In Brightman v Lamson Paragon Ltd (1913) 18 CLR 331 at 335 Rich J said: "No restraint is excessive unless the area exceeds that fairly covered by the business of the covenantee at the date of the agreement or which might at that date reasonably be expected [656] to be covered by such business on the expiration of the agreement." No doubt this proposition is accurate as applied to cases such as that with which his Honour was dealing, where the employment is to be co-extensive with the area of the employer's business, and the employee may be expected to form personal relationships with customers in all parts of that area; but it should not, I think, be accepted as accurate in relation to cases where the employer carries on business in several areas, and the employment may be confined to one or some only of the areas and is of such a character that the employee while working in one area is unlikely to be brought into any significant degree of contact with customers in the others. In such a case a restraint upon the employee's becoming connected with a rival business after he leaves the employment will give the employer's business reasonable protection against the effects of the intimacies and knowledge to which Lord Birkenhead referred, if it is limited to the area or areas in which the employee in fact works within a reasonable time before the termination of his employment; and a restraint which applies indiscriminately to all the areas in which the employer carries on business will exceed what is reasonably necessary to prevent the injury to his business against which he is justified in guarding.

The criticism to which I think, with all respect, that Rich J's proposition is open is that while it recognises the limits of the subject of legitimate protection, it fails to take into account the limits of the danger against which protection is needed. In Mason's case [1913] AC 731 at 732, Viscount Haldane said:

> Had (the employers) been content with asking (the employee, a canvasser) to bind himself not to canvass within the area where he had actually assisted in building up the good will of their business, or in an area restricted to places where the knowledge which he had acquired in his employment could obviously have been used to their prejudice, they might have secured a right to restrain him within these limits. Lord Shaw of Dunfermline said in the same case (at 741): "A very reasonable restriction of a canvasser in such circumstances as are here disclosed might no doubt have been that he should not canvass his old customers or in the limited locality of his former labour."

Lord Moulton said (at 743):

> A small district in London was assigned to him, which he canvassed and in which he collected the payment due, and outside that small district he had no duties. His employment was therefore, that of a local canvasser and debt collector, and nothing more. Such being the nature of the employ-[657]ment, it would be reasonable for the employer to protect himself against the danger of his former servant canvassing or collecting for a rival firm in the district in which he had been employed. If he were permitted to do so before the expiry of a reasonably long interval he would be in a position to give to his new employer all the advantages of that personal knowledge of the inhabitants of the locality, and more especially of his former customers, which he had acquired in the service of the respondents and at their expense. Against such a contingency the master might reasonably protect himself, but I can see no further or other protection which he could reasonably demand.

Mason's case (at 724) had not been long decided at the time of Brightman's case (1913) 18 CLR 331, and the difference between a vendor and purchaser case and a master and servant case in relation to restraint of trade had yet to receive the emphasis which Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] 1 AC 688, was to give it. Since the latter decision it is not possible, I think, to uphold a restraint upon an employee in respect of engaging in a rival business if the restraint extends beyond the area to which the customers belong with whom the employee is likely to be brought into touch during the employment. In that case the employers had a business ramified over the United Kingdom, but a restraint of similar geographical extent was held invalid. Lord Parker of Waddington said:

> Had the restraint been confined to (the two places where the employee in fact worked) and a reasonable area round each of these centres, it might possibly have been supported as reasonably necessary to protect the plaintiff's connection, but a restraint extending over the United Kingdom was obviously too wide in this respect: [1916] 1 AC 711.

The case of Stephens v Kuhnelle (1926) 26 SR (NSW) 327 at 328; 43 WN 67 at 67, may be referred to in this connection. That case had to do with a covenant restraining a breadcarter from serving any person within a defined area who was during the employment a customer of the employer. After referring to certain decisions of the Court of Appeal given before the law on the subject had been laid down by the House of Lords in Mason v Provident Clothing & Supply Co (at 724), and Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby (at 688), Harvey CJ in Equity said:

> The question, however, which I have to decide now, in view of the later decisions, is whether this agreement is more widely couched than is necessary for the protection of the employer against the knowledge which was acquired by the employee of his customers and of his master's trade while [658] employed by him. In my opinion, the agreement breaks down at > the point where it restrains the employee from serving or causing to be served with bread or interfering with any customers of his employer who were customers during his employment. It may be that in some businesses and trades such an agreement would be proper where the knowledge of the employee did involve a knowledge of all his master's customers, or where he might possibly have had personal relations with all customers, such as in the case of some retail businesses; but in this case the evidence states, and it is uncontradicted, that each breadcarter knows only the customers on his own run, and has no knowledge of the other customers and no dealings with them. There therefore can be no necessity to protect the employer against the employee soliciting or dealing with customers whom such employee is not serving.

In the present case the evidence did not establish that the appellant, if working at Crystal Brook or at Wirrabara, would not be brought into touch with customers from the area surrounding the other of those towns; but the onus lay upon the respondents to prove facts in the light of which it was reasonable for the parties, when framing the restrictive clause of the agreement, to expect that the appellant, if working in one area, would be likely to come into contact with customers of the respondents' business in the other area, and no such evidence was given. The probabilities, I should have thought, were all against such an expectation; in the ordinary course of events, persons whose vehicles require mechanical attention would be likely to take them to the nearer of the two towns. It is true that in evidence one of the respondents said, when describing what in fact occurred, that to a certain degree the appellant, who worked only at Crystal Brook, would know of the customers at Wirrabara, adding that at times they would come to Crystal Brook; but there was no evidence that this occurred to any substantial extent, or that it could be expected at the date of the agreement to occur to any substantial extent.

It is said that the restrictive clause should be regarded as combining two severable restrictions, one in respect of the Crystal Brook area and the other in respect of the Wirrabara area. But even if the clause had been confined to one of those areas, its validity would have had to be decided in the light of the fact that at the date of the agreement it was not known whether the appellant would be working in that area during such a period preceding the termination of his employment that his knowledge of any relation with customers in that area might, in the absence of a restraint, cause injury to the respondents' business. The service agreement [659] did not specify where the appellant was to be employed. It was quite consistent with the agreement that he might be employed at Wirrabara, for instance, either during the whole term of his employment or during so long a period before its termination that any acquaintance he may have had with customers of the Crystal Brook business would be too remote in time to warrant any restriction in relation to the Crystal Brook area. In my opinion, therefore, severance of the restrictive clause of the agreement does not save it. In order to be valid it should, I think, have been so limited in respect of each area as not to operate therein unless the appellant should be employed by the respondents in their business in that area within some specified reasonable period preceding the termination of his service. Not being so limited, the clause, even if free from objection in any other respect, appears to me to exceed what was reasonably required in order to obviate the danger from which the respondents were entitled to obtain protection. Accordingly, I am of opinion that the restrictive clause should be held invalid as being in unlawful restraint of trade. I would allow the appeal, discharge the order of the Supreme Court and dismiss the action.

[41.80] McTIERNAN J: [641] At the time this agreement was made it was notorious that there was a shortage of workmen with mechanical skill and knowledge and there was a shortage of homes for workmen. The defendant and his wife and children lived at Crystal Brook. They moved there shortly after he entered into the plaintiff firm's service. He entered into its employment in consequence of replying to an advertisement issued by the plaintiff firm. The defendant then lived in another locality. It must have been obvious at the time the plaintiff firm exacted the covenants from him that it would be necessary for him to move from there to Crystal Brook in order to work for the plaintiff.

By reason of the notorious labour shortage and the economic situation it was detrimental to the interests of the public to restrain the defendant from working at his trade for a period of 12 months after the termination of the employment. The defendant was not employed for a fixed term. In view of the shortage of homes, it was not reasonable in reference to the defendant's interests to impose upon him a restraint which, whenever the employment was terminated, would force him to move his home beyond the geographic area of the restraint in order to earn his livelihood at his accustomed trade ….

In Attwood v Lamont [1920] 3 KB 571 at 581, Younger LJ said that the branch of the law with which the court was dealing has at all times been susceptible to influence from current views of public policy. There has been no development of public policy in Australia since that case which would incline the court to regard with less jealousy covenants made by a workman in restraint of his freedom to work at his trade or to engage in employment.

[Webb J delivered a judgment to the same effect as that of Kitto J. Latham CJ and Fullagar J dissented.]

Pearson v HRX Holdings

[41.85] Pearson v HRX Holdings Pty Ltd [2012] FCAFC 111; (2012) 205 FCR 187 (Full Court of the Federal Court).

[FACTS: HRX Holdings brought proceedings seeking an injunction restraining Pearson, a former employee, from him taking up employment with a competitor. HRX Holdings' claim was based on a restraint clause in Pearson's employment contract which purported to restrain Pearson from working in a business similar to or competitive with HRX Holdings or its subsidiaries for a period of two years after the termination of his employment with HRX Holdings. The trial judge found that the restraint was reasonable and granted an injunction. On appeal, Pearson argued that the restraint was not reasonably necessary to protect any legitimate interest of HRX Holdings. Pearson argued that the restraint was too broad as it prevented him from competing with HRX Holdings anywhere in the world for customers who may never have had any contact or dealings with HRX Holdings. Pearson also argued that the protection offered to HRX Holdings by separate non-solicitation and confidentiality clauses contained in the employment contract meant that it could not be said that the restraint was reasonably necessary.]
THE COURT:

Factual background

[10] HRX was founded in January 2005 by Katrina Leslie. The trustee of Ms Leslie's family trust, Cazo Pty Ltd (Cazo), is the major shareholder in HRX. Ms Leslie is the non-executive chair of HRX. Mr Pearson was first employed by HRX in February 2005. Both Ms Leslie and Mr Pearson were active in the establishment and direction of HRX in the human resources business.

[11] Mr Pearson first became involved in human resources in Australia in 1995, working for the firm known as Morgan & Banks. Thereafter, for a good deal of his time in the human resources industry, Mr Pearson worked for businesses associated with Mr Morgan and Mr Banks of that firm. At the present time, Mr Banks is the Chairman and Mr Morgan is a non-executive director of Talent2, a company which was established in 2003. Talent2 competes in Australia directly with HRX both generally and for particular clients and contracts. Mr Morgan and Mr Banks also have controlling interests in businesses in the United States of America. It was Mr Pearson's proposal to take up employment at a senior level with Talent2 that prompted HRX to commence proceedings against Mr Pearson.

[12] The nature and extent of HRX' business are important. HRX offers recruitment process outsourcing and consulting services, human resources outsourcing and recruitment technology to government and private enterprise. It develops techniques, technological systems, facilities and strategies for its clients. Mr Pearson has been an innovator in this area. He was HRX' primary presenter to prospective clients in its endeavour to secure business. The primary judge said at Reasons [6]:

> … He had an intimate knowledge of client relationships, of the techniques and resources used by HRX to sell its services to clients, of the methods by which HRX serviced the contracts which it obtained, and of the strategies with which HRX might attempt to retain a client whose contract was about to expire (generally two to three years after inception).

[13] Mr Pearson accepted that he has been a key component of HRX' success in entering and growing in the small and competitive market in Australia. During Mr Pearson's time at HRX its policy was to follow clients into business opportunities outside Australia and New Zealand. Although HRX had tendered for work in other areas, at the time of Mr Pearson's resignation, its only clients were in Australia and New Zealand.

[14] During Mr Pearson's employment with HRX, he had access to all, or virtually all, of HRX' confidential business information, including the techniques and facilities used by HRX to sell its services and its client retention strategies …

[17] Negotiations towards the execution of Mr Pearson's service agreement began in early August 2005 with a document proffered by Mr Pearson. That document proposed a post-employment restraint upon his carrying on, or having any interest in, a "Restrained Business" for a period of six months. Ms Leslie did not agree with the duration of that restraint. Ms Leslie gave evidence that the need for post-employment restraint upon Mr Pearson involved "one of the biggest risks to the business …". Negotiations ensued over a period of some months.

