[24] It has also been argued that some "terms" said to be implied in law are in fact rules of construction and that all implied "terms" of universal application fall into that category (Peden, "'Cooperation' in English Contract Law – to Construe or Imply?" (2000) 16 Journal of Contract Law 56 at 66–67). The application of that proposition to what has been treated as a contractual duty to cooperate is considered below. Debates about characterisation have attracted persuasive protagonists on both sides (Carter, Contract Law in Australia, 6th ed (2013) at 32–33 [2–19]; Seddon and Bigwood, Cheshire and Fifoot Law of Contract, 10th Aust ed (2012) at 461 [10.41]; Tolhurst, "Contractual Confusion and Industrial Illusion: A Contract Law Perspective on Awards, Collective Agreements and the Contract of Employment" (1992) 66 Australian Law Journal 705 at 716). They involve taxonomical distinctions which do not necessarily yield practical differences. Those debates are not concerned with the distinct question whether, and when, implication of a term is to be regarded as an exercise in the construction of a contract or class of contract.

[25] It has been accepted in this Court that some rules treated as implications of terms in law in particular classes of contract, or contracts generally, can also be characterised as rules of construction. Mason J, in Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596 at 607, so characterised the principle enunciated by Lord Blackburn in Mackay v Dick (1881) 6 App Cas 251 at 263 – a characterisation evidently endorsed in Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410 at 448–449 per McHugh and Gummow JJ:

> where in a written contract it appears that both parties have agreed that something shall be done, which cannot effectually be done unless both concur in doing it, the construction of the contract is that each agrees to do all that is necessary to be done on his part for the carrying out of that thing, though there may be no express words to that effect. What is the part of each must depend on circumstances.

The language of Lord Blackburn was indicative of a rule of construction rather than of implication. Nevertheless, Mason J also referred to the rule as defining an implied "duty to co-operate" ((1979) 144 CLR 596 at 607).

[26] The majority in the Full Court of the Federal Court referred to the implied duty of cooperation as providing an "alternative approach" to the application of the implied duty of mutual trust and confidence ((2013) 214 FCR 450 at 466). Their Honours relied upon its formulation in Secured Income as one which "requires a party to a contract to do all things necessary to enable the other party to have the benefit of the contract" ((2013) 214 FCR 450 at 467 [121]). That obligation of cooperation required the Bank to take the positive steps necessary to enable Mr Barker to have the benefit of cl 8, which contemplated the possibility of redeployment within the Bank as an alternative to termination ((2013) 214 FCR 450 at 467 [126]–[128]). In opening that alternative approach, their Honours adverted to the suggestion by Lord Steyn in Malik [1998] AC 20 at 45 that the implied duty of mutual trust and confidence propounded in that case "probably has its origin in the duty of co-operation between contracting parties" ([1998] AC 20 at 45). As appears below, whatever the historical basis in the United Kingdom for the implied duty of mutual trust and confidence, it cannot be supported in this country as an expression or development of the implied duty of cooperation.

[27] As to the direct application of the implied duty of cooperation, the Bank submitted in this Court, as Jessup J had reasoned in his dissent, that there was no relevant contractual benefit with which the implied term could engage. Clause 8 conferred a benefit by way of a termination payment but did not confer a contractual entitlement to the benefit of the Redeployment Policy. The submission made on behalf of Mr Barker that "the prospect of … redeployment was a benefit in the relevant sense" should not be accepted.

[28] An implication in law may have evolved from repeated implications in fact. As Gaudron and McHugh JJ observed in Breen v Williams (1996) 186 CLR 71some implications in law derive from the implication of terms in specific contracts of particular descriptions, which become "so much a part of the common understanding as to be imported into all transactions of the particular description" ((1996) 186 CLR 71 at 103 quoting Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410 at 449 per McHugh and Gummow JJ). The two kinds of implied terms tend in practice to "merge imperceptibly into each other" ((1996) 186 CLR 71 at 103 quoting Glanville Williams, "Language and the Law – IV" (1945) 61 Law Quarterly Review 384 at 401). That connection suggests, as is the case, that the "more general considerations" informing implications in law are not so remote from those considerations which support implications in fact as to be at large. They fall within the limiting criterion of "necessity", which was acknowledged by both parties to this appeal. The requirement that a term implied in fact be necessary "to give business efficacy" to the contract in which it is implied can be regarded as a specific application of the criterion of necessity. The present case concerns an implied term in law where broad considerations are in play, which are not at large but are not constrained by a search for what "the contract actually means."

[29] In Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd, McHugh and Gummow JJ emphasised that the "necessity" which will support an implied term in law is demonstrated where, absent the implication, "the enjoyment of the rights conferred by the contract would or could be rendered nugatory, worthless, or, perhaps, be seriously undermined" ((1995) 185 CLR 410 at 450) or the contract would be "deprived of its substance, seriously undermined or drastically devalued" ((1995) 185 CLR 410 at 453. See also Jarratt v Commissioner of Police (NSW) (2005) 224 CLR 44 at 68 [78] per McHugh, Gummow and Hayne JJ; [2005] HCA 50). The criterion of "necessity" in this context has been described as "elusive" (Crossley v Faithful & Gould Holdings Ltd [2004] ICR 1615 at 1627 [36]) and the suggestion made that "there is much to be said for abandoning" (Peel, Treitel: The Law of Contract, 13th ed (2011) at 231 [6-043]) the concept. Necessity does, however, remind courts that implications in law must be kept within the limits of the judicial function. They are a species of judicial law-making and are not to be made lightly. It is a necessary condition that they are justified functionally by reference to the effective performance of the class of contract to which they apply, or of contracts generally in cases of universal implications, such as the duty to cooperate. Implications which might be thought reasonable are not, on that account only, necessary (University of Western Australia v Gray (2009) 179 FCR 346 at 376–377 [139]–[142]). The same constraints apply whether or not such implications are characterised as rules of construction.

The implied term of mutual trust and confidence in the United Kingdom

[30] Employment contracts have attracted a number of implied terms in the course of the evolution of the employment relationship. All such terms are subject to the express provisions of the particular contracts and any applicable statutes. They include an implied duty imposed on the employer to provide the employee with a safe system of work (Koehler v Cerebos (Australia) Ltd (2005) 222 CLR 44 at 53 [19] per McHugh, Gummow, Hayne and Heydon JJ; [2005] HCA 15) and to give reasonable notice of the termination of the contract other than for breach (Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410 at 423, 429 per Brennan CJ, Dawson and Toohey JJ). An employee has an implied duty of fidelity to the employer not to engage in conduct which "impedes the faithful performance of his obligations, or is destructive of the necessary confidence between employer and employee" (Blyth Chemicals Ltd v Bushnell (1933) 49 CLR 66 at 81 per Dixon and McTiernan JJ; [1933] HCA 8). That duty may derive from the fiduciary obligations which employees owe to their employers, albeit those obligations have "different conceptual origins" from the contractual obligations (Concut Pty Ltd v Worrell (2000) 75 ALJR 312 at 317–318 [25]–[26] per Gleeson CJ, Gaudron and Gummow JJ; 176 ALR 693 at 700–701). Relevantly, the employment contract, in common with contracts generally, attracts the duty to cooperate enunciated by Lord Blackburn in Mackay v Dick (1881) 6 App Cas 251 at 263, recognised in Butt v M'Donald (1896) 7 QLJ 68 at 70–71 per Griffith CJ, although expressed expansively as encompassing all things that are necessary to enable the other party to have the benefit of the contract. See also Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596 at 607 per Mason J. It may also be noted that in the employment law of the United States there has been recognised an implied obligation which, though it "does not lend itself to precise definition … requires at a minimum that an employer not impair the right of an employee to receive the benefits of the employment agreement" (Jones v Central Peninsula General Hospital 779 P 2d 783 at 789 (1989). See also Metcalf v Intermountain Gas Co 778 P 2d 744 at 749 (1989); Wieder v Skala 609 NE 2d 105 at 109 (1992)).

[31] The submissions to the Court in this case focussed upon the question whether the proposed implied term of mutual trust and confidence was "necessary" in the sense that without it, the rights conferred by the Agreement could or would be rendered nugatory or worthless, or seriously undermined. Mr Barker relied substantially upon the decision of the House of Lords in Malik.

[32] The implied term of mutual trust and confidence in employment contracts in the United Kingdom arose out of what Professor Mark Freedland has described as "a highly context-specific and instrumental body of case law" (Freedland, The Personal Employment Contract (2003) at 155). Its development may be traced back to the enactment of a constructive dismissal provision in labour relations legislation in 1974 (Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974 (UK), Sched 1, par 5(2)(c), now s 95(1)(c) of the Employment Rights Act 1996 (UK)). In a seminal decision for that development, the Court of Appeal in Western Excavating (ECC) Ltd v Sharp [1978] QB 761 held that whether an employee was entitled to terminate employment by reason of the employer's conduct, and be treated as having been dismissed, was to be determined in accordance with the law of contract ([1978] QB 761 at 770 per Lord Denning MR, Eveleigh LJ agreeing at 773). It was not to be determined merely by reference to the unreasonableness of the employer's conduct. The contractual test for constructive dismissal, as accepted by the Court of Appeal, required the employer to be guilty of conduct constituting a significant breach going to the root of the contract of employment, or which showed that the employer no longer intended to be bound by one or more of the essential terms of the contract ([1978] QB 761 at 769–770 per Lord Denning MR, Eveleigh LJ agreeing at 773). After the decision in Western Excavating, the Employment Appeal Tribunal implied the term of mutual trust and confidence to meet the contractual test. In the leading decision, Courtaulds Northern Textiles Ltd v Andrew [1979] IRLR 84, the implication, apart from one aspect of its wording, was not in dispute ([1979] IRLR 84 at 85).

> a process of formulation of implied terms, which were in effect back-formations, in the sense that they were terms the breach of which would amount to expulsive or repudiatory conduct sufficient to constitute constructive dismissal by the employer. It was in this particular crucible that the implied term as to mutual trust and confidence was formed.

It was the case, however, that before the decision of the Court of Appeal, tribunals and courts in the United Kingdom had begun to formulate the test of constructive dismissal in terms of conduct by an employer rupturing the employee's trust or confidence in the employment relationship, a test applied by those who envisaged it as contractual or as a broader based test (Freedland, The Personal Employment Contract (2003) at 155). In the event, the implied term became, by the mid-1980s, "an orthodox tenet of the law of constructive unfair dismissal" (Freedland, The Personal Employment Contract (2003) at 156). That was the position in courts, other than the House of Lords, when Malik was decided.

[34] In Malik, the employer bank had carried on its business "dishonestly and corruptly" ([1998] AC 20 at 34 per Lord Nicholls). Former employees of the bank sued its provisional liquidators for damages for the stigma attaching to them by reason of their prior employment association with it. Lord Nicholls held that the bank was under an implied obligation to its employees not to conduct a dishonest or corrupt business ([1998] AC 20 at 34–35). That obligation was said to be a particular aspect of the general obligation imposed by the implied term ([1998] AC 20 at 35):

> not to engage in conduct likely to undermine the trust and confidence required if the employment relationship is to continue in the manner the employment contract implicitly envisages.

Although Malik was the first occasion on which the implied term was considered by the House of Lords, it appears to have been treated by their Lordships as a fait accompli. Lord Nicholls described it as a useful tool, well established in employment law ([1998] AC 20 at 39). Lord Steyn, who wrote the leading judgment, proceeded, like Lord Nicholls, upon the basis that the implied term was established as a standard term implied by law as an incident of all contracts of employment, albeit he described it as "a comparatively recent development" which probably had its origin "in the general duty of co-operation between contracting parties" ([1998] AC 20 at 45). His Lordship said ([1998] AC 20 at 46):

> The evolution of the implied term of trust and confidence is a fact. It has not yet been endorsed by your Lordships' House. It has proved a workable principle in practice. It has not been the subject of adverse criticism in any decided cases and it has been welcomed in academic writings. I regard the emergence of the implied obligation of mutual trust and confidence as a sound development.

The implication in Australia

[35] The conclusion reached by the House of Lords in Malik must be understood in the context of the existing body of decisions made by the courts and tribunals of the United Kingdom, reflecting a consensus as to the implication which predated Malik (See eg Courtaulds Northern Textiles Ltd v Andrew [1979] IRLR 84; Woods v WM Car Services (Peterborough) Ltd [1981] ICR 666; Imperial Group Pension Trust Ltd v Imperial Tobacco Ltd [1991] 1 WLR 589. See generally Lindsay, "The Implied Term of Trust and Confidence" (2001) 30 Industrial Law Journal 1). The history of the development of the term in the United Kingdom is not applicable to Australia. There is a background of approving references to the implied term in decisions of Australian State and federal courts (See eg Burazin v Blacktown City Guardian Pty Ltd (1996) 142 ALR 144; Perkins v Grace Worldwide (Aust) Pty Ltd (1997) 72 IR 186; Irving v Kleinman [2005] NSWCA 116; Delooze v Healey [2007] WASCA 157; Shaw v New South Wales (2012) 219 IR 87). The strength of those approving references, however, depends upon the analysis underpinning them. In South Australia v McDonald, decided in 2009, the Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia observed that, with the exception of two first instance decisions, none of the Australian authorities to that date had "addressed in any detail the basis for the implication of the implied term" ((2009) 104 SASR 344 at 388 [227]). In that case, the Full Court concluded that the extensive statutory and regulatory context in which the contract in question operated rendered the implied term unnecessary ((2009) 104 SASR 344 at 398 [270]). In an obiter statement, their Honours acknowledged that it had long been recognised in Australia that contracts of employment involve "elements of mutual confidence."((2009) 104 SASR 344 at 385 [215]) They related the development of the implied term to a contemporary view of the employment relationship as one of common interests and partnership ((2009) 104 SASR 344 at 389 [231]).

[36] There have been passing references to the duty in two decisions of this Court, neither of which constituted a determination that the duty should be implied (Concut Pty Ltd v Worrell (2000) 75 ALJR 312 at 322 [51] per Kirby J; 176 ALR 693 at 706; Koehler v Cerebos (Australia) Ltd (2005) 222 CLR 44 at 55 [24] per McHugh, Gummow, Hayne and Heydon JJ). In the end, while taking appropriate note of the decisions of State and federal courts, this Court must determine the existence of the implied duty by reference to the principles governing implications of terms in law in a class of contract. That requires this Court to determine whether the proposed implication is "necessary" in the sense that would justify the exercise of the judicial power in a way that may have a significant impact upon employment relationships and the law of the contract of employment in this country. The broad concept of "necessity" discussed earlier in these reasons may be defined by reference to what "the nature of the contract itself implicitly requires" (Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239 at 254 per Lord Wilberforce). It may be demonstrated by the futility of the transaction absent the implication (Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239 at 255 per Lord Wilberforce citing Miller v Hancock [1893] 2 QB 177 at 181 per Bowen LJ). It is not satisfied by demonstrating the reasonableness of the implied term (University of Western Australia v Gray (2009) 179 FCR 346 at 376 [139] and authorities there cited).

[37] The duty to cooperate satisfies the criterion of necessity explained in Byrne. The implied term of mutual trust and confidence, however, imposes mutual obligations wider than those which are "necessary", even allowing for the broad considerations which may inform implications in law. It goes to the maintenance of a relationship. It appears, at least in part, to be informed by a view of the employment contract as "relational", a characteristic of uncertain application in this context and not one which was advanced on behalf of Mr Barker. The implied term cannot be treated as a particular application to employment contracts of the duty to cooperate, which applies to contracts generally. That duty is directly related to contractual performance, which explains to some degree why it can arguably be characterised as a rule of construction.

[38] The duty of mutual trust and confidence is proposed in this appeal as an implication apposite to the disposition of a particular dispute in which an employee complains of an employer's conduct. Yet it is an implication which would impose obligations not only on employers but also on employees, whose voices about that consequence of the implication are not heard in this appeal. Neither party had a direct interest in putting submissions to the Court about the burden the implication might place on employees. While the mutuality of an obligation and its effect upon a range of interests is not a bar to its implication, it locates the propounded implication close to the boundary between judicial law-making and that which is within the province of the legislature.

[39] The need for a cautious approach to the implication is underlined by the observation in the fourth edition of Deakin and Morris's Labour Law, that "[i]n its most far-reaching form [the development of the implied term] could be said to mark an extension of the duty of co-operation 'from the restricted obligation not to prevent or hinder the occurrence of an express condition upon which performance of the contract depends to a positive obligation to take all those steps which are necessary to achieve the purposes of the employment relationship …'." (Deakin and Morris, Labour Law, 4th ed (2005) at 335 [4.91] quoting Hepple, Hepple & O'Higgins: Employment Law, 4th ed (1981) at 135). That extension was said to reflect a broader functional view, essentially a tribunal's view, of good industrial relations practice, embracing not only the material conditions of employment such as pay and safety, but also the psychological conditions which are essential to the performance by an employee of his or her part of the bargain (Deakin and Morris, Labour Law, 4th ed (2005) at 335 [4.91] quoting Hepple, Hepple & O'Higgins: Employment Law, 4th ed (1981) at 135).

[40] The complex policy considerations encompassed by those views of the implication mark it, in the Australian context, as a matter more appropriate for the legislature than for the courts to determine. It may, of course, be open to legislatures to enshrine the implied term in statutory form and leave it to the courts, according to the processes of the common law, to construe and apply it. It is a different thing for the courts to assume that responsibility for themselves. The mutual aspect of the obligation cannot be put to one side by characterising its operation with respect to employees as merely a restatement of the existing duty of fidelity. It is more broadly worded than that obligation. As Jessup J observed in his dissenting judgment in the Full Court, the proposed implied duty of mutual trust and confidence might apply to conduct by employees which was neither intentional nor negligent and did not breach their implied duty of fidelity, but objectively caused serious disruption to the conduct of their employer's business ((2013) 214 FCR 450 at 518 [304]).

[41] Importantly, the implied duty of trust and confidence as propounded in Malik is directed, in broad terms, to the relationship between employer and employee rather than to performance of the contract. It depends upon a view of social conditions and desirable social policy that informs a transformative approach to the contract of employment in law. It should not be accepted as applicable, by the judicial branch of government, to employment contracts in Australia.

[42] The above conclusion should not be taken as reflecting upon the question whether there is a general obligation to act in good faith in the performance of contracts. Nor does it reflect upon the related question whether contractual powers and discretions may be limited by good faith and rationality requirements analogous to those applicable in the sphere of public law (See eg Paterson, "Implied Fetters on the Exercise of Discretionary Contractual Powers" (2009) 35 Monash University Law Review 45 at 59, 73). Those questions were not before the Court in this appeal.

[43] Mr Barker also sought to support the decision of the Full Court by way of a notice of contention and the submission that the term of mutual trust and confidence should be implied as a matter of fact in the Agreement. For the reasons already given, the term did not answer the criterion of necessity required to support its implication in law in employment contracts generally. Mr Barker's counsel was unable to point to any particular feature of the Agreement that would support its implication in fact, albeit he referred to Mr Barker's seniority, his long and distinguished career with the Bank, and the silence of the contract on matters of trust and confidence. The submission in support of an implication in fact must be rejected.

Conclusion

[44] There was a conceded entitlement to damages in favour of Mr Barker of $11,692.31 together with interest based upon a breach of cl 6 of the Agreement found by the primary judge. The Bank gave an undertaking at the special leave hearing that it would pay Mr Barker's costs of the application for special leave and the appeal and not seek costs against him if successful in the appeal, nor would it seek to disturb costs orders made below which were favourable to him.

[KIEFEL and GAGELER JJ delivered separate judgments allowing the appeal.]

Appeal allowed.

Good faith in the exercise of discretionary contractual powers [14.160] Courts commonly equate the duty of good faith with a duty of reasonableness in exercising a discretionary power, see for example, Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works (1992) 26 NSWLR 234, extracted at [14.80]. A related, but probably narrower requirement is that a party is not to act for an extraneous or improper purpose. Courts have emphasised that good faith or reasonableness does not prevent a party from having regard to his or her own legitimate interests in exercising a discretionary power under a contract.

Reasonableness

[14.165] On what reasonableness in the exercise of contractual powers might require, see Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works (1992) 26 NSWLR 234, at [14.80] and Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596 at [14.155].

Extraneous purpose

[14.170] In Alcatel v Scarcella [1998] 44 NSWLR 349, 368, Sheller JA (with whom Powell JA and Beazley JA agreed) in discussing the implied duty of good faith, said:

> If a contract confers power on a contracting party wider than necessary for the protection of the legitimate interests of that party, the courts may interpret the power as not extending to the > action proposed by the party in whom the power is vested or, alternatively, conclude that the powers are being exercised in a capricious or arbitrary manner or for an extraneous purpose, which is another way of saying the same thing.

This standard looks to the motive of a party in exercising contractual powers, as illustrated in Burger King Corporation v Hungry Jack's Pty Ltd [2001] NSWCA 187; (2001) 69 NSWLR 558, at [14.175] and Trampoline Enterprises Pty Ltd v Fresh Retailing Pty Ltd [2019] VSCA 74. Presumably courts should take account of the intentions of the parties as to the scope of their contract when assessing whether a purpose is extraneous to the contract.

Burger King Corporation v Hungry Jack's

[14.175] Burger King Corporation v Hungry Jack's Pty Ltd [2001] NSWCA 187; (2001) 69 NSWLR 558 (Supreme Court of New South Wales, Court of Appeal) – Appeal from a decision of Rolfe J.

[FACTS: At the time of the trial Burger King Corp (BKC) conducted a worldwide franchised fast-food system which was the second largest of such fast-food chains in the world, after McDonald's. BKC had nearly 9,000 restaurants worldwide which it conducted primarily through a uniform franchise system, although operating a small proportion of restaurants itself. Hungry Jack's Pty Ltd (HJPL) was a company within the Competitive Foods Group of companies, which operated a number of fast-food restaurant outlets, including Kentucky Fried Chicken and Domino's Pizza. HJPL was operating 148 Hungry Jack's restaurants, and had paid royalties to BKC exceeding $20 million over the six-year period from November 1990 until November 1996. In 1973, BKC and HJPL entered into a number of formal franchise agreements. Under these arrangements, HJPL operated restaurants under the name "Hungry Jack's" but used the BKC system and trademarks for operating those restaurants.

In 1990, after several years of disputes the parties entered into four agreements, including the Development Agreement, which, together with the individual franchise agreements in respect of each of HJPL's Hungry Jack's stores, governed the contractual relationship of the parties. Under the Development Agreement HJPL had an unrestricted, non-exclusive right to develop restaurants throughout Australia. HJPL was also required to develop a total of at least four restaurants per year in Western Australia, South Australia and Queensland. In complying with the Development Agreement HJPL was required to obtain individual franchises for each restaurant developed under the Agreement. This in turn involved obtaining certain approvals, namely operational, financial and legal approval, for each newly developed restaurant. Clause 4 of the Development Agreement provided that the approvals were at the "sole discretion" of BKC. The clause also specified a number of matters relevant to those approvals. From at least 1993, BKC determined to take a more active role in the Australian market, including buying out HJPL or making it the minority party in some form of joint venture arrangement. It also had discussions with other parties with the same intent, namely, of reducing HJPL's role in the Australian market.

There were continuing disputes between the parties. From the end of March 1995, Jim Montgomery, HJPL's National Development Manager, began communicating directly with BKC, providing information, advice and recommendations. BKC utilised Montgomery's assistance for its benefit to the detriment of HJPL up until after the proceedings were commenced. In 1995, BKC imposed a freeze on HJPL recruiting third party franchisees. It also withdrew financial and operational approval from HJPL. The effect of these actions was to impede HJPL's development of new outlets as required by the Development Agreement. On 18 November 1996, BKC served a Notice of Termination of the Development Agreement, alleging a failure by HJPL to develop the required number of stores as specified in cl 2.1 of the Development Agreement.

In November 1996, HJPL commenced proceedings against BKC. The trial judge found in favour of HJPL and awarded damages. BKC appealed. The following extract deals with the alleged breaches by BKC of certain implied terms.]

SHELLER, BEAZLEY AND STEIN JJA: …

[141] HJPL claimed that there were implied into the Development Agreement terms: that BKC would do all that was reasonably necessary to enable HJPL to enjoy the benefits of, inter alia, the Development Agreement (the implied term of co-operation); that BKC must act reasonably in exercising its powers under the Development Agreement; and that there was an implied obligation on BKC to act in good faith in the exercise of its contractual powers. [142] Rolfe J held that these terms could be implied and that there had been a breach of each of the implied terms. His Honour concluded that the consequence of BKC being in breach was that HJPL was "dispensed … of the necessity to continue performance". His Honour also held: "in the absence of [a] factual justification there would be no basis [for BKC] to exercise the sole … discretion [under cl 4.1 of the Development Agreement]." [143] BKC disputed that there were implied terms of reasonableness and good faith and also disputed that it was in breach of any of the implied terms as found by Rolfe J …. [144] The implication of the implied term of co-operation was not controversial nor a matter in dispute between the parties: see Mackay v Dick (1881) 6 App Cas 251 where Lord Blackburn stated at 263 that:

> as a general rule, … where in a written contract it appears that both parties have agreed that something shall be done, which cannot effectually be done unless both concur in doing it, the construction of the contract is that each agrees to do all that is necessary to be done on his part for the carrying out of that thing, though there may be no express words to that effect.

[145] In relation to the second and third of these terms Rolfe J held that he was bound by decisions of this Court: "to hold that there is an implied term of either reasonableness or a duty of good faith or, perhaps both." …

[The Court referred to the judgments of the court in Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works (1992) 26 NSWLR 234 and Alcatel Australia Ltd v Scarcella & others (1998) 44 NSWLR 349, and of Finn J in Hughes Aircraft Systems International v Airservices Australia (1997) 76 FCR 151.]

[159] A review of cases since Alcatel indicates that courts in various Australian jurisdictions have, for the most part, proceeded upon an assumption that there may be implied, as a legal incident of a commercial contract, terms of good faith and reasonableness. For example, in Far Horizons Pty Ltd v McDonald's Australia Ltd [2000] VSC 310 Byrne J, in dealing with the provisions of a standard licence agreement whereby independent operators were licensed to conduct McDonald's fast food stores, said at para 120:

> … I do not see myself at liberty to depart from the considerable body of authority in this country which has followed the decisions of the New South Court of Appeal in Renard Construction (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works. I proceed, therefore, on the basis that there is to be implied in a franchise agreement a term of good faith and fair dealing which obliges each party to exercise the powers conferred upon it by the agreement in good faith and reasonably, and not capriciously or for some extraneous purpose. Such a term is a legal incident of such a contract. [160]

In Garry Rogers Motors (Aust) Pty Ltd v Subaru (Aust) Pty Ltd (1999) ATPR 41-703, which involved a standard form motor vehicle dealership agreement, Finkelstein J said at 43,014:

> The first respondent was prepared to accept the implication of [a term of good faith] in the dealership agreement for the purposes of the interlocutory application. It could hardly do otherwise. Recent cases make it clear that in appropriate contracts, perhaps even in all commercial contracts, such a term will ordinarily be implied; not as an ad hoc term (based on the presumed intention of the parties) but as a legal incident of the relationship; see Renard v Constructions (Vic) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works; Hughes Bros Pty Ltd v The Trustees of the Roman Catholic Church for the Archdiocese of Sydney & Anor; Alcatel Australia Ltd v Scarcella & Ors.

> If such a term is implied it will require a contracting party to act in good faith and fairly, not only in relation to the performance of a contractual obligation, but also in the exercise of a power conferred by the contract. There is no reason to think, prima facie at least, that the obligation of good faith and fair dealing would not act as a restriction on a power to terminate a contract, especially if that power is in general terms.

[161] In Saxby Bridge Mortgages Pty Ltd v Saxby Bridge Pty Ltd [2000] NSWSC 433, Simos J rejected the implication of a term of good faith in an agreement, inter alia, for the provision of mortgage services. However, his Honour approached the question on the basis of whether the conditions necessary for the implication of a term, ad hoc, had been satisfied. He does not appear to have considered whether such a term was a necessary legal incident of the contract. Saxby Bridge appears to stand on its own in this regard.

[162] In Asia Television Ltd v Yau's Entertainment Pty Ltd (2000) 48 IPR 283 Gyles J stated that the implication of a term to act in good faith in a licence agreement, in which the second applicant licensed entertainment programmes for reproduction and distribution by the respondent, and the scope and content of such a clause were "controversial questions". Without finally determining whether there were such implied terms, his Honour held that there was no relevant application of such an obligation on the facts of that case. [163] This necessarily brief survey of the case law post Alcatel indicates that obligations of good faith and reasonableness will be more readily implied in standard form contracts, particularly if such contracts contain a general power of termination. Clearly, however, the cases where these terms are to be implied are not limited to standard form agreements. Alcatel itself, which involved a 50-year lease agreement of commercial premises, provides an example of a one off contract where such terms were implied.

[164] There also appears to be increasing acceptance (Saxby Bridge aside) that if terms of good faith and reasonableness are to be implied, they are to be implied as a matter of law. We consider that to be correct. The argument by Mr Archibald, senior counsel for BKC, proceeded on that basis. He submitted, however, that the pre-conditions for the implication of a term at law had not been satisfied in this case, and that the implication was unnecessary as the contract comprehensively dealt with the rights of the parties. This raises the question of when a term will be implied at law.

[165] Traditionally, specific terms have been implied as a matter of law into contracts of a certain class. Examples include contracts between employer/employee (implied term not to disclose secret processes), for the sale of goods (implied terms of reasonable fitness and merchantable quality and that payment and delivery of goods are concurrent obligations), for the provision of work and materials, between landlord and tenant (implied term that premises will be reasonably fit for habitation) and in contracts of carriage by sea (an implied warranty of seaworthiness): see Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410 at 448; Castlemaine Tooheys Ltd v Carlton & United Breweries Ltd (1987) 10 NSWLR 468 at 487; Professor Glanville Williams, "Language and the Law" (1945) 61 Law Quarterly Review 403. Of course, some of these are implications now codified by statute: for example, contracts for sale of goods under the Sale of Goods Act 1923 (NSW).

[166] The Development Agreement does not fall into any of the traditional class of cases where terms have been implied as an incident of the contract.

[167] For a term to be implied at law in a new category of case, it must be both reasonable and necessary: see Castlemaine Toohey and Byrne. In Byrne, McHugh and Gummow JJ explained the meaning of necessity in this context. They said at 450:

> Many of the terms now said to be implied by law in various categories of case reflect the concern of the courts that, unless such a term be implied, the enjoyment of the rights conferred by the contract would or could be rendered nugatory, worthless, or, perhaps, be seriously undermined. Hence, the reference in the decisions to "necessity" ….
> This notion of "necessity" has been crucial in the modern cases in which the courts have implied for the first time a new term as a matter of law. (Emphasis added)

[168] It is within the framework of that notion of necessity that we consider in detail the submissions of each of the parties as to whether there should be implied into the Development Agreement the terms of good faith and reasonableness. Before doing so however, it is convenient to understand what is involved in those terms if they are implied.

Meaning of good faith and reasonableness

[14.180] [169] We have already touched upon this: see especially from para 146. However, it is worth noting that the Australian cases make no distinction of substance between the implied term of reasonableness and that of good faith. As Priestley JA said in Renard at 263: "The kind of reasonableness I have been discussing seems to me to have much in common with the notions of good faith".

[170] Priestley JA commented further at 265 that: "… in ordinary English usage there has been constant association between the words fair and reasonable. Similarly there is a close association of ideas between the terms unreasonableness, lack of good faith and unconscionability."

[171] Rolfe J observed that in Alcatel, Sheller JA at 369 appeared to equate the notions of "reasonableness" and "good faith". Whilst Sheller JA did not say that in terms, his review of the case law and academic and extra-judicial writings on the topic, clearly support the proposition. In addition to his references to Renard, Sheller JA referred to the statement of Sir Anthony Mason in his 1993 Cambridge Lecture, that it was probable that the concept of good faith "embraced no less than three related notions":

(1) an obligation on the parties to co-operate in achieving the contractual objects (loyalty to the promise itself);

(2) compliance with honest standards of conduct; and

(3) compliance with standards of contract which are reasonable having regard to the interests of the parties.

[172] In Garry Rogers, Finkelstein J considered at 43,014 that such a term imposed an obligation on a party "not to act capriciously". He pointed out, however, that such a term will not restrict a party acting so as to promote its own "legitimate interests". As his Honour explained, "provided the party exercising the power acts reasonably in all the circumstances the duty to act fairly and in good faith will ordinarily be satisfied".

[173] The same point was made in Kham & Nates Shoes (No 2) Inc v First Bank of Whiting (1990) 908 F 2d 1351, at 1357, that "[p]rinciples of good faith … do not block use of terms that actually appear in the contract". There must be something more. This was explained in Metropolitan Life Insurance Co v RJR Nabisco Inc (1989) 716 F Supp 1504, at 1517:

> In other words, the implied covenant will only aid and further the explicit terms of the agreement and will never impose an obligation "which would be inconsistent with other terms of the contractual relationship" … Viewed another way, the implied covenant of good faith is breached only when one party seeks to prevent the contract's performance or to withhold its benefits …. As a result, it thus ensures that parties to a contract perform the substantive, bargained-for terms of their agreement.

See also Rio Algom Corp v Jimco Ltd (1980) Utah, 618 P 2d 497.

[174] BKC submitted that there should not be implied into the Development Agreement implied terms of reasonableness or good faith (or any hybrid of the two). It raised two general objections to the implication of such terms. First, it was said that caution should be exercised in implying any such terms, as "such terms are calculated to subvert and distort the carefully negotiated and articulated contractual balance which the parties have achieved".

[175] Secondly, it was submitted that such a term should not be implied where the application would occasion contradiction of, or friction with, express provisions of the contract: see for example Metropolitan Life Insurance Co v RJR Nabisco Incorporated. It was submitted that His Honour erred in not asking whether there would be such contradiction or friction. It was then submitted that as the express provisions of the Development Agreement "comprehensively and exhaustively delineate the rights and obligations of the parties [they] cover the field" and any implied term of reasonableness or good faith would "pro tanto" be inconsistent. The provisions of cl 4.1(a) and cl 4.2 were said to demonstrate this point. [176] Those clauses, it was submitted, established an "objective benchmark against which the grant or withholding of operational approval" was to be made. It was submitted that "[t]he introduction of a generalised qualification of reasonableness to that subject matter would alter the expressly formulated benchmark and … effect a substantive modification to the operation of the express term". We understand this submission to mean that the objective benchmarks were the need to have operational, financial and legal approval as defined in cl 4.2. This submission is acceptable in so far as it goes. However, it does not grapple with two fundamental issues. First, the granting of operational, financial and legal approval is within "the sole discretion" of BKC. If full force is given to that concept, it would allow BKC to give or to withhold relevant approval "at its whim" including capriciously, or with the sole intent of engineering a default of the Development Agreement, giving rise to a right to terminate. That is hardly the language of objectivity. The point is well illustrated by the observations of Priestley JA in Renard at 258 [see above, p 466] ….

[177] Secondly, on BKC's submission, an exercise of discretion on wrong facts fell within the ambit of cl 4.1 provided that the wrong facts were not fraudulently determined. That too would permit BKC to effectively put an end to HJPL's valuable development rights under the Development Agreement for reasons which could not be justified on the facts if they were accurately ascertained. In our opinion, applying the words used by McHugh and Gummow JJ in Byrne, the "enjoyment of the rights conferred by the contract would or could be rendered nugatory, worthless or perhaps seriously undermined" if the clause was able to operate in the manner for which BKC contended.

[178] BKC sought to resist this result by submitting that the clause remained workable without the implication, as a fraudulent exercise of the discretion would not satisfy the clause (which is correct) and that de minimis breaches would not permit an exercise of discretion against the grant of approval. In regard to the latter point, it was submitted that whilst de minimis contraventions of operation or financial requirements were simply "to be disregarded", minor breaches were not.

[179] On HJPL's construction of cl 4.1, the matters specified in subcl (a), subcl (b) and subcl (c) operate as conditions precedent to grant of approval to a franchise application. HJPL submitted, however, that the criteria for operational approval were wide and indefinite in two respects.

[180] First, cl 4.1(a) required that the interior and exterior of restaurants be maintained to reflect "an acceptable Burger King image". Mr Bathurst, senior counsel for HJPL, sought to demonstrate this point by reference to the requirement to comply with the standard specifications and procedures contained in BKC's Manual of Operating Data. The manual contains the most detailed requirements relating to every aspect of operating a Burger King restaurant from food handling to recruiting, cleaning and manner and style of service. Page five of the Service Procedure Requirements provides an example. It sets out a nine phase service procedure starting with the first requirement "smile greet and order" and ending with the "smile thank you and parting phrase" such as "thanks very much, have a great day" or "thanks for coming, hope to see you again soon". Senior counsel submitted it would be impossible not to find at least one operational breach in each restaurant, so that, unless some restriction was placed upon the operation of cl 4.1 the rights under the Development Agreement would be illusory.

[181] Secondly, it confers upon BKC the right to change its standards, specifications and procedures at its sole discretion. It would appear to follow, on this submission, that it could do so without notice to HJPL, there being no contractual obligation to give notice of the change, unless the provision was conditioned by an obligation of reasonableness or good faith.

[182] Senior counsel further submitted that BKC's response that a de minimis breach would not disqualify a contracting party from operational approval did not provide an adequate answer to this problem because of the uncertainty that this would otherwise import into the operation of the clause.

Rather, it was necessary to imply the terms of reasonableness and good faith so as to ensure that HJPL had the contractual benefits to which it was entitled under the Development Agreement.

[183] In our opinion, HJPL's submission must be correct. There is such an extraordinary range of detailed considerations, particularly in relation to whether operational requirements have been satisfied, contained within cl 4.1(a), that unless there was an implied requirement of reasonableness and good faith, BKC could, for the slightest of breaches, bring to an end the very valuable rights which HJPL had under the Development Agreement. Further, contrary to BKC's submissions, cl 4 does not contain only objective criteria against which the discretion is to be exercised. There are many subjective, evaluative notions involved. The reflection of "an acceptable Burger King image" is one example. Senior counsel's example is another. [184] The meaning of cl 4.1(b) provides further support for the implication of these terms. That clause requires that for the purposes of financial approval, HJPL's stores must all be performing their obligations under their individual franchise agreements and HJPL must not be in default of any of its financial obligations to BKC. These two criteria qualify as objective benchmarks against which to grant, or not to grant, financial approval. However, BKC contended that HJPL's obligations under cl 4.1(b) went further and that the provision that HJPL "acknowledges and agrees that it is vital to BKC's interest that a franchisee be financially sound to avoid a business failure affecting the reputation and good name of the Burger King marks" imposed a contractual requirement to that effect on HJPL. The other possible construction of this part of cl 4.1(b), and that favoured by HJPL, is that it was no more than an acknowledgment of a particular circumstance and did not impose a contractual obligation.

[185] For present purposes, and without deciding the matter, we propose to assume that BKC's submission on this is correct and that this part of cl 4(1)(b) has contractual content. Once that assumption is made, it can be immediately seen that the provision is also wide and can have both an objective and subjective content. That being so, it reinforces our view that BKC's contractual powers under cl 4.1 are to be exercised in good faith and reasonably. That does not mean that BKC is not entitled to have regard only to its own legitimate interests in exercising its discretion. However, it must not do so for a purpose extraneous to the contract – for example, by withholding financial or operational approval where there is no basis to do so, so as to thwart HJPL's rights under the contract.

[186] In conclusion, therefore, we are of the opinion that the Development Agreement is subject to implied terms of reasonableness and good faith and his Honour was correct to so find.

[187] We should observe at this point that contrary to the submission of BKC, his Honour did not equate the implication of the terms of reasonableness and good faith with BKC's fiduciary obligations. In other words, his Honour did not find that BKC was required to prefer HJPL's interests to its own or to subjugate its interests to those of the respondents – the fiduciary duty point. Rather, his Honour found that the discretion conferred in cl 4.1 was one which was required to be exercised reasonably, so that it could not be used for a purpose foreign to that for which it was granted, such as to thwart HJPL's right to develop and ultimately to procure a situation where the Agreement could be terminated. This approach is consistent with the principles stated in South Sydney District Rugby League Football Club v News Ltd (2000) 177 ALR 611 and is the conclusion to which we have come.

Breach of the implied terms of good faith and reasonableness

[14.185] [The court held that BKC had breached the implied terms in the Development Agreement requiring co-operation, good faith and reasonableness. It had done this by imposing the third party freeze and by withdrawing financial and operational approval. In reaching this conclusion the court made the following comments:]

Third party freeze

… [223] BKC did not seek to support the freeze on any contractual basis. The freeze was imposed at a time when BKC had made a policy decision to, in some way, take back the Australian market. It was clear that what was meant by this was that it was actively seeking ways to at least reduce HJPL's dominant role if it could not remove it from the market altogether. One of the means available to HJPL to both satisfy the development schedule and to develop generally was through third party franchisee arrangements. HJPL was precluded from doing so from mid May 1995 at a time when there was evidence that there was active interest by prospective franchisee applicants. Although in May 1995 there may have been a reasonable basis to suspend the processing of applications for a short time, there was no basis for BKC to do so from at least early June 1995 onwards.

[224] We consider, therefore, that the continued imposition of the freeze was in breach of the implied terms of reasonableness and good faith.

Financial disapproval

… [306] The foregoing demonstrates a number of things. First, BKC asserted a right to conduct an annual financial review when it had no right to do so.

[307] Secondly, BKC's conduct at this time could not properly be characterised as an annual financial review of HJPL …. However, even if BKC was conducting an annual financial review and such review was permitted by the Development Agreement, the Development Agreement did not authorise withdrawal of financial approval pending completion of the review.

[308] Next, BKC's failure to grant financial approval after the time it had assessed HJPL as having complied with its ratios, was a breach of the implied term of good faith …. [310] In our opinion, the evidence clearly establishes that BKC's conduct is properly characterised as being directed not to furthering its legitimate rights under the Development Agreement but to preventing HJPL from performing its obligations under the Development Agreement. As Rolfe J put it: "In the end, I am forced to the conclusion that it was in pursuance of a deliberate plan to prevent HJPL expanding, and to enable BKC to develop the Australian market unhindered by its contractual arrangements with HJPL." [311] We agree with this conclusion ….

… [368] In our opinion, all these matters: namely, the failure to deliver a list of restaurants in the "Needs Improvement" category; the failure to forward the Franchise Action Plan to HJPL until October 1995; the failure to comply with its side of the process specified in detail in the Expansion Policy of at least ten visits per year, was unreasonable and lacking in good faith in the sense in which we have explained those concepts.

[369] We are also of the opinion that BKC's conduct in disapproving, in the manner and at the time it did, was a breach of the implied obligation of co-operation. It was apparent that the Expansion Policy required performance by both parties to achieve its purpose. We are of the opinion that, in order for HJPL to be able to effectively move to improve the categorisation of a restaurant from "Needs Improvement", it was incumbent upon BKC to provide the specified means for it to do so. That required BKC to promptly provide a Franchise Action Plan at the time it did its classification, in January/February 1995 and to visit the restaurants in accordance with the Policy. It did neither.

[370] Accordingly, we agree with his Honour's conclusion that BKC had not established that it was entitled in its sole discretion to operationally disapprove HJPL ….

[374] We have concluded that BKC breached its obligations of good faith and reasonableness by its conduct in imposing the third party freeze, and in financially and operationally disapproving HJPL from further expansion. In reaching that conclusion, we have focused on the conduct of BKC, including by reference to the way critical aspects of that conduct closely followed Montgomery's recommendations. We have, as a separate exercise, found it useful to review Montgomery's conduct in communicating directly with BKC, as a benchmark against which to independently assess BKC's actions in respect of the third party freeze and financial and operational disapproval. We review Montgomery's conduct by way of overview. [422] The trial judge made reference to the conduct of Montgomery in passing on HJPL's confidential information to BKC and in providing other advice to them which he clearly perceived would benefit BKC and perhaps also himself and would not benefit HJPL. His Honour found at para 17 that BKC was: "… content to … use [such material] to advance BKC's position."

> There were compelling examples of Montgomery's advice being followed, shortly after it was received, by BKC. I do not consider that this was merely coincidental …. [and that] BKC was prepared to go to [considerable lengths] … to use the material to seek to undermine the position of HJPL.

[424] His Honour further found that these activities "were carried out in the context of BKC's wishing to regain control of the Australian market", a strategy which commenced at least in 1993. He said that there was no commercially acceptable reason for Montgomery's conduct and that BKC's conduct was "commercially reprehensible". He found that not only was BKC acting behind HJPL's back but it was utilising the advice from Montgomery, knowing him to be a trusted employee of HJPL "to formulate its strategy against HJPL". [425] These findings, in our opinion, are incontestable and reinforce our conclusion that BKC acted in breach of its obligations of good faith in its dealings with HJPL over the issues of the third party freeze and financial and operational disapproval.

[The court also held that BKC's conduct in imposing the third party freeze and withdrawing financial and operational approval was a breach of the express terms of the Development Agreement. The court varied the damages award.]

Appeal allowed in part.

Legitimate interests

[14.190] A duty of good faith will not preclude a party from acting to protect his or her own legitimate interests. Thus, in South Sydney District Rugby League Football Club Ltd v News Ltd (2000) 177 ALR 611, 696, Finn J said that good faith will "not operate so as to restrict decisions and actions, reasonably taken, which are designed to promote the legitimate interests of a party and which are not otherwise in breach of an express contractual term". The concept is also considered in Garry Rogers Motors (Aust) Pty Ltd v Subaru (Aust) Pty Ltd [1999] FCA 903. This case also considered the possible breach of s 51AC of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) (now s 21 of the Australian Consumer Law, discussed in Chapter 38).

Garry Rogers Motors (Aust) v Subaru (Aust)

[14.195] Garry Rogers Motors (Aust) Pty Ltd v Subaru (Aust) Pty Ltd [1999] FCA 903 (Federal Court of Australia).

[FACTS: On 21 May 1991, Garry Rogers Motors, the applicant, was appointed by Subaru, the first respondent, as an authorised dealer of Subaru motor vehicles. Under the agreement between the parties, either party could terminate the agreement by notice in writing and the termination would be effective 60 days after notice had been given.

After its appointment as a Subaru dealer, the applicant updated its showroom and purchased plant and equipment to the value of approximately $110,000. It spent approximately a further $40,000 for staff training, advertising and the acquisition of stock. Since the introduction of sales targets in about 1995, the applicant reached or marginally exceeded those targets. In 1997 first respondent introduced what it called its "Six-Star Revitalisation Program". The program called for changes to dealer showrooms, service departments and spare parts departments. It required the adoption of a uniform and distinctive interior and exterior decoration, new signage, improvements in the standard of service and the like. In February 1998, Mr Cassar, the network development manager of the first respondent, attended the applicant's showroom and identified a number of areas where the showroom facilities and the practices adopted by the applicant did not conform to the program. In 6 May 1998, Mr Cassar met Mr Rogers, a director of the applicant. Mr Rogers indicated that he did not wish to comply with the program in respect of the showroom size, the signage, the colour of the tiles, paint and carpets and the reporting requirements. Mr Rogers later advised the first respondent that the applicant was willing to increase the size of the showroom. As to the other matters, Mr Rogers explained why he thought that they should not be carried out. Some he described as "pedantic". Others he described as unappealing. On 17 June 1998, the first respondent gave written notice of its "intention to terminate [the] relationship" between itself and the applicant. It advised that "the termination date [was] to be effective July 1 1999." The applicant subsequently advised that it now wished to adopt the Six-Star Program. The first respondent still maintained that the dealership was being terminated. The applicant commenced proceedings seeking an injunction restraining the first respondent giving effect to the termination.]

FINKELSTEIN J: … [34] The first of the two substantive arguments that the applicant has put forward in support of an interlocutory injunction is based on the alleged implied term of good faith and fair dealing. The first respondent was prepared to accept the implication of such a term in the dealership agreement for the purposes of the interlocutory application. It could hardly do otherwise. Recent cases make it clear that in appropriate contracts, perhaps even in all commercial contracts, such a term will ordinarily be implied; not as an ad hoc term (based on the presumed intention of the parties) but as a legal incident of the relationship: see eg Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works [1992] 26 NSWLR 234; Hughes Aircraft Systems International v Airservices Australia (1997) 146 ALR 1; Alcatel Australia Ltd v Scarcella [1998] 44 NSWLR 349.

[35] If such term is implied it will require a contracting party to act in good faith and fairly, not only in relation to the performance of a contractual obligation, but also in the exercise of a power conferred by the contract. There is no reason to think, prima facie at least, that the obligation of good faith and fair dealing would not act as a restriction on a power to terminate a contract, especially if that power is in general terms.

[36] It remains for me to decide whether the implication of that duty results in the conclusion that the first respondent has acted in breach of it.

[37] In my view, a term of a contract that requires a party to act in good faith and fairly, imposes an obligation upon that party not to act capriciously. It would not operate so as to restrict actions designed to promote the legitimate interests of that party. That is to say, provided the party exercising the power acts reasonably in all the circumstances, the duty to act fairly and in good faith will ordinarily be satisfied.

[38] However, whatever the precise content of the restriction on the exercise of a contractual power to terminate a contract is, it has not been exceeded in this case. I say this for two reasons. First, the first respondent did have good reason to terminate the dealership when it served its notice in June 1998. It had decided that its Six-Point Program was an appropriate means of improving the position of its dealers in the marketplace. It had requested the applicant to adopt the program in full and the applicant had refused to do so. The first respondent was entitled to treat this conduct as being contrary to its own business interests and to act accordingly. The second reason is that thirteen months' notice of termination was given. So far as the evidence discloses, this was a sufficient period of notice to enable the applicant to reorganise its affairs to accommodate the loss of the dealership, to the extent that it was able to do so. At least, it has not been suggested that the period of notice was unreasonable.

… [40] The second substantive point argued by the applicant was that in giving the notice of termination and, more importantly, in failing to withdraw that notice after the applicant had indicated its willingness to abide by the Six-Star Program, the first respondent had acted unconscionably, in contravention of s 51AC of the Trade Practices Act 1974 [now s 22 of the ACL] [41] I will assume, as the first respondent suggested I might, that s 51AC has application to the facts of this case. Section 51AC(1) is in the following terms:

A corporation must not, in trade or commerce, in connection with:

(a) the supply or possible supply of goods or services to a person (other than a listed public company); or

(b) the acquisition or possible acquisition of goods or services from a person (other than a listed public company); engage in conduct that is, in all the circumstances, unconscionable.

… [43] Section 51AC sets out the matters to which regard may be had in determining whether there has been unconscionable conduct in relation to the supply of goods or services. One of the matters mentioned is the "requirements of any applicable industry code": see s 51AC(3)(g). There is an applicable industry code: the "Franchising Code of Conduct". That code came into operation on 1 July 1998. However, by clause 5 most of its provisions did not take effect until 1 October 1998. The code is applicable to the facts of this case, because clause 4(2) provides that a motor vehicle dealership agreement is to be taken as a franchise agreement for the purposes of the code.

[44] Relevant for present purposes is clause 22. It provides:

(1) This clause applies if a franchisor terminates a franchise agreement:

(a) before it expires; and

(b) without the consent of the franchisee; and

(c) if the franchisee has not breached the franchise agreement; and

(d) clause 23 does not apply.

For paragraph (1)(b), a condition of a franchise agreement that a franchisor can terminate the franchise agreement without the consent of the franchisee is not taken to be consent.

(2) Before terminating the franchise agreement, the franchisor must give reasonable written notice of the proposed termination, and reasons for it, to the franchisee.

(3) Part 4 (resolving disputes) applies in relation to a dispute arising from termination under this clause.

[45] It will be noticed that this clause permits the termination of a franchise agreement before the expiry of the term of that agreement even if the franchisee has not breached the agreement. However, before terminating the agreement, the franchisor must (a) give reasonable written notice of the proposed termination and (b) provide written reasons for the termination. The first requirement has been satisfied. Thirteen months' notice was given. The second requirement has not been complied with. The first respondent did not provide written reasons for the termination. However, in the circumstances I do not regard this failure as constituting unconscionable conduct. The reason is that the applicant was aware that one factor, if not the principal factor, motivating the termination was its failure to adopt the Six-Star Program. It is true that the first respondent contends that there were other reasons why the notice of termination was given. Mr Cassar has said that he orally informed Mr Rogers of those reasons and this is one of the matters that are in dispute. Nevertheless it seems clear enough, in my opinion, that even if there were no other reasons for the termination, the dealership would have been terminated in consequence of the failure by the applicant to adopt the Six-Star Program. A failure to state in writing what the applicant knew to be the case could not constitute unconscionable conduct in my opinion. [46] Further, I do not regard the refusal by the first respondent to withdraw its notice of termination as unconscionable conduct. I take as the measure of unconscionability, conduct that might be described as unfair. In the present circumstances I do not believe that the first respondent has acted unfairly in not wishing to reinstate the applicant as a dealer. The applicant had been a dealer for seven or eight years. Whilst it was not obliged to adopt the Six-Star Program, that is, it was not contractually obliged to do so, its failure to adopt the program and its criticism of certain aspects of the program, could reasonably be regarded by the first respondent as an indication that the applicant was not willing to act in the best interests of the first respondent and of the dealership group as a whole. No doubt this led to a loss of confidence in the applicant. That loss of confidence would not necessarily be overcome by a change in attitude on the part of the applicant. Many relationships can only operate satisfactorily if there is mutual confidence and trust. Once that confidence and trust has broken down the position is not easily restored. It is not unconscionable to terminate a relationship where that trust and confidence has been undermined.

[47] For the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss the application for interlocutory relief with costs.

FRUSTRATION AS AN EXCUSE FOR NON-PERFORMANCE

[15.05] The performance of a contract may sometimes be disrupted by catastrophic events that have not been provided for by the parties in their contract. In such cases, it may be inferred that there is a gap in the parties' contract. The doctrine of frustration provides an excuse for non-performance in these sorts of cases.

WHEN IS A CONTRACT FRUSTRATED?

The test for frustration

[15.10] The modern test for determining when a contract is frustrated was expressed by Lord Radcliffe in Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham UDC [1956] AC 696, 729 as follows:

> Frustration occurs whenever the law recognises that without default of either party a contractual obligation has become incapable of being performed because the circumstances in which performance is called for would render it a thing radically different from that which was undertaken by the contract. Non haec in foedera veni. It was not this that I promised to do.

The test was approved by the High Court of Australia in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337 (extracted at [15.35]).

Illustrations

[15.15] The following cases provide illustrations of when a contract will or will not be frustrated. The modern test for frustration is based on the construction of the contract. Some of the cases, decided before Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham UDC [1956] AC 696, and Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, apply a different test of frustration. However, courts have stated on a number of occasions that the various theories of frustration produce similar results and that cases decided under the earlier theories were not wrongly decided, see for example Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham UDC

[1956] AC 696, 728; Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, 357 (extracted at [15.35]).

Destruction of subject matter

Taylor v Caldwell

[15.20] Taylor v Caldwell [1863] EWHC QB J1; (1863) 3 B & S 826; 122 ER 309 (Court of Queen's Bench – Rule to enter verdict for defendants).

[FACTS: On 27 May 1861, parties entered into a contract by which the defendants agreed to "let" and the plaintiffs agreed to "take" the Surrey Gardens and Music Hall on four days for the purpose of giving a series of four concerts, and day and night fetes for a fee of £100 for each day. After the making of the agreement, and before the first day on which a concert was to be given, the Hall was destroyed by fire. The plaintiffs lost money paid by them in preparing for the concerts, including in printing advertisements of and in advertising the concerts. The plaintiffs sought to recover this expenditure, alleging that the defendants had breached the contract.]

BLACKBURN J: [832] In this case the plaintiffs and defendants had, on the 27th May, 1861, entered into a contract by which the defendants agreed to let the plaintiffs have the use of The Surrey Gardens and Music Hall on four days then to come, viz, the 17th June, 15th July, 5th August and 19th August, for the purpose of giving a series of four grand concerts, and day and night fetes at the Gardens and Hall on those days respectively; and the plaintiffs agreed to take the Gardens and Hall on those days, and pay 100l for each day. The parties inaccurately call this a "letting," and the money to be paid a "rent;" but the whole agreement is such as to shew that the defendants were to retain the possession of the Hall and Gardens so that there was to be no demise of them, and that the contract was merely to give the plaintiffs the use of them on those days. Nothing however, in our opinion, depends on this. The agreement sets out various stipulations between the parties as to what each was to supply for these concerts and entertainments, and as to the manner in which they should be carried on. The effect of the whole is to shew that the existence of the Music Hall in the Surrey Gardens in a state fit for a concert was essential for the fulfilment of the contract – such entertainments as the parties contemplated in their agreement could not be given without it. After the making of the agreement, and before the first day on which a concert was to be given, the Hall was destroyed by fire. This destruction, we must take it on the evidence, was without the fault of either party, and was so complete that in consequence the concerts could not be given as intended. [833] And the question we have to decide is whether, under these circumstances, the loss which the plaintiffs have sustained is to fall upon the defendants. The parties when framing their agreement evidently had not present to their minds the possibility of such a disaster, and have made no express stipulation with reference to it, so that the answer to the question must depend upon the general rules of law applicable to such a contract. There seems no doubt that where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burthensome or even impossible. The law is so laid down in 1 Roll Abr 450, Condition (G), and in the note (2) to Walton v Waterhouse (2 Wms Saund 421 a 6th ed), and is recognised as the general rule by all the judges in the much discussed case of Hall v Wright (1858) EB & E 746; 120 ER 688. But this rule is only applicable when the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition either express or implied: and there are authorities which, as we think, establish the principle that where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract, they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied con-[834]dition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor.

There seems little doubt that this implication tends to further the great object of making the legal construction such as to fulfil the intention of those who entered into the contract. For in the course of affairs men in making such contracts in general would, if it were brought to their minds, say that there should be such a condition.

Accordingly, in the civil law, such an exception is implied in every obligation of the class which they call obligatio de certo corpore … [T]he principle is adopted in the civil law as applicable to every obligation of which the subject is a certain thing. The general subject is treated by Pothier, who in his Traité des Obligations, [835] states the result to be that the debtor corporis certi is freed from his obligation when the thing has perished, neither by his act, nor his neglect, and before he is in default, unless by some stipulation he has taken on himself the risk of the particular misfortune which has occurred.

Although the civil law is not of itself authority in an English court, it affords great assistance in investigating the principles on which the law is grounded. And it seems to us that the common law authorities establish that in such a contract the same condition of the continued existence of the thing is implied by English law.

There is a class of contracts in which a person binds himself to do something which requires to be performed by him in person; and such promises, for example, promises to marry, or promises to serve for a certain time, are never in practice qualified by an express exception of the death of the party; and therefore in such cases the contract is in terms broken if the promisor dies before fulfilment. Yet it was very early determined that, if the performance is personal, the executors are not liable …

[837] These are instances where the implied condition is of the life of a human being, but there are others in which the same implication is made as to the continued existence of a thing …

[839] The principle seems to us to be that, in contracts in which the performance depends on the continued existence of a given person or thing, a condition is implied that the impossibility of performance arising from the perishing of the person or thing shall excuse the performance. In none of these cases is the promise in words other than positive, nor is there any express stipulation that the destruction of the person or thing shall excuse the performance; but that excuse is by law implied, because from the nature of the contract it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the particular person or chattel. In the present case, looking at the whole contract, we find that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the Music Hall at the time when the concerts were to be given; that being essential to their performance.

[840] We think, therefore, that the Music Hall having ceased to exist, without fault of either party, both parties are excused, the plaintiffs from taking the gardens and paying the money, the defendants from performing their promise to give the use of the Hall and gardens and other things. Consequently the rule must be absolute to enter the verdict for the defendants.

[COCKBURN CJ, WIGHTMAN and CROMPTON JJ agreed with Blackburn J.]

Rule absolute.

Disappearance of the basis of the contract

[15.25] Krell v Henry [1903] 2 KB 740 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Darling J.

[FACTS: The plaintiff brought action to recover the balance of an amount for the hire of rooms by the defendant on Pall Mall on two dates under a contract constituted by correspondence between the parties. Evidence was admitted to show that on those dates the coronation procession of King Edward VII would take place and pass along Pall Mall. The coronation was postponed and the defendant declined to pay the balance due under the contract.]

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS LJ: [747] The real question in this case is the extent of the application in English law of the principle of the Roman law which has been adopted and acted on in many English decisions, and notably in the case of Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B & S 826; 122 ER 309. That case at least makes it clear that > where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless, when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that when entering into the contract they must have contemplated such continued existence as the foundation of what was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be considered a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor.

Thus far it is clear that the principle of the Roman law has been introduced into the English law. The doubt in the present case arises as to how far this principle extends. The Roman law dealt with obligationes de certo corpore. Whatever may have been the limits of the Roman law, the case of Nickoll v Ashton [1902] 2 KB 126 makes it plain that the English law applies the principle not only to cases where the performance of the contract becomes impossible by the cessation of existence of the thing which is the subject matter of the contract, but also to cases where the event which renders the contract incapable of performance is the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things, going to the root of the contract, and essential to its performance. It is said, on the one side, that the specified thing, state of things, or condition the continued existence of which is necessary for the fulfilment of the contract, so that the parties entering into the contract must have contemplated the continued existence of that thing, condition, or state of things as the foundation of what was to be done under the contract, is limited to things which are either the subject matter of the contract or a condition or state of things, present or anticipated, which is expressly [749] mentioned in the contract. But, on the other side, it is said that the condition or state of things need not be expressly specified, but that it is sufficient if that condition or state of things clearly appears by extrinsic evidence to have been assumed by the parties to be the foundation or basis of the contract, and the event which causes the impossibility is of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made. In such a case the contracting parties will not be held bound by the general words which, though large enough to include, were not used with reference to a possibility of a particular event rendering performance of the contract impossible. I do not think that the principle of the civil law as introduced into the English law is limited to cases in which the event causing the impossibility of performance is the destruction or non-existence of something which is the subject matter of the contract or of some condition or state of things expressly specified as a condition of it. I think that you first have to ascertain, not necessarily from the terms of the contract, but, if required, from necessary inferences, drawn from surrounding circumstances recognised by both contracting parties, what is the substance of the contract, and then to ask the question whether that substantial contract needs for its foundation the assumption of the existence of a particular state of things. If it does, this will limit the operation of the general words, and in such case, if the contract becomes impossible of performance by reason of the non-existence of the state of things assumed by both contracting parties as the foundation of the contract, there will be no breach of the contract thus limited. Now what are the facts of the present case? …

[750] In my judgment the use of the rooms was let and taken for the purpose of seeing the royal procession. It was not a demise of the rooms, or even an agreement to let and take the rooms. It is a licence to use rooms for a particular purpose and none other. And in my judgment the taking place of those processions on the days proclaimed along the proclaimed route, which passed 56A Pall Mall, was regarded by both contracting parties as the foundation of the contract; and I think that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties, when the contract was made, that the coronation would not be held on the proclaimed days, or the processions not take place on those days along the proclaimed route; and I think that the words imposing on the defendant the obligation to accept and pay for the use of the rooms for the named days, although general and unconditional, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards occurred. It was suggested in the course of the argument that if the occurrence, on the proclaimed days, of the coronation and the procession in this case were the foundation of the contract, and if the general words are thereby limited or qualified, so that in the event of the non-occurrence of the coronation and procession along the proclaimed route they would discharge both parties from further performance of the contract, it would follow that if a cabman was engaged to take someone to Epsom on Derby Day at a suitable enhanced price for such a journey, say £10, both parties to the contract would be discharged in the contingency of the race at Epsom for some reason becoming impossible; but I do not think this follows, for I do not think that in the cab case the happening of the race would be the foundation of the contract …

Each case must be judged by its own circumstances. In each case one must ask oneself, first, what, having regard to all the circumstances, was the foundation of the contract? Secondly, was the performance of the contract prevented? Thirdly, was the event which prevented the performance of the contract of such a character that it cannot reasonably be said to have been in the contemplation of the parties at the date of the contract? If all these questions are answered in the affirmative (as I think they should be in this case), I think both parties are discharged from further performance of the contract. I think that the coronation procession was the foundation of this contract and that the non-happening of it prevented the performance of the contract; and, secondly, I think that the [752] non-happening of the procession, to use the words of Sir James Hannen in Baily v De Crespigny (1869) LR 4 QB 180 at 185, was an event of such a character that it cannot reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the contracting parties when the contract was made, and that they are not to be held bound by general words which though large enough to include, were not used with reference to the possibility of the particular contingency which afterwards happened …

[ROMER LJ, expressing some doubt, agreed with Vaughan Williams LJ. STIRLING LJ agreed with Vaughan Williams LJ.]

Appeal dismissed.

Brisbane City Council v Group Projects

[15.30] Brisbane City Council v Group Projects Pty Ltd (1979) 145 CLR 143 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: Group Projects owned 19 acres of land zoned "future urban" which they wished to develop as a residential subdivision. The Brisbane City Council, the council, agreed to make the necessary application to have the land zoned residential in consideration of Group Projects carrying out certain works if the rezoning was approved. Essentially, these were to construct roads, footpaths, drains, water mains, plant trees and do other things appropriate for a residential subdivision. Much of this work was to be carried out off the 19 acres. The council undertook certain obligations relating to footpaths, water and sewerage. The agreement required Group Projects to furnish a bond of almost $200,000 as security for the performance of its obligations. Some months later, and before any rezoning had been approved, the parties were advised that the land was to be resumed by the Crown for school purposes. The rezoning was eventually approved but one month before it took effect, the land vested in the Crown under the resumption. Group Projects accordingly no longer owned the land and could not proceed with the proposed subdivision. The council contended that Group Project's obligations and the obligations on the bond remained in force.]

STEPHEN J: [154] To free itself of these obligations, Group Projects sought and obtained in the Supreme Court of Queensland (Dunn J) a declaration that the deed, bond and mortgage had each ceased to be binding upon the parties, the obligations they contained being discharged as and from 13 November 1976. An appeal to the Full Court was dismissed and the council now appeals to this court.

Dunn J held that on resumption the land became Crown land to which the relevant town planning legislation, and in consequence the City of Brisbane Town Plan, became inapplicable; the legislation did not bind the Crown and the subsequent purported rezoning was ineffectual … Thereupon the deed, bond and mortgage became "insusceptible of application to the new situation" and this without default of any party. It followed that the contracts contained in all three instruments had been frustrated since 13 November 1976. His Honour cited Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham UDC [1956] AC 696, as authority for that proposition …

[156] [O]n the view which I take, I am little concerned with the question whether Queensland's town planning legislation or Brisbane's Town Plan binds the Crown, and, if it does not, whether that means that zoning ceases for all purposes to have any application to land once it becomes Crown land. The question for me is, rather, whether Group Projects will be in breach of its obligations under the deed if it fails to perform them or whether it may instead invoke the doctrine of frustration so as to bring the deed, and no doubt the bond also, to an end …

In any consideration of the claim that this is a case of frustration, two features of the case should be noted at the outset. The first is that this is not the common case of two contracting parties, both interested in a commercial venture, one of them supplying to the other, in return for a money payment, goods or land or services. The council is a public body and the principal obligation which the deed imposes upon it is performance of an act, the making of an application for rezoning, which is of a kind which the statute contemplates that it will from time to time have occasion to perform in carrying out its public functions. The inducement offered to the council is not in essence monetary gain. Its relevant primary concern is, no doubt, that areas destined for residential development should be provided with proper amenities, with electric light, water, sewerage system, good roads, parks and the like. To induce it to apply for rezoning, Group Projects undertakes materially to assist in the provision of these amenities. No doubt the council has in mind that its own funds should not unnecessarily be expended in providing those amenities; instead the subdivider and, ultimately, purchasers of subdivided allotments should, so far as possible, be made to bear the financial burden. However, [157] essentially the advantages which the council seeks are not its own financial or commercial advancement but the attainment in a new subdivisional area of appropriate standards of amenity. This distinguishes the present case from those in which questions of frustration usually arise.

The second feature calling for mention is that in principle this is not a case in which performance of contractual obligations has either been rendered impossible or more onerous by the frustrating event. I use the qualifying expression "in principle" because, as it happens, some of Group Projects' obligations would in fact have involved the carrying out of work on the land itself, which has now become Crown land to which it no longer has access, let alone the right to carry out engineering works on it. But the bulk of the work contracted for, or towards the cost of which it has promised to contribute, was to be done off the acquired land, so that its acquisition by the Crown in no way prevents the doing of that work or alters its nature or cost. That this is not so in relation to all the work to be done is in a sense fortuitous and the great bulk of the work can still be performed with no greater difficulty or expense than before. If frustration is to apply its application cannot, in these circumstances, be accommodated very comfortably within any theory of frustration which is said to be based upon such a "change in the significance of the obligation that the thing undertaken would, if performed, be a different thing from that contracted for" (Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham UDC at 729 per Lord Radcliffe).

There is, I suppose, no doubt but that the acquisition of the land by the Crown for use as the site of a school has deprived Group Projects of all desire to now proceed with the work and expenditure which it has contracted for under the deed. To do that work and incur that expenditure would be to provide, at great cost to itself, facilities for land in which it no longer has the remotest interest. Even the council's interest in having some at least of that work performed may, one speculates, be now diminished … Be that as it may, it is clear that, although Group Projects no doubt remains able to perform the bulk of the obligations which it has undertaken, being that part [158] of the work which is not to be undertaken on the acquired land, and although that work will have neither changed in character nor become more onerous, yet the acquisition of the land for a school site has wholly destroyed Group Projects' purpose in undertaking any obligations at all.

Whichever of the competing theories, said to underlie and give conceptual validity to the doctrine of frustration, is to be preferred, and the truth may, indeed, not lie in a choice of one and the rejection of all others, there is no doubt that an examination of the parties' agreement and of the surrounding circumstances provides an appropriate starting point. I have already spoken of the role of the council, a public body performing public duties, and of the complete aborting of Group Projects' plans as a result of the acquisition of the land for a school site. The terms of the deed both reflect this role of the council and also emphasise that it was upon the basis of development of the land as a residential subdivision that the parties entered into it.

[His Honour then considered the obligations of the parties, pointing out how fundamental to their plans was the rezoning of the land for residential purposes. He continued] [159] So much for what may be gleaned from the surrounding circumstances and the parties' contract. The task is to set this alongside the doctrine of frustration and to see whether the result is that the law will regard the contract as frustrated or will, [160] instead, regard non-performance by Group Projects as actionable at the suit of the council. In Port Line Ltd v Ben Line Steamers Ltd [1958] 2 QB 146 at 162, Diplock J said: "It would appear to be the fate of frustration cases when they reach the highest tribunals that either there should be agreement as to the principle but differences as to its application, or differences as to the principle but agreement as to its application."

This was said despite, or perhaps in the light of, what is the leading modern authority in the field, the decision of their Lordships in Davis Contractors, pronounced in 1956. Such divergency of principle as commentators have extracted from their Lordships' speeches do not, I think, affect the present case. In Davis Contractors Viscount Simonds and Lord Morton offer no guide to principle, although they do reflect the general disinclination to allow much scope to the operation of frustration. Lord Somervell (at 733) agrees with Lord Reid's conclusion upon "the proper basis of frustration". It is in the speeches of Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe that extensive discussion of principle occurs.

Lord Reid rejected the notion of the implied term as the basis of the doctrine. He says (at 720-1) that the task for a court, confronted with the parties' contract, is to determine, on the true construction of the terms of the contract, read in the light of the nature of the contract and of the relevant surrounding circumstances when the parties made it, "whether the contract which they did make is, on its true construction, wide enough to apply to the new situation: if it is not, then it is at an end." Frustration he describes (at 723) as "the termination of the contract by operation of law on the emergence of a fundamentally different situation". What I understand his Lordship's approach to involve is, then, a comparison between the contemplated situation, as revealed by the terms of the contract on its true construction, and the situation in fact resulting from the frustrating event. If they be "fundamentally different" the contract is frustrated subject, of course, to the frustrating event not being the fault of the party seeking to rely upon the doctrine.

Lord Radcliffe (at 727-9) considers those cases which treat frustration as involving an implied term, cases which involved diverse approaches, sometimes subjective and sometimes objective, in [161] ascertaining the content of the term to be implied. His Lordship suggests (at 729):

> frustration occurs whenever the law recognises that without default of either party a contractual obligation has become incapable of being performed because the circumstances in which performance is called for would render it a thing radically different from that which was undertaken by the contract. Non haec in foedera veni. It was not this that I promised to do.

This is close to the views of Lord Reid and together they represent the approach which I would apply in the present case. It should, however, be noted that Lord Radcliffe tends rather to concentrate on a change in obligation. Thus he says, again (at 729):

> it is not hardship or inconvenience or material loss itself which calls the principle of frustration into play. There must be as well such a change in the significance of the obligation that the thing undertaken would, if performed, be a different thing from that contracted for.

Lord Radcliffe also introduces (at 731) the limitation that the frustrating event must not be one which the parties could "reasonably be thought to have foreseen". As already mentioned, the "change in obligation" test proposed by Lord Radcliffe, no doubt apt enough in most frustration situations, seems to be inapplicable here, as it was in the so-called Coronation cases, of which Krell v Henry [1903] 2 KB 740 is the leading example. But I do not understand his Lordship to say that without change in obligation there can be no frustration: it is "the occurrence of any unexpected event that, as it were, changes the face of things" (at 729) that give rise to frustration. His Lordship's emphasis upon change in obligation is, I think, to be understood in the context of the factual situation under discussion in Davis Contractors. Later cases in which frustration was discussed, many of them arising following the sudden closure of the Suez Canal, appear to me to throw little further light upon the principle of the doctrine so far as relevant to the present case. In Albert D Gaon & Co v Société Interprofessionelle Oléagineux Fluides Alimentaires [1960] 2 QB 318 at 347, Ashworth J referred to the need for a "fundamental commercial difference" between contemplated and actual performance, a view echoed on appeal by Sellers LJ (at 362). In Tsakiroglou & Co Ltd v Noblee Thorl [1962] AC 93 (which at first instance and in the Court of Appeal is reported with Gaon's case), Viscount Simonds (at 115) referred to the criterion of whether [162] "the nature of the contract 'fundamentally' altered", as did Lord Reid: at 119. Lord Guest (at 131) referred to the "juridical basis" of the doctrine of frustration as discussed by Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe in Davis Contractors. In The Eugenia [1964] 2 QB 226 at 238, Lord Denning, spoke of "a fundamentally different situation" arising for which the parties made no provision, "so much so that it would not be just in the new situation to hold them bound by its terms". He appears to reject (at 239) the relevance of foreseeability, to which Lord Radcliffe had attached importance in Davis Contractors: at 731.

Whether Lord Loreburn's theory of the implied term – FA Tamplin Steamship Co Ltd v Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co Ltd [1916] 2 AC 397; or that of the disappearance of the basis of the contract – Tatem Ltd v Gamboa [1939] 1 KB 132 per Goddard J; or Lord Wright's just and reasonable solution for reconciling the sanctity of contract with the special exceptions which justice demands (Denny, Mott and Dickson Ltd v Fraser & Co Ltd [1944] AC 265), or, again, the approaches manifest in the speeches in Davis Contractors, are to be preferred, the result in the present case appears to me to be the same. In saying this I echo the words of Diplock J in the Port Line case, who said (at 162): "I think, however, that whichever of the many suggested tests are applied, the result in this case is the same." I prefer to express the matter in terms of Lord Reid's approach in Davis Contractors, but, however expressed the conclusion should be, I think, that this contract has been frustrated. There has arisen, as a result of the compulsory acquisition of the land by the Crown for a school site, such a fundamentally different situation from that contemplated when the contract was entered into that it is properly to be regarded as having come to an end at the date of acquisition by the Crown.

It is no doubt true, as critics complain, that the various expositions of the true basis of the doctrine of frustration leave imprecise its actual operation when applied to the facts of particular cases. How dramatic must be the impact of an allegedly frustrating event? To what degree or extent must such [163] an event overturn expectations, or affect the foundation upon which the parties have contracted, or, again, how unjust and unreasonable a result must flow or how radically different from that originally undertaken must a contract become (to use the language of some of the various expositions), before it is to be regarded as frustrated? The cases provide little more than single instances of solutions to these questions.

These difficulties of application of the doctrine of frustration were keenly appreciated both by Latham CJ and by Williams J in their consideration of the doctrine in Scanlan's New Neon Ltd v Tooheys Ltd (1943) 67 CLR 169. They are, perhaps, inevitable in questions of degree arising when a broad principle must be applied to infinitely variable factual situations … [164] The combination of these considerations satisfy me that this is a proper case for the application of the doctrine of frustration. If the deed was frustrated by the acquisition, so too will be the bond and the mortgage security associated with it, as was held by Dunn J. I would accordingly dismiss this appeal.

[MURPHY J agreed with Stephen J. GIBBS CJ and WILSON J did not find it necessary to deal with the question of frustration.]

Appeal dismissed.

Codelfa Construction v State Rail Authority of NSW

[15.35] Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The predecessor in title to the State Rail Authority of New South Wales (the Authority), the Commissioner for Railways, called for tenders for the construction of certain parts of the Eastern Suburbs Railway in Sydney. The work involved the construction of tunnels, open cuts, other substantial excavation work and construction. Much of this work was to be carried out in residential areas. The construction of the railway was authorised by the City and Suburban Electric Railways (Amendment) Act 1967 (NSW) which in s 11 provided:

> Notwithstanding any provision in any Act to the contrary, it shall not be necessary for the Constructing Authority to give any notice of his intention to blast any rock, nor shall he be liable to have an injunction issued to restrain him from causing or continuing to cause any > nuisance by such blasting or any other operation necessary or proper in connection with the construction of the said work.

Codelfa's tender was accepted and the resulting contract provided that:

1. the contract price was payable for all work regardless of difficulty;
2. the contractor was to provide at his own expense everything necessary for the completion of the contract;
3. he was deemed to have informed himself fully of conditions affecting the carrying out of the work; and
4. all work was to be completed within 130 weeks of notice to proceed.

The contract also provided:

> The Commissioner shall not be entitled to cancel the contract or to take part of the works out of the contractor's hands or to recover from the contractor any liquidated damages, because of any delays in the completion of the works or the separable parts thereof owing to causes beyond the control or without the fault or negligence of the contractor if:
> (1) the contractor shall notify the engineer in writing of the cause of any such delay or default within ten days of the beginning thereof or within such further period as the engineer shall grant for the receipt of such notice; and
> (2) on receipt of such notice from the contractor under this subclause, the engineer shall ascertain the facts and the extent of the delay, and extend the time for completing the works when, in the opinion of the engineer, the findings of fact justify an extension.

Codelfa commenced work operating three shifts a day. Considerable noise, dust and vibration were caused by the work and notwithstanding s 11 of the Act, injunctions were granted against Codelfa restraining it from performing construction work on site between 10 pm and 6 am each day and certain work was prohibited on Sundays.

Codelfa, being restrained from working three shifts per day for six days a week and from working on the seventh day, claimed from the Commissioner an amount additional to the price payable under the contract in respect of the additional costs which it incurred and the profit which it did not earn by reason of the change in working methods it was constrained to adopt. The claim was put on alternative bases: either a warranty should be implied in the contract for breach of which Codelfa should recover damages, or the contract should be held to have been frustrated by the issue of the injunctions and Codelfa should recover on a quantum meruit an amount which, assumedly, would be more than the price payable under the contract. The claim was resisted by the Commissioner and the dispute was submitted to arbitration. …

[340] The Arbitrator held that a term should be implied in the contract "to the effect that upon the issuing of the restraining orders and injunctions referred to in par 18 the principal would grant to the contractor a reasonable extension of time for the completion of the works and would advise the contractor of the fact of the grant of the extension of time within a reasonable period after the issuing of the restraining orders and injunctions became known to the principal or ought to have become known to the principal". He found that the Authority had not within a reasonable time granted or notified Codelfa of the grant of a reasonable extension of time, and as a result Codelfa had suffered loss of $956,000.

Codelfa and the Authority each issued a summons out of the Supreme Court seeking determination of the questions stated in the special case. At the same time, Codelfa commenced proceedings in the Supreme Court alleging frustration of the contract; a request by the Authority to continue the work; an implied provision to pay a reasonable sum for the work done, and a failure to pay such sum. After the Arbitrator had made his award, a case was stated in the frustration action, incorporating the award and stating that the only facts on which Codelfa would rely to establish frustration were those contained in the pleadings and the findings of the

Arbitrator. The questions raised by the special case stated by the Arbitrator and the case stated in the frustration action were determined by Ash J. Amongst other things, his Honour held that the following addition should be made to the term which the Arbitrator held should be implied in the contract: "that the works, the subject of the contract, could be carried out by the contractor on a three-shift continuous basis six days per week and without restriction as to Sunday and that no injunction or other restraining order would or could be granted against the contractor in relation to [341] noise or other nuisance arising out of the carrying out of the said works on such basis". He dismissed Codelfa's frustration action.

On appeal, the Court of Appeal Division (Reynolds, Glass and Samuels JJA) varied Ash J's answers to some of the questions raised in the special case, and in particular held that the term to be implied should be: "If the contractor is prevented from executing the works on the basis of a three shift continuous operation six days per week without restriction as to Sundays by the terms of an injunction granted to restrain any nuisance caused by the inherently noisy or disturbing nature of any work performed in accordance with the contract (including any requirements made by the engineer pursuant to Cl S 8(2)(c) thereof), the Commissioner within a reasonable period thereafter shall grant and notify to the contractor a reasonable extension of time in respect of any delays in the completion of the works thereby occasioned, and shall indemnify the contractor against any additional costs or expenses thereby reasonably incurred." The dismissal of the frustration action was affirmed.

Codelfa appealed to the High Court against some of the answers given to the questions raised in the special case stated by the Arbitrator, and against the dismissal of its appeal in the frustration action. The Authority cross-appealed, challenging certain answers given by the Court of Appeal to the Arbitrator's special case, including the finding of the implied term. The matters raised by the appeal and cross-appeal were whether a term relating to the granting of the injunctions should be implied in the contract; whether the granting of the injunction frustrated the contract; the construction of the rise and fall clause; and the allowance by the Arbitrator of interest on the sum found due.]

MASON J: [345]

Implied term

In this ocean of litigious controversy there is one large island of agreement between the parties. It is common ground that their contract consists of the agreement dated 21 March 1972 and the various documents which it incorporates … The appellant's case is that a term has to be implied in the contract to give business efficacy, to make it workable. Consequently, there is no contest as to what constitutes the contract; rather the contest is as to its meaning and effect.