[18] The terms of the service agreement as finally executed restrain Mr Pearson from accepting employment with, or engaging in a business "similar to or competitive with", HRX for two years after the termination of employment. Importantly, it also provides for his salary to be paid to him by HRX during all but three months of the restraint period. Further, it provides for Mr Pearson to be allocated an eight per cent shareholding in HRX. Mr Pearson acknowledged in cross-examination that he understood that, if he had not agreed to the restraint, he would not have been allocated these shares.

[19] Clause 9 of the service agreement contains obligations concerning confidential information which are expressed to survive the termination of employment. Read with the definition of "Confidential Information", those obligations require Mr Pearson not to disclose information including policies, procedures, contracts, agreements, affairs, ideas, business plans and developments relating to existing or future business opportunities or business practices as well as all other matters relating to the internal or external operations or plans of companies in the HRX group.

[20] The service agreement also contains cl 14.3, a non-solicitation clause, the terms of which we will set out directly below.

[21] Mr Pearson decided to leave HRX on 12 August 2011 as a result – so he told HRX' customers – of his dissatisfaction with management practices. In fact, a week before Mr Pearson resigned from HRX, Talent2 had offered him the position of General Manager – Global Head of Business Development for its Recruitment Management Services which he had accepted.

[22] Mr Pearson gave two months' written notice of his resignation from the employment of HRX on 29 September 2011. Mr Pearson proposed, unless restrained, to work as one of Talent2's senior executives in direct competition to HRX in Australia. It was proposed that Mr Pearson would continue to live in Sydney while working as one of Talent2's most senior executives. He would report and be responsible to the executive of Talent2 who, though based in Hong Kong, directs business in competition with HRX. Thus Mr Pearson would supervise and lead Talent2's employees who compete with HRX in Australia.

The service agreement

[23] Clause 14 of the service agreement contains cl 14.4 which is the restraint the subject of this appeal. It is necessary to set out in full the terms of cl 14:

14.1 Acknowledgment

The Executive acknowledges to the Company that he:

(a) has an intimate interest in the contacts, clients, knowledge and management of the Company's business;

(b) has obtained specific employment legal advice in relation to this agreement, including without limitation the restraints contained in this clause 14;

(c) has and will receive consideration for his obligations under this clause, including the HRX Shares which will be granted to the Executive without cost to him;

(d) would detrimentally affect the Company's legitimate interests by breaching his obligations under this clause; and

(e) pursuant to paragraph (a) believes the restraints contained in this clause 14 are reasonable, in context of the Employment, the industry and the period and geographic nature of the restraints, to protect the goodwill of the Company's business.

14.2 Certain conduct prohibited during the Employment

The Executive must not during the Employment, do any of the following things without first getting the consent of the Board:

(a) business activities: directly or indirectly carry on a Restrained Business, alone or in partnership or joint venture, with anyone else;

(b) no interest: subject to clause 14.6, directly or indirectly be concerned with or interested in a Restrained Business in any capacity, including as principal, agent, partner, joint venturer, shareholder, unit holder, employee, director, trustee, beneficiary, manager, consultant, adviser or financier; or

(c) payment: accept any payment or other benefit in money or in kind from any person as an inducement or reward for any act or forbearance or in connection with any matter or business transacted by or on behalf of the Company.

14.3 Non-solicitation

The Executive must not and must not counsel, procure or otherwise assist any person or entity to do any of the following during the Restraint Period:

(a) customers: solicit or persuade a Customer to stop or reduce its business with the Company or its Related Bodies Corporate;

(b) employment: induce or attempt to induce an employee or contractor of the Company to terminate his or her employment or consulting relationship with the Company;

(c) suppliers: solicit or persuade a supplier to stop or reduce its business with the Company or its Related Bodies Corporate.

14.4 Restraint Period obligations

(a) The Executive must not and must not counsel, procure or otherwise assist any person or entity to do any of the following things during the Restraint Period:

  (i) no competition: directly or indirectly carry on a Restrained Business, alone or in partnership or joint venture with anyone else;

  (ii) no interest: subject to clause 14.6, directly or indirectly be concerned with or interested in a Restrained Business in any capacity including as principal, agent, partner, joint venturer, shareholder, unit holder, employee, director, trustee, beneficiary, manager, consultant, adviser or financier.

(b) In further consideration of the Restraint Period under this sub-clause, the Company will pay the Executive the average monthly Remuneration Package which he received during the two years before the Termination Date or during the Employment if employed for less than 2 years, for each month of the Restraint Period, except the first 3 months of the Restraint which will be unpaid, provided that:

(i) If Pearson leaves voluntarily within 2 years any amounts payable or paid by the Company in respect of the Restraint Period are reduced by any alternative remuneration or income received or receivable by the Executive, including proceeds from any sale of the HRX Shares;

(ii) If Pearson does not voluntarily leave within 2 years then any amounts payable by the Company in respect of the Restraint Period are reduced by any alternative remuneration or income received or receivable by the Executive, including proceeds from any sale of the HRX Shares on the following schedule:

- If proceeds from any sale of HRX shares is less than $500,000 then there is no reduction for the sale of HRX shares
- If the sale of HRX shares is more than $500,000 but less than $1,000,000 then the amount owing under the Restraint will be reduced by 50 per cent
- If the sale of HRX shares is $1,000,000 or more, then clause (i) applies (ie amounts payable are reduced by any alternative remuneration or income received or receivable by the Executive, including proceeds from any sale of the HRX Shares.

(iii) the Executive must immediately refund to the Company any payments made which exceed what the Executive is otherwise entitled to be paid under this sub-clause, whether or not a demand has been made by the Company to do so;

(iv) the Executive must use his best endeavours to obtain alternative employment commensurate with his skills and experience;

(v) the Executive must provide the Company with any information it requests or answer any questions arising from or in connection with his employment, remuneration and income following the Termination Date;

(vi) the Executive must immediately inform the Company if he accepts an offer of employment and provide the Company with particulars of his remuneration in respect of that employment; and

(vii) the Executive is not entitled to any payment in respect of the Restraint Period if the Company waives the Executive's obligations under this clause 14.4. within 14 days post termination.

14.5 Separate undertakings

If any part of an undertaking in clause 14.2 is unenforceable, it may be severed without affecting the enforceability of the rest of that undertaking or the other undertakings.

14.6 Listed securities

Nothing in this clause 14 prevents the Executive or the Executive's nominee holding 5 per cent or less of the issued shares or units of a body corporate or a unit trust listed on a stock exchange.

14.7 Survival

[24] The constraints in clause 14.4 are expressed by reference to the defined term, "Restrained Business" in cl 1 of the service agreement. That definition is as follows:

> "Restrained Business" means a business or operation similar to or competitive with the business of a Group Company, including without limitation a business involved in the outsourcing of recruitment services (often referred to as Onsite or Recruitment Process Outsourcing) or any other HR Outsourcing areas that HRX is operating in at the time of leaving the company.

[25] The term "Restraint Period" is defined in cl 1 of the service agreement to mean "2 years from the Termination Date".

"Customer" means:

(a) a customer or client of the Company or its related bodies corporate who was a:

  (i) customer or client of the Company or its related bodies corporate at any time in the 12 months prior to the termination of the Employment; and

  (ii) person or entity who entered into negotiations with the Company or its related bodies corporate with a view to receiving products or services from the Company at any time in the 6 months prior to the termination of the Employment; and

(b) a prospective customer or client of the Company or its Related Bodies Corporate to whom a Group Company has presented their services or have solicited business from in the 12 months prior to termination of the Employment.

The reasons of the Primary Judge

a. The construction issue

[31] The primary judge held that the words "similar to" and "competitive with" are not entirely disjunctive but are intended to refer to aspects of the same concept. On this view, a restrained business is one which is potentially or actually in competition with HRX' business at the time of termination of employment. The primary judge held that, while this market may not necessarily be confined to Australia, it is sufficiently narrow to exclude the notion of an unlimited global restraint. His Honour reached this conclusion for several reasons.

[32] First, the definition must be read as an aid to construction of the restraint in cl 14.4 of the service agreement. Clause 14 must be read in the overall context of the service agreement having regard to the purpose of cl 14 itself and construed in a way that is consistent with that purpose. The evident purpose of cl 14 is to protect HRX' legitimate interests rather than unnecessarily to restrain the future activities of Mr Pearson after the termination of his employment. Construed in this way, the definition means a business which might pose a real commercial threat to HRX if it had the benefit of Mr Pearson's intimate knowledge.

[33] Secondly, the primary judge held that the definition of "Restrained Business" is self-limiting, in that it was only intended to restrain Mr Pearson in areas of business in which HRX was actually operating at the time the executive left its employ.

[34] Thirdly, not long before the execution of the service agreement, HRX by its agent, Mr Pearson, had agreed to excise the words "similar to" from an otherwise identical version of the same agreement for a prospective executive. The primary judge held that this was a clear indication, as an objective surrounding circumstance, that those words were not seen (or intended) to add materially to the words "competitive with".

b. Reasonableness of the restraint

[35] The extent of the negotiations between the parties was regarded by the primary judge as an indication of the deliberate character of the execution of the service agreement which could be attributed to both parties.

[36] The primary judge held that the restraint in cl 14.4 of the service agreement was reasonable. The restraint was the subject of specific negotiation; it was the subject of separate consideration in the form of payments; it was the only restraint at the time to be accompanied by payment; and it reasonably accommodated the contractual cycle on which HRX operates, its clients typically entering into two to three year contracts. The fact that Mr Pearson was to be paid at least at the level he enjoyed while at HRX for the balance of the restraint period represented a significant amelioration of any financial disadvantage to him; it directly affected the objective assessment of the reasonableness of the restraint.

Consideration

[51] In our respectful opinion, HRX' interest in protecting its customer connections was sufficient to justify HRX' bargaining for protection against the risk that the personal contacts made by Mr Pearson in the course of HRX' business would follow him unbidden to a new employer. That interest went beyond HRX' interest in confidential information and would not sufficiently be protected by the confidentiality provision of the service agreement. And the non-solicitation provision would not have protected HRX from the risk that its customers, knowing of Mr Pearson's move to Talent2, would choose to move their business to Talent2 unbidden by Mr Pearson and without even discussing the move with him. Further, the non-solicitation clause would be engaged only if there were a reduction in HRX' business: if an existing customer took new business to Talent2 upon an invitation from Mr Pearson, that conduct would not be caught by the non-solicitation clause. Finally, the non-solicitation clause might not provide practical protection to HRX if HRX did not become aware of a breach.

[52] It has been recognised that a confidentiality clause may not afford adequate practical protection to an employer's interests in preserving trade secrets. In Woolworths Ltd v Olson [2004] NSWCA 372, a restraint on subsequent employment was held to be justified by the need to protect a valuable trade secret. Mason P (with whom McColl and Bryson JJA relevantly agreed) said at [67]:

> A recognised method of such protection is the procurement of a restraint upon the employee given access to such information taking up employment with a competitor whom he might be willing to provide with such information. A reasonable employment restraint is easier to enforce than a breach of confidence or breach of copyright claim; it removes the temptation for the former employee to offer and for the new employer to solicit confidential information; and it provides certainty of definition as regards the area of confidential information to be protected. These interests have been judicially recognised (see Littlewoods Organisation Ltd v Harris [1977] 1 All ER 1472 at 1479, 1485, Wright at 333, Kone Elevators at 43, 834).

[53] As Dickson J noted in Elsley, the protection afforded by the non-solicitation and confidentiality provisions is unlikely to be perfect given the difficulties of proof of breach. In Lindner v Murdock's Garage (1950) 83 CLR 628, Latham CJ also observed at 636-7 that an employer's interest in customer connections may not be sufficiently protected by a covenant against solicitation and that a covenant against competition may be a more reasonable form of protection as > … a covenant against solicitation … is difficult to enforce; it is difficult to show breach and difficult to frame an injunction. The master is entitled to protect himself by a covenant against competition [637].