When we say that the implication of a term raises an issue as to the meaning and effect of the contract we do not intend by that statement to convey that the court is embarking upon an orthodox exercise in the interpretation of the language of a contract, that is, assigning a meaning to a particular provision. Nonetheless, the implication of a term is an exercise in interpretation, though not an orthodox instance.

Of course, I am speaking of an implied term necessary to give business efficacy to a particular contract, not of the implied term which is a legal incident of a particular class of contract, of which Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239, is an example … [346] The implication of a term is to be compared, and at the same time contrasted, with rectification of the contract. In each case the problem is caused by a deficiency in the expression of the consensual agreement. A term which should have been included has been omitted. The difference is that with rectification the term which has been omitted and should have been included was actually agreed upon; with implication the term is one which it is presumed that the parties would have agreed upon had they turned their minds to it; it is not a term that they have actually agreed upon. Thus, in the case of the implied term the deficiency in the expression of the consensual agreement is caused by the failure of the parties to direct their minds to a particular eventuality and to make explicit provision for it. Rectification ensures that the contract gives effect to the parties' actual intention; the implication of a term is designed to give effect to the parties' presumed intention. For obvious reasons the courts are slow to imply a term. In many cases, what the parties have actually agreed upon represents the totality of their willingness to agree; each may be prepared to take his chance in relation to an eventuality for which no provision is made. The more detailed and comprehensive the contract the less ground there is for supposing that the parties have failed to address their minds to the question at issue. And then there is the difficulty of identifying with any degree of certainty the term which the parties would have settled upon had they considered the question.

Accordingly, the courts have been at pains to emphasise that it is not enough that it is reasonable to imply a term; it must be necessary to do so to give business efficacy to the contract. So in Heimann v Commonwealth (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 691, Jordan CJ (at 695), citing Bell v Lever Brothers Ltd [1932] AC 161 at 226, stressed that in order to justify the importation of an implied term it is "not sufficient that it would be reasonable to imply the term … It must be clearly necessary" (To the same effect are the comments of Bowen LJ in The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64 at 68) …

The basis on which the courts act in implying a term was expressed by MacKinnon LJ in Shirlaw v Southern Foundries [347] (1926) Ltd [1939] 2 KB 206 at 227 in terms that have been universally accepted: "Prima facie that which in any contract is left to be implied and need not be expressed is something so obvious that it goes without saying …" The conditions necessary to ground the implication of a term were summarised by the majority in BP Refinery Pty Ltd v Hastings Shire Council (1977) 52 ALJR 20 at 26:

(1) it must be reasonable and equitable;

(2) it must be necessary to give business efficacy to the contract, so that no term will be implied if the contract is effective without it;

(3) it must be so obvious that "it goes without saying";

(4) it must be capable of clear expression;

(5) it must not contradict any express term of the contract.

In the present case the New South Wales Court of Appeal placed much emphasis on the speeches of Lord Wilberforce in Prenn v Simmonds [1971] 1 WLR 1381 at 1383-5, and in Reardon Smith Line v Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989 at 995-7. Their Honours, though acknowledging that his Lordship's remarks were directed not to the implication of a term but to the application of the parol evidence rule, for in each of the two cases the issue was one of orthodox construction of a contract, thought that the remarks had significance for the implication of a term in a contract. With this I agree. But there is a question whether these two cases and other authorities support the Court of Appeal's view that it is legitimate to take into account the common beliefs of the parties as developed and manifested during their antecedent negotiations.

The broad purpose of the parol evidence rule is to exclude extrinsic evidence (except as to surrounding circumstances), including direct statements of intention (except in cases of latent ambiguity) and antecedent negotiations, to subtract from, add to, vary or contradict the language of a written instrument: Goss v Lord Nugent (1833) 5 B & Ad 58 at 64-5; 110 ER 713 at 716. Although the traditional expositions of the rule did not in terms deny resort to extrinsic evidence for the purpose of interpreting the written instrument, it has often been regarded as prohibiting the use of extrinsic evidence for this purpose. No doubt this was due to the theory which came to prevail in English legal thinking in the first half of this century that the words of a contract are ordinarily to be given their plain and ordinary meaning. Recourse to extrinsic evidence is then superfluous. At best it [348] confirms what has been definitely established by other means; at worst it tends ineffectively to modify what has been so established.

On the other hand, it has frequently been acknowledged that there is more to the construction of the words of written instruments than merely assigning to them their plain and ordinary meaning: see, for example, the remarks of Knox CJ in Life Insurance Co of Australia Ltd v Phillips (1925) 36 CLR 60 at 69. This has led to a recognition that evidence of surrounding circumstances is admissible in aid of the construction of a contract. So Lord Wilberforce in L Schuler AG v Wickman Machine Tool Sales Ltd [1974] AC 235, was able to state the broad thrust of the rule in this way (at 261):

> The general rule is that extrinsic evidence is not admissible for the construction of a written contract; the parties' intentions must be ascertained, on legal principles of construction, from the words they have used. It is one and the same principle which excludes evidence of statements, or actions, during negotiations, at the time of the contract, or subsequent to the contract, any of which to the lay mind might at first sight seem to be proper to receive.

His Lordship noted that evidence of surrounding circumstances is an exception to the rule, but he had no occasion to discuss its scope for there it was not, as it is here, a critical question.

However, as Lord Wilberforce had earlier pointed out in his speech in Prenn, a speech in which four other members of the House of Lords concurred, the English rule forbidding recourse to extrinsic evidence is not as strict as some have thought. The issue in Prenn was whether the word "profits" meant the separate profits of RTT, a company controlled by the appellant, or the consolidated profits of the group of companies consisting of RTT and its subsidiaries. It was held that, although evidence of prior negotiations and of the parties' intentions, and a fortiori the intentions of one of the parties, ought not to be received, evidence restricted to the factual background known to the parties at or before the date of the contract, including evidence of the "genesis" and objectively of the "aim" of the transaction, was admissible. Considered in the light of this evidence "profits" meant "consolidated profits".

Lord Wilberforce said (at 1383-4):

> The time has long passed when agreements, even those under seal, were isolated from the matrix of facts in which they were set and interpreted purely on internal linguistic considerations. There is no need to appeal here to any modern, anti-literal, tendencies, for Lord Blackburn's well known judgment [349] in River Wear Commissioners v Adamson (1877) 2 App Cas 743 at 763, provides ample warrant for a liberal approach. We must, as he said, inquire beyond the language and see what the circumstances were with reference to which the words were used, and the object, appearing from those circumstances, which the person using them had in view. Moreover, at any rate since 1859 (Macdonald v Longbottom (1860) 1 El & El 977; 120 ER 1177) it has been clear enough that evidence of mutually known facts may be admitted to identify the meaning of a descriptive term.

His Lordship went on to assert that the well-known decision of Cardozo J in Utica City National Bank v Gunn 118 NE 607 (1918), "followed precisely the English line": at 1384. There extrinsic evidence of the circumstances in which a guarantee was executed and of its object was received for the purpose of giving the words "loans and discounts" the looser meaning of "renewals". Lord Wilberforce quoted with evident approval the comment of Cardozo J (at 608) that surrounding circumstances may "stamp upon a contract a popular or looser meaning" than the strict legal meaning, certainly when to adopt the latter would make the transaction futile.

In Macdonald it had been held that the defendant's contract to buy "your wool" included not only wool which the plaintiffs had on their own farms, but also wool which they had bought in from other farms, one of the plaintiffs having stated before the contract in a conversation with the defendant's agent that he had wool from those two sources. This decision was followed in Bank of New Zealand v Simpson [1900] AC 182. Lord Davey (at 188-9) quoted with approval the remarks of Lord Campbell in Macdonald (983-4; 1179):

> I am of opinion that, when there is a contract for the sale of a specific subject matter, oral evidence may be received, for the purpose of shewing what that subject matter was, of every fact within the knowledge of the parties before and at the time of the contract.

> The two together constituted his wool; and, with the knowledge of these facts, the defendant contracts to buy "your wool". There cannot be the slightest objection to the admission of evidence of this previous conversation, which neither alters nor adds to the written contract, but merely enables us to ascertain what was the subject matter referred to therein.

[350] It is apparent that the principle on which the Judicial Committee acted in Simpson is that where words in a contract are susceptible of more than one meaning extrinsic evidence is admissible to show the facts which the negotiating parties had in their mind. Later in Great Western Railway and Midland Railway v Bristol Corp (1918) 87 LJ Ch 414, Lord Atkinson (at 418-19) and Lord Shaw (at 424-5) stated that evidence of surrounding circumstances was inadmissible except to resolve an ambiguity, that is, where the words are susceptible of more than one meaning, and that Lord Blackburn was dealing with just such a case in River Wear Commissioners. Their Lordships took the view that evidence of surrounding circumstances was not admissible to raise an ambiguity for in their opinion that would be to contradict or vary the words of the written document, the assumption being that in the overwhelming majority of cases the written words will have a fixed meaning. Lord Wrenbury thought otherwise, stating (at 429) that in every case of construction extrinsic evidence is receivable to raise and resolve an ambiguity.

Lord Wilberforce in Prenn did not discuss these competing views, perhaps because the difference between them is more apparent than real. However, I doubt whether English and United States use of extrinsic evidence for the purpose of interpretation is quite as uniform as his Lordship appeared to think.

Lord Wilberforce returned to the same theme in Reardon Smith. In a speech concurred in by a majority of the members of the House of Lords he acknowledged that it is legitimate "to have regard to … 'the surrounding circumstances' ": at 995. He went on to say (at 995-6):

> In a commercial contract it is certainly right that the court should know the commercial purpose of the contract and this in turn presupposes knowledge of the genesis of the transaction, the background, the context, the market in which the parties are operating.

After discussing Utica, Prenn and Wickman, his Lordship continued (at 996):

> [351] It is often said that, in order to be admissible in aid of construction, these extrinsic facts must be within the knowledge of both parties to the contract, but this requirement should not be stated in too narrow a sense. When one speaks of the intention of the parties to the contract, one is speaking objectively — the parties cannot themselves give direct evidence of what their intention was — and what must be ascertained is what is to be taken as the intention which reasonable people would have had if placed in the situation of the parties. Similarly when one is speaking of aim, or object, or commercial purpose, one is speaking objectively of what reasonable persons would have in mind in the situation of the parties.

His Lordship thought that this approach was supported by the speeches in Hvalfangerselskapet Polaris Aktieselskap v Unilever Ltd (1933) 39 Com Cas 1 and Charrington & Co Ltd v Wooder [1914] AC 71. He expressed the conclusion to be drawn from them in this way (at 997):

> what the court must do must be to place itself in thought in the same factual matrix as that in which the parties were. All of these opinions seem to me implicitly to recognise that, in the search for the relevant background, there may be facts which form part of the circumstances in which the parties contract in which one, or both, may take no particular interest, their minds being addressed to or concentrated on other facts so that if asked they would assert that they did not have these facts in the forefront of their mind, but that will not prevent those facts from forming part of an objective setting in which the contract is to be construed.

In DTR Nominees Pty Ltd v Mona Homes Pty Ltd (1978) 138 CLR 423, Stephen and Jacobs JJ and I, following Prenn, in a joint judgment said (at 429):

> A court may admit evidence of surrounding circumstances in the form of "mutually known facts" "to identify the meaning of a descriptive term" and it may admit evidence of the "genesis" and objectively the "aim" of a transaction to show that the attribution of a strict legal meaning would "make the transaction futile".

And in Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 53 ALJR 745 at 748, in a judgment concurred in by other members of the court I not only accepted and applied the statement in the majority judgment in BP Refinery of the conditions necessary to support the implication of a term, but I also accepted and applied Lord Wilberforce's different treatment, for the purpose [352] of construing a contract, of evidence of surrounding circumstances on the one hand and of the parties' intentions on the other hand. Having considered the topic in more detail on this occasion I see no reason to qualify what I then said.

The true rule is that evidence of surrounding circumstances is admissible to assist in the interpretation of the contract if the language is ambiguous or susceptible of more than one meaning. But it is not admissible to contradict the language of the contract when it has a plain meaning. Generally speaking facts existing when the contract was made will not be receivable as part of the surrounding circumstances as an aid to construction, unless they were known to both parties although, as we have seen, if the facts are notorious, knowledge of them will be presumed.

It is here that a difficulty arises with respect to the evidence of prior negotiations. Obviously the prior negotiations will tend to establish objective background facts which were known to both parties and the subject matter of the contract. To the extent to which they have this tendency they are admissible. But in so far as they consist of statements and actions of the parties which are reflective of their actual intentions and expectations they are not receivable. The point is that such statements and actions reveal the terms of the contract which the parties intended or hoped to make. They are superseded by, and merged in, the contract itself. The object of the parol evidence rule is to exclude them, the prior oral agreement of the parties being inadmissible in aid of construction, though admissible in an action for rectification.

Consequently when the issue is which of two or more possible meanings is to be given to a contractual provision we look, not to the actual intentions, aspirations or expectations of the parties before or at the time of the contract, except in so far as they are expressed in the contract, but to the objective framework of facts within which the contract came into existence, and to the parties' presumed intention in this setting. We do not take into account the actual intentions of the parties and for the very good reason that an investigation of those matters would not only be time consuming but it would also be unrewarding as it would tend to give too much weight to these factors at the expense of the actual language of the written contract.

There may perhaps be one situation in which evidence of the actual intention of the parties should be allowed to prevail over their presumed intention. If it transpires that the parties have refused to include in the contract a provision which would give effect to the presumed intention of persons in their position it may be proper to receive evidence of that refusal. After all, the court is interpreting [353] the contract which the parties have made and in that exercise the court takes into account what reasonable men in that situation would have intended to convey by the words chosen. But is it right to carry that exercise to the point of placing on the words of the contract a meaning which the parties have united in rejecting? It is possible that evidence of mutual intention, if amounting to concurrence, is receivable so as to negative an inference sought to be drawn from surrounding circumstances. See Heimann (at 695).

The importance of this evolution of the law as it affects the construction of contracts is that it centres upon the presumed, rather than the actual, intention of the parties. Once it is accepted that in the construction of the contract account is taken of the presumed intention of the parties it naturally follows that account should also be taken of their presumed intention when the court is called upon to decide whether a term is to be implied. The existence of the remedy of rectification and the purpose which it serves make it obvious that the actual intention of the parties cannot constitute the basis of an implied term. However, it is equally obvious that in making the inquiry whether a term is to be implied the court is no more confined than it is when it construes the contract. For the implication of a term is an illustration of the process of construction, though differing from the more orthodox ascertainment of the meaning of a contractual provision.

There are, of course, older authorities which support a more restricted approach to the implication of a term. One example is the statement of Jordan CJ in Heimann (at 695) which confines recourse to the intention manifested by the express terms of the contract. It was later approved by Latham CJ in Scanlan's New Neon Ltd v Tooheys Ltd (1943) 67 CLR 169 at 195. These statements reflect an unduly restrictive approach to construction, an approach which is outmoded or "antiquated", to use the expression favoured in Wigmore on Evidence 3rd ed (1940), vol 9, para 2465 (p 214). Indeed, they do not accord with the approach taken by the majority of this court in Scanlan's.

The implication of the term found by the Court of Appeal rests on findings made by the Arbitrator based on circumstances surrounding the making of the contract, including evidence of the discussions between the parties which preceded entry into the contract. Thus the Arbitrator found that there was a common understanding [354] (described as a "belief" by the Court of Appeal) that the works would be carried out on a three shift continuous basis six days per week and without restriction as to Sundays. He also found that the Authority had represented to Codelfa, and that it had accepted, that no injunction would be granted in relation to noise or other nuisance. He further found that the works could not be carried out in accordance with methods and programmes agreed between the parties unless Codelfa worked three shifts a day for six days a week.

The first question is whether, in the light of the principles as I have explained them, it was legitimate to look to this material on the issue of implication of a term. I think it was. The discussions which generated these findings were not negotiations about the terms of the contract. The terms of the contract documents had been determined in advance by the Authority. By lodging its tender Codelfa accepted the Authority's contract documents. The relevant discussions were therefore directed to the question of price. Their object was to enable Codelfa to inform itself of what was involved in the work and to cost it so as to arrive at a price for inclusion in its tender. The consequence is that the discussions did not have the character of negotiations in the course of which the parties gradually evolved the terms of a bargain ultimately embodied in written form. Had the discussions been of that kind then, as we have seen, recourse to them would have been prohibited for the purpose of interpreting the contract by reference to the parties' actual intentions as expressed before entry into the contract. As it was, the relevant discussions reflect neither the preliminary consensus that merged into the written contract, nor statements made during the course of negotiations indicative of the unilateral intentions of each party. Instead the evidence revealed a matter which was in the common contemplation of the parties yet was not a contractual provision actually agreed upon for the simple reason that it was a matter of common assumption. To say that the maintenance of three eight hour shifts a day for six days a week was a matter of common contemplation between the parties is not enough in itself to justify the implication of a term. Lord Atkin's example of the sale of a painting believed by both seller and buyer to be the work of an old master (Bell at 226) is a striking illustration. It must appear that the matter of common contemplation was necessary to give the contract business efficacy and that the term sought to be implied is so obvious that it goes without saying. [355] In this case the problem, as I see it, lies not so much in saying that the implication of a term is necessary to give business efficacy to the contract, as in concluding that the particular term to be implied is so obvious that "it goes without saying". However, before I examine this question in detail I should reject the Authority's invitation to apply the decision of the House of Lords in Thorn v Mayor and Commonalty of London (1876) 1 App Cas 120. There it was held that a person calling for tenders on the basis of plans and specifications setting the work to be executed does not impliedly warrant that the work can be successfully executed according to such plans and specifications. That, so it seems to me, was a very different case. Plans and specifications required the building of Blackfriars Bridge by means of caissons designed by the defendants' engineer. The caissons as designed were not strong enough to withstand the pressure of the river with the consequence that work done was wholly lost and additional work had to be undertaken. The contractor's case based on an implied warranty failed, there being some indications in the contract inconsistent with the existence of such a warranty.

Lord Cairns LC (at 127) acknowledged that the contractor might have a claim on a quantum meruit for the additional work performed and that he might perhaps have refused to go on with the contract on the ground that the new work was "additional or varied work, so peculiar, so unexpected, and so different from what any person reckoned or calculated upon".

Lord Chelmsford (at 132) thought that "in the exercise of common prudence" the contractor before tender ought to have informed himself of: "all the particulars connected with the work, and especially as to the practicability of executing every part of the work contained in the specification, according to the specified terms and conditions". As a canon of commonsense this statement cannot be faulted. But it cannot be elevated into an absolute rule of law; its value and force necessarily depends on the relationship between the parties and the arrangements which they make.

Even so, there remains an insurmountable problem in saying that "it goes without saying" that had the parties contemplated the possibility that their legal advice was incorrect and that an injunction might be granted to restrain noise or other nuisance, they would have settled upon the term implied by the Court of Appeal or that implied by the Arbitrator and by Ash J at first instance. I doubt whether the fiction of treating the parties as reasonable and fair makes the problem any the less difficult. This is not a case in which [356] an obvious provision was overlooked by the parties and omitted from the contract. Rather it was a case in which the parties made a common assumption which masked the need to explore what provision should be made to cover the event which occurred. In ordinary circumstances negotiation about that matter might have yielded any one of a number of alternative provisions, each being regarded as a reasonable solution.

The difficulty which I have with the implication of a term here is much the same as the difficulty that Lord Reid had in Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham Urban District Council [1956] AC 696, in accepting that the doctrine of frustration rests on an implied term: see at 719-21. It is greater because in many situations it is easier to say that the parties never agreed to be bound in a fundamentally different situation which has unexpectedly emerged than it is to assert that in a like situation the parties have impliedly agreed that the contract is to remain on foot with a new provision, not adverted to by them, governing their rights and liabilities. My reluctance to imply a term is the stronger because the contract in this case was not a negotiated contract. The terms were determined by the Authority in advance and there is some force in the argument that the Authority looked to Codelfa to shoulder the responsibility for all risks not expressly provided for in the contract. It is a factor which in my view makes it very difficult to conclude that either of the terms sought to be implied is so obvious that it goes without saying.

Accordingly, my conclusion is that, if Codelfa is entitled to any relief in respect of the changed circumstances, that relief is more appropriately founded on the doctrine of frustration than on the implication of a term. I therefore have no need to consider other arguments advanced by the Authority based on specific provisions in the contract against the implication of a term, although cl s 8(2)(c) of the specification, a provision which I consider later in connection with frustration, would require careful consideration before implying the term found by the Court of Appeal.

Frustration

[15.40] In Brisbane City Council v Group Projects Pty Ltd (1979) 54 ALJR 25 at 28–9, Stephen J discussed the authorities. The more recent authorities, National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina Ltd [1981] 2 WLR 45 and Pioneer Shipping v BTP Tioxide [1981] 3 WLR 292, do not call for any revision of that dis-[357]cussion. I agree with Stephen J's acceptance of the approach adopted by Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe in Davis Contractors. Lord Reid said that the task of the court is to determine (at 720–1):

> on the true construction of the terms which are in the contract read in light of the nature of the contract and of the relevant surrounding circumstances, … [and] whether the contract > which they did make is … wide enough to apply to the new situation: if it is not, then it is at an end.

Later he described (at 723) frustration as "the termination of the contract by operation of law on the emergence of a fundamentally different situation".

Lord Radcliffe said (at 729):

> frustration occurs whenever the law recognises that without default of either party a contractual obligation has become incapable of being performed because the circumstances in which performance is called for would render it a thing radically different from that which was undertaken by the contract … It was not this that I promised to do.

His Lordship, noting that special importance attaches to an unexpected event, observed: "There must be as well such a change in the significance of the obligation that the thing undertaken would, if performed, be a different thing from that contracted for". It is implicit, if not explicit, in the judgment of Stephen J, as in the speeches of Lord Reid and Lord Radcliffe in Davis Contractors, that to express a preference for this view of frustration as against the theory of the implied condition and other suggested bases is not to cast doubt on the authority of earlier decisions. This is of critical importance because the earlier cases provide many illustrations of the proposition that a contract will be frustrated when the parties enter into it on the common assumption that some particular thing or state of affairs essential to its performance will continue to exist or be available, neither party undertaking responsibility in that regard, and that common assumption proves to be mistaken: see, for example, FA Tamplin Steamship Co Ltd v Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Co Ltd [1916] 2 AC 397 (charterparty of a vessel requisitioned in time of war); Denny, Mott and Dickson Ltd v James B Fraser & Co Ltd [1944] AC 265 (trading agreement between timber merchants affected by prohibition under legislative authority of continued trading in time of war). Two objections may be urged to the width of the proposition I have stated.

The first is that the common assumption must be found in the contract itself. The answer to this objection is that, granted that the assumption needs to be contractual, in the case of frustration, as [358] with the implication of a term, it is legitimate to look to extrinsic evidence in the form of relevant surrounding circumstances to assist us in the interpretation of the contract, unless its language is so plain that recourse to surrounding circumstances would amount to no more than an attempt to contradict or vary the terms of the contract. Cases such as Krell v Henry [1903] 2 KB 740 demonstrate the point. There the contract was for the hire of a flat for two particular days, the unexpressed common assumption being that the flat was hired for the purpose of viewing the coronation processions. The Court of Appeal held that the taking place of the processions was the foundation of the contract and that the rent was not recoverable on the processions being cancelled due to the King's illness. The correctness of that decision was questioned by Lord Finlay LC in Larrinaga & Co Ltd v Société Franco-Americaine des Phosphates de Medulla, Paris (1923) 29 Com Cas 1 at 7 on the ground that the parties may have contracted in the expectation that a particular event would happen, each taking his chance, but not making the happening of the event the basis of the contract. In Maritime National Fish Ltd v Ocean Trawlers Ltd [1935] AC 524, Lord Wright (at 528–9) referred to Lord Finlay's comment, remarking that Krell v Henry was an authority not "to be extended". This comment is not so much a criticism of the reception of the extrinsic evidence in that case as an adverse reflection on its capacity to negate the possibility that each party was taking his chance on the outcome.

Krell v Henry was strongly criticised by Latham CJ in Scanlan's (at 188–94), but much of his Honour's criticism appears to be founded on the outmoded view, rejected by McTiernan and Williams JJ, that it was not legitimate to take extrinsic evidence into account. Even so, his Honour was disposed to concede (at 193) that Krell v Henry could be more readily understood as a contract which was subject to a condition or as a conditional contract. It is not without significance that the parol evidence rule has never been applied so as to exclude evidence of a condition, non-fulfilment of which goes to the existence or validity of the contract. In any event McTiernan and Williams JJ took a more favourable view of Krell v Henry, demonstrating that it was consistent with the later cases and that the views expressed by Vaughan Williams LJ in that case conformed to the doctrine of frustration as it was subsequently elaborated. Of course, we need to read the judgments in Scanlan's in the light of the more recent statements as to the [359] theoretical basis of the doctrine. However, in my view they do not affect the point now under discussion, except to reinforce the reception of extrinsic evidence of relevant surrounding circumstances. So, Lord Radcliffe in Davis Contractors (at 729) quoted with approval the remarks of Lord Wright in Denny, Mott and Dickson (at 274–5): "The data for decision are, on the one hand, the terms and construction of the contract, read in the light of the then existing circumstances, and on the other hand the events which have occurred." And, as we have seen, Lord Reid was of the same opinion.

The second objection is that the proposition does not sufficiently acknowledge the fact that the event which generally, if not universally, works a frustration, is an event which supervenes after the making of the contract, viz a change in the law which make it impossible for the parties to execute the contract. It is not surprising that the cases commonly throw up situations of supervening impossibility caused by a change in the law; they are the more common instances of the unforeseen or unexpected occurrence. But in principle there is no reason why a mutual assumption arising from a mistaken view that an activity is immune from injunctive relief should not attract the principle of frustration. No doubt it is more difficult in such a case to show that the grant of injunctive relief was not foreseen or could not reasonably have been foreseen, but if that can be shown then the doctrine of frustration should apply. The injunction is a supervening event though it does not stem from any alteration in the law.

An unusual element in the present case is that the parties appear to have received, accepted and acted on erroneous legal advice that the contract work could not be impeded by the grant of an injunction to restrain noise or other nuisance, advice which was based on an erroneous interpretation of s 11 of the City and Suburban Electric Railways Act 1915 (NSW). One might have expected the parties and their advisers to have had reservations about the correctness of the advice and to have given consideration to the possibility that, despite the advice, an injunction might be granted. However, the findings do not reflect the existence of any reservations; indeed, they record Codelfa's acceptance of the representations made by the Authority. Codelfa is a wholly owned subsidiary of an Italian company and this may explain Codelfa's willingness to accept and act on the representation made by the Authority. [360] The doctrine of frustration is closely related to the concept of mutual mistake. However, in general, relief on the ground of mutual mistake is confined to mistakes of fact, not of law. If the common contractual assumption is of present fact it is a case of mutual mistake; if the assumption is of future fact it is a case of frustration (Bell at 225–6 per Lord Atkin), the distinction being that in one case the contract is void ab initio and in the other it is binding until the assumption is falsified. Here the mistake is not one of present fact; it is either a mistake as to future fact or a mistake of law. Even if it be a mistake of law, this is not, I think, fatal to the application of the doctrine of frustration. The unsatisfactory distinction between a mistake of fact and one of law has not so far been carried over into frustration and I see no reason to further complicate the doctrine by invoking this distinction. The critical issue then is whether the situation resulting from the grant of the injunction is fundamentally different from the situation contemplated by the contract on its true construction in the light of the surrounding circumstances. The contract itself did not require that the work be carried out on a three shift continuous basis six days a week without restriction as to Sundays. But it required completion of the works within 130 weeks. And Codelfa with its tender had submitted a construction programme which involved a three shift continuous basis six days a week. By cl s 6 of the specifications Codelfa was required to submit a revised programme of work to the engineer for his determination within 30 calendar days of the issue of a notice to proceed under the contract. This Codelfa did. Again it made provision for the method of operation already mentioned. It was accepted by the engineer.

It is in this contractual setting that the findings of the Arbitrator have special significance. [His Honour set out the findings of the arbitrator and continued] [361] The submission of the proposed programme of work with the tender, its supersession by the revised programme pursuant to cl s 6 of the specifications, together with the very provisions of cl s 6 itself dealing with the construction programme, provide a link between the contract and the antecedent discussions so as to enable us, subject to a consideration of specific provisions in the specifications, to say that the contract contemplated that completion would be achieved within the time stipulated by the method of work already mentioned, it being assumed that it could not be disturbed by the grant of an injunction.

I reject the Authority's argument that cl s 6 is inconsistent with the notion that the contract looked to this method of work as the mode by which the work was to be completed. Certainly cl s 6(5) envisaged that a major change to the work diagram as determined by the engineer might be required by "revisions to the programme". It seems that the responsibility for initiating such a change lay with Codelfa. But I do not think that this is necessarily inconsistent with Codelfa's case on frustration nor do I think that cl g 44(7) of the contract, which provides for the grant of an extension of time in case of delays "owing to causes beyond the control or without the fault or negligence of the Contractor", covers the position. Delay due to the grant of an injunction on the ground of nuisance committed by [362] Codelfa scarcely answers this description, even though it results from performance of the work in the only manner which will enable completion to take place within the time stipulated.

Clause s 8(2)(c) however, poses a greater obstacle. It provides:

> The operation of all plant and construction equipment shall be such that it does not cause undue noise, pollution or nuisance. This may require the use of sound insulated compressors and air tools, silencers on ventilating fans and restrictions on the working hours of plant or such other measures as approved by the engineer. The contractor shall not be entitled to additional payment if the engineer requires that measures be taken to reduce noise and pollution.

Once the injunctions were granted the engineer gave notices reflecting the provisions of the injunctions, restricting the hours of work so as to prohibit work at night and thereby inhibited Codelfa from continuing with its three shift operation under the contract. The first paragraph of cl s 8(2)(c) contains a promise by Codelfa that it will not operate plant and equipment so as to cause a nuisance. The second specifically looks to the possibility of a restriction on working hours of plant. And the third denies additional remuneration if the engineer requires measures to be taken to reduce noise and pollution. Do these provisions support the view that Codelfa was undertaking in any event to perform the contract work, even though the method contemplated by the parties might prove to be unlawful or impossible by reason of its amounting to a nuisance and its being restrained by injunction? I do not think that cl s 8(2)(c) has such a wide-ranging effect. It involves no subtraction from the language of the provisions to say that it is quite consistent with the contemplated method of work being an essential element of the contract. Indeed, there would be no inconsistency between these provisions and an explicit provision for termination of the contract in the event that the method of work was restrained by injunction. There was plenty of scope for an exercise of the engineer's power under the second paragraph so long as it did not displace the continuation of that method of work. I come back then to the question whether the performance of the contract in the new situation was fundamentally different from performance in the situation contemplated by the contract. The answer must, I think, be in the affirmative. Paragraphs 14, 15, 16, 18 and 19 of the Arbitrator's award go a long way towards establishing this answer. The finding contained in para 16 proceeds on the footing that the contract work could not be carried out as contemplated by the contract once injunctions were granted, the effect of which was to prohibit the continuous three shift a day [363] operation six days a week. Performance by means of a two shift operation, necessitated by the grant of the injunctions, was fundamentally different from that contemplated by the contract.

There is, of course, no inconsistency between the conclusion that a term cannot be implied and the conclusion that events have occurred which have brought about a frustration of the contract. I find it impossible to imply a term because I am not satisfied that in the circumstances of this case the term sought to be implied was one which parties in that situation would necessarily have agreed upon as an appropriate provision to cover the eventuality which has arisen. On the other hand I find it much easier to come to the conclusion that the performance of the contract in the events which have occurred is radically different from performance of the contract in the circumstances which it, construed in the light of surrounding circumstances, contemplated.

It is the stated case in action No 12577 of 1978 that presents the issues relating to frustration. In that action Codelfa sought relief against the Authority on the footing that the contract had been frustrated. The action was commenced on 23 May 1978 after Yeldham J had ruled on 9 September 1976, following the Privy Council's decision in Hirji Mulji v Cheong Yue Steamship Co [1926] AC 497, as he was bound to do, in preference to the conflicting decision of the House of Lords in Heyman v Darwins Ltd [1942] AC 356, that the Arbitrator had no jurisdiction to entertain a claim based on frustration …

[364] Hirji Mulji decided that an arbitrator had no jurisdiction under an arbitration clause in a charterparty when the charterparty was terminated by frustration because the arbitration clause was brought to an end with the contract of which it formed part. In Heyman the House of Lords decided that an arbitration clause, which provided that any difference or dispute which might arise "in respect of" or "with regard to" or "under the" contract should be referred to arbitration, applied to a dispute arising out of a claim by one party that liability under the contract had been discharged by reason of repudiation which had been accepted. In Heyman their Lordships drew a distinction between a contract void ab initio, in which event there is no valid submission to arbitration, and a valid contract which is subsequently repudiated, where acceptance of the repudiation leaves the contract, including the arbitration clause, on foot for the purpose of enforcement, though performance under the contract is at an end. Viscount Simon LC (at 367), Lord Wright (at 383) and Lord Porter (at 395) thought that the effect of frustration was similar to that of repudiation which has been accepted by the innocent party, with the consequence that the arbitration clause is left on foot. Although Lord Wright and Lord Porter did not express a concluded opinion upon the question, they nevertheless expressed reasons for arriving at a result contrary to that reached in Hirji Mulji. As might be expected, emphasis was [365] given to the need to construe the relevant arbitration clause so as to ensure that it comprehends the particular dispute or difference which has arisen between the parties. In this action the Lord Chancellor expressly left open the effect of Scott v Avery clause.

Lord Macmillan, who spoke for Lord Russell of Killowen as well, in putting cases of frustration to one side, expressed doubt (at 375) as to the correctness of some of the views enunciated by Lord Sumner in Hirji Mulji. Nothing in Lord Macmillan's speech is inconsistent with the proposition that frustration does not put an end to a submission to an arbitration clause so expressed as to confer jurisdiction on an arbitrator to decide a dispute relating to frustration. Indeed, the emphasis which his Lordship gave to the special nature and purpose of arbitration clauses suggests that he would have come to the same conclusion upon the point as that reached by the Lord Chancellor.

In my opinion, the reasoning of the House of Lords in Heyman is to be preferred to that of Lord Sumner in Hirji Mulji. In its application to an arbitration clause the distinction between a contract which is void ab initio and a contract which is valid but subsequently repudiated is well taken. Lord Sumner was in error in holding that the acceptance by an innocent party of the repudiation of a contract brings the contract, including an arbitration clause, to an end for all purposes.

I agree with the House of Lords that the case of frustration is to be assimilated for relevant purposes to the determination of a contract by breach or by acceptance of repudiation. The fact that the Lord Chancellor proceeded on the implied term theory of frustration does not in my view affect the reasoning by which he arrived at his conclusion.

The relevant clause in the contract in the present case, cl G 46, contains Scott v Avery clause. Clause g 46, so far as is relevant is in these terms:

(1) Except as otherwise specifically provided in the contract all disputes arising out of the contract during the progress of the works or after completion or as to any breach or alleged breach thereof shall be decided by the Commissioner.

(4) Submission to arbitration shall be deemed to be a submission to arbitration within the meaning of the New South Wales Arbitration Act 1902 or any statutory modification thereof.

(5) No action or suit shall be brought or maintained by the Contractor or the Commissioner against the other of them to recover any money for or in respect of or arising out of any breach or alleged breach of this contract by the Contractor or [366] the Commissioner or for or in respect of any matter or thing arising out of this contract unless and until the contractor or the Commissioner shall have obtained an award of an Arbitrator appointed under this clause for the amount sued for.

Subclause (1) refers to "all disputes arising out of the Contract", an expression wider than "disputes under the contract", the expression which Lord Wright in Heyman was inclined to think sufficient to confer jurisdiction on the Arbitrator with respect to frustration, had the question arisen in that case. The subclause was plainly wide enough to embrace a dispute arising out of a claim by Codelfa for remuneration on a quantum meruit based on frustration of the contract.

To my mind the fact that subcl (5) is a Scott v Avery clause does not diminish the jurisdiction of the Arbitrator. Indeed, once the conclusion is reached that the submission to arbitration is broad enough to include the dispute, even though it relates to frustration, subcl (5) operates to condition curial jurisdiction on the existence of an award … The true position, as it seems to me, is that the Arbitrator had, and has, jurisdiction to deal with this issue and that the parties by cl g 46(5) effectively conditioned their right to sue, whether on the contract or in quasi-contract, on the existence of an award … [W]e should follow the course of remitting the matter to the Arbitrator so that he can exercise the jurisdiction which has hitherto been denied to him.

[367] There may be a question, assuming frustration, as to whether the contract was frustrated on 28 June 1972. The first injunction was granted on that day. It did not restrict the hours of working; it restrained blasting of such intensity that rocks were propelled into surrounding residential areas. However, it also restrained Codelfa from detonating explosives in such a way as to cause or permit to be emitted from the site vibrations or noise to such a degree as to occasion to the plaintiff a nuisance or annoyance. The judgment expressly rejected Codelfa's claim of immunity based on s 11 of the City and Suburban Electric Railways Act. It therefore destroyed the common belief of the parties that no injunction could be granted to restrain noise or other nuisance on the part of Codelfa in the construction of the works and it effectively resulted in a situation, confirmed by the later injunctions, where the work could not be continued on the footing of a continuous three shift operation a day for six days a week. However, the matter is for the Arbitrator to decide …

AICKIN J:

Implied term

[15.45] [373] Logically the question whether there is to be a term implied into the contract must be dealt with before the question of possible frustration can arise. Accordingly I must first deal with the term implied by the Court of Appeal. One approach to this question has been to postulate the presence of the "officious bystander" who is present throughout the negotiations and intervenes before their conclusion. This has been the formula used since MacKinnon LJ introduced it in Shirlaw v Southern Foundaries (1926) Ltd. It is [374] not always a helpful or useful process and there are particular problems in applying the traditional approach to cases of building or construction contracts. I note in passing that Lord Denning's attempt to "kill off" the officious bystander in Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1976] 1 QB 319, did not commend itself to the House of Lords in the same case, Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239. However it seems no longer the exclusive means of approaching the question.

The first problem is that the manner in which the officious bystander formulates his question will often determine the answer which the parties will give. In the present case if the question put was "What will be the position if the Authority's legal advice about immunity is wrong?", the answer would be very different from that which might be received to the question "What will happen if an injunction is granted?". Yet it seems to me with respect that the former question is equally, if not more, appropriate. One may formulate a further query; must the officious bystander be satisfied with the first response or may he pose a second question, and if not, why not?

The second problem, which does not seem to have been expressly averted to in the authorities is the manner in which the doctrine of implied terms should be applied in the case of "contracts of adhesion" where the terms are not the result of negotiation (except as to price) but are provided in a standard form designed by one party upon which the other must tender. In the present case the only questions for negotiation were the price and one aspect of the mode of performance of part of the work …

Frustration

[15.50] We are of course not bound by the decisions of the House of Lords but the decisions in Davis Contractors, National Carriers and Pioneer Shipping provide valuable guidance on the present topic. The fact that their Lordships have now firmly adopted a basis for the application of the doctrine of frustration which departs from that adopted in earlier decisions of the House of Lords and from the manner in which the doctrine was expressed in this court by Latham CJ in Scanlan's New Neon Ltd v Tooheys Ltd presents no reason why we should not now apply the doctrine adopted by their Lordships in those cases if we think that it is right. For my own part I would with respect adopt the reasons of the House of Lords in those three cases as being preferable to the other bases which have been suggested from time to time. Their test has the advantage of being flexible and capable of application to a wide range of circumstances and lacks the degree of unreality involved in the implied term theory. I would, like Stephen J in the Brisbane City Council case, prefer to express my conclusion in the present case on the basis of Lord Radcliffe's formulation.

Having applied that test I am satisfied that the contract between the Authority and the Contractor was frustrated by the grant of the injunction prohibiting work on the tunnels between the hours of 10 pm and 6 am …

[381] It is plain on the findings of the Arbitrator that both parties proceeded upon the assumption that the works could be lawfully completed within the specified time by continuous work on a three shift basis for six days a week. The situation became one in which it was impossible to perform the contract in accordance with its terms, impossible because court orders restrained the mode of performance, which was held to constitute a nuisance, but which was critical to the completion of the works within the time allowed … This situation does not appear to be the subject of any decided cases. It bears a superficial resemblance to two of the "Suez Canal cases" but an examination of those cases shows that they are significantly different. The first was Tsakiroglou & Co Ltd v Noblee Thorl GmbH. In that case there was a contract by which the sellers agreed to sell to buyers Sudanese ground nuts for shipment cif Hamburg during November/December 1956. On 2 November the Suez Canal was closed but the goods could have been shipped round the Cape of Good Hope. That route was more than twice as long and much more expensive. The sellers did not ship the goods. In arbitration proceedings the sellers were held to be in default. It was held that there was no implied term that shipment was to be by Suez or by the customary route at the date of the contract and that the sellers' obligation was to ship the goods to their [382] destination by a reasonable and practicable route if available. It was also said that although the route via the Cape involved a change in the method of performance, it was not such a fundamental change as to bring about frustration. An important feature of the case however is that there was no evidence that the buyers attached any importance to the route, that is, there was no time fixed by which delivery was required to be made and the longer journey round the Cape, though more expensive, would not involve any failure to deliver in accordance with the contract. To the same effect was The Eugenia [1964] 2 QB 226, where the blocking of the Suez Canal was held not to bring about "so fundamentally different a situation" as to frustrate a charterparty. Lord Denning MR said (at 239) that the parties foresaw the possibility that the Canal might be closed but were unable to agree on what provision should be made for it. He said that it was therefore possible to argue for frustration as the parties had made no provision for the event which happened. Lord Denning referred to the fact that there was no special reason for early arrival and the only effect was that the voyage was longer and more expensive. Donovan LJ also referred to the negotiations between the parties, saying that they had considered the contingency of the Canal being closed but, although suggestion had been made for a clause to deal with that question, the parties were unable to agree on what the provision should be. Donovan LJ also drew attention to the fact that there was no evidence that early arrival of the cargo was of particular importance. Danckwerts LJ agreed with both judgments.

The fact that there was no time fixed for completion of the voyage in each case is an important part of the reasoning and provides a significant difference between those cases and the present case.

It is also significant to note that in The Eugenia both Lord Denning MR and Donovan LJ referred to the negotiations between parties which led up to the contract. That was treated, without the need for express comment, as part of the surrounding circumstances to be taken into account.

However in the present case the contractor was obliged to complete the work within a specified time, subject only to extensions required to be granted by the Authority or its engineer in accordance with the terms of the contract. The Arbitrator took the view that more than a mere extension of the time for doing the work was involved. He found that the whole programme of the work was disrupted and would have had to be restructured. The contractor then had an apparently absolute obligation (subject to [383] questions of extension of time in accordance with other provisions of the contract) to complete the works by the original contract date in a situation in which it was impossible for that obligation to be performed lawfully.

In my opinion the grant of the injunction produced frustration in the true sense of that term. It had become unlawful to perform the work in a manner which would have complied with the requirement of the contract, a requirement well known to both parties. The fact that both parties to the contract had an understanding of the law which led them to believe that the performance of the contract on the three shift basis could not be interfered with by any private or public litigant seeking to restrain a nuisance caused by the performance of the work, does not prevent the application of the doctrine of frustration.

The situation presents a close analogy with the requisition of a ship or the issuing of restraining orders under war-time regulations which prevent the construction of a dam, rather than an analogy to the Suez Canal cases …

[STEPHEN and WILSON JJ delivered short judgments agreeing with the judgments of MASON and AICKIN JJ. BRENNAN J held that there was no basis for implying a term as proposed by Codelfa. His Honour was of the opinion that the granting of the injunction was not a frustrating event.]

Appeal allowed. Award remitted to Arbitrator.

LIMITATIONS ON THE DOCTRINE OF FRUSTRATION

[15.55] There are three important limitations on the doctrine of frustration:

1. The risk of the frustrating event must not have been provided for by the parties in their contract, see further Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337 (extracted at [15.35]).
2. The purported frustrating event must not be one which the parties could "reasonably be thought to have foreseen": Davis Contractors Ltd v Fareham UDC [1956] AC 696, 731.

3. The frustrating event must have occurred without fault by the party seeking to rely on frustration, see Bank Line Ltd v Arthur Capel & Co [1919] AC 435, 452; Paal Wilson and Co A/S v Partenreederei Hannah Blumenthal (The Hannah Blumenthal) [1983] 1 AC 854, 909.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF FRUSTRATION

Common law

[15.60] A frustrated contract comes to an end automatically. At common law, rights and liabilities which have accrued unconditionally prior to the time of the frustrating event remain in place, while the parties will be discharged from most future obligations. This approach can make rather haphazard the right of a party to recover money paid under a contract which has only been partially performed or to be compensated for work done under a partially performed contract, as illustrated in Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32 (extracted at [10.50]).

[15.65] Note

See Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344, 355, extracted at [27.160], where Mason CJ notes that the decision in the Fibrosa case correctly reflects the law in Australia and should be preferred to the decision of the High Court in Re Continental C & G Rubber Co Pty Ltd (1919) 27 CLR 194.

Statute

[15.70] In New South Wales, South Australia and Victoria, legislation has been enacted to vary to the common law rules and provide for the consequences of frustration. See further the Frustrated Contracts Act 1978 (NSW); the Frustrated Contracts Act 1988 (SA); the Australian Consumer Law and Fair Trading Act 2012 (Vic), Pt 3.2.

ISSUES WITH STANDARD FORM CONTRACTS

[16.05] The unfair contract terms law contained in Pt 2-3 of the ACL regulates the use of unfair terms in standard-form consumer contracts. The characteristics of standard-form contracts and the issue of whether consumers genuinely consent to the terms in those contracts are discussed in the following extract.

Standard-form Contracting in the Electronic Age

[16.10] RA Hillman and JJ Rachlinski, "Standard-form Contracting in the Electronic Age" (2002) 77 New York University Law Review 429, 435.

A. The Basic Issues Presented by Paper Standard-form Contracts

1. The Paper Paradigm

People encounter standard forms in most of their contractual endeavours. From significant but infrequent transactions, such as leasing or purchasing a home or car, to everyday transactions, such as checking a coat or buying a ticket to a sporting event, standard forms govern contractual relationships.

Although such transactions differ in detail, the standard-form exchange generally involves a face-to-face meeting between a business's agent and the consumer. The agent presents a printed form to the consumer with a few basic terms to be filled in by the parties and the remaining terms already drafted and printed by the business. The business repeatedly employs the form and has invested time and money perfecting it. The form is long and full of legalese. The consumer is in a hurry.

The consumer correctly perceives several realities. First, the agent is not disposed to bargain over the boilerplate or lacks the authority to do so. In short, the business presents the form on a take-[436] it-or-leave-it basis. Second, the consumer would not understand much of the language of the boilerplate even if she took the time to read it. Third, the business's competitors usually employ comparable terms. Fourth, the remote risks allocated by the boilerplate likely will not eventuate. Fifth, the business seeks to establish and maintain a good reputation with the purchasing public and generally will stand behind its product. Sixth, the consumer expects the law to enforce the boilerplate, with the exception of offensive terms.

The consumer, engaging in a rough but reasonable cost-benefit analysis of these factors, understands that the costs of reading, interpreting, and comparing standard terms outweigh any benefits of doing so and therefore chooses not to read the form carefully or even at all. The consumer also is under some pressure from the business's agent to sign quickly and may believe that the events described in the boilerplate are too remote to be worth worrying about. To illustrate [437] all of these dynamics, analysts often employ the example of the busy traveler at an airport who is presented by an agent of the rental-car company with a long, incomprehensible standard form substantially similar to forms offered by other rental car companies. The consumer has no interest in reading or understanding these terms; she just wants to be on her way.

2. Costs and Benefits of Enforcing Standard-Form Contract Terms

As a general legal matter, parties are entitled to judicial enforcement of contract terms, including standard terms. Although standard-form contracts seem suspect and fail to satisfy contract law's notions of bargained-for exchange, courts and theorists generally consider enforcement of such terms appropriate. Parties are obliged to read and understand the written terms of their contracts. A clear rule holding parties to these written terms puts both parties on notice that they should read and understand written terms before signing. Furthermore, standard-form contracting has advantages, even for consumers. Standard forms are ubiquitous precisely because they provide [438] significant economies to businesses and consumers. Experienced businesses best understand what risks they can bear most efficiently and what risks should be allocated to the consumer. Careful allocation of these risks minimizes the costs of the goods or services businesses offer.

For example, consider the standard form that the manufacturer of a durable good might use. Suppose the good sometimes fails to function properly because of defective manufacture or improper use. The manufacturer should provide a warranty that covers only the risks that the product is defective, leaving the risks associated with poor maintenance to the consumer. This arrangement would place the risks the manufacturer can best control on the manufacturer and the risks the consumer can best control on the consumer, thereby avoiding expensive moral hazard and adverse selection problems. The manufacturer is therefore likely to allocate risks in this manner in its standard-form sales contract.

This example reveals that the uniformity of standard provisions across different businesses within a single profession need not be suspicious. Just as the drive to reduce costs pushes manufacturers to [439] use similar component parts, it also pushes businesses to employ comparable terms to allocate contract risks. Because the best allocation of risks is not likely to vary between businesses within an industry, most businesses will offer terms similar to those offered by their competitors. Less experienced businesses simply copy their senior counterparts. Uniformity of terms within an industry, in fact, might indicate that the industry is highly competitive.

This analysis explains why businesses resist negotiating terms in standard-form contracts. If the standard terms allocate risks efficiently, constant renegotiation is an academic exercise, inasmuch as parties are apt to settle on the same terms. Inexperienced consumers might fail to realize the efficiencies of the standard terms, but experienced businesses know that such allocations allow them to keep prices low. In short, businesses standardize their risks and reduce bargaining costs by offering one set of terms to all consumers.

Standard terms also save businesses and consumers litigation expenses because these terms typically will have withstood judicial scrutiny. In addition, repeat use of standard terms offers consumers a better chance of understanding the meaning of the terms and offers [440] courts a greater opportunity to recognize and strike offensive ones, thereby fostering migration of terms towards the reasonable.

Despite the potential benefits of standard provisions, however, courts are right to treat them with suspicion. The ability of businesses to identify efficient allocation of risks also gives them the opportunity to exploit consumers by getting them to accept contract terms that inefficiently shift risks to consumers. Businesses understand the true risks of contracts better than consumers, and hence can include terms in the form that are much more favorable to them than consumers know or appreciate. In effect, businesses have incentives and opportunities both to allocate the risks of the contract efficiently and to impose hidden risks on consumers where possible.

For example, suppose a software company sells an Internet application with a bug that makes it easier for hackers to invade the computer system of the application's users. Suppose further that the cost to the software company of remedying this bug is less than the harm it imposes on the consumers who use the software. In a well-functioning market, the manufacturer would bear the cost of fixing the bug. If consumers fail to appreciate the extent of this risk, however, the software company could, in a standard-form sales contract, allocate the risks associated with hacking to the consumers. In effect, the product becomes more expensive than it appears to consumers. Buried in the boilerplate is a term explicitly forcing consumers to bear the risks and expenses associated with hacking risks that the manufacturer knows to be real and serious, but that consumers fail to appreciate. Rather than sensibly allocating risks, the term in this example allows the business to exploit a gap in consumers' knowledge about the product's risks.

These dynamics create a dilemma for courts. Failing to enforce a standard term against consumers could undermine an efficient allocation of contractual risks. Businesses likely will adjust the price for the [441] underlying good or service to reflect the courts' refusal to enforce the term. In the end, if the term reasonably allocated contractual risks, the judicial failure to enforce it would be a socially inefficient net loss to both businesses and consumers. Enforcing a contract term against a consumer, however, might ratify a business's efforts to take advantage of consumers.

Courts have difficulty distinguishing between terms that create a reasonable arrangement of risks and terms that constitute exploitation of consumers. They lack the incentives and experiences that allow businesses to identify and distinguish between sensible practices and opportunities to exploit consumers. Furthermore, courts typically frame the issue as a dispute between a single consumer and a business, rather than as an aggregate policy that affects the vast majority of consumers and businesses that transact with each other contentedly. Courts are thus apt to misidentify terms quite frequently.

3. The Role of Competition

In theory, consumers' best protection against exploitation is not the courts, but their own vigilance and acumen. Consumers concerned about the possibility of exploitation can try to avoid terms they consider exploitative and refuse to transact with businesses that have reputations for offering and enforcing manipulative contract terms. In [442] addition, the aggregate decisions of many consumers can pressure businesses into providing an efficient set of contract terms in their standard forms. Competition in the market for the goods or services can provide courts with some assurance that businesses will not supply exploitative terms.

Furthermore, even though many, if not most, consumers lack the time, skill, or desire to shop carefully among contract terms, economists argue that even a small percentage of savvy, vigilant consumers create adequate incentives to make businesses competitive. Unless a business easily can identify these alert consumers and offer more favorable treatment to them, it must choose between losing a small group of customers and offering efficient terms to the entire market. In a competitive market, providers of goods and services cannot afford to lose even a small group of customers. Consequently, businesses must write their boilerplate so as to compete effectively for the small group of savvy consumers.

Businesses' concern with their reputations provides a similar barrier to the exploitation of consumers. Businesses must worry that if they consistently include and enforce terms that exploit consumers, they will develop an unsavory reputation, just as if they offered shoddy goods or services. Consumers thus can protect themselves, [443] to some extent, by investigating the reputation of businesses and selecting only those with good reputations.

These factors, however, might not be adequate to ensure that all businesses consistently refrain from efforts to exploit consumers. If the number of savvy consumers is too small, businesses will not find it worthwhile to compete for them. Exploiting the ignorance of the vast majority of consumers might be more lucrative for some businesses than competing for the smart consumers. Furthermore, businesses might develop ways of identifying the savvy consumers and offering them different terms. Such a practice would leave the vast majority of consumers unprotected. Businesses also might be able to hide their reputations or manipulate consumer perception with clever advertising. To the extent that standard terms cover events that are unlikely to occur, most consumers will lack direct knowledge of businesses' practices concerning those terms. Consequently, information on businesses' reputations is apt to be unreliable.

[444] Businesses' concern with their reputations also might fail to protect consumers because businesses might be managed by unsavory short-term players who are unconcerned with their reputations. Just as courts in product liability cases do not rely exclusively on businesses' concern with their reputations to ensure that manufacturers provide efficiently safe products, courts worry that reputational concerns inadequately ensure that businesses provide efficient terms.

Furthermore, as some commentators have argued, businesses themselves might be ignorant of the terms offered in their boilerplate agreements. Businesses often delegate the job of drafting their terms to lawyers, who believe that they can best serve their clients by composing an arsenal of one-sided terms without regard to the business environment, or for that matter, anything else. In addition, business managers might rely on some of the same cognitive processes that affect consumers. In particular, businesses might worry too much about protecting themselves from rare events, overestimating the likelihood of such events because of a few salient incidents.

Despite these concerns, courts recognize that the combination of businesses' efforts to compete for savvy consumers and businesses' concerns with their reputations often will dissuade them from attempting [445] to exploit consumers with standard terms. Courts are also mindful of their own limited ability to distinguish exploitation from sensible business practices and of the costs associated with mistakenly refusing to enforce the latter. The adverse consequences of judicial reliance on market discipline might, in many cases, be less harmful than the consequences of judicial interference with sensible business practices. Therefore, courts should be certain that they have identified some failure of the market or of firm reputation before deciding to strike a standard term.

B. Market Failures and Standard-form Contracts

[16.15] An imperfect market can fail to provide sufficient discipline to protect consumers. Market failures take many forms, but in the context of standard-form contracts, they distill into roughly three somewhat overlapping categories. First, because consumers incur costs in monitoring standard-form language and firm reputation, they rationally could decide that such costs outweigh the benefits, even though a failure to monitor makes them vulnerable to exploitation. Second, even if they rationally decide the benefits of reading the standard terms outweigh the costs, consumers face social pressures (often arranged by businesses) against investigating the details of the contract. Finally, consumers might not react rationally to the presence of exploitative terms in standard-form contracts. Psychological research on judgment and choice combined with descriptions of how consumers think about contracts suggest that consumers will not appreciate the dangers presented by boilerplate language. [446]

1. "Rational" Market Failures

Reading and understanding boilerplate terms is difficult and time consuming for consumers. Consumers recognize that they are unlikely to understand the lengthy and complicated legal jargon in the boilerplate. To make matters worse, consumers commonly encounter standard forms when they are in a hurry. Businesses also can create boilerplate that is difficult to read by using small print, a light font, and all-capital lettering and by burying important terms in the middle of the form.

Furthermore, consumers generally would gain little from reading and comprehending the boilerplate. Consumers generally understand most of the important terms (such as price and quantity of goods) and assume that the remainder of the form addresses unlikely contingencies. Consumers also recognize that even if they do understand and dislike the terms, the agent presenting the form lacks the authority to bargain over the terms. Finally, the terms included in standard-form contracts tend to be uniform within an industry, so consumers see little point in attempting to shop around.

Consumers also have good reason to believe that the standard terms are not something to worry about. Consumers recognize that boilerplate language is usually a matter of customary practice within an industry, rather than an attempt by a single business to exploit them. As such, the standard terms could reflect an industry's attempt [447] to identify the optimal allocation of contractual risks. If consumers believe that the market for a good or service is reasonably competitive, they also should trust that the terms in the boilerplate allocate risks in such a way as to minimize the overall cost of the good or service. Consumers may sign standard-form contracts without reading them carefully because they believe that most businesses are not willing to risk the cost to their reputation of using terms to exploit consumers.

Finally, consumers might refrain from reading standard forms if they believe that courts will strike unreasonable terms. This poses a dilemma for courts: Full enforcement of boilerplate often will leave consumers justifiably unpleasantly surprised, but it will also give notice to consumers to pay more attention to boilerplate.

All of these factors create a "free-rider" problem for consumers. For any single consumer, the costs of monitoring a business's standard-form contract outweigh the benefits. At the same time, however, all consumers benefit from a sufficient number taking care to monitor businesses' practices closely enough to dissuade businesses from including exploitative terms in their standard-form contracts. Because consumers do not realize all of the benefits of their vigilance, the market likely underproduces savvy consumers.

2. Social Forces

Rational calculation alone cannot explain consumers' general failure to read standard forms. In some circumstances, the market [448] should produce a sufficient number of consumers who recognize the unlikely contingencies covered by the standard form such that businesses feel disciplined. Nevertheless, most commentators agree that only a tiny fraction of consumers read and understand boilerplate. Other factors therefore also must affect consumer behavior. Social forces induce consumers to sign standard-form contracts quickly, even when they should take the time to read and understand them. Businesses often present standard-form contracts at a moment when consumers are hurried and when stopping to read and understand the boilerplate will feel awkward or unpleasant. For example, businesses sometimes present forms to consumers when other consumers, also in a hurry, are waiting in line, such as at the car rental counter. Businesses want consumers to believe that by reading the boilerplate, they are wasting everybody's time. At the very least, the business's agent may send signals that he is in a hurry.

Consumers know that reading the boilerplate may not only waste people's time, but can appear confrontational. By stopping to read the boilerplate, a consumer signals to the agent, and any others present, that the consumer does not trust the business or its agent. Particularly after a long negotiation over other terms (such as the price of a car), the consumer often will develop a relationship with the business's agent. Consumers will feel uncomfortable suddenly indicating distrust to the reassuring agent by studying terms covering unlikely events. Finally, businesses can deliberately (or even unintentionally) reduce consumers' willingness to read the terms by the manner in which [449] they present the contract. For example, people prefer commensurate over one-sided exchanges and expect their counterparts to have the same preference. Consequently, people generally feel that if they have received a concession in a social exchange, they are obliged to follow up with one. In one systematic study of this phenomenon, psychologists found that people were twice as willing to donate two hours of their time to a charity if they had already declined to donate two hundred hours of their time to the same charity. People were more willing to donate their time because they felt badly about turning down the initial request. Businesses frequently take advantage of this technique. They offer consumers the standard-form contract only after concluding a long negotiation in which the business has made the consumer feel that she had won many concessions. Car dealers, for example, know to defer discussion of the boilerplate until after agreement to the basic terms so that the consumer believes there has been some give-and-take. In their efforts to ensure that they sell as many cars as possible, car dealerships structure their transactions so as to convince consumers that they can safely trust the salesperson and ignore the fine print in the sales contract.

Businesses' agents also can take advantage of the generally good-natured approach most people bring to any social interaction. For example, people often require little in the way of a justification for doing favors. In one study, office workers using a photocopy machine were equally willing to allow a person to interrupt their work to make copies when the interrupter said she was in a rush as when she merely said she had to make copies. People mindlessly do these little favors [450] for others in the ordinary course of social interaction, so long as the party receiving the favor offers some justification, however dubious. This tendency suggests agents often will have little difficulty extracting

The precise social technique that businesses rely upon to complete the transaction does not matter for this analysis. Suffice it to say that businesses can draw upon a host of social conventions and influences that lead people into quiet compliance when signing standard-form contracts. In addition, businesses inadvertently can create social pressure on consumers to sign their forms. Over time, experienced agents will discover methods of presenting standard terms that smooth the transaction and save time by discouraging consumers from reading their forms.

3. Cognitive Factors

In addition to the rational and social factors in the environment of form contracting that dissuade consumers from reading standard forms, consumers also rely on decision making strategies about contractual risks that keep them from reading the boilerplate. Consumers have limited cognitive resources with which to assess the risks associated with a contract. Consequently, they rely on mental shortcuts or rules of thumb to guide complex decisions about risks. [451] These rules of thumb lead people to worry too much about risks in some circumstances, and not enough about risks in others. Although excessive concern with risk could induce consumers to overcome some of the rational and social factors that discourage them from reading boilerplate, several features of the business-to-consumer standard-form contract suggest that consumers are more apt to worry too little about contractual risks.

First, psychologists long have believed that when making a decision, such as whether to enter into a contract, people rarely invest in a complete search for information, nor do they fully process the information they receive. Instead, they rely on casually acquired, partial information, sufficient to make them comfortable with their choice: a process referred to as "satisficing." Consumers engaged in a process of satisficing will stop investigating their decisions before they have all the information they need to make informed choices. Consumers are therefore unlikely even to consider whether the assessment of the remote risks described in boilerplate terms is important to their decision to enter into a contract.

Second, and related to the satisficing process, people have difficulty making decisions that require a balancing of many different factors. [452] To simplify matters, people tend to reduce their decisions to a small number of factors, even as they claim to use multiple factors. This narrow cognitive focus might be sensible, in fact. Numerous studies indicate that people who rely on simplified decision-making models also tend to make better decisions than if they used complicated models. Some scholars have argued that this tendency to simplify decision-making means that people essentially cannot evaluate the many situations covered by the terms in standard-form contracts. Instead, they focus their attention on a small number of aspects of a contract, such as price and quantity.

This narrow cognitive focus that people bring to complex decisions creates a temptation for businesses to offer enticing prices and terms concerning the negotiable portions of the form and to make up for any concessions by drafting one-sided boilerplate terms. Consumers will focus their cognitive skills on the "important" terms, such as price, but ignore the hidden costs buried in the boilerplate. Consumers also mistakenly might believe that they have digested all of the boilerplate terms.

Third, consumers who have decided to enter into a contract largely based on a few salient factors such as price and apparent quality want to believe that refraining from reading the boilerplate is reasonable. [453] Although there are few studies on consumer responses to standard-form contracts, psychologists have demonstrated that people often engage in such "motivated reasoning," meaning that they make inferences consistent with what they want to believe. People also interpret ambiguous evidence in ways that favor their beliefs and desires. Because consumers usually encounter standard terms after they have decided to purchase the good or service, they will process the terms in the boilerplate in a way that supports their desire to complete the transaction. One empirical study, for example, demonstrated that tenants tend to believe that the terms of leases they have signed are more favorable to them than is actually the case.

Finally, although people commonly overestimate the importance of adverse risks, they underestimate adverse risks they voluntarily undertake. For example, automobile drivers overestimate their ability to avoid accidents. This over-optimism also extends to legal obligations. [454] Because consumers voluntarily enter into contracts, they will tend to believe that they can also safely discount the low-probability events covered by standard terms. People intending to purchase a product likely will overstate their own ability to assess the reputation and good faith of the person or company with whom they are interacting.

4. Summary of the Paper-World Paradigm

In the paper world of standard-form contracting, consumers consistently fail to read their standard terms. This failure undermines market pressure to provide mutually beneficial terms. Despite their institutional limitations, courts therefore have reason to police the terms of standard-form contracts to protect consumers from exploitation.

UNFAIR CONTRACT TERMS

[16.25] Part 2-3 of the ACL provides a regime rendering void unfair contract terms in standard-form consumer contracts. The application of this regime is discussed in the next extract.

ACCC v Chrisco

[16.30] Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v Chrisco Hampers Australia Ltd [2015] FCA 1204; (2015) 239 FCR 33.

[FACTS: The facts are set out in the judgment of Edelman J.]

EDELMAN J:

Introduction

[35] [2] The applicant, the ACCC, claimed that Chrisco contravened the ACL in the course of Chrisco's business. Chrisco's business included supplying customers with Christmas hampers. The goods in Chrisco's hampers were usually priced above retail prices. But the customers paid Chrisco for the hampers by instalments over periods of up to a year. Chrisco said that many of its customers had told Chrisco that "they wouldn't be able to manage without our help".

[3] Chrisco's contracts with its customers contained a term (called the HeadStart term) that required the customers to allow Chrisco to continue withdrawing funds from the customer's bank account even after the customer had made full payment for the goods. The term would apply unless the customer opted out of it. The money withdrawn from the customer's bank account would be used for any future order made by the customer but the customer would not obtain any discount on a future order and if the customer did not place an order, but requested a refund of the money paid, the money would be refunded without interest.

[4] The first issue concerns whether the HeadStart term is an "unfair term" within the meaning of s 24 of the ACL. The essential issue in this case is whether the HeadStart term caused a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract. One of Chrisco's submissions was that the demographic of its customers, some of whom were described as "unsophisticated", was such that it was an advantage for them to have money removed from their accounts prior to placing another order unless they elected to the contrary or sought a refund. Chrisco submitted that the removal of the money from the customers' accounts without interest, and without any discount on a prospective order, conferred a benefit on the customers. Chrisco said that the benefit was that the customers were given the ability to pay for prospective orders by smaller instalments over a longer period of time (albeit at a higher cost taking into account the time value of money). As I explain in the body of these reasons, such a "benefit" is not substantial. I consider that in all of the circumstances of the HeadStart term and Chrisco's contract the term was unfair.

[38] [26] It was common ground that, since January 2011, each agreement between Chrisco and a customer for the supply of a Christmas hamper was a consumer contract within the meaning of s 23(3) of the ACL and a standard form contract within the meaning of s 27 of the ACL. Chrisco's customers were all consumers.

Issue 1: Was the 2014 HeadStart term an "unfair term" within the meaning of s 24 of the ACL?

[31] The 2014 HeadStart term which the ACCC alleged to be unfair is set out below. It was pleaded in paragraphs 10 and 11 of the ACCC's statement of claim, and admitted to be a term by Chrisco.

[32] As to orders made from Chrisco's catalogue:

> When your 2014 […] Order is fully paid you will automatically roll into a 2015 HeadStart Plan for the following year. Your HeadStart Plan is fully refundable. You can choose not to have this option by ticking here.
>
>
> How does a HeadStart Plan work? Your direct Debit payments will continue until your order is fully paid (no later than 24th October 2014). After the 24th October 2014, a HeadStart Plan will be created for you and payments will continue accordingly. A HeadStart Plan will be created for you and payments towards next year's order, while giving you time to decide exactly what products you want.
> We will write to you to confirm your HeadStart Plan payments prior to commencing Direct Debits.

[33] As for orders made from Chrisco's website, for the 2014 year, the website terms and conditions relevantly provided:

> When your 2014 […] Order is fully paid you will automatically roll into a 2015 HeadStart Plan for the following year. Your HeadStart Plan is fully refundable. You can choose not to have this option by ticking here.
> HeadStart Plan Your direct debit payments will continue until your order is fully paid for (no later than 24th October 2014). After the 24th October 2014, a HeadStart Plan will be created for you and direct debit payments will continue accordingly. A HeadStart Plan allows you to make payments towards next year's order, while giving you time to decide exactly which products you want. We will write to you to confirm your HeadStart Plan payments prior to commencing your direct debits. Your HeadStart Plan is fully refundable at no cost to you, should you change your mind.

[40] [35] A separate term of the contract, which the ACCC did not allege to be unfair but which is relevant in the consideration of the terms of the contract as a whole, is the provision in the Order Confirmation. For the 2014 year, the Order Confirmation also provided in relation to a HeadStart Plan:

> Unless you've advised us otherwise, we'll keep your payments going for any fully paid Hamper 2014 order, so that you can keep saving for next years order. Please see above for your final payment date.

[36] The Hamper 2014 Order Confirmation identified the final payment date as a date in late October 2014.

Section 24 of the ACL: the meaning of an unfair term

[37] Section 24 of the ACL provides as follows:

Meaning of unfair

(1) A term of a consumer contract is unfair if:

(a) it would cause a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract; and

(b) it is not reasonably necessary in order to protect the legitimate interests of the party who would be advantaged by the term; and

(c) it would cause detriment (whether financial or otherwise) to a party if it were to be applied or relied on.

(2) In determining whether a term of a consumer contract is unfair under subsection (1), a court may take into account such matters as it thinks relevant, but must take into account the following:

(a) the extent to which the term is transparent;

(b) the contract as a whole.

[39] Section 24 of the ACL is an example of a legislative technique that was historically less familiar to the common lawyer than it was to the civilian lawyer. It is a technique which creates broad evaluative criteria to be developed incrementally. In Plevin v Paragon Personal Finance Ltd [2014] 1 WLR 4222, the United Kingdom Supreme Court considered a legislative provision that permitted reopening of credit transactions where the relationship between the creditor and the debtor was "unfair". Speaking of the provision, Lord Sumption in the leading judgment said, at [10], that it was not possible to state a precise or universal test for its application.

[40] As Justice Leeming has explained, open-ended statutes which turn on broadly expressed concepts "naturally and indeed necessarily attract a more purposive and less minutely textual mode of construction": M Leeming, "Equity: Ageless in the 'Age of Statutes' " (2015) 9 Journal of Equity 108 at 116. The legislative concept of "unfairness" in s 24, with elaboration through the three elements of unfairness, might be described as a guided form of open-ended legislation. In relation to the Victorian version of the same unfairness provisions as arise in this case, in Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2015) 236 FCR 199 at [363]-[364], Allsop CJ (Besanko and Middleton JJ agreeing) emphasised the evaluative nature of the assessment of unfairness, to be carried out with a close attendance to the statutory terms. The Chief Justice also observed that "unjustness and unfairness are of a lower moral or ethical standard than unconscionability".

(a) Would the HeadStart term cause a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract?

[43] [47] Both parties proceeded on the common ground that the approach to be taken to this element was the approach taken by Lord Bingham in Director-General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc at [17]:

> The requirement of significant imbalance is met if a term is so weighted in favour of the supplier as to tilt the parties' rights and obligations under the contract significantly in his favour. This may be the granting to the supplier of a beneficial option or discretion or power, or by the imposing on the consumer of a disadvantageous burden or risk or duty.

[49] I proceed on the basis that Lord Bingham's definition is an appropriate meaning to be given to the notion of "significant imbalance". But the focus remains on the terms of the section. This is particularly the case in circumstances in which the UK regulations are not identical to the terms of s 24 and, as I have explained above, were not intended to be identical.

[44] [51] An assessment of this first element of unfairness requires consideration of the HeadStart term together with the parties' other rights and obligations arising under the contract in order to assess whether the HeadStart term causes a significant imbalance in the rights and obligations arising under the contract.

[52] The first point of note about the HeadStart term, which I consider to be a "relevant matter" under s 24(2), is that the HeadStart term is a term from which the consumer could "opt out". Although the Headstart term required the consumer to permit Chrisco to remove money from the consumer's account for an order that might never be placed, the consumer had the power to opt out of that obligation.

[53] The second point of note is that the HeadStart term gave a right to Chrisco to withdraw money from the consumer's account, after the conclusion of the consumer's order, without any substantial corresponding right to the consumer. A right is the correlative of a duty. But what duty is imposed upon Chrisco which corresponds to the consumer's duty to permit Chrisco to withdraw money from his or her account?

[54] Several possible formulations of a consumer's corresponding right can be considered.

[55] One formulation by Senior Counsel for Chrisco was that the HeadStart term gave the consumer (ts 112) "a right to place an order for delivery of a hamper of their choosing within the amount … contributed at any time up to the delivery date and they retain the option to get their money fully back if they do not place that order".

[56] But this is no right at all. A consumer had the power to place an order for a delivery of a hamper whether or not the HeadStart term applied. The consumer could place an order for an amount which would otherwise have been collected under the HeadStart term, or an amount more or less than that. I do not accept that the consumer obtained a substantial corresponding right to be repaid upon demand, prior to placing an order, without interest, and assuming the continuing solvency of Chrisco, the same sum of money that Chrisco had withdrawn earlier. As I explain below, there is also a lack of clarity about the operation of any such "right".

[57] Another attempted formulation of a right of a consumer under the HeadStart term corresponding to the obligation to have money withdrawn from the consumer's account was that the consumer had a right to place an order for a Chrisco hamper without having to pay the larger weekly or larger monthly contribution if the payments were made over a shorter period. But the "larger weekly" or "larger monthly" contribution was not a larger overall payment because the price of the hamper did not change. In fact, taking into account the time value of money, this alleged "right" is for the consumer to pay more, by making payments of the same total amount but starting at an earlier point in time.

[58] In effect, the HeadStart term involved a savings plan by which (unless they opted out or sought a refund) consumers were required to save, interest free, with Chrisco, towards the purchase of Chrisco's goods in 2015 which were generally priced above retail prices and which the consumers might not decide to purchase.

[59] At various points in oral submissions both counsel proceeded from the assumption that the consumers involved suggests that Chrisco's consumers were generally from low to middle incomes.

The limited evidence concerning the demographic of consumers supports that as a general, although not universal, matter. There was evidence describing anecdotal information that this was Chrisco's class of consumer (TB 794). Chrisco's "Customer Guarantee" also described how "thousands of customers … tell us they wouldn't be able to manage without our help".

[60] Senior Counsel for Chrisco submitted that there was no imbalance, or no substantial imbalance, in the parties' rights because the sums of money lost as a result of the consumers' payments being interest free were likely to be small. Even if the assumption were made that the sums of money involved were likely to be small (which I do not accept, for reasons explained below at [65]-[68]), I do not accept that there would be no imbalance in the parties' rights as a result of the interest free transfer of the consumer's money to Chrisco.

[61] Chrisco's assumption of very small sums of money being lost as a result of interest free payments can be tested with an example. The example might be a consumer who orders Chrisco's Australia Zoo Family pass hamper for $185 from the 2014 Chrisco catalogue. This requires weekly payments of $3.60 rather than a lump sum payment or larger payment, before 24 October 2014, of $185 (which Chrisco's general acknowledgment in its marketing material might be an amount which is more than retail prices).

[62] The submission by Chrisco was effectively that such an "unsophisticated" consumer who did not have the "discipline" to budget to pay $185 for the purchase of the same hamper for the following Christmas, in December 2015, would benefit from Chrisco's savings plan at very little cost to the consumer. In other words, this unsophisticated consumer, who cannot budget for himself or herself to save $3.60 per week, would not suffer any significant financial disadvantage by having Chrisco withdraw that amount of money from the consumer's account on a monthly basis after 24 December 2014.

[63] In oral submissions, Senior Counsel for Chrisco accepted that a hypothetical consumer might have credit card debt which would accumulate at a greater rate due to Chrisco's withdrawals. But, he submitted, it might only be 25% of these small sums that would have been incurred as a cost (ts 114).

[64] The example given by Senior Counsel for Chrisco is based on the assumption that consumers who provide Chrisco with a direct debit authority might have a credit card debt. That is an appropriate assumption. The possibility that a consumer might have credit card debt is a matter upon which judicial notice could be taken just as easily as the judicial notice invited by Chrisco that low interest rates are paid on savings accounts. Indeed, Chrisco's own terms and conditions provided that an order can be paid by credit card and that "Credit Cards will be debited on the 15th of every month". Although the ACCC's case focused only upon the direct debit payments rather than the credit card payments by consumers, Chrisco's intention to debit credit cards as well as savings accounts provides a further basis for the inference that Chrisco's customers might have credit card debt.

[65] It takes only a little reflection, and a calculator, to see that in the hypothetical example above the Chrisco withdrawals could cost this hypothetical consumer up to $25 in interest. This calculation is made using only monthly compounding. In other words, in the hypothetical example, the "unsophisticated" consumer who did not have the "discipline" to budget $3.60 a week, could incur an additional cost of $25 on a $185 purchase. Although this is only a hypothetical example, and might be the outer limit of cost to the consumer, it [46] illustrates that the sums of money involved due to the interest free nature of a consumer's payments over periods of up to 11 months is not necessarily a small amount in relation to the hamper purchase.

[66] In any event, I do not accept the assumption by Chrisco that only small sums of money were involved in the expenditure on Christmas hampers.

[67] First, although Senior Counsel submitted that the average hamper cost was between $80 and $750, there were certainly hampers that cost more than $750. For instance, at p 34 there was a "Mega Christmas" hamper for $962. At p 40 there was a large foldout of a "Summer holiday" hamper for $2,249. There was no evidence concerning the average size of an order.

[68] Secondly, the assumption that orders would be in the lower end of a range of $80 to $750 is based upon the premise that consumers would order only one hamper. But the order form permitted a consumer to order multiple hampers. Indeed, the considerable number of boxes to complete on the order form for different hampers (see instruction number 5), and the provision for a "quantity" of each different hamper, suggests that an order of more than one hamper might not have been unusual. Gift hampers could also be ordered for other people.

[69] Ultimately, it suffices to say that the sums of money lost by Chrisco's withdrawals from the consumer's account, without any obligation upon Chrisco to pay interest and with no discount for the consumer who subsequently chose to place an order, involved a significant detriment to the consumer. That detriment was not balanced by any substantial corresponding right that the consumer obtained against Chrisco.

[70] By itself, it is not necessarily determinative that there is no substantial right to a consumer, or duty upon Chrisco, that corresponds with the consumer's obligations under the HeadStart term. The evaluative exercise involves consideration of the contract as a whole to determine whether there is a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract. I have mentioned the particular importance of the provision which permits the consumer to opt out of the HeadStart term. The evaluative exercise also requires consideration of the extent to which the HeadStart term was transparent.

[71] I turn to a consideration of the extent to which the HeadStart term was transparent and the terms of the contract as a whole.

[72] The Explanatory Memorandum to the Trade Practices Amendment (Australian Consumer Law) Bill (No 2) at [5.38] described a lack of transparency in the terms of a consumer contract as a matter that may be "a strong indication of the existence of a significant imbalance in the rights and obligations of the parties under the contract".

[74] It is unnecessary to decide whether a lack of transparency could itself create an imbalance which does not otherwise exist.

[75] The considerations relevant to assess the extent of transparency of the HeadStart term involve whether it is expressed in reasonably plain language; legible; presented clearly; and readily available to the consumer.

[77] As for website orders, the location of the HeadStart term can be seen in Annexure 2 to these reasons. Although described as the 2013 order form, the relevant year for the unfair contract terms is orders placed prior to 24 October 2014. Again, there is an "opt out" clause on the order form in a similar place to the catalogue order form and the HeadStart term is under the subheading "HeadStart Plan" in a section entitled Payments.

[78] I do not consider that the HeadStart term in the catalogue or on the website was wholly lacking in any transparency. The matters I have described above show that the term was not hidden, and that the option to opt out of the clause was in a place where it might be noticed.

[79] However, there are matters concerning the HeadStart term that reduce its transparency.

[80] First, the language of the HeadStart term is not plain in three respects.

[81] The first respect in which the HeadStart term is not plain is that, as the ACCC set out in its amended pleading at paragraph 13A, the HeadStart term does not clearly identify the amounts that will be direct debited by Chrisco under the HeadStart term or the means by which those amounts would be determined.

[82] The HeadStart term provides that payments to Chrisco from the consumer's account will "continue accordingly". It is the taking of these payments without any corresponding right that the ACCC alleges caused the significant imbalance between the rights of the consumer and the rights of Chrisco. But what are the payments that will be taken? The HeadStart term contains no information on this point. The direct debit request to be completed by the consumer does not resolve this lack of transparency because it does not provide for any particular amount to be debited. It provides only that Chrisco "will give notice to the Customer if it proposes to vary any of the direct debit arrangements".

[83] The lack of transparency on this point might have been easily resolved by reference to the contract as a whole if the amount to be withdrawn from the consumer's account is clearly provided elsewhere in a contemporaneous document. But, prior to the "Order Confirmation" (which is part of the contract although it is not expressed in that way), it was not clear what the amount would be that would be withdrawn from the consumer's account to "continue" the payments. For the notion of "continuing" payments to be transparent the consumer must be able to know what payment was being "continued". [48]

[86] The second respect in which the HeadStart term is not plain is closely related to the first. It concerns the sentence in the catalogue and website terms and conditions which provided "We will write to you to confirm your HeadStart Plan payments prior to commencing Direct Debits". It would not be plain to a consumer whether this was an indication that Chrisco would write to confirm whether the consumer intended to proceed with a scheme of having his or her account debited before an order was placed or whether it was an indication that Chrisco would write to confirm the amount of the payments that it would take.

[87] The Order Confirmation, when it was subsequently received, would have revealed to any consumer that it was the latter. Only at this time would any doubts be removed concerning the precise amount of payments for the consumer who had not opted out of the HeadStart Plan. But, at this later time, the consumer would also discover that the "confirmation" was effectively a formal notice rather than a request by Chrisco to withdraw the money from the consumer's account.

[88] The third respect in which HeadStart term was not plain was that, as the ACCC pleaded, it did not explain to the consumer "the means by which the consumer could cancel the HeadStart Plan" and obtain a refund. Numerous uncertainties might arise:

(1) Could the consumer cancel the HeadStart Plan at any time prior to the final order date in October the following year?