[54] It is not in the least fanciful to regard the non-solicitation clause here as an inadequate protection for HRX. In concluding that an injunction to enforce the terms of the restraint was appropriate, the primary judge referred at Reasons [56] to an email sent by Mr Pearson to an existing client of HRX on 12 December 2011. It said relevantly:

> I cannot solicit your business … but I believe you can solicit my services if you know what I mean.

[55] In this Court, Senior Counsel for Mr Pearson made the unedifying submission that the sending of this email was indeed a breach of the non-solicitation clause by his client; yet that HRX was sufficiently protected by its terms because Mr Pearson undertook to abide by them. It is, no doubt, correct that the sending of this email was a breach of the non-solicitation clause; but to acknowledge that now is a cold comfort to HRX. Had this litigation not been commenced by HRX, it might never have known of this communication.

[56] It follows from what we have said that we would reject Mr Pearson's argument that there was no legitimate interest of HRX which might support the restraint in cl 14.4 of the service agreement.

[57] Additionally, it seems to us that HRX' legitimate interests were not confined to the protection of its customer connections as they existed at the time of Mr Pearson's departure from HRX' employment. HRX had a legitimate interest in obtaining the full benefit of its bargain with Mr Pearson while he was employed by it so as to maximise the extent of customer connections made during the term of his employment. A contracting party's interest in obtaining the benefit of its bargain is implicit in any contract: Mackay v Dick (1881) 6 App Cas 251 at 263; Butt v M'Donald (1896) 7 QLJ 68 at 70-71; and Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596 at 606-607.

[58] There are two aspects of HRX' interest in securing the benefit of its bargain which are relevant here. The first is the preservation of the value of the goodwill generated for HRX by Mr Pearson during the term of his employment which we have already discussed. As we have said, that interest would not be adequately protected by the non-solicitation provision if Mr Pearson were subsequently to take up employment with a firm to which HRX' customers might be disposed to bring new business without even discussing the move with him.

[59] The second aspect of HRX' interest in having the benefit of its bargain is its interest in the expansion of its business while Mr Pearson was employed by it. That this was a real interest is confirmed by the shareholding arrangement with Mr Pearson. This arrangement provided him with an incentive to ensure the energetic pursuit by him of all potential customers, wherever they be located, if they could be serviced by HRX. The restraint clause, like this incentive, served the legitimate interest of HRX in the expansion of its business by ensuring that Mr Pearson would not, with an eye on the non-solicitation provision and a lively appreciation of the real possibility of a future for himself in business independent of HRX, "hang back" from the diligent pursuit of all potential customers …

[61] We turn now to consider whether the restraint was a reasonable manner of protection for HRX' interests.

[62] Where a contractual restraint protects a legitimate interest of the covenantee the restraint must afford no more than reasonable protection as between the parties, and in terms of the public interest. In our respectful opinion, in terms of HRX' interests, both in protecting its customer connections and in ensuring the diligent and faithful pursuit by Mr Pearson of business opportunities for HRX, cl 14.4 is, as between the parties, reasonably necessary to protect those interests.

[63] The benefits secured to Mr Pearson under his contract of employment included an entitlement to shares. As he acknowledged, this entitlement was a quid pro quo for the protection of HRX against the risks involved in its dependence on his faithful and diligent performance of his crucial role in the business of HRX. The allocation of shares to Mr Pearson and the provision for payment for 21 of the 24 months of the restraint period confirm that the restraint was an aspect of a reasonable commercial arrangement as between the parties. In return for the restriction on Mr Pearson's career, he bargained successfully for a stake in HRX' business; a benefit which he acknowledged in cross-examination he would not have received had he not agreed to the restraint. There is no reason to think that there was any inequality of bargaining power in the negotiations which led to this arrangement. Indeed, Mr Pearson's prominence in his field was such that he might be said to have held the upper hand in the negotiations with Ms Leslie. In this regard, he was the first employee to negotiate a provision for payment by HRX during the period of his post-employment restraint.

[64] The nature of the business in which HRX, Talent2 and Mr Pearson are engaged is such that the needs of customers, located in, say, Hong Kong, can be met by services provided or arranged by persons physically located in Australia. The geographical limitations on restraints on competition which have been the focus of attention in the authorities have little relevance in the assessment of the reasonableness of the geographic operation of the restraint in question. It is to be noted that cl 14.4 does not operate by reference to particular markets; rather, as Senior Counsel for HRX emphasised, conduct on Mr Pearson's part which occurs in Australia may have ramifications adverse to HRX' ability to provide services to existing customers who embark on overseas ventures or to overseas branches of existing customers.

[65] The two-year restraint also reasonably accommodates the contractual cycle on which HRX operates. It thus affords HRX the opportunity to effect a renewal of its contracts with customers without the risk that the customer will choose to "stay" with Mr Pearson as the individual with whom it is familiar.

[66] No separate argument was advanced by Mr Pearson to the effect that cl 14.4 was unreasonable so far as the public interest is concerned. In this regard, there is no reason to apprehend that cl 14.4 was not reasonably in the public interest. There is no reason to apprehend harm to the public interest in the ready availability of human resources recruitment services in Australia. The evidence is that the industry is competitive; the absence of Mr Pearson from the industry for two years is not likely to change that state of affairs.

[67] It is also, we think, relevant to acknowledge that HRX was potentially a competitor in an international market for human resources recruitment services. Given the nature of the business of human resource recruitment, there appears to be no geographic barriers to the recognition of such a market. The public interest is actually enhanced by arrangements which promote the expansion of Australian business overseas, and the engagement of Mr Pearson on terms which ensured his diligent pursuit of such business on behalf of his employer in such an arrangement.

Appeal dismissed.

In Provida Pty Ltd v Sharpe [2012] NSWSC 1041, Pembroke J set out the following useful summary of the legal issues at play when assessing restraint clauses in employment contracts:

> The legal principles which govern the resolution of the issues in this case are well known. The general policy of the law is that people should honour their contracts: Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon [1991] NSWCA 19; (1991) 22 NSWLR 1 at 9 (Gleeson CJ); Seven Network (Operations) Ltd v Warburton (No 2) [2011] NSWSC 386 at [3]. It does not matter if the employee may have misunderstood or overlooked the terms of the contract to which he is bound. The enforcement of a commercial contract does not depend on a party's knowledge or understanding of its terms: Toll (FGCT) Pty Ltd v Alphapharm Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 49; (2004) 219 CLR 165 at [43]–[44].
> There are some qualifications to the general principle that contracts are meant to be observed. Covenants imposing a restraint on an employee's trade and covenants against solicitation of clients will not be enforced if the restraint is not necessary for the reasonable protection of the legitimate interests of the employer: Buckley v Tutty [1971] HCA 71; (1971) 125 CLR 353 at 376; Curro v Beyond Productions Pty Ltd (1993) 30 NSWLR 337 at 344. Restraints of trade, including restraints on solicitation of customers, will only be upheld when they are reasonably necessary to prevent, among other things, the disclosure of confidential information obtained by the former employee in the course of employment or the exploitation of a connection built up by that employee with the employer's customers in the course of that employment.

There are several subsidiary principles that should also be mentioned:

(a) First, the court gives considerable weight to what parties have negotiated and embodied in their contract but a contractual consensus is not conclusive even when there is a contractual admission as to reasonableness: Woolworths Ltd v Olson [2004] NSWCA 372 at [39]; Seven Network at [70]–[71].

(b) Second, the validity of the restraint is to be tested at the time of entering into the contract and by reference to what the restraint entitled or required the parties to do rather than what they intended to do or have actually done: Woolworths at [40].

(c) Third, the test of reasonableness is measured by reference to the interests of the parties concerned and the interests of the public. The requirement that the restraint be reasonable in the interests of the parties means that the restraint must afford no more than adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed: Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns and Ammunition Co Ltd [1894] AC 535; Herbert Morris Ltd v Saxelby [1916] 1 AC 688 at 707; Buckley v Tutty at 376; Linwar Securities Pty Ltd v Christopher Savage [2006] NSWSC 786 at [25]–[26] (Nicholas J); Koops Martin Financial Services Pty Ltd v Reeves [2006] NSWSC 449 at [28] (Brereton J).

(d) Fourth, an employer is not entitled to require protection against mere competition. Covenants that restrain competition are invalid unless they are reasonably necessary to protect the legitimate business interests of the employer: Dewes v Fitch [1920] 2 Ch 159 at 181; Wright v Gasweld Pty Ltd (1991) 22 NSWLR 317 at 329 (Gleeson CJ); Harlow Property Consultants Pty Ltd v Byford [2005] NSWSC 658 at [24]-[25] (White J).

(e) Fifth, an employer is entitled to protection against the use by the employee of knowledge obtained by him of his affairs and business methods: Dewes v Fitch at 181.

(f) Finally, an employer's customer connection is an interest which can support a reasonable restraint of trade, especially so where the particular employee has, as against a particular client, become the human face of the business and the person who represents the business, or some aspect of the business, to the client: Cactus Imaging Pty Ltd v Peters [2006] NSWSC 717; (2006) 71 NSWLR 9 at [25] (Brereton J); Kearney v Crepaldi [2006] NSWSC 23 at [51]-[53] (McDougall J). In Arthur Murray Dance Studios of Cleveland Inc v Witter (1952) 105 NE (2d) 685, 705 (Ohio Common Pleas) Hoover J described this principle applying where:

> … the employee, by contact with the customer, gets the customer so strongly attached to him that when the employee quits and joins a rival he automatically carries the customer with him in his pocket.

Sale of a business

Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & Ammunition

[41.95] Nordenfelt v Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & Ammunition Co Ltd [1894] AC 535 (House of Lords) – Appeal from Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: Nordenfelt (the appellant) was a manufacturer of quick-firing guns and ammunition. He sold his business to a company. Later that company, with his concurrence, sold the business to Maxim (the respondents). As part of the arrangement, the appellant covenanted that he would not, during the period of 25 years, engage in the manufacture of guns, gun mountings or carriages, gunpowder explosives or ammunition or in any trade or business competing or liable to compete in any way with that carried on by the respondents. Nordenfelt entered into an agreement with other manufacturers of guns and ammunition. The respondents sought an injunction to enforce the covenant. The trial judge, Romer J, held that the covenant was void. The Court of Appeal held that the covenant was too wide in its application to any business which the respondent might carry on during 25 years, but that it was valid as regards the guns and ammunition and that accordingly an injunction should be granted. Nordenfelt appealed to the House of Lords.]

LORD MACNAGHTEN: [560] The stipulation was that Mr Nordenfelt should not, during the term of 25 years from the date of the incorporation of the company, if the company should so long continue to carry on business: "engage except on behalf of the company either directly or indirectly in the trade or business of a manufacturer of guns, gun-mountings or carriages, gunpowder explosives or ammunition."

So far the covenant has been held good; then come the words: "or in any business competing or liable to compete in any way with that for the time being carried on by the company."

A proviso was added to the effect that such restriction should not apply to explosives other than gunpowder, or to subaqueous or submarine boats or torpedoes, or castings or forgings of steel or iron, or alloys of iron or of iron, or alloys of iron or of copper. The latter part of the covenant, which extends to all competing businesses, may be disregarded. In view of the manifold objects of the company, as set out in their memorandum of association, it was held by the Court of Appeal to be void; and there is no appeal from that part of the decision. The proviso also, I think, may be put aside. It is one of the circumstances to be taken into consideration as bearing upon the question of the reasonableness of the agreement; but it is not, I think, essential to the validity of this covenant.