(2) What would happen if the consumer did not do so? …

(3) Would direct debit payments continue even if the payments for the previous year's hamper had been made over a short period (say, from August 2014) so that the total amount of the 2014 total payment had already been collected by January 2015?

(4) In (3), if Chrisco assumed that the consumer intended to order a larger hamper and continued the direct debits then how long would those direct debits continue?

(5) Could Chrisco, as the ACCC asserted, "charge the consumer termination charges in the event he or she cancels the HeadStart Plan after [49] it has been converted to a new order without the benefit of having a 21 days Cooling off period"? If so, could the same termination charges apply where Chrisco "auto-converts" the HeadStart Plan into an order by the consumer for similar goods as the consumer had ordered the previous year?

[89] Secondly, the HeadStart term could have been presented in a manner which was far more legible, much clearer, and more readily available to the consumer. The font size of the HeadStart term was very small. It was less than half of the size of the main heading "About your payments". There was nothing about this term that drew it to the consumer's attention beyond any of the 20 other paragraphs on the same page.

[90] In comparison, in the catalogue order form and "Customer Guarantee", Chrisco employed various techniques to bring other matters specifically to the attention of the consumer. For instance, a bright red colour was used to the statement "Add up total order value". Blue italics, and a larger font, was used for the request "Please provide at least two forms of contact details". And a box in white starkly against a yellow background, and bold font, was used for statements like "We guarantee our products are good quality". The HeadStart term, which permits money to be withdrawn from the consumer's account, without interest, and before any order is placed, is in the same font as every other term on the densely packed page of small print terms and conditions.

[91] Another difficulty with the legibility, clarity and availability of the HeadStart term is that although the HeadStart term and the opt-out provision were opposite each other in the four pages of the catalogue there was no reference in either to the other. The opt-out box to be ticked did not refer to the HeadStart term on the previous page nor did it explain what was involved in the HeadStart Plan. And the HeadStart term on the previous page did not refer to the possibility of opting out.

[92] A further difficulty with the legibility, clarity and availability of the HeadStart term is that the provision that the "HeadStart Plan is fully refundable" is not contained in the terms and conditions in the catalogue at all. Instead, this term is contained in the opt-out box on the form which would be sent to Chrisco. Unless the consumer made a copy of the order form, the consumer who consulted the terms and conditions would not be aware that the HeadStart Plan is fully refundable. Although the ACCC did not allege that Chrisco had breached s 97(1)(b) by failing to ensure that "a copy of the agreement is given to the consumer to whom the goods are, or are to be, supplied", s 97(1)(b) emphasises the lack of transparency that arises due to the absence of this term being in the possession of the consumer who orders by catalogue.

[50] [95] I have focused above upon the considerations particular to the HeadStart term as pleaded. This was the primary focus of the parties in submissions. The evaluative exercise, however, requires the HeadStart term to be considered in the context of the contract as a whole in order to determine whether it would cause a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract. I take into account that both the HeadStart term and the contract as a whole were designed to be convenient to the consumer. In many respects a consumer who entered into the contract with Chrisco may have sought this convenience, particularly given Chrisco's acknowledgment that the prices were generally more than retail prices. This convenience also included the lack of a charge for the collection of instalment payments and the lack of any separate packing, administration, or delivery (other than to remote areas or for oversized or overweight items) charge for items that could be selected for inclusion in a Christmas Hamper.

[96] I also take into account that the HeadStart term is neither listed as an example of an unfair term in s 25 nor does it fall into any of the categories of potential unfair terms described in s 25. But neither those terms, nor those categories, are exhaustive.

[97] Overall, for the reasons I have expressed, and as an evaluative assessment of all the circumstances relevant to the HeadStart term including its transparency and the contract as a whole, the HeadStart term caused a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract.

(b) Was the HeadStart term not reasonably necessary in order to protect the legitimate interests of Chrisco as a party advantaged by it

[98] There is a rebuttable presumption in s 24(4) that a term of a consumer contract is presumed not to be reasonably necessary in order to protect the legitimate interests of the party who would be advantaged by the term. Chrisco made no submission to suggest that the term was reasonably necessary to protect its legitimate interests. This requirement of an unfair term was satisfied.

(c) Would the HeadStart term cause detriment to a party if it were to be applied or relied on?

[99] Counsel for the parties made few submissions concerning this requirement of an unfair term. They assumed, correctly, that in the circumstances of this case, considerations of detriment were also an important part of the consideration of whether the HeadStart term caused a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract.

[100] As I have explained above at [60]-[68], the primary manner in which the HeadStart term would cause detriment to a consumer if it were to be applied or relied on is that it would impose a significant financial detriment upon the consumer without any significant corresponding benefit. This conclusion is also fortified by the considerations concerning transparency discussed above at [72]-[92]. [51]

Conclusion

[101] The first issue concerned those consumers who placed orders, either by Chrisco's Christmas hamper catalogue or online, for delivery of hampers in the November to December 2014 period. I am satisfied that the HeadStart term in those contracts was an unfair term. Since it was common ground that (i) the contracts between Chrisco and its customers were consumer contracts and (ii) the contracts were standard form contracts, the effect of s 23(1) is that the HeadStart term was void for customers placing orders in the November to December 2014 period online or by the catalogue order form.

Orders accordingly.

Consumer guarantees

[17.05] The Australian Consumer Law, Pt 3-2 provides mandatory standards of quality in the supply of goods and services to consumers.

The Australian Competition and Consumer Commission (ACCC), Australian Securities and Investments Commission (ASIC) and State and Territory consumer protection agencies have produced guidance on the consumer guarantees for business, legal advisors and consumer representatives to provide more detailed guidance about the consumer guarantees. PERFORMANCE AND BREACH

Chapter 18. Performance and breach 535

PART VIII

Performance and breach

[18.05] Parties making a contract aim for it to be performed according to its terms. Typically this is what will occur. The cases in this book largely concern the relatively small proportion of transactions in which there is a dispute over performance. Often the parties will be arguing over whether the contract was performed in accordance with its terms. One party (the aggrieved party) will argue that the other party has breached the contract, either through a failure to perform at all or through performance which is in some way inadequate, defective or untimely. The party alleged to have breached the contract may then respond that the contract did not require him or her to do what the aggrieved party alleged. Resolving this issue depends primarily on identifying and construing the terms of the contract, as discussed in Chapters 12–15. Alternatively, the party alleged to be in breach may argue that there was some excuse for his or her failure to perform; for example, that that the contract was not properly formed (see Chapters 3–8), that the contract was frustrated (see Chapter 15) or that the enforceability of the contract is affected by misinformation (Chapters 32 and 33), an abuse of power (Chapters 34–38) or illegality (see Chapters 40–42).

Once a breach of contract is established, the aggrieved party has a right to damages to compensate for any loss caused by the breach. If the contract has been fully performed, this may be a sufficient remedy. If the contract has been only been partially performed, there are more options potentially available to the aggrieved party. He or she may want to proceed with performance of the contract in addition to claiming damages for any loss caused by the breach. If the party in breach is also willing to continue with the contract, there is no reason why performance cannot proceed. If the party in breach does not wish to perform, then, in some cases, the aggrieved party might be able to obtain an order for specific performance compelling performance of the contract (see Chapter 30). Alternatively, and in addition to claiming damages, the aggrieved party might want to terminate the contract, perhaps because he or she no longer trusts the other party to do what is expected under the contract. It is important to bear in mind that not all breaches give rise to a right to terminate a contract. The right to terminate, for breach and otherwise, is discussed in Chapters 19–25. The right to terminate a contract may, in some circumstances, be lost. These circumstances and other restrictions on the right to terminate are discussed in Chapter 25.

[19.05] A contract may be brought to an end by operation of law as in the case of frustration (see Chapter 15) or by the election of one of the parties following certain types of breach (see Chapter 21). The parties may also themselves agree to terminate their contract.

CATEGORIES OF AGREEMENTS TO TERMINATE A CONTRACT

[19.10] There are essentially two ways in which a contract may be terminated by the agreement of the parties. These are:

1. termination according to the terms of the contract to be terminated; or
2. termination by a separate and subsequent contract between the parties.

In either case, the rights to terminate may be express or implied.

TERMINATION UNDER THE ORIGINAL CONTRACT

Express powers to terminate

[19.15] Particularly in long-term commercial contracts, parties will usually include an express term providing when or how their contract may be brought to an end. Often the parties will also specify a procedure to be followed before the contract can be terminated, for example, requiring notice of the decision to terminate.

Implied right to terminate a contract of otherwise indefinite duration

[19.20] Where a contract is silent as to its duration, courts may be prepared to imply a right for one or both of the parties to terminate that contract. The considerations relevant in implying such a right and whether the party terminating should be required to give reasonable notice of termination to the other party are considered in Crawford Fitting Co v Sydney Valve & Fitting Pty Ltd (1988) 14 NSWLR 438.

Crawford Fitting v Sydney Valve & Fittings

[19.25] Crawford Fitting Co v Sydney Valve & Fittings Pty Ltd (1988) 14 NSWLR 438 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Appeal from Rogers J.

[FACTS: In 1969, Crawford, the appellants, an Ohio-based corporation and manufacturer of specialised valves and fittings used in controlling high-pressure gas and liquids, appointed Sydney Valve, the distributor, as the exclusive distributor of its products in New South Wales. The distributor agreed not to deal in any other products. In 1984, the appellants gave the distributor six months' notice of termination of the agreement. Rogers J held that the "reasonable period of notice should have been two years". The appellants appealed.]

PRIESTLEY JA: [440] As I agree generally with what McHugh JA has written, I will not go over the ground he has covered. The question in the case seems to me to be one of fact, to be decided in the light of the considerations discussed by McHugh JA, and one which this Court is in as good a position to decide as the trial judge.

Amongst the various factors which have weighed with me in reaching the conclusion that six months notice of termination were not breaches of contract in the circumstances of the case, there are two in regard to which I wish to add to what McHugh JA said. The first of these is that once notices of termination were given, one of three possibilities had to come to pass for each distributor: either (i) to leave the particular field of activity, by going out of business altogether, or going into a different field, or (ii) to continue in business partly in the same field and partly in another or others, or (iii) to remain substantially in the same field in direct competition with either the appellants or their products. The third of these would present particular problems for both parties; … Each party to the contract would have conflicts of interest during the notice period which were not present before the notice was given. The same observation would apply, to a lesser extent to the second possibility. In each situation, it seems to me, the shorter the [441] period of notice, within the limits of reasonableness, the better. Similarly if the first possibility is taken into account against the factual circumstances described by McHugh JA.

The second factor is related to the feeling that first acquaintance with the facts of the case caused in me, that there was, somehow, something unfair in the way the distributors had been treated by the appellants. On trying to pinpoint the reason for this reaction, I concluded that it stemmed from the fact that the contracts were terminated, rather than that the length of notice of termination was unreasonable. It was only the latter point that was in issue in this court. It was assumed in argument that the contracts could be terminated on reasonable notice, and (silently) involved in this assumption was that the (implied) term concerning termination did not provide for any payment of compensation for loss of a long standing arrangement valuable to each distributor. In the absence of any such provision the value of the arrangement to each distributor was contingent only, and lasted only so long as due notice of termination was not given ….

The principles applicable

[19.30] When the question arises whether a commercial agreement for an indefinite period may be terminated, the answer depends upon whether the agreement contains an implied term to that effect. The existence of the term is a matter of construction. But the question of construction does not depend only upon a textual examination of the words or writings of the parties. It also involves consideration of the subject matter of the agreement, the circumstances in which it was made, and the provisions to which the parties have or have not agreed.

In Llanelly Railway & Dock Co v London and North Western Railway Co (1875) LR 7 HL 550 Lord Selborne declared (at 567):

> an agreement de futuro, extending over a tract of time which, on the face of the instrument, is indefinite and unlimited, must (in general) throw upon anyone alleging that it is not perpetual, the burden of proving that allegation, either from the nature of the subject, or from some rule of law applicable thereto.

In Llanelly the House of Lords held that an agreement by which a railway company was given running powers over another company's lines was a permanent and not a terminable agreement. However, with the exception of Lord Selborne, the judgments of the other members of the House were based on the terms of the agreement and not upon any general principle of construction …

Although even in the second half of this century the law has been stated to be in accordance with the speech of Lord Selborne in Llanelly … the weight of 20th century authority makes it difficult to hold that there is any presumption of perpetuity in the case of commercial agreements …

In Martin-Baker Aircraft Co Ltd v Canadian Flight Equipment Ltd [1955] 2 QB 556, McNair J said (at 577) that there is no presumption of permanency in the case of an indefinite commercial agreement but that if there is it is in favour of termination and not perpetuity.

Mr Justice Buckley has also expressed the view that there is no presumption either way: Re Spenborough Urban District [444] Council's Agreement [1968] Ch 139 at 150. To the same effect is the judgment of Lockhart J in State Bank v Commonwealth Savings Bank (1985) 60 ALR 73 at 101. However, it is not easy to reconcile these statements with the principle that there is a general presumption against adding to a contract a term which the parties have not expressed … In principle, the better view would seem to be that, although there is a presumption against implying a term that an agreement is terminable, ordinarily the nature of a commercial agreement will lead to the conclusion that the parties must have intended it to be terminable on notice. This was the effect of the approach of the courts in Winter Garden Theatre (London) Ltd v Millennium Productions Ltd [1948] AC 173, Martin-Baker, Spenborough …

Whether a contract is terminable on reasonable notice instead of at will also depends upon the existence of an implied term … That question is determined by the circumstances existing at the date of the contract … However, the reasonableness of the period of notice depends upon the circumstances existing when the notice is given … When a contract is terminable on reasonable notice, the period of notice must be sufficiently long to enable the recipient to deploy his labour and equipment in alternative employment, to carry out his commitments, to bring current negotiations to fruition and to wind up the association in a businesslike manner: Winter Garden at 200-1; Australian Blue Metal Ltd v Hughes [1963] AC 74 at 99; Witt (WA) Pty Ltd v Metters Ltd [1967] WAR 15 at 24-5. But in the latter case Hale J denied (at 23) that it is relevant to the reasonableness of the period of notice that the recipient needs time to recoup any expenditure incurred. The appellants asserted that the decision in Witt (WA) Pty Ltd v Metters Ltd and the decision of the Judicial Committee in Australian Blue Metal Ltd v Hughes supported their claim that the reasonableness of a notice period does not take account of the expenditure outlaid by the recipient of the notice or his efforts in creating the conditions which will enable profits to be earned in the future. The appellants contended that these matters are only relevant in determining whether the agreement has existed for a reasonable period … In Witt an agent expended time and money in developing overseas markets and securing orders. After the relationship of the parties had been in existence for almost two and a half years, the manufacturer gave less than four months' notice of termination. The agent claimed that it should have 12 months' notice because another year was needed to recoup its expenditure. Hale J said (at 23) that an implied term requiring reasonable notice of termination should be capable of implementation in a reasonably practicable manner and that the task would be difficult and virtually impossible if the manufacturer needed to form an [445] opinion "based on the profit which the plaintiff might be expected to make in the future". He rejected the agent's contention.

In Australian Blue Metal Ltd v Hughes, the parties entered into a written agreement which gave the "right to mine for magnesite" in return for a royalty. The Judicial Committee held that the agreement was terminable at will with a period of grace to remove any mineral already mined. However, Lord Devlin, in tendering the advice of the Judicial Committee, said that it would not have made any difference to the result of the appeal if the agreement was terminable only on reasonable notice. He said (at 99):

> The implication of reasonable notice is intended to serve only the common purpose of the parties. Whether there need be any notice at all, and, if so, the common purpose for which it is required, are matters to be determined as at the date of the contract; the reasonable time for the fulfilment of the purpose is a matter to be determined as at the date of the notice. The common purpose is frequently derived from the desire that both parties may be expected to have to cushion themselves against sudden change, giving themselves time to make alternative arrangements of a sort similar to those which are being terminated.

Lord Devlin said that there was no evidence from which it could be inferred that a factor operating in the minds of the parties at the time when the contract was made was that it should not be terminated abruptly just "when their operations were moving out of an unprofitable phase into a profitable one." He also said that there was insufficient evidence of any heavy initial expenditure which could only be recouped in time. Accordingly, Lord Devlin said (at 99) that the Judicial Committee could not "infer as the common purpose of any requirement of reasonable notice anything more than the ordinary purpose — time on the one hand for the appellants to deploy their labour and equipment profitably elsewhere and, on the other hand, for the respondents to find another licensee".

Although the Judicial Committee's references to the common purpose being in existence at the time of the contract and to the lack of evidence of any heavy "initial" expenditure are consistent with the appellant's contentions in this case, they do not really assist it. The notice in Hughes was given within ten weeks of entering into the agreement. The reference to initial heavy expenditure, therefore, does not have the significance which in another context it might have had. Moreover, the common purposes, which give rise to a requirement of reasonable notice, are not necessarily the same for a distributorship agreement, for example, as they are for the type of agreement considered in Australian Blue Metal Ltd v Hughes. It will often be a common purpose of a distributorship agreement that the relationship of the parties will continue for long enough after the giving of a notice of termination to enable the distributor to recoup any extraordinary expenditure or effort. Otherwise a distributor would have no incentive to make or outlay additional effort or expenditure for the mutual benefit of the parties. Inability to reap the benefits of ordinary expenditure or effort incurred during the course of the agreement may be regarded as a business risk which a distributor takes when he enters into an agreement terminable at any time. If the nature of the business produces a lapse of time between effort or expenditure and earning, a certain amount of such effort or expenditure [446] will go unrewarded whatever period of notice is given. But extraordinary effort or expenditure by the distributor incurred with the actual or tacit authority of his principal is in a different category. An appropriate period of notice can give the distributor the opportunity to exploit any extraordinary effort or expenditure. In principle, therefore, it is difficult to see why extraordinary effort and expenditure is not relevant to the reasonableness of the notice period even though the agreement has been in existence for more than a reasonable period.

In Martin-Baker Aircraft Co Ltd v Canadian Flight Equipment Ltd, McNair J, in holding that there was an implied term that the agreement was terminable on reasonable notice, took into account (at 580) that the agent was unlikely to expend money without security. In determining the reasonableness of the notice, his Lordship took into account (at 581) the outlay of capital expenditure. In Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 WLR 361 … in holding that 12 months was a reasonable period of notice their Lordships took into account that the parties had in mind that promotional efforts were needed and that the real reward would come in the future …

The appellants asserted that in both these cases the recipient of the notice had not had a sufficient opportunity to obtain its reward for expenditure and effort incurred and that they were to be explained by the necessity for the contract to continue for a reasonable period of time. That was not the way, however, that the judges who heard the cases decided them. The appellants also relied on the approach in the United States where the courts distinguish between the reasonable duration of a contract and the reasonable notice necessary to terminate it …

In McGinnis Piano & Organ Co v Yamaha International Corp 480 F 2d 474 (1973) the Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit said (at 479):

> We understand the rule in Minnesota to be that franchise agreements which do not contain provisions for duration or termination are ordinarily terminable by either party at will upon reasonable notice [447] to the other. Reasonable notice is that period of time necessary to close out the franchise and minimise losses. We further understand Minnesota law to permit a reasonable duration to be implied in franchise agreements where a dealer has made substantial investments in reliance on the agreement. Reasonableness in such situations is measured by the length of time reasonably necessary for a dealer to recoup its investment. A reasonable notice period prior to termination is also required ….

Although Witt and Decro-Wall seem to proceed on a contrary hypothesis, I think that a contract for an indefinite period will sometimes contain an implied term that it will continue for a reasonable period. The approach in the United States authorities is in my opinion conceptually correct. That approach receives some support from the judgment of Dixon J in Reid v Moreland (1946) 73 CLR 1 where the High Court had to consider an agreement which gave a right to cut timber in return for royalty payments. After holding that the right was exclusive but not interminable, Dixon J said (at 13) that he thought "that the common implication would be made restricting the exercise of the right to a reasonable time. In other words, it should be understood as a right within a reasonable time to cut and remove the timber on the land." This proposition concerned a case where the licensee was claiming that his right to exploit property was permanent. By a parity of reasoning a contract which is not determinable by will and which has no fixed duration should continue by common implication for a reasonable period.

The implication of a term that a distributorship or agency should continue for a reasonable period gives effect to the reasonable expectations of the parties. The distributor is frequently obliged to invest his own or borrowed money in the establishment or development of the business, in purchasing stock and plant, and in employing workers. He has no hope of recouping his initial expenditure or effort if the manufacturer can terminate the agreement at will or by a period of notice sufficient only to enable the distributor to deploy his labour and equipment elsewhere …

Accordingly, if a person in the initial stages of a business arrangement expends money or effort in developing the business, it provides a ground for implying a term that the business is to continue for a reasonable period. If, for example, in addition to agreeing to sell a product, a distributor furnishes additional consideration by setting up or developing a distribution system at his own expense, there will usually be an implied term that the distributorship will continue for a reasonable period: Jack's Cookie Co v Brooks 227 F 2d 935 at 938-9 (1955). There will be a base for such an implication even where the initial effort or expenditure is of a kind that will recur throughout the agreement. For it is not to be presumed that the parties intended that the agreement could be put to an end before the person incurring the expenditure [448] or effort has had an opportunity to recoup his initial expenditure or effort …

In this class of case, no question of notice arises until the contract has existed for a reasonable period. Despite their reasoning, cases such as Decro-Wall should be regarded as falling under the category of agreements which must exist for a reasonable period before any notice can be given.

However, the relevance of expenditure of money or effort cannot be confined to cases where the expenditure or effort occurs in the initial stages of the contract. If, during the contract, a party, acting within the scope of the agreement, engages in extraordinary expenditure or effort, that factor must be taken into account in determining the reasonableness of any notice given … In so far as Witt (WA) Pty Ltd v Metters Ltd suggests the contrary, in my opinion it is erroneous. On the other hand, recurrent expenditure or effort not being of an extraordinary nature would not seem relevant to the reasonableness of the notice period. The expenditure of money or effort is simply part of the ordinary cost of doing business. Once the business has existed for a reasonable period, the inability to profit from such work or expenditure is part of the business risk the agent or distributor takes in entering into an agreement which is terminable at any time. Further, the prospect of obtaining profits in the future is not a relevant factor to be taken into account except so far as it is consequential upon the incurring of extraordinary expenditure or effort within the scope of the agreement.

The chief purpose of a notice for a reasonable period, therefore, is to enable the parties to bring to an end in an orderly way a relationship which, ex hypothesi, has existed for a reasonable period so that they will have a reasonable opportunity to enter into alternative arrangements and to wind up matters which arise out of their relationship. Matters to be wound up will include carrying out existing commitments, bringing current negotiations to fruition, and, where appropriate, obtaining the fruits of any extraordinary expenditure or effort carried out within the scope of the agreement. The line between ordinary recurrent expenditure and effort and extraordinary expenditure and effort will not always be easy to draw …

In the present case, the appellants claimed that the agreement had existed for a reasonable period. But they did not dispute that the agreement was terminable only for cause or by giving reasonable notice. However, they contended that the distributors had failed to prove that six months was not a reasonable period of notice …

[453] Although the matter is near the borderline, I have come to the conclusion that on the evidence the distributors have failed to prove that the notice given by Crawford was unreasonable … On balance, I do not think that they have shown that, if they had had two years' notice or even 12 months' notice, they would have been in a better position "to make alternative arrangements of a sort similar to those" which were terminated than they were with six months' notice.

Accordingly, I have come to the conclusion that his Honour's answer to the preliminary question should be set aside …

TERMINATION BY SUBSEQUENT AGREEMENT

Express agreements

[19.35] Parties may make a subsequent agreement to terminate their contract. To be binding in law, an agreement to terminate an existing agreement must comply with the ordinary rules of contract formation, including the requirement of consideration (see Chapter 4). Where both parties still have obligations to perform under the contract, each party will provide consideration in agreeing to release the other party from her or his remaining obligations: see Paal Wilson & Co A/S v Partenreederei Hannah Blumenthal [1983] 1 AC 854, 915–6. The need for consideration requires a distinction to be drawn between contracts that remain at least partly unperformed on each side (executory contracts) and contracts that have been fully performed by one party.

Executory contracts may be discharged by mutual agreement. No particular form is necessary, and the consideration for each party's abandonment of her or his rights is the contemporaneous abandonment by the other party of her or his rights. By contrast, in the case of a contract that has been fully performed by one party, the party who has not performed cannot provide consideration by agreeing to release the performing party from his or her obligations. To discharge such a contract, parties must rely on a deed or may make use of an agreement known as an "accord and satisfaction".

Accord and satisfaction

[19.40] Accord and satisfaction is the purchase of a release from an obligation, whether arising under contract or tort, by means of any valuable consideration, not being the actual performance of the obligation itself. The accord is the agreement by which the obligation is discharged. The satisfaction is the consideration which makes the agreement operative: British Russian Gazette & Trade Outlook Ltd v Associated Newspapers Ltd [1933] 2 KB 616, 643 per Scrutton LJ. The operation of an accord and satisfaction is discussed in McDermott v Black (1940) 63 CLR 161, which concerns the use of an accord and satisfaction to obtain a release from liability in tort.

McDermott v Black

[19.45] McDermott v Black (1940) 63 CLR 161 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: Black, the purchaser, alleged that he was induced by fraudulent misrepresentations made by McDermott, the vendor, to enter into a contract of sale of shares and that he deposited certain bonds with McDermott to secure payment of the deposit. Prior to the date of completion, Black complained, by letter, of the misrepresentations, but in a later letter, he withdrew all allegations imputing anything improper to McDermott, conditional on McDermott granting him an extension of time to complete the contract. This extension of time was granted, but Black refused to complete on the extended date, whereupon McDermott rescinded the contract. Black then sued the vendor for damages for deceit, relying on the misrepresentations that he had withdrawn.]

DIXON J: [183] The question for our consideration may be divided under two legal heads.

First, did Black's agreement to withdraw the allegations of improper conduct operate to extinguish his cause of action in deceit? And secondly, if not, did it nevertheless disable him from relying in an action of deceit upon the specific misrepresentations to which his withdrawal related? That is to say, conceding that if he had been able to establish other fraudulent misrepresentations afterwards discovered, he might have maintained an action of deceit founded upon them, yet could he revive the allegations he had withdrawn and rely also on them?

An agreement not to sue upon particular allegations might give a defendant a good equitable plea, but at common law it would be necessary for him to show that it amounted to an accord and satisfaction discharging the cause of action or else that it gave rise to an estoppel.

The essence of accord and satisfaction is the acceptance by the plaintiff of something in place of his cause of action. What he takes [184] is a matter depending on his own consent or agreement. It may be a promise or contract or it may be the act or thing promised. But, whatever it is, until it is provided and accepted the cause of action remains alive and unimpaired. The accord is the agreement or consent to accept the satisfaction. Until the satisfaction is given the accord remains executory and cannot bar the claim. The distinction between an accord executory and an accord and satisfaction remains as valid and as important as ever. An accord executory neither extinguishes the old cause of action nor affords a new one. The decision of the Court of Appeal in British Russian Gazette etc Ltd and Talbot v Associated Newspapers Ltd [1933] 2 KB 616, though doubtless some of the reasons display less zeal for principle than for reform, does not appear to me to be inconsistent with the received doctrine that no new cause of action is given by an accord executory … The case … provides no more than a late illustration of the doctrine, finally established perhaps by Flockton v Hall (1849) 14 QB 380; 117 ER 150; Hall v Flockton (1851) 16 QB 1039; 117 ER 1179, that of accord and satisfaction there are two cases, one where the making of the agreement itself is what is stipulated for, and the other, where it is the doing of the things promised by the agreement. The distinction depends on what exactly is agreed to be taken in place of the existing cause of action or claim. An executory promise or series of promises given in consideration of the abandonment of the claim may be accepted in substitution or satisfaction of the existing liability, or, [185] on the other hand, promises may be given by the party liable that he will satisfy the claim by doing an act, making over a thing or paying an ascertained sum of money and the other party may agree to accept, not the promise, but the act, thing or money in satisfaction, of his claim. If the agreement is to accept the promise in satisfaction, the discharge of the liability is immediate; if the performance, then there is no discharge unless and until the promise is performed.

In the present case, an extension of time to 5 August 1937, is the thing promised. From the nature of the concession, the extension consisted not so much in allowing time to elapse as in the waiver de praesenti of insistence on the plaintiff's observing the time named in the contract and of the consequences of non-observance, whatever they might be. What the plaintiff sought was a concession in the nature of a variation of the contractual terms fixing the time for completion. There is little difficulty, therefore, in regarding the defendant's agreement to postpone, and not the actual lapse of time, as the thing looked for by the plaintiff. The point of difficulty in the present case appears to me to lie elsewhere. The difficulty is to be sure of an intention on the part of the plaintiff to discharge the defendant from any liability, that is, an intention to take the agreement to extend the time in replacement or satisfaction of any existing right or claim against the defendant or, at all events, of the right or claim put in suit by the present action. The "withdrawal of all allegations imputing anything improper to" the defendant conditionally upon the latter's agreeing to three weeks' further time for payment of the balance of purchase money clearly amounts to an election to affirm the contract. It does, I think, imply a promise not to revive the allegations. But it must be acknowledged that, standing alone, it would not be easy to spell out of it an intention to treat the extension as satisfying a claim. The correspondence, however, not only adverts expressly to misrepresentations, but on that ground Black threatened to sue to recover the bonds. An action for deceit is but the legal description of the remedy for misrepresentation which the respondent Black appears to have contemplated. Accordingly should it not be taken as a possible liability, among others, to which the withdrawal should be understood as putting an end? On the whole I think that this [186] question should receive an affirmative answer. The untechnical and inexact expression, "withdraw allegations", no doubt causes some difficulty. But it must be borne in mind that the purpose was to settle or compromise a very definite dispute … The withdrawal of the allegations of improper conduct meant, in my opinion, that he would make no claim based upon misrepresentation but would accept the promise of further time instead. Estoppel can, I think, be put aside. But I think that, consistently with principle, the agreement to withdraw in consideration of a grant of time can be regarded as an accord and satisfaction. I am prepared to hold that on this ground the respondent Black's cause of action is answered, founded, as it is, on the three misrepresentations withdrawn.

But I am of opinion that in any case a good equitable plea is sustained by the agreement, that is, if the legal defence were not enough. The sufficiency of the facts to provide an answer in equity is determined by somewhat different considerations.

At law, "the only case in which a covenant or promise not to sue is held to be pleadable as a bar, or to operate as a suspension, [187] and by consequence a release or extinguishment of the right of action, is where the covenant or promise not to sue is general, not to sue at any time. In such cases, in order to avoid circuity of action, the covenants may be pleaded in bar as a release … for the reason assigned, that the damages to be recovered in an action for suing contrary to the covenant would be equal to the debt … or sum to be recovered in the action agreed to be forborne: Ford v Beech (1848) 11 QB 852 at 871; 116 ER 693 at 700 per Parke B".

But equity did not follow the law in its refusal to give effect to the agreement of the parties. At law an accord and satisfaction was not pleaded in bar of an action upon a specialty but in equity the debt was treated as discharged, and, before the Judicature Act, the creditor was restrained from proceeding at law for its enforcement. In the same way a parol variation of a contract under seal obtains its effective operation from equitable doctrine: Berry v Berry [1929] 2 KB 316. A release, though not under seal, if given for consideration, was enforced by injunction, and so, too, was an agreement by simple contract not to sue. Accordingly they now constitute good equitable defences to legal demands. There is no reason to doubt that in the same way equity would give effect to a simple contract not to set up or rely upon specific allegations of fact as part of a common law cause of action or for that matter as a plea, or part of a plea, answering a cause of action. Before the Judicature Act the mode of relief was by injunction restraining the party from pleading the facts in his declaration or plea as the case might be and the foundation of the injunction was the promise of the party, negative in character, given for consideration. The promise, however the contract might be expressed, is in character negative, because, ex hypothesi, the stipulation to be enforced is that the party will not set up the specific allegations of fact. A negative stipulation gives the party a prima facie equity to have a violation of the contract restrained because the legal remedy by way of damages is not sufficient to protect the party and secure the interest [188] for which he bargained. But like all other titles to equitable relief the prima facie right to restrain the breach of an agreement not to sue or not to set up specified matters is subject to the well-known rules or principles upon which courts of equity act. Relief would not be granted if the agreement were unfairly obtained or oppressive. The stipulation, whether express or implied, must be sufficiently certain and not too vague and indefinite. The consideration must not be illusory or inadequate. There are two points at which these principles touch the plaintiff's agreement to withdraw the allegations of improper conduct. In the first place, though an implication against reviving the allegations appears to me quite certain, the extent and nature of the promises to be implied may be said to be too doubtful. It may be thought insufficiently clear that the parties intended to stipulate that the plaintiff should not be at liberty to include the misrepresentations referred to in an action of deceit. Conflicting views have been suggested of the nature and extent of the undertaking to withdraw the allegations of improper conduct. For instance, it has been said that it was directed only against aspersion on character, against further contumely or insult. Another view put forward was that its purpose was to destroy in advance the probative value of Black's assertions. It has also been explained on the ground that it was desired to fix Black with an affirmance as opposed to a disaffirmance of the contract. Notwithstanding these rival interpretations of the agreement to withdraw the allegations, I am of opinion that the parties should be understood as stipulating that the respondent Black would not base any cause of action upon the allegations he withdrew. But so to interpret their contract is one thing: it is another thing to say that the construction or implication is sufficiently clear and definite to form the ground of an injunction. Upon the latter question the opinion of Martin J that the language of the agreement is far too vague and the difference in the views of the withdrawal that have been put forward must shake any confidence that otherwise might be felt. But it is necessary to distinguish between the difficulties that are encountered in interpreting the meaning of the parties to a negative stipulation and the vagueness or indefiniteness of the stipulation when interpreted. In the present case I think the [189] difficulties fall under the former head rather than the latter. It appears to me that, once it is determined that the parties intended that Black should not be at liberty to revive the allegations and rely upon them in legal proceedings in support of a claim, little difficulty remains in saying that their meaning was definite enough to warrant a court of equity restraining such an action at law as the present. The other point at which the general principles of equity touch the question whether the agreement to withdraw the allegations provides an equitable defence, depends upon its fairness and justice …

In my opinion the agreement to withdraw operates to prevent the respondent Black from maintaining this action.

The appeal of McDermott should, therefore, be allowed and judgment in the action should be entered in his favour …

Termination inferred from subsequent agreement

[19.50] Where parties to a contract make a subsequent contract covering similar ground to the first, an issue may arise as to whether the new contract was intended to act as a discharge and substitution for the original contract or as a mere variation of the original contract. The task is to ascertain the intention of the parties as embodied in the contracts. While each case will depend on its own circumstances, Concut Pty Ltd v Worrell [2000] HCA 64 illustrates some of the considerations which a court may take into account.

[19.55] Concut Pty Ltd v Worrell [2000] HCA 64 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Queensland Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: In 1980, Mr Wells commenced employment with Concut, the appellant, pursuant to an oral agreement. In December 1986, the appellant and Wells executed a document headed "SERVICE AGREEMENT" (the service agreement) which was stated to record the terms and conditions of Mr Wells' employment with Concut.

In 1988, Concut terminated the employment of Mr Wells without notice. In 1991, Mr Wells brought an action in the District Court of Queensland for damages for wrongful termination of his employment. Concut defended the claim on the ground that Mr Wells had breached his conditions of employment by alleged misconduct by the use of Concut's employees and property in the building of his house without Concut's permission. Concut had not been aware of Mr Wells' misconduct when it terminated his employment.

The trial judge held that Mr Wells' activities had amounted to significant misconduct and held that Concut had been entitled to dismiss him without notice. By majority, the Court of Appeal allowed an appeal. The Court of Appeal held that the service agreement was "a new and discrete contract of employment terminating and replacing the oral agreement" of 1980. The Court of Appeal held that there was no obligation under the service agreement for Mr Wells to disclose his prior misconduct and accordingly that there had been no breach of any term of the service agreement by Mr Wells which would entitle Concut to terminate that agreement without notice. Concut was granted leave to appeal to the High Court.]

GLEESON CJ, GAUDRON and GUMMOW JJ: [697] The issues which must be determined are to be understood in the context of the law respecting employment relationships. It would be unusual for this to be purely contractual. Statute may impose obligations to observe industrial awards and agreements: Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410; 131 ALR 422, and in some instances the relevant terms of the employment relationship may be found in the industrial award which binds the parties at the relevant time: see eg Stratton v Illawarra County Council [1979] 2 NSWLR 701; at 705-6. Further, as Mason J pointed out in Hospital [698] Products Ltd v United States Surgical Corp (1984) 156 CLR 41 at 96-7, the relationship between employee and employer is one of the accepted fiduciary relationships; their critical feature is that the fiduciary undertakes or agrees to act for or on behalf of, or in the interests of, another person in the exercise of a power or discretion that will affect the interests of that other person in a legal or practical sense …. In the present case, the dispute centres not upon these other aspects of the employment relationship, but upon the identification of the contractual source of the relationship over a fairly lengthy period. In our view, the majority of the Court of Appeal erred in treating the service agreement as a new and discrete contract of employment which had the effect of terminating and replacing the anterior oral agreement between Concut and Mr Wells, and this error dictated an incorrect outcome to the appeal.

The relevant principles are well settled. In FCT v Sara Lee Household & Body Care (Aust) Pty Ltd (2000) 74 ALJR 1094 at 1098; 172 ALR 346 at 350-1, Gleeson CJ, Gaudron, McHugh and Hayne JJ said:

> When the parties to an existing contract enter into a further contract by which they vary the original contract, then, by hypothesis, they have made two contracts. For one reason > or another, it may be material to determine whether the effect of the second contract is to bring an end to the first contract and replace it with the second, or whether the effect is to leave the first contract standing, subject to the alteration. For example, something may turn upon the place, or the time, or the form, of the contract, and it may therefore be necessary to decide whether the original contract subsists.

Their Honours went on ((2000) 172 ALR 346; at 351; 74 ALJR 1094 at 1098. See also: (2000) 172 ALR 346; at 360 [81]; 362 [95]; 363 [100]; 74 ALJR 1094 at 1105, 1106, 1107 per Callinan J) to refer to the judgment of Taylor J in Tallerman & Co Pty Ltd v Nathan's Merchandise (Victoria) Pty Ltd (1957) 98 CLR 93 at 143-4. Taylor J had rejected submissions that (a) "it is impossible by a subsequent agreement, merely, to vary or modify an existing contract" and (b) "[an] agreement which purports to vary an existing contract operates … first of all to abrogate entirely the existing contractual relationship and, then, to reinstate the terms of the old contract as varied or modified by the new agreement" (cf Meek v Port of London Authority [1918] 2 Ch 96). His Honour, to the contrary, accepted the propositions that (a) the earlier contract might be rescinded altogether, the determining factor being the intention of the parties disclosed by the later agreement; (b) partial rescission is a variation, not the destruction, of the contractual relationship between the parties; and (c) the earlier contract may be varied by way of (i) partial rescission with or without the substitution of new terms for those rescinded and (ii) the addition of new terms with or without any partial rescission at all ((1957) 98 CLR 93; at 144). In Tallerman (1957) 98 CLR 93 at 135 (see also at 122-3 per Williams J) Kitto J spoke in terms which involved [699] acceptance of propositions (a) and (b) as identified above, adding that while "in strict logic" a variation may be a new contract, "the discharge of an old contract is a matter of intention".

The decision of the majority in the Court of Appeal in the present case appears to involve the holding that there was a discharge of the prior contractual relationship between Concut and Mr Wells, that the service agreement became the exclusive charter of the contractual rights and duties of the parties, and that subsisting rights and liabilities under the prior contract, including those arising by reason of breach thereof, were compromised or released. However, the text of the service agreement itself, as well as the surrounding circumstances, indicate that such a conclusion would not be in accord with the manifest intention of the parties.

The service agreement recited that Mr Wells was an employee of Concut and manifested no intention to displace rights and liabilities which had accrued between the parties since Mr Wells had become the Queensland Branch Manager in 1980 by releasing or compromising those rights and liabilities. Rather the employment relationship continued but was supplemented by the terms of the service agreement. Clause 1 thereof specified a term of employment to continue until 30 November 1991 and for periods thereafter as provided in the clause; cl 2 fixed Mr Wells' remuneration and provided for regular salary reviews; cl 8 contained various provisions protective of the interest of Concut in what was defined as "confidential information". Clause 11 stipulated an entitlement to four weeks annual leave on full salary, but this had to be read with cl 13. This was headed "PRIOR SERVICE" and stated: "Nothing contained in this agreement shall in anyway [sic] limit or restrict the accrued rights of [Mr Wells] in respect of prior service with [Concut] to long service leave, superannuation, holiday pay and other like emoluments."

The conclusion that the employment relationship continued but was supplemented by the terms of the service agreement has several relevant consequences. One concerns the argument that the express provision made in cl 6(a) of the service agreement for dismissal without notice if at any time Mr Wells was guilty of serious misconduct had a prospective and exclusive operation. The corollary is said to be that Concut was precluded from dismissing Mr Wells during the currency of the service agreement for misconduct anterior to the date of the service agreement. However, cl 6(a) operated concurrently with terms implied by law and did not displace the consequences of anterior breach of such terms. In Castlemaine Tooheys Ltd v Carlton & United Breweries Ltd (1987) 10 NSWLR 468 at 487, Hope JA identified contracts between master and servant as a typical class of contract in which terms will be implied by law. Such terms apply in the absence of an expression of contrary intention by the parties: Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410 at 449-50. In discerning that intention, regard should be had to "the familiar principle of construction that clear words are needed to rebut the presumption that a contracting party does not intend to abandon any remedies for breach of the contract arising by operation of law": Stocznia Gdanska SA v Latvian Shipping Co [1998] 1 WLR 574 at 585; Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd v Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd [1974] AC 689 at 717. Thus, an express provision for termination for breach in certain circumstances [700] may be regarded as designed to augment rather than to restrict or remove the rights at common law which a party otherwise would have had on breach: Holland v Wiltshire (1954) 90 CLR 409 at 415-16; Taylor v Raglan Developments Pty Ltd [1981] 2 NSWLR 117 at 135.

Paragraph (a) of cl 6 of the service agreement is a provision of this character. It specifies that certain acts or omissions are to be treated as included in the notion of "serious misconduct" for which Mr Wells might be dismissed without notice. The activities so identified are a failure to devote the whole of Mr Wells' time and attention to the business of Concut during normal business hours, absence without leave (except in the case of illness or accident), disobedience, and neglect to fulfil any of the orders or directions of the board of Concut. Paragraph (a) was expressed prospectively and augmented rather than restricted or removed rights which Concut otherwise would have in respect of a breach of any term implied by law; nor did it release or compromise such rights as Concut may have had at the time of the execution of the service agreement by reason of past misconduct of Mr Wells. In Pearce v Foster, Lord Esher MR stated it to be a "rule of law" that "where a person has entered into the position of servant, if he does anything incompatible with the due or faithful discharge of his duty to his master, the latter has a right to dismiss him": (1886) 17 QBD 536 at 539. See also the discussion by Viscount Simonds in Sterling Engineering Co Ltd v Patchett [1955] AC 534 at 543-4 and in Lister v Romford Ice and Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] AC 555 at 575-6; cf Scally v Southern Health and Social Services Board [1992] 1 AC 294 at 306-7; Malik v Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA (in liq) [1998] AC 20 at 34-5, 45-6. In Blyth Chemicals Ltd v Bushnell, in the course of considering the position of the respondent, who was the manager of the appellant's business, Starke and Evatt JJ said ((1933) 49 CLR 66 at 72-3):

> As manager for the appellant, the respondent was in a confidential position. And it is clear that he might be dismissed without notice or compensation if he acted in a manner incompatible with the due and faithful performance of his duty, or inconsistent with the confidential relation between himself and the appellant.

In the same case, Dixon and McTiernan JJ said ((1933) 49 CLR 66 at 81):

> Conduct which in respect of important matters is incompatible with the fulfilment of an employee's duty, or involves an opposition, or conflict between his interest and his duty to his employer, or impedes the faithful performance of his obligations, or is destructive of the necessary confidence between employer and employee, is a ground of dismissal.

Contractual obligations and fiduciary duties have different conceptual origins, "the former", in the words of McLelland J (United States Surgical Corp v Hospital Products International Pty Ltd [1982] 2 NSWLR 766 at 799; affirmed (1984) 156 CLR 41), "representing express or implied common intentions manifested by the mutual assents of contracting parties, and the latter being descriptive of circumstances in which equity will regard conduct of a particular kind as unconscionable and consequently attracting equitable remedies". Formulations of the obligations of an employee in terms such as those in Pearce and Blyth Chemicals may be understood, Professor Finn [701] has pointed out, as the re-expression of equitable obligations in terms of implied contracts: Finn, Fiduciary Obligations, 1977, p 267. See also Gurry, Breach of Confidence, 1984, pp 177-9; Dean, The Law of Trade Secrets, 1990, pp 181-3. If so, the importation is well established and beneficial, and nothing turns upon it for present purposes.

The trial judge had held that Mr Wells' activities in relation to the building operations at Beaudesert had amounted to significant misconduct which was sufficient to terminate his employment. His Honour also held, with reference to Shepherd v Felt and Textiles of Australia Ltd (1931) 45 CLR 359 at 373, 377-8 that it did not matter that at the time of the dismissal Concut had not been aware of that misconduct. That misconduct nevertheless was available to Concut to resist the action for damages for wrongful dismissal instituted by Mr Wells. The majority in the Court of Appeal did not controvert those grounds upon which the case had been decided at trial. Plainly, the trial judge was correct in deciding the case in this way. However, the Court of Appeal directed its attention to the submissions for the appellant, which sought to outflank the decision of the trial judge by maintaining that Concut had not been entitled to terminate the employment of Mr Wells because breach of the earlier oral contract did not entitle Concut to terminate without compensation what was said to be the later fixed term contract.

In this court, no attempt was made, and none would have succeeded, to deny the proposition of law expressed in Shepherd. The proposition that the dismissal of an employee may be justified upon grounds on which the employer did not act and of which the employer was unaware when the employee was discharged is but an application of what, in Shepherd, Dixon J identified as a rule of general application with respect to the discharge of contract by breach: (1931) 45 CLR 359 at 377.

The submissions, accepted by the majority in the Court of Appeal, depended upon acceptance of a view of the contractual relationship between Mr Wells and Concut before and during the currency of the service agreement which, as indicated above, should not be accepted. There may conceivably have been a question whether, by reason of any release or compromise of Concut's rights arising at general law by reason of the serious breach by Mr Wells of the term implied by law into his contractual relationship, Concut had been disabled from later justifying its dismissal of Mr Wells by reliance upon the breach. However, no such release or compromise was stipulated in the service agreement and no other source for it has been suggested.

The majority in the Court of Appeal fixed their attention upon the state of affairs at the time of execution of the service agreement and emphasised that there was nothing to show that Mr Wells had deliberately withheld his prior misconduct in order to induce Concut to enter into "the new written contract of employment". The majority further stressed that the speech of Lord Atkin in Bell v Lever Brothers Ltd [1932] AC 161 at 227-8 was "strong authority for the proposition that there is no duty on an employee to disclose his or her own past faults".

Neither proposition is determinative of the present appeal once there is an appreciation of the duration and content of the employment relationship between the parties. In any event, Bell v Lever Brothers Ltd was concerned not with an [702] answer to a claim for damages for breach of contract, but with a situation where payments had been made under contracts stated to be entered into "in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands" between the parties (the text of the agreements is set out in the speech of Lord Blanesburgh [1932] AC 161 at 178-9) and the party which had then made the payments sought to recover them as moneys paid under total failure of consideration. (See the judgment of Wright J, Lever Brothers Ltd v Bell [1931] 1 KB 557 at 567-9.) The jury had held that the contracts had not been induced by fraud ([1931] 1 KB 557 at 560-1).

In the present matter, the majority of the Court of Appeal, as did counsel for the respondent in this court, placed particular reliance upon the statement by Lord Atkin in Bell v Lever Brothers Ltd [1932] AC 161 at 228:

> If a man agrees to raise his butler's wages, must the butler disclose that two years ago he received a secret commission from the wine merchant; and if the master discovers it, can he, without dismissal or after the servant has left, avoid the agreement for the increase in salary and recover back the extra wages paid? If he gives his cook a month's wages in lieu of notice can he, on discovering that the cook has been pilfering the tea and sugar, claim the return of the month's wages? I think not. He takes the risk; if he wishes to protect himself he can question his servant, and will then be protected by the truth or otherwise of the answers. (emphasis added)

However, as these remarks show, Lord Atkin was concerned with avoidance of agreements for failure to disclose past misconduct and the recovery of moneys paid thereunder. In his speech, Lord Atkin (who, with Lord Blanesburgh and Lord Thankerton, comprised the majority) had isolated "[t]wo points … for decision": [1932] AC 161 at 217. At trial, the defendants had admitted liability to account for their profits on certain private dealings in breach of duty and their payments into court on that account were accepted: [1931] 1 KB 557 at 560, 574. The first was whether the agreement with Bell negotiated by Mr Cooper was void by reason of a "mutual mistake" of Bell and Cooper, as to the "quality of the thing contracted for" ([1932] AC 161 at 218), so that, if the agreement be executed (as was the case), one party "can recover back money paid on the ground of failure of the consideration": [1932] AC 161 at 222. His Lordship decided that "the party paying for release [had gotten] exactly what [it had] bargain[ed] for", and it was not to the point that, had it known the true facts, it would not have entered into the bargain: [1932] AC 161 at 223-4. So, on this ground, Bell was able successfully to resist the claim for repayment.

With this branch of Lord Atkin's speech, which for 70 years has attracted varied academic analysis, the Court of Appeal was not concerned. The passage set out above comes from that part of Lord Atkin's speech answering favourably to Bell the second point for decision. This was whether Bell had "owed a duty to Levers to disclose his misconduct, and that in default of disclosure the contract was voidable": [1932] AC 161 at 227. [703]

In Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Ali [1999] 2 All ER 1005; at 1015, Lightman J dealt with this section of Lord Atkin's speech and said that Bell v Lever Brothers Ltd was authority for the following propositions:

> The current law as generally understood may be stated as follows: that (1) (subject to one exception) neither party to a contract is obliged to disclose facts material to the decision of the other party whether to enter into that contract; (2) the exception is limited to contracts which are uberrimae fidei; (3) neither contracts of employment nor contracts of compromise (unless by way of family arrangement) fall within this exceptional category; and (4) neither the employer nor the employee, once in contractual relations, are under a duty as such to disclose to each other their own breaches of contract.

Proposition (4) may require qualification to allow for obligations of disclosure which attend a fiduciary duty, if informed consent is to be obtained to what otherwise would be a breach of that duty. (Cf McCarry, "The Employee's Right to Silence" (1983) 57 Australian Law Journal 607; Collins, "Implied Duty to Give Information During Performance of Contracts" (1992) 55 Modern Law Review 556 at 559.) Further, particular problems arise respecting the contracts of compromise identified in proposition (3) by his Lordship where there is a question respecting the actual or apparent authority of counsel to enter into such a compromise. In Harvey v Phillips (1956) 95 CLR 235 at 243, Dixon CJ, McTiernan, Williams, Webb and Fullagar JJ said that a court did not appear to possess a discretion to rescind or set aside such a compromise and continued ((1956) 95 CLR 235; at 243-4. See also Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422 at 432:

> The question whether the compromise is to be set aside depends upon the existence of a ground which would suffice to render a simple contract void or voidable or to entitle the party to equitable relief against it, grounds for example such as illegality, misrepresentation, non-disclosure of a material fact where disclosure is required, duress, mistake, undue influence, abuse of confidence or the like.

Questions respecting non-disclosure of a material fact where disclosure is required may also arise where the complaint is one of contravention of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth): Demagogue Pty Ltd v Ramensky (1992) 39 FCR 31. None of these questions arises here.

The fundamental point is that the present appeal is not concerned with any claim by Concut to avoid Mr Wells' contract for alleged failure by Mr Wells to disclose alleged misconduct during a period anterior to his appointment in 1980 as Queensland Branch Manager. Rather, the outcome of the case turns upon the breach of an obligation implied by law in the employment contract and the right of the employer to rely upon that breach, when subsequently discovered, in answer to a claim for damages for wrongful dismissal, although the dismissal was not based on that ground. The applicable principles are well settled and their application to the undisputed facts produces a result favourable to the employer …

McHUGH J: I agree that this appeal should be allowed …

[19.60] KIRBY J: [709] Problems of the present kind are usually resolved by the law of contract by reference to the imputed intention of the parties to the contractual relations, as expected here in the successive oral and written agreements. Of course, that "intention" is to be ascertained objectively. In a case such as the present, ordinary practical and commercial considerations militate strongly against a conclusion that the service agreement wholly discharged the former oral agreement and excused every later discovered instance of misconduct that had occurred during the currency of the employment, however serious. The service agreement simply did not deal with the problem which later arose. It would take much more explicit provisions in the service agreement to persuade me that it was intended, objectively, to deprive the employer of the remedies normal to the discovery by it of such a breach by a senior employee of one of the most basic terms ordinarily implied in an employment contract. This is particularly so given the essential character of an employment relationship recognised by the common law, which continued from the commencement of the oral contract until the employee's dismissal, regardless of the intervening execution of the service agreement …

Termination by abandonment

[19.70] After a period of inactivity or other conduct that indicates the parties no longer desire their contract to be on foot, the courts may treat the parties as having mutually agreed to abandon that contract. See, for example, DTR Nominees Pty Ltd v Mona Homes Pty Ltd (1978) 138 CLR 423, at [22.65]. The issue is also discussed in Fitzgerald v Masters (1956) 95 CLR 420.

Fitzgerald v Masters

[19.75] Fitzgerald v Masters (1956) 95 CLR 420 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: In 1927, the respondent made a contract in writing with the deceased (of whose will the appellants were executors) for the purchase of an interest in the deceased's farm. As from the date of the contract, the farm was to be worked, in effect, as a partnership but the actual transfer of the interest in the land was not to take place until the respondent had paid in full. By way of deposit and instalments, the respondent paid more than half the purchase price, and in 1931, he offered to pay a substantial part of the balance, but at the deceased's request, he did not do so. Meanwhile the working partnership had been observed, but in 1932, it became apparent to the parties to the contract that the farm could not support them both, and the respondent left. Between that date and

1948, the respondent had no connection with the working of the farm, but in 1948, he began a correspondence over the contract with the deceased, which continued until the latter's death in 1951. In 1953, the respondent began a suit for specific performance against the appellants. The appellants alleged that the contract had long since been abandoned.]

DIXON CJ and FULLAGAR J: [432] There can be no doubt that, where what has been called an "inordinate" length of time has been allowed to elapse, during which neither party has attempted to perform, or called upon the other to perform, a contract made between them, it may be inferred that the contract has been abandoned. A good example is to be found in Pearl Mill Co Ltd v Ivy Tannery Co Ltd [1919] 1 KB 78 … What is really inferred in such a case is that the contract has been discharged by agreement, each party being entitled to assume from a long-continued ignoring of the contract on both sides that … "the matter is off altogether".

It is impossible, in our opinion, to infer a discharge of the contract in the present case. In each of the cases cited above the contract was an executory contract, under which neither party had acquired any proprietary right or interest. The position was simply that each party had promised to do something, and for a long period no act was done in performance of the contract, and no step was taken to require any act to be done in performance of the contract. Here the contract had been partly performed by the respondent. Before he left the property, he had paid more than half of the purchase price, and he had an equitable interest in the land. He had registered his contract. It is impossible to suppose, nor can the deceased have supposed, that he ever intended simply to allow the deceased to keep both the money and the land, and no suggestion that the money should be repaid to him was ever made. As Taylor J observed during argument, if he had at any time regarded the contract as at an end, the first thing one would have expected him to do [433] was to demand repayment of his money. The truth is, we think, that the equitable interest in the land, which the respondent had acquired, could not be lost or destroyed by mere inaction on his part. It could only be lost or destroyed by release or express agreement on his part, or if the deceased lawfully rescinded the contract. Any release or agreement could be expected to provide for adjustments taking into account the part of the price already paid, and, in the event of rescission by the deceased, the rules of law and equity would take care of the position …

Appeal dismissed.

CONTINGENT CONDITIONS

[20.05] Parties sometimes make the performance of their contract conditional upon the occurrence, or non-occurrence, of a specified event which neither party promises to ensure will, or will not, occur. For example, a contract for the sale of land may be made subject to the purchaser obtaining finance. If the condition is not fulfilled, then the parties will be released from the obligation to perform their contract, without liability on either side. In some cases, the failure of the contingent condition will render performance impossible, unviable or irrelevant. In other cases, the failure of a contingent condition may provide a convenient opportunity for one party to escape a contract which has become unpalatable for other reasons.

DIFFERENT SENSES OF THE WORD "CONDITION"

Contingent and promissory conditions

[20.10] A contract term that makes the performance of the contract conditional on the occurrence of an event that neither party promises to ensure is sometimes described as a contingent condition. The word condition is also used to refer to a contractual promise that is essential in the sense that a breach of the promise by one party will entitle the other party to elect to terminate the contract and claim damages, as discussed in Chapter 21. A condition which embodies a promise is sometimes referred to as a promissory condition.

[20.15] McTier v Haupt [1992] 1 VR 653 (Supreme Court of Victoria).

[FACTS: The McTiers, as purchasers, and the Haupts, as vendors, entered into a contract for the sale of a house, with furniture included. A deposit was paid, but before the balance was payable two people broke into the house and burnt it virtually beyond repair. The McTiers refused to proceed to completion in the ordinary way. They claimed declarations that they could refuse to complete until the property was restored, or that they could complete while reserving the right to compensation for breach or with an abatement of the purchase price. The contract contained the following term (GC1.2): "This sale is subject to … (the) property and chattels being delivered to the purchaser on the settlement date in their present state of repair (fair wear and tear excepted) but the failure so to deliver the chattels shall only create a right to compensation".]

BROOKING J: [657] Terminology is important for a clear understanding, and while what is important is not so much the selection of terms as consistency in their use, I prefer to distinguish between "promises" and "conditions" as the American writers do rather than distinguish, as do Chitty on Contracts, General Principles, 26th ed, para 795, Anson, Law of Contract, 25th ed, pp 131–2 and Lindgren, Time in the Performance of Contracts, 2nd ed, passim, between "promissory conditions" and "contingent conditions". Corbin would [reserve] the expression "promissory condition" for a third class of case, where there is both a condition (in the Corbin sense) and a promise that the condition shall be fulfilled: see Corbin on Contracts, ss 633–5 and Williston on Contracts, 3rd ed, ss 664–5. Sutton & Shannon on Contracts, 6th ed, pp 295–6, while not adopting the American terminology but instead distinguishing between "promissory conditions" and "contingent conditions", similarly accepts the possibility of this third position, where a stipulation combines the characteristics of a promissory condition and a contingent condition. (This third position must not be confused with the case where there is a promise, not that the condition shall be fulfilled, but that the promisor will make reasonable efforts to procure its fulfilment.)

Terminology in this field is, as I have said, by no means uniform, a state of affairs that is at times the cause and at times the result of misunderstanding and confusion. In Perri v Coolangatta Investments Pty Ltd (1982) 149 CLR 537, at 546, Gibbs CJ used the expression "promissory condition" to describe a provision which was a promise as opposed to a condition precedent to the obligation to complete a contract of sale. That decision itself is an illustration of the distinction between a condition in the sense in which the American writers use that word and a promise. I refer for example to the judgment of Brennan J, at 565, where his Honour said: "Though the stipulation specifies the event upon the occurrence of which the obligations to complete cease to be contingent, the stipulation contains no promise that the event will occur."

Similarly, at 566, his Honour observed: "This is not a case where the purchasers promise that a condition precedent to the obligation to complete will be fulfilled … where the occurrence of an event upon which the obligations to complete are contingent is not promised, the mere non-occurrence of the event is no breach of contract …" [658] Another illustration of the distinction will be found in Hale v Finch 104 US 261 (1881), where the bill of sale of the steamboat "New World" contained the words, "This sale is upon the express condition" that the steamboat should not run on the waters of the State of California. The Supreme Court held that there was "only an agreement that the sale was upon the express condition that neither the boat not its machinery should be so used. It is the case of a bare, naked condition, unaccompanied by words implying an agreement, engagement or promise by the vendee that he would personally perform or become personally responsible for the performance of the express condition upon which the sale was made". I turn to GC1.2. To make a sale of land "subject to" the occurrence of some event has long been a usual means of expressing a condition. This is so well known to lawyers that illustrations from the numerous reported decisions are unnecessary. The language used in GC1.2 is the language of condition, not of promise. That provision does not say "shall" or "will" or "must", either with the active or with the passive voice. It does not (although scarcely any weight can be given to this consideration) mention the vendor. The event defined – delivery of the property and chattels to the purchaser on the settlement date in their present state of repair – is one which the vendor will not necessarily be able to bring about. Whatever might be said if GC1.2 did not look to a particular point of time, no one can say that it will in all circumstances lie in the power of the vendor to ensure that the property and chattels are delivered to the purchaser on the settlement date (a term defined or explained in the particulars of sale) in the same state of repair as at the date of the contract. There might be an explosion, a conflagration, a destructive tempest or some other casualty on the eve of settlement against which the vendor was powerless to guard. Of course a party may bind himself by contract to do something which may lie outside his power, but the fact that the suggested promise is of this kind is material in considering whether words using the language of condition are intended to import a promise.

Lindgren, para 116, accepts that where a contract is expressed to be "subject" to the coming into existence of a factual situation by a stipulated time, the stipulation will ordinarily be found to be a contingent condition.

[659] It seems that in James P O'Collins Pty Ltd v Esnouf (1986) V Conv R 54-193, GC1.2 struck Ormiston J so clearly as a clause containing a contractual promise that the contrary view did not even occur to his Honour as a possibility. In view of this I have hesitated before reaching the conclusion that the contrary view is not only open but also to be preferred. But that is the conclusion which I have reached. In my view, GC1.2 contains no promise on the vendor's part to deliver property and chattels in repair. I see no sufficient reason for attributing to the provision any effect other than that of condition (in the Corbin sense), the effect for which the choice of language is appropriate ….

I conclude that in the present case the only right of Mr and Mrs McTier was to avoid the contract. That GC1.2 makes the contract voidable, not void, where the property is not delivered in repair is clear, and I need not consider whether on its proper construction the clause makes the contract voidable at the option of the vendor in any circumstances. I have no doubt that the clause at least gives the purchaser the right to avoid.

Judgment for the defendants.

Contingent conditions to performance and formation

[20.20] This chapter is concerned with contingent conditions that qualify the performance of a contract. Less commonly, a contingent condition may qualify the formation of a contract. On this distinction, see Perri v Coolangatta Investments Pty Ltd (1982) 149 CLR 537 at [20.50].

Conditions precedent and subsequent to performance

[20.25] In the case of contingent conditions to performance, a distinction is sometimes drawn between conditions precedent and subsequent. A contingent condition precedent to performance is one which must be fulfilled before the parties are bound to perform their contract. A contingent condition subsequent is one where the parties' obligation to perform is immediately binding but will come to an end should the event specified in the condition occur. However, the effect of the condition is more significant than the terminology used to describe it. See further Meehan v Jones (1982) 149 CLR 571, 592 (see [6.150]); Perri v Coolangatta Investments Proprietary Limited (1982) 149 CLR 537, 541 (at [20.50]).

THE DUTY TO CO-OPERATE

[20.30] A contingent condition is one which the parties have not undertaken to fulfil. Nonetheless parties may be obliged, either expressly or by implication, to co-operate in ensuring the condition is satisfied. On the implied duty to co-operate, see further at [14.70]–[14.190].

THE CONSEQUENCES OF NON-FULFILMENT

[20.35] Where a contingent condition of performance is not fulfilled, the contract will either be void or, more commonly, voidable. Where a contract is void, this means that it comes to an end automatically. Where a contract is voidable, the contract may be brought to an end on the election of one or other of the parties. Which of these possibilities applies in a particular case is a matter of construction. In Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd (1950) 81 CLR 418, the High Court displayed a preference for finding that non-fulfilment of the condition renders the contract voidable, especially where the event upon which the condition depends may be brought about by the default of one of the parties. In MK & JA Roche Pty Ltd v Metro Edgley Pty Ltd [2005] NSWCA 39, the New South Wales Court of Appeal stressed that ultimately the effect of non-fulfilment of a contingent condition must be determined, as a matter of construction, by focusing on the intentions of the parties as evidenced by the language in which the contingent condition is framed.

[20.40] Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd (1950) 81 CLR 418 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Suttor, the vendor/defendant, and Gundowda Pty Ltd, the purchaser/plaintiff, entered into a contract dated 20 October 1947 for the sale of a pastoral property. Clause 12 of the contract provided that: in the event of the consent of the Treasurer not being obtained within two months from the date hereof or within such further period as may be mutually agreed upon by the parties hereto, this contract shall be deemed to be cancelled, and upon the vendor returning to the purchaser any deposit paid herein neither party shall be under any further liability to the other for any sum for damages, cost or otherwise. The two-month period referred to in cl 12 of that contract expired on 20th December 1947. The Treasurer's consent in writing was obtained on 5th January 1948. On 15th January 1948, the vendor's solicitor, by letter, informed the purchaser's solicitor that as the Treasurer's consent had not been obtained within the stated period of two months, the contract was no longer effective after 20th December 1947. The purchaser sought specific performance of the contract.]

LATHAM CJ, WILLIAMS AND FULLAGAR JJ: [440] [One of the contentions raised on appeal was that] cl 12 of the contract of 20th October 1947 provided that in the event of the consent of the Treasurer not being obtained within two months from its date [440] (that is 20th December 1947) or within such further period as might be mutually agreed upon by the parties the contract should be deemed to be cancelled and upon the vendor returning to the purchaser any deposit neither party should be under any further liability to the other for any sum for damages, costs or otherwise, and that the consent of the Treasurer was not obtained within two months so that the contract was automatically cancelled on that date … So far as cl 12 is concerned, there are, in our opinion, two answers to the contention of the appellant.

In the first place McManamey was at Gundowda from 29th November to 8th December 1947 and he gave evidence of conversations between himself and the defendant which his Honour accepted and which are quite sufficient to prove an oral agreement prior to 20th December that the time for the Treasurer's consent should be extended for a reasonable period after that date. This agreement would vary cl 12 whether that clause originally provided for an automatic cancellation or not. This variation of cl 12 was expressly alleged in the statement of claim. It was a variation of a contract for the sale of land and therefore a contract which could not have been proved if the Statute of Frauds (now s 54A of the Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW) as amended) had been pleaded. But the statute was not pleaded and it was therefore open to the plaintiff to prove the variation.

In the second place, although cl 12 in terms provides for an automatic avoidance of the contract on the occurrence of a specified event, that is (even if no agreement for an extension of time were made) by no means the end of the matter. The effect of contractual provisions of this character was discussed and explained in New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v Société des Ateliers et Chantiers de France [1919] AC 1. Lord Atkinson said (at 9):

> It is undoubtedly competent for the two parties to a contract to stipulate by a clause in it that the contract shall be void upon the happening of an event over which neither of the parties shall have any control, cannot bring about, prevent or retard. For instance, they may stipulate that if rain should fall on the thirtieth day after the date of the contract, the contract should be void. Then if rain did fall on that day the [441] contract would be put to an end by this event, whether the parties so desire or not. Of course, they might during the currency of the contract rescind it and enter into a new one, or on its avoidance immediately enter into a new contract. But if the stipulation be that the contract shall be void on the happening of an event which one or either of them can by his own act or omission bring about, then the party, who by his own act or omission brings that event about, cannot be permitted either to insist upon the stipulation himself or to compel the other party, who is blameless, to insist upon it, because to permit the blameable party to do either would be to permit him to take advantage of his own wrong, in the one case directly, and in the other case indirectly in a roundabout way, but in either way putting an end to the contract.

Where the event in question is one which cannot occur without default on the part of one party to the contract, the position is clear. The provision is then construed as making the contract not void but voidable: only the party who is not in default can avoid it, and he may please himself whether he does so or not. In the present case the happening of the event (not obtaining the Treasurer's consent) may be brought about by failure on the part of either party to take certain necessary steps (provision of particulars by the vendor or making of application by the purchaser) to obtain the Treasurer's consent, or it may be brought about without any default on the part of either party. In fact, although there was some argument to the contrary, it was, we think, brought about without any default on the part of either party. Such a case is perhaps not quite so clear as the simpler case where the event cannot occur without default on one side or the other. But we are of opinion that the New Zealand Shipping Case [1919] AC 1 requires the same construction to be given to the contract in both classes of case. The provision in question is to be construed as making the contract not void but voidable.

The question of who may avoid it depends on what happens. If one party has by his default brought about the happening of the event, the other party alone has the option of avoiding the contract. If the event has happened without default on either side, then either party may avoid the contract. But neither need do so, and, if one party having a right to avoid it does not clearly exercise that right the other party may enforce the contract against him. This is, we think, the view of Lord Shaw and Lord Wrenbury in the New Zealand Shipping Case [1919] AC 1, and it is consistent with what was said by Lord Finlay [442] LC. The language of Lord Atkinson (1919) AC, at 10, 11 may perhaps be regarded as expressing a different view, but we doubt whether his Lordship had in mind the precise point which arises here and which did not arise in the New Zealand Shipping Case [1919] AC 1. Although the effect of a provision in a contract may differ according to the events which happen, its construction cannot differ according to the events which happen. If "void" means "voidable", it means "voidable" whatever happens. It cannot very well mean "voidable" if an event happens through the default of one party, and "void" if the event happens without default by either party.

McManamey and Allworth were at Gundowda from 27th to 31st December 1947. The construction of cl 12 which we have adopted is that the clause did not automatically cancel the contract of 20th October 1947 but only brought it to an end if after that date one of the parties exercised its option to cancel it. On 6th January 1948 the defendant's solicitor wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors that cl 12 of the contract spoke for itself and this may have been intended to be a notice that the defendant considered the contract to be cancelled. But there was no clear statement that the contract was considered by the defendant as cancelled until 15th January 1948 when the defendant's solicitor wrote to the plaintiff's solicitor that "the consent of the Treasurer was not obtained within the period of two months of the date of the contract and therefore the contract is no longer effective after 20th

December 1947." But this letter was obviously written on the view, with which we do not agree, that cl 12 effected an automatic cancellation of the contract when the Treasurer had not consented by 20th December 1947. His Honour accepted the evidence of McManamey and Allworth of the events that occurred at Gundowda between 27th and 31st December, 1947, and it is clear from this evidence that the defendant was treating the contract as still on foot although he was asking for certain variations to which McManamey agreed provided the directors of the plaintiff approved. Before the defendant's solicitor purported to cancel the contract the consent in writing of the Treasurer to the transfer had been obtained on 5th January, 1948, and the cancellation was therefore too late … [444]

Clause 12 of the contract therefore remains a condition subsequent having the incidents already mentioned and did not operate to cancel the contract because either it was varied before 20th December 1947 so as to give the plaintiff a further reasonable time after that date to obtain the Treasurer's consent, or the defendant was too late in availing himself of any option he had to cancel the contract.

Appeal dismissed.

MK & JA Roche v Metro Edgley

[20.42] MK & JA Roche Pty Ltd v Metro Edgley Pty Ltd [2005] NSWCA 39 (Supreme Court of New South Wales – Court of Appeal).

[FACTS: Metro Edgley (Metro) accepted an offer by M K & J A Roche (Roche) to take a 40-year lease of a restaurant. The contract included cl 2A(b) which stated: "This contract will be deemed to be automatically rescinded and of no force and effect if the conditions precedents are not satisfied by 31 December 2003 (or such later date the Developer may notify Roche in writing [up to 31 December 2004])". On 18 December 2003, Metro gave written notice to Roche that the date in cl 2A(b) of the agreement was extended to 31 March 2004. On 31 March 2004, several conditions precedent still had not been satisfied, but both parties continued on with the contract. On 10 May 2004, Roche received legal advice that non-satisfaction of the contingent conditions brought the contract to an end. On 21 May 2004, Roche sent a letter to Metro detailing the conditions giving rise to automatic rescission of the contract and claiming the return of the deposit it had paid. Roche sought a declaration that the contract had automatically come to an end because the contingent conditions had not been satisfied by the required date and that, as a result, it was entitled to a refund of the deposit. Metro argued that, on the true construction of cl 2A(b), non-fulfilment of the conditions precedent by the relevant date did not result in automatic termination of the contract but rather resulted in the contract being voidable at Roche's discretion. Metro argued that by continuing on with the contract after 31 March 2004, Roche had affirmed the contract and thus lost the right to bring the contract to an end. The trial judge accepted Metro's argument. Roche appealed.]

HODGSON J: [39] [T]he appellants submitted that, in holding that the non-fulfilment of the conditions precedent did not give rise to an automatic rescission, the primary judge had relied on what was said in Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd (1950) 81 CLR 418 at 440-442, to the effect that, where a contractual provision is to the effect that a contract is void upon the happening of an event that may be caused by the default of one party, then the provision is to be construed as making the contract voidable at the option of a party who is not in default. However, [the appellants] submitted, the question was one of construction and must depend on the particular words of the particular contract: see Sandra Investments Pty Ltd v Booth (1983) 153 CLR 153 at 161 and 165. A contract could be construed as providing for automatic termination even though the event could possibly be caused by the default of one party, and that party could be precluded from taking advantage of the clause by direct application of the principle that a party cannot be permitted to take advantage of its own wrong: see Rudi's Enterprises Pty Ltd v Jay (1987) 10 NSWLR 568 at 576-580.

[40] [The appellants] submitted that the wording of cl 2A(b), and in particular the use of the word "automatically", was such as to plainly exclude the need for a notice. This was also supported by the inclusion in the agreement of a Sunset Date: the primary judge's construction would mean that, if the Developer had extended the date to the Sunset Date, the agreement would continue beyond the Sunset Date unless one or other party gave a Notice of Termination, and that could not have been intended. It was also supported by the circumstance that the agreement itself distinguishes between automatic rescission and rescission pursuant to a right of rescission: see cl 5(d). The construction was also supported by the circumstance that the Developer, and only the Developer, is given the right to extend the deadline.

[41] [The respondents] submitted that most of the elements of the conditions precedent were within the control of one or both parties. Accordingly, the primary judge was correct to apply what was said in Suttor. [The respondents] also referred to New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v Société des Ateliers et Chantiers de France [1919] AC 1 at 4, 9, 12–13, 15; Meehan v Jones (1982) 149 CLR 571 at 591–2; and Sandra Investments.

[42] In my opinion, the first question to be considered is whether Suttor establishes a principle of law to be applied irrespective of the apparent intention of the parties, or rather establishes a principle to guide the construction of a contract, which can give way to sufficiently clear expressions of intention to the contrary. I say at once that in my opinion it is the latter.

[43] Suttor concerned a contract for the sale of a pastoral property that provided that, in the event of the consent of the Treasurer not being obtained within two months of the date of contract or such further period as might be mutually agreed upon by the parties, the contract should be deemed to be cancelled. The High Court held that the non-receipt of the Treasurer's consent by the relevant date did not effect an automatic cancellation of the contract because the relevant clause should be construed as making the contract not void but voidable, the question of who might avoid it depending upon the event. The following reasoning appears in the joint judgment of Latham CJ, Williams J and Fullagher J at 440-442 [Hodgson J then quoted from Suttor, see [20.40]].

[44] [Suttor] could be read as setting out a principle of law rather than a mere guide to construction, but to so read it would in my opinion be against very well-established principles concerning the construction of contracts, including the principle that, if words used in a contract are unambiguous, the Court must give effect to them: Australian Broadcasting Commission v Australasian Performing Rights Assn (1973) 129 CLR 99 at 109. The passages referred to earlier in Sandra Investments are to similar effect. Accordingly, I respectfully agree with what Samuels JA (with the concurrence of Priestly JA and McHugh JA) said in Rudi's Enterprises, particularly in the following passage at 579:

> I cannot think that the Court in Suttor intended to lay down the proposition that parties could not stipulate for automatic termination of a contract save upon the occurrence of an event which, objectively, lay beyond their control. Effect must be conceded to the parties' intention.

[45] Thus, as asserted in Rudi's Enterprises, where the parties have clearly stipulated for automatic termination upon the occurrence of an event which could occur either without the default of either party or with the default of one or other party, and if the event occurs through the default of one party, then, although in general terms this would mean automatic termination, the party whose default caused the event can be prevented from taking advantage of this by direct application of the principle that a party cannot take advantage of its own wrong, rather than through construing the con-tract contrary to its clear meaning.

[46] I appreciate that, in some circumstances, this could give rise to uncertainty. If one has such a contract and the invalidating event occurs through the default of one party, that party will be in doubt as to whether performance of the contract is or is not required of it, unless some notice is given by the party not in default. However, I do not think this consideration does more than generally support the Suttor approach to construction.

[47] In my opinion, the Suttor principle of construction applies most powerfully if the invalidating event can occur only through a breach of contract by one or other party. The lesser the likelihood that the disabling event occur through the breach of one or other party, as distinct from some cause outside the control of the parties, the less powerfully does the principle apply. In the case of cl 2A of the Development Contract, it appears that there are many matters outside the control of the parties that could cause the non-fulfilment of the conditions precedent. So in my opinion, the Suttor principle does not apply at full strength. In my opinion, the wording of cl 2A(b), and particularly the use of the word "automatically", clearly shows that the parties' intention, as manifested by the words they chose, was that the contract would be automatically rescinded and that no notice was required; and that intention should prevail in the construction of the contract.

The approach adopted in M K & J A Roche Pty Ltd v Metro Edgley Pty Ltd [2005] NSWCA 39 received support in Waterman v Gerling Australia Insurance Co Pty Ltd [2005] NSWSC 1066; (2005) 65 NSWLR 300. In Queensland the Suttor approach was adopted in Donaldson v Bexton [2006] QCA 559; [2007] 1 Qd R 525 and Quinn Villages Pty Ltd v Mulherin [2006] QCA 433. In Principal Properties Pty Ltd v Brisbane Broncos Leagues Club Ltd [2013] QSC 148; [2014] 2 Qd R 132, Jackson J described the Metro Edgley approach as "the principle to be adopted in this context" (at [79]).

[20.45] As discussed in Chapter 23, the mere fact of delay by one party in performing a contract does not always entitle the other party to terminate that contract for breach. In many cases, before a right to terminate arises, a party must comply with a notice procedure. As recognised in Perri v Coolangatta Investments Pty Ltd (1982) 149 CLR 537, the rules are different where a contingent condition fails to be fulfilled on time.

Perri v Coolangatta Investments

[20.50] Perri v Coolangatta Investments Pty Ltd (1982) 149 CLR 537 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Under a contract made on 7 April 1978, Perri, the appellants/purchasers, agreed to purchase land from Coolangatta, the respondent/vendor. No time was fixed for completion and the contract did not expressly provide that time was of the essence. The purchase price was $220,000 and a $22,000 deposit, payable on the signing of the contract, was in fact paid prior to signing. Special Condition 6 provided: "This contract is entered into subject to Purchasers completing a sale of their property … (at) Lilli Pilli".

The Lilli Pilli property was finally sold in March 1979 with completion on 13 June 1979. On 17 July 1978, the respondents issued a notice to complete to the appellants requiring completion by 8 August 1978. The sale was not completed by that date and on 10 August 1978, the respondent gave notice rescinding the contract. On 29 September 1978, the respondent sought a declaration that the contract had been validly rescinded. On 27 February 1979, the appellants purported to waive the benefit of Special Condition 6 and sought completion on 15 March 1979 or some mutually convenient date. The respondent replied that the contract had been rescinded by their notice of 10 August. On 21 March 1980, the appellants cross-claimed for specific performance of the contract.

Needham J found that the contract had been terminated before the appellants commenced proceeding, made the declaration sought and dismissed the cross-claim. An appeal by the appellants to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. The appellants appealed to the High Court.]

GIBBS CJ: [541] In my opinion Special Condition 6 made the completion of the sale of the property at Lilli Pilli a condition precedent to the performance of certain of the obligations of the parties under the contract, including the obligation of the respondent to complete the sale. It has sometimes proved difficult to decide whether a particular condition of a contract should be classified as a condition precedent or a condition subsequent, and as Professor Stoljar has pointed out in "The Contractual Concept of Condition" (1953) LQR 485 at 506, if the words "precedent" and "subsequent" are to make sense they must be connected with a definite point of reference; since they express a relationship in time, the question which must be asked is: "Precedent to what? Subsequent to what?" However, provided the effect of a condition is clearly understood, its classification may be merely a matter of words. The condition in the present case was not a condition precedent to the formation of a binding contract. It is clear that a binding contract came into existence immediately upon signature, and that the parties to it were from that moment subject to certain obligations. For example, the appellants became liable to pay a deposit. Further, there was implied a promise by the appellants that they would do all that was reasonable to find a buyer for the Lilli Pilli property and to complete a sale to him. It was held in Lombardo v Morgan [1957] VR 153, that a term of that kind should be implied in a contract for the sale of land which contained a condition making the sale subject to the vendor disposing of his business within 90 days; and that decision is consistent with authority, including decisions of this court … The fact [542] that a promise of this kind is implied is quite inconsistent with the notion that no binding contract has come into existence …

Special Condition 6 did not fix any time within which the sale of the property at Lilli Pilli was to be completed, nor did it fix a date for completion of the sale. In Aberfoyle Plantations Ltd v Cheng [1960] AC 115, it was said that in such a case the condition must be fulfilled within a reasonable time. This statement is clearly correct …

The condition was in my opinion one for the benefit of the appellants, who were therefore entitled to waive it, but since there was no waiver before proceedings were commenced that question need not be further considered.