Mr Nordenfelt admittedly has broken the earlier part of the covenant. His contention is that the whole covenant is void in law as being a covenant in restraint of trade unlimited in space. And the only point which your Lordships have to decide is [561] whether that part of the covenant which the appellant has broken is valid. For it cannot be disputed that the covenant is severable, and that part may be good though part be void. The learned judges of the Court of Appeal have come to the conclusion that the earlier part of the covenant is valid. But though they all arrive at one and the same result they approach the question from somewhat different points of view. [His Lordship then discussed the judgment in the Court of Appeal in great detail. He continued:]

[564] In the age of Queen Elizabeth all restraints of trade, whatever they were, general or partial, were thought to be contrary to public policy, and therefore void: Colgate v Bacheler (1602) Cro Eliz 872; 78 ER 1097. In time, however, it was found that a rule so rigid and far-reaching must seriously interfere with transactions of every-day occurrence. Traders could hardly venture to let their shops out of their own hands; the purchaser of a business was at the mercy of the seller and every apprentice was a possible rival. So the rule was relaxed. It was relaxed as far as the exigencies of trade for the time being required, gradually and not without difficulty, until it came to be recognised that all partial restraints might be good, though it was thought that general restraints, that is, restraints of general application extending throughout the kingdom, must be bad. Why was the relaxation supposed to be thus limited? Simply because nobody imagined in those days that a general restraint could be reasonable, not because there was any inherent or essential distinction between the two cases. "Where the restraint is general," says Lord Macclesfield, in Mitchel v Reynolds (1711) 1 P Wms 181; 24 ER 347, "not to exercise a trade throughout the kingdom," the restraint "must be void, being of no benefit to either party and only oppressive, as shall be shewn by-and-by." Later on he gives his reason: "Why does it signify" he says, "to a tradesman in London what another does at Newcastle; and surely it would be unreasonable to fix a certain loss on one side without any benefit to the other." "Any deed," says Best LCJ in [565] Homer v Ashford (1825) 3 Bing 322, 326; 130 ER 537, 539, "by which a person binds himself not to employ his talents, his industry, or his capital in any useful undertaking in the kingdom, would be void, because no good reason can be imagined for any person's imposing such a restraint on himself."

The true view at the present time, I think, is this: The public have an interest in every person's carrying on his trade freely; so has the individual. All interference with individual liberty of action in trading, and all restraints of trade of themselves, if there is nothing more, are contrary to public policy, and therefore, void. That is the general rule. But there are exceptions: restraints of trade and interference with individual liberty of action may be justified by the special circumstances of a particular case. It is a sufficient justification, and indeed it is the only justification, if the restriction is reasonable; reasonable, that is, in reference to the interests of the parties concerned and reasonable in reference to the interests of the public, so framed and so guarded as to afford adequate protection to the party in whose favour it is imposed, while at the same time it is in no way injurious to the public. That, I think, is the fair result of all the authorities. But it is not to be supposed that that result was reached all at once. [His Lordship then discussed the development of the law through the cases in considerable detail. He then continued:]

[573] Now, in the present case it was hardly disputed that the restraint was reasonable, having regard to the interests of the parties at the time when the transaction was entered into. It [574] enabled Mr Nordenfelt to obtain the full value of what he had to sell; without it the purchasers could not have been protected in the possession of what they wished to buy. Was it reasonable in the interests of the public? It can hardly be injurious to the public, that is, the British public, to prevent a person from carrying on a trade in weapons of war abroad. But apart from that special feature in the present case, how can the public be injured by the transfer of a business from one hand to another? If the business is profitable there will be no lack of persons ready to carry it on. In this particular case the purchasers brought in fresh capital, and had at least the opportunity of retaining Mr Nordenfelt's services. But then it was said there is another way in which the public may be injured. Mr Nordenfelt has "committed industrial suicide", and as he can no longer earn his living at the trade which he has made peculiarly his own, he may be brought to want and become a burden to the public. My Lords, this seems to me to be very far-fetched. Mr Nordenfelt received over £200,000 for what he sold. He may have got rid of the money. I do not know how that is. But even so, I would answer the argument in the words of Tindal CJ: "If the contract is a reasonable one at the time it is entered into we are not bound to look out for improbable and extravagant contingencies in order to make it void": Rannie v Irvine (1894) 7 Man & G 976; 14 LJCP 10; 135 ER 393. My Lords, for the reasons I have given, I think the only true test in all cases, whether of partial or general restraint, is the test proposed by Tindal CJ: What is a reasonable restraint with reference to the particular case? I think that the restraint in the present case is reasonable in every point of view, and therefore, I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

[LORDS HERSCHELL, WATSON, ASHBOURNE and MORRIS, delivered judgments in which they held the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

[42.05] Where a contract is prohibited by statute or is illegal at common law, two consequences may follow:

1. Unenforceability: one or both parties may be prevented from suing on the contract.
2. Non-retrieval: one or both parties may be precluded from recovering money or property transferred under it.

These two consequences are examined in this chapter.

UNENFORCEABILITY

Statutory illegality

[42.10] When considering the consequences of a finding of statutory illegality, the court is involved in the task of statutory interpretation. The court must determine, in accordance with the ordinary principles that govern the construction of statutes, whether the legislature intended to render a contract void when such a finding would destroy legal rights held by an innocent party. Quite often such considerations lead the court to find that the contract in question is not prohibited by statute on the basis that it is unlikely that parliament intended that such consequences be visited upon an innocent party (see Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410, extracted at [40.35]). Adopting this approach, the court might also find that only the party responsible for the illegality loses his or her right to enforce the contract. As the majority observed in Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Baxter Healthcare Pty Ltd [2007] HCA 38; (2007) 232 CLR 1, 28:

> there is nothing unusual about a circumstance in which making or giving effect to a contract involves an offence by one party to the contract but not the other. The consequences of such illegality for the rights of the parties will not necessarily be the same.

Two cases included in previous chapters are relevant:

1. First, Yango Pastoral Co Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 (extracted at [40.35]) shows that the courts will reflect upon the effects on innocent parties before finding that a contract is unenforceable because of its association with illegality. Gibbs ACJ and Mason J noted that a finding that the contract was impliedly prohibited would mean not only that the wrongdoer (Yango) lost its ability to recover moneys owed to it but also that innocent depositors would be unable to recover moneys deposited with Yango. As it was unlikely that Parliament would intend such consequences be inflicted on innocent depositors, the statute was held not impliedly to prohibit contracts entered into in breach of s 8.
2. Second, Master Education Services Pty Ltd v Ketchell [2008] HCA 38; (2008) 236 CLR 101 (extracted at [40.45]) demonstrates that the courts will consider the range of remedies provided for by the statute when deciding whether the contract is prohibited by statute. The range of remedies that could be imposed in response to the breach was said to exhaust the consequences of breach.

Common law illegality

[42.15] As discussed in Chapter 41, a contract which involves illegal conduct may be unenforceable at common law on the ground of public policy even though the contract is not expressly or impliedly prohibited by statute. This has traditionally been justified by reference to the maxim ex turpi causa non oritur actio – an action does not arise from a base cause – but it is doubtful whether the maxim now properly describes either the basis of the rule or its usual effect. Despite the illegality, one or both of the parties may be able to enforce the contract.

Carefully defining the consequences of illegality at common law may help the court balance its desire to uphold bargains against concerns with aiding the enforcement of agreements associated with conduct that is contrary to public policy. For example, where a contract is not illegal, but has been performed in an illegal manner, the unenforceability rule is modified. If both parties to a contract intend that a wrongful mode of performance should be adopted, the general rule is that neither party may sue on the contract. If, however, the contract itself is not illegal, but one party intends to perform it in an illegal way, the innocent party who was unaware of the illegality may have a remedy. The maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis ("where there is equal fault, the defendant is in the stronger position") does not apply because the parties are not in pari delicto.

Several cases included in earlier chapters are relevant.

1. Fitzgerald v F J Leonhardt Pty Ltd (1997) 189 CLR 215 (extracted at [41.60]) shows how the courts determine whether a contract is unenforceable at common law because of its association with a breach of statute. It provides an example of the court finding that illegality did not affect the enforceability of the contract. The contract was illegal as performed, not formed and the claimant was an innocent party.
2. North v Marra Developments Ltd (1981) 148 CLR 42 (extracted at [41.40]) also deals with common law illegality raised by breach of statute. It provides an example of conduct that raised policy concerns sufficient to justify rendering the contract unenforceable. The parties had contemplated a breach of statute from the outset and both were complicit in the illegality.

3. Wilkinson v Osborne (1915) 21 CLR 89 (extracted at [41.15]) provides an example of an agreement that violated public policy to such an extent that the court held the contract was unenforceable.

Severance

[42.20] Illegality will not necessarily cause the entire contract to be rendered unenforceable. In fact, it may be that only one clause raises illegality concerns. A difficult question arises when one or more, but not all, of the contractual terms raise illegality concerns. The question is whether the remaining valid promises are enforceable or whether the whole contract is infected with the vice of the objectionable promise or promises. In certain circumstances, the illegal part may be severed from a contract. This will leave the balance of the contract enforceable, assuming there is still consideration to support the promises sought to be enforced.

Criteria of severance

[42.25] The material contained in Chapters 40–1 demonstrates that the grounds upon which a contractual promise may be illegal, void or unenforceable are various. The reasons for, and the strengths of the policies behind, the particular rules vary considerably. It would be strange if the courts approached the question of severance in these very different cases by employing a stereotyped rule. The cases demonstrate that they have not done so. As Kitto J pointed out in Brooks v Burns Philp Trustee Co Ltd (1969) 121 CLR 432, 438: "Questions of severability are often difficult, and tests that have been formulated as useful in particular classes of cases are not always satisfactory for cases of other kinds." Sometimes the court will ask whether the defective promise is so material to the whole contract that there should be inferred an intention not to make a contract that would operate without it. Other times, it will ask whether the elimination of the term would change merely the extent rather than the kind of contract.

Thomas Brown and Sons v Fazal Deen

[42.30] Thomas Brown and Sons Ltd v Fazal Deen (1962) 108 CLR 391 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: In 1943, Fazal Deen deposited 19 gold bars and a quantity of gems with one Harden, who was the general manager of the appellant company. The gold bars and gems were to be held in safe custody until Fazal Deen required them. At the time of the transaction, it was illegal for gold to be kept by a private person. Regulation 14 of the National Security (Exchange Control) Regulations in force at the relevant time required every person to deliver gold to the Commonwealth Bank within one month after it had come into his or her possession or control.

In 1959, demand was made for the return of the gold bars and gems. They were not returned. In January 1960, Fazal Deen issued a writ against the company claiming, inter alia, the return of the gold bars and gems, or their value, and damages for their detention and, alternatively, damages for breach of the contract of bailment and conversion. The trial judge decided in favour of Fazal Deen on the claim in detinue and held that Harden had acted as the company's agent. He also held that the gold bars and gems had disappeared from the company's custody not later than April 1953. The company appealed.]

KITTO, WINDEYER and OWEN JJ: [410] It is necessary then to consider whether the agreement under which the gold, the gems and the safe were entrusted to the company's custody contravened the National Security (Exchange Control) Regulations in any respect, and, if so, what was the effect of such a contravention on the plaintiff's right to maintain the action. By reg 14(1) of those regulations, which were in force at the relevant time, every person who had any gold in his possession or control was required to deliver it to the Commonwealth Bank within one month after it came into his possession or control. And, by reg 14(3), all gold so delivered thereupon vested in the Bank free from any mortgage, charge, lien, trust or other interest, the Bank being directed to pay for the gold to the person delivering it, on behalf of all persons having any interest therein, at the price fixed by the regulations. Until delivery to the Bank, therefore, the gold remained the property of the plaintiff although, on the date when it was deposited with the company, the time had long passed when it should have been delivered to the Bank. The terms of the bailment required the company to hold the gold, along with the gems and the safe, in safe custody until such time as the plaintiff required them to be redelivered to him and, while apart from the provisions of the regulations he could no doubt have demanded their return at any time, the purpose common to both parties was that the company should hold them for an indefinite period and not part with them except to the plaintiff. So far as the gold was concerned, the performance of that agreement would, and in fact it did, contravene the regulations, but it does not follow that [411] the bailment of the gems and of the safe was tainted by illegality. If the terms of the bailment relating to the gold were severable from those relating to the gems and the safe the bailment of the latter chattels would be lawful. The test of severability was stated by Jordan CJ in McFarlane v Daniell: "If the elimination of the invalid promises changes the extent only but not the kind of contract, the valid promises are severable: Putsman v Taylor."