Although by September 1978 a reasonable time had elapsed, the condition had not then been fulfilled. The question then arises whether the respondent was entitled to terminate the contract without first giving to the appellants a notice requiring them to fulfil the condition, or to perform the contract, within a reasonable time. Aberfoyle Plantations Ltd v Cheng is authority that no notice is necessary when the contract, expressly or by implication, fixes a date by which the condition is to be fulfilled. Their Lordships laid down the rule applicable to such a case as follows (at 125): "where a conditional contract of sale fixes (whether specifically or by reference to the date fixed for completion) the date by which the condition is to be fulfilled, then the date so fixed must be strictly adhered to, and the time allowed is not to be extended by reference to equitable principles." Their Lordships did not explain why equitable principles are inapplicable. The explanation given by Professor Treitel, in his work on The Law of Contract (4th ed, 1975), [544] p 570, is that the equitable principle that time is not of the essence of the contract does not apply, because "until the condition is performed the whole existence of the contract remains in doubt." However, their Lordships went on to say that if they had accepted counsel's argument that the vendor was entitled to a reasonable time to fulfil the condition, they would have been disposed to agree that time, not being originally of the essence of the contract, could not be made so by service of a notice when the vendor had not been guilty of any delay or default such as had to be shown in order to entitle the purchaser to serve such a notice: at 128. Those observations, as Cooke J said in Hunt v Wilson [1978] 2 NZLR 261 at 271 "certainly tend towards the view that, if no time is fixed for completion and a condition is to be satisfied within a reasonable time, the equitable requirements as to notice apply". Again, however, their Lordships did not explain why the equitable principles might apply in the one case but not in the other.

In Maynard v Goode (1926) 37 CLR 529 at 542, Higgins J said that he strongly thought "that a right to put an end to the contract or to refuse to perform it would not arise thereunder automatically without some warning notice from the vendor, fixing a reasonable limit of time for completion." Isaacs J may have been of a similar opinion: at 539–40. These remarks were obiter, because in that case it was held that the condition was performed within a reasonable time.

In Gange v Sullivan (1966) 116 CLR 418 a contract for sale contained a provision that the contract was subject to the purchaser obtaining a certain development approval of the local council and that in the event of the council not granting such approval by 31 May 1965 the contract was to be at an end. By 31 May 1965 the council's approval had not been given and the purchaser had not waived the condition. It was held that the contract did not automatically come to an end. Taylor, Menzies and Owen JJ said (at 441):

> Whilst the effect of a condition must in every case depend upon the language in which it is expressed and a decision upon the meaning of one condition cannot determine the meaning of a different condition, the authorities cited do show a disposition on the part of the courts to treat non-fulfilment of a condition such as that here under consideration as rendering a contract voidable rather than void in order to forestall a party to a contract from gaining some advantage from his own conduct in securing, or contributing to, the non-fulfilment of a condition bringing the contract to an end. Accordingly … we are [545] prepared to treat non-fulfilment of the condition as rendering the contract voidable rather than void.

Barwick CJ was of a similar opinion: at 429. The authority principally relied on by the court was Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd (1950) 81 CLR 418, a case of condition subsequent. It was not suggested in either of those cases that it was necessary to give any notice to complete. The non-fulfilment of the condition gave the party not in default a right to avoid the contract, but if that party did not exercise the right the other party might enforce the contract against him. In Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd the attempt to cancel the contract was made too late, since the condition had been fulfilled in the meantime: at 442. It appears to have been assumed that no notice to complete need be given before the right to avoid the contract was exercised. In both cases however a time for fulfilment of the condition was expressly fixed by the contract.

Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd and Gange v Sullivan are consistent with Aberfoyle Plantations Ltd v Cheng, and support the view that where a conditional contract fixes the date by which the condition is to be fulfilled the contract may be terminated if the condition has not been fulfilled when that date arrives, and that it is unnecessary to give any prior notice to the other party. The question is whether a similar conclusion should be reached when no time for fulfilment of the condition is fixed by the contract, and it accordingly must be performed within a reasonable time. There is little authority on the question, and it must be approached from the standpoint of principle. The condition with which we are concerned is not one which it was entirely in the power of the appellants to fulfil. Although they might use their best endeavours to find a buyer and complete a sale, it still remained necessary for them to find someone prepared to buy. Although, in fact, the appellants did not make reasonable efforts to satisfy the condition, it is impossible to say that they must have effected a sale within a reasonable time if they had made all reasonable endeavours to do so. It seems inappropriate that one party to a contract should be able to give a notice requiring the other to complete a sale, when that other party has not promised to do so (his promise only being to do all that was reasonable) and when it is not necessarily within his power to do so. The doctrines of equity enable a party to a contract to obtain specific performance notwithstanding his failure to carry out his obligations within a stipulated time, when that time is not of the essence of the contract. The party not in default has a correspond-[546]ing power to limit a particular time within which the other contracting party is to perform his obligations. These principles have recently been discussed by this court in Louinder v Leis (1982) 149 CLR 509. They apply, in my opinion, only where the party to whom a notice may be given is under a contractual obligation to act. In the present case no doubt the appellants might have been given a notice requiring them to make reasonable efforts to sell, but they could not have been required to make a sale, for that was beyond their power. Moreover, a notice can only be given when the party to whom it is addressed is either in breach of contract, or guilty of unreasonable delay. A purchaser might have made all reasonable efforts but yet have been unable to complete a sale, and in that situation the vendor would not be able to give a notice to complete, and would, if the appellants' argument is correct, be bound indefinitely to a contract that might never result in a sale. For these reasons I consider that when the time has elapsed for performance of a condition which is not a promissory condition, but a condition precedent to the obligation to complete a contract of sale, either party, if not in default, can elect to treat the contract as at an end if the condition has not been fulfilled or waived, and that it is not necessary first to give a notice calling on the party in default to complete the contract or fulfil the condition. What I have said is, of course, subject to any sufficient indication of a contrary intention in the words of the contract itself … Although in Aberfoyle Plantations Ltd v Cheng an erroneous view may have been taken of the nature of the condition there considered, nevertheless, in my respectful opinion, it was correct to hold that the time fixed by the contract for performance of the condition was not to be extended by reference to equitable principles, and the same conclusion should be reached when the condition is to be performed within a reasonable time. In the present case the learned trial judge was plainly correct in holding that a reasonable time for the fulfilment of Special Con-[547]dition 6 had expired by September 1978. In the view that I have formed, it was then open to the respondent to avoid the contract without first giving any notice limiting a reasonable time for completion. By instituting the proceedings, before the condition had been either fulfilled or waived, the respondent sufficiently evidenced its election to avoid the contract.

I would dismiss the appeal.

[20.55] MASON J (dissenting): [551] There is an obvious difference between the condition which is precedent to the formation or existence of a contract and the condition which is precedent to the obligation of a party to perform his part of the contract and is subsequent in the sense that it entitles the party to terminate the contract on non-fulfilment. In the first category the transaction creates no rights enforceable by the parties unless and until the condition is fulfilled. In the second category there is a binding contract which creates rights capable of enforcement, though the obligation of a party, or perhaps of both parties, to perform depends on fulfilment of the condition and non-fulfilment entitles him to terminate.

Conditions precedent within the first category may produce different consequences. In most cases, but perhaps not in all, a party may be able to withdraw from the transaction before fulfilment of the condition. But in each class of case, the transaction creates no enforceable rights in respect of the subject matter of the transaction unless the condition is fulfilled because, [552] until the occurrence of that event, there can be no binding contract. There is also a problem in classifying a transaction which imposes an obligation on a party not to do anything which will prevent fulfilment of the condition. Even if it is to be placed in the first category, that consisting of conditional contracts – and I have some difficulty in placing it there – it yields no enforceable rights with respect to the subject matter of the transaction unless and until the contract is fulfilled, though the obligation not to prevent fulfilment of the condition will be enforceable in the event of its breach. Generally speaking the court will tend to favour that construction which leads to the conclusion that a particular stipulation is a condition precedent to performance as against that which leads to the conclusion that the stipulation is a condition precedent to the formation or existence of a contract. In most cases it is artificial to say, in the face of the details settled upon by the parties, that there is no binding contract unless the event in question happens. Instead, it is appropriate in conformity with the mutual intention of the parties to say that there is a binding contract which makes the stipulated event a condition precedent to the duty of one party, or perhaps of both parties, to perform. Furthermore, it gives the courts greater scope in determining and adjusting the rights of the parties. For these reasons the condition will not be construed as a condition precedent to the formation of a contract unless the contract read as a whole plainly compels this conclusion. In the present case it is the language of special condition 6 alone which supports this result. By relating the condition to entry into the contract the clause seems to suggest that the formation or existence of the contract itself is dependent upon completion of the sale of the Lilli Pilli property. But the condition is capable of being read as a provision which conditions the performance of the obligations of one or both parties on fulfilment of the condition and the tradition in this Court is to so construe provisions of this kind – see Maynard (1926) 37 CLR 529; Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd (1950) 81 CLR 418, at 443; Brien v Dwyer (1978) 141 CLR 378, at 393, 397–8. Moreover, it is clear enough that the condition was inserted for the protection of the purchasers, to guard against the possibility that they would lack adequate finance. It was certainly not inserted for the protection of the vendor. Consequently, it is a condition which may possibly be capable of waiver by the purchasers, though this is not a point which needs to be decided.

In the Court of Appeal, Mahoney JA thought that special [553] condition 6 was not devoid of a promissory element. It relates to an event the occurrence of which, though not probably in the control of the purchasers, is closely affected by their actions and efforts. It would be absurd to suggest that the parties contemplated that the purchasers could refrain from making any effort to sell. That would be to give the purchasers what in substance amounted to an option to withdraw. I am therefore inclined to read the clause as imposing an implied obligation on the purchasers to make all reasonable efforts to sell the Lilli Pilli property. The conclusion to be drawn then is that the clause expresses a condition which is precedent to the appellants' duty to perform the contract, non-fulfilment of which entitles them to terminate the contract, rather than as a condition precedent to the formation of the contract. Instead of saying that the condition contains a promissory element I should prefer to say that the promise is the subject of an implied term which is associated with the condition, though perhaps not forming part of it.

It seems that in the courts below the parties were united in the view that the vendor, as well as the purchasers, could terminate for non-fulfilment of the condition. On the other hand, as I have said, the clause was inserted for the protection of the appellants and it is probably unnecessary to concede to the respondent for its protection an equivalent right to terminate for non-fulfilment of the condition. It seems to be sufficiently protected by relying on its rights to insist on completion of the contract within a reasonable time and by taking such action as it may in that event. Even so, the fact that the clause draws no distinction between the parties and is not expressed to condition only the purchasers' obligation to complete, together with their implied obligation to make all reasonable efforts to sell the Lilli Pilli property, provide strong ground for thinking that the respondent as well as the appellants had a right to terminate on non-fulfilment of the condition. This does not necessarily deny a right in the appellants to waive the benefit of the clause, the respondent's right of termination for breach, like the appellants', subsisting so long as there is no waiver by the appellant.

The provision is not one which on non-fulfilment works a termination of the contract of its own force without notice. If the clause were a self-executing provision its operation might cause very great confusion. It is preferable to view it as a provision which entitles the party to terminate by notice in the event of non-fulfilment, so that it has an operation similar to that of the clause [554] discussed in Gundowda (1950) 81 CLR, at 440–2. The consequence is that, if on non-fulfilment neither party exercises the right to terminate, the contract continues on foot.

As the contract does not fix a time for completion it would accord with general principle to say that completion must take place within a reasonable time. In this case what is a reasonable time for completion needs to be measured with special condition 6 in mind. The clause does not specify a time within which the Lilli Pilli property is to be sold. Accordingly, it contemplates that there should be such a sale within a reasonable time. But it seems obvious that the parties envisaged that in the ordinary course of events the sale of the Lilli Pilli property would be completed before the appellants could be called upon to complete the purchase of the subject property. The mutual intention was that the appellants could only be compelled to complete if they had received the proceeds of sale of the Lilli Pilli property. The consequence is that a reasonable time for completion must necessarily be somewhat longer than the reasonable time allowed for the purpose of fulfilment of special condition 6 …. [555] On the view which I take of this contract the respondent could not require the appellants to complete until a reasonable time had elapsed within which to complete the sale of the Lilli Pilli property. The primary judge found that a reasonable time had expired by September 1978, without making a specific finding on the question whether a reasonable time had elapsed by 17 July, when the [556] second notice to complete was given requiring completion on 8 August 1978. It is, I think, implicit in his Honour's findings that he rejected the respondent's case that a reasonable time had elapsed by 17 July, a rejection with which I agree. Mahoney JA seems to have been in error in stating that the parties accepted that a reasonable time had so elapsed. But even if that were so the giving of a notice in relation to special condition 6 may well have been an essential preliminary for insistence on completion.

In the result my conclusion is that the respondent did not validly rescind the contract by its notice given on 10 August 1978 and I would therefore allow the appeal.

[BRENNAN J agreed generally with Gibbs CJ. STEPHEN J agreed with Brennan J. WILSON J thought that a reasonable time had elapsed prior to the issue of the respondent's notice rescinding the contract.]

Appeal dismissed.

WAIVER OF A CONTINGENT CONDITION

[20.60] The parties to a contract subject to a contingent condition may decide that they will not require the condition to be fulfilled before performance of the contract is to occur. This is known as waiver of the contingent condition. One party alone will also have a right to waive compliance with a contingent condition where the condition is for the benefit of that party. Perri v Coolangatta Investments Pty Ltd (1982) 149 CLR 537, extracted at [20.50] illustrates that, in the absence of waiver by the date by which the condition needs to be fulfilled, the fact that a condition is for the benefit of one party may not preclude the other party from terminating the contract on the ground of failure of the condition.

RIGHTS CONFERRED BY THE COMMON LAW

[21.05] This chapter considers when one party (the aggrieved party) will be entitled to terminate a contract by reason of a breach by the other party. As discussed in Chapter 22, a party may also be entitled to terminate where the other party repudiates his or her obligations under the contract. Regardless of whether or not the aggrieved party decides to terminate the contract, he or she will have a right to damages to compensate for loss caused by any breach of the contract. Where an aggrieved party seeks to terminate a contract, the other party may argue that the right to terminate has been lost by some conduct on the part of the aggrieved party. Restrictions on the right to terminate are discussed in Chapter 25.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A BREACH OF CONTRACT?

[21.10] Briefly, a breach occurs when a party fails to perform at the time or to the standard required by the contract. See Chapter 18.

WHEN IS THERE A RIGHT TO TERMINATE FOR BREACH AT COMMON LAW?

[21.15] Whether or not there is a common law right to terminate for breach depends primarily on the classification of the term breached. In this context, there is a three-fold classification of terms; conditions, warranties and intermediate or innominate terms.

1. If a term is a condition, the aggrieved party will be entitled to terminate for any breach of that term by the other party regardless of the gravity or consequences of the breach. Damages to compensate for any loss suffered by the aggrieved party will also be available.
2. If a term is a warranty, the aggrieved party will not be entitled to terminate merely by reason of a breach of the term by the other party, although damages to compensate for any loss suffered by the aggrieved party will be available.
3. If a term is an intermediate or innominate term, the aggrieved party's right to terminate depends on the gravity and consequences of the breach of the term. If the breach is likely to have serious consequences for further performance of the contract, then the aggrieved party will be entitled to terminate the contract in addition to claiming damages for any losses caused by the breach.

Accordingly, the first step in deciding whether or not an aggrieved party has a right to terminate for breach of a term of the contract is to classify the term in question. The most important categories are conditions and intermediate terms. Terms will generally only be classified as warranties where required by statute, in particular under the Sale of Goods Acts. The classification of a term as intermediate is likely to be preferred for the reason that it gives courts greater flexibility in dealing with a breach. In Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 QB 26 at 69–70, Lord Diplock suggested that, in the absence of a clearly expressed intention to the contrary, a term will only properly be classified as a warranty if it is such that no possible breach could give rise to an event which would deprive the aggrieved party of substantially the whole of the benefit which it was intended she or he should receive from the contract.

TERMINATION FOR BREACH OF A CONDITION

[21.20] Where a term is classified as a condition, any breach of the term, regardless of its gravity, will give the aggrieved party a right to terminate the contract. In the absence of classification by statute or by an express statement by the parties, whether a term is a condition is determined as a matter of construction of the contract in question. The accepted test for whether a term should be construed as a "condition" in Australia is that stated by Jordan CJ in Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd v Luna Park (NSW) Ltd (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 632, 641:

> The question whether a term in a contract is a condition or warranty, that is, an essential or inessential promise, depends upon the intention of the parties as appearing in or from the contract. The test of essentiality is whether it appears from the general nature of the contract, or from some particular term or terms, that the promise is of such importance to the promisee that he would not have entered into the contract unless he had been assured of a strict or substantial performance of the promise, as the case may be, and this ought to have been apparent to the promisor.

In Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks (1951) 83 CLR 322, 336, the High Court said that the test was "succinctly stated" by Jordan CJ in Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd v Luna Park (NSW) Ltd.

In DTR Nominees Pty Ltd v Mona Homes Pty Ltd (1978) 138 CLR 423, 431, Stephen, Mason and Jacobs JJ provided further explanation of the relevant test:

> [T]he quality of essentiality depends … on a judgment which is made of the general nature of the contract and its particular provisions, a judgment which takes close account of the importance which the parties have attached to the provision as evidenced by the contract itself as applied to the surrounding circumstances.

Some of the relevant factors in assessing whether or not a term is a condition are considered in Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd v Luna Park (NSW) Ltd (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 632; (1938) 61 CLR 286 at [21.25] and Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks (1951) 83 CLR 322 at [21.35]. See also Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 QB 26 and Ankar Pty Ltd v National Westminster Finance (Australia) Ltd (1987) 162 CLR 549 at [21.45] and [21.50]–[21.55].

Tramways Advertising v Luna Park

[21.25] Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd v Luna Park (NSW) Ltd (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 632 (Supreme Court of New South Wales, Full Court) – Appeal from District Court; High Court of Australia (1938) 61 CLR 286.

[FACTS: Tramways Advertising, the plaintiff, carried on the business of advertising on trams for its clients. It entered into a contract with Luna Park, the defendant, whereby it agreed to exhibit for three "seasons" advertising material for the defendant by means of 53 boards displayed on the roofs of trams. In a letter, which was admitted to be part of the contract, the plaintiff guaranteed "that these boards will be on the track at least eight hours a day throughout the season". After the contract had been in operation for two seasons, the defendant objected that the display contracted for, namely that each and every board be displayed for at least eight hours on each and every day, was not being provided and that it did not regard itself as being bound by the contract any further. The plaintiff admitted that this service had not been provided but contended that the obligation imposed by the contract was performed if, during each season, each board was displayed for an average of eight hours per day. The plaintiff offered to discuss making any desired alterations to the form of the advertisement but the defendant refused to discuss the matter. The plaintiff then proceeded to display the boards on the trams when the defendant's third season began. The defendant protested against the boards being displayed at all, and in particular, objected that some of the advertising matter had become misleading; but it refused to give any instructions for alteration and the plaintiff continued the display. The plaintiff company sued for £86 13s 4d, being the charge for a calendar month at the beginning of the third season. The defendant in a cross-action sued for damages for breach of contract.]

JORDAN CJ: [641] In considering the legal consequences flowing from a breach of contract, it is necessary to remember that:

(1) the breach may extend to all or to some only of the promises of the defaulting party;

(2) the promises broken may be important or unimportant;

(3) the breach of any particular promise may be substantial or trivial;

(4) the breach may occur or be discovered (a) when the innocent party has not yet performed any or some of the promises on his part, or after he has performed them all; and (b) when the innocent party has received no performance from the defaulting party, or has received performance in whole or in part; and

(5) the resultant rights of the innocent party and the nature of the remedies available to him may depend upon some or all of these matters.

The nature of the promise broken is one of the most important of the matters. If it is a condition that is broken, that is, an essential promise, the innocent party, when he becomes aware of the breach, has ordinarily the right at his option either to treat himself as discharged from the contract and to recover damages for loss of the contract, or else to keep the contract on foot and recover damages for the particular breach. If it is a warranty that is broken, that is, a non-essential promise, only the latter alternative is available to the innocent party: in that case he cannot of course obtain damages for loss of the contract … The question whether a term in a contract is a condition or a warranty, that is, an essential or a non-essential promise, depends upon the intention of the parties as appearing in or from the contract. The test of essentiality is whether it appears from the general nature of the contract considered as a whole, or from some particular term or terms, that the promise is of such importance to the promisee that he would not have entered into the contract unless he had been assured of a strict or a substantial performance of the promise, as the case may be, and that this ought to have been apparent [642] to the promisor … If the innocent party would not have entered into the contract unless assured of a strict and literal performance of the promise, he may in general treat himself as discharged upon any breach of the promise, however slight. If he contracted in reliance upon a substantial performance of the promise, any substantial breach will ordinarily justify a discharge. In some cases it is expressly provided that a particular promise is essential to the contract, for example, by a stipulation that it is the basis or of the essence of the contract (Bettini v Gye (1876) 1 QBD 183 at 187) but in the absence of express provision the question is one of construction for the court, when once the terms of contract have been ascertained: Bentsen v Taylor Sons & Co (No 2) [1893] 2 QB 274 at 280–1 …

[643] In considering the exact measure of relief that can be obtained in any particular case for breach of an essential promise, it is necessary to have regard to a number of factors. The breach may, for example, not occur or not be discovered until the contract has been wholly or partly performed; or the innocent party may by his conduct after the breach has come to his notice debar himself from relying on it as a ground for putting an end to the contract. If an essential breach is committed when nothing has yet been done to perform the contract on either side, the innocent party if he chooses may by notice to the defaulting party exercise his right of treating himself as discharged from the obligations of the contract and may also sue for damages for loss of the contract. A communicated election to avoid the contract, if made by a party having a right to avoid it, is at once operative and is final and irrevocable. And a party who has purported to avoid a contract upon an untenable ground is entitled to rely upon any valid ground which in fact then existed and has not been waived: Shepherd v Felt & Textiles of Australia Ltd (1931) 45 CLR 359 at 377–8.

If, on the other hand, when the breach is discovered, the position is that the defaulting party has wholly (though defectively) performed the contract, and the innocent party has accepted performance in such a way that he can no longer reject it, he is remitted to his remedy by way of damages or set-off for the breach … If, however, he is still in the position to reject performance, he may determine the contract, refuse to perform it further, recover any payments made as on a total failure of consideration … and also recover damages for loss of the contract.

In the intermediate case, where the contract has been partly performed by the defaulting party, the questions arise:

(1) whether the innocent party who, after such part-performance, [644] becomes aware of an essential breach committed in the course of performance, can rely on the breach as a ground for putting an end to the contract as a source of future obligations, and obtaining damages for loss of contract; and

(2) whether, if he has and exercises this right, he is bound to accept and (upon a quantum meruit or otherwise) give consideration for, the defective part-performance, subject to a right to compensation for the defect, or whether he may reject the defective part-performance, obtain damages as on a total loss of contract, and also, in respect of any consideration already given by him, obtain relief as on a total failure of consideration.

It needs to be remembered also that if a party who becomes entitled to put an end to a contract by reason of a breach of an essential promise does not exercise this right when he becomes aware of the breach, he loses his right, and is remitted to his remedy by way of damages only, in the following events:

(1) if, notwithstanding knowledge of the breach, he proceeds to do some act, referable to the contract, which could only be properly done by him by virtue of the contract treated as a subsisting contract …;

(2) if the party in default proceeds to carry on with the performance of the contract at the request or with the permission, express or tacit, of the innocent party, made or given with knowledge of the breach …

Subject to what has just been stated, the innocent party does not lose his right of putting an end to the contract merely by insisting that the breach shall be remedied; but if he takes this course, then:

(1) as a general rule, he cannot afterwards exercise the right without giving reasonable notice of his intention to do so …; and

(2) he loses his right if, before he exercises it, the defaulting party acquires and exercises a right to be relieved from the performance of the contract …

The fact, however, that the innocent party has condoned one breach of an essential promise does not prevent him from terminating the contract if a second breach of an essential promise is committed …

In cases where, notwithstanding a breach of an essential promise the innocent party by choice refrains, or through force of circumstances is prevented, from putting an end to the contract, so that it remains on foot, the contract continues to be binding on both parties. In such cases it is sometimes said that the condition is reduced to a warranty. In truth it continues to be a condition, but no higher relief can be obtained in respect of the particular breach than if it were a breach of warranty … compare Sale of Goods Act 1923, s 16. A party by committing a breach of an essential promise cannot thereby compel the innocent party to put an end to the contract; the latter may go on with the performance of the contract if he chooses … If however, the terms or nature of the contract are such that the participation of the defaulting party is necessary to enable the innocent party to perform the contract on his part, and this participation is withheld, the innocent party is necessarily prevented and absolved from performance so long as the participation is withheld. And, if the innocent party insists on upholding the contract, he must in any action brought by him on the contract as a subsisting contract prove performance on his own part or readiness and willingness to perform, as the case may be, unless of course upon the pleadings he is not put to such proof …

[646] One essential promise which is implied in every contract is that neither party will without just cause repudiate his obligations under the contract, whether the time for performance has arrived or not … that is, that he will not expressly or impliedly intimate that he refuses to be bound by the contract in whole or in part … A breach of this implied promise not to repudiate ordinarily entitles the other party to put an end to the contract; and a party who without lawful justification purports to treat himself as discharged from the obligations of the contract for a supposed essential breach by the other party is himself guilty of repudiating the contract and thereby vests in the other party a right lawfully to put an end to the contract … Repudiation may be express, as where a party expressly intimates that he refuses to perform the contract or to perform some part of it whether essential or not, or implied, as where he so conducts himself, whether in committing breaches or otherwise, as to show that he is refusing to perform the contract …

In the case of a contract which is to be, or in fact is, performed in instalments, a breach of contract committed in relation to one or more of the instalments, may amount:

(1) to a breach of a non-essential promise sounding only in damages; or

(2) to a breach of an essential promise a breach of which justifies avoidance of the contract; or

(3) to an implied repudiation of the obligations of the contract, that is, to a breach of the implied essential promise not to repudiate.

Section 34 of the Sale of Goods Act 1923 deals only with the first and third of these matters; and it has been held that the test of whether a breach amounts to an implied repudiation is whether it is of such a kind or takes place in such circumstances [647] as to lead to the inference that similar breaches will be committed with respect to subsequent instalments: Maple Flock Co Ltd v Universal Furniture Products (Wembley) Ltd [1934] 1 KB 148 at 156. But apart from special circumstances, a vital breach of any essential promise is a good ground for avoiding the contract notwithstanding that no intention to repudiate can be established. Thus, if it was expressed to be of the essence of the contract that at least 1 ton should be delivered every week, failure to deliver a complete ton in any week would justify avoidance notwithstanding that the supplier was evidently straining every nerve to perform the contract and that there was no reason to suppose that the breach would be repeated …

[His Honour then concluded that the interpretation of the contract contended for by the plaintiff was correct and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount claimed as a liquidated sum. Accordingly, the cross-action for damages for breach of contract failed. DAVIDSON J delivered a judgment to a similar effect and NICHOLAS J dissented.]

On Appeal to the High Court (1938) 61 CLR 286

[Luna Park (NSW) Ltd appealed to the High Court which by a majority (LATHAM CJ, RICH and McTIERNAN JJ, DIXON J dissenting) held that upon the true construction of the contract the plaintiff's undertaking was that each and every roof board would be displayed for at least eight hours on each and every day.]

[21.30] LATHAM CJ: [299] I agree with what Nicholas J says in his reasons for judgment – the guarantee "was an assurance to the advertiser that, whatever might be the ordinary practice of the Tramway Department, the boards advertising Luna Park would be on the track not only for an average period of eight hours but for eight hours on every day, and that by this means a proclamation of the allurements of Luna Park would continuously be thrust upon the attention of residents of the industrial suburbs" (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 661. It follows that in my opinion the plaintiff must fail upon the claim because the plaintiff sues upon the special contract and has not [300] performed the contract in accordance with its terms …

In the cross-action, the defendant claimed damages for breach of contract by the plaintiff in not displaying the 53 roof boards daily throughout the whole contract period of 52 weeks. The claim therefore was based first upon the actual failure to display the roof boards as required by the contract during the first and second seasons, and secondly, as to the third season, upon a discharge of the contract alleged to have been rightfully brought about by the defendant and entitling the defendant to sue for damages even though the time for performance by the plaintiff had not expired.

It is admitted by the plaintiff that if the defendant's construction of the clause is adopted the contract has been broken by the plaintiff. Therefore, as a matter of course, the defendant is entitled to nominal damages. This right does not in any way depend upon whether the defendant was entitled for any reason to determine the contract. Thus, according to the construction of the clause which I regard as correct, there is no doubt whatever as to the defendant's right of action for damages for breach of contract in respect of the first two seasons … [301] But it is quite impossible to ascertain from the evidence available the number of days upon which particular boards were not shown or, if shown, were shown for less than eight hours. Thus the extent of the breach is undetermined. It is true that there are many authorities which establish that substantial damages can be awarded where a breach of contract is established, even though the calculation of the damages is "not only difficult but incapable of being carried out with certainty or precision": Chaplin v Hicks [1911] 2 KB 786 at 791. See also other cases dealing with damages for loss of publicity. In all these cases, however, the extent of the breach was established. There was a complete failure on one side to perform the contract. In the present case, however, there has not been a complete, but only a partial, failure to perform the contract. The extent of the failure is unascertained. Thus the evidence which the defendant was content to put before the court does not make it possible to reach any estimate of damage suffered.

I can see no reason why the defendant should be allowed to fight the matter over again. If a party chooses to go to trial with incomplete evidence he must abide the consequences. The fact that his evidence might have been strengthened affords no reason for ordering a new trial. Thus the defendant must be content, so far as the first and second seasons are concerned, with nominal damages.

In the Supreme Court a great deal of attention was devoted to the consideration of the question whether the particular clause in question was a condition or a warranty. As I have already stated, this question is unimportant in relation to the right of the defendant to claim damages for past admitted breaches. The defendant [302] cannot, however, claim damages in respect of the third season unless he was entitled to determine the contract … In my opinion the defendant was entitled to determine the contract for two reasons: first, by reason of the plaintiff's actual breaches of the contract, and, secondly, by reason of the plaintiff's evident intention (notwithstanding the challenge by the defendant) to continue to perform the contract in the future in the same manner as in the past. In the past the plaintiff had given and had intended to give only a display of an average of eight hours per day per board, and it was clear that the plaintiff intended to continue to perform the contract in the same way. I agree with the Full Court that the guarantee clause was a condition and not a warranty in the sense in which those words are used by Fletcher-Moulton LJ in Wallis Son and Wells v Pratt and Haynes [1910] 2 KB 1003 at 1012. It was a term of the contract which went so directly to the substance of the contract or was so "essential to its very nature that its non-performance may fairly be considered by the other party as a substantial failure to perform the contract at all". The breach of such a term by one party entitles the other party not only to obtain damages but also to refuse to perform any of the obligations resting upon him.

The essential character of the clause in question appears both from its own terms and from the circumstances in which the contract was made. In the first place the words "we guarantee" are particularly suited, in a contract drawn by laymen, to emphasise [303] the importance of the clause which they introduce. In the next place, the payment of £20 per week was not to begin until the complete number of roof boards, namely, 53, were all displayed at the same time. The money is made payable "from date of first appearance of complete number of boards 53 in all". Thus, if the advertising company displayed even as many as 52 boards on every day throughout a whole season, it would never become entitled to recover any payment. This provision in the contract therefore supports the view that the parties regarded the completeness of the display contracted for as an essential element in the contract. Further, the preliminary correspondence shows that the advertising company represented continuity of display as an important feature … Reference to these statements is permissible because, when the question is whether a promise is a condition or a warranty:

> there is no way of deciding that question except by looking at the contract in the light of the surrounding circumstances, and then making up one's mind whether the intention of the parties, as gathered from the instrument itself, will best be carried out by treating the promise as a warranty sounding only in damages, or as a condition precedent by the failure to perform which the other party is relieved of his liability. In order to decide this question of construction, one of the first things you would look to is, to what extent the accuracy of the statement – the truth of what is promised – would be likely to affect the substance and foundation of the adventure which the contract is intended to carry out (Bentsen v Taylor, Sons & Co (No 2) [1893] 2 QB 274 at 281 per Bowen LJ) …

A discontinuous and irregular display is a different thing from a guaranteed continuous and regular display. For these reasons, in my opinion, [304] the clause was a condition and not a mere warranty. Accordingly any breach of the clause would entitle the defendant to determine the contract.

[His Honour then said that the words "at least eight hours" should be construed as meaning "substantially eight hours" but was of the opinion that the admission by the advertising company that each board was not exhibited for at least eight hours should be taken to mean that each board was not exhibited for substantially eight hours per day. His Honour continued:]

I am accordingly of opinion that the defendant was entitled to determine the contract by reason of the past breaches of the plaintiff.

But further, apart from any right of the defendant to determine the contract on account of breach of a condition in the past, the defendant was entitled to determine the contract on another ground. The plaintiff was prepared to continue the performance of the contract only upon the basis of the plaintiff's construction of the contract, that is, by giving an average daily eight hours' display of the roof boards. Probably this was the only way in which the plaintiff could perform the contract, because the plaintiff did not control the running of the trams. The position, therefore, was that the plaintiff had given the defendant the right to believe that the contract would not be performed according to its true construction. The circumstances were such as to justify the inference that breaches such as those which had already been committed would be committed in [305] the future. The plaintiff, therefore, must be regarded as renouncing the contract which it had in fact made, even though it was contended by the plaintiff that the contract would be properly performed … The defendant can justify the repudiation of the contract upon any ground which in fact existed whether or not such a ground was previously relied upon by him: Shepherd v Felt and Textiles of Australia Ltd (1931) 45 CLR 359.

Appeal allowed.

Associated Newspapers v Bancks

[21.35] Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks (1951) 83 CLR 322 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Under a ten-year contract between the parties commencing 27 March 1949, Bancks, the defendant, agreed to provide weekly a full page drawing of "Us Fellers" or such other subject as might be agreed to from time to time, and Associated Newspapers, the plaintiff company, undertook to publish it each week on the front page of the comic section of the Sunday Sun and Guardian. Until 11 February 1951, the company complied but on that day and the next two succeeding Sundays, owing to a shortage of newsprint, the comic was printed so as to appear on the third page which was headed "Sunday Sun Comics". On the ground that the company had repeatedly, without his consent, and in the face of protest, broken its undertaking, the defendant gave notice by a letter of 26 February 1951 that he was no longer bound by the contract. The company commenced proceedings for an injunction restraining the threatened breach by the defendant of certain negative stipulations in the contract.]

DIXON, WILLIAMS, WEBB, FULLAGAR AND KITTO JJ: [336] The first question is whether the company's undertaking to present the defendant's drawings on the front page of the comic is a condition or essential term of the contract going to its very root, the breach of which would immediately entitle the defendant at his option to rescind the contract and sue for damages for the loss of the contract, or a mere warranty or non-essential and subsidiary term the breach of which would entitle the defendant to damages. Various tests have been advanced by the courts from time to time to determine what is a condition as opposed to a warranty. In Bettini v Gye (1876) 1 QBD 183 at 186, Blackburn J (as he then was) said that to determine this question the court must ascertain the intention of the parties to be collected from the instrument and the circumstances legally admissible with reference to which it is to be construed. Later in the same case his Lordship said that in the absence of any express declaration by the parties, as in the present case (at 188):

> we think that we are to look at the whole contract and applying the rule stated by Parke B to be acknowledged in Graves v Legg (1854) 9 Ex 709 at 716; 156 ER 304, see whether the particular stipulation goes to the root of the matter, so that a failure to perform it would render the performance of the rest of the contract by the plaintiff a thing different in substance from what the defendant has stipulated for; or whether it merely partially affects it and may be compensated for in damages.

In Bentsen v Taylor, Sons & Co (No 2) [1893] 2 QB 280 at 281, Bowen LJ, discussing the distinction between a condition and a warranty, points out that in order to decide this question one of the first things you would look to is, to what extent the truth of what is promised would be likely to affect the substance and foundation of the adventure which the contract is intended to carry out. Perhaps the test is better formulated by Morison in his Principles of Rescission of Contracts (1916), p 86: "You look at the stipulation broken from the point of view of its probable effect or importance as an inducement to enter into the contract". As he says, this form is "expressly supported by such cases as Flight v Booth (1834) 1 Bing (NC) 370; 131 ER 1160 and Bannerman v White (1861) 10 CB (NS) 844; 142 ER 685 and, implicitly by such cases as Hoare v Rennie (1859) 5 H & N 19; 157 ER 1083 and Powes v Shand (1877) 2 App Cas 455." [337] The test was succinctly stated by Jordan CJ in Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd v Luna Park (NSW) Ltd (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 632; 55 WN 228. The decision was reversed on appeal, but his Honour's statement of the law is not affected … At least it is clear that the obligation of the defendant to supply a weekly full-page drawing of "Us Fellers" and the plaintiff's undertaking to present the drawing each week on the front page of the comic section are concurrent and correlative promises. And it would not seem open to doubt that the obligation of the defendant is a condition. He was not an ordinary employee of the plaintiff. He was employed as a comic artist and his true work was to produce this weekly drawing. It was for this production that his substantial weekly salary was principally payable. It was what he was really engaged to do. It would be strange if his obligation was a condition of the contract while the undertaking of the plaintiff was a subsidiary term the breach of which would only sound in damages. The undertaking is really a composite undertaking comprising three ingredients: (1) to present a full-page drawing; (2) to present it weekly; and (3) to present it on the front page of the comic section. It is impossible to attach different values to the defendant's obligation and the plaintiff's undertaking. The plaintiff would not have employed the defendant unless it had been assured that the defendant would perform his promise, and the [338] defendant would not have made the promise unless he was assured that his work would be published in a particular manner. Obviously it was of prime importance to the defendant that there should be continuity of publication so that his work should be kept continuously before the public, that his work should be published as a whole and not mutilated, and that it should be published on the most conspicuous page of the comic section. It is like a contract under which an actor is engaged to act in a theatre. It is not sufficient if the employer pays his salary. He must find work for him to do in the sort of part, principal or subsidiary, for which he is employed … A failure to give an actor a proper part is a breach of contract which goes to its root and justifies the actor in treating the contract as rescinded: White v Australian and New Zealand Theatres Ltd (1943) 67 CLR 266.

In the present case the undertaking of the plaintiff company that each weekly full-page drawing would be presented on the front page of the comic section formed a condition a substantial failure in the performance of which would enable the defendant to treat the contract as at an end. The plaintiff committed three successive breaches of this condition and thereupon the defendant was certainly entitled to treat the contract as discharged. Such a failure of the plaintiff to perform the condition went to the root of the contract and gave the defendant as the injured party the right immediately to treat the contract as at an end: Luna Park (NSW) Ltd v Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd. He exercised this right by his letter of 26 February.

Reliance was placed by counsel for the appellant on the passage in the speech of Lord Selborne LC, which appears in Mersey Steel and Iron Co Ltd v Naylor Benzon & Co (1884) 9 App Cas 434 at 438–9:

> I am content to take the rule as stated by Lord Coleridge in Freeth v Burr (1874) LR 9 CP 208, which is in substance, as I understand it, that you must look at the actual circumstances of the case in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other; you must examine what that conduct [339] is, so far as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, to an absolute refusal to perform the contract, such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part; and I think that nothing > more is necessary in the present case than to look at the conduct of the parties, and see whether anything of that kind has taken place here.

That passage has been cited in many subsequent cases … But his Lordship was not there dealing with a breach of a condition. In a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered by instalments the seller, a company, set up the refusal of the buyer to pay ad diem for one delivery as discharging it from the contractual obligation to make further deliveries. The refusal was based upon the ground that a petition for the winding up of the company had been presented and that it would be unsafe to make the payment. An argument for the seller that payment for every delivery was a condition precedent to the obligation to make subsequent deliveries was rejected and it was plain that the mere failure by the buyer to pay for the one delivery could not of itself go to the root of the contract. The House of Lords were thus concerned with the circumstances which might make a refusal by one party to perform an executory contract in what otherwise would be a non-essential respect a ground for the other party to the contract treating himself as discharged from further performance. This is apparent from the speech of Lord Blackburn …

The defendant had not to prove, as in the case of a breach or breaches of non-essential terms of a contract, that the conduct of the plaintiff was such as to amount to a refusal to be bound by the contract. But when the circumstances are considered they would appear to constitute such conduct. The plaintiff made [340] the original change without consulting the defendant. It maintained that it was entitled to do so despite his protests. On 26 February there had been three publications in breach of the contract and several more were intended …

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

TERMINATION FOR BREACH OF AN INTERMEDIATE TERM

[21.40] Where a term is intermediate, the right to terminate depends on the nature of the breach and its foreseeable consequences. For a breach of an intermediate term to give rise to a right to terminate, the breach must be serious or deprive the aggrieved party of "substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he [or she] should obtain from the contract": Ankar Pty Ltd v National Westminster Finance (Australia) Ltd (1987) 162 CLR 549, 562 (extracted at [21.50]). The category of intermediate term was formally recognised to be part of modern English contract law in the decision in Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 QB 26, 70 (at [21.45]). The doctrine of intermediate terms received obiter support from the Australian High Court in Ankar Pty Ltd v National Westminster Finance (Australia) Ltd (1987) 162 CLR 549, 562 (extracted at [21.50]) and was recognised as part of Australian law in Koompahtoo Local Aboriginal Land Council v Sanpine Pty Ltd [2007] HCA 61; (2007) 233 CLR 115 (extracted at [21.60]).

Hongkong Fir Shipping Co v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha

[21.45] Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 QB 26 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Salmon J.

[FACTS: By a time charter Hongkong Fir Shipping, the shipowners, chartered a ship that they owned to Kawasaki Kisen, the charterer, for a period of 24 months. The charter party provided in cl 1 that the vessel be "delivered and placed at the disposal of the charterers at Liverpool … she being in every way fitted for ordinary cargo service". Clause 3 provided that the shipowners should "maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull and machinery during service". The vessel was delivered to the charterers on 13 February 1957, and on that day sailed from Liverpool to Newport Mews, Virginia, to load coal and carry it to Osaka where she arrived on 25 May. Between Liverpool and Osaka the ship was at sea for about eight and a half weeks but was off hire for a further five weeks owing to various machinery breakdowns. At Osaka a further period of 15 weeks was required to make her ready for sea. On 6 June 1957, the charterers terminated the charterparty because of the delay, due, as they alleged, to the unseaworthiness of the vessel and claimed damages for breach of contract. On 8 August, the shipowners intimated that they would treat the termination as wrongful and would hold the charterers liable in damages. In November 1957, the shipowners issued a writ against the charterers claiming damages for wrongful repudiation of the charterparty.

Salmon J held that although the shipowners were in breach of their obligation to provide a seaworthy ship by reason of their failure to provide a competent and sufficient engine room staff, such a failure did not amount to a breach of condition justifying the charterers in repudiating the charter party unless the delays involved in making the ship seaworthy were so great as to frustrate the commercial purpose of the charter. He held that on the facts the charter party had not been so frustrated. The charterers appealed.]

DIPLOCK LJ: [65] Every synallagmatic contract contains in it the seeds of the problem: in what event will a party be relieved of his undertaking to do that which he has agreed to do but has not yet done? The contract may itself expressly define some of these events, [66] as in the cancellation clause in a charterparty; but, human prescience being limited, it seldom does so exhaustively and often fails to do so at all. In some classes of contracts such as sale of goods, marine insurance, contracts of affreightment evidenced by bills of lading and those between parties to bills of exchange, Parliament has defined by statute some of the events not provided for expressly in individual contracts of that class; but where an event occurs the occurrence of which neither the parties nor Parliament have expressly stated will discharge one of the parties from further performance of his undertakings, it is for the court to determine whether the event has this effect or not.

The test whether an event has this effect or not has been stated in a number of metaphors all of which I think amount to the same thing: does the occurrence of the event deprive the party who has further undertakings still to perform of substantially the whole benefit which it was the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract that he should obtain as the consideration for performing those undertakings?

This test is applicable whether or not the event occurs as a result of the default of one of the parties to the contract, but the consequences of the event are different in the two cases.

Where the event occurs as a result of the default of one party the party in default cannot rely upon it as relieving himself of the performance of his own undertaking. This is only a specific application of the fundamental legal and moral rule that a man should not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong. Where the event occurs as a result of the default of neither party, each is relieved of the further performance of his own undertakings and their rights in respect of undertakings previously performed are now regulated by the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943.

This branch of the common law has reached its present stage by the normal process of historical growth, and the fallacy in Mr Roskill's [counsel for the charterers] contention that a different test is applicable when the event occurs as a result of the default of one party from that applicable in cases of frustration where the event occurs as a result of the default of neither party lies, in my view, from a failure to view the cases in their historical context. The problem: in what event will a party to a contract be relieved of his undertaking to do that which he has agreed to do but has not yet done? has exercised the English courts for centuries, probably ever since [67] assumpsit emerged as a form of action distinct from covenant and debt and long before even the earliest cases which we have been invited to examine; but until the rigour of the rule in Paradine v Jane (1647) Aleyn 26; 82 ER 897, was mitigated in the middle of the last century by the classic judgments of Blackburn J in Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B & S 826; 122 ER 309, and Bramwell B in Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co Ltd (1874) LR 10 CP 125, it was in general only events resulting from one party's failure to perform his contractual obligations which were regarded as capable of relieving the other party from continuing to perform that which he had undertaken to do. In the earlier cases before the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, the problem tends to be obscured to modern readers by the rules of pleading peculiar to the relevant forms of action (covenant, debt and assumpsit) and the nomenclature adopted in the judgments, which were mainly on demurrer, reflects this. It was early recognised that contractual undertakings were of two different kinds: those collateral to the main purpose of the parties as expressed in the contract and those which were mutually dependent so that the non-performance of an undertaking of this class was an event which excused the other party from the performance of his corresponding undertakings. In the nomenclature of the 18th and early 19th centuries undertakings of the latter class were called "conditions precedent" and a plaintiff under the rules of pleading had to aver specially in his declaration his performance or readiness and willingness to perform all those contractual undertakings on his part which constituted conditions precedent to the defendant's undertaking for non-performance of which the action was brought. In the earliest cases such as Pordage v Cole (1669) 1 Wms Saund 319; 85 ER 449 and Thorpe v Thorpe (1701) 12 Mod Rep 455; 88 ER 1448, the question whether an undertaking was a condition precedent appears to have turned upon the verbal niceties of the particular phrases used in the written contract and it was not until 1773 that Lord Mansfield, in the case which is a legal landmark, Boone v Eyre (1779) 1 Hy Bl 273; 126 ER 160, swept away these arid technicalities … The fact that the emphasis in the earlier cases was upon the breach by one party to the contract of his contractual undertakings, for this was the commonest circumstance in which the question arose, tended to obscure the fact that it was really the event resulting from the breach which relieved the other party of further performance of his obligations; but the principle was applied early in the 19th century and without analysis to cases where the event relied upon was one brought about by a party to a contract before the time for performance of his undertakings arose but which would make it impossible to perform those obligations when the time to do so did arrive … It was not, however, until Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co Ltd that it was recognised that it was the happening of the event and not the fact that the event was the result of a breach by one party of his contractual obligations that relieved the other party from further performance of his obligations.

"There are the cases" said Bramwell B (at 147) "which hold that, where the shipowner has not merely broken his contract, but has so broken it that the condition precedent is not performed, the charterer is discharged: … Why? Not merely because [69] the contract is broken. If it is not a condition precedent, what matters is whether it is unperformed with or without excuse? Not arriving with due diligence, or at a day named is the subject of a cross-action only. But not arriving in time for the voyage contemplated, but at such a time that it is frustrated, is not only a breach of contract, but discharges the charterer. And so it should, though he has such an excuse that no action lies."

Once it is appreciated that it is the event and not the fact that the event is a result of a breach of contract which relieves the party not in default of further performance of his obligations, two consequences follow:

(1) the test whether the event relied upon has this consequence is the same whether the event is the result of the other party's breach of contract or not, as Devlin J pointed out in Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 QB 401 at 434;

(2) the question whether an event which is the result of the other party's breach of contract has this consequence cannot be answered by treating all contractual undertakings as falling into one of two separate categories: "conditions" the breach of which gives rise to an event which relieves the party not in default of further performance of his obligations, and "warranties" the breach of which does not give rise to such an event.

Lawyers tend to speak of this classification as if it were comprehensive, partly for the historical reasons which I have already mentioned and partly because Parliament itself adopted it in the Sale of Goods

Act 1893, as respects a number of implied terms in contracts for the sale of goods and has in that Act used the expressions "condition" and "warranty" in that meaning. But it is by no means true of contractual undertakings in general at common law. No doubt there are many simple contractual undertakings, sometimes express but more often because of their very simplicity ("It goes without saying") to be implied, of which it can be predicated that every breach of such an undertaking must give rise to an event which will deprive the party not in default of substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he should obtain from the contract. And such a stipulation, unless the parties have agreed that breach of it shall not entitle the non-defaulting party to treat the contract as repudiated, is a [70] "condition". So too there may be other simple contractual undertakings of which it can be predicated that no breach can give rise to an event which will deprive the party not in default of substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he should obtain from the contract; and such a stipulation, unless the parties have agreed that breach of it shall entitle the non-defaulting party to treat the contract as repudiated, is a "warranty". There are, however, many contractual undertakings of a more complex character which cannot be categorised as being "conditions" or "warranties" if the late 19th century meaning adopted in the Sale of Goods Act 1893, and used by Bowen LJ in Bentsen v Taylor Sons & Co (No 2) [1893] 2 QB 274 at 280; 9 TLR 552 (CA), be given to those terms. Of such undertakings all that can be predicated is that some breaches will and others will not give rise to an event which will deprive the party not in default of substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he should obtain from the contract; and the legal consequences of a breach of such an undertaking, unless provided for expressly in the contract, depend upon the nature of the event to which the breach gives rise and do not follow automatically from a prior classification of the undertaking as a "condition" or a "warranty". For instance, to take Bramwell B's example in Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co Ltd itself, breach of an undertaking by a shipowner to sail with all possible dispatch to a named port does not necessarily relieve the charterer of further performance of his obligation under the charterparty, but if the breach is so prolonged that the contemplated voyage is frustrated it does have this effect.

In 1874, when the doctrine of frustration was being foaled by "impossibility of performance" out of "condition precedent" it is not surprising that the explanation given by Bramwell B should give full credit to the dam by suggesting that in addition to the express warranty to sail with all possible dispatch there was an implied condition precedent that the ship should arrive at the named port in time for the voyage contemplated. In Jackson v Union Marine Insurance Co Ltd there was no breach of the express warranty; but if there had been, to engraft the implied condition upon the express warranty would have been merely a more complicated way of saying that a breach of a shipowner's undertaking to sail with all possible dispatch may, but will not necessarily, give rise to an event which will deprive the charterer [71] of substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he should obtain from the charter. Now that the doctrine of frustration has matured and flourished for nearly a century and the old technicalities of pleading "conditions precedent" are more than a century out of date, it does not clarify, but on the contrary obscures, the modern principle of law where such an event has occurred as a result of a breach of an express stipulation in a contract, to continue to add the now unnecessary colophon "Therefore it was an implied condition of the contract that a particular kind of breach of an express warranty should not occur." The common law evolves not merely by breeding new principles but also, when they are fully grown, by burying their ancestors.

As my brethren have already pointed out, the shipowners' undertaking to tender a seaworthy ship has, as a result of numerous decisions as to what can amount to "unseaworthiness", become one of the most complex of contractual undertakings. It embraces obligations with respect to every part of the hull and machinery, stores and equipment and the crew itself. It can be broken by the presence of trivial defects easily and rapidly remediable as well as by defects which must inevitably result in a total loss of the vessel. Consequently the problem in this case, is in my view, neither solved nor soluble by debating whether the shipowner's express or implied undertaking to tender a seaworthy ship is a "condition" or a "warranty". It is like so many other contractual terms an undertaking one breach of which may give rise to an event which relieves the charterer of further performance of his undertakings if he so elects and another breach of which may not give rise to such an event but entitles him only to monetary compensation in the form of damages. It is, with all deference to Mr Roskill's skilful argument, by no means surprising that among the many hundreds of previous cases about the shipowner's undertaking to deliver a seaworthy ship there is none where it was found profitable to discuss in the judgments the question whether that undertaking is a "condition" or a "warranty"; for the true answer, as I have already indicated, is that it is neither, but one of that large class of contractual undertakings one breach of which may have the same effect as that ascribed to a breach of "condition" under the Sale of Goods Act 1893, and a different breach of which may have only the same effect as that ascribed to a breach of "warranty" under that Act …

What the judge had to do in the present case as in any other case where one party to a contract relies upon a breach by the other as giving him a right to elect to rescind the contract, was to look at the events which had occurred as a result of the breach at the time at which the charterers purported to rescind the charterparty and to decide whether the occurrence of those events deprived the charterers of substantially the whole benefit which it was the intention of the parties as expressed in the charterparty that the charterers should obtain from the further performance of their own contractual undertakings … The question which the judge had to ask himself was, as he rightly decided, whether or not at the date when the charterers purported to rescind the contract, namely 6 June 1957, or when the shipowners purported to accept such rescission, namely 8 August 1957, the delay which had already occurred as a result of the incompetence of the engine room staff, and the delay which was likely to occur in repairing the engines of the vessel and the conduct of the shipowners by that date in taking steps to remedy [73] these two matters, were when taken together, such as to deprive the charterers of substantially the whole benefit which it was the intention of the parties they should obtain from further use of the vessel under the charterparty.

In my view, in his judgment – on which I would not seek to improve – the judge took into account and gave due weight to all the relevant considerations and arrived at the right answer for the right reasons.

[SELLERS LJ considered the relevant clauses to be warranties. UPJOHN LJ was of the opinion that where a term was not a condition, the question was whether the breach of the term went to the root of the contract.]

Ankar v National Westminster Finance (Aust)

[21.50] Ankar Pty Ltd v National Westminster Finance (Aust) Ltd (1987) 162 CLR 549 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Ankar Pty Ltd (Ankar) entered into an agreement with National Westminster Finance (Australia) Ltd, previously called Lombard Australia Ltd (Lombard), guaranteeing the performance of a hirer General Energy (Manufacturing) Pty Ltd (Manufacturing) under a contract for the hire of machinery. Under cl 8 of the agreement, Lombard agreed, inter alia, to notify Ankar if Manufacturing proposed to sell or assign its interest in the machinery. Under cl 9, Lombard agreed to notify Ankar if Manufacturing was in default under the lease, whereupon Lombard and Ankar were to consult about the course of action Lombard would take following the default. Manufacturing defaulted under the contract of hire and thereafter assigned its interest in the machinery to its parent company. Lombard consented to the assignment. Lombard did not notify Ankar of Manufacturing's proposal to assign. Lombard also failed to notify Ankar before the assignment that Manufacturing was in default under the contract. Nor was there any consultation between Lombard and Ankar to determine what course of action Lombard would take. Ankar brought an action in the Supreme Court of New South Wales for a declaration that it was released from its obligations under the Agreement. The trial judge made the declaration. An appeal by Lombard to the Court of Appeal was allowed. Ankar then appealed, by special leave, to the High Court.]

MASON ACJ, WILSON, BRENNAN AND DAWSON JJ: [553] [This appeal] raises an important question of principle: In what circumstances does a creditor's breach of a contract of guarantee discharge the surety from liability under that contract? … [555] The critical issue is whether Lombard's breaches of the Security Deposit Agreement discharged Ankar from its obligations under that agreement …

The appellant's case was that it was discharged from liability on the ground that the breaches of cll 8 and 9 were breaches of essential conditions or, alternatively, on the ground that they were material breaches of the contract of guarantee. It was not in controversy that a surety is discharged from its obligation under a contract of suretyship by the creditor's breach of an essential condition, so long at any rate as the surety treats the contract as at an end. On the other hand Lombard strongly contested the notion that a surety is discharged by anything less than a breach of an essential term or a breach going to the root of the contract. According to Lombard, discharge of the surety for breach of the suretyship contract by the creditor is governed by the ordinary principles of the law of contract, there being no special rule applicable to contracts of suretyship.

Unfortunately the decided cases do not speak with a single voice on the issues presented by these arguments. On the contrary, support can be found in the authorities for a variety of discordant propositions relating to the discharge of the surety. For the moment we shall pass them by with a view to stating as briefly as may be the relevant principles of the general law of contract as they apply to the discharge of the surety's obligations under the suretyship contract for breach of it by the creditor.

Breach of an essential term or a breach going to the root of the contract will of course discharge the surety from future liability if the surety elects to rescind for breach. The expression "essential term" perhaps needs some elaboration in the context of suretyship because it is said sometimes that a surety is discharged by non-fulfilment of a condition precedent and at other times that a surety is discharged by the creditor's breach of a condition. A condition precedent may be unfulfilled without any breach of contract, but when performance by the creditor of a contractual promise is a condition precedent to the liability of the surety under a contract of [556] suretyship which otherwise involves no more than a guarantee of payment of the debt owing to that creditor, the creditor's promise is necessarily an essential term of the contract. The terms of the contract itself demonstrate that the surety would not have entered into the contract of suretyship unless he had been assured of a strict performance of the promise: see Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd v Luna Park (NSW) Ltd (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 632, 641–2; Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks (1951) 83 CLR 322, 337; DTR Nominees Pty Ltd v Mona Homes Pty Ltd (1978) 138 CLR 423, 430–1. Conversely, when a contractual promise is a condition, performance of the promise, if the promisee so elects, is treated as a condition precedent to the promisee's executory obligations. Acceptance that a promissory condition operated in this way was the very foundation of the illuminating judgment of Bowen LJ in Bentsen v Taylor, Sons & Co [1893] 2 QB 274, at 281, where his Lordship, in deciding whether a provision was a condition or a warranty, spoke of the need to determine "whether the intention of the parties, as gathered from the instrument itself, will best be carried out by treating the promise as a warranty sounding only in damages, or as a condition precedent by the failure to perform which the other party is relieved of his liability": see also Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 QB 26, 60, 69–70; Bunge Corporation v Tradax SA [1981] 1 WLR 711, 717, 718, 721, 725. In the context of suretyship contracts there has been a natural tendency to refer to the creditor's promise as a condition precedent rather than as a condition. This is because many guarantees are unilateral instruments, containing no promises on the part of the creditor except in so far as the recital of the consideration may refer to such a promise: see, eg, United Dominions Trust (Commercial) Ltd v Eagle Aircraft Services Ltd [1968] 1 WLR 74 which, though not involving a guarantee, concerned a unilateral undertaking. This tendency in no way affects the discussion in the preceding paragraph. In deciding whether a promise has the status and effect of a condition, courts are not too ready to construe a term as a condition and, at least where other considerations are finely balanced, will hold that a term is of such a kind that breach of it does not give rise to an automatic right to rescind. This approach is explained by a preference for a construction that will encourage performance rather [557] than avoidance of contractual obligations: Cehave NV v Bremer mbH [1976] QB 44, at pp 70–1; Bunge Corporation [1981] 1 WLR, pp 715–16.

Three factors favouring an interpretation of cll 8 and 9 that gives them the status of conditions may be mentioned. First, in the event of breach, neither clause is readily enforceable by way of an action for damages. Damages for breach would be difficult to prove. Secondly, the two clauses impose an obligation to give the surety notice and the purpose of imposing an obligation to give that notice is to enable the surety to take such action as it can to safeguard its position and its interests. Notice of default would alert the appellant to the immediacy of its risk, enable it to persuade the debtor to remedy the default and put possible alternative proposals to Lombard for its consideration. Notice of a proposed assignment would possibly enable the appellant to make suggestions for the disposition of the debtor's interest in the machinery to the best advantage. Thirdly, as Deane J explains in his judgment, it was clearly disadvantageous to the surety to be faced with a situation in which it would be liable as surety for a lessee of equipment who no longer enjoyed possession of that equipment, notwithstanding that it remained liable to pay the rent.

On the other hand the provisions are not expressed to be conditions. No time is fixed within which notice is to be given: cf Midland Counties Motor Finance Co Ltd v Slade [1951] 1 KB 346, at p 351; United Dominions Trust (Commercial) Ltd [1968] 1 WLR 74. And the language in which the clauses are expressed does not provide a clear indication that they were intended to be fundamental obligations or to operate as conditions. If the contract in the present case were to be viewed as an ordinary contract without regard to its special character as a suretyship contract, we incline to think that the factors already mentioned would establish cll 8 and 9 to be conditions. It is necessary to take into account as well the special character of a suretyship contract and of the relationship that it creates between the parties. As appears later, when this is done, the relevant obligations in cll 8 and 9 are seen clearly to have the status of conditions. As a preliminary to a consideration of this matter it is necessary to examine the special principle, said to apply to a suretyship contract, that the surety is discharged from its obligations by the creditor's breach of that contract, so long at any rate as the breach materially prejudices the interests of the surety. [559] … [The] principle is the by-product, not so much of the general law of contract, as of the special relationship between creditor and surety arising out of the suretyship contract upon which equity fastened to protect the surety when the creditor's conduct affected the surety's liability: Holme v Brunskill (1877) 3 QBD 495, 505. According to the English cases, the principle applies so as to discharge the surety when conduct on the part of the creditor has the effect of altering the surety's rights, unless the alteration is unsubstantial and not prejudicial to the surety. The rule does not permit the courts to inquire into the effect of the alteration. The consequence is that, to hold the surety to its bargain, the creditor must show that the nature of the alteration can be beneficial to the surety only or that by its nature it cannot in any circumstances increase the surety's risk, eg, a reduction in the [560] debtor's debt or in the interest payable by the surety. The mere possibility of detriment is enough to bring about the discharge of the surety.

The foundation of the rule is that the creditor, by varying the principal contract or extending time, has altered the surety's rights without consulting it though the surety has an interest in the principal contract, and that the creditor cannot be permitted to do: see Rees v Berrington (1795) 2 Ves Jun 540; 30 ER 765. Thus the liability of the surety was seen to be strictissimi juris and the suretyship contract was construed strictly in his favour. In the United States the rule of strict construction, though applied in favour of sureties who receive no reward, is not applied to a compensated surety, ie, a surety for reward. On the contrary the suretyship contract is construed against the compensated surety. This is largely because surety bonds are thought to resemble insurance contracts, the premiums are calculated against estimated risks and the contracts incorporate forms prepared by the surety. The United States approach may be partly due to a belief that the rule of strict construction, as it has been applied in England, is over-zealous in its protection of the surety: see Cardozo, The Nature of the Judicial Process (1921), pp 152 et seq; Stearns, Law of Suretyship, 5th ed (1951), §5.1; New York Law Revision Commission Annual Report (1937), pp 891–5; "Guarantee – Effect upon Guarantor's Liability of Subsequent Agreement between Creditor and Principal Debtor", Notes and Comments, Australian Law Journal, vol 8 (1934), p 58. According to the law as it has developed in the United States, the surety company must show some injury before it will be absolved from the contract (Chapman v Hoage (1936) 296 US 526, 530), and then it will be discharged pro tanto to the extent of the damage or prejudice it suffers: American Jurisprudence (2d) vol 74, "Suretyship", §259. In accordance with this approach, a surety company is discharged by the creditor giving the debtor an extension of time only if it is shown that the extension is a material variance in the sense that it results in material harm or prejudice to the surety: Guaranty Co v Pressed Brick Co (1903) 191 US 416.

Lombard does not submit that we should adopt the United States approach. For this reason, if no other, it would be inappropriate to take this course. However, it is of some importance to note that the different approach taken in the United States with respect to the special principle rests on the view that it arises not so much from the [561] terms of the suretyship contract, as from the relationship between the parties which the contract creates.

However, the fundamental question still remains: Is the rule of strict construction, derived from the equitable rule which protects the surety from any alteration in its liability, subsumed in the general principles of the law of contract so that the surety may treat itself as discharged from liability if, but only if, the breach is such as to entitle the surety at law to rescind the contract? In truth there is no difference between the equitable rule and the legal rule, as Lord Selborne LC pointed out in In re Sherry; London & County Banking Co v Terry (1884) 25 Ch D 692, 703. There, in a passage accepted by the Privy Council in National Bank of Nigeria Ltd v Awolesi [1964] 1 WLR 1311, 1316, his Lordship said: "A surety is undoubtedly and not unjustly the object of some favour both at law and in equity, and I do not know that the rules of law and equity differ on the subject."

At law, as in equity, the traditional view is that the liability of the surety is strictissimi juris and that ambiguous contractual provisions should be construed in favour of the surety. The doctrine of strictissimi juris provides a counterpoise to the law's preference for a construction that reads a provision otherwise than as a condition. A doubt as to the status of a provision in a guarantee should therefore be resolved in favour of the surety and so the provision should be interpreted as a condition, or perhaps as an innominate term, instead of a mere warranty. If the surety is to be discharged for breach of a promissory term in the suretyship contract, the justification for the discharge must be that the creditor has failed to comply with a provision that, as a matter of interpretation, requires strict performance as a condition precedent to the surety's obligation or at least requires substantial performance of the promise such that the surety would not have entered into the contract if it had not been assured that there would not be a breach such as the breach which in fact occurred. If on its true interpretation the term is not intended so to operate, it is not easy to understand why the surety should be discharged by its breach. Of course, in construing the contract the court is entitled to look to the general setting in which the contract has come into existence: see, eg, the discussion in Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, at pp 996–7.

Since the judgment of Diplock LJ in Hongkong Fir [1962] 2 QB 26 it has [562] been recognized in England that a term in a contract may stand somewhere between a condition and a warranty. Such an intermediate or innominate term, it has been held, is capable of operating, according to the gravity of the breach, as either a condition or a warranty. In Hongkong Fir the obligation of seaworthiness was readily classified as innominate because a breach of the obligation might be trivial, making damages an adequate remedy, or grave, in which event it should have effect as a breach of condition. The innominate term brings a greater flexibility to the law of contract, as Lord Wilberforce has remarked on more than one occasion: Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, 998; Bunge Corporation [1981] 1 WLR 711, 715–16. Although nothing less than a serious breach of an innominate term entitles the innocent party to treat the contract as at an end, the breaches of cll 8 and 9 merit this description.

Whether provisions of the kind found in cll 8 and 9 are provisions which, if they cannot be described as conditions, can be described accurately as innominate terms is a question of some difficulty. In Bunge Corporation, Lord Wilberforce suggested [1981] 1 WLR 711, 715 that a time clause is not susceptible of treatment as an innominate clause because it can give rise to one kind of breach only – to be late. If this suggestion be well founded, and we would not wish to be taken as implying that it is, there might be a problem in treating the provisions of cll 8 and 9, especially cl 9, as innominate terms.

Be this as it may, returning to the earlier discussion of the two provisions in the context of conditions, the special characteristics of the suretyship relationship and the fact that it creates a liability strictissimi juris on the part of the surety are enough, when added to the factors mentioned earlier in this judgment, to justify treating the relevant obligations in the two provisions as conditions, breach of which, at Ankar's option, discharged it from performance of its obligations under the Security Deposit Agreement to the extent to which they related to the sum of $125 000.

In the result we would allow the appeals.

[21.55] DEANE J: [571] The limits of the rights and liabilities of the parties to the particular relationship of guarantor and principal creditor are consensual and it is impermissible to approach the identification of the special rules defining the prima facie limits of the consensual rights and liabilities of the parties to a particular category of relationship in a way that effectively denies their special character by forcing them into the formalized terms appropriate to the expression of universal principle. Put differently, special rules which prima facie (in the sense of being subject to contrary agreement) define the rights and liabilities of the parties to a particular category of consensual relationship, such as that between guarantor and creditor or that between partners, are essentially concerned with presumptions of contractual intention. There is no warrant, either in principle or in utility, for distorting them into statements of immutable and overriding principle.

[572] [It] seems to me that, regardless of what be the precise qualification, Lombard's departure from its obligations under cll 8 and 9 was plainly of the seriousness or substantiality necessary to preclude the existence of the circumstances under which Ankar had agreed to be liable as surety for the default of Manufacturing …

Koompahtoo Local Aboriginal Land Council v Sanpine

[21.60] Koompahtoo Local Aboriginal Land Council v Sanpine Pty Ltd [2007] HCA 61; (2007) 233 CLR 115 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: In July 1997, Koompahtoo and Sanpine entered into a joint venture agreement for the development of commercial land. Sanpine agreed to manage the development and Koompahtoo contributed the land to be developed. Clause 16 of the development agreement imposed many obligations on Sanpine including the obligation to establish a development program and to prepare the annual accounts of the joint venture. For example, cl 16.5(a) provided that "Sanpine shall ensure that proper Books are kept so as to permit the affairs of the Joint Venture to be duly assessed. Financial records comprised in the Books shall be kept in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles and in such a manner as enables the Venturers to extract from the Books any information in relation to the affairs of the Joint Venture as that Venturer may reasonably require from time to time". Clauses 12 and 16 of the agreement obliged Sanpine to prepare and submit to the management committee reports showing the expenditure incurred by the joint venture and the progress of development. Such reports were never prepared. Clause 16 also made specific provision as to how the project funds were to be dealt with. The specified requirements were not complied with. There were no meaningful joint venture accounts, and the records that had been kept by Sanpine failed to justify significant debts claimed by Sanpine to be chargeable to the joint venture. Furthermore, requests made to Sanpine for financial information were met with what the trial judge described as "evasion and prevarication".

Sanpine's breaches of the joint venture agreement were revealed when Koompahtoo went into administration, and Sanpine was unable to inform the administrator of the true financial position of the joint venture and how the money borrowed from financiers had been applied. On the basis of these breaches, the administrator terminated the joint venture agreement, alleging that Sanpine's conduct constituted repudiatory conduct. Sanpine commenced proceedings seeking a declaration that Koompahtoo's termination of the joint venture agreement was invalid.

At trial, Campbell J did not attempt to determine whether the terms breached were essential terms. Instead, his Honour assumed that the terms breached were intermediate terms and held that the repeated breaches of these terms amounted to repudiatory conduct. There is some uncertainty whether the finding that Koompahtoo could terminate the contract was based on a finding that its breach of intermediate terms had sufficiently serious consequences to justify termination or on a finding that Sanpine's breaches were repudiatory in nature. The High Court reasoned that as his Honour made no finding about the intention evinced by Sanpine (the requisite test of repudiation), his Honour's decision must have been based on breach of innominate terms.

In any event, Campbell J's finding was overturned on appeal to the NSW Court of Appeal. Giles JA (with whom Tobias JA agreed) focused his attention on whether Sanpine's conduct was repudiatory. As Koompahtoo representatives had not pressed Sanpine about its breaches, it could not be said that Sanpine had evinced an intention not to be bound by the contract. Giles JA also held that the terms breached were not conditions, nor were the consequences of the breaches sufficiently serious to allow Koompahtoo to terminate on the basis of breach of intermediate terms. Koompahtoo appealed to the High Court.]

GLEESON CJ, GUMMOW, HEYDON and CRENNAN JJ: [136] Leaving to one side remedies of injunction to restrain breaches of contract, or specific performance to enforce contractual obligations, the ordinary remedy for breach of contract is an award of damages. Termination of a contract in response to breach, where permitted, may alter substantially the allocation of risk accepted by the parties. The consequences of termination for the parties may be affected by external circumstances such as market fluctuations (see G H Treitel, Remedies for Breach of Contract, Clarendon Press, Oxford, 1988). At the same time, there are cases in which damages are not an adequate remedy, and it would be irrational and unjust to bind one party to an ongoing contractual relationship notwithstanding the other's default. The appellants say that binding Koompahtoo to a long-term joint venture with Sanpine is such a case. This, however, is not a suit for the dissolution of a partnership, and it is the law of contract that is to be applied.

For present purposes, there are two relevant circumstances in which a breach of contract by one party may entitle the other to terminate. The first is where the obligation with which there has been failure to comply has been agreed by the contracting parties to be essential. Such an obligation is sometimes described as a condition. In Australian law, a well-known exposition was that of Jordan CJ in Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd v Luna Park (NSW) Ltd (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 632, 641-2, who, in comparing conditions and warranties, employed language reflected in many statutory provisions.

[138] The second relevant circumstance is where there has been a sufficiently serious breach of a non-essential term. In Hong Kong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 QB 26 the English Court of Appeal was concerned with a stipulation as to seaworthiness in a charterparty. Breaches of such a stipulation could vary widely in importance. They could be trivial or serious. The Court of Appeal held that to the accepted distinction between "conditions" and "warranties"; that is, between stipulations that were in their nature essential and [103] others, there must be added a distinction, operative within the class of non-essential obligations, between breaches that are significantly serious to justify termination and other breaches. This was a recognition that, although as a matter of construction of a contract it may not be the case that any breach of a given term will entitle the other party to terminate, some breaches of such a term may do so. Diplock LJ said [at 69-70] that the question whether a breach by one party relieves the other of further performance of his obligations cannot always be answered by treating a contractual undertaking as either a "condition" or a "warranty". Of some stipulations "all that can be predicated is that some breaches will and others will not give rise to an event which will deprive the party not in default of substantially the whole benefit which it was intended that he should obtain from the contract; and the legal consequences of a breach of such an [139] undertaking, unless provided for expressly in the contract, depend upon the nature of the event to which the breach gives rise". …

It may be true that this court has yet to accept Hong Kong Fir as an essential element in the grounds for decision in any particular case. However, in Ankar Pty Ltd v National Westminster Finance (Aust) Ltd (1987) 162 CLR 549, 562 Mason ACJ, Wilson, Brennan and Dawson JJ referred to Hong Kong Fir with evident approval and said that the concept of the intermediate and innominate term brings a greater [104] flexibility to the law of contract. With that in mind, it was entirely appropriate for Campbell J to proceed with an analysis of the facts in which Hong Kong Fir was applied.

The practical utility of a classification which includes intermediate terms, and the consequent greater flexibility of which the court spoke in Ankar, appears from several consequences. First, the interests of justice are promoted by limiting rights to rescind to instances of serious and substantial breaches of contract. Secondly, a just outcome is facilitated in cases where the breach is of a term which is inessential.

[140] As will appear later in these reasons, we rest our decision in the appeal not upon the ground of breach of an essential obligation, but upon application of the doctrine respecting intermediate terms …

[145] The approach of Campbell J was correct. The focus of attention should be the contract, and the nature and seriousness of the breaches. [146] There being, at this stage, no concern with waiver, estoppel, variation or forbearance, the intention that is relevant is the common intention of the parties, at the time of the contract, as to the importance of the relevant terms and as to the consequences of failure to comply with those terms. This is a question of construction of the contract to be decided in the light of its commercial purpose and the business relationship it established. The contract established a joint venture for a land development project of considerable size and complexity, to be carried out over a number of years. Koompahtoo brought to the joint venture its land. Sanpine brought its management and financial expertise. Sanpine's obligations as to dealing with joint venture funds (which were borrowed on the security of Koompahtoo's land) and maintaining proper books and accounts were of importance, not only to working out the ultimate result of the joint venture when the land had been developed and sold, but also to enabling the parties (and a person such as the administrator) to know material facts, and to make decisions and judgments informed by that knowledge. The inability of Sanpine to inform the administrator, or even the trial judge, of the true financial position of the joint venture, and to produce informative joint venture accounts, exemplifies the point. It was not within the contemplation of the contract that it should have been necessary for Koompahtoo, at any time, to have engaged in extensive legal process in order to find out what had become of the money borrowed on the security of its land, or to assess the financial state of the joint venture.

Although Campbell J was prepared to make the contrary assumption, there is much to be said for the view that the obligation contained in the first sentence of cl 16.5(a) was essential. Sanpine was to ensure that proper books (a defined term) were kept so as to permit the affairs of the joint venture to be duly assessed. "Books" was defined, in cl 1.1, to mean the accounting, financial and other documents and records of the joint venture. The purpose of para (a), and, in particular, the first sentence, is emphasised by para (b) of cl 16.5, which entitled each venturer to inspect the books at any time and receive such information and explanations as that venturer might require. Enabling the affairs of the joint venture to be duly assessed involved assessment with reasonable facility and within a reasonable time. Campbell J held, and it was accepted in the Court of Appeal, that there was a breach of cl 16.5(a). Giles JA said, and Campbell J was willing to assume, that a breach of cl 16.5(a) could be trivial. The clause, however, contains more than one obligation. An obligation to keep books and records in accordance with generally accepted accounting standards might be contravened in an immaterial way, and one would not attribute to the parties a common intention that any breach of such an obligation would justify termination. What, however, of the first sentence of para (a)? On its true construction, it required Sanpine to ensure that it kept such books and accounts as would permit the affairs of the joint venture to be assessed with reasonable facility and within a reasonable time. It is difficult to resist a conclusion that [147] such an obligation was essential. The ability to make an assessment of the affairs of the joint venture, at all times from the commencement of the agreement, was vital. Koompahtoo was providing the land to be developed. It was subject to legislative control of the use that could be made lawfully of its assets. It was subject to regulatory scrutiny. Decisions as to borrowing upon the security of its land, and undertaking commitments for the future, required a capacity to assess, at any time, and from time to time, the affairs of the venture.

In one sense, the breaches of cl 16.5 may have been so obvious, and so numerous, as to distract attention from the consideration that, within cl 16.5(a), there was an obligation of basic importance. The clearest evidence of breach of that obligation was what occurred when Mr Lawler was appointed administrator. He was unable to assess the affairs of the joint venture. Plainly, Sanpine was unable to provide him (and was later unable to provide the trial judge) with proper joint venture books and accounts that would permit such assessment. It is no answer to say that, given sufficient time, and with sufficient effort, it might have been possible to reconstruct, from such records as had been kept within Sanpine, an approximation of accounts which would reveal the financial position of the joint venture. The purpose of cl 16.5 went beyond enabling approximate assessment of the financial position of the joint venture after a prolonged inquiry or litigation. However, we do not rest our decision upon the ground of breach of an essential obligation.

Even if one were to accept that all of the contractual obligations with which Sanpine failed to comply were inessential in that, on the true construction of the contract, not every breach would justify termination and that the obligations were intermediate terms in the sense earlier discussed, nevertheless, as Campbell J and Bryson JA held, the breaches of Sanpine were in a number of respects gross, and their consequences were serious. Once again, the experience of the administrator following his appointment, and the unsuccessful attempts at the hearing before Campbell J to explain the use of all the funds borrowed on the security of Koompahtoo's land, demonstrate that the breaches found by Campbell J, and in particular the breaches of cl 16.5, went to the root of the contract. As a matter of construction of the contract, it ought to be accepted that breaches of that order deprived Koompahtoo of a substantial part of the benefit for which it contracted. Such breaches justified termination. On that ground, we would uphold the decision of the primary judge …

KIRBY J: [152] Campbell J, referring to leading Australian texts on contract law, identified two basic but different taxonomies as to the right to terminate a contract at common law. The first was drawn from Professor John Carter's text Breach of Contract (citation omitted) and the second from Dr N C Seddon and Associate Professor M P Ellinghaus's eighth Australian edition of Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract (citation omitted).

[153] Both taxonomies arrange the decisional law into a tripartite scheme of classification. Both recognise that a right to terminate will arise in respect either of a breach of an "essential" term or "repudiation" (in the sense of conduct manifesting that one of the parties is unable or unwilling to perform). It is over the character of the third class of circumstances authorising termination that the taxonomies diverge. Professor Carter postulates that a right to terminate exists at common law in respect of "a sufficiently serious breach of an intermediate term". Dr Seddon and Associate Professor Ellinghaus, on the other hand, state that a right to terminate will arise in respect of a "[b]reach causing substantial loss of benefit"; that is, a "breach consisting of a failure to perform which has the effect of depriving the injured party of the substantial benefit of the contract" …

[158] I would endorse the argument advanced in the ninth Australian edition of Cheshire and Fifoot (citation omitted):

> It is difficult to see the necessity for introducing [an "intermediate"] category of terms as a means of legitimising termination by reference to the extent of loss actually caused by a breach. Unless otherwise agreed, a breach that substantially deprives the other party of the benefit of a contract should entitle that party to terminate it, no matter whether the term in question is essential, intermediate, or inessential. The identification of a third kind of term distinct from, and intervening between, essential terms (conditions) and inessential terms (warranties), further proliferates an already over-elaborate terminology, and is an obvious invitation to circularity of reasoning. Many judgments acknowledge, even if only indirectly, that loss of substantial benefit may be sufficient as such to justify termination by the injured party.

Of the two taxonomies set out in the reasons of Campbell J, I prefer that proposed by Dr Seddon and Associate Professor Ellinghaus in the Australian edition of Cheshire and Fifoot. I regard it as a correct statement of the common law of Australia. Thus, a right to terminate arises in respect of: (1) breach of an essential term; (2) breach of a non-essential term causing substantial loss of benefit; or (3) repudiation (in the sense of "renunciation"). The common thread uniting the three categories is conduct inconsistent with the fundamental postulate of the contractual agreement.

This scheme of classification affords the requisite "flexibility" to ensure just outcomes in individual cases – a proper concern upon which the joint reasons rightly place emphasis. However, it avoids the need to invent so-called "intermediate terms". It also simplifies the determination of the consequences of breach of a contractual term, removing needless steps from the process of reasoning. Under taxonomies incorporating the "intermediate term", a finding that a term has been breached requires a determination of whether that term is essential or non-essential. If it is the latter, the court must then inquire as to whether it is of an "intermediate" character. If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, the court must make a further determination of whether the breach was of "sufficient seriousness" to warrant termination. The latter two steps are interrelated. However, when the "intermediate term" is excluded, the process of reasoning is simplified and clarified. Either the term breached is essential or it is non-essential. It cannot somehow be somewhere in between. If it is the former, termination will be justified. If it is the latter, the court can turn its attention directly to the objective indicia of "substantial loss of benefit" without feeling a need to affix the "intermediate" label on the contractual terms ex post facto.

I would prefer to decide the case on this footing. I express this preference because the holding in the joint reasons will now endorse the Hong Kong Fir doctrine as part of the common law of Australia. I cannot agree in that result. Before that doctrine passes into endorsement by this court as a binding rule of Australian law. I have endeavoured to explain its theoretical and practical imperfections [160] and to set out an alternative and preferable expression of the governing common law rule. It produces the same outcome in this case. However, it does so without resort to the unpersuasive classification that is now upheld and applied. …

In the circumstances of the case, I consider that the breaches established had, as a matter of fact, the effect of depriving Koompahtoo of the substantial benefit of the contract. That benefit in large part comprised the application of Sanpine's expertise in management to the joint venture project. The defaults of Sanpine undercut that benefit to a significant extent … [161] It follows that the appeal succeeds. The defaults of Sanpine were such as to vindicate Koompahtoo's termination of the agreement. Given the context, those defaults deprived Koompahtoo of the substantial benefit of the agreement. There is no need to appeal to the elusive and contestable concept of intermediate or innominate terms. So I would not do so. The Court of Appeal erred in its approach and in its conclusions. The orders of Campbell J should be restored for the reasons that I have explained.