Applying that test, it is clear that the plaintiff's rights of action in respect of the gems and the safe would not be answered by a defence of illegality based upon a breach of the National Security (Exchange Control) Regulations since the contractual obligation upon the company as to the return of the plaintiff's property on demand applied to every part of the property deposited whether demanded together with the rest of it or separately. In the case of the gold, however, the plaintiff could not succeed if he was obliged to rely upon the illegal transaction to establish his case.

Severance limited to deletion

[42.35] Severance is only available to delete words or phrases or sentences from a contract. What is left must be able to stand alone and make sense independently of the severed material. The court will not add or change words in order to make sense of what is left. Further, the meaning of the words which are left must not be altered. These points are illustrated by Peters Ice Cream (Vic) Ltd v Todd [1961] VR 485 (see the following extract).

A contractual provision in restraint of trade can be drafted in a way which anticipates severance. It may, for example, set out different variables of:

1. the kind of conduct proscribed (eg, the manufacturing of items A, B, C or D);
2. the duration of the restraint (eg, for two, four, six or eight years); and
3. the area of the restraint (eg, within a radius of three, eight, 10 or 20 kilometres).

The contract may then provide that covenants generated by the various combinations are subject to severance. This technique will be successful in defining enforceable covenants, provided the requirements of certainty are met.

Peters Ice Cream (Vic) v Todd

[42.40] Peters Ice Cream (Vic) Ltd v Todd [1961] VR 485 (Supreme Court of Victoria) – Trial of action.

[FACTS: Todd, a shopkeeper (the defendant), agreed that in consideration of Peters Ice Cream (Vic) Ltd (the plaintiff) supplying certain ice-cream products he would not "sell, serve, supply or vend any other make of ice-cream and/or kindred products … during any period this agreement is in force within a reasonable distance from my present place of business". The period of the agreement was five years. Todd in fact sold certain ice-cream products other than those of Peters Ice Cream (Vic) Ltd during the currency of the agreement. The company brought an action against Todd, claiming an injunction and damages.]

LITTLE J: [489] The contract between the parties does not leave the restraint unlimited in area, nor does it define in any precise way what the area of restraint is. It provides merely that the defendant agrees not to sell ice-cream other than that manufactured by the plaintiff within a reasonable distance from his present place of business. It was put by the plaintiff that what was a reasonable distance was a question of fact to be determined by the court just in the same way as the court may have to determine a reasonable price or a reasonable time …. [490] In this case, however, the parties have not, in my opinion, by the use of the imprecise language employed, defined the promisor's obligation, or defined it in such a way that the court can determine whether it exceeds or does not exceed the protection to which it may find the promisee was in fact entitled. They have, I think, left to the court the task of making their contract for them, and of carving out from time to time a distance which, within the restraint of trade doctrine, is reasonable. It is not for the court, however, to determine what protection could have been validly agreed upon between the parties. The function of the court is to determine whether a protection agreed upon between the parties is in law valid. The clause is, therefore, in my opinion, void …

[491] It was argued by counsel for the plaintiff, however, that if the expression "within a reasonable distance" was bad, it should be severed from the rest of the clause … Mr Harris submitted that a severance could and should be effected in either of two ways: (a) by striking out of the contract the whole phrase "within a reasonable distance from my present place of business"; or (b) by striking out the words "within a reasonable distance".

As to the first method, it was said that whilst in the result the promise would be unlimited as to area, it would none the less be valid (vide Peters American Delicacy Co Ltd v Champion (1928) 41 CLR 316) in which case there was no limit to the area within which the restraint was to operate but no suggestion was made that the restraint was accordingly too wide.

[492] In the present case, however, the parties have indicated by their language that the area is not to be unlimited. To adopt the first alternative would accordingly convert into an unlimited restraint a restraint which was not intended to be unlimited. If the second alternative were adopted, the word "from" would no longer be attached to the words "reasonable distance" but simply to "my present place of business". The prohibition would be against sales "from my present place of business". The word "from" would accordingly in the contract, as severed, be used in a sense different from that which it bears in the document as it now stands. If the parties had been asked to express their intentions in an expanded form, it would seem likely that they would have provided against the defendant selling "at or within a reasonable distance from" the present place of business. Instead of the word "at" they may have employed the expression "in or on" as in Peters American Delicacy Co Ltd v Patricia's Chocolates and Candies Pty Ltd (1947) 77 CLR 574. If, in an agreement expressed in either of those ways, severance were effected, what would remain would be a restraint on selling, serving, supplying or vending "at" or "in or on" the present place of business. Such a provision, however, is, in my opinion, narrower than a provision against selling, serving, supplying or vending "from" my present place of business.

But in any event the argument appears not to take into account that by the contract, the defendant also promises not to make ice-cream or kindred products. The language of that promise, equally with the words "sell, serve supply or vend", is, I think, plainly attached to the phrase "within a reasonable distance from my present place of business". It is, accordingly, a promise "not to make ice-cream within a reasonable distance from the present place of business". Excision of the words "within a reasonable distance" would in this respect produce an ungrammatical and meaningless clause. To give any meaning (with those words deleted) to the promise not to make ice-cream, it would be necessary either to construe that promise as unlimited in area, that is, ignore the words "from my present place of business", or to do drastic surgery to the whole restraint provision so as to read the promise not to make ice-cream as one not to make it at the present place of business. Apart from all other considerations, the first alternative would produce the result that the promise not to sell would be limited, whilst the promise not to make would not be limited to the present place of business. The second alternative involving, as it does, transposition and addition of words, is not severance.

It follows that neither of the two methods of severance urged by Mr Harris is open: "I think it is still the law [said Lord Sterndale MR in Attwood v Lamont [1920] 3 KB 571 at 577] that a contract can be severed if the severed parts are independent of one another and can be severed without the severance affecting the meaning of the part remaining."

The considerations I have discussed serve to emphasise what is, in my opinion, as Mr McGarvie submitted, the fundamental objection to severance in this case, namely that the promise in the present contract is a single and indivisible one … [493] To use the language of Sargant J in Nevanas & Co v Walker [1914] 1 Ch 413 at 423, there has been no "clear severance by the parties themselves". Whether a promise is "separate or not depends on the language of the document. Severance, as it seems to me, is the act of the parties, not of the court": Putsman v Taylor [1927] 1 KB 637 at 640 per Salter J. I am, accordingly, of opinion that severance is not possible in the agreement now before me …

Judgment for defendant.

[42.45] Note

In New South Wales, the law relating to severability is affected by the Restraints of Trade Act 1976 (NSW). Under this Act, a restraint of trade may be valid to the extent that it is not against public policy, whether it is in severable terms or not.

NON-RETRIEVAL

[42.50] The second potential consequence of illegality is that a party may be prevented from recovering money or property transferred under the affected contract. Where a party is unable to rely on his or her contractual rights, they may nevertheless be able to recover money or property by relying on other areas of the law. For example, they may be able to make a restitutionary claim or a claim based on one of the property torts.

Restitution

[42.55] A claim in restitution may founder on the defence of illegality. The central policy consideration at stake is the coherence of the law: Equuscorp Pty Ltd v Haxton [2012] HCA 7; (2012) 246 CLR 498, extracted at [42.60]. Other potentially relevant factors include whether the plaintiff is in pari delicto (equally guilty). Where the claimant is innocent, the courts are more likely to allow a restitutionary action. Where the illegality is raised because of a breach of statute, it will also be relevant to consider whether the claimant was a member of a class that the legislation aims to protect. If the claimant is a member of a protected class, the court is more likely to allow the restitutionary action.

Another situation in which parties may not be in pari delicto is when one of the parties was persuaded by fraud or duress to enter an illegal contract. The pressured party may be permitted to seek restitution on the basis that they are less guilty than the other party. However, as Callaghan v O'Sullivan [1925] VLR 664 (extracted at [42.65]) shows, parties may still be regarded as in pari delicto even though one of them is in a position of superior power.

Where the contract is illegal on the ground that it is contrary to public policy, a plaintiff may be able to retrieve money or property transferred under the contract if the plaintiff can show that he or she repented before the illegal purpose had been substantially achieved. It may be difficult to determine in some cases what constitutes achievement of the illegal purpose. These matters are considered in Clegg v Wilson (1932) 32 SR (NSW) 109 (extracted at [42.75]) and George v Greater Adelaide Development Co Ltd (1929) 32 CLR 91 (extracted at [42.80]).

Equuscorp v Haxton

[42.60] Equuscorp Pty Ltd v Haxton [2012] HCA 7; (2012) 246 CLR 498 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: The appellants sought to recover from the respondents money lent pursuant to a failed investment scheme. Members of the public were invited to invest in a farming venture. These investments were funded by loans provided by Rural Finance Pty Ltd (Rural), a company associated with the promoter of the investment scheme. The loans were held to be unenforceable for illegality because, in breach of the Companies Code, the promoter issued invitations to invest without first registering a prospectus providing information about the investments. When the investment scheme failed, Equuscorp, who acted as the promoter's financier, took an assignment of Rural's rights. It brought an action to recover the principal and interest due under the loan agreement as a debt. Alert to the possibility that the loan agreements may be unenforceable, Equuscorp argued in the alternative that it could recover the moneys advanced by way of a restitutionary action because the consideration provided under the loan agreements had totally failed.

At trial, Byrne J allowed the restitutionary action. The investors appealed to the Victorian Court of Appeal, which held that Rural had no right to restitution. Equuscorp appealed to the High Court.]

FRENCH CJ, CRENNAN and KIEFEL JJ:

Illegality and the Code

[21] Section 170(1) of the Code and associated provisions underpinned the finding by the primary judge that the loan agreements were unenforceable for illegality. Section 170(1) appeared in Div 6 of Pt IV of the Code at the time that the schemes were entered into and provided:

> A company or an agent of a company shall not issue to the public, offer to the public for subscription or purchase, or invite the public to subscribe for or purchase, any prescribed interest unless a statement in writing in relation to that prescribed interest has been registered by the Commission under Division 1.

The "statement" was required to set out "prescribed matters" including extensive information about the relevant investment (Code s 170(4)). Section 174(1) provided, inter alia, that a person shall not contravene or fail to comply with a provision of s 170 and imposed a penalty of $20,000 or imprisonment for five years or both. Section 174(2) provided:

> A person is not relieved from any liability to any holder of a prescribed interest by reason of any contravention of, or failure to comply with, a provision of this Division.

It was not an offence against the Code to take up a prescribed interest which was issued or offered to the public or the subject of an invitation to the public in contravention of s 170(1).

[22] … The immediate predecessor of s 170 of the Code was s 82 of the Uniform Companies Acts. Their policy was obvious enough. It was to protect members of the public by requiring prior disclosure of information relevant to their investment decisions (Corporate Affairs Commission (SA) v Australian Central Credit Union [1985] HCA 64; (1985) 157 CLR 201, 210; per Mason ACJ, Wilson, Deane and Dawson JJ; Hurst v Vestcorp Ltd (1988) 12 NSWLR 394 at 402 per Kirby P, 421 per Mahoney JA). Provisions of that kind have a long lineage in corporate regulation.

[23] The effect of the prescribed interest provisions on agreements associated with the issue of such interests in contravention of the Code was primarily a matter of statutory construction, but also involved the application of the common law. As appears from the joint judgment in this Court in Miller v Miller [2011] HCA 9; (2011) 242 CLR 446, 458 [26];, and the decisions of this Court cited in that judgment, an agreement may be unenforceable for statutory illegality where:

(i) the making of the agreement or the doing of an act essential to its formation is expressly prohibited absolutely or conditionally by the statute (Yango Pastoral Company Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 423 per Mason J, Aickin J agreeing at 436; Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 552 per Deane and Gummow JJ);

(ii) the making of the agreement is impliedly prohibited by statute (Yango Pastoral Company Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 423 per Mason J). A particular case of an implied prohibition arises where the agreement is to do an act the doing of which is prohibited by the statute (Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 552 per Deane and Gummow JJ);

(iii) the agreement is not expressly or impliedly prohibited by a statute but is treated by the courts as unenforceable because it is a "contract associated with or in the furtherance of illegal purposes" (Yango Pastoral Company Pty Ltd v First Chicago Australia Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 410 at 432 per Jacobs J; Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538 at 552 per Deane and Gummow JJ).