Appeal allowed.

THE CONCEPT OF REPUDIATION

[22.05] Where one party manifests an unwillingness or inability to perform his or her obligations under the contract, the other party may have the right to terminate. Traditionally, the party who is unwilling or unable to perform the contract has been said to have repudiated the contract. However, more recently the High Court appears to have adopted new terminology. For example, in Koompahtoo Local Aboriginal Land Council v Sanpine Pty Ltd [2007] HCA 61; (2007) 233 CLR 115, [44] the majority used the term renunciation to describe conduct of a party who is no longer willing or able to perform the contract. The majority also suggested that the term repudiation should be used to describe any breach of contract which justifies termination by the other party. However, in the following discussion the traditional terminology is used.

Hargrave J in Earney v Australian Property Investment Strategic Pty Ltd [2010] VSC 621, [77] set out a summary of the relevant legal principles concerning repudiation:

(1) The term repudiation is used in a number of senses. Relevantly, the High Court has recently stated that repudiation:

> may refer to conduct which evinces an unwillingness or an inability to render substantial performance of the contract. This is sometimes described as conduct of a party which evinces an intention no longer to be bound by the contract or to fulfil it only in a manner substantially inconsistent with the party's obligations. It be may [sic] termed renunciation. The test is whether the conduct of one party is such as to convey to a reasonable person, in the situation of the other party, renunciation either of the contract as a whole or of a fundamental obligation under it,

(2) It is not necessary to prove a subjective intention to repudiate. The test is an objective one.

(3) Whether there has been repudiation is a question of fact.

(4) Repudiation is not to be inferred lightly. It is a serious matter.

(5) Repudiation may be evidenced by a single act or by an accumulation of conduct in circumstances where no individual act on its own constitutes a repudiation.

(6) Repudiation does not bring an end to a contract. It is necessary for the innocent party to elect to accept the repudiation.

(7) Repudiatory conduct may be 'cured' by the party in breach, but only prior to the acceptance of the repudiation. Accordingly, once the innocent party has elected to terminate the contract for breach, it cannot thereafter be cured.

Repudiation and anticipatory breach

[22.10] An important aspect of the doctrine of repudiation is known as anticipatory breach. Anticipatory breach occurs when one party repudiates his or her obligations under the contract prior to the time set for performance of those obligations. In such a case, the aggrieved party will be entitled to terminate the contract. The aggrieved party may then immediately sue for damages for breach of the contract even though the date for performance by the repudiating party has not yet arrived. Termination for anticipatory breach does not affect the measure of damages available to the aggrieved party except insofar as it brings into immediate operation the duty of the aggrieved party to mitigate his or her damages. If, on the other hand, the aggrieved party chooses not to accept a repudiation occurring before the time set for performance, not only will the contract continue on foot but there will be no right to damages unless and until an actual breach occurs.

Reasons for the doctrine of repudiation

> [I]t is surely more rational, and more for the benefit of both parties, that, after the renunciation of the agreement by the defendant, the plaintiff should be at liberty to consider himself absolved from any future performance of it, retaining the right to sue for any damage he has suffered from the breach of it. Thus, instead of remaining idle and laying out money in preparations which must be useless, he is at liberty to seek service under another [contracting party], which would go in mitigation of the damages to which he would otherwise be entitled for breach of the contract: Hochster v De la Tour (1853) 2 El & Bl 678 at 689–90; 118 ER 922 at 926.

THE ABSENCE OF WILLINGNESS OR ABILITY

[22.20] Where a party indicates an unwillingness or inability to perform the whole contract, there is no difficulty in finding that there has been a repudiation which the aggrieved party may accept by terminating the contract. However, the circumstances may be such that it cannot be said that a party is repudiating the whole contract. It may be, for example, that a party is unable or unwilling to perform only a particular obligation out of a number of obligations. Does this necessarily constitute repudiation? A party may also repudiate a contract through a lack of willingness or ability to perform particular obligations. This will be the case where the unwillingness or inability to perform relates to a condition or essential term of the contract (Foran v Wight (1989) 168 CLR 385, 395, 416 and 441). Further, breach of a non-essential term may also evidence an intention to be no longer bound by the terms of the contract: Shevill v Builders Licensing Board (1982) 149 CLR 620. (See also Allphones Retail Pty Ltd v Hoy Mobile Pty Ltd [2009] FCAFC 85; (2009) 178 FCR 57, [49].) There will also be a repudiation of the contract where a party's unwillingness or inability to perform particular obligations is "fundamental". An absence of willingness or readiness to perform will be fundamental where it would deprive the aggrieved party of substantially the whole of the benefit of the obligations remaining to be performed under the contract (Progressive Mailing House v Tabali (1985) 157 CLR 17, 31; Laurinda Pty Ltd v Capalaba Park Shopping Centre Pty Ltd (1989) 166 CLR 623, 641–4; Foran v Wight (1989) 168 CLR 385, 441).

CONDUCT AMOUNTING TO A REPUDIATION

[22.25] A party will repudiate a contract where he or she evinces a lack of willingness or ability to perform the contract. Either unwillingness or inability will suffice. Whether the conduct of a party amounts to repudiation does not depend upon the subjective intention of that party. As Devlin J stated in Universal Cargo Carriers Corp v Citati [1957] 2 QB 401, 437, a party that says "I would like to but I cannot" repudiates the contract equally to the party that says simply "I will not".

Express statement

[22.30] The most straightforward case of repudiation is where the repudiating party makes an express statement to the effect that he or she is unwilling or unable to perform the contract. A party may make such a statement so that the other party is required to mitigate his or her loss.

Repudiation based on words or conduct

[22.35] In the absence of such a statement, a party's words or conduct may indicate that he or she is repudiating the contract. The following cases illustrate the type of conduct that may amount to repudiation of the contract.

Conduct showing an inability or unwillingness to perform

Carr v JA Berriman

[22.40] Carr v JA Berriman Pty Ltd (1953) 89 CLR 327 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: On 3rd May 1950, T Carr & Co, the building owner, and JA Berriman Pty Ltd, the builder, entered into a contract whereby the builder promised "upon and subject to the Conditions annexed hereto" to erect a factory on land owned by the owner. The contract provided that excavation of the site would be carried out by the building owner on or before 29 May. It also provided that all steel for use in the work would be supplied by proprietor and fabricated by the contractor.

The site was not excavated by the building owner by the time specified in the contract. Rather the site was at this time and subsequently covered with heavy machinery. The builder accepted a tender from a company named Hurll & Douglas for the fabrication of the steel work in connection with the building. The building owner was aware of this sub-contract. Subsequently the building owner wrote to the builder and advised that it had itself entered into a contract for the supply and fabrication of the structural steelwork for the building.

On 31 July 1950, the builder's solicitor then wrote to the building owner stating "my client regards the proprietor's failure to prepare the site and its arrangements [regarding the steel] as two distinct breaches of the building agreement". The builder's solicitor purported to cancel the contract and claim damages. The building owner disputed this right. The trial judge entered judgment for the builder. The full court dismissed an appeal by the building owner. The building owner appealed to the High Court.]

FULLAGAR J: [348] … I am of opinion that the company's solicitor was fully justified in asserting, as he did in his letter of 31st July, that two breaches of contract had been committed by Carr. He had not given possession of the building site, duly excavated or at all, on the date required by the contract or thereafter. And he had repudiated his obligation to deliver the structural steel for fabrication. As soon as this position is realized, the case becomes, in my opinion, a reasonably clear one.

Both Owen J and the Full Court appear, as I have said, to have approached the matter on the assumption that the only breach committed by Carr before 31st July lay in his failure to excavate and deliver the site. It was held by Owen J and the majority of the Full Court that that breach did justify rescission. But there are difficulties about this view, and there is much force in the answer made to it by counsel for Carr. Where a contract contains a promise to do a particular thing on or before a specified day, time may or may not be of the essence of the promise. If time is of the essence, and the promise is not performed on the day, the promisee is entitled to rescind the contract, but he may elect not to exercise this right, and an election will be inferred from any conduct which is consistent only with the continued existence of the contract. If time is not of the essence of the promise, the promisee is not entitled to rescind for non-performance on the day. If either (a) time is not originally of the essence, or (b) time being originally of the essence, the right to rescind for non-performance on the day is lost by election, the promisee can, generally speaking, only rescind after he has given a notice requiring performance within a specified reasonable time and after non-compliance with [349] that notice: see, eg, Taylor v Brown (1839) 2 Beav 180; 48 ER 1149; Stickney v Keeble [1915] AC 386; Panoutsos v Raymond Hadley Corporation of New York [1917] 2 KB 473. In the present case it is not necessary to determine whether time was of the essence of the building owner's promise to excavate and deliver the site on or before 29th May. For the company after 29th May did acts which seem consistent only with the continued existence of the contract after that date. It is sufficient to say that its contract with Hurll & Douglas was made after that date, and that up to the middle of July it continued to press for the commencement of the necessary work on the site. And no notice was ever given specifying a time within which performance of the promise to excavate and deliver was required. It cannot, in my opinion, be maintained that the right to rescind for breach of that promise as such had not been lost. Owen J was of opinion that there was a "continuing breach" of that promise: in other words he seems to have held that a fresh right to rescind accrued from day to day. But, as Dixon J pointed out in Larking v Great Western (Nepean) Gravel Ltd (1940) 64 CLR 221:

> If a covenantor undertakes that he will do a definite act and omits to do it within the time allowed for the purpose, he has broken his covenant finally and his continued failure to do the act is nothing but a failure to remedy his past breach and not the commission of any further breach of his covenant: (1940) 64 CLR, at p 236.

On the other hand, the effect of the builder's election not to rescind was to leave it open to the building owner to remedy his breach. If he did remedy it, the builder would be bound to accept the late performance, though entitled, of course, to sue for any damage suffered by him through the delay. The position thus remaining open, it is correct, in my opinion, to say, as Mr Ferguson said, that a failure to remedy the breach might continue so long and in such circumstances as to evince an intention on the part of the building owner no longer to be bound by the contract. In other words, the only legitimate inference might be that he is saying: "Not only have I broken my contract by not doing the thing on the due day, but I am not going to do the thing at all", or "I am not going to do the thing at all unless and until I find it convenient to do it". In this way a right to rescind might arise which is not based on breach of the particular promise as such. That promise, even if essential to begin with, has become non-essential by reason of the election of the promisee, but the promisee may nevertheless be able to establish that the conduct of the promisor with respect to his promise amounts to a refusal to be bound by the contract: [350] cf Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks (1951) 83 CLR, p 339. It was on this view of the present case that the majority of the Full Court dismissed the appeal. Their Honours thought that the failure to do anything at all towards performance of the contractual duty, the failure to make any attempt even to move any of the machinery from the site, the placing of further machinery on the adjoining land, the absence of any explanation or any assurance that any steps at all would be taken in the immediate future – that all these things showed that the building owner intended to take steps towards the performance of his duty if and when it suited him and not before. In other words, they showed that he did not intend to be bound by the contract within the meaning of the authorities. This view of the case rests on a sound legal foundation: the only question is whether it is warranted by the facts. The chief difficulty about accepting it lies in the fact that much heavy rain fell during the whole of June and July, and, although evidence accepted by the learned trial judge indicates that what was required could have been done between 3rd and 29th May, other evidence strongly suggests that the weather in June and July presented serious difficulties in connection with the removal of the machinery and the excavation of the site. And, as Mr Barwick rightly said, while the state of the weather is quite irrelevant on the question whether a breach of contract has been committed, it is very relevant on the question of the intention of the building owner with reference to the performance of the particular promise in question.

But the judgment under appeal leaves out of account the second breach of contract on the part of the building owner. And, when that second breach is brought into account, the difficulties of the case seem to me to disappear. This second breach went, as I have said, to a very substantial part of the contract. The estimated profit to the builder on the fabrication of the steel was £450, which was about one-fourth of the total estimated profit on the contract. The building owner's breach of contract meant that it lost that profit, and meant also, as the building owner must be taken to have known, that it became liable in damages under its own contract with Hurll & Douglas. Those damages were not likely to be less than £450. It is true that at a later date, on 21st August, the building owner's solicitors offered "to allow full and just allowances arising from" the placing of the fabrication of the steel in other hands. But this could not alter the position created by the breach of contract and by Mr Oser's letter of 19th July, which had announced that the amount allowed for the fabrication would simply be deducted from the contract price.

[351] One would be disposed to think that this second breach alone amounted to such repudiation as justified rescission. It is to be remembered that Carr's action in placing the fabrication of the steel in other hands was deliberate. Mr Barwick cited the case of James Shaffer Ltd v Findlay Durham & Brodie [1953] 1 WLR 106, but that case seems to present a marked contrast with this case. In that case the defendants were desirous of doing, and were in fact doing, their very utmost to perform their contract. It is possible that Carr believed that the architect had power under the conditions of the contract to "omit" therefrom the fabrication of the steel and so leave him at liberty to make other arrangements for the doing of that work. But he had, in the words of Latham CJ in Luna Park (NSW) Ltd v Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd (1938) 61 CLR, p 304 "given" Berriman "the right to believe that the contract would not be performed according to its true construction". Moreover, the step was taken without inviting the exercise of any discretion on the part of the architect. Mr Oser seems simply to have been presented with a fait accompli and to have tried to make the best he could of it.

But, when this second breach is viewed alongside the existing position with regard to the site, the case does not seem to admit of doubt. An election not to rescind for failure to deliver the excavated site on the due date could not deprive that failure of all significance. When a second breach occurs, the two combined may have a significance which it might not be legitimate to attach to the first alone. The position when Mr Oser's letter was received was this. The site had not been delivered on the due day. It was covered with heavy material. Nothing had been done towards putting it into the state required for delivery, further material had been placed on adjoining land on which it had been proposed to place the material then on the site itself, and repeated requests to the building owner had failed to produce any assurance that anything would be done within a reasonable time. Possession of the site was, of course, a vitally important matter. It is in this state of affairs that the building owner announces that he has engaged another contractor to carry out a large part of the work comprised in the contract. A reasonable man could hardly draw any other inference than that the building owner does not intend to take the contract seriously, that he is prepared to carry out his part of the contract only if and when it suits him. The intention must be judged from acts: Robert A Munro & Co, Ltd v Meyer (1930) 2 KB 312, at p 331. The intention "evinced" here is an intention not to be bound by [352] the contract. When such an intention is shown, the other party is entitled to rescind the contract. Mr Berriman thought that such an intention had been shown, and he acted accordingly. In my opinion, he was justified in the view which he took, and acted as he was legally entitled to act. From this conclusion two things follow. On the one hand, the builder's solicitor's letter of 31st July effected not a repudiation but a lawful rescission of the contract. It affords, therefore, no cause of action to the building owner. It is not suggested that, apart from that letter, the builder had committed any breach of contract. On the other hand, the builder, having lawfully rescinded the contract, is entitled to recover damages for loss of the contract and for any particular loss suffered by it through any breach of contract committed by the building owner before rescission. The building owner's action, therefore, rightly failed, while that of the builder rightly succeeded.

[DIXON CJ and WILLIAMS, WEBB and KITTO JJ agreed with the reasons for judgment of Fullagar J.]

Appeal dismissed with costs.

It should not be assumed that the continued breach of contractual obligations automatically constitutes repudiation. Where one party has not complied with the terms of the contract, but the other party has been happy to continue on with the contract despite the breach or breaches, such conduct is unlikely to sustain an inference of repudiation (see Koompahtoo Local Aboriginal Local Land Council v Sanpine Pty Ltd [2007] HCA 61; (2007) 233 CLR 115, extracted at [21.60]). A similar approach is adopted in the context of a party insisting on an erroneous interpretation of the contract (see DTR Nominees Pty Ltd v Mona Homes Pty Ltd (1978) 138 CLR 423, extracted at [22.65]).

Repudiation inferred from a combination of events

Progressive Mailing House v Tabali

[22.45] Progressive Mailing House Pty Ltd v Tabali Pty Ltd (1985) 157 CLR 17 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Tabali, the lessor/respondent, leased factory premises to Progressive Mailing House, the lessee/appellant, for five years from 4 December 1978 at a monthly rental. The lease was unregistered but in registrable form. Clause 10.1 provided that if the rent was unpaid for 14 days, the lessor might re-enter "without prejudice to any claim which he might have against the lessee in respect of any breach of the covenants".

Under cl 16.1, the lessor was required to carry out certain work on the premises. The lessee was to take possession 14 days after the lessor gave the lessee notice in writing that, in the opinion of its architect, the work had been satisfactorily completed. The lessee, in fact, went into possession before the lease was executed. The lessor gave the notice but the lessee denied that the work had been satisfactorily completed and ceased to pay rent. The lessee also committed a number of other breaches of covenant and failed to remedy these pursuant to notices served by the lessor. The lessor brought action in the Supreme Court of New South Wales seeking possession, judgment for outstanding rent and damages. Lusher J gave judgment for the lessor for possession. Assuming that a period of six months approximately would elapse before the respondent would succeed in reletting the premises, his Honour awarded $85,000 damages for breach of the covenants to pay rent and to pay outgoings. An appeal by the lessee to the Court of Appeal Division of the Supreme Court was dismissed. The lessee appealed to the High Court.]

MASON J: [27] [T]he rights of the parties … are to be determined on the footing that as between them, notwithstanding the failure to register the memorandum of lease, it brought into existence an equitable term of the duration which it specified and subject to the conditions which it contained. The question which arises is the extent, if at all, to which the relevant rights, duties and liabilities of the parties to the memorandum of lease fall to be determined by reference to the ordinary principles of contract law.

In Shevill v Builders' Licensing Board (1982) 149 CLR 620 at 625 Gibbs CJ assumed, without deciding, that the ordinary principles of contract law, so far as they are relevant to the [28] questions that arose in that case, applied to leases. He acknowledged that a contrary view had been expressed in Total Oil Great Britain Ltd v Thompson Garages (Biggin Hill) Ltd [1972] 1 QB 318 where the English Court of Appeal held that the principle that acceptance of a repudiation brings a contract to an end had no application to a lease because the lease was more than a contract – it created an estate or interest in land. The consequence in that case was that the lessee's claim that the lease for a term had been terminated by the lessee's acceptance of conduct of the lessor amounting to a repudiation failed. Lord Denning MR (with whom Edmund Davies and Stephen LJJ agreed) placed some reliance on the opinion expressed by Lord Russell of Killowen and Lord Goddard in Cricklewood Property and Investment Trust Ltd v Leighton's Investment Trust Ltd [1945] AC 221 at 233–4, that frustration does not bring a lease to an end. However, recently in National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd [1981] AC 675, the House of Lords held that the doctrine of frustration was in principle applicable to leases.

[29] Although Knox CJ and Gavan Duffy J in Firth v Halloran (1926) 38 CLR 261 at 268 held that the doctrine of frustration did not apply to leases, Isaacs J was of the contrary opinion. Later Williams J, in Minister of State for the Army v Dalziel (1944) 68 CLR 261 at 302, stated that the House of Lords, in Matthey v Curling [1922] 2 AC 180, had decided that the doctrine did not apply to leases. But, as we have seen, the House of Lords has now held in Panalpina that it does …

The decisions in Australia and Canada, and the speeches in Panalpina, reflect the point made by Douglas and Frank in "Landlords' Claims in Reorganisations" (1933) 42 Yale Law Journal 1003, in footnote 6, that, as the law of landlord and tenant had outgrown its origins in feudal tenure, it was more appropriate in the light of the essential elements of the bargain, the modern money economy and the modern development of contract law that leases should be regulated by the principles of the law of contract.

Accordingly, the balance of authority here as well as overseas, and the reasons on which it is based, support the proposition that the ordinary principles of contract law, including that of termination for repudiation or fundamental breach, apply to leases. However, it has been suggested that the presence of an express proviso for re-entry in a lease excludes any other right of termination of the lease by the lessor … [30] If it be accepted that the principles of contract law apply to leases, it is not easy to see why the mere presence of an express power to terminate should be regarded as excluding the exercise of such common law rights as may otherwise be appropriate. It is, of course, open to the parties by their contract to regulate the exercise of the common law right to determine for repudiation or fundamental breach. But in this case the parties have not attempted to do so … Although it is now conceded by the appellant that the lease was terminated under cl 10.1, the issue of repudiation arises because, as will appear later, the respondent cannot recover damages for loss of the benefit of the lease unless it establishes repudiation or fundamental breach by the appellant.

Shevill decided (a) that the proviso for re-entry in that case, cl 9(a), did not make breach of the covenant to pay rent breach of an essential term of the contract; and (b) that the evidence did not justify a finding that there was a fundamental breach of contract which would have entitled the lessor to rescind under the general law and sue for damages. The court was not called upon to decide whether a lessor can sue to recover damages for loss of bargain when he re-enters under a proviso for re-entry in consequence of the lessee's repudiation or fundamental breach. Gibbs CJ (at 629), with whom Murphy and Brennan JJ agreed, in passing observed: "It may be that cl 9(a) excludes the rights that would ordinarily flow from an accepted repudiation of the contract." This observation looks back to the construction of the clause which his Honour had already examined in some detail. It should not be taken as an indication that a proviso for re-entry necessarily excludes damages for loss of bargain whenever the lessor forfeits the lease pursuant to the proviso. And the Chief Justice's earlier comment (at 628) on the need for very clear words to bring about the result that whenever a lessor could exercise the right to re-enter he could recover damages for loss of bargain is not directed to damages for repudiation by the [31] lessee; it is aimed at the suggestion that the proviso should be so construed as to provide for such damages when re-entry takes place on the occurrence of a breach which is non-fundamental or minor.

It is often said that repudiation or fundamental breach – in the sense of breach of a condition or breach of another term or terms which is so serious that it goes to the root of the contract, and thus deprives the other party of substantially the whole benefit of the contract – entitles the innocent party to rescind the contract and sue for damages for loss of the bargain … But this does not mean that such damages are recoverable only in the event of discharge for breach though it is essential to an award of damages for loss of bargain that the defendant can no longer be required to perform his contractual obligations in specie. This essential foundation may be established by a common law rescission of the contract by the innocent party or by a termination of the contract in the exercise of a contractual power so to do. In either event, assuming repudiation or fundamental breach by the defendant, he could no longer be required to perform the contract and is liable for damages for loss of bargain. The well-recognised distinction between common law rescission and termination pursuant to a contractual power supplies no reason in principle why such damages are recoverable by the innocent party in one case and not in the other, provided of course that the exercise of the power is consequent upon a breach or default by the defendant which would attract an award for such damages.

Termination in the exercise of a contractual power is not an affirmation of the contract which debars the innocent party from suing for damages for breach on the ground of repudiation or fundamental breach. This is because the termination, so far from insisting on performance by the party at fault, brings to an end his obligation to perform his promise in specie.

Nor can it be said in the case of repudiation or fundamental breach, that loss of the bargain is attributable to the innocent party's exercise of his contractual power to terminate. It is different in the case of termination for non-essential breach, as Shevill demonstrates, because, by terminating pursuant to the contract at that stage, the innocent party puts it beyond his power to insist on performance, thereby bringing to an end any possibility of repudiation or fundamental breach with consequential damages for loss of bargain.

If the lessor has a common law right to recover damages for loss [32] of bargain consequent upon repudiation or fundamental breach, in the event that the lease is determined, either by acceptance of that repudiation or fundamental breach or by forfeiture as a result of re-entry, there is a difficulty in asserting that the lessor's right to recover after re-entry is subject to an acknowledgment of that right by the terms of the lease. It would be consistent with the principle to say that the right continues unless it is excluded by the lease … The appellant's … submission is that the evidence does not justify the conclusion that the appellant had demonstrated that it would or could no longer perform its obligations under the memorandum of lease or that there had occurred a fundamental breach entitling the respondent to rescind and recover damages for loss of bargain. In support of this submission the appellant points out, correctly, that repudiation of a contract is a serious matter and is not to be lightly inferred and that neither a breach of a covenant to pay rent nor a breach of a covenant to repair, without more, [33] constitutes a breach of a fundamental term, nor amounts to a repudiation of a lease.

Our consideration of the issue of repudiation and fundamental breach is complicated by the circumstances that the primary judge made no finding on the issue of repudiation because he thought, in the light of the Court of Appeal decision in Shevill, that it was unnecessary to do so and because Hutley JA, with whom Reynolds JA agreed, instead of examining the evidence relevant to the issue of repudiation, merely concluded that the appellant's conduct was repudiatory on the ground that it would have justified forfeiture "under circumstances in which the court would refuse relief". The primary judge's reasons for refusing relief against forfeiture were expressed in the following passage … This finding, though it comes close to a finding of repudiation, stops short of it … Repudiation or fundamental breach of a lease involves considerations which are not present in the case of an ordinary contract. First, the lease vests an estate or interest in land in the lessee and a complex relationship between the parties centres upon that interest [34] in property. Secondly, this relationship has been shaped historically in very large measure by the law of property, though in recent times the relationship has been refined and developed by means of contractual arrangements. Thus, traditionally at common law a breach of a covenant by a lessee, even breach of the covenant to pay rent, conferred no right on the lessor to re-enter unless the lease reserved a right of re-entry.

These incidents of the law of landlord and tenant indicate that mere breaches of covenant on the part of the lessee do not amount to a repudiation or fundamental breach … [His Honour then discussed the various breaches of covenant, other than the covenant to pay rent, and continued:]

[35] It is not suggested that the breaches so far discussed, viewed in isolation, amounted to a repudiation or fundamental breach of the lease. [36] It is the breach of the covenant to pay rent, in association with the other breaches, which is the central feature of the respondent's case on this issue … [37] The appellant's excuse for not paying the rent was that the work specified in the second schedule had not been carried out satisfactorily. Even assuming that this claim was well founded it did not entitle the appellant to refuse to pay the rent. The appellant persisted in maintaining a claim which was without any foundation … This was a refusal to carry out its obligations according to the terms of the unregistered lease and a persistence in carrying them out in a way substantially inconsistent with these terms … The rent did not represent but a nominal amount or but part of the valuable consideration which the appellant had agreed to provide in return for the right of use and occupancy which it argued [sic] under the memorandum of lease. It represented the whole of what the respondent was entitled to receive in the ordinary course in respect of the demised land during the term of the lease in a context where it would continue to be liable for some of the outgoings in respect of the premises.

In the result the evidence supports the conclusion that the appellant's conduct amounted to a repudiation of the lease or a fundamental breach of its obligations under the lease … I would dismiss the appeal.

[22.50] BRENNAN J: [39] A lessor can recover damages for loss of the benefit of a lease only [40] where the lessee has repudiated the lease before determination of the term. Such a repudiation is not necessarily established by proving a default in the payment of rent … For the reasons stated by Mason J, I think that … the lessee repudiated the contract embodied in the lease. That conclusion makes it necessary to decide in this case what was assumed but not decided in Shevill v Builders' Licensing Board, namely, whether the general contractual principles relating to rescission for anticipatory breach and damages for the loss of benefit of a contract apply when a lessee … repudiates his obligations under the lease … For reasons that I shall state presently I would hold that ordinary contractual principles do apply to a lease, but that the character of a lease as a demise distinguishes the consequences of [41] their application from their application to a contract that is not also a demise. If ordinary contractual principles apply to a lease, a fortiori they apply to an agreement to grant a lease or to an unregistered memorandum of lease which is not effective to convey a legal leasehold interest …

[42] Where, as in the present case, a lease contains a proviso for re-entry in certain events including the commission of specified breaches of covenant, it is not possible to imply a term which entitles the lessor to determine the lease in the event of anticipatory breaches of covenant that do not constitute a specified breach of covenant. The lessee's interest in the land, once vested in him by the demise, may be divested by breach of a condition of defeasance or by exercise of a power of re-entry for breach of covenant expressly reserved by the lease. A lessee's contravention of the provisions of a lease does not otherwise empower a lessor to determine the lease …

[43] A lessor's inability to determine a lessee's interest except where it is liable to forfeiture precludes the lessor from rescinding the lease for anticipatory breach, but it does not follow that the ordinary contractual principles relating to anticipatory breach do not apply to a lease where the lessee's interest is liable to forfeiture.

An objection taken in some jurisdictions to the application of those principles to leases is that a lease is a contract that has been executed or substantially executed by the lessor and that the principles relating to anticipatory breach apply only where the innocent party puts an end to executory obligations resting on him. It is true that, under an ordinary lease, the lessor's granting of the term discharges by performance his chief obligation, and the executory obligations under the lease rest chiefly on the lessee. If the lessor be under no executory obligations (or if his executory obligations be insubstantial), rescission for anticipatory breach by the lessee makes no difference (or no substantial difference) to the position of the lessor: he has parted with the leasehold interest and that interest is not liable to be revoked by mere rescission …

[44] In Mackenzie v Rees (1941) 65 CLR 1 at 15–16, Dixon J noted that there was then no English decision which applied the doctrine of anticipatory breach to contracts completely executed on one side … His Honour quoted from the American Restatement of the Law of Contracts, Art 318e, p 477: "There must be some dependency of performances in order to make anticipatory breach possible." That view commands substantial though not uniform support in the United States. Cooke J reviewed the authorities in Long Island Rail Road Co v Northville Industries Corp 362 NE (2d) 558 at 563 (1977), where he said:

> The doctrine of anticipatory breach has not generally been applied to all types of contracts, its application being limited ordinarily to bilateral contracts embodying some mutual and interdependent conditions and obligations. Moreover, limitations on the doctrine exist even in the instance of "a contract originally bilateral that has become unilateral and similarly unconditional by full performance by one party" … For the doctrine to apply there must be "some dependency of performances" (Restatement, Contracts, s 318, Comment (e)). For this reason, a party who has fully performed cannot invoke the doctrine even though the other party has repudiated.

The circumstance that obligations which have been performed are not affected by rescission for anticipatory breach does not necessarily mean that damages for anticipatory breach are denied to a party who has performed his obligations. The principles relating to anticipatory breach put both a shield and a sword in the hands of an innocent party who accepts the other party's repudiation. His shield is the ending of his executory obligations; his sword is an immediate right to damages. Where the contract has been fully performed by one party, no question of repudiation by him arises and he is under no executory obligation from which he might wish to be discharged in the event of repudiation by the other party. He has no need of a shield. But he may wish to brandish a sword. Although the paradigm case in which the principles are applied involves interdependent executory obligations, anomalies would occur if there were an unqualified rule that damages for repudiation by [45] anticipatory breach should be refused where the innocent party has fully performed his obligations, but granted where he has not. Whether the contract be executed or executory, it can be said that repudiation causes the innocent party loss of the benefit of the contract. Indeed, where the innocent party has fully performed his obligations, a repudiation by the other party deprives him not only of the profit to which his bargain entitled him but also of compensation for the cost incurred in performing his obligations.

On the other hand, it can be said that a party who has performed his obligations under a contract is entitled to no more and no less than the full and timeous performance of the obligations resting on the other party, and that an immediate award of damages for anticipatory breach of those obligations gives him more than the benefit of his bargain. There is substance in the observation by Williston on Contracts (3rd ed, 1968), vol 11, s 1313 that: "The law can properly excuse a promisor from performing whenever justice requires, but it does not have the same liberty of enlarging a promisor's contractual obligations." [46] Why should repudiation entitle the innocent party to accelerated payment when the contract stipulates that, in the circumstances that have occurred, that party should receive payment at a later time? …

However, there is no warrant for such a rule when the innocent party can and does revoke the benefit which the innocent party's performance of his obligations conferred on the repudiating party. Revocation of the benefit places the parties in a position similar to the position they would have been in if the contract had remained executory. Unless the innocent party has a right to damages in these circumstances, he cannot recover the benefit of his bargain. If he revokes the benefit that was conferred on the repudiating party, he cannot insist on the performance by that party of the interdependent obligations that fall due thereafter. Unless he is entitled to damages, he can obtain the benefit of the bargain only by foregoing the right to revoke the benefit, trusting that the other party will repent and perform the obligations he repudiated. The principles relating to anticipatory breach are intended to avoid the necessity for useless performance and to mitigate the damages for which the repudiating party is liable by permitting the innocent party to dispose of any property, services or other benefits to which the repudiating party would have been entitled under the contract. It accords with principle to permit a lessor to recover damages for anticipatory breach by a lessee when the benefit which has passed to the lessee – the interest in the land demised – is revoked by enforcing a forfeiture or by some other means of determining the lease. It accords too with authority …

[48] Acceptance of a surrender by a lessee who has repudiated a lease is at once an acceptance of the repudiation and a determination of the lessee's interest in the land. Where the lessee repudiates but does not give up possession, a lessor's acceptance must take some other form. Unless the lessee's interest in the land is determined in some [49] way, there can be no rescission of the contract, for the lessee continues to enjoy the benefit of the demise and to be liable to perform at least those covenants which touch and concern the land. So long as the lessee retains the interest which he took under the demise, neither party can put an end unilaterally to the executory obligations under the lease …

Where the lease is liable to forfeiture, as it was in the present case, enforcing the forfeiture both determines the lessee's interest in the land and constitutes the lessor's election to accept the repudiation …

[50] In the present case it was conceded that the service of the statement of claim determined the lessee's interest in the land. The statement of claim clearly accepted the lessee's repudiation and sought damages accordingly. Thus the elements of the lessor's cause of action were established. The assessment of damages by Lusher J conformed to principle. It was submitted that cl 10.1 of the lease limits the damages recoverable by the lessor to damages for past breaches of covenant. The submission is not borne out by the language of the clause. The clause specifies the events on the occurrence of which the right to re-enter arises and preserves "any claim which the Lessor may have against the Lessee in respect of any breach of the covenants … to be observed or performed". A claim for damages for anticipatory breach answers precisely that description …

I would dismiss the appeal.

[22.55] DEANE J: [52] As they developed, the contractual doctrines of frustration and termination for fundamental breach (or for repudiation) were not seen as applicable to an executed demise under which an interest or estate in land had actually passed to the tenant … The rationale of that approach was the perceived inappropriateness of those contractual doctrines to a leasehold estate viewed as analogous to a form of feudal tenure. On the other hand, the general trend in this century, particularly in relation to leases of urban premises, has been away from the type of lease which can realistically be so viewed. It has been towards the lease, at a commercial rental and for a shorter term, framed in the language of executory promises of widening content and diminishing relevance to the actual demise. It is apparent that the special rules of property law regarding chattels real are inadequate as the exclusive determinant of rights and liabilities under such modern leases. That being so, it has become necessary for courts to look somewhat more critically at the rational basis and justification of the traditional assumption that leases generally were beyond the reach of fundamental doctrines of the law of contract.

The actual application to leasehold interests of the common law doctrines of frustration and termination for fundamental breach involves some unresolved questions which are best left to be considered on a case by case basis whereby adequate attention can be focused on particular problems which might be overlooked in any effort at judicial codification. One cannot however ignore the fact that the clear trend of common law authority is to deny any general immunity of contractual leases from the operation of those doctrines of contract law. See, for example, National Carriers Ltd v Panalpina (Northern) Ltd. [I]t involves no more than recognition of the fact that the analogy between a leasehold and a freehold estate is an imperfect one and of the related fact that, except perhaps in the quite exceptional case of a completely unconditional demise for a long term with no rent reserved … the leasehold estate cannot be divorced from its origins and basis in the law of contract: the lease should be seen as "resting on covenant" (or contractual promise) and it is "the contract … and not the estate … which is the determining factor" (see Firth v Halloran (1926) 38 CLR 261 at 269 per Isaacs J) … [I]t should be accepted that, as a general matter and subject to one qualification, the ordinary principles of contract law are applicable to contractual leases. The qualification is that the further one moves away from the case where the rights of the parties are, as a matter of substance, essentially defined by executory covenant or contractual promise to the case where the tenant's rights are, as a matter of substance, more properly viewed by reference to their character as an estate (albeit a chattel one) in land with a root of title in the executed demise, the more difficult it will be to establish that the lease has been avoided or terminated pursuant to the operation of the ordinary principles of frustration or fundamental breach …

[O]nce it is accepted that the principles of the law of contract governing termination for fundamental breach are, as a matter of theory, applicable to leases generally, there is no difficulty in applying them to the present case in much the same fashion as to an ordinary executory contract: "[i]f the contract is avoided or dissolved … the estate in land falls with it": Cricklewood Property & Investment Trust Ltd v Leighton's Investment Trust Ltd at 240 per Lord Wright.

[54] Be that as it may however, once it is accepted that the principles of the law of contract governing termination for fundamental breach are, as a matter of theory, applicable to leases generally, there is no difficulty in applying them in the present case in much the same fashion as to an ordinary executory contract …

While the question is not without difficulty, I agree with other members of the court that the tenant's breaches of the memorandum of lease amounted, in the circumstances of the present case, [55] to fundamental breach of contract. It is not now suggested that the tenant is entitled to rely upon any special statutory provision precluding or controlling re-entry or providing for relief against forfeiture. It follows that the landlord was entitled to terminate the lease and, in accordance with ordinary contractual principles, sue the tenant for damages for loss of the benefit of the tenant's covenant to pay future rent and outgoings. The question arises whether that right to sue for general damages for loss of bargain survived the landlord's action in exercising the contractual right of re-entry contained in cl 10.1 of the memorandum of lease.

In Shevill v Builders' Licensing Board, it was held by the court that the lessor in that case was entitled only to unpaid past rent upon termination of the lease pursuant to the exercise of a contractual right of re-entry for breach of the covenant to pay rent promptly. The basis of the decision was not, however, a rejection of the proposition that the ordinary principles of contract law were applicable to the lease. The decision turned upon the conclusion that the breaches of the covenant to pay rent in that case did not constitute repudiation or fundamental breach. While the distinction between termination for fundamental breach and termination for a breach which the parties have agreed in advance would be such as to give rise to a right to terminate is not without difficulty (Larratt v Bankers and Traders' Insurance Co Ltd (1941) 41 SR (NSW) 215; Sotiros Shipping Inc v Sameiet Solholt (The "Solholt") [1983] 1 Ll R 605), the majority's reasoning in Shevill proceeded on an assumption that general damages for loss of the lease would have been recoverable if the lessee's failure to pay rent had, in the circumstances of that case, constituted repudiation or fundamental breach. The present case is in contrast to Shevill in that, as has been said, the tenant's breach of covenant constituted a fundamental breach of the memorandum of lease.

It follows from the foregoing that, in the circumstances which had arisen, the landlord had both a contractual right to terminate the lease by re-entry under cl 10.1 for breach of covenant and, on the application of the ordinary principles of contract law, a common law right to terminate for fundamental breach. The landlord was not obliged to elect between the two grounds for terminating the lease: it was entitled to rely upon them both. A party entitled to terminate a contract for repudiation or fundamental breach may rely upon both a specific contractual right to terminate the contract and the [56] common law right to terminate unless, as a matter of construction, the former excludes the latter (see, for example, Rawson v Hobbs (1961) 107 CLR 466 at 480; Shepherd v Felt and Textiles of Australia Ltd (1931) 45 CLR 359 at 377–8 and, generally, the cases referred to in Carter, Breach of Contract (1984), paras 914, 1006). More specifically, where a contractual right to terminate for past breach and the common law right to terminate for repudiation or fundamental breach exist concurrently, the reliance upon the contract involved in the exercise of the contractual right to terminate will not preclude the recovery of damages for loss of the future benefit of the contract by reason of repudiation or fundamental breach unless the contract expressly or impliedly so provides: compare Yeoman Credit Ltd v Waragowski [1961] 1 WLR 1124. Clause 10.1 of the memorandum of lease in the present case did not preclude the common law right to sue for fundamental breach. To the contrary, it expressly provided that the landlord's exercise of the right of re-entry thereunder would be "without prejudice to any claim which the Lessor may have against the Lessee in respect of any breach of the covenants and provisions in this Lease on the part of the Lessee to be observed or performed". That being so, the exercise by the landlord of the right of re-entry under cl 10.1 did not deprive it of the right to claim damages for the loss of the future benefit of the tenant's covenant to pay rent which it sustained by reason of the tenant's fundamental breach of the provisions of the lease.

The appeal should be dismissed.

Instalment contracts

Maple Flock v Universal Furniture Products (Wembley)

[22.60] Maple Flock Co Ltd v Universal Furniture Products (Wembley) Ltd [1934] 1 KB 148 – Appeal from du Parcq J.

[FACTS: The appellant agreed to sell 100 tons of rag flock to the respondents at £15 2s 6d per ton to be delivered at the rate of three loads per week of 1 ton for each load. The appellants warranted that the flock complied with the statutory standard of not more than 30 parts of chlorine per 100,000 parts of flock. After 18 deliveries had been made, it was found that the 16th delivery contained 250 parts of chlorine. The respondents accepted two further instalments and then purported to rescind the contract. The trial judge was of the opinion that the appellants carried on their business in a careful manner, but found for the respondents. The judgment of the Court (Lord Hewart CJ, Lord Wright and Slesser J) was delivered by Lord Hewart CJ.]

LORD HEWART CJ: [154] We think that on the evidence, and the findings of the learned judge, the true inference of fact is that there was no reasonable probability of any such improper delivery being repeated under the contract.

The decision of this case depends on the true construction and application of s 31(2) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, which is in the following terms:

> Where there is a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered by stated instalments, which are to be separately paid for, and the seller makes defective deliveries in respect of one or more instalments, or the buyer neglects or refuses to take delivery of or pay for one or more instalments, it is a question in each case depending on the terms of the contract and the circumstances of the case, whether the breach of contract is a repudiation of the whole contract or whether it is a severable breach giving rise to a claim for compensation but not to a right to treat the whole contract as repudiated.

That subsection was based on decisions before the Act … A contract for the sale of goods by instalments is a single contract, not a complex of as many contracts as there are instalments under it … [155] The subsection, … which deals equally with breaches either by the buyer or the seller, requires the court to decide on the merits of the particular case what effect, if any, the breach or breaches should have on the contract as a whole.

The language of the Act is substantially based on the language used by Lord Selborne LC in Mersey Steel and Iron Co v Naylor, Benzon & Co (1884) 9 App Cas 434, where he said (at 438):

> I am content to take the rule as stated by Lord Coleridge in Freeth v Burr (1874) LR 9 CP 208, which is in substance, as I understand it, that you must look at the actual circumstances of the case in order to see whether the one party to the contract is relieved from its future performance by the conduct of the other; you must examine what that conduct is, so as to see whether it amounts to a renunciation, to an absolute refusal to perform the contract, such as would amount to a rescission if he had the power to rescind, and whether the other party may accept it as a reason for not performing his part.

… Lord Selborne in the passage above quoted did not refer to any question of intention, but said that what is to be examined is the conduct of the party. Lord Coleridge in Freeth v Burr, on the question of a seller's breach, states thus one aspect of the rule: "Where by the non-delivery of part of the thing contracted for the whole object of the contract is frustrated, the party making default renounces on his part all the obligations of the contract": (1874) LR 9 CP 208 at 214.

In other [156] words, the true test will generally be, not the subjective mental state of the defaulting party, but the objective test of the relation in fact of the default to the whole purpose of the contract.

Since the Act, the subsection has been discussed by a Divisional Court in Millars' Karri and Jarrah Co (1902) v Weddel Turner & Co (1909) 14 Com Cas 25 … Bingham J thus stated what in his opinion was the true test (at 29):

> Thus, if the breach is of such a kind, or takes place in such circumstances as reasonably to lead to the inference that similar breaches will be committed in relation to subsequent deliveries, the whole contract may there and then be regarded as repudiated and may be rescinded. If, for instance, a buyer fails to pay for one delivery in such circumstances as to lead to the inference that he will not be able to pay for subsequent deliveries; or if a seller delivers goods differing from the requirements of the contract, and does so in such circumstances as to lead to the inference that he cannot, or will not, deliver any other kind of goods in the future, the other contracting party will be under no obligation to wait to see what may happen; he can at once cancel the contract and rid himself of the difficulty.

With the help of these authorities we deduce that the main tests to be considered in applying the subsection to the present case are, first, the ratio quantitatively which the breach bears to the contract as a whole, and secondly the degree of probability or improbability that such a breach will be repeated. On the first point, the delivery complained of amounts to no more than 11/2 tons out of a contract for 100 tons. On the second point, our conclusion is that the chance of the breach being repeated is practically negligible. We assume that the sample found defective fairly represents the bulk; but bearing in mind the judge's finding that the breach was extraordinary and that the appellant's business was carefully conducted, bearing in mind also that the appellants were warned, and bearing in mind that the delivery complained of was an isolated instance out of 20 satisfactory deliveries actually made both before and after the instalment objected to, we hold that it cannot reasonably be inferred that similar breaches would occur in regard to subsequent deliveries.

Appeal allowed.

Repudiation and an erroneous interpretation of the contract

DTR Nominees v Mona Homes

[22.65] DTR Nominees Pty Ltd v Mona Homes Pty Ltd (1978) 138 CLR 423 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Condition 4 of a contract for the sale of land (lots 1–9) stated that a plan of subdivision (which showed a total of 35 lots), a copy of which was annexed to the contract, had been lodged with the municipal council and that DTR, the vendor, would proceed with all due despatch to have the "relevant plan of subdivision" lodged for registration as a deposited plan. By condition 8, Mona Homes, the purchaser, was not required to complete prior to registration of the plan as a deposited plan. A deposit was payable on the signing of the contract and the balance within 14 days of registration.

The vendor had not in fact lodged as a deposited plan the plan of subdivision to which the contract referred (that is a plan for the subdivision of the 35 lots) but only a plan for the subdivision of the lots 1–9 the subject of the sale. It took the view that under the contract it was entitled to proceed in two stages – to subdivide lots 1–9 and then in the second stage, to subdivide the balance and that in lodging the plan of subdivision of lots 1–9 it complied with the terms of the contract.

The plan relating to lots 1–9, which had been approved by the municipal council before the contract was executed, was registered as a deposited plan on 7 July 1974. The vendor then required settlement within 14 days. On 19 July, the purchaser purported to rescind the contract on the ground that the lodged plan was not the plan referred to in the contract. The vendor, on 25 July, asserted that the purchaser's rescission constituted a wrongful repudiation of the contract, accepted the repudiation, rescinded the contract and retained the deposit. The court held that the vendors were in breach of condition 4 but that the breach in the circumstances did not justify rescission.]

STEPHEN, MASON and JACOBS JJ: [431] Quite apart from this aspect of the matter the purchasers' case as pleaded … was not one of rescission for actual breach of essential term, but one of rescission for repudiation and renunciation for so-called "anticipatory breach" … The relevant question therefore is whether the events which we have recounted evidence an intention on the part of the vendor to repudiate or renounce the contract or more precisely whether such an intention is to be inferred from those events.

For the purchasers it was submitted that such an intention should be inferred from the vendor's continued adherence to an incorrect interpretation of the contract. It was urged that the [432] vendor, because it was acting on an erroneous view, was not willing to perform the contract according to its terms. No doubt there are cases in which a party, by insisting on an incorrect interpretation of a contract, evinces an intention that he will not perform the contract according to its terms. But there are other cases in which a party, though asserting a wrong view of a contract because he believes it to be correct, is willing to perform the contract according to its tenor. He may be willing to recognise his heresy once the true doctrine is enunciated or he may be willing to accept an authoritative exposition of the correct interpretation. In either event an intention to repudiate the contract could not be attributed to him …

In this case the vendor acted on its view of the contract without realising that the purchasers were insisting upon a different view until such time as they purported to rescind. It was not a case in which any attempt was made to persuade the vendor of the error of its ways or indeed to give it any opportunity to reconsider its position in the light of an assertion of the correct interpretation. There is therefore no basis on which one can infer that the vendor was persisting in its interpretation willy nilly in the face of a clear enunciation of the true agreement.

Mr Meagher for the purchasers valiantly submitted that the vendor did not bona fide believe that the contract was to be interpreted as authorising the two-stage subdivision which it implemented … We cannot accept that … after all, the primary judge, mistaken though he was, thought that this was the correct view of the contract … Consequently it is a case of a bona fide dispute as to the true construction of a contract expressed in terms which are by no means clear … [433] In these circumstances the court is not justified in drawing an inference that the vendor intended not to perform the contract according to its terms or that it repudiated the contract. That being so, the purchasers were not entitled to rescind the contract for "anticipatory breach" as they purported to do by their notice of 19 July 1974. But the question remains whether the vendor was entitled to rely on this ineffective rescission of the contract by the purchasers as itself a repudiation of the contract and thereupon to rescind as it purported to do by its letter of 25 July … In our opinion the vendor could not rely on the purchasers' purported rescission as a repudiation. The purchasers purported to rescind only upon the basis that the vendor would not complete the contract as correctly interpreted. They were in error in regarding themselves as entitled to rescind at the stage when they purported to do so but they were not in error in their interpretation of the contract. The actions of the parties must now be considered in the light of the true interpretation of the contract. The purported rescission of 19 July did not evince an intention not to proceed with the contract correctly interpreted; it did no more than evince an intention not to proceed with the contract on the basis of the incorrect interpretation then being advanced by the vendor. That cannot be regarded as a repudiation which would entitle the vendor to rescind when it was itself the party in error. A party in order to be entitled to rescind for anticipatory breach must at the time of rescission himself be willing to perform the contract on its proper interpretation. Otherwise he is not an innocent party, the common description of a party entitled to rescind for anticipatory breach, and indeed could profit from his misinterpretation of the contract, as the vendor seeks to do in this case when it claims forfeiture of the deposit and damages. By insisting on its incorrect interpretation of the contract to the point of claiming to rescind because the purchasers were relying on the different but correct interpretation, the vendor by that stage showed that "definitive resolve or decision against doing in the future what the contract" [required,] which is referred to by Dixon CJ in Rawson v Hobbs (1961) 107 CLR 466 at 481. Whether or not the purchasers could by then have rescinded certainly the vendor could not do so.

The vendor never accepted that the contract be performed [434] according to its correct interpretation …

Thus the contract in the present case was still on foot on and after 25 July 1974. Neither party had effectively rescinded. But there can be no doubt that by 5 December 1974, when these proceedings were commenced, neither party, whatever may have been their reasons, regarded the contract as being still on foot. Neither party intended that the contract should be further performed. In these circumstances the parties must be regarded as having so conducted themselves as to abandon or abrogate the contract. The position is similar to that with which Isaacs J dealt in Summers v The

Commonwealth (1918) 25 CLR 144. The plaintiff did not succeed in his action for damages for breach of contract, but on the other hand the defendant had not rescinded. Time passed during which neither party took any steps to perform the contract. It was held that the parties had so conducted themselves as mutually to abandon or abrogate the contract …

[AITKIN J agreed. MURPHY J dissented.]

Woodar Investment Development v Wimpey Construction (UK)

[22.70] Woodar Investment Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction (UK) Ltd [1980] 1 WLR 277 (House of Lords).

LORD SALMON (dissenting): [287] I do not understand how Wimpey's honest belief in a bad point of law can in any way assist them. In Federal Commerce & Navigation Co Ltd v Molena Alpha Inc [1978] QB 927 at 979, Lord Denning said:

> I have yet to learn that a party who breaks a contract can excuse himself by saying that he did it on the advice of his lawyers: or that he was under an honest misapprehension. Nor can he excuse himself on those grounds from the consequences of a repudiation. I gratefully adopt that passage …

[288] The fact that a party to a contract mistakenly believed that he has the right to refuse to perform it cannot avail him. Nor is there any authority for the proposition that if a party to a contract totally refuses to perform it, this refusal is any the less a repudiation of the contract because he honestly but mistakenly believes that he is entitled by a condition of the contract to refuse to perform it.

It would indeed be unfortunate if the law were otherwise … It is acknowledged in this case that the mistake was an honest one. If, however, a case arose in which a mistake of this kind was alleged to be an honest mistake, but not acknowledged to be so, it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to prove the contrary.

WHY A SEPARATE ANALYSIS?

[23.05] Generally a breach that takes the form of a delay in performance will give rise to a right to terminate in the same circumstances as any other breach. However, termination for delay has traditionally warranted a separate discussion, due partly to some special terminology employed by the courts.

AT WHAT TIME IS PERFORMANCE REQUIRED?

[23.10] A contract will commonly specify a time by which the obligations in the contract are to be performed. Where no time is specified for performance, the law implies an obligation to perform within a reasonable time.

WHERE TIME IS OF THE ESSENCE

[23.15] A time stipulation that has the status of a condition is usually described as essential and time is said to be of the essence. Accordingly, failure by one party to tender performance by the appropriate time means that the other party (the aggrieved party) has the option of electing to terminate the contract.

When is time of the essence?

[23.20] The parties may expressly agree that time is to be essential in relation to some or all of the obligations in their contract. The most common formulation is a statement that time is to be of the essence. Historically, in the absence of express designation, the common law and equity took different approaches to time stipulations. The common law regarded time stipulations in contracts for the sale of land as of the essence. Equity did not assume that a time stipulation was of the essence. It looked to the substance of the matter. If, in a particular case, it was of the view that time was not in reality of the essence, and the party in breach was not otherwise disentitled to a decree, equity would prevent the exercise of the aggrieved party's common law right to terminate and order specific performance. If, however, equity was of the view that time should be regarded as of the essence, either because the parties had so expressly provided, or because of the nature of the subject matter or other circumstances of the case, it would decline to intervene and leave the parties to their common law rights. In contracts relating to land where the contract did not expressly make time of the essence, there was an equitable presumption in favour of the non-essentiality of time stipulations.

The equitable approach to time stipulations now prevails. Section 25(7) of the Judicature Act 1873 (Eng) provided:

> Stipulations in contracts, as to time or otherwise which would not before the passing of this Act have been deemed to be or to have become of the essence of such contracts in a Court of Equity, shall receive in all Courts the same construction and effect as they would have heretofore received in equity.

Corresponding provisions have been enacted in Australia: Civil Law (Property) Act 2006 (ACT), s 501; Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW), s 13; Law of Property Act (NT), s 65; Property Law Act 1974 (Qld), s 62; Law of Property Act 1936 (SA), s 16; Supreme Court Civil Procedure Act 1932 (Tas), s 11(7); Property Law Act 1958 (Vic), s 41; Property Law Act 1969 (WA), s 21. Accordingly, in the absence of express stipulation by the parties, whether or not time is of the essence is a matter of construction of the contract in question. See also Louinder v Leis (1982) 149 CLR 509 (extracted at [23.35]).

WHERE TIME IS NOT OF THE ESSENCE

[23.25] Where time is not of the essence, failure by one party to perform on time, while giving rise to damages for breach of contract, does not of itself give rise to a right of the aggrieved party to terminate. A right to terminate will be available should the delay continue so long or in such circumstances as to amount to repudiation and, possibly, for a serious breach of an innominate term, see Laurinda Pty Ltd v Capalaba Park Shopping Centre Pty Ltd (1989) 166 CLR 623 (extracted at [23.45]). Alternatively, the law of contract recognises a notice procedure that will allow an aggrieved party to terminate a contract for breach of a non-essential time stipulation.

NOTICE

[23.30] Where one party to the contract is in breach of a time stipulation but time is not of the essence in relation to that obligation, the aggrieved party may nonetheless gain a right to terminate for the delay through use of a notice procedure. The notice must set a reasonable time for performance of the obligation. If the party in breach does not perform the obligation in question within the reasonable time specified in the notice, the aggrieved party may immediately terminate the contract: see Louinder v Leis (1982) 149 CLR 509 (extracted at [23.35]). A valid notice to perform a contract or contractual obligation must satisfy three requirements:

1. the notice must specify a time for performance;
2. the time allowed must be reasonable; and
3. the notice must clearly convey that either the time fixed for performance is of the essence, or that the party giving the notice will regard herself or himself as being entitled to terminate should the notice not be complied with.

In addition, the party issuing the notice must be ready – that is, able – and willing to perform his or her contractual obligations at the time the notice is issued (on the readiness and willingness requirement, see further Chapter 25). Not all breaches prevent a party from issuing a notice to complete. Breach of inessential obligations that could easily sound in damages will not preclude the giving of a notice to complete.

The use of the notice procedure and the requirements for a valid notice are illustrated in Louinder v Leis (1982) 149 CLR 509 (extracted at [23.35]) and Laurinda Pty Ltd v Capalaba Park Shopping Centre Pty Ltd (1989) 166 CLR 623 (extracted at [23.45]).

Louinder v Leis

[23.35] Louinder v Leis (1982) 149 CLR 509 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: By a contract dated 1 November 1979, Louinder, the vendor/appellant sold property to Leis, the purchaser/respondent. No date was fixed for completion and time was not stated to be of the essence. Under cl 4, the purchaser was to tender a transfer to the vendor for execution within 28 days of receipt of the vendor's statement of title. The statement was delivered on 2 November 1979. The parties agreed to settle in January 1980, but in late January or early February the vendor sought a delay in settlement for three months. The purchaser agreed but was then informed that the vendor required settlement within a week.

On 8 February, no tender of a transfer having been made by the purchaser, the vendor issued a notice to complete within 21 days. On 4 March, the vendor terminated the contract on the ground that the notice had not been complied with. On 14 April, the purchasers sought an appointment to complete but were informed that the contract had been terminated. The purchaser then sued for specific performance and the vendor claimed a declaration that the contract had been validly terminated. Helsham CJ in Equity, issued a decree for specific performance and refused the declaration. Before Helsham CJ in Equity, the purchaser's failure to comply with cl 4 was not relied on, and the Court of Appeal refused to allow it to be raised on the vendor's appeal, which it dismissed. The vendor appealed to the High Court.]

GIBBS CJ: [512] Since the facts concerning the failure to comply with cl 4 were not examined at first instance … the Court of Appeal was correct in holding that it was not open to the appellant to take this point for the first time on appeal.

It is common ground that if it was not open to the appellant to rely on a breach by the respondent of cl 4, the appellant was not entitled to give the notice requiring completion of the contract unless the respondent had been guilty of unreasonable delay. In the circumstances of the case … it is impossible to conclude that the delay on the part of the respondent was unreasonable.

What I have said is enough to dispose of the case, but the parties have directed argument to the question whether, if the appellant had been able to establish that the respondent was in breach of cl 4, it would have been open to the appellant to give a notice to complete, and since that question appears to be an important one from a practical point of view, it appears appropriate to deal with it. There is no doubt that where a contract contains a promise to do a particular thing on or before a specified day, and time is not of the essence of the promise, the promisee can, generally speaking, only rescind for non-performance on that day if he has given a notice requiring performance within a specified reasonable time and there has been a failure to comply with that notice: Carr v J A Berriman Pty Ltd (1953) 89 CLR 327 at 348–9; Balog v Crestani (1975) 132 CLR 289 at 296. The question which arises is whether it is enough to enable the party not in default to give a notice that the other party is in breach of the contract or whether, as some text writers suggest, the notice can only be given to a party who has been guilty of unreasonable delay. The authorities which support the latter view are mainly based on the decision of [513] Harman J in Smith v Hamilton [1951] Ch 174. In that case the day for completion of the contract was 4 April, and it was held that the vendor could not, on 5 April, serve a notice on the purchaser "on the footing that there has been such impropriety on the part of the purchaser as entitles him, as it were, to engraft time on the contract" (at 181). Harman J particularly relied on Green v Sevin (1879) 13 Ch D 589 at 599, where Fry J said:

> What right then had one party to limit a particular time within which an act was to be done by the other? It appears to me that he had no right so to do, unless there had been such delay on the part of the other contracting party as to render it fair that, if steps were not immediately taken to complete, the person giving the notice should be relieved from his contract.

Fry J was there dealing with a case in which no time had been fixed by the contract for completion of the contract, as he himself pointed out immediately before the passage which Harman J cited. It appears from the examination of the authorities by Wootten J in Winchcombe Carson Trustee Co v Ball-Rand [1974] 1 NSWLR 477 that the cases before Smith v Hamilton were cases in which no time for completion had been fixed by the contract, or in which a time originally fixed had been waived. Further, the judgment of Harman J contains what has since been demonstrated to be an error of principle …

Both before and after Smith v Hamilton it was said in a number of cases that a clause providing for completion on a fixed date should, when time was not of the essence of the contract, be construed as meaning that completion could take place within a reasonable period after the date fixed. It has been convincingly shown by the House of Lords in Raineri v Miles [1981] AC 1050 that this view was erroneous. It was there held that the breach of a contractual provision as to time which was not of the essence of the contract was a breach of the contract and entitled the injured party to damages, notwithstanding that the rules of equity would relieve the party in breach to the extent of allowing him to obtain specific performance. Once one rejects the notion that a clause providing for completion on a specified day means that completion may take place within a [514] reasonable time thereafter, it is apparent that a party who fails to complete on the specified day is guilty of delay, within the meaning of the contract, whether or not the delay would, in the absence of the provision fixing the time, be regarded as unreasonable. In principle, it seems to me that such delay entitles the innocent party to treat the contract as at an end provided that, if time is not of the essence of the contract, he first gives a reasonable notice which is not complied with. I therefore respectfully agree with the statement in Neeta (Epping) Pty Ltd v Phillips (1974) 131 CLR 286 at 299 that where a contract of sale of land contains a stipulation as to time which is not of the essence of the contract, and one party is in breach or guilty of unreasonable delay, the party not in default may give a notice fixing a reasonable time for completion and making that time the essence of the contract. In my opinion this case laid down no new principle, in spite of the body of opinion to the contrary. The judgment of Fullagar J in Carr v J A Berriman Pty Ltd is in my opinion consistent with this view. In his clear statement of principle, Fullagar J ((1953) 89 CLR 327 at 348–9) did not suggest that, where there was a failure to perform on a specified day, it was necessary that there should in addition have been unreasonable delay before the party not in default became entitled to give a notice.

Assuming that the appellant had not waived cl 4, he would have been entitled to give the respondent a notice requiring him to tender a transfer within a reasonable time, and notifying him that the contract would be treated as at an end if the notice was not complied with. However, he would not have been entitled to give a notice requiring the respondent to complete the contract. Default in compliance with a covenant which fixes a time for performance of that covenant, when time is not of the essence, entitles the innocent party to make time of the essence and fix a reasonable time for performance of that covenant. If such a notice is not complied with, the party who gave the notice may rescind. However, mere breach of one contractual provision does not enable the injured party to rewrite another. Of course, the circumstances of the breach might be such as to show that there was unreasonable delay in completion, and that would justify giving a notice to complete. In the present case, where there was no unreasonable delay, the breach of cl 4 would have entitled the applicant to make time of the essence and limit a time for tender of the transfer, but it would not have entitled him to give a notice to complete. Even if this point had been open, the appellant would have failed.

The appeal should be dismissed.

[23.40] MASON J: [519] The Court of Appeal was right in refusing leave to allow the cl 4 point to be argued … But as the question sought to be raised is of particular importance in New South Wales, where it has been common practice to enter into contracts which do not fix a date for completion, we should deal with it. At the outset we need to keep in mind (a) the difference between a contract which does not fix a time for completion and one which does, though not making time of the essence; and (b) the difference between breach of an obligation to complete the contract on a stipulated date or within a reasonable time, as the case may be, and a breach of some other obligation imposed by the contract, for example cl 4 of the instant contract. The entitlement to give notice having the effect of making time of the essence varies in these situations.

A discussion of the topic necessarily demands some mention of the difference in attitude of the common law and equity to time stipulations in contracts. The date for completion is a term of the contract, breach of which would at common law entitle the innocent party to determine the contract and recover damages. If, however, [520] the parties did not make time of the essence of the contract, equity would order specific performance, unless to do so would be unjust, and would prevent the innocent party from enforcing his common law rights: Canning v Temby (1905) 3 CLR 419, 426. By reason of the approach taken by equity a practice developed whereby an innocent party, after default by the other party, gave notice requiring completion of the contract within a reasonable specified time, thereby seeking to establish, if the notice was not complied with, that there had been such delay as to disentitle the party at fault from specific performance and to justify rescission of the contract. This practice, in its application to an open contract, was indorsed in Green v Sevin (1879) 13 Ch D 589. The contract in Green v Sevin was an open contract. Under such a contract, Fry J pointed out, the purchaser was entitled to a reasonable time for performing his contract. His Lordship denied that one party had a right to limit the time for the doing of an act, independently of delay on the part of the other party, saying: "It appears to me that he had no right so to do, unless there had been such delay on the part of the other contracting party as to render it fair that, if steps were not immediately taken to complete, the person giving the notice should be relieved from his contract."

Fry J accepted that one party cannot remake the contract by unilaterally making time of the essence when consensually it is not so and went on to say: "There must have been such improper conduct on the part of the other as to justify the rescission of the contract sub modo, that is, if a reasonable notice be not complied with."

There is, I think, nothing in the judgment or in the earlier authorities which it examines to support the view that his Lordship was asserting that in the case of a contract fixing a date for completion unreasonable delay justifying rescission, rather than mere delay in completing on the stipulated date, was an essential qualification of the innocent party's right to give a notice.

Until Smith v Hamilton there seems to have been no judicial authority for the proposition that an innocent party could not give a notice to complete a contract specifying a date for completion, time not being of the essence, unless the other party was guilty of unreasonable delay, as distinct from mere failure to complete on the date fixed …

[Mason J then examined Smith v Hamilton and other cases and continued:] [523] A more liberal approach was taken by Barwick CJ and Jacobs J in their joint judgment in Neeta (Epping) Pty Ltd v Phillips (at 299), when they said:

> In cases where the contract contains a stipulation as to time but that stipulation is not an essential term then before a notice can be given fixing a time for performance, not only must one party be in breach or guilty of unreasonable delay, but also the party giving the notice must himself be free of default by way of breach or antecedent relevant delay. Only then may a notice be given fixing a day a reasonable time ahead for performance and making that time of the essence of the contract.

The reference to "breach" or "unreasonable delay" is explained by the circumstance that the passage is directed to stipulations as to time generally, viz those which stipulate a date and those which call for performance within a reasonable time. The reference to "breach" applies to the former, "unreasonable delay" to the latter, and to the former where there has been a waiver of the breach or the innocent party is disentitled to rely on it.

Their Honours pointed out that in relation to the giving of notice three questions arise:

(1) Was the other party "in breach of any term of the contract or guilty of unreasonable delay?"

(2) Was the innocent party in "breach of any term of the contract or guilty of any antecedent relevant delay?"

(3) Was the time fixed reasonable in all the circumstances?

What did their Honours intend by their expression "in breach of any term of the contract"? Did they have in mind "a mere breach of contract" or "a serious breach of contract"? Since Neeta (Epping) this question has been much debated. To me it seems that their Honours meant what they said and that they had in mind a breach of contract, whether serious or slight.

This is the view which Wootten J in Winchcombe Carson Trustee Co Ltd v Ball-Rand Pty Ltd took of the remarks made in Neeta (Epping). His Honour followed the view expressed by Barwick CJ and Jacobs J and declined to follow Smith v Hamilton distinguishing Green v Sevin on the ground that it related to an open contract. After an illuminating review of the authorities his Honour concluded that Smith v Hamilton did not correctly state the law and that the principle expressed in Neeta [524] (Epping) provided a more "certain framework for the conduct of conveyancing business".

In my view Barwick CJ and Jacobs J were right in saying that a mere failure to comply with a non-essential stipulation as to time justifies the giving of a notice having the effect of making time the essence of performance of that stipulation, even though the failure to comply does not involve an unreasonable delay. The non-essential stipulation as to time is a term of the contract enforceable by an action for damages and it is the breach of this term that justifies the giving of the notice.

By virtue of s 13 of the Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW) stipulations in contracts as to time which would not have been of the essence of such contracts in a court of equity "shall receive in all courts the same construction and effect as they would have heretofore received in such court". There has been an element of uncertainty affecting the operation of s 13 arising from the longstanding controversy as to the true principle underlying equity's attitude to time stipulations. In Seton v Slade (1802) 7 Ves Jun 265; 32 ER 108, Lord Eldon offered two alternative explanations. The first is that equity construes the contract differently by treating the time stipulation as formal only so that it is satisfied by compliance within a reasonable time. The second is that equity exercises a jurisdiction similar to relief against forfeitures and penalties, construing the contract as it would be construed at common law, but restraining the parties from an unconscionable exercise of their legal rights. The true position is that equity and common law differed not so much in the construction of the contract as in the consequences which they assigned to a breach of it. As Lord Cairns LJ said in Tilley v Thomas (1867) LR 3 Ch App 61 at 67: "The legal construction of the contract … is, and must be, in equity the same as in a Court of law." See also Rolt LJ. To the same effect are the speeches of Lord Atkinson and Lord Parker of Waddington in Stickney v Keeble [1915] AC 386, 402, 417, Lord Parker pointing out "that it was only for the purposes of granting specific performance that equity in this class of case interfered with the remedy at law" (at 416). Equity departed from the common law in insisting that a breach of a stipulation as to time only entitled the innocent party to rescind where time was of the essence of the contract. It was otherwise at common law. Consequently equity would intervene in appropriate cases to prevent the innocent party from enforcing his common law right to rescind and to assert her [525] own rule. It follows that in such cases the operation of s 13 converts the character of a time stipulation from essential to non-essential; it does not otherwise alter its terms or its construction. Thus the time stipulation is not read as if it called for performance by the stipulated date or "within a reasonable time" or "within a reasonable time thereafter". In this respect I agree with the recent decision of the House of Lords in Raineri v Miles [1981] AC 1050 and that of the New South Wales Court of Appeal in McNally v Waitzer [1981] 1 NSWLR 294. I reject the view of Harman J in Smith v Hamilton and the earlier comment of Maugham J in In Re Sandwell Park Colliery Co; Field v The Company [1929] 1 Ch 277,282, that "a clause fixing the date for completion is equivalent to a clause stating that completion shall be on that date or within a reasonable time thereafter", notwithstanding subsequent indications of support for the view to be found in [a number of cases] … Lord Diplock and Lord Simon of Glaisdale in United Scientific Holdings Ltd v Burnley Borough Council examined the legislative ancestors and relatives of s 13 and the observations of Lord Parker of Waddington in Stickney v Keeble [1915] AC at 416. Referring to the approach of the Court of Chancery Lord Diplock said ([1978] AC at 928): [526]

> Once the time had elapsed that was specified for the performance of an act in a stipulation as to time which was not of the essence of the contract, the party entitled to performance could give to the other party notice calling for performance within a specified period: and provided that the period was considered by the court to be reasonable, the notice had the effect of making it of the essence of the contract that performance should take place within that period.

Lord Simon expressed the matter rather differently …

For reasons already given I regard Lord Diplock's statement as correct. It accords with Neeta (Epping) and Raineri v Miles.

Accordingly, delay beyond the stipulated date will give rise to a liability in damages. But because equity treats the time stipulation as non-essential, mere breach of it does not justify rescission by the innocent party and will not bar specific performance at the suit of the party in default. Unreasonable delay in complying with the stipulation in substance amounting to a repudiation is essential to justify rescission. It is to this end that, following breach, the innocent party gives notice fixing a reasonable time for performance of the relevant contractual obligation. The result of non-compliance with the notice is that the party in default is guilty of unreasonable delay in complying with a non-essential time stipulation. The unreasonable delay amounts to a repudiation and this justifies rescission.

If the Smith v Hamilton view were to prevail and unreasonable delay were required to precede the giving of a notice one is then driven to ask "What is the point of insisting on the giving of a notice [527] which itself is required to fix a reasonable time for performance?" The consequence would be to defer the innocent party's right to rescind until such time as the other party has delayed for two periods, each one of which constitutes an unreasonable delay. This solution to the problem unnecessarily protects the party at fault at the expense of the innocent party. The Neeta (Epping) solution is more just; it enables one party to initiate the action once the other party is in breach. And it provides a little more certainty in determining when a notice may be given.

This solution is not unfair to the party who is guilty of a mere breach of contract. He is entitled to a notice which fixes a reasonable time in all the circumstances and those circumstances will include the fact that he has not been guilty of a serious breach of contract or of unreasonable or gross delay.

There is nothing in all this to deny the correctness of the Green v Sevin principle in its application to open contracts. There the existence of unreasonable delay, this being the relevant breach of contract, is an essential qualification for the giving of a notice. In this case because the notice itself must allow a reasonable time for completion, the party at fault, having been guilty of unreasonable delay, is entitled to a further period, being a reasonable time for completion. Because the initial period of delay is no more than a breach of a non-essential time stipulation, without more it cannot found an inference of repudiation.

One question which the joint judgment in Neeta (Epping) leaves unresolved is whether a notice to complete the contract can be given when the relevant breach of contract justifying the giving of a notice is not a breach of an obligation to complete but a breach of another term of the contract. In principle breach of a non-essential term justifies the giving of a notice fixing a reasonable time for the performance of that term. Generally speaking it does not entitle the innocent party to give notice fixing a time for completion of the contract. There are of course exceptions to this rule. Sometimes a contract will contain a condition which requires to be performed on or before the date of completion. Unreasonable delay or default in complying with the condition may then amount to delay or default in completion justifying the giving of a notice to complete. At other times the delay or default in complying with a particular provision may be so inordinate as to justify the innocent party in fixing a reasonable time for completion, as, for example, when non-compliance with the particular provision has the practical effect of making it impossible to complete within the time stipulated or contemplated by the contract. It was such a situation that Barwick CJ and Jacobs J had in mind in Neeta (Epping) when, speaking of [528] the purchaser's failure to send to the vendor a transfer within twenty eight days of the giving of particulars of title, they said: "Not only was this a breach but it involved a long delay which cannot be explained by the course of events at the office of the Commissioner of Stamp Duties. If it stood alone it would entitle the vendor to give a notice to complete." …

Thus, the general rule that a breach of a non-essential term entitles the innocent party to give a notice having the effect of making time of the essence in respect of that term is qualified so as to permit the giving of a notice having the effect of making time of the essence of the contract in respect of completion when the breach of the particular stipulation amounts to a breach of the obligation to complete or has the practical effect of making it impossible to complete the contract within the time stipulated or contemplated by the contract.

One final point should be mentioned. In Carr v JA Berriman Pty Ltd, Fullagar J (with whose judgment all the other members of the court concurred) said (at 348–9):

> If either (a) time is not originally of the essence, or (b) time being originally of the essence, the right to rescind for non-performance on the day is lost by election, the promisee can, generally speaking, only rescind after he has given a notice requiring performance within a specified reasonable time and after non-compliance with that notice.

This passage was referred to with evident approval by Gibbs J (with whom Jacobs J agreed) in Balog v Crestani at 296. Mahoney JA in his judgment in Perri v Coolangatta Investments Pty Ltd (Supreme Court of NSW (Court of Appeal); Unreported; 5 August 1981), expressed the view that the proposition enunciated by Fullagar J is not one of universal application for the reason that rescission for breach of a non-essential term is only justified when the breach [529] amounts to a repudiation of the contract or a fundamental breach. It is apparent from the language used by Fullagar J that he was not intending to express a proposition of universal application. Certainly, as Mahoney JA recognised, what his Honour said applies to the completion of a contract for the sale of land. And there is no reason to think that it does not apply to provisions in a contract for the sale of land that are to be fulfilled within a reasonable time when those provisions constitute an essential step in the process of completion of the contract.

In the event the appeal fails. There was no foundation for the vendors giving a notice to complete on 8 February 1980 as the contract did not fix a time for completion. The existence of unreasonable delay on the part of the purchaser was an essential qualification for the giving of a notice. The findings of fact made by the primary judge negated the existence of such delay.

I would dismiss the appeal.

[STEPHEN and WILSON JJ agreed with Mason J. BRENNAN J discussed the theory of the operation of notices to complete. His discussion is largely repeated in his judgment extracted in Laurinda Pty Ltd v Capalaba Park Shopping Centre Pty Ltd at [23.45].]

Laurinda v Capalaba Park Shopping Centre

[23.45] Laurinda Pty Ltd v Capalaba Park Shopping Centre Pty Ltd (1989) 166 CLR 623 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland, Full Court.

[FACTS: On 31 October 1985, Capalaba, the lessor, and Laurinda, the lessee, entered into an agreement (as a deed) for the grant of a lease of a shop forming part of a retail centre being constructed by Capalaba, for the period and on the terms set out in a form of lease annexed to the agreement. The form of lease stated the period of the lease to be six years, but certain other matters including the commencement date were left blank. The deed made provision for ascertaining the commencement date which, in the event, was 1 December 1985. The lessor was entitled to complete the other blanks in the form of lease. Capalaba and Laurinda executed the form of lease on or about the date of the deed.

On 3 December 1985, Laurinda went into possession of the shop and, in January 1986, paid to Capalaba (as it was bound to do under the deed) $2,317 being costs of stamping, and incidental to the preparation of, the lease. On 14 March 1986, Laurinda's accountants asked Capalaba's solicitors to forward a copy of the lease at the earliest opportunity. On 25 March 1986, Capalaba's solicitors advised that in October 1985 the lease had been sent to Melbourne for execution by Capalaba and it was expected "in the near future". By April 1986, Capalaba was aware that Laurinda was seeking to sell its business. On 21 August 1986, Laurinda's solicitors wrote to Capalaba's solicitors. After pointing out that the lease should have been registered some ten months previously, that Laurinda had already provided funds for its registration, and the importance to Laurinda of having the lease registered, the letter continued:

> In such circumstances, and in view of the unexplained and lengthy delay, it appears reasonable that our clients require your client to complete registration within 14 days from the date hereof. If registration is not completed within that time then our clients naturally reserve their rights in respect of your client's default.

This letter was received the next day. On 3 September 1986, Capalaba's solicitors replied that they had referred the letter to Capalaba for instructions.

On 5 September 1986, Laurinda terminated the agreement on the ground that Capalaba had repudiated the agreement or was in breach of essential terms of the agreement as a result of Capalaba's failure to register the lease or deliver a lease in registrable form. On 3 October 1986, Capalaba re-entered the premises.

On 31 October 1986, Laurinda commenced an action for a declaration that the lease had been validly rescinded, recovery of the $2,317 and damages and interest. Capalaba denied that it had been guilty of any unreasonable delay in completing the transaction, contended that Laurinda's purported termination was a wrongful repudiation, and claimed unpaid rent, damages and interest.

At the trial, Connolly J held that the letter of 21 August was not an effective notice to complete, but that the agreement for the lease had been validly terminated by Laurinda for Capalaba's repudiation. The Full Court, on appeal, held that it had not. Laurinda appealed to the High Court.]

MASON CJ: [633] The appellants' principal submission is that Capalaba's conduct amounted to a repudiation of the agreement entitling Laurinda to treat the agreement as at an end. The appellants submit that Connolly J was correct in holding that Capalaba's failure to procure registration or deliver a registrable lease demonstrated that Capalaba was not prepared to carry out its part of the agreement until it suited it.

It is evident that Connolly J, in reaching his conclusion upon this point, had in mind the observations of Fullagar J in Carr v J A Berriman Pty Ltd (1953) 89 CLR 327 where his Honour said with reference to the facts of that case (at 351):

> It is in this state of affairs that the building owner announces that he has engaged another contractor to carry out a large part of the work comprised in the contract. A reasonable man could hardly draw any other inference than that the building owner does not intend to take > the contract seriously, that he is prepared to carry out his part of the contract only if and when it suits him.

Fullagar J went on to say (at 351–2) that the intention evinced was "an intention not to be bound by the contract" and that, upon that intention being shown to exist, the other party was entitled to treat the contract as at an end. What his Honour said in this respect accords with later statements upon the topic by members of this [634] Court … There is a difference between evincing an intention to carry out a contract only if and when it suits the party to do so and evincing an intention to carry out a contract as and when it suits the party to do so. In the first case the party intends not to carry out the contract at all in the event that it does not suit him. In the second case the party intends to carry out the contract, but only to carry it out as and when it suits him. It is much easier to say of the first than of the second case that the party has evinced an intention no longer to be bound by the contract or to fulfil it only in a manner substantially inconsistent with his obligations and not in any other way. But the outcome in the second case will depend upon its particular circumstances, including the terms of the contract. In some situations the intention to carry out the contract as and when it suits the party may be taken to such lengths that it amounts to an intention to fulfil the contract only in a manner substantially inconsistent with the party's obligations and not in any other way …

[Mason CJ reviewed the correspondence between the parties and continued as follows:] [636] If for the moment we put to one side the question whether the letter of 21 August 1986 validly fixed a time for registration of the lease, this correspondence demonstrates an attitude on the part of Capalaba which was not only dilatory but also cavalier and recalcitrant. Capalaba was remiss in failing to respond in a more positive way to the appellants' requests, especially after the letter of 21 August. More than that, Capalaba's solicitors had on two occasions made incorrect statements about the progress of the matter. There was the incorrect statement in the letter of 28 November 1985 that the lease had been executed and would be sent "shortly". Then there was the statement in the letter of 25 March 1986 that the lease documents would be returned by Capalaba to its solicitors "in the not too distant future" and that the stamped parts of its documents would be provided to Laurinda "as soon as we are able to". Moreover, in the face of the letter of 21 August 1986, Capalaba's solicitors only say on 3 September that they have referred the letter for instructions. And this correspondence needs to be read in the light of Capalaba's failure to take steps to obtain the mortgagee's consent to the lease, to complete the lease in accordance with cl 6.2 and to make arrangements for stamping the lease. Although the matter is finely balanced, the unjustified delay on the part of Capalaba between March and 3 September 1986, accompanied by incorrect statements and unfulfilled assurances sustained the inference of repudiation drawn by Connolly J. Based on Capalaba's unwillingness to deliver a registrable lease to Laurinda, it seems to me that Capalaba's intention was only to perform the contract in a manner substantially inconsistent with its [637] obligations, such as would allow Laurinda to treat Capalaba as having repudiated the contract.

The Full Court appears to have reached the opposite conclusion on the footing that the case against Capalaba amounted to no more than a case of delay and that mere delay is never a sufficient foundation for inferring an intention to repudiate. Whether the statement that mere delay can never support an inference of intention to repudiate can be sustained as a universal proposition may be put to one side because cl 15.7 specifically deals with the situation in this case. However, the short answer to the approach taken by the Full Court is that the circumstances, as I have outlined, amount to more than a case of mere delay. Capalaba's delay was accompanied, as Connolly J found, by an intention not to complete the contract until it suited it.

Although my conclusion on the issue of repudiation makes it unnecessary to deal with the appellants' submission that the letter of 21 August validly fixed a time within which Capalaba was bound to complete the agreement by registering the lease, it is as well that I should deal with the question in view of its general importance. Capalaba does not now dispute that there had been unreasonable or unnecessary delay on its part in completing the agreement before 21 August 1986 such as would entitle Laurinda to give notice to complete, fixing a reasonable time within which completion was to take place: see Louinder v Leis (1982) 149 CLR 509; Green v Sevin (1879) 13 Ch D 589; Smith v Hamilton [1951] Ch 174. But Capalaba submits that the notice given on 21 August was defective because it failed to notify Capalaba that in the event of non-compliance the appellants would treat the agreement as at an end and because the time limited for completion was not reasonable. The first point, found against the appellants by the Full Court and Connolly J, was discussed by Gibbs J in Balog v Crestani (1975) 132 CLR 289, 296–300. There his Honour pointed out (at 296) that the authorities that relate to contracts for the sale of land: "… very strongly suggest, even if few of them actually decide, that to be effective the notice requiring performance must inform the party to whom it is given that the party giving it will treat the contract as at an end if the notice is not complied with."

Later his Honour went on to say (at 298):

> Today, when adherence to form is not generally much [638] esteemed, it may be thought that it ought to be enough that a party requires performance within a specified reasonable time, and indicates that he will rely on his rights if the other party fails to comply with his requirement, although a prudent solicitor may prefer to use the accepted formula rather than face the prospect of litigation.

For my part I agree with the suggestion made by Gibbs J that it is not necessary that the notice should state that the party will treat the contract as at an end in the event of non-compliance with the requirement stated in the notice and that it is sufficient if the notice indicates that the party giving it may choose to rely on his rights in that event. However, the notice must convey a definite and specific intent to require strict compliance with the terms of the contract within a reasonable time, so that the recipient will be made aware that the party giving the notice may elect to treat the contract as at an end at the conclusion of such reasonable time unless compliance is forthcoming. In the present case Capalaba was aware that Laurinda wished to dispose of its business and regarded the matter as urgent. The surrounding circumstances were not only sufficient to found an inference of repudiation by Capalaba in the face of the demands of Laurinda; they are also clearly capable of demonstrating that, given the expiry of a reasonable period, Laurinda would regard the contract as at an end. In these circumstances, it can scarcely be suggested that the notice did not alert Capalaba to the possibility that non-compliance might result in termination of the contract. Accordingly, I would not hold that the notice given on 21 August was ineffective on this ground.

I turn now to the question whether the time limited by the notice was reasonable. The time limited was thirteen days because the notice was not received until 22 August. In judging whether the time allowed was reasonable the Court must consider all the circumstances of the case, including any unnecessary delay on the part of the party to whom the notice is given before it is given: Stickney v Keeble [1915] AC 386. There Lord Parker of Waddington observed (at 419):

> In considering whether the time so limited is a reasonable time the Court will consider all the circumstances of the case. No doubt what remains to be done at the date of the notice is of importance, but it is by no means the only relevant fact. The fact that the purchaser has continually been pressing for completion, or has before given similar notices which he has waived, or that it is specially important to him to obtain early completion, are equally relevant facts … It would be unjust and inequitable to allow the vendor to put forward his own [639] unnecessary delay in the face of the purchaser's frequent requests for expedition as a ground for allowing him further time or as rendering the time limited by such a notice as that to which I have referred an unreasonable time.

See also 398, 415 and 426; Ajit v Sammy [1967] 1 AC 255, 258. McMurray v Spicer (1868) LR 5 Eq 527, which held that time before the service of a notice to complete is to be excluded in computing whether delay is a defence to a suit for specific performance of a contract for sale of land (at 537–8) has no application to the computation of what is a reasonable time for completion for the purposes of a notice to complete. In saying this I am not to be taken as necessarily endorsing what was said in McMurray v Spicer. The notice to complete rested the right of the appellants to rescind the contract upon Capalaba's failure to secure registration. The adequacy of the time limited by the notice must be considered in that light. On the view which I have expressed earlier as to the effect of the letter of 14 March 1986, there is no clear evidence that the appellants were pressing Capalaba before 21 August 1986 to complete performance of the agreement and the notice given that day constitutes the first express demand made by the appellants for performance of the agreement in the relevant respect. In computing the reasonableness of the time limited by that notice it is relevant to take account of the time which Capalaba already had to complete performance of the agreement but it is necessary to bear in mind that there was no explicit pressure from the appellants during that time to do so. The appellants had pressed without success for completion pursuant to cl 6, but this was a demand of a more limited nature. Capalaba called evidence from Mr Lockhart, a solicitor, with a view to establishing that the time limited was inadequate for the purpose of having the lease stamped and registered. Mr Lockhart stated that in his experience it would be unlikely that a shopping centre lease would be stamped and registered within fourteen days, though he agreed that documents could be stamped and registered on an urgent basis.

On this point Connolly J said:

> … I am far from persuaded that the contract could not have been stamped, endorsed with the mortgagee's consent and tendered within the 14 days limited. It must be remembered that when this notice was given, those advising the first plaintiff [Laurinda] could have had no knowledge that the lease had not been completed by the defendant's solicitors before it [640] was despatched to Melbourne for execution by the defendant. That completion was, as has been seen, a purely mechanical exercise. Nor had the first plaintiff's advisers any way of knowing that the consent of the mortgagee, though freely available, had not been obtained. Nor had they been told that the contract, although executed, had not been stamped, although they might have conjectured as much from the fact that it had not been brought, in its fully executed form, into Queensland.

The problem with his Honour's approach, viewed from the appellants' standpoint, is that the onus must rest with the party giving the notice of showing that the time limited by the notice is reasonable judged as at the time the notice is given. Consequently, the primary judge's observations do not amount to a finding that the time fixed by the notice was reasonable.

The question is one of fact and it falls to be determined by reference to evidence which, as one might expect on an issue of this kind, is rather indefinite. However, the evidence of Mr Lockhart is sufficient to raise a serious doubt in my mind as to the prospect of having the lease stamped and lodged for registration within the period of thirteen days limited by the notice. Of course this is not a decisive consideration because it is relevant to have regard to the opportunity which Capalaba had to attend to these matters before the notice was given. In Sindel v Georgiou (1984) 154 CLR 661, 670 the Court said: "Although in Ajit v Sammy … the Privy Council held that a six day notice to complete was reasonable in the circumstances of that case, it is our view that strong circumstances must be shown to justify the giving of a notice to complete which allows less than fourteen days for completion." In my view, no such circumstances have been shown to be present in this case. The time allowed by the notice was therefore insufficient.

But there is strictly no need to decide this point. The finding of repudiation by Capalaba necessitates the allowing of the appeal and the restoration of the orders of Connolly J.

BRENNAN J: [641] Two questions arise: (1) was Capalaba's failure a breach of a term of the agreement for lease? if so, (2) was it a breach which entitled Laurinda to rescind?

The terms of the contract

[23.50] On the appeal, it was conceded that Capalaba was under an implied obligation "to effect registration and to effect it within a reasonable time" … The lessor's obligation comprehends at least the delivery to the intending lessee of an appropriate instrument capable of registration [380] and, in my opinion, comprehends also the procuring of its registration. The time to be implied for performance of the intending lessor's obligation is a reasonable time … Time was not of the essence of Capalaba's implied promise to procure registration of an appropriate instrument …

The right to rescind

[23.55] A right in one party to rescind a contract will arise when the [642] other party repudiates a contract generally, but it may also arise when the other party repudiates a term of the contract. A right to rescind depends on the importance of the term repudiated. Here, the subject of the agreement was the granting of a legal lease for a term of six years. The implied promise by Capalaba to procure registration of an appropriate instrument was thus at the heart of the agreement. It was a promise of such importance to the promisee that it would not have entered into the contract unless it had been assured of substantial performance and this ought to have been apparent to the promisor. It answered the criterion of an essential promise in the sense that an outright repudiation of the promise would have entitled Laurinda to rescind. The criterion of an essential promise which I have stated in terms relevant to the present case is derived from the criterion expressed by Jordan CJ in Tramways Advertising Pty Ltd v Luna Park (NSW) Ltd (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 632, 641–2 and frequently adopted in this court, most recently in Ankar Pty Ltd v National Westminster Finance (Australia) Ltd (1987) 162 CLR 549, 556, but I have modified it by using the term "substantial performance" rather than the usual formula of "a strict or a substantial performance". The modification is necessary when, no day for performance being stipulated and the subject matter of the promise not being such as to require strictly timeous performance, time is not of the essence of the promise either in law or in equity … When time is not of the essence, the promisee must have been willing to enter into the contract without an assurance that the promise would be performed strictly, albeit with an assurance that the promise would be performed substantially. Thus, Laurinda would not have been entitled either at law or in equity to rescind the contract as soon as a reasonable time for procuring registration had elapsed …

Where an essential term – in the sense defined – is to be performed within a reasonable time, there being no stipulated day for performance, and that time passes without performance, the innocent party does not acquire a right to rescind unless the defaulting party repudiates or has repudiated his obligation to [643] perform …. The same observation may be applied to agreements for lease. More than a mere failure in timeous performance is necessary to warrant an inference of repudiation, but delay may be so serious as to amount to a refusal to perform and in such a case an innocent party has a right to rescind. Barwick CJ and Jacobs J observed in Neeta (Epping) Pty Ltd v Phillips (1974) 131 CLR 286, 306: "Contracts for the sale of land, creating as they do equitable interests in land, do not easily go off except pursuant to an express condition of the contract or pursuant to an express repudiation or a repudiation clearly to be inferred."

The difference between a contract which contains a stipulated day for performance of an essential term and a contract which, expressly or impliedly, requires performance within a reasonable time is important when the question is whether, on failure to perform within the time limited by the contract, the innocent party is entitled to rescind. In the former case, a right to rescind arises at law when the stipulated day passes; in the latter, that right does not necessarily arise when the reasonable time expires but only when repudiation is clearly to be inferred from the circumstances in which the delay occurs. Delay will amount to repudiation if the defaulting party "evinces an intention no longer to be bound by the contract … or shows that he intends to fulfil the contract only in a manner substantially inconsistent with his obligations and not in any other way": Shevill v Builders Licensing Board (1982) 149 CLR 620, 625–6; Progressive Mailing House Pty Ltd v Tabali Pty Ltd (1985) 157 CLR 17, 33, 40. If the inference to be drawn from the circumstances is that the defaulting party intends to perform an essential promise after some minor delay, repudiation cannot be inferred; but if the inference is that the defaulting party intends so to delay performance that the promisee will be substantially deprived of the benefit of the promise, repudiation can be inferred. The inference is not lightly drawn: Progressive Mailing House Pty Ltd v Tabali Pty Ltd at 32. However, a reservation on the part of the promisor that he may perform the promise if it suits his convenience to do so is not inconsistent with repudiation of the contract or promise. Thus [644] Fullagar J was able to say in Carr v J A Berriman Pty Ltd (at 349):

> it is correct … to say … that a failure to remedy the breach might continue so long and in such circumstances as to evince an intention on the part of the building owner no longer to be bound by the contract. In other words, the only legitimate inference might be that he is saying: "Not only have I broken my contract by not doing the thing on the due day, but I am not going to do the thing at all", or "I am not going to do the thing at all unless and until I find it convenient to do it".

When delay in performance is prolonged, the point at which repudiation might be inferred is necessarily uncertain. The promisor and promisee are likely to regard the circumstances differently. To provide a firm foundation for the inference of repudiation, it is prudent for the promisee to give a notice to complete. In Louinder v Leis, Mason J said (at 526):

> Unreasonable delay in complying with the stipulation in substance amounting to a repudiation is essential to justify rescission. It is to this end that, following breach, the innocent party gives notice fixing a reasonable time for performance of the relevant contractual obligation. The result of non-compliance with the notice is that the party in default is guilty of unreasonable delay in complying with a non-essential time stipulation. The unreasonable delay amounts to a repudiation and this justifies rescission.

That was said in reference to delay beyond a stipulated date. It does not follow that delay beyond the stipulated reasonable time necessarily amounts to repudiation. But if, the stipulated reasonable time having elapsed, a notice to complete allowing a further reasonable time is given, a failure to comply provides a firm foundation for an inference of repudiation. A right to rescind is one thing; fairness in the exercise of that right is another. In some circumstances, equity asserts a jurisdiction to restrain the exercise of a right to rescind. As I attempted to explain in Louinder v Leis (at 532–6), a notice to complete does not make time of the essence of the contract when the contract itself does not do so, but it is a step towards lifting an equitable restraint on the exercise of a right to rescind which arises aliunde. Therefore, when a contract requires performance of an essential promise within a reasonable time and a valid notice to complete on or before a specified day is given by the innocent party, the significance of the notice is twofold: primarily, it fixes a day when, if the default is not [645] remedied, the party in default will be held to have repudiated the promise; and, secondarily, it will show that, for equity's purposes, it is fair for the innocent party to exercise that right … Where a contract contains a promise to be performed within a reasonable time, a notice to complete does not insert the time it prescribes into the contract and make that time of the essence, but the notice is evidence which may support the inference of repudiation, from which the innocent party's right to rescind arises and it clears the way for the exercise of that right.

When a reasonable time is prescribed for performance of an essential term of a contract, a notice to complete requiring performance of that term by a specified day can be given only if the party to whom it is given is already in breach of his contractual obligation: Neeta (Epping) Pty Ltd v Phillips at 299. But it would be futile to give a notice if, in the event of the default complained of persisting beyond the time limited by the notice, repudiation were not to be inferred from the circumstances then existing. Therefore, in considering whether the time limited by a notice is reasonable in such a case, it is necessary to consider whether an inference of repudiation would be drawn from non-performance if that were to persist beyond that time ….

[646] At the time when the letter of 21 August 1986 was written, it could not reasonably have been inferred from Capalaba's delay in stamping and registering the lease that it did not intend to be bound by its promise to register the lease. Does its failure to stamp and register within the 14 days allowed by the letter of 21 August tip the balance? The answer depends on whether the letter was an effective notice to complete, and there were two reasons advanced for holding that it was not.

The first found favour before the trial judge and before the Full Court. Connolly J held that the letter of 21 August was not an effective notice to complete because it did not inform Capalaba that Laurinda would treat the contract as at an end if the notice was not complied with. In Balog v Crestani (1975) 132 CLR 289, 296–8, Gibbs J raised but did not answer the question whether it was essential to the validity of a notice to complete that it should notify the giver's intention to rescind in the event of non-compliance. As the purpose of a notice is to fix a day for the completion of a contract or the performance of a term of a contract so that the parties' respective rights will be ascertained thereafter as though the contract had stipulated for that day to be of the essence, it must be sufficient that the party giving the notice makes it clear that the terminal day specified in the notice is thereafter to be treated as of the essence for the performance of the contract (or of the relevant term of the contract, as the case may be). The reasons advanced by Deane and Dawson JJ for this view are, in my respectful opinion, compelling. The letter of 21 August 1986 … falls short of communicating Laurinda's intention to treat the end of the 14-day period as of the essence for performance of Capalaba's obligation to complete registration. For this reason … the letter … [647] was not an effective notice to complete. This conclusion led Connolly J to hold that he was constrained to reject the letter "as a notice requiring performance non-compliance of which, without more, entitled [Laurinda] to rescind".

His Honour did not have to decide whether the time limited by the letter of 21 August was unreasonably short …

The onus to establish that the time was reasonable rested on Laurinda. The only evidence was that of Capalaba's solicitor who said that "it would be unlikely to expect that you could get a shopping centre lease stamped and registered within 14 days" although application for expedited stamping and expedited registration could be made to the relevant authorities. Having regard to this fact and the factors earlier mentioned, I should think that the 13 days effectively allowed for registration was unreasonably short. I would not draw an inference merely from Capalaba's non-performance in registering the lease, which continued until the time limited by the letter had expired, that Capalaba had repudiated the contract. However, his Honour found that Capalaba simply declined to perform its obligation "until it suited it" and that Laurinda "was entitled to regard the conduct of [Capalaba] as repudiatory in a relevant sense and to treat the contract as discharged". The finding was based in part upon facts which emerged at the trial, showing that Capalaba had deliberately delayed in executing the lease, securing the mortgagee's consent, stamping and registering the lease (or tendering a registrable lease) because Capalaba's commercial interests were better served by delay.

Repudiation is not ascertained by an inquiry into the subjective state of mind of the party in default; it is to be found in the conduct, whether verbal or other, of the party in default which conveys to the other party the defaulting party's inability to perform the contract or promise or his intention not to perform it or to fulfil it only in a manner substantially inconsistent with his obligations and not in any other way …

[648] [I]n Carswell v Collard (1893) 20 R (HL) 47, 48, Lord Herschell LC stated the question precisely: "Of course, the question was not what actually influenced the defender, but what effect the conduct of the pursuer would be reasonably calculated to have upon a reasonable person." …

The question whether an inference of repudiation should be drawn merely from continued failure to perform requires an evaluation of the delay from the standpoint of the innocent party. Would a reasonable person in the shoes of the innocent party clearly infer that the other party would not be bound by the contract or would fulfil it only in a manner substantially inconsistent with that party's [383] obligations and in no other way? Different minds may easily arrive at different answers. If one looks merely at Capalaba's conduct in the circumstances known to Laurinda when the letter of 21 August 1986 was written, Capalaba's failure to register the lease did not amount to repudiation. The shortness of the time for registration limited by that letter and the absence of an intimation in the letter that that time would be regarded as of the essence deprive the letter of 21 August of the effect which a valid notice to complete would have had …

[649] I would not infer repudiation merely from non-registration within the time limited by the letter. However, I am unable to agree with the Full Court who, accepting that the notice was ineffectual, held that "until an effectual notice was given the delay continued but that alone was insufficient to make evident any intention on the part of [Capalaba] that it would not be bound by the contract". Repudiation may be established without proof of an effective notice to complete. The absence of an effective notice means that the other evidence must be examined to determine whether a clear inference of repudiation should be drawn, but it does not preclude the drawing of that inference.

If the evidence showed no more than 14 days of continued non-registration of the lease after 21 August 1986, I would not draw the inference of repudiation. But the letter of 21 August was followed by Capalaba's solicitors' letter of 3 September 1986. After assurances that the lease had been executed and the costs of stamping and registration had been paid, advice was given in March 1986 that the lessee's stamped parts of the lease would be provided as soon as the lease was available after its return from Melbourne expected "in the not too distant future", but there was no further communication from Capalaba or its solicitors. Then, stimulated by Laurinda's letter of 21 August 1986, Capalaba's solicitors, on the eve of the expiration of the time limited, advise merely that they have referred the letter to their client "for its response", undertaking to advise their "client's instructions". The long and unexplained delay from March to September 1986 ending with a letter stating that the solicitors required further instructions with respect to completing what had been promised over five months earlier is sufficient foundation for the drawing of an inference of repudiation. It is the inference which Laurinda drew and, although it cannot be said that no other reasonable inference is open, it is a reasonable inference which can be clearly drawn. I have vacillated in arriving at this conclusion but, having arrived at it, I would allow the appeal and restore the judgment of Connolly J.

[23.60] DEANE AND DAWSON JJ: [653] The innocent party who makes time of the essence of a contract by an effective notice to complete within a nominated time is bound by the notice in the sense that the time nominated for completion becomes of the essence for him as well as for the defaulting party (see, for example, Quadrangle Development and Construction Co Ltd v Jenner [1974] 1 WLR 68, 71; Balog v Crestani at 298). If – where completion involves action on his part – the innocent party himself fails to complete within that time, the other party will be able to take account of the then existing circumstances in determining whether to rescind the contract or to institute proceedings for its enforcement. The party giving the notice enjoys the like advantage since he may waive his right to terminate the contract for non-compliance with the requirements of the notice and bring proceedings for specific enforcement of the contract. This mutuality of the respective positions of the parties accords with equitable principle and the interdependent character of the contractual obligations involved. That being so, it would be anomalous if equity were to require that a notice to complete should unequivocally state that the party giving it will, in the stipulated circumstances, treat the contract as at an end in a context where it is unnecessary that he have any such unequivocal intention at the time of giving the notice and where, even if he had such an unequivocal intention at that time, he might subsequently waive the right to treat the contract as at an end and bring proceedings for its enforcement. Moreover, it is somewhat difficult to see why, as a matter of bare principle, a notice fixing a time for completion or performance does not, in the absence of other grounds for termination, constitute a repudiation of the contract if it unequivocally states that the party giving the notice will, on the expiry of what is subsequently held to be an unreasonably short period, act on the basis that the contract is at an end. True it is that these difficulties will be avoided or overcome if such an unequivocal statement in a notice to complete or perform is read as not meaning what it says but as being subject to an implied qualification that the party giving the notice will not treat the contract as at an end at all unless he both desires and is entitled to rescind at the expiry of the time which the notice fixes: compare Woodar Investment Development Ltd v Wimpey Construction UK Ltd [1980] 1 WLR 277. However, such distortion of the ordinary meaning of words serves only to illustrate the undesirability and potentially misleading consequences of a requirement that a notice to complete [653] contain such an unequivocal statement. The notions of fairness and good conscience which inspire the traditional doctrines of equity point strongly against any such inflexible requirement …

[T]he weight of past authority is debatable and clearly inadequate to justify this court in insisting upon a requirement that a notice to complete must unequivocally state that, in the event of non-compliance, the party giving the notice will treat the contract as at an end. That is not, of course, to suggest that a notice will be effective to make time of the essence of a contract with the consequence that the party giving the notice will be entitled to rescind in the event of non-compliance if it is inadequate to convey to a reasonable person in the position of the recipient that that is its purport and effect. The whole point of equity's intervention in relation to stipulations as to time was that, in the absence of express or implied contractual provision to the contrary, it regarded it as inequitable or unconscionable for a party to a contract to rescind for breach of a time stipulation without having given reasonable warning to the party in default. It seems to us, however, that, in modern circumstances, a notice will be adequate to convey such a warning if, but only if, it conveys either that the time fixed for performance is made of the essence of the contract or that the party giving the notice will, in the event of non-compliance, be entitled (or regard himself as entitled) to rescind. A notice, particularly one between solicitors, can convey those matters by implication.

The letter of 21 August 1986 from the lessee's solicitors contained no mention of termination of the contract. Nor did it state that time was being made of the essence or that the lessee would, in the event of non-compliance, be, or regard itself as being, entitled to rescind … [Their Honours then referred to the letter and continued:] On balance, however, it appears to us that [the letter was] inadequate to convey either of those matters in the circumstances of the present case. It follows that the letter was ineffective to make time of the essence of the contract …

[655] There remains for determination the question whether, even accepting that the letter of 21 August 1986 was inadequate to make time of the essence of the contract, the lessee was, by 5 September 1986, entitled to rescind the contract by reason of repudiation by the lessor. That question was resolved in the lessee's favour by Connolly J at first instance and in the lessor's favour by the Full Court. It can be said at once that we are in substantial agreement with the reasoning of Connolly J in relation to it …

[Their Honours then reviewed the correspondence and continued:] [657] It is in the above context that one must examine the effect of the letter of 21 August 1986 from the lessee's solicitors … The lessor's response was its solicitors' letter which was not posted until 3 September 1986, that is, the day before the last day allowed by the notice. That response bordered on the contemptuous. It conveyed no explanation of past failure to honour either contractual obligation or subsequent assurances. It contained no assurances at all as to the future …

The question which must now be answered is whether the lessor's conduct up to and including the letter of 3 September 1986 was such as to constitute repudiation of the contract …

[658] In the present case, the alleged repudiation by the lessor was of the fundamental obligation to produce a lease of the subject premises in registrable form. Clearly, there was unreasonable delay on the part of the lessor in the performance of that obligation. That delay was deliberate and was for the lessor's own commercial purposes. Its significance, from the viewpoint of a reasonable person in the position of the lessee, was heightened by an absence of explanation in the face of the lessee's requests and complaints and by the dishonouring of assurances given as to future conduct. Indeed, even the assurance that the lease had been executed by the lessor was misleading since it now appears that no completed form of lease had even been brought into existence. The letter of 21 August 1986 from the lessee's solicitors served to bring matters to a head. The totally unresponsive reply of 3 September 1986 seems to us to have taken the matter to a stage where the combined effect of dishonoured assurances, continued failure to produce a lease in registrable form and continued refusal properly to address the lessee's legitimate requirements and complaints was, to adapt words used by Fullagar J in Carr v J A Berriman Pty Ltd (at 351) such that a reasonable man could hardly draw any other inference than that the lessor was not prepared to take its primary obligation under the contract seriously …. [659]

It was, in our view, correctly resolved by the learned trial judge in the lessee's favour in the present case when he held that the lessor's conduct constituted repudiation of the contract which entitled the lessee to terminate it.

It follows that we would allow the appeal, set aside the orders of the Full Court of the Supreme Court and restore the orders made by the learned primary judge … [GAUDRON J agreed that the lessor's conduct amounted to repudiation.]

Appeal allowed.

ELECTION

[24.05] On breach of condition, grave breach of an intermediate term or repudiation, the party not in breach (the aggrieved party) has a right to terminate the contract. In this situation, it is said that the aggrieved party is put to his or her election. The essence of election is that an aggrieved party cannot take up two inconsistent positions. Either the aggrieved party must terminate the contract or he or she must affirm, that is continue with, the contract. Affirming a contract does not destroy the aggrieved party's right to sue for damages for the breach in question. Once it is made, an election is final and cannot be retracted. On what constitutes an election, see Chapter 25.

This chapter considers the consequences of an aggrieved party's decision either to affirm or to terminate a contract for both the aggrieved party and the other party.

WHERE THE CONTRACT IS AFFIRMED

Consequences of affirmation for the aggrieved party

[24.10] See Foran v Wight (1989) 168 CLR 385, extracted at [25.15].

Consequences of affirmation for the non-performing party

Right to rely on subsequent events

[24.15] Affirmation keeps the contract alive for the benefit of both parties: Bowes v Chaleyer (1923) 32 CLR 159, 197; Foran v Wight (1989) 168 CLR 385, 395 and 441. Accordingly, a party who has breached or repudiated a contract may be able to rely to her or his advantage on subsequent events, including subsequent breaches by the aggrieved party: Bowes v Chaleyer (1923) 32 CLR 159.

Bowes v Chaleyer

[24.20] Bowes v Chaleyer (1923) 32 CLR 159 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: The parties entered into a contract for the sale of 1,800 yards of French tie silks at various prices by Chaleyer, the plaintiff/respondent, to Bowes, the defendant/appellant. The contract contained the following term: "Goods to be shipped per sailer/steamer. Half as soon as possible. Half two months later".

A short time after the contract was made, the appellant wrote to the respondent, announcing that the appellant would be compelled to cancel the order due to concerns over the price of the tie silks. The respondent nonetheless proceeded to import the tie silks. Some 340 yards were shipped by the El Kantara on 21st October; some 800 yards by the Morea on 17th November; some 580 yards by the Naldera on 13th December. The respondent tendered each order to the appellant, but they were rejected. The appellant asserted that the contract had been cancelled shortly after it was made. The respondent sued the appellant, claiming as damages the difference between the contract price of the goods and the price obtained on the sale by auction, alleging that the appellant wrongfully repudiated the contract.]

KNOX CJ: [167] The first question for decision is whether the appellant was entitled to reject the goods tendered to him on the ground that the conditions of the contract as to shipment had not been complied with.

Three questions are involved, namely: (1) What is the meaning of the stipulation with respect to shipment? (2) Was the stipulation complied with? and (3) If not, did the failure to comply with it entitle the appellant to reject the goods tendered?

(1) As to the first of those questions, the words of the stipulation are "Goods to be shipped per sailer/steamer. Half as soon as possible. Half two months later." I can find no ambiguity in these words. Their natural or literal meaning appears to me to be that the goods were to be shipped by sailing ship or steamer in two instalments, each consisting of substantially one-half of the goods ordered, the first instalment to be shipped as soon as possible and the second instalment two months after the shipment of the first. Macfarlan J thought that the words "two months later" might mean either "not more than two months later," "exactly two months later," "as nearly as possible two months later," or "not less than two months later." I am unable to agree. I can find no justification in the context for adding to the plain and unambiguous expression "two months later" either the words "not more than" or the [168] words "not less than." The parties having expressed their agreement in plain words, it is not open to the Court to consider what their motives were or whether they may not have meant to stipulate for something different. In view of the dates and quantities of the respective shipments, it is not necessary to consider whether "two months later" meant "exactly two months later" or "as nearly as possible two months later."

(2) On the meaning which I attribute to the stipulation in question it is clear that the respondent did not comply with it …. In one respect, at any rate, the words of the agreement are clear, namely, in providing that a period of substantially two months must elapse between the shipment, ie, the complete shipment, of one-half of the goods ordered and the shipment of the other half; and, even assuming that the contract did not require the first half to be comprised in one shipment, the admitted facts show that neither the first shipment taken alone, nor the first and second shipments taken together, consisted even approximately of one-half of the goods ordered, and that the third shipment did not comprise even approximately one-half of the goods and was not made two months later than the second shipment, some portion of which was required to make up the first instalment of one-half.

(3) The stipulation in question fixed the times of shipment of the goods sold, as well as the amounts of the respective shipments. The general rule is that a stipulation in a contract for > the sale of goods that the goods shall be shipped at a given time is, at least prima facie, a condition precedent: see J Aron & Co v Comptoir Wegimont [1921] 3 KB 435, and the cases referred to by McCardie J in his judgment in that case. I can find nothing in the terms of the contract or in the circumstances of this case which requires that this stipulation should be considered otherwise than as a condition precedent, the breach of which would justify the appellant in rejecting the goods when tendered. The tender made on 19th January was not of [169] one-half the goods, nor was the tender which was made on 26th January; and on 8th February, when the third tender was made, the conditions of the contract as to shipment of both instalments had been broken.

But Mr Cohen, for the respondent, argued that the appellant had, in June 1920, repudiated his obligation under the contract and that his repudiation absolved the respondent from the necessity of showing that any condition precedent had been fulfilled; and in support of this argument he relied on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Braithwaite v Foreign Hardwood Co [1905] 2 KB 543. It is a sufficient answer to this argument that the repudiation by the appellant was never accepted by the respondent, who elected to proceed with the performance of the contract notwithstanding the repudiation. By his statement of claim the respondent alleges that in June 1920 the appellant wrongfully repudiated the contract. After that date the respondent procured the shipment of all the goods covered by the contract and, so far from accepting the repudiation, on three separate occasions tendered goods to the appellant in assumed performance of the contract. A repudiation, or, more properly, a breach by anticipation, of the contract by one party gives the other party the option of treating the contract as at an end or of waiting till the time for performance has arrived before making any claim for breach of contract. If he elects to wait – as the respondent did in this case – he remains liable to perform his part of the contract and enables the party in default to take advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify him in refusing to perform it: Halsbury's Laws of England, vol VII, p 439; Frost v Knight (1872) LR 7 Ex 111, 112 ….

[170] For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and judgment be entered for the appellant, the defendant in the action.

[24.25] HIGGINS J: In the plaintiff's order form, filled in and signed by the defendant, the plaintiff was requested to indent for the defendant certain tie silks, specified, from Europe: "Goods to be shipped per sailer/steamer. Half as soon as possible. Half two months later." It appears that some 340 yards were shipped by the El Kantara on 21st October; some 800 yards by the Morea on 17th November; some 580 yards by the Naldera on 13th December – all in 1920. It is clear, therefore, that the half-and-half stipulation was not observed; nor was there an interval of two months between the first and second shipments, or between the second and third shipments. The learned Judge who tried the action interpreted the words "half two months later" as meaning not more than two months later – just as if the words used were "half within two months afterwards." I regret that I cannot take this view of the meaning; I regret it because the defendant would probably not have accepted the goods even if the contract as to shipment had been literally fulfilled. But the emphatic word is "later"; and as there is nothing in the rest of the contract to qualify the words, I am constrained to take the view that there was to be an interval of substantially two months before the second shipment. Such a provision may well have a familiar commercial purpose – the merchant may well want an interval within which he may dispose of the first shipment before [188] he be called on to find the money for the second; or in arranging his contracts for a period to come, he may want to know how long, approximately, it will be before the ship can arrive with the goods. The parties may not have actually meant this effect; but we have to act not on what they actually meant, but on what they have said. Looking at the construction of the words as they stand, I can find no ground for treating the stipulation as to the interval between shipments as being other than a condition precedent to the duty of the purchaser to accept the goods ….

Unless, therefore, the alleged repudiation of the contract by the defendant relieved the plaintiff in some way of his obligation to have the goods shipped as provided in the contract, the defendant was not under any obligation to accept the goods ….

[190] It is clear, therefore, that on and after 19th January, if not before, the defendant gave absolute and unequivocal notice to the plaintiff that he would not accept the goods – would not perform the contract. The plaintiff then had a right of election: he could have concurred with the defendant in rescinding the contract, and bring an action for the breach; or he could have treated the notice as inoperative, and proceed with the contract. The plaintiff chose the latter course; and thereby he remained subject to all his own obligations under the contract, and the defendant remained in a position to take advantage of any failure of the plaintiff to do his part. A door must be either open or shut; a contract must either subsist or be at an end. This contract was not at an end; and the question remains, has the plaintiff failed to fulfil the conditions which would entitle him to payment from the defendant. On my view of the meaning of the words of the contract, the plaintiff has failed to have the goods shipped in halves, with an interval of two months; and the defendant is entitled to say, "what you offered to me is not that for which I bargained – non haec in foedera veni." [191] It is not for Courts to weigh the importance of conditions which parties choose to put into their contracts; the failure here must be treated as being as fatal as if the contract were for pigskins and the tender were of sheepskins.

Counsel for the plaintiff have relied on a case before the Court of Appeal in England: Braithwaite v Foreign Hardwood Co [1905] 2 KB 543. There a contract provided for the sale of rosewood to be delivered in Hull in instalments during 1903. There were two consignments. Before the first consignment reached Hull the buyers refused to accept any rosewood under the contract on a ground which was untenable. Afterwards, the plaintiff wrote saying that he had the bill of lading for the first consignment; and the defendants wrote refusing to take the bill of lading as they had repudiated the whole contract; and the plaintiff sold the consignment and claimed the difference between the contract price and the price on resale. The second consignment came, and the defendants again refused, and the consignment was resold at less than the contract price. It appeared subsequently that the first consignment was inferior in quality to that agreed on; the second consignment was satisfactory in quality. It was held by Kennedy J that the repudiation of the contract by the defendants was accepted by the plaintiff as a final repudiation; and that the defendants could only give evidence of inferior quality in reduction of damages. This decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeal on the ground that the refusal of the defendants to take the bill of lading (after the general repudiation) amounted to a waiver by the defendants of the performance by the plaintiff of the conditions precedent. There is no such waiver here of the performance by the plaintiff of the conditions precedent as to shipment. This case was discussed and followed in Taylor v Oakes, Roncoroni & Co (1922) 27 Com Cas, 261; 127 LT, 267; and Scrutton LJ said (1922) 27 Com Cas, 272–3; 127 LT, 271:

> The vendor, not accepting the first repudiation, tendered the bill of lading for the instalment, and the purchaser refused to take it, on the ground that there was a collateral contract which he inaccurately alleged to exist. Thereupon the vendor accepted the [192] second repudiation and sold the goods. It was held that it was no use the purchasers saying "Oh, but the goods you were going to tender were not in accordance with the contract," because once they had repudiated the contract and the repudiation had been accepted, the vendor was relieved from the necessity of proving his readiness and willingness.

The expressions used in Braithwaite's Case [1905] 2 KB 543 may not have been very carefully weighed; but the case lends no support to the argument that failure of the plaintiff to fulfil a condition precedent cannot be used as a defence where the plaintiff has not accepted the defendant's repudiation (see also British and Benington Ltd v North-Western Cachar Tea Co [1923] AC 48).

In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

I do not hesitate to say that my opinion is given with hesitation. For we have to interpret a loosely expressed contract – a printed form of the plaintiff, filled in carelessly, without a careful fitting of the written words to the printed. One may conjecture, for instance, that the word "sailer" was inadvertently left standing in the printed form "per sailer/steamer"; but as the word has not been crossed out, we must give it due effect. If I felt free to preface my judgment by a general statement that the respondent in all substantial respects has faithfully carried out his part of the transaction, and that all the elements of real justice are on the side of the respondent, my opinion would, of course, be in favour of the respondent; but I should feel that I was begging the whole question. The whole case turns on the construction of a peculiar contract which is not likely to be repeated.

[STARKE J reached a similar conclusion to Knox CJ and Higgins J. ISSACS and RICH JJ dissented.]

Appeal allowed.

WHERE THE CONTRACT IS TERMINATED

Consequences of termination for the aggrieved party

[24.30] Where an aggrieved party terminates a contract, that action brings to an end both parties' future obligations to perform under the contract. However, the contract is not rescinded from the beginning. This means that rights that have already been unconditionally acquired, or accrued, are not discharged: see McDonald v Dennys Lasceles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457, extracted at [29.85]. Examples of rights which have accrued before a contract is terminated include the right to recover payment for any part of the contract which has been performed (see Chapter 29) and the right to claim damages for any breaches accruing up until the time the contract was terminated (see Chapter 26).

Consequences of termination for the non-performing party

[24.35] As just noted, where a contract is terminated, rights which have accrued prior to termination continue in force and may accordingly be relied upon even by a party who has breached or repudiated the contract.

RESTRICTIONS ON THE RIGHT TO TERMINATE

[25.05] There are a number of ways in which a party who has a prima facie right to terminate a contract (the aggrieved party) may be restricted from exercising that right. The parties may themselves impose such restrictions by way of express terms. Some statutes also impose restrictions on the right to terminate for breach. This chapter is concerned with the legal and equitable principles which may restrict an aggrieved party's right to terminate a contract.

READINESS AND WILLINGNESS

[25.10] To be entitled to terminate a contract for breach or repudiation, an aggrieved party must generally be able to show that he or she was ready and willing to perform the contract. The time at which an aggrieved party must have been ready and willing to perform and what the aggrieved party must show to satisfy the requirement are discussed in Foran v Wight.

Foran v Wight

[25.15] Foran v Wight (1989) 168 CLR 385 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: A contract for the sale of land under which the purchaser paid a 10 per cent deposit of $7,500 provided for settlement on or before 22 June 1983 and in this respect time was of the essence. On 20 June 1983, the vendors' solicitor advised the purchasers' solicitor that the vendors would be unable to settle on 22 June as they would be unable by then to effect registration of a right of way as they were required under the contract to do. On 22 June, neither party tendered performance. On 24 June, the purchasers served a notice of rescission on the vendors based on the vendors' failure to complete on 22 June. The vendors refused to recognise the validity of the rescission. The purchasers sought declarations that the contract had been validly rescinded and that they were entitled to the return of the deposit.

The vendors claimed that the purchasers would not have been able to raise the purchase money by 22 June and, accordingly, they were not entitled to rescind the contract. The evidence as to the purchasers' financial condition was somewhat vague, but the trial judge found that if the purchasers bore the onus of proving their ability to pay the purchase price, they had not discharged it. Nevertheless the trial judge gave judgment for the purchasers on the basis of the repudiation by the vendors on 20 June. The Court of Appeal, Kirby P dissenting, set aside the judgment for the purchasers who then appealed to the High Court.]

DAWSON J: [440] The term of the contract requiring completion on or before 22 June 1983 was, by express provision, an essential term. Clearly enough, by indicating on 20 June 1983 that they would not be complying with it, the vendors were in anticipatory breach of the contract and had thereby repudiated it.

[441] In Afovos Shipping Co v Pagnan [1983] 1 WLR 195 at 230, Lord Diplock suggested that anticipatory breach of a contract by one party occurs only where "the threatened non-performance would have the effect of depriving [the] other party of substantially the whole benefit which it was the intention of the parties that he should obtain from the primary obligations of the parties under the contract then remaining unperformed …. The non-performance threatened must itself satisfy the criteria of a fundamental breach". Perhaps Lord Diplock was intending to suggest that an anticipatory breach of an essential (or fundamental) term need not necessarily amount to repudiation. On the other hand, perhaps he was recognizing that an anticipatory breach must be fundamental before it can amount to repudiation, whether it is fundamental because it is the breach of an essential term or for some other reason. An essential term is a term which the parties have agreed, or which the law says, goes to the root of the contract. In Laurinda Pty Ltd v Capalaba Park Shopping Centre Pty Ltd (1989) 166 CLR 623, Brennan J thought that anticipatory breach may amount to repudiation whether it is of an essential term or otherwise goes to the root of the contract. I see no reason to doubt that view. It is in accordance with the decision of this Court in Huppert v Stock Options of Australia Pty Ltd (1965) 112 CLR 414, and the observations of Dixon CJ in Rawson v Hobbs (1961) 107 CLR 466 at 480.

Repudiation by way of anticipatory breach by a party to a contract does not put an end to the contract unless the other party accepts the repudiation and rescinds the contract. Although he may do so, the other party does not have to accept the repudiation. He may continue to treat the contract as on foot and hold the party guilty of repudiation to the performance of his obligations. If those obligations remain unperformed when the time for performance arrives, the anticipatory breach will be converted into an actual breach. If the other party keeps the contract alive, he does so not only for his own benefit but also for the benefit of the party guilty of repudiation. The latter may, upon giving reasonable notice, [442] withdraw his repudiation and complete the contract and, subject to a qualification with which I shall deal, the other party remains bound by the contract, enabling the repudiating party to take advantage of any breach by the other party or any supervening event which would discharge him from liability. If the other party elects to rescind, the rescission is, of course, not ab initio. He is entitled to maintain an action for damages for the anticipatory breach, the damages being calculated by reference to the loss which he would suffer by the breach becoming actual, subject to any opportunity to mitigate his loss in the meantime. It is, I think, clear that the anticipatory breach of a contract amounting to repudiation cannot, if the repudiation is not accepted, continue beyond the time for performance. At that point, the failure to perform becomes an actual and not an anticipatory breach and the remedies available are for actual, rather than anticipatory, breach.

I have said that there is a qualification to the proposition that a party who elects not to accept the repudiation of a contract remains bound by the terms of the contract to perform the obligations which it imposes upon him. Whilst the contract remains on foot for both parties, if the repudiation by one party makes it futile or pointless for the other party to attempt to perform an obligation, the law does not require him to do so. The obligation remains — it does not disappear from the contract — but the other party is treated as if he had performed it in the limited sense that he is absolved from the consequences, which would otherwise flow from his non-performance. This principle, which emerged before the doctrine of anticipatory breach was formulated in 1853 in Hochster v De la Tour (1853) 2

El & Bl 678; 118 ER 922 was originally justified as being common sense, although it has latterly been seen as the early recognition of the now developed notions of estoppel.

In Jones v Barkley (1781) 2 Doug 684; 99 ER 434, which preceded the doctrine of anticipatory breach, the plaintiffs were under a contractual obligation to assign an equity of redemption and execute a release in consideration of a sum of money to be paid by the defendant. The [443] defendant refused to perform his part of the bargain. Lord Mansfield said (at 694; ER at 439–40):

> If ever there was a clear case, I think the present is. One need only state what the agreement, tender, and discharge, were, as set forth in the declaration. It charges, that the plaintiffs offered to assign, and to execute and deliver a general release, and tendered a draft of an assignment and release, and offered to execute and deliver such assignment, but the defendant absolutely discharged them from executing the same, or any assignment and release whatsoever. The defendant pleads, that the plaintiff did not actually execute an assignment and release; and the question is, whether there was a sufficient performance. Take it on the reason of the thing. The party must shew he was ready; but, if the other stops him on the ground of an intention not to perform his part, it is not necessary for the first to go farther, and do a nugatory act.

In Ripley v M'Clure (1849) 4 Ex 345; 154 ER 1245, also decided before the doctrine of anticipatory breach had emerged, the plaintiff had agreed to sell and the defendant to buy part of a cargo of tea to be exported from China. The goods were to be delivered to Belfast at a certain price, payable on delivery. It was held that a refusal by the defendant before the arrival of the cargo to perform his part of the agreement would dispense with the plaintiff's obligation to deliver the goods. Parke B put it in terms of waiver, saying (at 359–60; 1251):

> By an express refusal to comply with the conditions of the contract of purchase, the defendant must be understood to have said to the plaintiff, "You need not take the trouble to deliver the cargo to me, when it arrives at Belfast, as purchaser, for I never will become such;" and this would be a waiver, at that time, of the delivery, and, if unretracted, would dispense with the actual delivery after arrival.

And in Cort v Ambergate Railway Co (1851) 17 QB 127; 117 ER 1229, the plaintiffs, who jointly manufactured railway chairs, sued for breach of contract to manufacture and supply certain chairs to the defendants. The defendants, having accepted and paid for some of the chairs, told the plaintiffs not to supply any more as they would not accept or pay for them. The plaintiffs averred that they were ready and willing to perform the contract but were prevented from doing so by the defendants, an allegation which was traversed by the defendants. Lord Campbell CJ observed (at 144; 1236): [444]

> In common sense the meaning of such an averment of readiness and willingness must be that the noncompletion of the contract was not the fault of the plaintiffs, and that they were disposed and able to complete it if it had not been renounced by the defendants. What more can reasonably be required by the parties for whom the goods are to be manufactured? If, having accepted a part, they are unable to pay for the residue, and have resolved not to accept them, no benefit can accrue to them from a useless waste of materials and labour, which might possibly enhance the amount of damages to be awarded against them.

> Upon the whole, we think we are justified, on principle and without trenching on any former decision, in holding that, when there is an executory contract for the manufacturing and supply of goods from time to time, to be paid for after delivery, if the purchaser, having accepted and paid for a portion of the goods contracted for, gives notice to the vendor not to manufacture any more as he has no occasion for them and will not accept or pay for them, the vendor having been desirous and able to complete the contract, he may, without manufacturing and tendering the rest of the goods, maintain an action against the purchaser > for breach of contract; and that he is entitled to a verdict on pleas traversing allegations that he was ready and willing to perform the contract, that the defendant refused to accept the residue of the goods, and that he prevented and discharged the plaintiff from manufacturing and delivering them.

It may be thought that in that passage there are indications that the final destination of the principle would be found to lie in estoppel. There could be no claim by the plaintiffs based upon the delivery of the goods, but the defendants were, by reason of their representation, precluded (or estopped) from alleging that the plaintiffs were not ready or willing to deliver them.

Similar indications are to be found in Peter Turnbull & Co Pty Ltd v Mundus Trading Co (Australasia) Pty Ltd (1954) 90 CLR 235. In that case the defendant had contracted to sell oats to the plaintiff to be loaded in Sydney, during the months of January and February 1951, on a ship or ships to be nominated by the plaintiff. The defendant was having difficulty supplying the oats but persisted up to 28 February in saying that it could perform the contract by shipment in Melbourne, thus intimating to the plaintiff that it was useless to pursue the conditions of the contract applicable to shipment in Sydney and that the plaintiff need not do so. Dixon CJ pointed out that in the court below the case was treated as "one in which [445] the contract had been kept open by the plaintiff notwithstanding the defendant's intimation of its inability to perform it, with the consequence that the plaintiff was bound to fulfil the conditions on its part to be fulfilled": at 245. But, as Dixon CJ noted, the case was not as simple as that. The intimation by the defendant and the course pursued by it was an "additional element" which brought into application other principles of law. Although he did not speak in terms of estoppel, clearly enough what Dixon CJ was referring to as an additional element was the representation by the defendant that it was pointless for the plaintiff to nominate a ship for shipment in Sydney and the reliance of the plaintiff upon that representation in not making such a nomination. That was the circumstance which brought into play the principle of law which Dixon CJ (at 246–7) expressed as follows:

> Now long before the doctrine of anticipatory breach of contract was developed it was always the law that, if a contracting party prevented the fulfilment by the opposite party to the contract of a condition precedent therein expressed or implied, it was equal to performance thereof … But a plaintiff may be dispensed from performing a condition by the defendant expressly or impliedly intimating that it is useless for him to perform it and requesting him not to do so. If the plaintiff acts upon the intimation it is just as effectual as actual prevention….

It is necessary to deal with the decision in Braithwaite v Foreign [446] Hardwood Co [1905] 2 KB 543, more for the difficulty which it has caused than for the light which it shed upon the relevant principles. In that case, the plaintiff, who lived in British Honduras, contracted to sell a quantity of Honduras rosewood to the defendants by instalments. Payment was to be by cash against bill of lading. While the first consignment was on the sea, the defendants repudiated the contract and refused to accept any rosewood upon the ground that the seller had committed a breach of a collateral oral agreement not to supply rosewood to any other person in the trade. Ultimately the trial judge found that there was no such collateral agreement. After the defendants' repudiation of the contract, the plaintiff's agent informed the defendants that he had received the bill of lading for the first instalment, but the defendants again wrote refusing to take the bill of lading on the basis of their previous repudiation. When the first consignment of rosewood arrived, the plaintiff sold it as against the defendants and sought to recover the difference in price from them by way of damages. The trial judge, Kennedy J, found that the repudiation of the contract by the defendants was wrongful and that it was accepted by the plaintiff, presumably when the first consignment was sold. But he also found that a portion of the first consignment was not in accordance with the contract and that the defect would have entitled the defendants to repudiate the contract with respect to that consignment had they not previously wrongfully repudiated it. He awarded damages to the plaintiff, making allowance for the defective wood. No question arose with respect to a second consignment which was, in the absence of any collateral agreement, wrongly rejected by the defendants.

On appeal, Collins MR, somewhat inexplicitly in view of the finding of Kennedy J to the contrary, treated the defendants' repudiation of the contract as not having been accepted by the plaintiff. Upon that basis he expressed the view that the act of the defendants in refusing to take the bill of lading absolved the plaintiff from the obligation of delivering rosewood in accordance with the specifications of the contract. Cozens-Hardy LJ agreed with Collins MR. Mathew LJ, who purported to be of the same opinion, dealt with the matter (as appears from the report in (1905) 74 LJ KB 688 at 693–4) upon the basis that the plaintiff accepted the defendants' repudiation of the contract. He then described as "astonishing" the suggestion made by the defendants that, having discovered that their repudiation was wrongful, "they are entitled to fall back upon and to re-open the matter of the first consignment, [447] and to say that, as they have since discovered that the plaintiff would have been in a difficulty as to the delivery of that consignment, he was not in a position to perform the conditions precedent with respect to that consignment, and therefore cannot claim any damages with respect of it".

There have been various explanations of the decision in Braithwaite: see, for example, Taylor v Oakes Roncoroni and Co (1922) 127 LT 267; British and Benington's Ltd v NW Cachar Tea Co [1923] AC 48; Bowes v Chaleyer (1923) 32 CLR 159. Whatever explanation is the correct one, the reasons of the majority in Braithwaite may be interpreted as offering support for the proposition that where a contract is repudiated by a party to it, the other party, if he does not accept the repudiation and affirms the contract, is thereby absolved from tendering further performance under the contract, at all events unless and until the repudiation is withdrawn. Put in that way, that proposition has now been found unacceptable by the House of Lords in Fercometal v Mediterranean Shipping Co [1989] 1 AC 788. In that case, Lord Ackner, whose reasons were those of the House, favoured an interpretation of Braithwaite whereby after the first general repudiation by the defendants, there was an offer by the plaintiff to tender the bill of lading in relation to the first consignment, which was refused. Upon this view that refusal constituted a second repudiation by the defendants "which was accepted by sale in the market, thereby making it irrelevant to consider any question of waiver of conditions precedent": at 803. Upon this basis, Braithwaite does not support the above proposition for which it appears to be authority. On the other hand, if that explanation is incorrect and Braithwaite does support that proposition, then, in the opinion of Lord Ackner, it is wrong. In his view, the correct exposition of the law is as follows (at 805):

> When A wrongfully repudiates his contractual obligations in anticipation of the time for their performance, he presents the innocent party B with two choices. He may either affirm the contract by treating it as still in force or he may treat it as finally and conclusively discharged. There is no third choice, as a sort of via media, to affirm the contract and yet to be absolved from tendering further performance unless and until A gives reasonable notice that he is once again able and willing to perform. Such a choice would negate the contract being kept alive for the benefit of both parties and would deny the party who unsuccessfully sought to rescind, the right to take [448] advantage of any supervening circumstance which would justify him in declining to complete.

This statement of the law, by itself, does not accommodate the earlier cases beginning with Jones v Barkley to which Lord Ackner had earlier made reference. These cases "were concerned to absolve the "innocent party" from the need to render useless performance, which the repudiating buyer had indicated he no longer wanted": [1989] 1 AC at 797. The principle established by these cases may or may not be thought to provide a via media, but it is not possible to ignore them. Nor did Lord Ackner do so. However, in recognising them, he categorised them as cases of estoppel. Thus he says (at 805):

> Of course, it is always open to A, who has refused to accept B's repudiation of the contract, and thereby kept the contract alive, to contend that in relation to a particular right or obligation under the contract, B is estopped from contending that he, B, is entitled to exercise that right or that he, A, has remained bound by that obligation. If B represents to A that he no longer intends to exercise that right or requires that obligation to be fulfilled by A and A acts upon > that representation, then clearly B cannot be heard thereafter to say that he is entitled to exercise that right or that A is in breach of contract by not fulfilling that obligation.

Turning to Fercometal itself, it is not difficult to see why Lord Ackner chose to deal first with the doctrine of anticipatory breach as a separate issue and then to introduce a qualification by way of estoppel. Indeed, it may be inaccurate to speak of estoppel as a qualification for it rests upon its own principles, irrespective of whether those principles have previously been given express recognition in the context of anticipatory breach. In Fercometal, charterers entered into a charterparty with the owners of a vessel for the carriage of a cargo of steel from Durban to Bilbao. There was no time stipulated for the loading of the vessel, but the charterers were given the option of cancelling the charterparty should the vessel not be ready to load on or before 9 July 1982. Upon forming the view that the vessel would not be available for loading by 9 July, the charterers on 2 July purported to cancel the contract. That cancellation was premature and constituted a repudiation of the charterparty by way of anticipatory breach. The owners continued to assert the availability of the vessel. On 8 July, despite the owners' assertion that the vessel was available for loading, it was clear that it was not and on 12 July the charterers sent a further cancellation notice. The owners advanced a claim for [449] dead freight against the charterers, based upon a contention that the repudiation constituted by the first and wrongful cancellation, although not accepted, absolved the owners from any responsibility of having their vessel ready by the cancelling date, thus disentitling the charterers from cancelling on or after that date and enabling the owners to pursue their claim.

Clearly in that situation, there was, to use the words of Dixon CJ in Peter Turnbull, no "additional element" which, the contract having been kept alive, could have relieved the owners of their obligations under it. Thus, speaking in the language of estoppel, Lord Ackner concluded that there was no finding of any representation by the charterers that they no longer required the owners' vessel to arrive on time let alone that the owners were induced thereby not to make the vessel ready to load by 9 July.

There is, in truth, no difference between the "additional element" of which Dixon CJ spoke and the requirements of the law of estoppel, even taking the strictest view of those requirements ….

Under the contract, the obligation of the purchasers to pay the purchase price or the balance of the purchase price was simultaneous with the obligation of the vendors to deliver a conveyance. That is to say, they were mutual or concurrent obligations, the performance of each being conditional upon the performance of the other. [451] Not only were there concurrent obligations to settle but, an essential time having been fixed for settlement, there was an obligation on each side to settle within that time. The vendors intimated, however, that they could not settle within that time and impliedly intimated that it would be useless for the purchasers to attempt to do so. Unless there was some reason preventing them from doing so, the purchasers were entitled to rely upon the representation of the vendors as absolving them from tendering the purchase price within the stipulated time. In Mahoney v Lindsay (1980) 55 ALJR 118 at 119, Gibbs J, relying upon Peter Turnbull, expressed the situation as follows:

> The main argument submitted on behalf of the appellant was that in the circumstances, it was not proved that the respondents had been absolved from their obligation to seek out the vendor and tender the purchase money. However, if one party to a contract prevents the other from fulfilling a condition of the contract, that is equivalent to performance by the latter.

The reason why it is said that the purchasers were not entitled to rely upon the vendors' representation is that they, the purchasers, were not ready and willing to perform their obligations because they did not then have the finance to enable them to do so. Of course, the date for settlement had not arrived at the time the vendors repudiated the contract and, as will appear, it is necessary to consider the purchasers' obligation at that time with that fact in mind. I shall return to that aspect of the matter shortly. First it is necessary to settle the question whether the purchasers were under any obligation to prove, as plaintiffs, that, notwithstanding the vendors' repudiation, they were ready and willing to perform their obligations under the contract. Of course, readiness and willingness implies not only disposition, but also capacity: De Medina v Norman (1842) 9 M & W 820 at 827; 152 ER 347 at 350.

In any action for breach of contract, the readiness and willingness of the plaintiff to perform those mutual obligations remaining to be performed on his part under the contract is a condition precedent to his right to recover: see Hensley v Reschke (1914) 18 CLR 452. Under the old rules a plaintiff was required to plead that he was ready and willing but under the present rules that fact is implied with the effect that he is not required to prove it unless the defendant puts it in issue. In that [452] event, the burden of proving readiness and willingness rests upon the plaintiff. See Supreme Court Rules 1970 (NSW) Pt 15, r 11. But what if the breach is anticipatory rather than actual? The authorities have given conflicting answers to this question, but it is now clear that in cases of repudiation as well as actual breach, readiness and willingness on the part of the plaintiff is part of his cause of action. The position was clearly stated in DTR Nominees Pty Ltd v Mona Homes Pty Ltd (1978) 138 CLR 423 at 433:

> A party in order to be entitled to rescind for anticipatory breach must at the time of rescission himself be willing to perform the contract on its proper interpretation. Otherwise he is not an innocent party, the common description of a party entitled to rescind for anticipatory breach …

Nevertheless there are those who have held a contrary view. In Bowes v Chaleyer (1923) 32 CLR 159 at 198, Starke J said: "No doubt, if a party repudiates a contract and the repudiation is accepted and acted upon by the other party, then the latter is relieved from proving readiness and willingness on his part to perform the contract." See also per Higgins J. A similar view was expressed in Taylor v Oakes, Roncoroni and Co, and by Lord Atkinson in British and Beningtons Ltd v NW Cachar Tea Co. And support for the proposition is to be found in the judgment of Collins MR in Braithwaite v Foreign Hardwood Co and in YP Barley Producers Ltd v EC Robertson Pty Ltd [1927] VLR 194 at 209.

The errors in these cases lay, I think, in attempting to carry too far the principle that the repudiation by one party of a contract may absolve the other party from the obligation of tendering useless performance. No doubt that principle, when it applies, may reduce the extent, or alter the nature, of the readiness and willingness which a plaintiff is required to show, but there is no reason why it should eliminate the requirement entirely. A party should not be able to sue for breach if he is unable or unwilling to carry out his part of the bargain; where, in other words, he is not the innocent party. Even where a party has been absolved by the repudiating party from performing his future obligations under the contract he must show that at the time of the repudiation he was ready and willing to complete the contract had it not been repudiated. But in proving his readiness and willingness where he has been absolved from tendering performance he may not have to prove a great deal. [453] For example, in Cort v Ambergate Railway Co the plaintiffs could and did prove that they were ready and willing to manufacture railway chairs in accordance with their contract at the time it was repudiated by the defendants. But they were not required to prove that they had taken steps to manufacture the chairs in order to be able to tender them.

Dixon J recognised the limited scope of the readiness and willingness required of a plaintiff in the case of anticipatory breach of a contract. In Psaltis v Schultz (1948) 76 CLR 547 at 560, he expressed it in this way:

> To be ready and willing to perform a contract a party must not only be disposed to do the act promised but also have the capacity to do it. But the tenor of the promise will show when and how the act is to be performed and it is to that time and mode of performance that the capacity and disposition to fulfil the promise are to be directed. It is enough that he is not presently incapacitated from future performance and is not indisposed to do, when the time comes, what the contract requires.

And in Rawson v Hobbs Dixon CJ returned to the question. He said (at 480–1):

> It is hardly necessary to say that once there has been a renunciation of a contract or of future performance of an essential obligation thereof by one contracting party, the other if he elects to treat that as an anticipatory breach discharging the contract is relieved from all further obligation to perform on his side and in consequence need not thereafter be > ready and willing to do what would otherwise be his part. But that is not the question. What is the question is whether up to that point he must not be ready and willing to proceed with the contract and, as and when the time comes to do his part, so far as it is of the essence, to perform the contract on his side…. One must be very careful to see that nothing but a substantial incapacity or definitive resolve or decision against doing in the future what the contract requires is counted as an absence of readiness and willingness. On the other hand it is absurd to treat one party as tied to the performance of an executory contract although the other has neither the means nor intention of performing his part when his turn comes, simply because his incapacity to do so is not necessarily final or logically complete.

In this case, the purchasers did not accept the vendors' repudiation of the contract but terminated the contract for actual breach. But the vendors' implied intimation to the purchasers that [454] there was no point in their attempting to tender the purchase price on the due date was sufficient to alter the nature of the readiness and willingness which the purchasers were required to prove, that being put in issue by the vendors. They were not required to show that upon the day stipulated for settlement they were ready and willing to tender the purchase price. They were absolved from the obligation of placing themselves in a position to be able to tender the purchase price upon that day by reason of the representation of the vendors two days earlier. All that the purchasers were required to show was that at the time of the repudiation, that is, at the time they were absolved from future performance, there was not a "substantial incapacity" on their part or a "definitive resolve or decision" against the performance of their obligations.

The question whether the purchasers satisfied this onus is not without some difficulty because the trial judge directed his attention to the situation on the date stipulated for settlement rather than the situation two days before. However, the purchasers did not have to prove that they could have raised the amount needed to complete the financing of their purchase by the time stipulated for settlement. They merely had to prove that, at the time of the defendants' repudiation, two days before the settlement date, they were not incapacitated from raising that amount and had not resolved or decided against doing so. That was a relatively light burden to discharge and, upon the evidence, I think that the plaintiffs did discharge it. There is nothing in the trial judge's findings which requires a contrary conclusion.

Treating the situation as one giving rise to an estoppel, it can be seen that the vendors, by indicating their inability to settle and their intention of not doing so, represented to the purchasers that they did not require them to tender the purchase price and would not hold them in breach of contract for not doing so. The purchasers in reliance upon the representation did not tender the balance of the purchase price and would, upon the date fixed for settlement, have been in breach of contract if the vendors had not been estopped from denying the truth of their representation. Thus, in relying upon the vendors' representation the purchasers placed themselves at risk of non-performance – in a position of detriment – unless the vendors were kept to their word. The vendors were estopped. Had the purchasers pursued their claim for damages, the question may have arisen whether, notwithstanding that at the time of the vendors' repudiation they were ready and willing to proceed with the contract and to perform their future obligations as they fell due, the purchasers were nevertheless unable to prove their loss. Subsequent events may have established that the balance of the [455] purchase price was unavailable to them by the time settlement was due: compare The Mihalis Angelos [1971] 1 QB 164. Had the purchasers claimed damages and been unable to prove their loss for this reason, they would have been entitled only to nominal damages.

But the purchasers seek only to recover the deposit paid by them. That is not a claim for damages. It is a claim for money had and received and is based upon an imputed promise to repay, the money having been paid for a consideration that has wholly failed. The purchasers are entitled to the return of the deposit.

I would allow the appeal.

[25.20] MASON CJ [delivered a long judgment in which he reviewed the authorities in detail. He came to substantially the same conclusion on the law as did Dawson and Brennan JJ, and, with the exception of the point dealt with in the extract of the judgment of Deane J below, as did Deane J. His Honour, however, took a different view of the evidence, which he thought necessarily led to the conclusion that the purchasers would not have been able to raise the purchase price by the day on which they purported to discharge the contract even if they had continued to make every effort to obtain the necessary funds. His Honour said]: [408] Accordingly, in relation to termination for actual breach, the principle is that established by their earlier decisions – the plaintiff is required to show that he was ready and willing to perform the contract if it had not been repudiated by the plaintiff. In other words, the requirement is that the plaintiff be ready and willing to perform except to the extent that the defendant dispensed with his performance. In the case of an anticipatory renunciation accepted by the plaintiff, the requirement of readiness and willingness extends only up to the time of acceptance because then the earlier repudiation results in an early termination of the contract. Accordingly, in the case of actual breach the requirement of readiness and willingness is more stringent; it continues through to the time for performance. That is because the termination of the contract does not antedate the time for performance. Subject to this difference and to the possibility of a difference in the onus of proof, the principle to be applied in the case of actual breach is consistent with that to be applied on the case of termination for anticipatory breach. The difference in the onus of proof arises because in the case of termination for anticipatory breach the plaintiff will generally be able to show at the time of termination that he would have been able to perform at the time for performance by demonstrating that he was not then disabled or incapacitated from [409] such performance. As Dixon CJ noted in Rawson v Hobbs at 481 one "must be very careful to see that nothing but a substantial incapacity or definitive resolve or decision against doing in the future what the contract requires is counted as an absence of readiness and willingness". However, in the present case, the anticipatory breach of the vendors was not accepted. The case is one of termination for actual breach. The time for determining whether or not the purchasers would have been ready and willing to perform the contract had it not been for the dispensing conduct of the vendors is therefore the time for performance. The purchasers have not discharged the onus of showing that at that time they would have been so ready and willing. It follows that the purchasers are unable to justify their termination by reference to the ordinary principles of contract law. It is necessary now to turn to the doctrine of estoppel in order to ascertain whether the application of that doctrine enables the purchasers to succeed …

[412] The same principle [of estoppel] may be applied to the purchasers in this case if they acted to their detriment on the faith of the representation by not tendering performance on 22 June. The estoppel would operate to protect the purchasers from a claim by the vendors that the purchasers' failure to tender performance constituted a breach of contract and, as well, to enable the purchasers to maintain their termination of the contract on the footing that the vendors, not the purchasers, were in breach of the contract.

This brings me to the question whether the purchasers acted to their detriment in reliance upon the vendors' representation. The purchasers acted in reliance upon the representation by not continuing their efforts to procure finance and by not tendering performance on 22 June. Whether they did so to their detriment is the critical issue. If, in any event, quite apart from the making of the representation, the purchasers would have been unable to tender performance on that date, due to the inadequacy of their financial resources, there can be no basis for concluding that they were induced by the representation to act to their detriment …

[413] My conclusion adverse to the purchasers on the issue of readiness and willingness denies that the purchasers sustained a relevant detriment in consequence of their reliance upon the representation. Although it might be true to say that, as a result of the vendors' intimation, the purchasers lost the chance of tendering the purchase price and therefore were subjected to the requirement that they demonstrate that they would have been ready and willing to perform but for that intimation, the evidence reveals that that chance would have come to nothing. The purchasers cannot by invoking the doctrine of estoppel avoid the need to show that the vendors' conduct caused them not to perform the contract. The contract went off for two reasons: first, because the purchasers lacked the financial resources to complete on the appointed day; secondly, because the vendors were unable to complete on the appointed day as the right of way could not be registered in time. Accordingly, the failure of the contract was as much due to the purchasers' incapacity as that of the vendors. But in order to terminate the contract the purchasers needed to show that the vendors were at fault. The consequence is that the purchasers did not validly terminate the contract. In this situation it might at first seem just and fair that the purchasers should recover their deposit but it is conceded that, if the purchasers did not validly terminate, the vendors' later termination of the contract was valid and it was not contested, in this event, that the purchasers' claim to recover the deposit should fail. In any case, so long as the contract continued on foot, it governed the relations between the parties and there is no basis in these circumstances for an appeal to the law of quasi-contract. In the result I would dismiss the appeal.

[25.25] BRENNAN J [also delivered a long judgment in which he reviewed the authorities and relevant principles in considerable detail. The judgment is extracted on several specific points]: [416] When a promise is an essential term of a contract, an announcement by the promisor before the time for performance arrives that he will not perform the promise is an anticipatory breach amounting to a repudiation of the contract conferring on the promisee a right to rescind the contract. It is unnecessary, in my opinion, that an anticipatory breach be classified as "fundamental" in any other respect in order to amount to a repudiation: but cf per Lord Diplock in Afovos Shipping Co v Pagnan …

[425] In Rawson v Hobbs at 418 Dixon CJ expressed a caution against lightly finding a party not to be ready and willing:

> One must be very careful to see that nothing but a substantial incapacity or definitive resolve or decision against doing in the future what the contract requires is counted as an absence of readiness and willingness. On the other hand it is absurd to treat one party as tied to the performance of an executory contract although the other has neither the means nor intention of performing his part when his turn comes, simply because his incapacity to do so is not necessarily final or logically complete.

To speak of an incapacity which is "substantial" and of a resolve or decision which is "definitive" is to import a test of degree. A test of degree inevitably gives rise to differences in the evaluation of facts and produces some uncertainty in the resolution of concrete cases. Yet, in the great variety of circumstances to which the test might be applied, it is impossible to posit terms of greater precision. Lord Sumner's phrase — "wholly and finally disabled" — is too demanding a test of incapacity to accord with reasonable commercial practice but it is indicative of the range which the test of substantiality connotes. The test of incapacity, either as a ground of rescission or as an element of readiness and willingness, is an exacting test though it must be expressed as a matter of degree …

[427] In the light of this discussion, I would state the relevant principles thus: if an executory contract creates obligations which are mutually dependent and concurrent and, before the time for performance of the obligations arrives, one party, A, gives the other party, B, an intimation that it will be useless for B to tender performance and B abstains from performing his obligation in reliance on A's intimation, B is dispensed from performing his obligation and A's obligation is absolute provided that B had not repudiated the contract and he was ready and willing to perform his obligation up to the time when the intimation was given. It is immaterial that A's intimation amounts to a repudiation of the contract unless B terminates the contract by accepting the repudiation. If, at the time when the intimation was given, B was substantially incapable of future performance of his obligation or had already definitively resolved or decided not to perform it, B was not ready and willing. If B was not then ready and willing, A's failure to perform his obligation when the time for performance arrives is no breach of contract …

Damages and rescission

[25.30] [430] A breach by A of an essential term of the contract entitles B to rescind the contract and to recover damages for the loss of the benefit to which, had the contract been performed, he would have been entitled. Whether the breach be anticipatory or actual, it is necessary to form an estimate of what would have happened had the contract been performed in comparison with what has happened, the contract being broken.

Where B, being otherwise ready and willing to perform his part of mutually dependent and concurrent obligations, acts on A's intimation of non-performance and does not tender performance of his own obligation, he is entitled to damages for A's non-performance. In assessing the damages, it is necessary to form an estimate of the benefit to which B would have been entitled had A performed his contractual obligation. Where, as in this case, a purchaser who has made no announcement that he will not complete and who is attempting to raise finance in order to complete when the vendor intimates that he will not complete on the stipulated day, the purchaser's entitlement to damages for the vendor's failure to complete on that day depends on two related but distinct questions: first, whether the purchaser was at the time of the intimation substantially incapable of raising the finance and, second, whether it is more likely than not that the purchaser would have succeeded in raising the finance. A reasonable prospect of a purchaser's raising finance (the converse of "substantial incapacity") suffices to show that the purchaser was ready and willing at the time of the intimation, but it does not establish that the purchaser would have been ready and willing to complete when the time for completion arrived and would have become entitled to the benefit of the completed contract. The onus is on the purchaser to establish his damages on the balance of probabilities. The readiness and willingness which must be shown by a purchaser in proof of his damages for the vendor's breach in failing to complete at the stipulated time is readiness and willingness to pay the price at that time …

[431] Readiness and willingness to pay the price when the time for completion arrives is a condition precedent to the recovery of substantial damages, but proof of that kind of readiness and willingness is not essential to establish that a vendor who has given an intimation of non-performance and who fails to perform is in breach.

The problem of assessing damages does not arise in this case, where the purchasers have purported to rescind for the vendors' breach and seek merely to recover the deposit. The finding, albeit obiter, of Needham J that the purchasers had not discharged the onus of proving readiness to complete seems to relate to the likelihood of the purchasers' having in hand on 22 June the finance needed to settle. That question does not fall for determination. Had the purchasers sought to recover substantial damages from the vendors for the vendors' failure to complete on 22 June, the purchasers' inability to prove on the balance of probabilities that they would have been able to pay the price on that day would have been fatal to the claim. But the purchasers abandoned a claim for damages for the vendors' breach.

The true question is whether, when the vendors intimated on 20 June that they could not complete on 22 June, the purchasers were already "substantially incapable" of raising the needed finance to tender on 22 June. The purchasers were undoubtedly encountering grave difficulties in raising the finance they needed — on 20 June they were perhaps $10 000 short of the amount needed to complete — but their difficulties were not so grave that in their view it was futile to continue the effort. The male purchaser's evidence not only contains an assertion that he was able to complete; it contains an expression of confidence that his mother and his bank would make up the shortfall. Though Needham J was not convinced that either source would produce the finance needed, the male purchaser apparently had a good relationship with both prospective sources neither of whom was shown to be without lending capability. Those circumstances preclude a finding that, when the vendors' solicitor intimated on 20 June that the contract [432] could not be completed on 22 June, the purchasers were substantially incapable of raising the finance needed to complete. After the vendors' solicitor intimated that completion would not take place on 22 June, the purchasers apparently acted upon the intimation of 20 June, suspended the arrangements with the finance company which was to provide the major part of the finance, and did not tender the balance of the price on 22 June. The facts support the inferences that the purchasers acted on the vendors' solicitor's intimation and were, up to the time when the intimation was given, ready and willing to complete. In those circumstances, the vendors' failure to complete on 22 June was a breach of contract which entitled the purchasers to rescind. The purchasers were content with the declarations made by the trial judge that the contract was validly rescinded and that they were entitled to a return of the deposit.

Recovery of deposit

[25.35] Upon rescission of the contract, the consideration for which the purchasers had paid for the deposit failed totally. The purchasers became entitled to recover the deposit not as damages but in quasi-contract as money paid for a consideration that had totally failed: see Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32. The purchasers' claim for the deposit was not founded on the contract which they rescinded.

The appeal should be allowed, the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be set aside and the judgment of Needham J restored.

[25.40] DEANE J [except for the passage extracted below, delivered a judgment generally in accordance with the principles expressed by Mason CJ and Brennan and Dawson JJ]: [437] [I]t is strictly unnecessary that I express any view on the question whether one party to a contract is precluded from rescinding it by accepting a repudiation of the contract by the other party if he is not in a position to prove that he is, or but for the repudiation would have been, ready, willing and able to perform the contract. However, in view of the discussion of that question in other judgments, it would seem desirable that I indicate that, notwithstanding some statements of authority to the contrary, I do not accept the proposition that a party must incur the expense necessary to put himself in a position where he can positively demonstrate actual or potential readiness and willingness to perform a contract before he can accept the repudiation of the other party and thereby rescind. In my view, that proposition is unjustified by either principle or common sense. Absence of actual or potential readiness or willingness to perform a contract will prima facie preclude a successful action against the other party for specific enforcement of the contract or for the recovery of damages for its breach. It does not, of itself, preclude rescission of the contract by acceptance of the other party's repudiation. Were it otherwise, the law would require the useless and futile expenditure by an innocent party of whatever time, effort or money was necessary to place himself in a position where he could positively demonstrate actual or potential ability to perform a contract in order to be able to bring it to an end on the ground that it had already been repudiated by the other party. Indeed, it is difficult to see why, as a matter of [438] principle or common sense, actual breach or even repudiation by one party to a contract should prevent that party from rescinding the contract by accepting a repudiation of the contract by the other party. Put differently, it is difficult to see why the law should insist that, even though both parties to a contract have repudiated it, the contract must hang like an albatross around their necks unless and until they reach a new agreement about its termination. The point can be illustrated by the hypothetical example of express repudiation by each party to a contract followed by acceptance of the other's repudiation and unilateral rescission of each of them. How can it be said that, in those circumstances, the law continues to require that each perform the contract?

It follows from what has been said above that the purchasers were entitled to rescind the contract. This they did. Upon rescission, the purchasers were entitled to obtain restitution of the deposit which they had paid. Their claim for the return of the deposit was not founded on the rescinded contract. Nor did it represent a claim for damages for the vendors' breach of its terms. It was a claim founded in the equitable notions of fair dealing and good conscience which require restitution of a benefit received as, or as part of, the quid pro quo for a consideration which has failed: compare per Lord Wright, Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd at 64–6; Muschinski v Dodds (1985) 160

CLR 583 at 618–20. If it be necessary to clothe that claim in a nomenclature, the appropriate one in a modern context is "restitution" for, or of, "unjust enrichment". The benefit whose receipt falls into one of the categories of case which the law characterises as unjust enrichment may be actual. Alternatively, it may be constructive as, for example, where it involves full or partial performance of something requested to be done. The benefit constituting the unjust enrichment in the present case was actual in that it would seem to be common ground that the deposit which the purchasers seek to recover was actually received by or on behalf of the vendors.

If the purchasers had sustained other loss caused by the vendors' repudiation of the contract, it would have been open to them to claim damages for breach of contract. Such a claim would, however, have succeeded only if the purchasers could discharge the onus of establishing that such further loss had been in fact sustained by them and had been caused by the vendors' breach. The learned trial judge's finding that the purchasers had not established on the balance of probabilities that they would, but for the vendors' [439] repudiation, have been able to complete the contract would, while it stands and subject to the possible effect of any relevant estoppel, preclude them from discharging that onus. They do not, however, seek to recover such additional damages.

I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal and restore the judgment of Needham J.

[25.45] GAUDRON J: [458] It was said by Lord Ackner in Fercometal v Mediterranean Shipping Co at 805, that "[t]here is no third choice, as a sort of via media, to affirm the contract and yet to be absolved from tendering further performance unless and until [the other party] gives reasonable notice that he is once again able and willing to perform". Subject to the operation of an estoppel or waiver (as was seemingly recognised by his Lordship at 805 and as operated in Peter Turnbull), that is an accurate statement of the law. Thus, in the present case it was possible for the purchasers to affirm the contract and yet to be freed from tendering performance on the essential day by the vendors' waiver of the benefit of that essentiality. However, it should be emphasised that affirmation is no more than an acknowledgment of the continued existence of the contract.

In the present case the purchaser did not rescind upon receipt of the communication that the vendors were unable to settle on the stipulated day made essential for settlement by the contract. Even if it be accepted that this amounted to an election to affirm the contract, the obligations affirmed were the obligations brought into existence by the contract, namely, to settle on the day made essential by the contract. Nothing that the purchasers did following receipt of the communication amounted to a waiver of that essentiality. The consequence was that, once the day made essential had passed, the contract could no longer be performed according to its essential term and there was no consensus, as in the case of mutual waiver, to support a variation of that term. The conclusion to be drawn from that situation is that the contractual obligations had come to an end, and the notice of rescission operated to put the matter beyond dispute such as might arise in the event that no action were taken and it were to be asserted that that inaction amounted to waiver of essentiality. That being so, I agree with Brennan J that the deposit was recoverable as money paid for a consideration that wholly failed.

The appeal should be allowed, the orders of the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales should be set aside and in lieu thereof it should be ordered that the appeal to that court be dismissed with costs.

[Some of the judgments also contained considerable discussion of the principles of equitable estoppel. This discussion has not been extracted as it has been largely overtaken by the views expressed by their Honours in Commonwealth v Verwayen at [9.80].]

Appeal allowed.

[25.48] Notes

1. In Sharjade Pty Ltd v Commonwealth [2009] NSWCA 373, Hodgson JA found that the views expressed in Foran v Wight as to whether an aggrieved party who seeks to terminate a contract based on the other party's anticipatory breach must show that he or she is ready and willing to perform, were made by way of obiter dicta. His Honour found that, as a matter of principle, Deane J's view is preferable (at [62]–[68]). Hodgson JA found that an anticipatory breach that amounts to repudiation should justify termination by the aggrieved party whether or not the aggrieved party was itself ready and willing to perform. According to Hodgson JA, in such circumstances, the aggrieved party needs only to establish that he or she was ready and willing to perform the contract if he or she seeks damages. Young JA (at [145] and [156]) and Sackville AJA (at [163]) agreed in principle with Hodgson JA's view but decided the case on a more traditional basis. They found that as the aggrieved party had only breached a non-essential term, the aggrieved party was entitled to terminate the contract.

2. The fact that a party who wishes to terminate has breached the contract does not generally prevent that party from terminating. There are two views as to the types of breach that will preclude termination:

   In Lantry v Tomule Pty Ltd [2007] NSWSC 81, [81], White J said:

   > [I]n the case of termination for breach, a party seeking to terminate for the opposite party's breach is not precluded from doing so by reason of his own breach of contract if he has not repudiated the contract, if his breach is of a non-essential term, and if there is no causal relationship between his breach and that of the opposite party (see Nina's Bistro Bar Ltd (formerly Mytcoona Pty Ltd) v MBE Corporation (Sydney) Pty Ltd [1984] 3 NSWLR 613 at 620 and 632; Road Show Entertainment Pty Ltd v (ACN 053 006 269) Pty Ltd [1997] NSWSC 473; (1997) 42 NSWLR 462 at 479-480).

   In Sharjade Pty Ltd v Commonwealth [2009] NSWCA 373, Hodgson JA took the view that a party in breach of an essential term is not necessarily precluded from terminating:

   > [54] A further and more difficult question is whether … a party who is also in breach of the contract … can terminate despite its own breach. The answer is that generally it can, at least unless the obligations breached are interdependent or the breach by the party wishing to terminate has caused the breach that this party wishes to rely on.
   > [55] As regards the former exception, it seems clear for example that, under a contract for the sale of land, the obligation of the vendor to transfer the land and the obligation of the purchaser to pay the price on completion are mutually dependent and concurrent; and that generally neither party who fails to perform its obligation when the time for performance arrives can terminate for the other party's failure at that time to perform its obligation: Foran v Wight, at 396 per Mason CJ, 417 per Brennan J and 433 per Deane J. However, there is a question whether this is a true or merely apparent exception to the general position stated in the previous paragraph, because the correct analysis may be that in such a case there is no breach at all, rather than that there is an inhibition on terminating for breach.
   > [56] As regards the latter exception, it seems clear that a party cannot rely on an event as a ground for terminating a contract if that event has been caused by that party's own breach of contract: see for example Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd (1950) 81 CLR 418 at 440-442, Nina's Bar Bistro Pty Ltd v MBE Corporation (Sydney) Pty Ltd [1984] 3 NSWLR 613, Plumor Pty Limited v Handley (1996) 41 NSWLR 30. The latter two cases also decided, correctly in my opinion, that the onus of proof lies on the party resisting termination, that is, the party who wishes to assert that the event that would otherwise justify termination was caused by the party seeking to rely on that event.