In the third category of case, the court acts to uphold the policy of the law, which may make the agreement unenforceable. That policy does not impose the sanction of unenforceability on every agreement associated with or made in furtherance of illegal purposes. The court must discern from the scope and purpose of the relevant statute "whether the legislative purpose will be fulfilled without regarding the contract or the trust as void and unenforceable". (Miller v Miller (2011) 242 CLR 446 at 459 [27]) As in the case when a plaintiff sues another for damages sustained in the course of or as a result of illegal conduct of the plaintiff, "the central policy consideration at stake is the coherence of the law." (Miller v Miller (2011) 242 CLR 446 at 459 [15])

[24] The making of the loan agreements was not expressly prohibited by the Code. The primary judge did not discuss in his reasons whether their making was impliedly prohibited. There was evidently no submission before his Honour that the making of the loan agreements was prohibited as conduct by Rural making it liable as an accessory to primary contraventions of the Code. It appears that the primary judge held the loan agreements to be unenforceable as against the respondents on the common law ground that they were made in furtherance of an illegal purpose. The precise basis of their unenforceability was not further explored in the Court of Appeal.

[25] In Nelson v Nelson, Deane and Gummow JJ observed, in relation to contracts associated with or in furtherance of illegal purposes, that ((1995) 184 CLR 538 at 552):

> [t]he formulation of the appropriate public policy in this class of case may more readily accommodate equitable doctrines and remedies and restitutionary money claims than is possible where the making of the contract offends an express or implied statutory prohibition.

That observation involves the rejection of any inflexible or rigid rule excluding non-contractual claims in cases involving contracts unenforceable for illegality. In this case, the answer to the question whether it would have been open to Rural to pursue claims for money had and received under the loan agreements depends upon a number of factors but critically upon whether vindication of those claims would have frustrated or defeated, or have been inconsistent with, the statutory purpose of the provisions of the Code relating to the issue of prescribed interests. The requirement of coherence in this area of the law is not satisfied by the mere exclusion of an implied legislative intention to render unenforceable a contract made in furtherance of a contravening purpose. Unenforceability flows from the application of the common law informed, inter alia, by the scope and purpose of the relevant statute.

Whether restitutionary relief was available

[26] Equuscorp's restitutionary claims, as argued in this Court, depended entirely upon the unenforceability of the loan agreements. Had the agreements been enforceable, it is unlikely that the restitutionary claims could have been brought.

[27] The loan agreements were unenforceable because they were made in furtherance of an illegal purpose. That conclusion was not challenged in the Court of Appeal nor in this Court. The policy considerations informing the common law, discussed earlier in these reasons, must be taken to have required that conclusion. The question that follows is how the common law would have affected Rural's right to pursue restitutionary relief.

[28] Equuscorp based its claims for money had and received on what it said was a "total failure of consideration". It submitted that Rural had advanced money under the loan agreements on the basis that they were enforceable. That was a state of affairs, it was argued, which was always unsustainable. As a result, the respondents were unjustly enriched. The argument directs attention to the nature of the claim for money had and received and its interaction with the common law relating to illegal transactions …

[30] In David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1992) 175 CLR 353, this Court explained the part played by unjust enrichment in a claim for money had and received (in that case for recovery of a payment made under mistake of law). That explanation may be expressed, at a fairly high level of abstraction, as an approach to determining such claims. In summary:

- recovery depends upon enrichment of the defendant by reason of one or more recognised classes of "qualifying or vitiating" factors;
- the category of case must involve a qualifying or vitiating factor such as mistake, duress, illegality or failure of consideration, by reason of which the enrichment of the defendant is treated by the law as unjust;
- unjust enrichment so identified gives rise to a prima facie obligation to make restitution;
- the prima facie liability can be displaced by circumstances which the law recognises would make an order for restitution unjust.

Unjust enrichment therefore has a taxonomical function referring to categories of cases in which the law allows recovery by one person of a benefit retained by another. In that aspect, it does not found or reflect any "all-embracing theory of restitutionary rights and remedies" (Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 544 [72] per Gummow J) …

[32] Failure of consideration is one of the factors that makes retention of a benefit prima facie unjust … [33] As Gummow J pointed out in Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 516, failure of consideration for the purpose of a claim for money had and received is not confined by contractual principles. In that case there had been no failure of performance by Rothmans of any promise it had made. There was no question of repudiation by it of its contractual obligations. The question was whether it was "unconscionable" for Rothmans as the recipient of payments to retain them in circumstances in which it was not specifically intended or especially provided that it should so enjoy them. The question of unconscionability, as his Honour explained, derived from the general equitable notions which found expression in the common law count for money had and received. This Court acknowledged in Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 164 CLR 662 at 673 that "contemporary legal principles of restitution or unjust enrichment can be equated with seminal equitable notions of good conscience" albeit the action itself is not for the enforcement of a trust. The reference to conscionability in this context, however, does not mean that whether enrichment is unjust is to be determined by reference to a subjective evaluation of what is fair or unconscionable. As the Court reiterated in Farah Constructions Pty Ltd v Say-Dee Pty Ltd (2007) 230 CLR 89 at 156 [150] per Gleeson CJ, Gummow, Callinan, Heydon and Crennan JJ:

> recovery rather depends on the existence of a qualifying or vitiating factor falling into some particular category.

[33] Failure of consideration as a basis for a claim for money had and received may arise from a number of causes. One cause is illegality. Where a payment is made under a contract which is unenforceable for illegality, the unenforceability of the agreement may constitute a failure of consideration which is capable of supporting a claim for recovery of the payment …

[34] The outcome of a restitutionary claim for benefits received under a contract which is unenforceable for illegality, will depend upon whether it would be unjust for the recipient of a benefit under the contract to retain that benefit. There is no one-size-fits-all answer to the question of recoverability. As with the question of recoverability under a contract affected by illegality the outcome of the claim will depend upon the scope and purpose of the relevant statute. The central policy consideration at stake, as this Court said in Miller, is the coherence of the law. In that context it will be relevant that the statutory purpose is protective of a class of persons from whom the claimant seeks recovery. Also relevant will be the position of the claimant and whether it is an innocent party or involved in the illegality.

[35] Much judicial and academic ink has been spilt on this topic, which exercised the minds of Roman jurists in the days of the Republic. It elicited the cri de coeur of Lord Chief Justice Wilmot in 1767, "no polluted hand shall touch the pure fountains of justice", and the more temperate offering of Lord Mansfield, who wrote of a plaintiff's need to "draw [his] remedy from pure fountains".

[36] The importance of policy in determining the effect of illegality upon a restitutionary claim was central to Lord Mansfield's observation in Holman v Johnson:

> It is not for [the defendant's] sake, however, that the objection is ever allowed; but it is founded in general principles of policy, which the defendant has the advantage of, contrary to the real justice, as between him and the plaintiff, by accident, if I may so say.

There were often compelling policy arguments on both sides. In listing reasons for and against the grant of relief in relation to illegal transactions, Professor John Wade, writing in the Texas Law Review in 1946, said that (Wade, "Benefits Obtained Under Illegal Transactions – Reasons For and Against Allowing Restitution" (1946) 25 Texas Law Review 31 at 60):

> The balancing process … leaves on one side the view that a court should not help a man who has engaged in an illegal transaction out of the predicament in which he has placed himself, and on the other the view that a court should not permit unjust enrichment of one person at the expense of another. Of these two arguments, each of which seems most nearly determinative upon its side of the question, neither takes precedence upon logical analysis.

The search then is for a principled basis for determining whether or not relief is to be allowed.

[37] Professor Birks, in an article published in 2000, proposed as a criterion for the grant or refusal of restitutionary relief in relation to an illegal contract (Birks, "Recovering Value Transferred Under an Illegal Contract" (2000) 1 Theoretical Inquiries in Law 155 at 203):

> Would allowing that cause of action to be maintained make nonsense of the refusal to enforce the contract?

He characterised the question as one about self-stultification of the law. As he correctly pointed out on such an approach (at 203):

> The inquiry is constantly an inquiry into consistency and rationality, not into turpitude.

> Against a person who will not repay a loan, the claim in contract and a personal claim in unjust enrichment on the ground of failure of consideration appear to yield substantially the same performance.

So in Boissevain v Weil [1950] AC 327 Lord Radcliffe said of such a case (at 341):

> A court that extended a remedy in such circumstances would merit rather to be blamed for stultifying the law than to be applauded for extending it.

[38] The negative goal of avoiding self-stultification in the law may be expressed positively as the objective of maintaining coherence in the law as discussed by this Court in Miller. That approach is consistent with the proposition in the Third Restatement on Restitution and Unjust Enrichment that (§32(2) at 505-506):

> Restitution will also be allowed, as necessary to prevent unjust enrichment, if the allowance of restitution will not defeat or frustrate the policy of the underlying prohibition.

The point is also made in the Restatement that (§31, Comment b at 483):

> [d]ifferent rules govern the availability of restitution in connection with agreements that are merely "unenforceable" … and agreements that are unenforceable because they are "illegal".

That distinction is important and is reflected in the distinction between §31 and §32 of the Restatement which deal with unenforceability and illegality respectively. In a statutory setting, of course, both categories of case can be brought under a general rubric conditioning enforceability upon statutory purpose and associated public policy considerations. Moreover, as acknowledged in the Restatement (§31, Comment b at 483):

> [l]ying somewhere astride these familiar classifications are cases in which the claimant has violated a statute whose objectives might be regarded as both procedural and substantive.

Nevertheless, the making of an agreement which is unenforceable for illegality throws up a distinct suite of issues affecting the availability of restitutionary relief in respect of benefits received under the agreement.

[39] There has been some consideration by intermediate courts of appeal of the availability of restitutionary relief in respect of loan agreements affected by illegality arising out of the prospectus requirements of companies legislation and thereby held unenforceable. The reasoning in those cases, however, focussed upon considerations applicable to unenforceable agreements generally, rather than the specific issues which arise in the case of agreements unenforceable for illegality …

[45] Had a right to claim restitution for money had and received been available to Rural in this case, it would have been able to recover by such claims what the policy of the law denied it in respect of the loan agreements. Rural was not an arms length financier. It was part of the closely related group of companies that were involved in the promotion of the schemes. The loan agreements were an integral part of the schemes and in so far as they involved the issue of invitations and offers to investors to take up prescribed interests without the benefit of the protections required by the Code, furthered that illegal purpose. As in the Hurst case, while not essential to the investments, the loans made the investments more attractive. Recovery from the investors would have been recovery from persons whose protection was the object of the statutory scheme. The respondents were not in pari delicto with Rural. The failure of consideration invoked by Equuscorp was the product of Rural's own conduct in offering the loan agreements in furtherance of an illegal purpose. This is a clear case in which the coherence of the law, and the avoidance of stultification of the statutory purpose by the common law, lead to the conclusion that Rural did not have a right to claim recovery of money advanced under the loan agreements as money had and received. There was therefore no right to claim such relief available for assignment to Equuscorp. In any event, for the reasons that follow, any such rights, if they had existed, would not have been assigned by the Deed.

GUMMOW and BELL JJ:

Money had and received

[99] The first line of defence by the respondents is that the scheme and purpose of Pt IV Div 6 of the Code, with particular reference to ss 170 and 174, is at odds with permitting against holders of prescribed interests an action for money had and received by them under loan agreements which were entered into as a direct consequence of contravention of s 170. That submission should be accepted and it is dispositive of the appeals, but several points should first be made.

[100] The first point is that, unlike the position under the foreign exchange regulations considered by Lord Radcliffe in Boissevain v Weil, s 170 of the Code did not by its terms forbid and render illegal either the contractual promise by the respondents to repay the moneys lent, or the very act of borrowing independently of the contractual promise. If s 170 had done so, then it would have struck both the contractual and restitutionary claims. But s 170 did not, and the decision of Byrne J to refuse to enforce the loan agreements was based upon considerations of the kind discussed in the extracts from Miller v Miller set out above.

[101] The second point is to recognise the fallacy of an assumption that contractual and restitutionary issues can readily be collapsed, so that, on the grounds just mentioned, to refuse to Equuscorp a contractual remedy necessarily denies the action by Equuscorp against the investors for money had and received. It was accepted in David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia that the existence of "illegality" may provide a qualifying or vitiating factor which enlivens a restitutionary action. The availability of such an action where there is an ineffective contract will determine whether the existing distribution of gains and losses is to lie undisturbed.

[102] The distinction between a contractual and a restitutionary action is illustrated in Commonwealth Homes and Investment Co Ltd v Smith (1937) 59 CLR 443 at 463, 466, by the rejection of the limitation defence pleaded to the action for money had and received in contrast to the limitation period applicable to the action in contract. Even if, in the present litigation, the claims in contract by Equuscorp were statute barred or extinguished (as Byrne J held was the result in the matters which are now the subject of appeals M128 and M130), the actions for money had and received would not suffer the same fate; they accrued only on the assertion by the respondents in their defences filed in 1999 that they were not bound by the loan agreements. Equuscorp correctly submits that, by itself, the difference in the applicable limitation regimes does not require denial of its actions for money had and received.

[103] The determinative issue, as Equuscorp accepted, is whether the policy of the statute law represented by Pt IV Div 6 of the Code denies any scope for an action for money had and received. In that regard, guidance is provided by the statement by Professor Palmer in his treatise The Law of Restitution (1978), vol 2 at 171:

> The illegality of the transaction will preclude recovery of damages for breach, or any other judgment aimed at enforcement of the contract, and the problem is whether the plaintiff can nonetheless obtain restitution of values transferred pursuant to the contract. The fact that public policy prohibits enforcement of the contract is not a sufficient reason for allowing one of the parties to retain an unjust enrichment at the expense of the other. Such a retention is warranted only when restitution is in conflict with overriding policies pursuant to which the transaction is made illegal.

That statement requires qualification to include within its scope circumstances where a contract is ineffective, not by reason of "illegality" sourced in a statute, but where the statute requires compliance with formalities which have not been observed by the parties, or restricts legal capacity, as does the doctrine of ultra vires …

[108] In Nelson v Nelson McHugh J referred to Kiriri Cotton Co Ltd v Dewani [1960] AC 192, where the Privy Council upheld an action by a tenant for money had and received to recover a premium the tenant had paid, contrary to a rent restriction law, to obtain the lease. McHugh J cited this as an example of the class of cases where recovery was permitted because the statutory scheme rendering a contract or arrangement illegal was enacted for the benefit of a class including the claimant.

[109] The respondents correctly submit that this principle applies here but to the opposite effect. This is because the prospectus provisions were not enacted for the protection of Rural and the other Johnson interests, but for the protection of the respondents as investors in the prescribed interests.

Conclusions

[110] The explanation of the money lending cases given by Mason and Wilson JJ in Pavey & Matthews is in point here. Their Honours said:

> The relevant provisions in those cases explicitly rendered unenforceable contracts executed by the money lender. The statutes were directed at making unenforceable an obligation to repay money already lent and a security already given in respect of such an obligation. It was not possible to interpret these provisions so that they left on foot any quasi contractual causes of action on the part of the lender. Request and receipt by the borrower of the money lent were integral elements in a situation in which the contract and all securities were expressed to be unenforceable. An additional feature of the money lending cases is that the legislation was designed to protect borrowers by imposing onerous obligations on money lenders to comply with the statutory requirements. (emphasis added)

[111] The prospectus provisions have a long history. This was traced by Mahoney JA in Hurst v Vestcorp (1988) 12 NSWLR 394 at 421 to the mid 19th century. As Heerey J later remarked when dealing with the prospectus provisions of the Code, so seriously did the legislature regard these provisions, including s 170, that a breach not necessarily fraudulent and not necessarily causing monetary loss nevertheless could result in a five year term of imprisonment. This supports the conclusion that in a case such as is presented by these appeals, the investors who received prescribed interests should not be in the same position as if Pt IV Div 6 of the Code had not been enacted or had been complied with by Rural, and the loan agreements had been effective in accordance with their terms. The respondents correctly submit that to permit recovery on the actions for money had and received would stultify the statutory policy evident in Pt IV Div 6 of the Code. We agree with what is further said on this point by French CJ, Crennan and Kiefel JJ at [45] in their reasons. Equuscorp, as successor to Rural, in these circumstances cannot complain that the loss is left to lie where it has fallen.

[HEYDON J delivered a dissenting judgment.]

Appeal dismissed.

Callaghan v O'Sullivan

[42.65] Callaghan v O'Sullivan [1925] VLR 664 (Supreme Court of Victoria) – Trial of action.

[FACTS: The four defendants, who were police constables, had threatened to prosecute the plaintiff and his daughter on a charge of being in possession of uncustomed or stolen goods unless the plaintiff would agree to pay them £6,500. Of this sum, £1,000 was paid over by the plaintiff five days later. The defendants did not make any report or initiate any proceedings against the plaintiff or his daughter. The plaintiff sought to recover the £1,000.]

IRVINE CJ: [666] The material facts, then, appear to resolve themselves into these:

(1) that the plaintiff was induced to pay a sum of money to the defendants on their implied undertaking not to take steps that would lead to a prosecution;

(2) that such steps were not in fact taken; and

(3) that the plaintiff was quite content to let the matter rest until it became evident that an inquiry, based on information derived from some source not stated in the evidence, was to be held, and that then he, acting on legal advice, launched a prosecution against the detectives.

Is he in such circumstances entitled to claim the aid of a court of law to recover the money so paid? Both on principle and authority I think he is not …

[668] The case of Atkinson v Denby (1861) 6 H & N 778; (1862) 7 H & N 934 at 31 LJ Ex 362; 158 ER 749, is often relied upon in support of the position that the parties are not in pari delicto where there is coercion exercised by the person taking the money over the person paying it; or, to put it in other words, where the defendant has taken advantage of the condition or position of the plaintiff to extort money from him. If that is true as a general proposition it would probably cover the present case. It is said, to use the words of Lord Ellenborough in a case that he recently referred to: "It can never be predicated as par delictum where one holds the rod and the other bows to it."

An examination of the cases shows, however, that this has never been laid down as a principle of general application. Indeed, if it did it would enable money paid to stifle a prosecution to be in all cases recoverable. In Atkinson v Denby a debtor who has been coerced to pay a creditor £50 by the threat that if he did not do so the creditor would not join with the other creditors in signing a composition deed, was held entitled to recover it back because the consideration was an illegal one as being a fraud on [669] creditors. Martin B dissented, and of the remaining judges, Bramwell B and Wild B held that the case was covered by Smith v Bromley (1760) 2 Doug 696 n; 99 ER 441, and Smith v Cuff (1817) 6 M & S 160; 105 ER 1203. In the Court of Exchequer Chamber the court was unanimous in holding the case governed by Smith v Bromley and Smith v Cuff, and it was not suggested that any new rule of law was stated or applied. It becomes necessary, therefore, to examine the cases referred to.

In Smith v Bromley Lord Mansfield uses the words:

> If the act is in itself immoral or a violation of the general laws of public policy, there the party paying shall not have this action; for where both parties are equally criminal against such general laws, the rule is potior est conditio defendentis. But there are other laws which are calculated for the protection of the subject against oppression, extortion, deceit, etc. If such laws are violated and the defendant takes advantage of the plaintiff's condition or situation, there the plaintiff shall recover, and it is astonishing that the reports do not distinguish between the violation of one sort and the other.

In Browning v Morris (1778) 2 Cowp 790; 98 ER 1364 at 792 (Cowp), Lord Mansfield had drawn the same distinction. He said: "If a man pays a sum of money by way of a bribe he can never recover it in an action, because both plaintiff and defendant are equally criminal"; and went on to state the exception to the general rule in almost the same language as in Smith v Bromley. In Williams v Hedley (1807) 8 East 378; 103 ER 388, Lord Ellenborough adopts and applies the language of Lord Mansfield in Smith v Bromley, and also in Browning v Morris, and expressly founds his decision in the case before him that the action was maintainable on that distinction so stated.

In Smith v Cuff Lord Ellenborough, following Smith v Bromley, decided that the action lay in a similar case. In his judgment he uses the oft-quoted expression cited above. That expression, if relied upon to establish a general right to relief, no matter what the nature of the illegal purpose for which the money was paid, so long as it can be shown that one party has in any respect the whip hand of the other (to use a common expression), derives no support from the great authority of Lord Ellenborough in the context in which it was used. Lord Ellenborough cannot be supposed to have intended to enunciate a rule so inconsistent with the distinction which he so strongly insisted on in Williams v Hedley … In my opinion, all the authorities on which Atkinson v Denby rests, and Atkinson v Denby itself, do not extend to cases where the illegal purpose for which the money was paid was the violation of a general law of [670] public policy, and that the buying off of a threatened prosecution, even though brought about by express threats to prosecute unless the money is paid, is a violation of such a law.

Judgment for the defendant.

Plaintiff repents: locus poenitentiae

[42.70] Where the contract is illegal on the ground that it is contrary to public policy, a plaintiff may be able to retrieve money or property transferred under the contract if the plaintiff can show that he or she repented before the illegal purpose had been substantially achieved. Also, it may be difficult to determine in some cases what constitutes achievement of the illegal purpose. These matters are considered in the following two cases.

Clegg v Wilson

[42.75] Clegg v Wilson (1932) 32 SR (NSW) 109 (Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Hearing of suit.

[FACTS: Mrs Elizabeth Clegg, an elderly widow (the plaintiff), executed a memorandum of transfer over certain real property to Wilson (the defendant). This transfer was executed pursuant to the terms of an agreement with Wilson. Under this agreement, she agreed to pay Wilson £6,000 if he promised not to give evidence in a prosecution which he had caused to be commenced against her son, who was a solicitor. The agreement also provided that the property would be taken as being worth £3,200.

The charge was withdrawn by the police after the son had been committed for trial on a number of other charges. Wilson at no time made any request that the charge should be withdrawn and had expressed his willingness to the police at all material times to give evidence against the son.

Mrs Clegg commenced an action against Wilson in which she claimed rescission of the memorandum of transfer and an injunction to restrain Wilson from registering it.]

LONG INNES J [His Honour held that the agreement was illegal as an agreement to stifle a prosecution and that there was no evidence of fraud, oppression or undue influence. He also held that as the agreement was illegal it could not constitute consideration for the transfer. He continued]: [114] The plaintiff's prompt repudiation of the arrangement is, I think, to be attributed, not to her removal from the influence of the defendant, but to the realisation of the fact that, owing to the imminence of other charges, the stifling of the prosecution on the charge in which the defendant was concerned would not achieve her son's freedom from imprisonment, while it would in some measure destroy the provision which he had made for her and himself, probably out of his client's moneys …

[118] In Halsbury's Laws of England, vol VII, p 409, para 846, it is stated that money paid or goods delivered in pursuance of an illegal contract can be recovered from the other party so long as the contract remains executory, provided notice be given repudiating the contract before the action is brought; if however, the illegal purpose has been carried out or a substantial [119] part of the contract has been performed, money paid under the contract can no longer be recovered, except where the parties are not in pari delicto. This statement has been criticised by Sir Adrian Knox CJ in George v Greater Adelaide Land Development Co Ltd (1929) 43 CLR 91, on the ground that it is difficult to reconcile it with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co [1904] 1 KB 558, except on the view that the actual payment of money, or delivery of goods, pursuant to the contract is to be regarded as the performance of a substantial part of it. For my own part I may add that, so read, it would be reduced to a statement that money paid, or goods delivered, in pursuance of an illegal contract can be recovered from the other party so long as the contract remains executory except where the money paid, or goods delivered, constitute the performance by the plaintiff on his part of a substantial part of the contract. If this be so, the plaintiff's right to relief would appear to vary inversely to the need for it, and the law would seem to offer but slight inducement to parties to illegal contracts to repudiate them before the illegal purpose has been achieved. I think, however, that on an examination of the authorities it will appear that in Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co and the other cases of that type, the view taken has been that in that class of case an illegal purpose has in fact been carried out. It becomes necessary, therefore, to attempt to discover by an examination of the relevant authorities what is the law on this subject; and in this examination only those cases in which the contracts were executory in their nature, and in which the parties were in pari delicto, need be considered.