[57] In the absence of such interdependence or a proved causal link, the circumstance that a party is itself in breach does not generally disentitle it to rely on the other party's breach of contract, if that breach would otherwise entitle the former to terminate: Nina's Bar, State Trading Corporation of India Ltd v M Golodetz Ltd [1989] 2 Lloyds Reports 277, Roadshow Entertainment Pty Ltd v (ACN 053 006 269) Pty Ltd [1997] NSWSC 473; (1997) 42 NSWLR 462. This position is assumed in the decision of the High Court of Australia in The Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64. Even if the terminating party's breach were itself sufficient to justify termination, in my opinion the better view is that this would not of itself preclude termination by that party, so long as the terms breached were independent and the causal link referred to earlier was not established: see Golodetz at 285-287, Roadshow at 481. (This passage from Roadshow was quoted with approval by Powell JA, with whom Meagher JA agreed, in Kyrwood v Drinkwater [2000] NSWCA 126 at [154]; although opposing views have been expressed by Fitzgerald JA in dissent in that case, and by Gummow J in Thors v Weekes (1989) 92 ALR 131 at 143-144 and White J in Rona v Shimden Pty Ltd [2005] NSWSC 818; (2005) 12 BPR 23,287 at [92].)

[25.50] An aggrieved party faced with an event which entitles her or him to terminate the contract has a choice between terminating and continuing with, or affirming, the contract. The doctrine of election refers to this choice between alternative rights. Once made, an election is generally final and cannot be retracted.

There are two requirements for an election to affirm a contract:

1. knowledge of at least the facts giving rise to the right to terminate; and
2. unequivocal conduct consistent only with a choice to continue with the contract.

Tropical Traders v Goonan

[25.55] Tropical Traders Ltd v Goonan (1964) 111 CLR 41 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Western Australia.

[FACTS: A contract for the sale of land by Tropical Traders, the vendor/appellant, to Goonan, the purchaser/respondents, dated 6 January 1958 and of which time was of the essence (cl 12) provided that the purchase price of £47,500 was payable as to £10,000 by way of deposit (£500 before signature and the balance by 6 January), four sums of £5,000 each at 12 monthly intervals and the balance of £17,500 five years from the date of the agreement. Interest on the outstanding balance of the purchase price was payable. Clause 11 of the contract provided that if the purchaser failed to pay the deposit or any other moneys payable by the respective times, the appellant could rescind the contract and all moneys paid would be forfeited to the appellant. The balance of the deposit was paid one day late, and the first three instalments of £5,000 plus interest were paid 3, 13 and 5 days late respectively. The fourth payment was 10 days early. The balance of £17,500 was due on 6 January 1963, a Sunday. On 7 January, the respondent paid the interest due but sought an extension of three months in which to pay the balance owing. On 9 January, the appellant's solicitors wrote to the respondents confirming a telephone conversation of the previous day, the material part of the letter being: "In order to give you an opportunity of finding the money and subject to the payment of an additional £50 to cover further interest on (sic) the Company's costs and expenses, the Company will not take action under the contract until Monday, 14 January but this must be regarded as an act of grace on the part of the Company and without prejudice to and in no way varying the Company's right to the strict enforcement of the contract."

On 14 January, the appellant, not having received the final payment, gave notice of rescission and sought a declaration that the contract had been validly rescinded. The respondents counterclaimed for specific performance. Jackson SPJ dismissed the appellant's claim and ordered specific performance. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

KITTO J: [51] The question for decision is whether this purported rescission was effectual. The respondents say that it was not, for reasons which may be summarised under four heads:

> (1) by accepting late payments in the years 1959, 1960 and 1961, or alternatively by accepting those late payments and then granting the extension of time for payment of the £17 500, the appellant either made the stipulation that time should be of the essence no longer applicable in respect of the £17 500 or created a promissory estoppel against insisting that the stipulation was still applicable in respect of the balance; (2) by accepting on 7 January the payment of £962 10s for interest, or alternatively by granting the extension of time to 13 January, the appellant bound itself by an election not to rescind for non-payment of the £17 500 on 6 January; (3) time never became of the essence in respect of 13 January; and (4) …

The learned judge of first instance held that by voluntarily accepting late payments in the years 1959, 1960 and 1961 the appellant indicated to the respondents and induced them to believe that the clause of the contract as to time being of the essence would not be enforced against them, and thus either "waived" the clause or created an equitable estoppel against relying upon it …

[52] [B]ut from the bare fact of the acceptance of late payments of three out of four annual instalments of £5 000 each it does not follow that in respect of the final payment of £17 500 the appellant was giving the respondents to understand that they might safely rely upon its treating cl 12 of the contract as no longer in force. I can see no justification for such a conclusion. Each acceptance of a late payment operated, of course, as an election by the appellant not to rescind the contract for non-payment of the relevant amount on its due date; but to read into the acceptances, considered either separately or as a whole, something promissory or some inducement to a belief in relation to future payments is, I think, to take an unwarranted step. It may be that repeated acquiescence by one party to a contract in non-observances by the other of stipulations as to time may amount, when considered in the light of particular circumstances, to an assent to time being treated for the future as not of the essence, notwithstanding a provision in the contract that it is of the essence; and in such a case it may not matter whether the result is described as a promissory estoppel or a waiver or a variation of the contract by mutual, though tacit, consent. But it is not a valid general proposition that wherever some instalments are accepted late without demur the party accepting them is precluded in respect of later instalments from insisting upon the agreement that time shall be of the essence … In the present case there is nothing to support the conclusion unless that general proposition be correct … It is a strong thing to place upon a few days' indulgence in respect of instalments payable during the course of a contract a construction which means that in relation to the time for completion of the payment of purchase price a stipulation that time shall be of the essence may be regarded [53] as abandoned. I do not think that such a construction can properly be placed upon the appellant's conduct in accepting the late instalments in the present case.

Nor do I think that a conclusion to the effect that cl 12 was waived or dispensed with is assisted by adding to the acceptance of late instalments the granting on 8 January of an extension of time until 13 January for payment of the balance of purchase money. On the contrary, the extension was granted with a plain intimation, both in the telephone conversation and in the letter of the following day, that the appellant was insisting upon its strict rights under the contract except to the extent of the indulgence it was offering. In the face of the letter the respondents had no reasonable ground for a belief that if they should fail to pay the £17 500 and an additional £50 before 14 January they could still count on being allowed further time.

The real questions which arise in relation to the granting of the extension are first whether it amounted to a binding election not to rescind for non-payment of the £17 500 on 6 January, and secondly, if it did amount to such an election, whether it was ineffectual to fix 13 January as a date in respect of which time was of the essence. In Kilmer v British Columbia Orchard Lands Ltd [1913] AC 319, the Privy Council proceeded on the footing that the vendor in that case could not insist that time was of the essence after having given an extension of time for payment of an instalment. The case is clear authority for the proposition that a stipulation making time of the essence may be rendered no longer applicable by the granting of an extension of time in particular circumstances; but it is not authority for the more general proposition that every grant of an extension of time deprives such a stipulation of effect for the future. Counsel had cited to their Lordships the case of Barclay v Messenger (1874) 43 LJ Ch 449, in which Jessel MR dealt with the effect of an extension of time under a contract making time of the essence and held that "a mere extension of time, and nothing more, is only a waiver to the extent of substituting the extended time for the original time, and not an utter destruction of the essential character of the time" (at 456). This was a pronouncement upon a point which had been one of difference between Lord Romilly and Lord Cranworth in Parkin v Thorold (1852) 16 Beav 59; 51 ER 698, Sir George Jessel accepting the opinion of the latter in accordance with the view of Lord St Leonards: Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers [54] (14th ed, 1862), p 270. It is hardly to be supposed that Lord Moulton, who delivered the judgment in Kilmer's Case, would have intended to overrule without even mentioning it a case which for 40 years had stood as settling a point formerly disputed at so high a level. Evidently the time clause was disregarded because of something special in the facts. That is the explanation of the case which was adopted in later cases in the Privy Council: Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 AC 275 at 279, 280; Brickles v Snell [1916] 2 AC 599 at 604 …

The authority of Barclay v Messenger is therefore unimpaired by Kilmer v British Columbia Orchard Lands Ltd. In Fry on Specific Performance (6th ed, 1921) para 1126, p 523, the case is [55] described as having decided that the letter by which the vendors there agreed to an extension of time for payment was "only a qualified and conditional waiver of the original stipulation". This, in my opinion, is an accurate way of describing the action of the appellant in the present case in allowing the respondents time to pay the final balance of purchase money. Time being of the essence the appellant became entitled, as soon as 6 January 1963 had passed, to elect for or against rescinding the contract. Any act done by it and consistent only with the continuance of the contract on foot the law would hold to constitute an election against rescinding; and an election once made could not be retracted. But the appellant was not bound to elect at once. It might keep the question open, so long as it did nothing to affirm the contract and so long as the respondents' position was not prejudiced in consequence of the delay: Clough v London and North Western Railway Co (1871) LR 7 Exch 26 at 34, 35; Scarf v Jardine (1882) 7 App Cas 345 at 360. By telling the respondents it would not rescind before Monday, 14 January, and that they would have to pay £50 for the additional accommodation to cover interest, costs and expenses, the appellant did no more than promise that it would not elect to rescind the contract before 14 January and that if the £17 500 and the additional £50 should be paid before that date the contract would stand affirmed. In the language of Fry LJ in Howe v Smith: "this was not a stipulation postponing the time for completion generally, but merely limiting the exercise of a consequential power" (1884) 27 Ch D 89 at 103, 104.

The granting of the extension of time, therefore, far from constituting an election by the appellant to affirm the contract, was the announcement of an intention to refrain from electing either way until either the £17 500 should have been paid or 14 January should have arrived. Not that election is a matter of intention. It is an effect which the law annexes to conduct which would be justifiable only if an election had been made one way or the other: Scarf v Jardine; Craine v Colonial Mutual Fire Insurance Co Ltd (at 325). But the solicitor's telephone message of 8 January and his letter of the 9th were not of such a nature as to be justified only on the footing of an election made, and it cannot be said that there were any negotiations between the parties of such a kind as to imply that the contract was not to be rescinded and accordingly was proceeding to completion …

[56] It has been contended that the appellant's acceptance of the £962 10s for interest on 7 January 1963 should be considered an election by it to affirm the contract. If the sum had included interest for any period beyond 6 January, acceptance of the payment would necessarily have implied the existence of the contract after that date and would therefore have constituted an election not to rescind. But the sum consisted only of interest for the year ended 6 January 1963. The respondents had had possession of the premises for that year, and by cl 2 of the contract the interest was made payable at the end of it. For the respondents a submission was made that the appellant could not have recovered the interest save by suing on the contract, and that therefore by accepting the payment it treated the contract as still on foot. If the payment had been of an instalment of the price, the contention might well have been correct, even though the instalment were one which the contract had made payable specifically on 6 January, for only on the basis that the appellant was still bound by the sale could he assert a right to any part of the price: see per Dixon J in Automatic Fire Sprinklers Pty Ltd v Watson (1946) 72 CLR 435 at 464, 465 … But the right to interest on unpaid purchase money is correlative with the right to possession. The interest is analogous to a sum for rent or use and occupation. Accordingly the £962 10s being interest in respect of a completed period of possession, would have been recoverable by the appellant even after an election to rescind: compare McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457 at 476. By accepting payment of it, therefore, the appellant did not elect against terminating the contract …

A declaration that the contract was validly rescinded by the appellant on 15 January 1983 should be made, and the respondent's counterclaim for specific performance be dismissed; but the action should be remitted to the Supreme Court to enable consideration to be given to the question of granting the respondents on equitable terms relief against the forfeiture of the purchase moneys paid: see Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 AC 275.

Immer (No 145) v Uniting Church in Australia Property Trust (NSW)

[25.60] Immer (No 145) Pty Ltd v Uniting Church in Australia Property Trust (NSW) (1993) 182 CLR 26 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The Uniting Church in Australia Property Trust (NSW) (the Trust), the respondent, was entitled to excess air space rights in relation to an historic building in Pitt Street, Sydney which it proposed to refurbish. Under the Sydney City Council's policy on transferable floor space, the Trust was entitled to transfer the rights so that the space could be incorporated in development on some other site, subject to a requirement that it first complete the refurbishment to the satisfaction of the Council. The Trust agreed to sell its rights to Immer (No 145) Pty Ltd (Immer), the appellant. If the Council's approval was not granted by 1 April 1989, Immer was entitled to rescind the contract. The Trust did not complete the refurbishment by that date. On 26 June 1989, Immer's solicitor, in the mistaken belief that the Council had approved the transfer, sent to the Trust's solicitor documents for settlement including a draft deed of assignment containing a recital that "the Council has approved the said transfer subject to this Deed". On 25 August 1989, after discovering that the refurbishment had not been completed, Immer gave the Trust notice of rescission on the ground that the transfer of the rights had not been approved by the specified date.

The Court of Appeal held that Immer was bound by the deed of sale and was obliged to complete the purchase on the ground that, by its letter of 26 June forwarding a draft deed of assignment for execution by the Trust, it had elected to affirm the contract. Immer appealed to the High Court.]

DEANE, TOOHEY, GAUDRON and MCHUGH JJ: [32] This appeal concerns the question whether the purchaser under an agreement for sale abandoned its contractual right to rescission and elected to affirm the agreement. As the agreement was for the sale of "air space", it is necessary to say something about the subject matter.

Air space

Air space is the subject of two documents emanating from the Sydney City Council ("the Council"): "Transferable Floor Space: Summary of Council's Present (Interim) Policy" and "Development Control and Floor Space Ratio Code". For present purposes the operation of these documents is sufficiently explained in the judgment of the primary judge, Young J:

> It would appear that, under the town planning codes of this city, provisions have been made for buildings to have a maximum floor space ratio. However, there is also a provision that where there is an historic building, which cannot utilize the ratio to advantage, it is possible to transfer the overplus to some other site, either an adjacent site or a site in the same precinct. It would appear that the reason for this is that funds can be provided to the owner of the historic site to preserve the building and at the same time other land in the city will become more valuable because it will be able to bear a higher building. It would seem that there is a market in the city for these bonus floor site ratios and the present transaction is an illustration of what happens ….[40]

Was there an election?

… Immer accepted that it could have been held to an election without awareness of the legal situation which would have allowed it to rescind, but said that it could not have been so held unless it was aware of the facts giving rise to the right to avoid the deed. In this regard it pointed to the judgment of Mason, Brennan, Deane and Dawson JJ in Khouryo v Government Insurance Office (NSW) (1984) 165 CLR 622, at pp 633–4:

> It would seem however that, at least where the alternative rights arise under the terms of the one contract, a party may be held to have elected to affirm it notwithstanding that he was unaware of the actual right to avoid it … Even in such a case however, the party alleged to have elected to affirm the contract must be at least aware of the facts giving rise to the right to avoid the contract.

[41] On this basis, Immer argued that on 26 June 1989 it was not aware of the facts giving rise to its right to rescind the agreement because it did not know that the Council was actively asserting that the relevant permission had not been given. The answer to this submission is that the evidence does not support a conclusion that Immer was unaware of the fact giving rise to the right to rescind under cl 7 of the deed, that is to say, the fact that "approval" had not been "granted by 1.4.89". Nonetheless, Immer's mistaken belief that the approval of the City Council had been given at some subsequent time is, as will be seen, relevant to the question whether it lost the right to rescind the deed by reason of an election to affirm it.

The true nature of election is brought out in this sentence from the seminal work of Spencer Bower and Turner, The Law Relating to Estoppel by Representation 3rd ed (1977), p 313: "It is of the essence of election that the party electing shall be "confronted" with two mutually exclusive courses of action between which he must, in fairness to the other party, make his choice." When Immer's solicitors wrote their letter of 26 June 1989, the date 1 April 1989 in cl 7 of the deed had passed. It was then open to Immer, as purchaser, to rescind the deed, subject to any question that might arise as to whether rescission could be effected peremptorily or only after reasonable notice. Can it be said that Immer was then confronted with two mutually exclusive courses of action between which it must choose? Were its actions consistent only with an intention to keep the agreement on foot and inconsistent with the exercise of the right to rescind? (While cl 7 of the deed spoke of "rescind", strictly the right conferred on Immer by that clause was a right to terminate the contract: see Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract, 6th Aust ed (1992), par 2104.)

If a party to a contract, faced with the choice of terminating the contract or keeping it on foot, terminates the contract that party will ordinarily have acted in a way that leaves no doubt as to the choice made. And that choice will be clearly inconsistent with the exercise of the right to keep the contract on foot because the contract no longer exists. But where, as here, the situation is the converse the question is not answered so readily. Immer was proceeding on the footing that the Council had approved the transfer of air space rights and that completion of the transfer was possible. Mr Dixon-Smith wrote the letter of 26 June 1989 in that belief. But it was not the case. Not only was it not the case but Mrs Dale would have been aware at the time she received the letter that it was not the [42] case and that restoration and refurbishment of Pilgrim House was still a condition of that approval being obtained.

As Spencer Bower and Turner point out in the passage quoted earlier, at the heart of election is the idea of confrontation which in turn produces the necessity of making a choice. But in a case such as the present one, the choice is not merely one of affirming the agreement; it involves as well the abandonment of the right to rescind. Abandonment is more readily inferred in some circumstances, for instance where the choice arises once and for all. Here, by reason of cl 7 of the deed, Immer was entitled at any time after 1 April 1989 to rescind the deed. There is of course a danger of circularity here because the Uniting Church says: "Yes, so long as Immer did not elect not to rescind." The point is that where the right to rescind is a continuing one, it is not so readily concluded that the party entitled to rescind has abandoned that right completely as opposed to taking no action to exercise the right at the time in question.

There can be no doubt that when Mr Dixon-Smith wrote the letter of 26 June 1989 it was Immer's understanding that the Council had approved a transfer of air space rights and that there was no obstacle to early completion on the transaction. That is manifest from the correspondence. In Tropical Traders Ltd v Goonan (1964) 111 CLR, at p 55 Kitto J commented: "Not that election is a matter of intention. It is an effect which the law annexes to conduct which would be justifiable only if an election had been made one way or the other." On the other hand, in Sargent v ASL Developments Ltd (1974) 131 CLR, at p 656 Mason J said of the elements essential to the making of a binding election:

> The question is complicated because in some instances election may take place as a matter of conscious choice with knowledge of the existence of the alternative right and in other cases it may occur when the law attributes the character of an election to the conduct of a party.

But, in drawing this distinction, Mason J was focusing on the dichotomy between awareness of the right to rescind and awareness of the facts giving rise to the right. We do not read that passage from his Honour's judgment as implying that a party to a contract who is aware either of the right to rescind or of facts giving rise to a right to rescind will necessarily be held to have elected to affirm a [43] contract if he or she acts on the basis that the contract remains on foot. Such an implication is at odds with the notion of being confronted with the necessity of making a choice. In the present case it cannot truly be said that Immer was confronted with the necessity of making a choice at the time the letter in question was written, even less that it was abandoning for all time its rights under cl 7 of the deed.

The evidence indicates that the solicitors for Immer and the Uniting Church both assumed that the letter of 29 March 1989 which notified the City Solicitor's approval of the deed but did not mention the requirement that the restoration work on Pilgrim House be completed meant that the approval of the Council was a formality. Be that as it may, the forwarding by Immer's solicitors on 26 June 1989 of documents for settlement, including the draft deed of assignment reciting the approval of the Council, was clearly on the basis that the Council had, by then, approved. In a context where the Council had not, in fact, approved the transfer and where the stage had not been reached where Immer was required to make an election either to rescind the contract or to abandon the right to rescind, the forwarding of the documents for settlement did not constitute an election to affirm the contract regardless of whether the Council had or had not approved.

The letter of 26 June 1989 and Immer's actions at the time were consistent with Immer being prepared to continue with an agreement which it understood to be ready for completion and because of which it did not direct attention to its rights under cl 7. No prejudice was caused to the Uniting Church by Immer's actions; the possibility of rescission was due to the Church's inability to obtain the approval for the Council to the transfer of air space rights, an approval which was not obtained until September 1990.

In our view Immer's actions in and about June 1989 did not constitute an election on its part not to exercise its right of rescission.

[25.65] BRENNAN J: [30] A basic requirement of an election between alternative rights arising under a contract is that the party electing should know the facts which give rise to those rights (Khoury v Government Insurance Office (NSW) (1984) 165 CLR 622, at pp 633–4) or, perhaps, at least be taken to have known of those facts. Immer must have known on 26 June that the time limited by cl 7 had expired without a grant of approval and that it was entitled under cl 7 to rescind the deed. But Immer's letter was written on the footing that the Trust was then in a position to complete the transfer as evidenced by par C of the Recitals in the draft deed. If the letter of 26 June were an election not to rescind, it was an election sub modo, conditional upon the Trust's ability to complete the transfer at that time. The letter cannot be construed as an unqualified election to affirm the contract whether or not the Trust was in a position to complete the transfer. If the Trust was not then in a position to complete the transfer, the qualification was not satisfied, and there was no election.

An act amounting to an election must be unequivocal: Matthews v Smallwood [1910] 1 Ch 777, at p 786; P Samuel & Co Ltd v Dumas [1924] AC 431, at p 477; Brown v Smitt (1924) 34 CLR 160, at p 168; Elder's Trustee & Executor Co Ltd v Commonwealth Homes & Investment Co Ltd (1941) 65 CLR 603, at p 616. Where a contract can be terminated at the option of a promisee, the right to terminate is not necessarily lost by the promisee doing any act consistent with the continuance of the contract. If the act is also consistent with the reservation of a right to terminate in certain events, the right to terminate is not lost by the doing of the act. Thus, in Tropical Traders Ltd v Goonan (1964) 111 CLR 41, at p 55 a vendor who was entitled under the general law to rescind a contract for the sale of land by reason of the purchaser's failure to complete within the time limited, time being of the essence of the contract, did not lose its right to rescind by giving the purchaser additional time. By promising to affirm the contract if the price and an additional sum were paid by a later date, the vendor was held not to affirm the contract but merely to limit the exercise of its power to rescind. Although Immer made no further bargain with the Trust, Immer's solicitors' letter enclosing the draft deed of assignment containing Recital C could not be construed as an election to affirm the contract but merely as an intimation that, if the Trust was in a [31] position to complete, Immer was not intending to exercise its right to rescind. Immer did not elect on 26 June not to rescind even if the Trust were unable to complete the transfer. After the Council's advice on 29 June that the Trust was not in a position to complete the sale, further representations were made to the Council to obtain approval of the transfer.

Once the Council's decision of 14 August specifying the conditions of approval was communicated to Immer's solicitors, Immer elected to rescind. Nothing that occurred after 26 June altered the situation until Immer elected to rescind on 25 August. In O'Connor v SP Bray Ltd (1936) 36 SR (NSW) 248, at pp 261-2, Jordan CJ said in reference to alternative rights conferred by a contract (see [also] Sargent v ASL Developments Ltd (1974), 131 CLR 634, at p 645, per Stephen J):

> where there has been no intimation of avoidance, the question whether delay, after knowledge of the facts giving rise to avoidability, or things said or acts done during the delay, constitute such an election to go on with the contract as puts an end to the right to > avoid, depends upon "the length of the delay and the nature of the acts done during the interval, which might affect either party, and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking the one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy": Lindsay Petroleum Co v Hurd (1874) LR 5 PC 221, at p 240. This is the position, also, when it is sought to rely on acts done as constituting an irrevocable election not to avoid: (ibid); Abram SS Co v Westville Shipping Co [1923] AC 773, at pp 779, 789; Torrance v Bolton (1872) LR 8 Ch App 118, at p 124; and it appears to be the position, where it is sought to rely on things said, where these are not so express and explicit as to entitle the other party to rely on them as an affirmance: Brown v Smitt (1924) 34 CLR, at pp 167–8. Where a promisor or a promisee has the right to elect which of alternative promises he will perform or enforce, according to where the right of choice may lie, an intimation of election is irrevocable; but this is because the intimation is, in effect, an acceptance which determines the nature of a contractual right: Leake on Contracts, 6th ed (1911), pp 485–7.

> It would appear, therefore, from the authorities, that an intimation of an election between alternatives of itself produces no irrevocable results, except in cases where the intimation, of itself, produces legal consequences independently of any question of election, or where it is necessary that the choice [32] should be treated as irrevocable, in order to do justice to the other party (cf Ward v Day (1863) 4 B & S 337, at p 352 [122 ER 486, at pp 491–2]).

Neither of the excepted cases applies here.

It was obvious that at no time prior to Immer's notice of rescission on 25 August had it elected to affirm the contract without the Trust's being able to complete the transfer. It was obvious also, once the Council's resolution of 14 August was passed, that Immer was entitled then to exercise its right to rescind under cl 7. It exercised that right and the contract was thereupon terminated.

I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Court of Appeal and restore the judgment and orders of Young J.

Appeal allowed with costs.

ESTOPPEL

[25.70] The exercise of a right to terminate a contract may, like other legal rights, be restricted by equitable estoppel. An aggrieved party may be estopped from terminating a contract where he or she has induced the other party to believe that the contract will not be terminated in the circumstances that have occurred, and the other party has relied on that assumption to his or her detriment. See further Chapter 9 and Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406, extracted at [25.85].

WAIVER

Agricultural and Rural Finance Pty Ltd v Gardiner

[25.75] Agricultural and Rural Finance Pty Ltd v Gardiner [2008] HCA 57; (2008) 238 CLR 570 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Agricultural and Rural Finance Pty Ltd (the lender) loaned money to Mr Gardiner so that he could participate in an agricultural project. Mr Gardiner also entered into indemnity agreements with an associated company of the lender, Oceanic Agricultural Ltd (the indemnifier). Under the terms of the indemnity agreements, the indemnifier agreed to indemnify the borrower against any demand by the lender for repayment under the loan agreements where the borrower ceased to participate in the agricultural project for one of the reasons specified in the indemnity agreements. Further, the loan agreements themselves provided that the lender was unable to have recourse to the borrower if the indemnity was effective and enforceable.

Clause 2 of the indemnity agreements made punctual payment of the loan agreement a condition of the enforceability of the indemnity agreement. Mr Gardiner had failed to make punctual payments. A term of the loan agreements gave the lender the right to accelerate the obligation to pay in these circumstances. The lender did not enforce this term and Mr Gardiner eventually met his obligations under the loan agreements. When the agricultural project collapsed, Mr Gardiner sought to rely on the indemnity agreements. The indemnifier asserted that it was not bound to indemnify Mr Gardiner because the condition in cl 2 of the indemnity agreement had not been satisfied. In response, Mr Gardiner argued that the indemnifier had waived its right to rely on cl 2. Mr Gardiner relied on four separate events in support of his "waiver" argument. First, he asserted that Mr Lloyd (the indemnifier's managing director) had made oral representations that the borrower would receive reminder notices. Second, he asserted that Mr Lloyd had told him that he "need not be concerned about the indemnity". Third, he claimed that Ms Edwards (who worked for the lender) had told him "there would be no adverse consequences as a result of the delay in payment". Finally, he relied on a letter sent by Ms Edwards that stated "as [the lender] failed to send reminder notices we will accept payment as 'on time' up until 30 June 1999". On credit grounds, all five judges did not accept that the first three events had occurred, at least in the manner as described by Mr Gardiner. Their Honours accepted that the fourth event took place, but held that Ms Edwards was speaking for the lender, not the indemnifier.

The trial judge rejected Mr Gardiner's waiver argument and found for the indemnifier. In the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, Spigelman CJ found for Mr Gardiner. His Honour held that the requirement for punctuality of payment is met when the lender accepts the payment as constituting punctual payment. Basten JA found that Mr Gardiner's obligations under the loan agreements had been varied and that, as a result, he had made punctual payment. As the indemnity agreements and loan agreements were interlocking, Mr Gardiner was also to be treated as having made punctual payment for the purposes of the indemnity agreements. Handley AJA held that the conditions in the indemnity agreements had not been satisfied and that the lender should be able to recover directly from the borrower. Mr Gardiner appealed to the High Court.]

GUMMOW, HAYNE and KIEFEL JJ: [39] [T]he Borrower did not pay punctually amounts due under the … loan agreements. It also follows that, subject to the plea of waiver, the indemnity agreements made in respect of those loans were not "effective and enforceable". It is necessary to deal now with the plea of waiver…

The plea of waiver

[49] The Borrower submitted that there was a "waiver" in one or more of three different senses: an election between inconsistent rights; an application of the common law doctrine of forbearance; or the abandonment or renunciation of a right. The Borrower accepted that the plea of waiver was not a plea which sought to allege that there had been a variation of any relevant agreement, or that the doctrine of promissory estoppel was engaged. There was no consideration for a variation of agreement. There was no detrimental reliance for a promissory estoppel.

[50] As the Borrower's submissions implicitly accepted, "waiver" is a word applied in a variety of senses. Leading scholars have long cautioned against, even condemned, its use. Roscoe Pound, in his Foreword to Ewart's work Waiver Distributed, described (Ewart, Waiver Distributed (1917), p v) waiver as one of a number of "solving words" which are "but substitutes for thought" and as one of a number of "pseudo-conceptions" or "soft spots in what appears a hard legal crust". ... And Corbin spoke ("Conditions in the Law of Contract"(1919) 28 Yale Law Journal 739, 754) of waiver as a word of "indefinite connotation" which "like a cloak … covers a multitude of sins".

[51] Waiver has often been used in senses synonymous with election or estoppel. It has been suggested (see, eg, Finagrain SA Geneva v P Kruse Hamburg [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep 508 at 534 per Megaw LJ) that waiver is indistinguishable from one or other of those doctrines. Sometimes, although expressed in terms of waiver, the reasoning adopted in cases reveals the elements for applying a more specific principle, typically election (see, eg, R v Paulson [1921] 1 AC 271 at 280, 283; Motor Oil Hellas (Corinth) Refineries SA v Shipping Corporation of India (The Kanchenjunga) [1990] 1 Lloyd's Rep 391 at 397-398) or estoppel (See, eg, Enrico Furst & Co v WE Fischer Ltd [1960] 2 Lloyd's Rep 340 at 349-350; WJ Alan & Co Ltd v El Nasr Export & Import Co [1972] 2 QB 189 at 213). And it may be that in cases of the several kinds last mentioned, the term is used as no more than a conclusionary word stating the consequences of the operation of that more specific principle, rather than as indicating the application of any distinct and independent principle.

[52] Nonetheless, it is clear that there are cases in which the word has been used in senses other than those embraced by principles of election, estoppel or variation of contract. So, for example, waiver has been used in the sense of rescission where what has occurred is "an entire abandonment and dissolution of the contract" (Mulcahy v Hoyne (1925) 36 CLR 41 at 53 per Isaacs J, citing Price v Dyer (1810) 17 Ves Jr 356, 364; 34 ER 137, 140). It has been used in connection with a party not insisting upon a term of a contract which is identified as a term for that party's sole benefit (See, eg, Mulcahy v Hoyne (1925) 36 CLR 41 at 55 per Isaacs J; at 58 per Starke J; Gange v Sullivan (1966) 116 CLR 418 at 429 per Barwick CJ). And from time to time "waiver" has been used (See, eg, Bacon v Purcell (1916) 22 CLR 307 at 312; Embrey v Earp (1890) 6 WN (NSW) 130 at 131) to describe some modification of the terms of a contract without the formalities, or consideration, necessary for an effective contractual variation. ...

[55] In the present case, the term "waiver" was used to denote three different principles … Those principles were described as election, forbearance and abandonment or renunciation. It is convenient to deal with them in that order.

Election?

[56] In this Court an intentional act, done with knowledge, whereby a person abandons a right by acting in a manner inconsistent with that right has been described as the "waiver" of that right (Craine v Colonial Mutual Fire Insurance Co Ltd (1920) 28 CLR 305 at 326; Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641 at 658 per Latham CJ.). But as later demonstrated (Elder's Trustee and Executor Co Ltd v Commonwealth Homes and Investment Co Ltd (1941) 65 CLR 603 at 616-619 per Rich A-CJ, Dixon and McTiernan JJ; Owendale Pty Ltd v Anthony (1966) 117 CLR 539 at 556-557 per Windeyer J; Sargent v ASL Developments Ltd (1974) 131 CLR 634 at 641 per Stephen J; Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 406-407 per Mason CJ. See also O'Connor v SP Bray Ltd (1936) 36 SR (NSW) 248 at 257-264 per Jordan CJ), many such cases are applications of the doctrine of election between inconsistent rights…

[58] The doctrine of election is long established at common law. As Jordan CJ pointed out in O'Connor v SP Bray Ltd (1936) 36 SR (NSW) 248 at 257, "[s]ince the days of the Year Books it has been recognised that you cannot have the egg and the halfpenny too". If, then, something happens which gives rise to the existence of two alternative rights, and one of those rights is satisfied, the other is no longer available. A breach of contract by one party always gives the other party a right to recover damages for the breach. If serious, the breach will give the innocent party the right to treat the contract as at an end. But the innocent party need not accept the repudiatory breach and avoid the contract; the innocent party may choose to insist upon further performance. And as Craine v Colonial Mutual Fire Insurance Co Ltd (1920) 28 CLR 305 shows, the exercise, despite knowledge of a breach entitling one party to be discharged from its future performance, of rights available only if the contract subsists, will constitute an election to maintain the contract on foot…

[63] … [T]here are aspects of the present case which fall entirely within an orthodox application of the doctrine of election between competing rights. In particular, when the Borrower failed to make a payment punctually, ARF had the option to accelerate the time for repayment of the balance outstanding under the loan agreement. ARF did not exercise that option and, in the letter of 2 June 1999, said (in effect) that it would not exercise that right on account of the amount then outstanding, if payment was received by 30 June of that year. Instead ARF accepted the Borrower's subsequent tender of (unaccelerated) performance according to the contract and ARF thereby elected not to exercise the right to accelerate the time for repayment. Had it attempted to do so in the period between 2 June and 30 June a case of estoppel may well have been made out. But ... ARF's election not to accelerate did not deny the fact of breach by the Borrower. On the contrary, the premise for analysis of these events as an election by the Lender is that the Borrower had not made due and punctual payment.

[64] It is next necessary to recognise that the election made between inconsistent rights which has just been identified was an election made by the Lender — ARF. Contrary to the premise that necessarily underpinned the Borrower's submissions about election, there was no election made by the Indemnifier — OAL. Even if the letter of 2 June 1999 were to be treated as OAL's letter, OAL made no election because the Borrower's lateness of payment gave OAL no choice between competing rights.

[65] As has already been noticed, a condition of OAL's liability on its indemnity was that the Borrower had punctually paid amounts due under the loan agreements. The Borrower's failure to pay punctually gave OAL no choice between terminating the indemnity agreements for breach and insisting upon future performance. It gave OAL no such choice because the Borrower was not obliged by the indemnity agreements to pay the Lender punctually. The Borrower's obligation for punctual performance was imposed by the loan agreements. It was an obligation which the Borrower owed to the Lender, not OAL. OAL was not a party to the loan agreements. The Borrower's failure to pay punctually gave OAL no claim against the Borrower for breach of the loan agreements. That the Lender, ARF, was a party to the indemnity agreements and that the Borrower and the Indemnifier were also parties to Licence and Management Agreements made with the Trustee of the project which, among other things, obliged the Borrower to comply with the loan agreements, neither require nor permit a different conclusion.

[66] The indemnity agreements assumed the existence of the obligation to pay punctually and attributed consequences according to whether the obligation was met. But the indemnity agreements did not oblige the Borrower to pay punctually. OAL was therefore not in a position where it could choose between insisting upon future performance of the loan agreements and accelerating the time for the discharge of those agreements by requiring repayment of all that was outstanding. And because the Borrower owed the Indemnifier no obligation under the indemnity agreements, other than the obligation to pay the indemnity fee, OAL could make no choice between insisting upon the Borrower performing future obligations under those agreements and bringing the agreements to an end.

[67] It follows that, in so far as the Borrower submitted that OAL had made any election between competing rights, the Borrower's submission should be rejected.

Forbearance?

[68] The Borrower submitted that the common law has long recognised a doctrine (described as waiver, or forbearance from exercising a contractual right) that is distinct from cases of contractual variation, election between inconsistent rights, estoppel or what the Borrower called "the unilateral renunciation or abandonment of a right or benefit where a party acts in a manner inconsistent with the maintenance of that right or benefit".

[69] In support of its submission that the matters alleged in the particulars of the plea of waiver engaged a principle identified as forbearance from exercising a contractual right, the Borrower relied on a number of decisions in which a party's conduct had been held to disentitle it from insisting upon a condition of performance. Those cases included three to which particular reference must be made: Ogle v Earl Vane (1868) LR 3 QB 272, Panoutsos v Raymond Hadley Corporation of New York [1917] 2 KB 473 and, in this Court, Electronic Industries Ltd v David Jones Ltd (1954) 91 CLR 288.

[70] Each of these cases was said to be an example of the common law's response to the concern that a party not approbate and reprobate and of a doctrine which "operates where a party in an existing contractual relationship (the promisor) agrees not to enforce a condition, or right, and the other party (the promisee) acts upon the basis that the condition is not being enforced".

[71] Expressed in those terms, the proposition for which the Borrower contended seems little different from estoppel. The reference to an agreement not to enforce was evidently intended to encompass cases where the promisor represented that a contractual condition would not be enforced. And the reference to the other party, the promisee, acting upon the basis that the condition is not being enforced seems to evoke notions of detrimental reliance identical to those referred to by Dixon J in Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641 at 674 that the party asserting the estoppel "must have so acted or abstained from acting upon the footing of the state of affairs assumed that he would suffer a detriment if the opposite party were afterwards allowed to set up rights against him inconsistent with the assumption". Yet the Borrower submitted that forbearance differs from estoppel and accepted that, in this case, his pleading did not raise any defence of estoppel.

[72] It will also be recalled that the appeal to this Court was conducted on the footing that estoppel was not in issue and was not in issue because Mr Gardiner could not show detrimental reliance upon any representation that the indemnity remained effective and enforceable despite failure to make payments punctually. That no argument of detrimental reliance was advanced on behalf of Mr Gardiner may owe much to the fact that when Mr Gardiner was first told that some payments were late he sought to reassure Ms Edwards that he would make future payments on time. ...

[83] In oral argument the Borrower gave particular emphasis to the decision of the English Court of Appeal in Panoutsos [1917] 2 KB 473. There, a contract for sale and shipment of goods no later than a specified date, by one or more vessels, provided that each shipment was to be deemed a separate contract and that payment be "by confirmed bankers' credit". The buyer opened a credit but it was not "confirmed". With notice of that fact the sellers made some shipments and drew on the credit for payment. The sellers sought and obtained an extension of time for completing the shipments. Before that extended time had expired the sellers cancelled the contract on the ground that the credit provided was not "confirmed". In an ex tempore judgment, Viscount Reading CJ said (at 477) that "[i]t is open to a party to a contract to waive a condition which is inserted for his benefit" and that, in this case, the sellers had waived the condition for a confirmed bankers' credit. He continued (at 478):

> If at a later stage the sellers wished to avail themselves of the condition precedent, in my opinion there was nothing in the facts to prevent them from demanding the performance of the condition if they had given reasonable notice to the buyer that they would not ship unless there was a confirmed bankers' credit. If they had done that and the buyer had failed to comply with the condition, the buyer would have been in default, and the sellers would have been entitled to cancel the contract without being subject to any claim by the buyer for damages.

On its face, then, what was said in Panoutsos may be read as supporting the Borrower's submissions about forbearance. It is to be observed, however, that the facts in Panoutsos can readily be fitted within principles of estoppel, for it is evident that the buyer of the goods had relied on the implicit representation that its performance was sufficient. And Panoutsos was later treated (Charles Rickards Ltd v Oppenheim [1950] 1 KB 616 at 623 per Denning LJ) as an example of the application of those principles rather than as establishing any separate principle of forbearance. Indeed, Cheshire and Fifoot, writing in 1947 about the decision in Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd [1947] KB 130, saw (Cheshire and Fifoot, (1947) 63 Law Quarterly Review 283, 299) Panoutsos as one of several decisions in which judges, "no doubt … influenced by the dictates of natural justice", based decisions expressed in terms of "waiver" in "estoppel or first cousin to it, though they cannot or dare not say so in unambiguous language". And Cheshire and Fifoot saw (at 300) the re-emergence in High Trees House of a doctrine of promissory estoppel as having "elucidated the confused rules relating to waiver" and the courts as having "carried the doctrine of estoppel to its logical conclusion". The authors went on to say (at 300):

> If they [the courts] are satisfied that there has been forbearance with regard to performance and that one of the parties has proceeded on the assumption that the forbearance is to be effective, they will not allow the arrangement to be repudiated. They have drawn no fine distinctions between waiver or forbearance and variation, or, in this connection between a statement of fact and a promise de futuro. They lay no stress on whether it was the plaintiff or defendant who requested the forbearance, or whether the forbearance occurred before or after performance was contractually due, or whether consideration has been given. Further, the forbearance can be used, as Bruner v Moore [1950] 1 KB 616 at 622-623 shows, as a weapon of offence, at any rate as a means of obtaining the equitable remedy of specific performance. The basis of this sensible and commercially useful attitude is that the arrangement made by the parties and taken by at least one of them at its face value raises an equity against the party resisting.

[84] As earlier indicated, in many cases in which it is said that a party to a contract has "waived" a condition for that party's benefit, the party said to have waived the condition will have made an election between inconsistent rights (to insist on further performance or treat the contract as discharged for failure of the condition). In other cases, of which Panoutsos is an example, the case may be better identified as one of estoppel (Handley, Estoppel by Conduct and Election (2006), pp 38-39 §[2-018])…

Abandonment or renunciation?

[88] The third basis put forward by the Borrower for the submission that the Lender or Indemnifier (or both) had waived satisfaction of the condition of punctual payment as a condition for the indemnity being effective and enforceable was described as "abandonment" or "renunciation"…

[90] Propositions expressed in terms of abandonment or renunciation of a right, like the proposition that a contractual condition inserted in a contract for the benefit of one party has been waived by that party, are statements of conclusion. They are not statements that reveal the process of reasoning which leads to the assignment of the chosen description …

[93] Even accepting that the condition had the characteristic of being for the benefit of the alleged waiving party, no question about OAL's insistence upon that condition arose until the indemnity was called on. That did not occur until the Borrower had ceased to carry on the relevant business. If, as Mr Gardiner asserted, the Lender or the Indemnifier (or both) had earlier said (even unequivocally) that they would not insist upon compliance with the condition for punctual payment, the time for abandonment or renunciation of the right to insist upon the condition had not arrived when those statements were made and what was said or done at that time constituted, therefore, no abandonment or renunciation … Even if the matters alleged in the particulars given of the plea of waiver were established, there was no waiver (in the sense of abandonment or renunciation) of insistence upon punctual payment as a condition for the indemnity being effective and enforceable.

No "waiver"

[94] For the reasons that have been given, even if the facts were as Mr Gardiner alleged them to be, none of the three senses in which he alleged there was a waiver (election, forbearance, abandonment) was made out …

A residual category or general principle?

[98] ... [T]he submissions in this litigation have not been based upon the existence of some residual category or general principle of "unfairness" at common law which is distinct from the case of "waiver" upon which reliance was placed, and from the principles of "election", "forbearance" and "renunciation". That makes it unnecessary to determine whether such a residual category or general principle exists in the common law of Australia. However, this silence on the subject should not be taken as an encouragement to further speculation.

[99] It may be thought that some degree of support for such a category or principle of unfairness is to be found in some decisions in other jurisdictions. However, two observations may be made respecting what has been said in certain decisions in the United Kingdom, Canada, New Zealand and the United States.

[100] First, "waiver" is sometimes used, as it is in Australia, in contexts that are far removed from the contractual context presented in this case. Decisions made in those other contexts, such as decisions about the "waiver" of constitutional rights (eg, Johnson v Zerbst (1938) 304 US 458 and Barker v Wingo (1972) 407 US 514) do not bear upon issues of the kind now under consideration. Secondly, decisions in other jurisdictions lend weight to the observation of Lord Wilberforce, in Mardorf Peach & Co Ltd v Attica Sea Carriers Corporation of Liberia [1977] AC 850 at 871, that "the word "waiver", like "estoppel", covers a variety of situations different in their legal nature, and tends to be indiscriminately used by the courts as a means of relieving parties from bargains or the consequences of bargains which are thought to be harsh or deserving of relief". The need for coherence of legal principle and the effects of overly broad interpretations of waiver and estoppel upon other doctrines must be borne in mind (See, eg, Saskatchewan River Bungalows Ltd v Maritime Life Assurance Co [1994] 2 SCR 490 at 500 per Major J: "An overly broad interpretation of waiver would undermine the requirement of contractual consideration."). Further, in some cases the reference to "unfairness" may not be to a defining principle. For example, when analysed in the case of an estoppel, it may convey no more than that there has been no detrimental reliance to found the estoppel ...
KIRBY J:

The content of "waiver" in law

[118] The disputed concept of "waiver": ... "Waiver" has had its defenders as a principle to be deployed in the analysis of various legal situations, including in the law of contract. However, its invocation has attracted sustained criticism. Courts and knowledgeable commentators have described the notion of "waiver" as "imprecise" (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 451 per Dawson J); "troublesome" (Dugdale and Yates, "Variation, Waiver and Estoppel — A Re-Appraisal", Modern Law Review, vol 39 (1976) 680, at p 681); "over-used in the law generally, but particularly in relation to contractual rights" (Carter, "Waiver (of Contractual Rights) Distributed", Journal of Contract Law, vol 4 (1991) 59, at p 59); "a cover for vague, uncertain thought" (Ewart, Waiver Distributed (1917), p 5); "a term of shifting meaning" (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 422 per Brennan J); and "not at all a precise term of art" (Oliver Ashworth [2000] Ch 12 at 28 per Robert Walker LJ).

[119] Some of this confusion and the resulting criticism is because "waiver" has been variously understood as including instances of estoppel (Joint reasons at [51]); election (Joint reasons at [56]); deliberate forbearance of insistence upon rights (Joint reasons at [68]); and conscious abandonment or renunciation of rights (Joint reasons at [51]) …

[121] In Foran v Wight (1989) 168 CLR 385, Deane J recognised the relevance of this evolution (at 434):

> The line between the somewhat arbitrary doctrine of waiver and the doctrine of estoppel by conduct has always been a vague one (See Craine (1920) 28 CLR 305 at 326-327) and the former doctrine is being increasingly enveloped and rationalised by the latter.

[122] Gaudron J likewise acknowledged these doctrinal uncertainties in The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 481:

> Given that the same conduct may constitute what was characterised as waiver in Craine and provide the foundation for an estoppel, there has been a tendency, in recent times, to question whether and, if so, in what circumstances waiver exists independently of the general law of estoppel. And this question has led to the further question whether the word "waiver" is not productive of confusion.

[131] Against unilateral "waiver": To determine the ambit of any freestanding or unilateral legal principle of "waiver", it is important to notice the conflicting views expressed, both in this Court and by respected commentators.

[132] In Verwayen, Mason CJ took a very narrow view of "waiver". He did not accept that one party to an agreement could unilaterally waive its legal rights so that the contract would become unenforceable (absent estoppel or election) if that party were later to change its mind (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 406):

> Generally speaking … an existing legal right is not destroyed by mere waiver in the sense of an express or implied intimation that the person in whom the right is vested does not intend to enforce it. In these cases, unless consideration is present, something in the nature of an election or an estoppel is required.

[133] Mason CJ preferred to consider the "category of waiver" as only "an example of the doctrine of election" (at 407). Nevertheless, he acknowledged that, in certain circumstances, a party to litigation could, with legal effect, agree not to raise a particular defence or engage in conduct that would estop that party from later raising that defence (at 407).

[134] Similarly, McHugh J in Verwayen was prepared to acknowledge the existence of a form of "waiver", separate from estoppel and election. However, he considered that such cases were "sui generis" and "anomalous" (at 497). He preferred the simplicity of "the more established doctrines of election, contract and estoppel" (at 497).

[135] This also appears to be the preferred position of Dr Seddon and Associate Professor Ellinghaus in their much respected Australian edition of Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract (9th Aust ed (2008), pp 90-91 [2.29] (citations omitted)):

> As with any promise, there are only three ways in which it can be legally enforceable: by contract, deed or estoppel. Therefore it is incorrect to assert that, by itself, non-enforcement of a contractual right, or even a positive promise not to enforce a right, amounts to a waiver in the sense of being precluded from enforcing that right. Only if the limitation period has expired is it correct to say the right has been given up (in the absence of contract, deed or estoppel), and, even then, it is still substantively in existence.

The authors question whether proposed cases of "waiver" could be usefully distinguished from cases of "election to affirm" or "estoppel"…

[136] Support for unilateral "waiver": On the other hand, opinions have been expressed in support of a unilateral and enforceable "waiver" by judges of this Court (Craine (1920) 28 CLR 305 at 326; Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 423 per Brennan J; at 457 per Dawson J; at 472-473 per Toohey J.) and by judges in the United Kingdom (Panoutsos v Raymond Hadley Corporation of New York [1917] 2 KB 473 at 477; Glencore Grain Ltd v Flacker Shipping Ltd (The Happy Day) [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 487 at 506 [64] per Potter LJ, delivering the reasons of the Court), New Zealand (Neylon v Dickens [1978] 2 NZLR 35 at 37-38; Connor v Pukerau Store Ltd [1981] 1 NZLR 384 at 386), Canada (British American Oil Co v Ferguson [1951] 2 DLR 37 at 44; Marchischuk v Dominion Industrial Supplies Ltd [1991] 2 SCR 61 at 65; Saskatchewan River Bungalows Ltd v Maritime Life Assurance Co [1994] 2 SCR 490 at 499-500), the United States of America (Johnson v Zerbst (1938) 304 US 458 at 464; Barker v Wingo (1972) 407 US 514 at 529; Milas v Labor Association of Wisconsin, Inc (1997) 571 NW (2d) 656 at 659 [13] (Wis); Cassey v Stewart (1999) 727 So 2d 655 at 658 (La App 2 Cir)) and South Africa (Laws v Rutherfurd (1924) AD 261 at 263; Road Accident Fund v Mothupi (2000) (4) SA 38 at 49 [15]). Such a "waiver" would operate against parties to a contract who know of a breach and who, without any relevant disability or disqualification, consciously waive the breach so as to preclude a later change of mind and a later decision to enforce legal rights. Supporters of waiver then regard the defence as applying notwithstanding the absence of a variation of the contract or of the necessary preconditions to establish an estoppel or an election between inconsistent rights (cf Sargent v ASL Developments Ltd (1974) 131 CLR 634 at 641) …

[138] In Verwayen, Brennan J explained his view of "waiver" by reference to what Lord Hailsham of St Marylebone LC had said in Banning v Wright (Inspector of Taxes). Brennan J stated:

> What his Lordship is saying is that a right which is susceptible of waiver can be "confessed" by a party against whom it might prima facie be exercisable but that party's liability can be "avoided" by showing that the right has been abandoned. In other words, upon waiver, the party waiving the right ceases to be able thereafter to assert it effectively. When a right has been waived [in this sense] … it is unnecessary to consider whether any other party has acted in reliance on the release or abandonment: the right is abandoned once and for all.

[139] To justify a unilateral "waiver", separate from the rules of contract, estoppel and election, Brennan J explained (at 423):

> These distinct doctrines serve different purposes: election … ensures that there is no inconsistency in the enforcement of a person's rights; estoppel or equitable estoppel ensures that a party who acts in reliance on what another has represented or promised suffers no unjust detriment thereby; waiver recognises the unilateral divestiture of certain rights. True it is that the divisions in nature and purpose between one of these doctrines and another have not always been expressed in the way in which I have stated them and there have been occasions when the sterilisation of a right has been dubiously attributed to one doctrine rather than to another.

[140] Dawson J took a similar approach in Verwayen (at 456):

> In order to waive a statutory right … it must be a personal or private right and must not rest upon public policy or expediency … Provided that it bars a remedy rather than extinguishes a cause of action, a statute of limitations gives rise to a right of that kind and it must be pleaded if it is to be invoked … If it is not pleaded, it is said to be waived.

His Honour went on, however, to acknowledge the imperfection of the propounded category.

[141] In the United Kingdom, Robert Walker LJ in Oliver Ashworth [2000] Ch 12 at 31 left open whether there existed a "third route", besides estoppel and election. He did so after reference to a principle of Scottish law that recognises an equitable doctrine of enforceable election, known as "approbate and reprobate" (See Ker v Wauchope (1819) 1 Bligh (NS) 1, 21; 4 ER 1, 8; referred to by Hoffmann J in Banner Industrial and Commercial Properties Ltd v Clark Paterson Ltd [1990] 2 EGLR 139 at 140). Ultimately, his Lordship put the question aside as he did not consider it necessary to decide the matter in that case.

[142] Nevertheless, in Glencore Grain Ltd v Flacker Shipping Ltd (The Happy Day) [2002] 2 Lloyd's Rep 487 at 506 [64], Potter LJ, delivering the reasons of the Court, pressed the modern conceptualisation of "waiver" a little further):

> Broadly speaking, there are two types of waiver strictly so-called: unilateral waiver and waiver by election. Unilateral waiver arises where X alone has the benefit of a particular clause in a contract and decides unilaterally not to exercise the right or to forego the benefit conferred by that particular clause … In such a case, X may expressly or by his conduct suggest that Y need not perform an obligation under the contract, no question of an election by X between two remedies or courses of action being involved. Waiver by election on the other hand is concerned with the reaction of X when faced with conduct by Y, or a particular factual situation which has arisen, which entitles X to exercise or refrain from exercising a particular right to the prejudice of Y. Both types of waiver may be distinguished from estoppel. The former looks principally to the position and conduct of the person who is said to have waived his rights. The latter looks chiefly at the position of the person relying on the estoppel. In waiver by election, unlike estoppel, it is not necessary to demonstrate that Y has acted in reliance upon X's representation.

[143] Conclusion: an emerging concept of "waiver": A number of conclusions may be drawn from a consideration of the foregoing authorities:

(1) The content of the doctrine of "waiver" in the taxonomy of remedies available where there is an alleged contractual breach is not settled. This is partly because of the differing ways in which the concept of "waiver" has been used: as an umbrella term to encompass various forms of unilateral loss of legal rights, and as a technical category that falls short of estoppel or election but to which the waiving party will nevertheless be held;

(2) Where the doctrines of estoppel, election or contractual variation (for consideration or by deed) apply, they must be given effect according to the established law on those subjects. Nevertheless, because there is an obvious overlap between the categories, it is possible for an additional or alternative category of "waiver" to be recognised as part of Australian law. In practice, parties commonly plead and not infrequently seek to prove overlapping legal categories. The overlap is an inherent feature of judge-made law. A lack of conceptual purity and uncertain application is occasionally balanced by the provision of practical remedies apt to the facts of the particular case;

(3) Reliance on technical instances of unilateral "waiver" is certainly not new in the common law. It finds resonance in both old (Craine (1920) 28 CLR 305 at 326. See Seddon and Ellinghaus, Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract, 9th Aust ed (2008), p 1046 [21.31]) and recent authority in this Court (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 423 per Brennan J; at 457 per Dawson J; at 472-473 per Toohey J), and in the judicial decisions of other common law countries (see above these reasons at [136]). Judicial and scholarly analysis of unilateral "waiver", however, is divided (see above these reasons at [131]-[142]). At least at the level of past decisions of this Court, it is inconclusive (See, eg, Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394). If necessary, it therefore falls to this Court to resolve the ambiguity;

(4) Particular instances of "waiver" have been upheld in the context of litigation. This is the case in proceedings where a party indicates its intention not to invoke a statutory limitation defence (cf Seddon and Ellinghaus, Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract, 9th Aust ed (2008), p 1046 [21.31]). However, as McHugh J observed in Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 497, such instances are sui generis and anomalous. They do not decide the issue of legal principle and policy presented by a case such as the present. At most, they illustrate particular examples of circumstances that enliven a broader and as yet imprecise principle of the common law. For example, it cannot be the case that there is a special legal category in relation to the suggested "waiver" of a bar provided by a statute of limitations. Such a category could be no more than an example, or occasion, of the application of a broader principle of law still awaiting expression;

(5) The precise role of "waiver" cannot therefore be resolved by absolute statements, at least at this stage. Nonetheless, drawing from recent authority, and by analogy with the Scottish doctrine of "approbation and reprobation", it is relatively easy to conceive of circumstances where it "may be unfair for one party, A, to adopt inconsistent positions in his dealings with the other, B" (Oliver Ashworth [2000] Ch 12 at 27 per Robert Walker LJ). Circumstances in the dealings between parties sometimes alter. Persons involved in a dispute change their minds. Supporting the availability of an enforceable doctrine of "waiver" in particular circumstances lies at the core of the common law freedom enjoyed by parties of full capacity to contract. That freedom includes the freedom of the party both to insist on its legal rights and to renounce, abandon or waive such rights. Rather than upholding the permanent effectiveness of all instances of "waiver", to forestall a change of mind, there is a competing notion that ordinarily, until judgment is entered, a party may invoke and demand their legal rights (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 427 per Brennan J). That is the case unless there is some countervailing substantive or procedural impediment that prevents that party from doing so; and

(6) It is obviously necessary to avoid undermining competing principles that are established in the law (cf Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 497 per McHugh J) when developing the limited instances where unilateral "waiver" would prevent a party from changing its mind and seeking to revive an insistence on its legal rights. These potentially competing principles include the necessity to establish consideration (or a deed) for a bilateral variation of a contract; to demonstrate reliance and detriment to establish a legally effective estoppel; and to show a conscious choice between inconsistent rights for a legally effective election (Feltham, Hochberg and Leech (eds), Spencer Bower's Law Relating to Estoppel by Representation, 4th ed (2004), pp 375-376 [XIII.1.26]).

[144] In light of the foregoing analysis, I am inclined to accept that a party may unilaterally release or abandon a right and be held to such a "waiver" beyond instances of contractual variation, estoppel and election. In my view, "waiver" certainly extends beyond the very particular circumstance of an indication of non-reliance on a statute of limitations.

[145] However, for the doctrine of "waiver" to find a sure footing amongst the categories of legal relief, the circumstances of the "waiver" must be clear in the first place. To be binding, the parties must be subject to no relevant disability or disadvantage. Further, as to the parties to, and the circumstances of, the "waiver", the facts must be such that it would be manifestly unfair for the party which had earlier waived its legal rights later to adopt an inconsistent position and to seek to enforce them. Cases of estoppel and binding election are the clearest examples of such a manifest unfairness. However, I would accept a residual category of manifest unfairness at common law that is distinct from estoppel and election. The law will provide relief by upholding a "waiver" in circumstances where not to do so would be manifestly unfair to the beneficiary of the "waiver".

[Applying this test to the facts at hand, Kirby J held that the indemnifier had not waived its rights. Like Gummow, Hayne and Kiefel JJ, Kirby J did not accept that the first three events listed in the facts at the beginning of this extract had occurred. Further, as Ms Edwards did not have the authority to act on behalf of the indemnifier, it could not be said that it was "manifestly unfair" to allow the indemnifier to rely on cl 2 of the indemnification agreements.

HEYDON J agreed with the reasons of GUMMOW, HAYNE and KIEFEL except for two qualifications that did not relate to the analysis of the waiver argument.]

Appeal allowed.

RELIEF AGAINST FORFEITURE

[25.80] The termination of a contract may result in one party suffering the deprivation, or forfeiture, of an interest in property, instalment payments or valuable contractual rights. Courts of equity have long exercised a jurisdiction to provide relief against certain forfeitures. Relief against the forfeiture of an interest in property may be granted by ordering specific performance of the contract in favour of the party in breach. The extracts from Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406 at [25.85] and Tanwar Enterprises Pty Ltd v Cauchi [2003] HCA 57; (2003) 217 CLR 315 at [25.105] deal with the circumstances in which a court will exercise this discretion. The jurisdiction to relieve against the forfeiture of instalment payments is referred to in the extract from Tanwar Enterprises Pty Ltd v Cauchi [2003] HCA 57; (2003) 217 CLR 315 at [25.135] and in the extract from McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457 at [29.85]. As to whether a court could grant relief against the forfeiture of contractual or other non-proprietary rights, see the note at [25.150].

Legione v Hateley

[25.85] Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: Under a contract of sale dated 14 July 1978, Mr and Mrs Hateley, the purchasers, agreed to purchase certain land from Mr and Mrs Legione, the vendors. The purchase price was $35,000, payable by a deposit of $6,000 and the balance, bearing interest at 8 per cent, on 1 July 1979. On payment of the deposit, the purchasers were entitled to, and did, enter into possession of the land. Without the knowledge of the vendors, the purchasers built a house on the land. Special Condition 5 stated that time was of the essence. It further provided that a party could not enforce his rights and remedies under the contract unless he gave the other written notice specifying the default and stating his intention to enforce his rights and remedies unless the default were made good within a period of not less than 14 days of the notice, and the other party failed to remedy the default. The condition also provided that if the notice stated that the contract would be rescinded if the default were not remedied, it would become rescinded at the expiration of the period if the default were not remedied. In event of rescission, the vendors were entitled to forfeit the deposit and recover possession.

The purchasers had expected to raise the balance of the purchase money on the sale of another property, but this sale fell through. On 29 June, the purchasers so informed the vendors and requested a three-month extension for the time for completion. On 12 July, the vendors' solicitors informed the purchasers that time would not be extended and suggested that the purchasers might obtain bridging finance. On 26 July, they sent a notice to the purchasers stating that unless the balance of the purchase price and certain accrued interest were duly paid, the vendors would rescind the contract. The time for payment expired at midnight on 10 August. On 9 August, the purchaser's solicitor, Mr Gardiner, telephoned the vendor's solicitor and told a secretary, Miss Williams, whom he was told was dealing with the matter, that the purchaser had arranged bank finance and would be ready to settle on 17 August. Miss Williams said, "I think that'll be all right but I'll have to get instructions." On 14 August, the vendor claimed that the contract had been rescinded in consequence of the notice and on the following day refused a tender of the residue of the price.

The purchasers unsuccessfully sought an order for specific performance in the Supreme Court of Victoria and the vendors' counterclaim for a declaration that the contract had been rescinded was successful. An appeal to the Full Court by Mrs Hateley, the surviving purchaser, was allowed. The vendors appealed to the High Court.]

GIBBS CJ and MURPHY J: [421] [T]here will be an estoppel in the present case if the following facts are established — (1) that Miss Williams, by saying that she would get instructions, induced the solicitors for the purchasers to believe that the vendors' right to rescind the contract would be kept in abeyance until the instructions were obtained and communicated, and intended that those solicitors should act on that belief; (2) that the vendors are bound by the conduct of Miss Williams; (3) that the solicitors for the purchasers, acting on the faith of that inducement, desisted from paying the balance of the purchase price within the time specified in the notice of rescission, although they would otherwise have made payment within that time; (4) that it would be inequitable to allow the vendors to rescind the contract without first informing the purchasers that no extension of time would be granted and then giving the purchasers a reasonable opportunity to make the payment. It is of course clear that neither the solicitors, nor Miss Williams, had any actual authority from the vendors to make any representation to the purchasers that the vendors' rights would be kept in abeyance. But the vendors had authorized the solicitors to act for them in completing the sale. Within reasonable limits, the solicitors, having been entrusted by the vendors with the conduct of the negotiations, must be treated as having the authority which, within the course of the negotiations, they purported to exercise: cf Crabb v Arun District Council [1976] Ch 179, 193. "The solicitor is to be regarded as the alter ego of the client and the rights of the other party to the contract cannot be made to depend upon the diligence or lack of diligence exhibited by the solicitor in his dealings with his client": Sargent v ASL Developments Ltd (1974) 131 CLR 634, 659; see also at 649. It was of course the conduct of the vendors that gave the solicitors ostensible authority to act on their behalf. The authority extended to actions carried out in the ordinary course of business by such members or employees of the firm as ordinarily acted for it. When the solicitors selected or permitted Miss Williams to speak on their behalf, in their capacity as solicitors for the vendors, her words bound the vendors ….

[422] The statement by Miss Williams was in our opinion both intended and likely to induce a belief in the mind of the purchasers' solicitors that the vendors would not enforce their strict legal rights until they indicated their intention to do so. In one sense, the statement made by Miss Williams may have seemed only tentative and provisional. However, it was made in the context of a conversation between parties who knew that the time fixed by the notice of rescission was about to expire, and that if the purchasers did not settle within that time the contract would be at an end. There would have been no point in Miss Williams obtaining instructions, if, by the time they had been obtained, the rescission of the contract had taken effect. The position would have been quite different if Miss Williams had said: "I have no instructions — the only safe thing for you to do is to settle within the time specified in the notice." But when Miss Williams said that she thought it would be all right, and that she would have to get instructions, she must have meant, and the purchasers' solicitors were entitled to believe, that the position was being left in abeyance until the instructions were received. If that were not so, the conversation would have been a futility. We should add that we consider that Miss Williams acted quite reasonably in doing what she did.

It was submitted that there was no evidence that the purchasers' solicitors believed that the matter was left in abeyance and that the vendors' rights would not be enforced until some further communication was made and the purchasers were given an opportunity to make payment. However, it seems to us that the facts lead to the inference that the solicitors had such a belief and acted on it. Funds were available on 9 August, and it is impossible to suppose that the purchasers' solicitors would not have made payment on that or on the following day, if they had thought that the vendors intended to insist on their legal right to treat the contract as rescinded if payment had not been made within the time specified in the notice. The terms of the letter sent by the purchasers' solicitors on 9 August support this view. The inaction of the purchasers, which altered their position, was because they believed, on the faith of the conversation, that the matter was in abeyance. It would be [423] inequitable to allow the vendors to treat the contract as rescinded without first informing the purchasers that they must complete forthwith and giving them a reasonable opportunity to do so.

The vendors had the legal right to treat the contract as rescinded if payment was not made by midnight on 10 August. But for the reasons which we have given, the conduct of their agents made it inequitable to allow them to enforce that right without first giving reasonable notice to the purchasers of their intention to do so if payment was not made. They gave no notice but claimed to treat the contract as rescinded. The purchasers forthwith made a tender of payment. The vendors were estopped from treating the contract as rescinded when the tender was made.

For these reasons we consider that the purchasers were entitled to specific performance and that the appeal should be dismissed.

However, it appears that the other members of the Court would hold that the vendors were not estopped from treating the contract as rescinded. It therefore becomes necessary for us to consider the further question whether the purchasers should be relieved against the forfeiture of their interest in the land that will occur if the vendors are successful in the present proceedings. …

There is no doubt that when the purchasers executed the contract and paid the deposit the beneficial ownership of the land passed to them subject to the payment of the purchase money. The effect of cl 15 of the copyright conditions of sale was to deprive the [424] purchasers of their interest in the land once a notice had been given under that clause and the default in payment to which the notice referred had not been remedied within the time limited in the notice. In saying that we of course assume, contrary to our own opinion, that no estoppel had occurred. In these circumstances it is manifest that the condition brought about a forfeiture of the purchasers' interest in the land.

In Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] AC 691, 722 Lord Wilberforce said:

> There cannot be any doubt that from the earliest times courts of equity have asserted the right to relieve against the forfeiture of property. The jurisdiction has not been confined to any particular type of case. The commonest instances concerned mortgages, giving rise to the equity of redemption, and leases, which commonly contained re-entry clauses; but other instances are found in relation to copyholds, or where the forfeiture was in the nature of a penalty. Although the principle is well established, there has undoubtedly been some fluctuation of authority as to the self-limitation to be imposed or accepted on this power. There has not been much difficulty as regards two heads of jurisdiction. First, where it is possible to state that the object of the transaction and of the insertion of the right to forfeit is essentially to secure the payment of money, equity has been willing to relieve on terms that the payment is made with interest, if appropriate, and also costs (Peachy v Duke of Somerset (1721) 1 Stra 447; 93 ER 626 and cases there cited) …. Secondly, there were the heads of fraud, accident, mistake or surprise, always a ground for equity's intervention, the inclusion of which entailed the exclusion of mere inadvertence and a fortiori of wilful defaults.

Later, after discussing some of the authorities, his Lordship went on [1973] AC 691, 723:

> But it is consistent with these principles that we should reaffirm the right of courts of equity in appropriate and limited cases to relieve against forfeiture for breach of covenant or condition where the primary object of the bargain is to secure a stated result which can effectively be attained when the matter comes before the court, and where the forfeiture provision is added by way of security for the production of that result.

The judgment of Lord Wilberforce was concurred in by all members of the House in that case except Lord Simon of Glaisdale who took a wider view, holding that "equity has an unlimited and unfettered jurisdiction to relieve against contractual forfeitures and penalties" [1973] AC 691, 726. It was held in that case that there was power to relieve against the exercise by the covenantee (the assignor of a leasehold [425] interest) of a right of entry on failure by the covenantor to perform certain stipulations as to fencing and support of buildings.

In the light of those statements of principle it is difficult to see any reason why the power of courts of equity to relieve against forfeiture should not be available in a case such as the present ….

[429] A court of equity will grant specific performance notwithstanding a failure to make a payment within the time specified by the contract if there is nothing to render such an order inequitable. The fact that time for the performance of the stipulated obligation is of the essence of the contract generally makes the grant of specific performance inequitable in such a case. However, if it is just to relieve against the forfeiture which is incurred when the vendor retains payments already made under the contract, it is difficult to see why it should be unjust to relieve the purchaser against the forfeiture of the interest in the property that results in exactly the same circumstances. No doubt where the parties have chosen to make time of the essence of the contract the grant of relief against forfeiture as a preliminary to an order for specific performance will be exceptional. Nevertheless on principle we can see no reason why such an order should not be made if it will not cause injustice but will on the contrary prevent injustice. If relief against the forfeiture is granted, the objection to the grant of specific performance is removed.

In the present case the circumstances revealed by the existing evidence indicate that it would be unjust for the vendors to insist on the forfeiture of the purchasers' interest in the land. Important among those circumstances is the fact that the purchasers have erected on the land a house of considerable value and if the contract is rescinded the vendors will receive an ill-merited windfall. Further there are the facts that the purchase moneys were tendered only four days after the notice expired, and that the late payment was explained by the terms of the letter from the vendors' solicitors. The breach by the purchasers was neither wilful nor apparently serious. To enforce the legal rights of the vendors in these circumstances would be to exact a harsh and excessive penalty for a comparatively trivial breach. However, an opportunity should be given to the vendors to establish whether they have suffered damage as a result of the purchasers' failure. Moreover it will be necessary for the court to consider what terms should be imposed on the purchasers as a condition of the grant of relief. Clearly they should be required to pay the balance of the purchase price and interest, although at what rate will be a matter that requires consideration. Whether the purchasers should in addition be required to pay anything in respect of damages or costs depends on the evidence and argument that may be adduced.

As we have already indicated, in our opinion the appeal should be dismissed. However, in the circumstances we concur in the order that the case be remitted to the Supreme Court for determination of [430] the respondent's claim to be relieved from the forfeiture of her interest under the contract of sale.

[25.90] MASON and DEANE JJ: [435] Since the parties in the present case were in a pre-existing contractual relationship, it is unnecessary to consider whether, as apparently envisaged by Denning J in Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd [1947] 1 KB 130, 134-5, the doctrine of promissory estoppel should be accepted as a general doctrine applicable regardless of the existence of that relationship. Nor is it necessary, for the purposes of the present case, to consider whether the doctrine of promissory estoppel should be treated as an extension of estoppel in pais into a field where the doctrine of consideration otherwise predominates or whether it should be seen as an independent equitable doctrine. In either case, it is clear that there is general correspondence between the "grounds of preclusion" of an ordinary estoppel by representation and the "grounds of preclusion" of a promissory estoppel and that a number of rules which have been established as applicable to estoppel in pais are also applicable to promissory estoppel. Two of those rules are presently relevant.

First, it has long been recognized that a representation must be clear before it can found an estoppel in pais: Low v Bouverie [1891] 3 Ch 82, 106, 113; Newbon v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1935) 52 CLR 723, 738; Woodhouse AC Israel Cocoa Ltd SA v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co Ltd [1972] AC 741, 755-6, 768, 771 ….

[436] The requirement that a representation must be clear before it can found an estoppel is, in our view, applicable to any doctrine of promissory estoppel: see Woodhouse AC Israel Cocoa Ltd SA v Nigerian Produce Marketing Co Ltd; China-Pacific SA v Food Corporation of India [1981] QB 403, 429-30. …

[437] The second of those rules is that a person will not be estopped from departing from an assumption or a representation "unless, as a result of adopting it as the basis of action or inaction, the other party will have placed himself in a position of material disadvantage if departure from the assumption be permitted": per Dixon J in Thompson v Palmer (1933) 49 CLR 507, 547; and see Tool Metal Manufacturing Co Ltd v Tungsten Electric Co Ltd [1955] 1 WLR 761, 763-4; Grundt's Case (1937) 59 CLR 641, 674-5; Fontana NV v Mautner (1979) 254 Est Gaz LR 199. Again, we are of the view that this general rule is applicable to any doctrine of promissory estoppel: see Ajayi v RT Briscoe (Nigeria) Ltd [1964] 1 WLR 1326, 1330; Spencer Bower and Turner, Estoppel by Representation, 3rd ed (1977), pp 391-4.

Ultimately, in the view we take, the question whether there is a promissory estoppel in the present case depends upon whether the suggested representation was made to the solicitor acting for Mr and Mrs Hateley and, if it was, whether Mr and Mrs Hateley, through that solicitor, acted on it with the result that they were placed in a position of material disadvantage if departure from the representation were permitted. As we followed the argument, the suggested representation was to the effect that the vendors would not rely on any right to treat the contract as at an end provided that settlement took place either on 17 August 1979 or within a reasonable time after the solicitor for Mr and Mrs Hateley was advised that the vendors were not prepared to extend the time for settlement until that day (whichever was the earlier). If what was said on 9 August 1979 by Miss Williams of the firm of solicitors acting for the vendors to Mr Gardiner, who was the solicitor acting for Mr and Mrs Hateley, amounted to such a representation, it was within the ostensible authority of the solicitor for the vendors to make it on behalf of the vendors. It is true that the evidence indicates that Miss Williams was but the secretary of that solicitor. She was, however, the person to whom Mr Gardiner was connected when he asked to speak to the person dealing with the matter. More importantly, examination of the correspondence between solicitors indicates that it was Miss Williams who had signed in her own name, on behalf of the vendors' solicitors, a letter advising that the [438] vendors were not prepared to extend the due date for completion of the contract of sale and a subsequent letter enclosing a copy of the notice of rescission.

The evidence is unsatisfactory on the question whether, if there were a representation to the suggested effect, Mr and Mrs Hateley, through their solicitor, adopted it as a basis of action or inaction and thereby placed themselves in a position of material disadvantage if departure from the representation were permitted. Part of the reason for this may be a failure by the pleadings to allege this necessary component of any promissory estoppel. Mr Gardiner did not give express evidence as to whether he had interpreted what Miss Williams said as constituting a representation to the relevant effect or whether he had acted upon any such representation. On the day before he had the telephone conversation with Miss Williams, he had written to Mr and Mrs Hateley in terms which indicate that he already assumed that settlement would take place on 17 August 1979. Overall, however, the evidence seems to us to warrant a finding that Mr Gardiner acted on the representation and, as a result of so acting, failed to arrange settlement prior to the expiry of the time for settlement allowed by the notice of rescission. That being so, the issue as to the existence of a promissory estoppel finally resolves itself into the question whether a representation to the relevant effect was ever made by Miss Williams on behalf of the vendors to Mr Gardiner on behalf of Mr and Mrs Hateley.

… The requirement that a representation as to existing fact or future conduct must be clear if it is to found an estoppel in pais or a promissory estoppel does not mean that the representation must be express. Such a clear representation may properly be seen as implied by the words used or to be adduced from either failure to speak [439] where there was a duty to speak or from conduct. Nor is it necessary that a representation be clear in its entirety. It will suffice if so much of the representation as is necessary to found the propounded estoppel satisfies the requirement. Thus, a representation that a particular right will not be asserted for at least x days is not rendered, for the purposes of promissory estoppel, unclear or equivocal merely because the words used are equivocal as to whether the relevant period is x days, x plus one day or x plus two days. If what is said or done amounts to a clear and unequivocal representation that the particular right will not be asserted for a period of at least x days, a representation to that effect can be relied on to found an estoppel. …

The first thing to be noted about what was said in the conversation between Mr Gardiner and Miss Williams is that Miss Williams' comments were in reply to statements made to her by Mr Gardiner. Those statements were to the effect that "the ANZ Bank at Pakenham", from whom the purchasers were said to have arranged bridging finance, "required approximately a week in which to carry out their usual title searches, but they would be ready to settle on the following Friday — which was 17 August". In other words, on his own account of the conversation, Mr Gardiner did not inquire of Miss Williams whether the vendors would allow a further period of time for settlement. He "told" her that the bank "required" the further time for searches after which they would be "ready to settle". It was in reply to those statements of Mr Gardiner [440] that Miss Williams commented that she thought that that would be all right but that she would have to get instructions. Plainly that statement could not be treated as an agreement or representation that the vendors would extend the time for settlement until 17 August 1979. Nor can that statement properly be seen as containing any representation that, pending communication of instructions, the purchasers could, with impunity, disregard the time allowed for settlement by the notice of rescission. To the contrary, Miss Williams' statement that she thought it would be all right but would have to get instructions intimated that she was not in a position to agree to what was, on a fair interpretation of Mr Gardiner's account of the conversation, being put to her as a fait accompli.

It follows that Miss Williams did not, either by her words or her conduct, make to Mr Gardiner, on behalf of Mr and Mrs Hateley, any clear and unequivocal representation to the effect of that suggested as the basis for a promissory estoppel. The only representation in Miss Williams' answer to the statement that the bank "required" a further week to carry out title searches and that they would be "ready to settle" on 17 August was the express representation that she personally thought that that would be all right but that she would have to get instructions. It is, in our view, impossible properly to read into that statement any representation to the effect that, unless they were advised to the contrary, the purchasers could, with impunity, disregard the expiry of the time fixed by the written notice of rescission which had been served upon them. Indeed one can do no more than speculate as to what Miss Williams would have said if Mr Gardiner had expressly raised the question of waiving compliance with the notice pending receipt and communication of instructions. In the result, we are of the view that there was no basis, in the evidence, for a finding that the vendors were estopped, as against Mr and Mrs Hateley, from asserting that the contract was at an end on the expiry of the time allowed by the notice of rescission. We turn to the respondent's submission that she is entitled to relief against the forfeiture of her interest in the land upon terms that she pay to the appellants the amount of $30 188.24 that was tendered to them on 15 August 1979 and not accepted, being the balance of the purchase moneys under the contract. As the respondent did not advance a case for relief against forfeiture in the courts below, there is a question whether she should now be allowed to make this submission. Before examining this question it will be convenient to consider the respondent's case for relief against forfeiture.

[441] Two Privy Council decisions are daunting obstacles confronting the respondent's case — Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 AC 275 and Brickles v Snell [1916] 2 AC 599. They stand seemingly as authority for the proposition that specific performance, even by way of relief against forfeiture, is never ordered when a stipulation as to time, which is of the essence of the contract, has not been observed. However, three years before those decisions, the Privy Council in Kilmer v British Columbia Orchard Lands Ltd [1913] AC 319 had ordered specific performance of a contract by way of relief against forfeiture at the suit of the purchaser, notwithstanding that the vendor had elected to treat the contract as at an end following the purchaser's default in making due payment of an instalment of the purchase price, the contract containing a provision that time was to be of the essence.

The principle which the Judicial Committee applied in Kilmer's Case had been enunciated in In re Dagenham (Thames) Dock Co; Ex parte Hulse (1873) LR 8 Ch App 1022, where the Court of Appeal in Chancery (James and Mellish LJJ) held that a provision in a contract entitling the vendor to rescind for late payment, forfeit instalments of purchase price already paid and retake possession, time being of the essence of the contract, was a penalty against which relief should be granted by requiring completion on terms that the purchaser pay the balance of the purchase price with interest for late payment. Mellish LJ expressed the principle in this way (1873) LR 8 Ch App, at p 1025:

> … where there is a stipulation that if, on a certain day, an agreement remains either wholly or in any part unperformed — in which case the real damage may be either very large or very trifling — there is to be a certain forfeiture incurred, that stipulation is to be treated as in the nature of a penalty.

James LJ spoke of it as "an extremely clear case of a mere penalty for non-payment of the purchase-money", agreeing that it was a penalty from which the company was entitled to be relieved on payment of the residue of the purchase money with interest (34). In Kilmer's Case in the judgment prepared by Lord Macnaghten and delivered by Lord Moulton the views of James and Mellish LJJ were repeated and applied. Their Lordships said [1913] AC, at p 325: "It seems to be even a stronger case, for the penalty, if enforced according to the letter of the agreement, becomes more and more severe as the agreement approaches completion, and the money liable to confiscation becomes larger."

Kilmer's Case was explained in Steedman v Drinkle and Brickles v Snell as a case in which the vendor had waived the due payment of the overdue instalment so that the purchaser's breach of contract was not a breach of an essential condition. Unfortunately Kilmer's Case does not easily lend itself to this explanation. Waiver was one of the arguments advanced in support of the appeal. It was not, however, reflected in the judgment, where their Lordships set out the provision making time of the essence in respect of payment of instalments and forfeiting all instalments paid in the event of any delay in payment and noted that the relevant payment was by the terms of the agreement to be made on or before 14 June 1910, that it was extended to 7 July 1910, and that on 9 July the vendor declared that the deal was off. In the absence of any reference in the judgment to a waiver of time being of the essence — and there is no reference — it is difficult to conclude that the judgment turned upon any finding to that effect. Indeed, the report contains no reference to material which could sustain the conclusion that there had been a waiver of the essentiality of prompt payment. The extension of the time for payment from 14 June to 7 July would not involve such a waiver. So much had been decided in Barclay v Messenger (1874) 43 LJ Ch 449, 456, more recently followed by this Court in Tropical Traders Ltd v Goonan (1964) 111 CLR 41, 53-5 where Kitto J, with whom Taylor and Menzies JJ agreed, accepted the explanation of Kilmer's Case offered in Steedman v Drinkle and Brickles v Snell, supplementing that explanation by reference to facts stated in the Law Journal report of Kilmer's Case (1913) 82 LJPC 77.

Much earlier Dixon J in McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457, 478 had questioned the correctness of the traditional explanation of Kilmer's Case. He said that the view adopted in the Dagenham (Thames) Dock Case (1873) LR 8 Ch App 1022:

> … seems to have been that relief should be granted, not against the forfeiture of the instalments, but against the forfeiture of the estate under a contract which involved the retention of the purchase money: and this may have been the ground upon which Lord Moulton proceeded in [Kilmer's Case], notwithstanding the explanation of that case given in Steedman v Drinkle and Brickles v Snell.