The reported cases of this nature may be divided into classes according to whether, at the date of their repudiation, their illegal purpose has been carried into effect either: (a) wholly; (b) partially; or (c) not at all; in other words, according to whether they were at the material date, as regards their illegal purpose, executed or executory.

It is not disputed, and there can be no doubt, that where the illegal purpose has been completely achieved, equity will not relieve. Instances of this type of case are Taylor v Chester (1869) LR 4 QB 309; Goodall v Lowndes (1844) 6 QBD 464; 115 ER 173; Jones [120] v Merionethshire Permanent Building Society [1892] 1 Ch 173; and Re Mapleback; Ex parte Caldecott (1876) 4 Ch D 150. The last three mentioned of those cases were all cases in which the illegal purpose was to stifle a prosecution.

It is equally well established that the same result follows where the illegal purpose has been partly carried into effect. Instances of this type of case are afforded by Ayerst v Jenkins (1873) LR 16 Eq 275; Re Great Berlin Steamboat Co (1884) 26 Ch D 616; Kearley v Thomson (1890) 24 QBD 742; and Apthorp v Neville & Co (1907) 23 TLR 575. While Herman v Jeuchner (1885) 15 QBD 561 and Re Gurwicz; Ex parte The Trustee [1919] 1 KB 675, may perhaps be variously regarded as falling within either of those two classes.

It is only in regard to the third of those classes of cases that doubt can exist; and that class of cases also admits of being itself subdivided into cases:

(a) where consideration has been given, or there has been part performance, by the defendant; and

(b) cases in which there has been no such consideration or part performance on his part.

The reported cases may, however, also be divided into two main classes according to whether they are illegal:

(a) because forbidden expressly or implicitly by statute; or

(b) because, although not prohibited by statute, they are opposed to public policy and the interests of the public …

In cases where the contracts are illegal because expressly or impliedly prohibited by statute the view appears to have been uniformly taken that the maxims ex turpi causa non oritur actio and in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis et possidentis apply, notwithstanding the executory nature of the contract. Instances of cases of this type are Lowry v Bourdieu (1780) 2 Doug 468; 99 ER 299; Lubbock v Potts (1806) 7 East 449; 103 ER 174; Howard v Refuge Friendly Society (1886) 54 LT 644; Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co; Goldstein v Salvation Army Assurance Society [1917] 2 KB 291; [121] George v Greater Adelaide Land Development Co Ltd; and Re National Benefit Assurance Co Ltd [1931] 1 Ch 46.

The explanation of these cases appears to me to be that where parties, who are contracting upon an equal footing, and each of whom knows, or is deemed to know the law, propose to enter into an agreement, prohibited by statute, and which they know, or are deemed to know, is so prohibited, they both purpose the doing of an illegal act, and that illegal purpose is achieved by the mere making of the contract whether anything further remains to be done thereunder or not.

This being the state of the law with regard to contracts made illegal by statute, one might have expected that it would logically follow that the same results would ensue in the case of contracts illegal at common law as being opposed to public policy; but, as was pointed out by Lord Halsbury L in Quinn

v Leathem [1901] AC 495 at 506, the English law is not a logical system, and whether the reason be, as was suggested by Lord Eldon in St John v St John (1805) 11 Ves 526, 536; 32 ER 1192, 1196, that where agreements, illegal as opposed to public policy, are repudiated, and the public interest requires that relief should be given, and it is given to the public through the party; or whether the view taken has been that, where a contract is illegal merely because its object is to achieve a purpose which is opposed to the public interest, it is to the public interest that an opportunity, and even inducement, should be afforded to either party to repent before the illegal purpose is achieved and injury to the public done, it is not necessary for me to consider; whatever the reason may be it is well established that at any rate in certain classes of such cases equity will relieve by ordering the return of money paid, goods delivered, or property transferred, pursuant to the contract, provided that due notice of repudiation is given before action is brought, and provided further that the illegal purpose has not been carried, either wholly or in part, into effect … [125] The conclusion, therefore, to which I have come is that in a case where the plaintiff has repudiated a contract which is illegal because opposed to public policy, for which the defendant has given no consideration, while the illegal purpose remains wholly executory, this court should grant equitable relief by ordering the repayment of money paid, goods delivered, or property transferred to the defendant pursuant to the contract, notwithstanding that there is an element of turpitude in the contract, and that both parties are in pari delicto …. [His Honour then held that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief claimed.]

Judgment for the plaintiff.

George v Greater Adelaide Land Development Co

[42.80] George v Greater Adelaide Land Development Co Ltd (1929) 43 CLR 91 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia.

[FACTS: The respondent company brought an action against Mr George, the appellant, to recover the balance of purchase money payable under a contract for the sale of a certain vacant allotment of land. One of the defences raised by the appellant was that the contract contravened the provisions of the Town Planning and Development Act 1920 (SA). He also counterclaimed for the recovery of the money already paid under the contract. One of the terms of the contract was that it was to be "subject to the conditions of sale and to the provisions of the Town Planning and Development Act 1920, being complied with".

At the time the contract was entered into, it did not comply with the provisions of the Act, but a few months after it had been entered into, the Act was complied with. At the trial, Murray CJ gave judgment for the company and dismissed the counterclaim. George appealed to the High Court.]

KNOX CJ [His Honour held that the contract contravened the provisions of the Act and continued]: [99] The remaining question is whether the appellant is entitled to recover the money paid by him under the alleged contract. It appears that the amount which the appellant now seeks to recover was paid in respect of instalments of purchase money payable under the contract during the period between 19 November 1925 and 17 August 1927. Apparently, nothing beyond the payment of these instalments was done by either party towards performance of the contract. It is said in Halsbury's Laws of England, vol VII, para 846 that money paid in pursuance of an illegal contract can be recovered from the other party so long as the contract remains executory, but that if a substantial part of the contract has been performed money paid under the contract can no longer be recovered except where it appears that the parties were not in pari delicto. It appears to me difficult to reconcile this statement of the law with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Harse v Pearl Life Assurance Co [1904] 1 KB 558, unless the payment of money in pursuance of the contract be regarded as performance of a substantial part of it. In that case the plaintiff sought to recover the amount paid by him as premiums on illegal contracts of insurance into which he had been induced to enter by the innocent misrepresentation of [the] defendant's agent. The County Court judge held that even if both policies were void for want of insurable interest (that is, were illegal contracts and therefore void, and not merely voidable at the option of one of the parties) the representations having been innocently made, the premiums could not be recovered back. The decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (Collins MR and Romer and Mathew LJJ).

In delivering judgment, Collins MR said (at 563):

> It is clear law that where one of two parties to an illegal contract pays money to the other, in pursuance of the contract, it cannot be recovered back … Unless there can be introduced the element of fraud, duress, or oppression, or difference in the position of the parties which created a fiduciary relationship to the plaintiff so as to make it inequitable for the defendants to insist on the bargain that they had made with the plaintiff, he is in the position of a person who has made an illegal contract and has sustained a loss in consequence of a misstatement of law, and must submit to that loss.

And [100] Romer LJ said (at 564): "Assuming that the two policies are void because they were illegal, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot recover the premiums that he had paid unless he can make out that he is not in pari delicto with the defendant company." I can find no sufficient ground on which that case can be distinguished from the case now under consideration. In each the contract was void because it was illegal, in each both parties apparently believed the contract to be valid, in each there was no fraud proved, and no fiduciary relationship between the parties, nor was anything proved in the nature of oppression or duress. In Harse's case, the contract being wholly void, neither party could have insisted on its performance, and therefore it could not be said that the company had been at risk under the policies, or that anything had been done in performance of the contract except the payment of premiums in pursuance of it. In Harse's case it could not be said that the illegal purpose had been carried out or a substantial part of the contract had been performed, unless the payment of premiums were regarded as such performance; and, if so, in the present case there is no reason for treating the payment of instalments of purchase money as having a different result. The decisions relied on by counsel for the appellant appear to me to be distinguishable. In Kettlewell v Refuge Assurance Co [1908] 1 KB 545, fraud was proved. In Hughes' case [1916] 2 KB 482, the contracts were obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation, and therefore, the parties were not in pari delicto. In Hermann v Charlesworth [1905] 2 KB 123, Collins MR based his decision on the position of the defendant as a stakeholder and on the attitude of courts of equity to the particular mischief arising on marriage brokage contracts. Taylor v Bowers (1876) 1 QBD 291, was a case of stakeholder; so, in substance, was the case of Perpetual Executors and Trustees Association of Australia Ltd v Wright (1917) 23 CLR 185, and the case before the Judicial Committee ((1908) LR 35 Ind App 98) referred to in the reasons of Isaacs, Gavan Duffy and Rich JJ: (1917) 23 CLR 197. Where the action is to recover money deposited with a stakeholder to abide the event of an illegal contract the money can be recovered, if notice be given [101] to the stakeholder at any time before he has actually paid it over in pursuance of the contract. But the decision in Harse's case seems to show that, where money is paid in pursuance of an illegal contract by one of the parties to the other, it is not recoverable unless there be present some element of fraud, duress or oppression or some circumstances creating a fiduciary relationship between the parties so that the parties may be regarded as not in pari delicto. In the present case nothing of that kind is shown to exist; and, on the authority of the decision in Harse's case, I am of opinion that the appellant is not entitled to recover the amount paid by him in pursuance of the contract.

I think that both the action and the counterclaim should be dismissed. [STARKE and ISAACS JJ delivered judgments to the same effect.]

Torts to goods

[42.85] Plaintiffs who have obtained or transferred goods under illegal contracts have brought actions in tort when those goods have been abused. The relevant torts are trespass to goods, conversion and detinue. In Bowmakers Ltd v Barnet Instruments Ltd [1945] KB 65, 71, Du Parcq LJ found that such tort actions could succeed so long as the plaintiff was not forced to rely on the impugned contract in order to make out its claim. Du Parcq LJ noted:

> A man's right to possess his own chattels will as a general rule be enforced against one who, without any claim of right, is detaining them, or has converted them to his own use, even though it may appear either from the pleadings, or in the course of the trial, that the chattels in question came into the defendant's possession by reason of an illegal contract between himself and the plaintiff, provided that the plaintiff does not seek, and is not forced, either to found his claim on the illegal contract or to plead its illegality in order to support his claim.

This principle is sometimes referred to as the "no reliance" theory or as the "Bowmakers rule" after the case in which it was enunciated. However, its status as part of Australian law is questionable. First, in cases where the rule has been applied, the Australian courts have given it a narrow scope of operation: see Thomas Brown and Sons Ltd v Fazal Deen (1962) 108 CLR 391 (extracted at [42.30]).

Secondly, the "no reliance" rule is inconsistent with the emphasis in recent High Court decisions (such as Equuscorp Pty Ltd v Haxton [2012] HCA 7; (2012) 246 CLR 498 and Miller v Miller [2011] HCA 9; (2011) 242 CLR 446) on the question of coherence and whether denial of the cause of action is needed to uphold the purpose of the prohibition in question. In Nelson v Nelson (1995) 184 CLR 538, the court rejected as too inflexible and extreme the view that a claimant who must plead or rely on illegal conduct cannot obtain relief. Rather, "the question of illegality is bound up with the view taken of the underlying policy of the Act" (at 559). The real issue is whether public policy is better served by allowing an action to recover money or property than it is by disallowing recovery.