Apart from Steedman v Drinkle and Brickles v Snell, statements in the judgments in Mehmet v Benson (1965) 113 CLR 295, 307-8, 309, 314-15, and in Petrie v [443] Dwyer (1954) 91 CLR 99, 104-5, appear to support the proposition that specific performance of a contract cannot be obtained by a purchaser once the contract has been rescinded in consequence of his breach of an essential term. The proposition does not, however, appear to have been in issue in either case.

The question has not been raised as an issue in recent times, no doubt because the doctrine enunciated in Steedman v Drinkle and Brickles v Snell has been thought to hold the field. However, Farwell J in Mussen v Van Diemen's Land Co [1938] Ch 253 expressed the opinion that specific performance, with or without compensation, would be ordered at the suit of a purchaser wherever possible, so long as he was able and willing to complete. He said [1938] Ch 253, 263-4:

> There are no doubt cases where there has been a failure to pay the instalments and to complete the contract, and the purchaser has then come forward and said: "I am here and now ready and willing to complete the contract and to pay the price originally stipulated by the contract and to carry out its terms," and then the Court has said that it is inequitable and against conscience that the vendor should refuse specific performance and claim to retain the money already paid. That is because the Court has said that if the plaintiff is willing to carry out his contract, notwithstanding the fact that temporarily at any rate he was unable to do so, if he is willing and able to carry out his contract, it being the primary intention of the parties that the sale should take place, it would be against conscience for the defendant to say: "I will not give effect to the primary intention of the parties, but I will refuse to complete, and I will retain the money which has been paid to me."

Although it is not entirely clear that his Lordship was directing his remarks to a contract in which due payment was of the essence, it seems that his comments were intended to embrace this situation, because the contract with which he was dealing was of that kind. In particular, it appears plainly enough from his judgment that Farwell J was of the view that the plaintiff in that case would have been entitled to relief if it had appeared that what the defendant company sought to do was unconscionable.

Farwell J thought that relief against forfeiture of instalments of purchase money already paid would only be granted to a purchaser who was willing and able to complete the contract. In this respect a majority of the Court of Appeal (Somervell and Denning LJJ, Romer LJ dissenting) held otherwise: Stockloser v Johnson [1954] 1 QB 476. But this aspect of Farwell J's judgment is not material to the [444] question now under consideration; nor is the answer to this question dependent on the correctness of his Lordship's opinion in respect of relief against the forfeiture of instalments of purchase money.

Underlying the approach taken in the Dagenham (Thames) Dock Case (1873) LR 8 Ch App 1022 and Kilmer's Case [1913] AC 319 is an expansive view of the equitable jurisdiction to relieve against forfeiture. This in turn conforms to the fundamental principle according to which equity acts, namely that a party having a legal right shall not be permitted to exercise it in such a way that the exercise amounts to unconscionable conduct — see Story, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, 12th ed (1877), vol 2, par 1316.

It has been thought by some that the equitable jurisdiction to relieve against penalties and forfeitures is a branch of the jurisdiction to relieve in cases of accident. This view has been strongly contested — see Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 5th ed (1941), vol 2, par 433, p 206, n 18 — on the ground that the correct foundation of the jurisdiction was expressed by Lord Macclesfield LC in Peachy v Duke of Somerset (1721) 1 Str 447, 453; 93 ER 626, 630: "The true ground of relief against penalties is from the original intent of the case, where the penalty is designed only to secure money, and the Court gives him [the obligee] all that he expected or desired …"

The principle as expressed by Lord Macclesfield was modified and extended by Lord Thurlow LC who, in Sloman v Walter (1783) 1 Bro CC 418, 419; 28 ER 1213, 1214, expressed it in this way:

> The rule, that where a penalty is inserted merely to secure the enjoyment of a collateral object, the enjoyment of the object is considered as the principal intent of the deed, and the penalty only as accessional, and, therefore, only to secure the damage really incurred, is too strongly established in equity to be shaken.

It is, however, doubtful whether these comments, appropriate as they may have been to relief against penalties, were intended to apply with equal force to all cases of relief against forfeiture. There is more to be said for the view that when the equitable jurisdiction is invoked to relieve against a forfeiture which is not in the nature of a penalty, equity looks to unconscionable conduct, as Farwell J indicated in Mussen's Case [1938] Ch 253, 263-4, in the passage already quoted, especially when unconscionable conduct is associated with fraud, mistake, accident or surprise.

[445] A penalty, as its name suggests, is in the nature of a punishment for non-observance of a contractual stipulation; it consists of the imposition of an additional or different liability upon breach of the contractual stipulation: see, generally, O'Dea v Allstates Leasing System (WA) Pty Ltd (1983) 152 CLR 359. On the other hand, forfeiture involves the loss or determination of an estate or interest in property or a proprietary right, eg, a lease, in consequence of a failure to perform a covenant. When non-payment of rent or a fine is made the occasion for forfeiture of an estate or interest in property it may be proper to treat the forfeiture as being similar in character to a penalty because it is designed to ensure payment of the rent or fine. There is, however, a real distinction between "penalty" and "forfeiture" and it is unfortunate that the terms have been frequently used in a way which blurs it. The claims made by the purchasers in Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 AC 275 and Brickles v Snell [1916] 2 AC 599 were for relief against the "forfeiture" of instalments of purchase money. The relevant contracts, like the modern contract of sale, permitted the vendor to "forfeit" instalments of purchase money. In this situation, despite the use of the word "forfeit", relief is granted on the footing that the contractual provision entitling the vendor to retain the instalments is in substance a penalty, or in the nature of a penalty, because it is designed to ensure payment of the entire purchase price and it exceeds the damage which he suffers by reason of the purchaser's default.

The respondent's claim here is of a different kind to that involved in Steedman v Drinkle and Brickles v Snell. She seeks relief against forfeiture of her equitable interest as purchaser under a binding contract for sale. Forfeiture of the purchaser's interest, usually the consequence of the vendor's rescission for breach of an essential term, occurs under the general law regulating the rights of vendor and purchaser. Such a forfeiture is to be distinguished from a contractual forfeiture which is designed to ensure performance of a principal obligation. True it is that condition 5 expressly regulated the vendor's right of rescission in the present case and provided for rescission on non-compliance with the prescribed notice on expiration of the time limited. However, the presence of this contractual stipulation, which merely regulates the vendor's common law right to rescind, does not alter the essential character of the forfeiture of the purchaser's interest which occurs when rescission takes place. No doubt the risk of forfeiture is a strong inducement to completion of the contract, that being the primary intention of the parties, but it [446] is incorrect to describe the rescission for which condition 5 provides and the forfeiture of the purchaser's interest which it entails as a penalty or as being in the nature of a penalty.

In this Court it has been said that the purchaser's equitable interest under a contract of sale is commensurate only with her ability to obtain specific performance of the contract (Brown v Heffer (1967) 116 CLR 344, 349). On this view the loss of the respondent's equitable interest, from which she presently seeks to be relieved, was occasioned by her failure to comply with an essential condition of the contract, payment of the balance of the purchase price on 10 August 1979, the date fixed for completion by the appellant's rescission notice, time being of the essence by virtue of condition 5. Upon the expiration of the time fixed by the notice the contract came to an end.

A competing view — one which has much to commend it – is that the purchaser's equitable interest under a contract for sale is commensurate, not with her ability to obtain specific performance in the strict or primary sense, but with her ability to protect her interest under the contract by injunction or otherwise: Tailby v Official Receiver (1888) 13 App Cas 523, 546-9; Redman v Permanent Trustee Co of New South Wales Ltd (1916) 22 CLR 84, 96; Hoysted v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1920) 27 CLR 400, 423; Pakenham Upper Fruit Co Ltd v Crosby (1924) 35 CLR 386, 396-9; Jordan, Chapters on Equity, 6th ed (1945), p 52, n (e). If this view were to be adopted and applied, the respondent's inability to obtain specific performance in the primary sense would not entail the loss of her equitable interest. She would retain that interest so long as she was entitled to make out a case for relief against forfeiture.

However, for the purposes of this case we are prepared to accept the correctness of the statement in Brown v Heffer. It then becomes necessary to look behind the authorities to the reasons which have been put forward to sustain the view that rescission in consequence of breach of an essential term is an absolute bar to relief against forfeiture of the purchaser's interest. Before doing so, we should make one comment on the authorities. Steedman v Drinkle and Brickles v Snell deny the exercise, rather than the existence, of jurisdiction to relieve against forfeiture of the purchaser's interest under a contract when he is in breach of an essential term and the contract has been brought to an end. If the purchaser in this situation fails to obtain relief it is because he is unable to bring [447] himself within the principles according to which relief is granted or refused, not because there is an absence of jurisdiction to grant him relief.

The rule that relief is never granted in respect of forfeiture by operation of law has no application to a forfeiture which occurs in consequence of a voluntary act done in the exercise of a legal right for, as we have seen, it is against such an act that relief is ordinarily granted. In this case rescission was the consequence of the respondent's non-compliance with a notice given by the appellants in exercise of the right conferred by condition 5. However, condition 5 does not affect the intrinsic character of rescission — essentially it is a voluntary act done by way of exercise of a legal right bringing about a legal consequence, the termination of the contract. Of course, if relief be granted against the vendor's voluntary act, the legal consequence flowing from that act – the rescission – is displaced and the purchaser's equitable interest is either continued or renewed.

Next there is the problem presented by the suggested unavailability of specific performance. Relief against forfeiture of the purchaser's interest under a contract for sale ordinarily involves an order for specific performance of the contract against the vendor, subject to compensation, that is, to the imposition of such terms as will fairly compensate him for insistence on completion of the contract in the altered circumstances occasioned by the purchaser's breach. The critical question then is: Should specific performance ever be ordered when the purchaser is in breach of an essential condition? The argument in favour of a negative answer is forceful. If parties expressly or impliedly stipulate that performance of a term is essential to their bargain then it would ordinarily be unjust to the innocent party to require him to complete notwithstanding a breach of that term. Generally speaking equity expects men to carry out their bargains and "will not let them buy their way out by uncovenanted payment": Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] AC 691, 723, per Lord Wilberforce. Nor will it remake the parties' contract simply because it transpires that as things have happened one party has made a bad bargain.

But if there be fraud, mistake, accident, surprise or some other element which would make it unconscionable or inequitable to insist on forfeiture of the purchaser's interest under the contract because he has not performed in strict accordance with its terms there is no injustice to the innocent party in granting relief against forfeiture by means of specific performance with or without compensation.

[448] Cheney v Libby (1890) 134 US 68 provides an illustration of an unconscionable rescission. There the Court ordered specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, time being of the essence, when the purchaser had failed on the due date to pay an instalment of purchase price in dollars, the stipulated mode of payment. The purchaser had been misled by the vendor's conduct into thinking that another form of payment would be accepted because it had been accepted by the vendor in the past. Once he knew the vendor refused to accept the payment, the purchaser promptly tendered payment in dollars, though the due date for payment had passed. The Court said (1890) 134 US 68, 78:

> Even where time is made material, by express stipulation, the failure of one of the parties to perform a condition within the particular time limited, will not in every case defeat his right to specific performance, if the condition be subsequently performed, without unreasonable delay, and no circumstances have intervened that would render it unjust or inequitable to give such relief. The discretion which a court of equity has to grant or refuse specific performance, and which is always exercised with reference to the circumstances of the particular case before it, (Hennessy v Woolworth, (1888) 128 US 438, 442) may, and of necessity must, often be controlled by the conduct of the party who bases his refusal to perform the contract upon the failure of the other party to strictly comply with its conditions.

After noting that forfeiture of the contract would enable the vendor "to take advantage of his own wrong" (1890) 134 US 68, 79, the Court went on to say (1890) 134 US 68, 80 that the provisions of the contract – "cannot be applied where the efficient cause of the failure of the party seeking specific performance to comply strictly and literally with the contract was the conduct of the other party". The foregoing discussion indicates that the Judicial Committee in Steedman v Drinkle and Brickles v Snell gave more weight to the value of enforcing contracts according to their strict terms and less attention to the fundamental principle which underlies the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction to relieve against forfeiture than we are disposed to give them. That the Judicial Committee did so is readily understandable because in the early part of this century overriding importance attached to the concept of freedom of contract and to the need to hold parties to their bargains. These considerations, though still important, should not be allowed to override competing [449] claims based on long standing heads of justice and equity. The result of the two decisions was to enunciate an inflexible rule that specific performance will never be granted where there is a breach of an essential condition, thereby diminishing the utility of the remedy in cases of relief against forfeiture. A preferable course is to adjust the availability of the remedy so that it becomes an effective instrument in situations in which it is necessary to relieve against forfeiture of the purchaser's interest under a contract for sale. The rule would then be expressed by saying that it is only in exceptional circumstances that specific performance will be granted at the instance of a purchaser who is in breach of an essential condition.

Whether the exceptional circumstances exist in a given case hinges on the existence of unconscionable conduct. It is impossible to define or describe exclusively all the situations which may give rise to unconscionable conduct on the part of a vendor in rescinding a contract for sale. None the less it may be said that where the conduct of the vendor, though not creating an estoppel or waiver, has effectively caused or contributed to the purchaser's breach of contract there is ground for exercising the jurisdiction to relieve. And if it also appears that the object of the rescission is not to safeguard the vendor from adverse consequences which he may suffer as a result of the contract remaining on foot, but merely to take unconscientious advantage of the benefits which will fortuitously accrue to him on forfeiture of the purchaser's interest under the contract, there will be even stronger ground for the exercise of the jurisdiction.

In the ultimate analysis the result in a given case will depend upon the resolution of subsidiary questions which inevitably arise. The more important of these are: (1) Did the conduct of the vendor contribute to the purchaser's breach? (2) Was the purchaser's breach (a) trivial or slight, and (b) inadvertent and not wilful? (3) What damage or other adverse consequences did the vendor suffer by reason of the purchaser's breach? (4) What is the magnitude of the purchaser's loss and the vendor's gain if the forfeiture is to stand? (5) Is specific performance with or without compensation an adequate safeguard for the vendor? In the present case we can answer the first two of these questions favourably to the respondent by reference to the evidence. Although we have concluded that the statement made on 9 August 1979 by Miss Williams to Mr Gardiner was not sufficiently clear and unequivocal to ground an estoppel against the appellants, it nevertheless created the impression in Mr Gardiner's mind that settlement would take place on 17 August or such earlier date, being a reasonable time, as might be advised if the appellants were not [450] prepared to extend the time for completion until 17 August. Granted that this was not the impression that Miss Williams intended to convey by her words and that it is not the construction which we place upon them, the words were capable of being understood in the sense in which Mr Gardiner understood them.

We have already found that Mr Gardiner acted in reliance on the statement made by Miss Williams as he understood it. The consequence is that the purchaser's breach was inadvertent and not wilful. In this context it seems that the breach was not a serious breach, though its impact on the vendor's position remains to be ascertained.

Of course we know that forfeiture will entail the loss by the respondent and the acquisition by the appellants of the value of the dwelling house which the respondent and her husband erected on the land at a cost of $35 000 after going into possession. In the absence of countervailing circumstances this consequence in itself might tend to suggest that the rescission was, in the circumstances of inadvertent breach, unconscientious and that the appellants are acting unconscionably in insisting that the rescission should stand. However, the evidence as it presently stands does not enable us to answer question 4 fully or to answer questions 3 and 5 above. It is a deficiency that presents a very real problem in deciding whether the respondent should be allowed to argue a case in favour of relief against forfeiture. The normal rule is that a party will not be permitted to argue a point, neither raised on the pleadings, nor fought at the trial, when further evidence might possibly affect the result. In this case, however, the Court has decided that the respondent should be at liberty to raise the point on this appeal. An important factor in that decision was the consideration that an investigation of the issue at first instance would have been abortive in view of the decisions in Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 AC 275 and Brickles v Snell [1916] 2 AC 599 which were binding on the Supreme Court.

The conclusion which we have reached is that the Court had jurisdiction to relieve against forfeiture in the circumstances of this case, that there is a serious question to be tried in the exercise of that jurisdiction and that the decision in the case will ultimately depend on considerations to which the parties have not had the opportunity of directing evidence. We would therefore remit the case to the Supreme Court for determination of the respondent's claim to be relieved from the forfeiture of her interest under the contract of sale. In all the circumstances, there should be no order as to costs of the [451] proceedings in this Court. In the event that the respondent succeeds in obtaining an order for the enforcement of the contract on the further hearing of the proceedings in the Supreme Court of Victoria, there should be no order as to the costs of the appeal from Murray J to the Full Court of the Supreme Court. In the event that the respondent fails to obtain such an order for the enforcement of the contract, the respondent should be ordered to pay the appellants' costs of the appeal to the Full Court. The costs of the proceedings at first instance, including the costs of the hearing before Murray J, and the costs of the proceedings on remitter to the Supreme Court, should be reserved to be dealt with by the Judge of the Supreme Court before whom the matter comes on further hearing.

[25.95] BRENNAN J (dissenting): … Could Miss Williams' statement have been understood reasonably by Mr Gardiner as making a promise or representation that, although the time for compliance with the notice might expire, the contract would not become rescinded while instructions were being obtained and for a reasonable time thereafter? The courtesies commonly observed by solicitors negotiating on their clients' behalf may give rise to an expectation that the status quo will be maintained as between their clients while instructions are being obtained, but whether a conversation which engenders such an expectation amounts to a promise or representation binding on the clients depends upon all the relevant circumstances. A relevant circumstance is the known limits of a solicitor's authority in the matter. Negotiations between solicitors are negotiations between agents, and the known limits of the authority – albeit the apparent or implied authority – of the respective agents define the ambit of their negotiations and thus shape the promises or representations binding upon the clients which can be inferred from the course of the negotiations. Generally speaking, when a party gives a notice to another party to secure or to facilitate the exercise of the first party's rights – such as the notice given by the vendors to the purchasers in the present case – the solicitor for the first party has no apparent or implied authority to countermand or qualify the effect of the notice in order to grant an indulgence to the other party. The solicitor for the party who gives the notice has no apparent or implied authority in such a case to make a binding promise or representation affecting the operation of the notice; he would need his client's instructions to permit him to do so. The solicitor for the [454] other party must be taken to know of that limitation in the absence of facts showing a wider authority …. Without any indication of a wider authority, it is not possible to infer that an undertaking by the vendors' solicitors to obtain further instructions amounted to a promise or representation that the notice would be countermanded or its operation suspended so as to keep the vendors bound by the contract after the time for rescission had passed. It is not necessary to consider what the position may have been if Miss Williams had represented that she had instructions authorizing her to extend the time for compliance with the notice. The question whether a statement by a solicitor that he has authority wider than his apparent or implied authority estops his client from denying the extent of the authority claimed does not arise upon the facts of the present case. This case turns on the anterior question, namely, whether it is to be inferred that Miss Williams, though she did not say so expressly, promised or represented on behalf of the vendors that the time for compliance with the notice was to be extended and the contract was to be kept on foot while she was obtaining instructions and during a reasonable time thereafter. Having regard to the limit upon her apparent or implied authority at the time – a limit which Mr Gardiner must be taken to have known – no such promise or representation can be inferred. If Miss Williams' statement that she expected that the vendors would agree to the extension sought by Mr Gardiner lulled him into believing that the vendors would not insist upon the rescission which was then imminent, his belief was induced by his sharing of Miss Williams' expectation as to what the vendors' [455] instructions would be, not by any promise or representation made by her on the vendors' behalf.

It follows that, in my opinion, Murray J at first instance was right to refuse the respondent a decree of specific performance, and that the appeal to the Full Court ought to have been dismissed. That appeal was allowed by a majority of the Full Court, and the respondent now seeks to maintain the Full Court's judgment in reliance upon a ground not argued before Murray J or before the Full Court. The respondent seeks relief against the forfeiture of her interest in the land the subject of the contract of sale. She went into possession, as she was entitled under cl 7 of the contract of sale, after paying the deposit in July 1978 and she erected a dwelling on the land at a cost of $35 000. If she is required to give up possession of the land, she will lose the benefit of that expenditure. The respondent submits that where default is made in the timeous payment of the residue of the purchase price under a contract of sale of land where time is of the essence and the vendor rescinds the contract, the consequential loss of the purchaser's interest in the land is a forfeiture against which equity can and will relieve in a proper case.

… [456] Where conveyance is the real consideration for payment of the price, it would be a penalty for the vendor to exact the price without conveying. Ordinarily a vendor who does not convey is denied the right to recover or retain the price or instalments of the price in excess of a reasonable deposit either because conveyance is treated as a condition of the obligation to pay the price or because a payment of the price or of an instalment of the price in advance of conveyance is treated as "a provisional payment defeasible by the subsequent failure, for any cause, of the real consideration": per Dixon J in Automatic Fire Sprinklers Pty Ltd v Watson (1946) 72 CLR 435, 465. And thus the purchaser has relief against the forfeiture of the price in excess of a reasonable deposit. But where there is a stipulation which entitles the vendor to retain the whole of the price or of an instalment of the price though he does not convey, the penalty can be avoided by directing conveyance upon payment of the balance (if any) of the price. Dagenham Dock and Kilmer may be seen as instances where relief was given against forfeiture of the estate under a contract which involved the retention of the purchase money by the vendor in the event of default by the purchaser. At all events, that was the explanation which Dixon J propounded in McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457, 478.

In the present case, the contract contains no special stipulation involving retention of the purchase money by the vendors, and there is no ground for relieving the defaulting purchaser against forfeiture of her interest in the land rather than against forfeiture of the payments of instalments of the purchase price. Indeed, the only rights which the purchaser acquired in the land were her rights under the contract and her interest in the land, being an equitable interest, is commensurate with the relief which equity would give her by way of enforcing the executory contract of sale — usually by a decree of specific performance: Brown v Heffer (1967) 116 CLR 344, 349; Redman v [457] Permanent Trustee Co of New South Wales Ltd (1916) 22 CLR 84, 96. Under an executory contract in which time is of the essence and which contains no special stipulation involving retention of the purchase money by the vendor, a purchaser who fails to pay the balance of the price at the stipulated time and who thereby loses his right to a decree to enforce the contract, loses his interest in the land. He is not entitled to the land as purchaser otherwise than under the contract; he has no entitlement to relief against forfeiture of his interest in the land independent of his right to a decree to enforce the contract.

[Brennan J discussed Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 AC 275 and Brickles v Snell [1916] 2 AC 599.] …

The relief to which a defaulting purchaser is entitled if he loses his right to specific performance is relief against the forfeiture of the purchase price other than a reasonable deposit: McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457; Mayson v Clouet [1924] AC 980; Linggi Plantations Ltd v Jagatheesan [1972] 1 MLJ 89 (PC). The purchaser has no entitlement to relief against forfeiture of the equitable interest that he would have had but for his default and that he has lost by reason of that default.

The respondent lost her interest in the land because she did not pay the residue of the price at the time she had promised, though she had agreed that time was of the essence of her contract. There is no equitable jurisdiction to relieve against the consequences of failure to pay the residue of the purchase price by the due date when the parties have agreed that the time of payment is of the essence of their contract: cf per Lord Wilberforce in Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] AC 691, 723. The purchaser, having lost her right to specific performance, has lost the benefit of the expenditure which she outlaid in putting a dwelling on the land. The appellants have obtained the benefit of that expenditure, but that circumstance does not destroy or sterilize the stipulation that time should be of the essence of the contract. If it had been possible to relieve the respondent against forfeiture of her interest in the land, the vendors' position would have required consideration: see Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] AC 691, 722. The question whether it would have been unjust to the vendors to foist a late payment of purchase moneys upon them would have required consideration. That question was not [459] investigated at the trial and it cannot be investigated on appeal to this Court. However, as

I am unable to uphold the new argument relied on by the respondent, I would allow the appeal and restore the judgment of Murray J.

Appeal allowed.

[Remit the case to the Supreme Court of Victoria for determination of the respondent's claim to be relieved from the forfeiture of her interest under the contract of sale.]

Tanwar Enterprises v Cauchi

[25.105] Tanwar Enterprises Pty Ltd v Cauchi [2003] HCA 57; (2003) 217 CLR 315 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The vendors owned three adjoining parcels of land at Glenwood, New South Wales. In October 1999, they entered into separate contracts to sell the land to Tanwar for a combined price of $4,502,526.90. Tanwar paid two sums of $225,126.32 as deposits. In addition, between 30 June 2000 and 20 July 2000, Tanwar paid a total of $397,473.40 towards the purchase price. On 20 July 2000, Tanwar also paid a total of $80,000 in consideration of an extension of the completion date from 28 February 2000 to August 2000. On 20 August 2000, the vendors issued notices of termination of each contract. However, the parties negotiated an extension. The parties entered into a deed which contained a new completion date of 25 June 2001. Time was stated to be of the essence. The funds for a second mortgage over the combined land were to come from Singapore. The funds did not arrive until 26 June 2001. The vendors served notice of termination of each contract. Tanwar commenced proceedings in the Supreme Court of New South Wales for relief against forfeiture and for specific performance of each contract or, alternatively, for return of each deposit. The primary judge rejected the claim to relief against forfeiture. The Court of Appeal dismissed Tanwar's appeal. Tanwar appealed this judgment.]

GLEESON CJ, MCHUGH, GUMMOW, HAYNE and HEYDON JJ:

The history of the litigation

[320] The case did not proceed on pleadings. Had there been pleadings, the issues of legal principle with which the Court of Appeal was, and now this Court is, concerned may have more readily appeared. To plead its suit as purchaser for specific performance (and for related declaratory relief), Tanwar would allege the making of each contract and the relevant terms, its performance and its readiness and willingness to perform the terms of the contract then to be performed, and its readiness and willingness to do all matters and things on its part thereafter to be done (Fitzgerald v Masters (1956) 95 CLR 420 at 434; Green v Sommerville (1979) 141 CLR 594, 610). To that, the respondents as vendors no doubt would respond that, in the events that had happened, and before the institution of the suit, the contracts had been brought to an end by the giving of the notices of termination on 26 June, there being contractual stipulations that time was of the essence.

It then would be for Tanwar to reply that, in the events that had happened, in equity time had not been of the essence on 26 June or, more precisely, that it was unconscientious of the vendors to plead the essential time stipulation and its breach as founding the purported termination on 26 June

(cf Spry, The Principles of Equitable Remedies, 6th ed (2001) at 211). That would focus attention upon what, as a matter of law and fact, was involved in the alleged unconscientious use by the vendors of their legal rights, given in terms by the contracts, to terminate upon failure by Tanwar to complete by 4.00 pm on 25 June. That is the essential issue in the case as it stands in this Court.

The leading judgment in the Court of Appeal was delivered by Handley JA. His Honour gave detailed consideration to the decisions of this Court in Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406 and Stern (1988) 165 CLR 489 and concluded that those two cases "lack a clear ratio which is binding on this Court". Handley JA also observed, with reference to the decision of the Privy Council in the Hong Kong appeal Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] AC 514, that it was "also clear that equitable relief will be available in Australia in circumstances where it would be refused in England". In this Court, each side sought support from one or more of the judgments in Legione and Stern. Neither side sought leave to re-open those cases, but there was a measure of disagreement as to the propositions of law for which they are authority ….

[321] At the trial, it appears not to have been disputed that Tanwar would be entitled in equity to relief against the forfeiture of the $397,473.40 representing part-payment of the purchase price were it to fail to obtain orders for specific performance of the contracts. If Tanwar were to succeed in obtaining specific performance, any question of this [322] forfeiture would cease to be of significance. As indicated above, the essential issue in this case is different. It concerns the alleged unconscientious reliance upon the essential time stipulation to found the termination of the contracts which Tanwar, for its part, wishes to complete.

The distinction sought to be made in the last paragraph may be seen in the statement by Gaudron J in Stern (1988) 165 CLR 489, 537:

> The issue raised by a purchaser who seeks specific performance of a contract which has been rescinded is not whether relief should be granted against the forfeiture of the interest arising under that contract, but whether specific performance remains an available remedy notwithstanding rescission …

The essential issue

[324] It now is convenient to return to the essential issue identified earlier in these reasons. Wherein lies the alleged unconscientious use by the vendors of their legal right to terminate upon failure by Tanwar to complete in accordance with the essential time stipulation imposed by the 2001 Deeds?

Unconscionable conduct

[25.110] The terms "unconscientious" and "unconscionable" are, as was emphasised in Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v C G Berbatis Holdings Pty Ltd (2003) 77 ALJR 926 at 933-934 [42]-[43], used across a broad range of the equity jurisdiction. They describe in their various applications the formation and instruction of conscience by reference to well developed principles. Thus, it may be said that breaches of trust and abuses of fiduciary position manifest unconscientious conduct; but whether a particular case amounts to a breach of trust or abuse of fiduciary duty is determined by reference to well developed principles, both specific and flexible in character. It is to those principles that the court has first regard rather than entering into the case at that higher level of abstraction involved in notions of unconscientious conduct in some loose sense where all principles are at large.

The term "unconscionable conduct" is used in authorities such as Legione and Stern. There is nothing new in this. The terms "unconscionable" and "against conscience" were, for example, used without distinction by Farwell J in Mussen v Van Diemen's Land Co [1938] Ch 253 at 262-263 in 1937. However, as Deane J explained in The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 440-441, (see also Australian Broadcasting Corporation v Lenah Game Meats Pty Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 199 at 227 [45]; Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v C G Berbatis Holdings Pty Ltd (2003) 77 ALJR 926 at 933 [41]), with reference to the discussion by Story (Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, 2nd Eng ed (1892), §1219) of the lien of the unpaid vendor, the term "unconscionable" is used to refer to that which [365] "ought not, in conscience," be allowed as between the parties; the purchaser, having taken a conveyance of the estate of the vendor, should not be allowed to keep it without payment of the full purchase price. Hence, as Deane J also pointed out ((1990) 170 CLR 394 at 444), "unconscientious" is the more accurate term.

In the present case, that more accurate term directs attention to the question why the vendors ought not to be heard to assert the exercise of their legal right to terminate in answer to the claim by Tanwar for [325] specific performance. The conscience of the vendors which equity seeks to relieve is, as Gleeson CJ put it in Australian Broadcasting Corporation v Lenah Game Meats Pty Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 199 at 227 [45], a "properly formed and instructed conscience".

In Guise v Kouvelis (1947) 74 CLR 102 at 116, when considering the defence of qualified privilege in defamation law, Dixon J lamented the lot of the judge called upon to apply "broad" or "flexible" categories or tests of responsibility or immunity. Nevertheless, as this Court emphasised in the judgment in Jenyns v Public Curator (Q) (1953) 90 CLR 113 at 119 per Dixon CJ, McTiernan and Kitto JJ, to which Dixon CJ was a party, the application of equitable doctrines and remedies may turn upon close analysis of the facts of the particular case. Cases of alleged undue influence and catching bargains are obvious examples; that is because the governing equitable principle in this field is concerned with the production by malign means of an intention to act. In that context, it is easy to speak of the conduct of the stronger party as unconscionable. But the phrase "unconscionable conduct" tends to mislead in several respects.

First, it encourages the false notions that (i) there is a distinct cause of action, akin to an equitable tort, wherever a plaintiff points to conduct which merits the epithet "unconscionable"; and (ii) there is an equitable defence to the assertion of any legal right, whether by action to recover a debt or damages in tort or for breach of contract, where in the circumstances it has become unconscionable for the plaintiff to rely on that legal right cf Kalamazoo (Aust) Pty Ltd v Compact Business Systems Pty Ltd [1990] 1 Qd R 231 at 258-259.

Secondly, and conversely, to speak of "unconscionable conduct" as if it were all that need be shown may suggest that it is all that can be shown and so covers the field of equitable interest and concern. Yet legal rights may be acquired by conduct which pricks no conscience at the time. A misrepresentation may be wholly innocent. However, at the time of attempted enforcement, it then may be unconscientious to rely upon the legal rights so acquired. To insist upon a contract obtained by a misrepresentation now known to be false is, as Sir George Jessel MR put it in Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1 at 12-13, "a moral delinquency" in a court of equity.

Thirdly, as a corollary to the first proposition, to speak of "unconscionable conduct" may, wrongly, suggest that sufficient foundation for the existence of the necessary "equity" to interfere in relationships established by, for example, the law of contract, is supplied by an element of hardship or unfairness in the terms of the transaction in question, or in the manner of its performance. The [326] vendors contend that the thrust of the submissions by Tanwar reveals this weakness in its case.

Legione

[25.115] In submissions, extensive reference was made to the decision in Legione (1983) 152 CLR 406. That case made it plain that the principles identified as promissory or equitable estoppel may operate to preclude the enforcement of contractual rights and so may estop a party from treating the contract in question as terminated for failure to meet an essential time stipulation. The division of opinion within the Court turned upon the question whether a particular telephone conversation was sufficient to found the necessary estoppel; in particular, whether the conversation contained a representation of the necessary clarity to the effect that observance of the time stipulation was not insisted upon. The majority (Mason, Brennan and Deane JJ) held that the terms of the conversation did not meet the necessary standard. The facts of the present appeal supply no foundation for an estoppel against reliance by the vendors upon the essential time stipulation in the 2001 Deeds.

In Legione (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 411, the Court also received written submissions upon a further question. This was identified as being whether the purchasers should be relieved against "the forfeiture" brought about by the notice of rescission. Pursuant to the contract, the purchasers had been entitled to go into possession on payment of the deposit. They had done so and had built a house on the land before the due date for completion which was nearly 12 months after the date of the contract.

The "forfeiture point" had not been pursued to any degree at the trial in Legione and the order made by this Court was that the case be remitted to the Supreme Court of Victoria for the determination of that issue ((1983) 152 CLR 406 at 459). The conclusion reached by Mason and Deane JJ had been that the Supreme Court had the necessary jurisdiction to relieve against forfeiture and that there was a serious question to be tried in the exercise of that jurisdiction (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 450. Gibbs CJ and Murphy J concurred in the order giving effect to that conclusion (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 429-430. Brennan J dissented.

Subsequently, in the joint judgment of five members of the Court in Ciavarella v Balmer (1983) 153 CLR 438 at 449-450, it was held that there was no evidence to found any estoppel against termination of the contract for sale of land. An application to amend the notice of appeal in this Court so as to claim relief against forfeiture was refused ((1983) 153 CLR 438 at 453-454). The Court described as [327] follows the circumstances which had led to the order of remittal in Legione (1983) 153 CLR 438 at 453:

> [T]he material in evidence strongly indicated unconscionable conduct on the part of the vendor in seeking to insist on the rescission of the contract in circumstances where the statement of the vendor's solicitors had helped lull the purchaser into a belief that the vendor would accept completion provided it took place within a few days and where the consequence of rescission was that the vendor would reap the benefit of the very valuable improvements which the purchaser had effected to the property.

In the present appeal, there is nothing to suggest that the vendors lulled Tanwar into any relevant false sense of security. To the contrary, the terms of the 2001 Deeds strikingly demonstrated an attitude by the vendors which would keep Tanwar on edge.

What then remains to support any case of unconscientious reliance by the vendors upon their legal right to terminate? It is convenient at this stage to consider the decision in Stern.

Stern

[25.120] The dispute concerned an instalment contract made in 1969 under which the last instalment would be paid in 1983. Time was made of the essence, after various vicissitudes, by notice given in 1979. Completion did not take place when specified and, in response to an action for an order for possession, the purchasers cross-claimed for specific performance and relief against forfeiture of their estate and interest in the land. By majority (Deane, Dawson and Gaudron JJ), the Court upheld the order of the New South Wales Court of Appeal (McArthur v Stern (1986) 5 NSWLR 538 at 558). This ordered relief against forfeiture and specific performance on terms including an inquiry as to the balance of the purchase money still owing and the interest to be payable thereon.

Deane and Dawson JJ said that "the contract as it was carried into effect was essentially an arrangement whereby the appellants undertook to finance the respondents" purchase upon the security of the land' so that "there was a close and obvious parallel between it and a purchase with the aid of a mortgage" ((1988) 165 CLR 489 at 528). The contracts between Tanwar and the vendors do not share that characteristic.

Gaudron J, the third member of the majority in Stern, doubted whether the instalment contract there in question was in substance part of a security transaction ((1988) 165 CLR 489 at 540; cf Union Eagle Ltd v Golden Achievement Ltd [1997] AC 514 at 522). Her Honour decided the appeal on a wider footing. This was that a decree of specific performance would secure all that the vendors had bargained for, whereas to deny that [328] remedy would prejudice the purchasers. A house had been built on the land, the land had increased in value and the balance unpaid was a relatively insignificant amount ((1988) 165 CLR 489 at 540-541). These circumstances, to which the vendors had not contributed, made it unconscionable for the vendors to insist on their contractual rights.

On the other hand, Mason CJ (in the minority as to the outcome) stressed that this was not a case like Legione where the conduct of the vendors had led to, caused, or contributed to, the breach of contract by the purchasers ((1988) 165 CLR 489 at 503-504). At bottom, the case put by Tanwar depends upon acceptance of the view of the equity jurisdiction taken by Gaudron J at the expense of that preferred by Mason CJ. The view of Mason CJ should be accepted.

Mason CJ and Stern

[25.125] In Legione, Mason and Deane JJ instanced "fraud, mistake, accident, [and] surprise" as elements which may make it inequitable to insist on termination of a contract for failure to observe its strict terms ((1983) 152 CLR 406 at 447-448). Subsequently, in Stern (1988) 165 CLR 489 at 502-503, Mason CJ took Legione and Ciavarella as establishing that the court will not readily relieve against loss of a contract for sale validly rescinded by the vendor for breach of an essential condition; and, in particular, equity was not authorised "to reshape contractual relations into a form the court thinks more reasonable or fair where subsequent events have rendered one side's situation more favourable" ((1988) 165 CLR 489 at 503). That latter proposition is at odds with the approach by Gaudron J in Stern, to which reference has been made earlier in these reasons at [35], but, nevertheless, it should be accepted as an accurate statement of the law. The result, as indicated above, is that Tanwar's case on the appeal is significantly weakened.

Mason CJ dissented as to the outcome in Stern, but this was to a significant degree because of the view he took of the nature of the particular contract in question and the denial of an analogy drawn, particularly by Deane and Dawson JJ ((1988) 165 CLR 489 at 528), to a mortgage transaction. To the extent that what Mason CJ said in Stern represented a development (or, perhaps, a contraction) of what had been put in the earlier cases, then it is to be preferred.

In Stern (1988) 165 CLR 489 at 502-503, Mason CJ also stated that equity intervenes only where the vendor has, by the vendor's conduct, caused or contributed to a circumstance rendering it unconscionable for the vendor to insist upon its legal rights. That helps explain why mere supervening events and changes in the relevant circumstances are insufficient. But it should be [329] noted that cases falling within the heads of mistake or accident will not necessarily be the result of activity by the vendor. In addition, his Honour spoke in Stern (1988) 165 CLR 489 at 502-503 of the circumstances being "exceptional" to attract equitable intervention. That also emphasised the insufficiency of subsequent events which are adverse to the interests of one side. However, the term "exceptional" is apt to be misunderstood, and it will be necessary to return to it later in these reasons under the heading "The present appeal".

Subsidiary questions?

[25.130] In Legione, Mason and Deane JJ had concluded their analysis of what they saw as the relevant principles by saying as follows (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 449:

> In the ultimate analysis the result in a given case will depend upon the resolution of subsidiary questions which inevitably arise. The more important of these are: (1) Did the conduct of the vendor contribute to the purchaser's breach? (2) Was the purchaser's breach (a) trivial or slight, and (b) inadvertent and not wilful? (3) What damage or other adverse consequences did the vendor suffer by reason of the purchaser's breach? (4) What is the magnitude of the purchaser's loss and the vendor's gain if the forfeiture is to stand? (5) Is specific performance with or without compensation an adequate safeguard for the vendor?

Tanwar relies upon those five "subsidiary questions". It accepts that the first question should be answered unfavourably because the conduct of the vendors did not contribute to Tanwar's breach. However, Tanwar says that its breach was trivial or slight, or inadvertent, that the vendors have suffered but nominal damage and no adverse consequences, that specific performance would be an adequate safeguard for the interests of the vendors, and that the vendors stood to gain the advantages flowing from the expenditure by Tanwar in obtaining the development approvals, together with the increase in value of the land which apparently occurred between the date of the contracts and the termination.

With respect to the third, fourth and fifth "subsidiary questions" posed in Legione by Mason and Deane JJ, the vendors respond that Tanwar entered into arrangements with the proposed second mortgagees dependent upon the arrival of funds from Singapore on the last day when settlement was required under the 2001 Deeds, and that notions of trivial or inadvertent breach must be considered in that light. With respect to the alleged increase in value, the vendors, correctly, emphasise that the first of the comparative dates is not 19 October 1999, but 5 June 2001, the date of the 2001 Deeds. This postdated the obtaining of the development approvals on 18 February [330] 2000. In any event, there had been no valuation evidence to found any specific finding respecting increase in value due to those consents or to other market forces. No such finding had been made. However, it was accepted that the benefit of the approvals would, with termination, accrue to the vendors. But that was an inevitable outcome bargained for when the 2001 Deeds had been negotiated.

The "interest" of Tanwar

[25.135] The vendors also challenge the doctrinal basis for treating as determinative of Tanwar's appeal these five "subsidiary questions". The vendors are correct in doing so.

What was said by Mason and Deane JJ in Legione respecting the "subsidiary questions" must be treated with care. That to which the questions are said to be "subsidiary" is the basic issue presented earlier in their joint judgment. This is expressed as ((1983) 152 CLR 406 at 440):

> the respondent's submission that she is entitled to relief against the forfeiture of her interest in the land upon terms that she pay to the appellants the amount of $30,188.24 that was tendered to them on 15 August 1979 and not accepted, being the balance of the purchase moneys under the contract. (emphasis added)

But what, if any, was the interest in the land enjoyed by Tanwar as purchaser? If there was such an interest, did it attract the exercise of the jurisdiction to relieve against forfeiture? What is the relationship between, on the one hand, the attitude of equity respecting forfeiture, and, on the other hand, the attitude of equity respecting the observance of express time stipulations?

Without answers to these questions, the significance for this appeal of the basic issue expressed in Legione, and thus the relevance of the five "subsidiary questions", cannot be assessed. But the answers are to be supplied only by a patient examination of several fundamentals, the understanding of which by equity courts has changed across time.

One commences by identifying the "interest" of a purchaser in the land the subject of an uncompleted contract. In Lysaght v Edwards (1876) 2 Ch D 499 at 506, Sir George Jessel MR described the position of the vendor at the moment of entry into a contract of sale as "something between" a bare trustee for the purchaser and a mortgagee who in equity is entitled to possession of the land and a charge upon it for the purchase money; in particular, the vendor had the right in equity to say to the purchaser "[e]ither pay me the purchase-money, or lose the estate". This way of looking at the relationship in equity between vendor and purchaser before completion appeared also in the works of eminent [331] writers of the period in which the Master of the Rolls spoke (Maitland, Equity, 2nd ed rev (1936) at 314-315; Pomeroy, A Treatise on the Specific Performance of Contracts (1879), §§315, 322, 389; Williams and Lightwood, A Treatise on the Law of Vendor and Purchaser of Real Estate and Chattels Real, 4th ed (1936), vol 1 at 59-60.) Later, Kitto J (Haque v Haque [No 2] (1965) 114 CLR 98 at 124) and Brennan J (KLDE Pty Ltd v Commissioner of Stamp Duties (Q) (1984) 155 CLR 288 at 301) preferred to treat what was said in Lysaght as indicating that "to an extent" the purchaser acquired the beneficial ownership upon entry into the contract.

This analogical reasoning in turn suggested (i) the purchaser had before completion an equitable estate in the land which would be protected against loss consequent upon termination of the contract by the principles developed in equity for relief against forfeiture and (ii) in the same way as failure to redeem a mortgage upon the covenanted date for repayment did not destroy the equity of redemption without the proper exercise of a power of sale (Latec Investments Ltd v Hotel Terrigal Pty Ltd (in liquidation) (1965) 113 CLR 265 at 274-275) or a foreclosure suit in equity (Maitland, Equity, 2nd ed rev (1936) at 182-183), failure to complete the contract on the due date did not bar the intervention of equity to order specific performance.

But what, on this way of looking at the matter, was the significance of a contractual stipulation specifying a date for completion as essential? The treatment by the English equity judges of this subject developed in the course of the nineteenth century, as Justice Lindgren has detailed in his extrajudicial writing on the subject (Time in the Performance of Contracts, 2nd ed (1982), [210]-[222]). While Lord Thurlow would have pushed the mortgage analogy to the extreme that a time stipulation in equity could never be essential unless there was something in the nature of the subject-matter of the contract, such as its fluctuating or depreciating value (Hanbury, Modern Equity, 8th ed (1962) at 85-86), to give it that quality, his view was doubted by Lord Eldon in Seton v Slade (1802) 7 Ves Jun 265; 32 ER 108. (See also Pomeroy, A Treatise on the Specific Performance of Contracts, (1879), §389) and rejected by Sir Lloyd Kenyon MR in Mackreth v Marlar (1786) 1 Cox 259; 29 ER 1156.

If the express contractual stipulation fixing time as an essential matter was not to be disregarded, how did that attitude stand with the analogy drawn from the relief against forfeiture cases? The answer given by Pomeroy (A Treatise on the Specific Performance of Contracts (1879), §391), with reference to In re Dagenham (Thames) Dock Co, Ex parte Hulse ((1873) LR 8 Ch App 1022), was that equity would relieve the purchaser from the operation of an essential time stipulation, "and from the forfeiture", if the provision was inserted as a penalty to [332] secure completion of the contract at the purchaser's risk of loss of the equitable interest in the land under the executory contract.

That reasoning, together with the authority of Dagenham, was relied upon in the majority judgments in Legione (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 426, 441. What the Court of Appeal in Chancery decided in Dagenham, and on what facts and grounds, is not fully apparent from the abbreviated report (See Harpum, "Relief Against Forfeiture and the Purchaser of Land" (1984) Cambridge Law Journal 134 at 147-148). But it must be remembered that in Dagenham there had been forfeiture of a payment of half the purchase price, so that it was not surprising that the forfeiture was treated as penal (Lang, "Forfeiture of Interests in Land" (1984) 100 Law Quarterly Review 427 at 434-435).

It should be added that, in Dagenham, as in Stern and other instalment contract cases, there would have existed an equitable lien securing for the purchaser the payments so made (Hewett v Court (1983) 149 CLR 639 at 663-664). It has been held in this Court that the lien may be enforceable even though there may be a good defence to a claim to specific performance of the contract (Hewett v Court (1983) 149 CLR 639 at 650, 664). It is the payment and retention of the moneys, not the availability of specific performance, which is critical (Rose v Watson (1864) 33 LJ Ch (NS) 385 at 389-390). But there remains the question, unnecessary to decide here, whether the lien of the purchaser necessarily is lost upon termination of the contract for breach by the purchaser of an essential time stipulation (Harpum, "Relief Against Forfeiture and the Purchaser of Land" (1984) Cambridge Law Journal 134 at 139).

At all events, the analogies drawn over a century ago in Lysaght (1876) 2 Ch D 499 at 506 with the trust and the mortgage are no longer accepted. Jacobs J observed in Chang v Registrar of Titles (1876) 2 Ch D 499 at 506 that:

> [w]here there are rights outstanding on both sides, the description of the vendor as a trustee tends to conceal the essentially contractual relationship which, rather than the relationship of trustee and beneficiary, governs the rights and duties of the respective parties.

Subsequently, in Kern Corporation Ltd v Walter Reid Trading Pty Ltd, Deane J said ((1987) 163 CLR 164 at 192): "[I]t is both inaccurate and misleading to speak of the unpaid vendor under an uncompleted contract as a trustee for the purchaser".

In Stern, Gaudron J points out ((1988) 165 CLR 489 at 537), consistently with authority in this [333] Court (Brown v Heffer (1967) 116 CLR 344 at 349; Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 456-457; Bahr v Nicolay [No 2] (1988) 164 CLR 604 at 612, 645-646. See also the warning by Stamp LJ in Berkley v Poulett [1977] 1 Estates Gazette Law Reports 86 at 93 against error caused by putting "the cart before the horse", to which Austin J referred in Chief Commissioner of Stamp Duties v Paliflex Pty Ltd (1999) 47 NSWLR 382 at 390), that the "interest" of the purchaser is commensurate with the availability of specific performance. That availability is the very question in issue where there has been a termination by the vendor for failure to complete as required by the essential stipulation. Reliance upon the "interest" therefore does not assist; it is bedevilled by circularity.

There is the further point subsequently made by Lord Hoffmann in Union Eagle concerning the adaptation here of the principles respecting penalty and forfeiture, even allowing the existence of a pre-completion equitable interest in the land. His Lordship distinguished ([1997] AC 514 at 520) the well established (McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457; Pitt v Curotta (1931) 31 SR (NSW) 477) jurisdiction in equity to relieve against forfeiture of part-payments and amounts in excess of a "reasonable deposit", matters not involved in Tanwar's appeal to this Court. He then proceeded ([1997] AC 514 at 520):

> But the right to rescind the contract, though it involves termination of the purchaser's equitable interest, stands upon a rather different footing. Its purpose is, upon breach of an essential term, to restore to the vendor his freedom to deal with his land as he pleases. In a rising market, such a right may be valuable but volatile. Their Lordships think that in such circumstances a vendor should be able to know with reasonable certainty whether he may resell the land or not.

The five "subsidiary questions" stated by Mason and Deane JJ in Legione (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 449, and set out above, reflect the treatment by Lord Wilberforce in Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] AC 691 (a lease case) of the "appropriate" considerations guiding the exercise of equity's jurisdiction to relieve against forfeiture for breach of covenants added by way of security for the production of a stated result. His Lordship said ([1973] AC 691 at 723-724):

> The word "appropriate" involves consideration of the conduct of the applicant for relief, in particular whether his default was wilful, of the gravity of the breaches, and of the disparity between the value [334] of the property of which forfeiture is claimed as compared with the damage caused by the breach.

However, the end sought to be protected, on the analysis by Mason and Deane JJ in Legione, was the interest of the purchaser in the land. That "interest", being for its existence dependent upon the administration of the very remedy in issue, does not suffice. Perhaps aware of the difficulty involved, Mason and Deane JJ went on in Legione (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 446, as later did Deane and Dawson JJ in Stern (1988) 165 CLR 489 at 522. See also Hewett v Court (1983) 149 CLR 639 at 665; KLDE Pty Ltd v Commissioner of Stamp Duties (Q) (1984) 155 CLR 288 at 297; Chan v Cresdon Pty Ltd (1989) 168 CLR 242 at 253, to say there was much to commend what they said was a competing view of Sir Frederick Jordan. In Ch V of his Chapters on Equity in New South Wales, and in the course of dealing with equitable assignments for valuable consideration, and the transfer of the equitable title to the assignee, Sir Frederick Jordan said (6th ed (1947) at 52 (footnote omitted)):

> This result is to be ascribed to the maxim that equity considers that done which ought to be done; and the principle is effective only in so far as the Court of Equity would, in all the circumstances of the case, grant specific performance of the agreement.

He added, somewhat obscurely, in a footnote (6th ed (1947) at 52, fn (e)):

> Specific performance in this sense means not merely specific performance in the primary sense of the enforcing of an executory contract by compelling the execution of an assurance to complete it, but also the protection by injunction or otherwise of rights acquired under a contract which defines the rights of the parties. (emphasis added)

In the New South Wales Court of Appeal (Chief Commissioner of Stamp Duties v ISPT Pty Ltd (1998) 45 NSWLR 639 at 654-655), doubt since has been cast upon the support for any such general principle by the authorities cited by Sir Frederick Jordan, beginning with Tailby v Official Receiver (1888) 13 App Cas 523 at 547-549. It is sufficient for present purposes to observe that, where the issue, as in Tanwar's appeal, concerns alleged unconscientious reliance by vendors upon their contractual right to terminate, it does not assist to found the equity of the purchaser upon the protection of rights to injunctive relief acquired under a contract the termination of which has taken place. Whilst the contracts here were on foot, breach thereof by the vendors would have been restrained. But there was no relevant breach of contract by the [335] vendors, and the contracts were terminated in exercise of a contractual right to do so.

The present appeal

[25.140] What Lord Wilberforce in Shiloh Spinners called "the special heads of fraud, accident, mistake or surprise" ([1973] AC 691 at 723) identify in a broad sense the circumstances making it inequitable for the vendors to rely upon their termination of Tanwar's contracts as an answer to its claim for specific performance. No doubt the decided cases in which the operation of these "special heads" is considered do not disclose exhaustively the circumstances which merit this equitable intervention. But, at least where accident and mistake are not involved, it will be necessary to point to the conduct of the vendor as having in some significant respect caused or contributed to the breach of the essential time stipulation. Tanwar's situation falls beyond that pale. The statement by Mason CJ in Stern ((1988) 165 CLR 489 at 502-503) respecting the insignificance of subsequent events for which the vendors were in no way responsible is fatal to the main thrust of Tanwar's case.

It should be made clear that what is said above does not support any proposition that the circumstances must be "exceptional" before equity intervenes. In their joint judgment in Stern (1988) 165 CLR 489 at 526, Deane and Dawson JJ, with reference to what had been said by Mason and Deane JJ in Legione (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 449, said, in a passage which puts the point of present significance:

> Mason and Deane JJ were not saying that there must be unconscionable conduct of an exceptional kind before a case for relief can be made out. Rather, what was being said was that a court will be reluctant to interfere with the contractual rights of parties who have chosen to make time of the essence of the contract. The circumstances must be such as to make it plain that it is necessary to intervene to avoid injustice or, what is the same thing, to relieve against unconscionable — or, more accurately, unconscientious — conduct.

Thus, it remains for Tanwar to show that it is against conscience for the vendors to set up the termination of the contracts. In the present appeal, as already has been indicated, there was no representation by the vendors which could found any estoppel. Nor has Tanwar asserted that there was any mistake in any relevant sense.

In Ciavarella (1983) 153 CLR 438 at 453, the order for remittal made in Legione was seen to have been made on the footing that there were already in the evidence indications that the vendors in Legione had helped to lull the [336] purchasers into the belief that they would accept completion provided it occurred within a few days. To relieve in those circumstances would be an exercise of the jurisdiction with respect to "surprise". That, as remarked earlier in these reasons, cannot be asserted in the present case.

The second matter which Mason and Deane JJ emphasised in Legione was the possibility that a case might be made out in the Supreme Court that the vendors were seeking to reap the benefits of the very valuable improvements to the property which the purchasers had effected whilst in possession under the contract ((1983) 152 CLR 406 at 449; Ciavarella v Balmer (1983) 153 CLR 438 at 453). It is not clear from their Honours' remarks whether the reaping of the benefit of the improvements as a consequence of termination of itself would be sufficient to deny insistence by the vendors upon their rescission. It is not readily apparent how that circumstance alone could be sufficient. The contract in

Legione had permitted the purchasers to enter into possession and any improvements they then made were at risk of the operation of the contractual provisions for termination.

Accident

[25.145] In its extremity, Tanwar then founds upon the jurisdiction to relieve against the consequences of "accident".

In Legione (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 444, Mason and Deane JJ referred to authorities disputing the treatment of cases of relief against penalties and forfeitures as instances of relief against accident. The jurisdiction with respect to accident was recognised at a time before the development of any settled body of equitable principles. The point is well made by Professors Keeton and Sheridan (Equity, 3rd ed (1987) at 38):

> "Accident" was a vague term which covered many situations, in their nature unforeseen, and it could, in particular situations, shade off into fraud. The law of mistake, particularly in relation to contracts and conveyances, is included under this head, and it led in turn to the development of the equitable rules governing the rectification of contracts and other instruments, and the rescission of documents of all kinds.

What then remains as the subject-matter of accident in modern equity? In Baird v BCE Holdings Pty Ltd (1996) 40 NSWLR 374 at 385-386, Young J referred to various writings on the subject which distinguish mistake as supposing an operation of the will of the agent in producing the event, albeit by reason of erroneous impressions on the mind. Spence, writing in 1846, said that the kinds of accidents or cases of extremity which might be relieved against were only to be ascertained from an examination of [337] the cases (The Equitable Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery (1846), vol 1 at 628). He instanced forfeiture and penalties. Other instances include the accidental diminution of assets in the hands of an executor, lost evidence and the defective execution of powers of appointment (Snell's Equity, 30th ed (2000) at 603-606), all far from the present case.

However, the learned writers on the subject emphasise and put to one side those situations where the event which has come to pass is one for which an express exculpatory provision might have been made, but was not sought or was not agreed to, and where to relieve against its consequences after it has occurred would deprive the other party to the contract of an essential right (Bispham, The Principles of Equity, 6th ed (1903), §§175, 176; Merwin, The Principles of Equity and Equity Pleading (1895), §419). In particular, equity will not relieve where "the possibility of the accident may fairly be considered to have been within the contemplation of the contracting parties" (Smith, Principles of Equity, 4th ed (1908) at 243-244). Story wrote (Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, 13th ed (1886), vol 1, §101):

> And this leads us naturally to the consideration of those cases of accident in which no relief will be granted by Courts of Equity. In the first place, in matters of positive contract and obligation created by the party (for it is different in obligations or duties created by law), it is no ground for the interference of equity that the party has been prevented from fulfilling them by accident, or that he has been in no default, or that he has been prevented by accident from deriving the full benefit of the contract on his own side…. The reason is, that he might have provided for such contingencies by his contract if he had so chosen; and the law will presume an intentional general liability where he has made no exception. (footnotes omitted)

It is here that the circumstances leading up to, and the terms of, the 2001 Deeds are of critical importance. The vendors withdrew the earlier notices of termination in return for the assumption by Tanwar of obligations to complete couched in unqualified terms. The obligation in the 2001 Deeds to settle by the stipulated time was not made subject to the availability of Tanwar's finance on that day. That there might be a failure by a third party to provide the finance was reasonably within the contemplation of Tanwar. The failure by Tanwar to avail itself of the advantages it obtained by negotiating the 2001 Deeds and by keeping the contracts on foot had the effect of exposing Tanwar again to the exercise by the vendors of their rights to terminate the contracts (cf Cameron v UBS AG (2000) 2 VR 108 at 115-116). Equity does not intervene to prevent the effective exercise of those rights. The claim by Tanwar for relief against the [338] consequences of the failure in the timely provision of the second mortgage does not succeed.

[KIRBY and CALLINAN JJ each also agreed that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

THE RIGHT TO DAMAGES

[26.05] Whenever a party to a contract (the defendant) breaches that contract, the other party (the plaintiff) will be entitled to an award of damages as monetary compensation for the breach. This chapter considers the principles governing the measure of damages for breach of contract.

THE COMPENSATION PRINCIPLE

[26.10] The guiding principle for an award of damages for the breach of contract is that such damages are compensatory, see further Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64, extracted at [26.15] and also Clark v Macourt [2013] HCA 56; (2013) 253 CLR 1, extracted at [27.155]. As explained by Parke B in Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex 850; 154 ER 363, 855 (Ex), 365 (ER), "where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same position with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed". The measures of damages used to give effect to this principle are expectation damages, reliance damages and damages for loss of a chance. Expectation damages compensate the plaintiff for the benefit he or she expected to gain from performance of the contract but has lost by reason of the breach. Reliance damages may be awarded where a plaintiff cannot establish his or her expectation loss. Damages for the loss of a chance are awarded where what the plaintiff expected to gain from performance of the contract was a chance of a benefit.

Commonwealth v Amann Aviation

[26.15] Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: On 31 March 1987, the Commonwealth and Amann entered into a three-year contract under which Amann was to provide coastal surveillance flights for the Commonwealth. On 12 September

1987, Amann commenced the flights, but at that date it was obvious, as it had been for some time, that Amann did not have all its aircraft ready to perform its contractual obligations nor did any of its aircraft comply in every respect with the specifications in the contract. On 12 September 1987, the Commonwealth purported to terminate the contract. On 15 September 1987, Amann treated the Commonwealth's action as a repudiation of the contract, elected to terminate it and in due course sued for damages for breach of contract. The trial judge, Beaumont J, found for Amann and assessed damages at $410,000. Amann appealed to the Full Court of the Federal Court claiming that it was entitled to substantially higher damages. The Commonwealth cross-appealed. The Full Court held that Amann was entitled to damages amounting to $6,600,207 and dismissed the Commonwealth's cross-appeal. The Commonwealth appealed to the High Court, by which time it accepted that its purported termination of the contract was invalid.]

MASON CJ AND DAWSON J: [74] The only questions which now arise for decision in this court concern the assessment of damages but, as will appear, the questions are such as to require a consideration of the terms of the contract. By way of explanation of this statement, we should point out that the Commonwealth submits that, in the assessment of damages, account must be taken of the likelihood that the Commonwealth would, in any event, have validly exercised its right to terminate the contract for breach some time after 12 September 1987.

The trial judge assessed damages on the basis of lost profits and arrived at an amount very substantially less than that claimed by Amann. Amann contended that it was entitled to damages on a "reliance" basis as it had incurred heavy expenditure in equipping itself to carry out its contractual obligations, this expenditure having been wasted by virtue of the Commonwealth's repudiation of the contract. By 12 September, apart from incurring pre-operational expenditure of $854 943, Amann had arranged for the acquisition and fitting out of aircraft at a cost of $5 281 521. It was common ground between the parties that the resale value of the aircraft was only $917 329, a difference of $4 364 192. This large discrepancy is to be explained both by the fact that the aircraft had been adapted to a special use for which there was a very limited demand and by the cost of transporting them to an available market.

Amann's prospects of making a substantial profit rested on its prospect of securing a renewal of the contract. The cost and value of the aircraft were such that a period of operation significantly longer than three years was needed in order to generate a substantial profit. The prospect of the contractor securing a renewal was strong because it would be fully equipped with the cost of its aircraft written [off]. It would be very difficult for a competitor to match this advantage …

The case for the appellant …

[26.20] [80] The Commonwealth argues that Amann was not entitled to an award of damages calculated on a reliance basis. The award of damages for breach of contract on that basis is only justified, so the argument runs, where the nature of the breach, having regard to the subject matter of the contract, is such as to render proof of the loss caused by the breach impossible. Absent such impossibility, damages should be calculated on the ordinary basis of loss of profits. The Commonwealth then submits that, in any event, an award for reliance damages should not be made where it is established, as here, that the plaintiff would have made a loss on the contract. In this respect, the Commonwealth contends that it was wrong to include in the assessment of damages an estimate of what Amann would have earned if it had obtained a renewal or extension of the contract. There was no commitment by the Commonwealth to renew or extend and, accordingly, Amann was not entitled to compensation on that footing. Furthermore, according to the Commonwealth's argument, to assess damages by reference to the prospect of renewal is inconsistent with the rule, said to be established in The Mihalis Angelos, that damages should be assessed on the footing that the defaulting party will not act so as to increase its liability.

The award of damages for breach of contract

The general rule at common law, as stated by Parke B in Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex 850; 154 ER 363 at 855 (Ex), 365 (ER), is "that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed" …

The award of damages for breach of contract protects a plaintiff's expectation of receiving the defendant's performance. That expectation arises out of or is created by the contract. Hence, damages for breach of contract are often described as "expectation damages". The onus of proving damages sustained lies on a plaintiff and the amount of damages awarded will be commensurate with the plaintiff's expectation, objectively determined, rather than subjectively ascertained. That is to say, a plaintiff must prove, on the balance of probabilities, that his or her expectation of a certain outcome, as a result of performance of the contract, had a likelihood of attainment rather than being mere expectation.

[81] In the ordinary course of commercial dealings, a party supplying goods or rendering services will enter into a contract with a view to securing a profit, that is to say, that party will expect a certain margin of gain to be achieved in addition to the recouping of any expenses reasonably incurred by it in the discharge of its contractual obligations. It is for this reason that expectation damages are often described as damages for loss of profits. Damages recoverable as lost profits are constituted by the combination of expenses justifiably incurred by a plaintiff in the discharge of contractual obligations and any amount by which gross receipts would have exceeded those expenses. This second amount is the net profit. The expression "damages for loss of profits" should not be understood as carrying with it the implication that no damages are recoverable either in the case of a contract in which no net profit would have been generated or in the case of a contract in which the amount of profit cannot be demonstrated. It would be an invitation to the repudiation of contractual obligations if the law were to deny to an innocent plaintiff the right to recoupment by an award of damages of expenditure justifiably incurred for the purpose of discharging contractual obligations simply on the ground that the contract breached would not have been or could not be shown to have been profitable. If the performance of a contract would have resulted in a plaintiff, while not making a profit, nevertheless recovering costs incurred in the course of performing contractual obligations, then that plaintiff is entitled to recover damages in an amount equal to those costs in accordance with Robinson v Harman, as those costs would have been recovered had the contract been fully performed. Similarly, where it is not possible for a plaintiff to demonstrate whether or to what extent the performance of a contract would have resulted in a profit for the plaintiff, it will be open to a plaintiff to seek to recoup expenses incurred, damages in such a case being described as reliance damages or damages for wasted expenditure.

A further example of the application of Robinson v Harman which will result in a plaintiff being entitled to claim damages for wasted expenditure is in a contract for services such as that between a solicitor and a client. Where a solicitor has breached his or her contractual duty of care, the measure of damages to which a client will be entitled will be such an amount as would put the client in the position he or she would have been in had the contract of retainer been performed without negligence. In cases where, had non-negligent advice been given, the client would not have entered into a subsequent transaction, for example a purchase of real property, then, in conformity with Robinson v Harman, the client [82] will be entitled to recover as damages expenditure wasted on account of the negligent advice, less anything subsequently recovered and given reasonable acts of mitigation: Hayes v Dodd [1990] 2 All ER 815 at 820 per Staughton LJ. The amount of wasted expenditure will be the appropriate measure of damages in such a situation because, it having been established that the client would not have entered into the subsequent contract if proper advice had been given, it is not sensible to speak of loss of profits. Hayes v Dodd is a useful illustration of the statement that the expressions "expectation damages", "damages for loss of profits", "reliance damages" and "damages for wasted expenditure" are simply manifestations of the central principle enunciated in Robinson v Harman rather than discrete and truly alternative measures of damages which a party not in breach may elect to claim. The corollary of the principle in Robinson v Harman is that a plaintiff is not entitled, by the award of damages upon breach, to be placed in a superior position to that which he or she would have been in had the contract been performed. In L Albert & Son v Armstrong Rubber Co (1949) 178 F 2d 182, Learned Hand CJ said (at 189):

> [O]n those occasions in which the performance would not have covered the promisee's outlay, such a result imposes the risk of the promisee's contract upon the promisor. We cannot agree that the promisor's default in performance should under this guise make him an insurer of the promisee's venture.

Learned Hand CJ went on (at 191) to approve the statement made by Fuller and Perdue in their celebrated article, "The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages" (1936) 46 Yale Law Journal 52 at 79: "We will not in a suit for reimbursement for losses incurred in reliance on a contract knowingly put the plaintiff in a better position than he would have occupied had the contract been fully performed." …

[84] [I]f a plaintiff's expenditure would not have been fully recouped had the contract been performed, then full compensation for the wasted expenditure would not be awarded. A plaintiff is only entitled to damages for an amount equivalent to that which would have been earned had the contract been fully performed. In this way, the award of damages assessed by reference to a plaintiff's expenditure is in complete conformity with the principle that an award of damages for breach of contract should place a plaintiff in the same position as if the contract had been performed.

In Anglia Television Ltd v Reed [1972] 1 QB 60 Lord Denning MR considered that a plaintiff could claim expenditure thrown away when he has not suffered any loss of profits or if he cannot prove what his profits would have been. His Lordship observed (at 63–4):

> It seems to me that a plaintiff in such a case as this has an election: he can either claim for loss of profits; or for his wasted expenditure. But he must elect between them. He cannot claim both. If he has not suffered any loss of profits — or if he cannot prove what his profits would have been — he can claim in the alternative the expenditure which has been thrown away, that is, wasted, by reason of the breach. That is shown by Cullinane v British "Rema" Manufacturing Co Ltd [1954] 1 QB 292 at 303, 308.

[85] Subsequently, in CCC Films Ltd v Impact Quadrant Films Ltd [1985] QB 16, Hutchison J said that "a plaintiff may always frame his claim in the alternative way if he chooses": at 32 …

We do not regard the language of election or the notion that alternative ways are open to a plaintiff in which to frame a claim for relief as appropriate in a discussion of the measure of damages for breach of contract. In truth, as has been seen, damages for loss of profits and damages for expenditure reasonably incurred are simply two manifestations of the general principle enunciated in Robinson v Harman. So much at least emerges from the judgment of this court in TC Industrial Plant Pty Ltd v Robert's Queensland Pty Ltd (1963) 37 ALJR 289 at 292–4 per Kitto, Windeyer and Owen JJ …

Naturally, the categories of case in which a plaintiff is likely to make a claim for the recovery of expenditure incurred are those in which the plaintiff has not suffered a loss of profits and those in which it is impossible to assess what would have been the outcome had the contract been performed or those in which that outcome is otherwise uncertain … The manner in which a plaintiff frames his or her claim for damages will be dictated not so much by a choice of alternatives giving rise to an election but simply according to whether the contract, if fully performed, would have been and could be shown to have been profitable (even if the actual amount of profit is not readily ascertainable). If this can be demonstrated, a plaintiff's expectation of a profit, objectively made out, will be protected by the award of damages. Otherwise, subject to it being demonstrated that a plaintiff would not even have recovered any or all of his or her reasonable expenses, a plaintiff's objectively determined expectation of recoupment of expenses incurred will be protected by the award of damages. An award of damages for expenditure reasonably incurred under a contract in which no net profit would have been realised, while placing the plaintiff in the position he or she would have been in had the contract been fully performed, also restores the plaintiff to [86] the position he or she would have been in had the contract not been entered into. In this particular situation it will be noted that there is a coincidence, but no more than a coincidence, between the measure of damages recoverable both in contract and in tort.

It should be observed that, in a case where it is not possible to predict what position a plaintiff would have been in had the contract been fully performed, as was the case in both McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377, and Anglia Television, it is not possible as a matter of strict logic to assess damages in accordance with the principle in Robinson v Harman. But the law considers the just result in such a case is to allow a plaintiff to recover such expenditure as is reasonably incurred in reliance on the defendant's promise. In this case, the law assumes that a plaintiff would at least have recovered his or her expenditure had the contract been fully performed. It will still be open to a defendant, however, to argue that, notwithstanding the fact that it is impossible to assess what profits, if any, the plaintiff would have made had the contract been fully performed, the expenditure claimed by a plaintiff would nevertheless not have been recovered even if, to use the examples of McRae and Anglia Television, the tanker had existed or the defendant actor, Oliver Reed, had participated in the production of the film. In essence, such an argument is to the effect that, far from being impossible to predict what the result of the contract would have been, if fully performed, it is possible to demonstrate that performance of the contract would not even have resulted in the recovery by the plaintiff of reasonable expenses incurred.

Onus of proof

[26.25] Why the law appears to assume that a plaintiff would at least have recovered reasonable expenses incurred in the case both of contracts not resulting in a net profit and of contracts in which a plaintiff maintains that it is not possible to determine what position the plaintiff would have been in had the contract been fully performed, and why the law puts the burden of displacing this assumption on a defendant are questions to which we now turn.

In other jurisdictions there is strong authority to the effect that, where a plaintiff claims damages for expenditure reasonably incurred, it is prima facie sufficient for that plaintiff to prove his or her expenditure and that it was reasonably incurred. The onus then shifts to the party in breach of contract to establish that such expenditure would not have been recouped even if the contract had been fully performed. If this onus is not discharged, a plaintiff's entitlement to reliance damages remains intact. In L Albert & Son [87] v Armstrong Rubber Co, Learned Hand CJ, after noting that the basis for the award of damages was not predicated on the notion that a defaulting promisor was an insurer for a promisee's venture, went on to observe (at 189):

> [I]t does not follow that the breach should not throw upon [the defaulting party] the duty of showing that the value of the performance would in fact have been less than the promisee's outlay. It is often very hard to learn what the value of the performance would have been; and it is a common expedient, and a just one, in such situations to put the peril of the answer upon that party who by his wrong has made the issue relevant to the rights of the other. On principle therefore the proper solution would seem to be that the promisee may recover his outlay in preparation for the performance, subject to the privilege of the promisor to reduce it by as much as he can show that the promisee would have lost, if the contract had been performed …

The placing of the onus of proof on a defendant in the manner described amounts to the erection of a presumption that a party would not enter into a contract in which its costs were not recoverable … [S]uch a presumption is not irrebuttable but, until that presumption is rebutted, a plaintiff may rely on it to recover his or her reasonable expenses both in the case of a contract which would not have been profitable and in the case of a contract where the outcome of the [88] contract, if it had been fully performed, cannot be demonstrated, whether at all or with any certainty. This last type of contract, of which McRae and Anglia Television have been cited as examples, is to be distinguished from a purely aleatory contract where, almost by definition, it would not be appropriate to apply the presumption we have described for the reason that inherent in the entry into such a contract is the contingency that not even the slightest expenditure will be recovered, let alone the securing of any net profit. In the case of aleatory contracts, damages are awarded for loss of a chance and the burden of establishing the existence and loss of this chance as a result of the defendant's breach lies on a plaintiff although, as has already been observed, mere difficulty of estimation does not relieve a court or jury, in appropriate cases, of the task and responsibility of placing a value on the chance lost …

In the context of the discussion of onus of proof and the presumption relating to recovery of reasonable expenditure incurred which we have described, it is necessary to consider the decision of this court in McRae. There, the plaintiffs recovered as damages the amount of the agreed purchase price together with the expenditure wasted in reliance on the promise that there was an oil tanker at the locality given, there being no oil tanker anywhere in that locality. The expenditure wasted was incurred by the plaintiffs in taking steps to see whether there was a tanker in the locality given and, if so, whether any and what things should be done to turn her to account. Dixon and Fullagar JJ (with whose conclusions McTiernan J agreed) considered that the steps taken by the plaintiffs were not unreasonable and that they were such as the defendant would naturally expect them to take. Their Honours concluded (at 413) that the case fell within the second rule in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex 341; 156 ER 145. The plaintiffs were therefore entitled to recover damages "measured by reference to expenditure incurred and wasted in reliance on the Commission's promise that a tanker existed at the place specified": at 415.

[89] Their Honours pointed out (at 414) that the plaintiffs had a prima facie case for recovery of wasted expenditure because (1) the expense was incurred; (2) it was incurred in reliance on the promise that there was a tanker; and (3) the fact that there was no tanker meant that the expense was wasted. This threw the burden on the defendant "of establishing that, if there had been a tanker, the expense incurred would equally have been wasted." But it was impossible to assess damages on the basis of a comparison between what was promised and what was delivered, "not because what was promised was valueless but because it is impossible to value a non-existent thing": at 414.

Accordingly, McRae illustrates the proposition that a plaintiff has a prima facie case for recovery of wasted expenditure once it is established that the expense was incurred in reliance on the promise of the party in breach, there being a failure of performance by that party. By reason of its facts, the reasoning in McRae does not depend upon the presumption that an innocent party would not have entered into the contract unless it would at least have recovered its reliance expenditure under the contract had it been performed. But the reasoning is not inconsistent with the application, in appropriate cases, of that presumption which, in our view, has much to commend it. Indeed, it is just and fair that the repudiating party should bear the onus of showing that the party not in breach would have made a loss on the contract.

The present case differs from McRae in that it was not impossible, as a matter of theory, for Amann to establish what its profits (if any) would have been had the Commonwealth not repudiated the contract. Indeed, the trial judge's assessment of damages proceeded on that footing although, significantly, he did not take into account the value to Amann of the prospects of renewal of the contract. But the difficulties attending that undertaking were legion … Not the least of those difficulties were the problems of assessing what were the prospects of early termination of the contract by the Commonwealth had the contract proceeded and, more importantly, the prospects of Amann securing a renewal of the contract. Add to those uncertainties the fact that, on any view, the most substantial part of Amann's damages flowing from the Commonwealth's breach of the original contract was represented by the wasted expenditure.

In this respect it is significant that the contract was of such a kind that the parties clearly contemplated that the contractor would be [90] in an advantageous and preferred position to secure a renewal of the contract had it run its expected course. In that event Amann would, subject to any variations in the Commonwealth's requirements, have had the necessary equipment (written down in value), facilities and personnel in place at the relevant time. The prospect of renewal was an important commercial benefit which would then have accrued to the contractor. Amann was looking to that commercial benefit as well as revenue receipts arising under the original contract as the reward which it would obtain under that contract. In other words, it was a contract which enabled the contractor to recoup part, if not all, of its expenditure during the currency of the original contract and placed the contractor in a favourable position to secure a renewal of the contract and earn substantial profits under any renewed contract. On this score alone it was a case in which, it being natural and appropriate for Amann to sue to recover its wasted expenditure by way of reliance damages, the onus rested on the Commonwealth of establishing that the reliance expenditure would have been wasted even if the contract had been performed.

The prospect of renewal of the contract and discharge of the onus

[26.30] In seeking to discharge this onus, the Commonwealth submits that it is irrelevant, when considering the position Amann would have been in had the contract been fully performed, to have regard to the value of Amann's prospects of renewal of the contract. This is because, so the argument runs, the Commonwealth was under no legal obligation to renew the contract. According to the argument, a defendant is not liable for that which he or she has not promised to do; a plaintiff is not entitled to recover compensation for the non-realisation of his or her expectation that the defendant would provide him or her with a benefit when the defendant has not assumed a legal obligation to do so. A variation of this argument is that to take into account loss arising from deprivation of the prospects of renewal is to take into account a loss arising from non-performance of an act which the Commonwealth was under no legal obligation to perform. Damages for the loss of a chance or an opportunity to secure a benefit may be awarded but, argues the Commonwealth, only in those cases in which there is a legal obligation to provide a chance or an opportunity of obtaining that benefit. Chaplin v Hicks [1911] 2 KB 786 is the classic illustration of just such a case …

[91] [A] defendant is not liable in damages for not doing that which he or she has not promised to do: Abrahams v Herbert Reiach Ltd [1922] 1 KB 477 at 482 per Scrutton LJ; Lavarack v Woods of Colchester Ltd [1967] 1 QB 278 …

However, the rule that the defendant is not liable in damages for not doing that which he or she has not promised to do is necessarily subject to the rule in Hadley v Baxendale. According to Alderson B's renowned formulation, the plaintiff is entitled to recover such damages as arise naturally, that is, according to the usual course of things, from the breach, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at [92] the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach: at 354; 151. It is now accepted that this is the statement of a single principle and that its application may depend on the degree of relevant knowledge possessed by the defendant in the particular case …

However, in the present case, the application of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale turns not on the degree of knowledge possessed by the defendant but on what may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties as the probable result of the breach. If it be right to suppose that the loss of the prospect of securing a renewal of the contract was within the contemplation of the parties as a probable result of the breach, then, notwithstanding the principle established by Abrahams and Lavarack, Amann is entitled to compensation which takes into account the value of the loss of the prospect of securing a renewal of the contract.

What was in the contemplation of the parties depends upon a consideration of the terms of the contract in the light of the matrix of circumstances in which it was made. As we have seen, performance of the contract by Amann would have placed it in an advantageous position to secure a renewal of the contract with the benefits that would entail. The prospect of renewal was a distinct commercial benefit, inevitably contemplated by the parties as enuring to the advantage of Amann on, and by reason of, its performance of the contract. It was not an advantage which would accrue to Amann independently of performance of the contract or incidentally. The corollary is that the parties necessarily contemplated the loss of that prospect as the probable result of a repudiation or fundamental breach of the contract on the part of the Commonwealth.

The Commonwealth also submits that the Full Court of the Federal Court was wrong in taking into account the prospect of renewal of the contract because to do so infringed the rule that, where there are two or more ways in which a defendant might perform the contract, the court, in assessing damages, adopts the mode of performance which is most beneficial to the defendant. That rule, which is a manifestation of the principle that damages [93] will not be awarded for not doing that which there is no legal obligation to do, is well supported by authority …

If we make the assumption that the contract would have proceeded to completion, which is a necessary assumption for present purposes, it would be wrong, in the circumstances of the case, to conclude that the Commonwealth would have refused to renew the contract simply because that outcome would reduce the [94] Commonwealth's liability in damages to Amann in the light of the events as they have actually fallen out. In assessing damages, the court is necessarily engaged in a hypothetical exercise, that is, ascertaining how the contract would have turned out had it not been brought to an end by Amann's acceptance of the Commonwealth's wrongful repudiation. On the assumption that the contract would have proceeded to completion, it would have been to the Commonwealth's advantage to have agreed to a renewal, rather than to have negotiated a fresh contract with a third party who would have been in the position of starting from scratch and thus have sought and insisted upon large financial rewards in order to compensate for heavy initial expenditure of the kind incurred by Amann. Accordingly, there would have been a strong prospect of renewal. This being so, the value of the prospect of a renewal of the contract was a matter to be taken into account in determining whether Amann would or would not have recouped its expenditure … [W]here the value of the legal obligation to the plaintiff depends upon the occurrence of an event extraneous to the contract, the probability of the occurrence is relevant to the estimate. As we have said, there was a strong prospect of such an occurrence in this case … The consequence of this, … in view of the onus cast upon the Commonwealth as the party in breach, is that the Commonwealth must demonstrate that the value to Amann of the prospect of renewal of the contract when combined with those expenses that would have been recovered by way of gross receipts was less than the total expenses to be incurred by Amann in the performance of its contractual obligations. If the Commonwealth was able to demonstrate that this would have been the result, had the contract been fully performed, then, in conformity with Robinson v Harman, Amann would not be entitled to all of its expenditure incurred in reliance on the Commonwealth's promise to perform and wasted as a result of the Commonwealth's breach. The Commonwealth was unable, however, to demonstrate this and so discharge the onus. Accordingly, the presumption that Amann would not have entered into a contract in which it would not recover the value of its expenditure incurred remains undisturbed. We agree with the Full Court's conclusion that Amann was entitled to recover as damages an [95] amount commensurate with what it had expended in reliance upon the Commonwealth's promise to perform its contractual obligations.

Discount in the quantum of damages by reference to the prospect of termination of the contract pursuant to cl 2.24 …

[26.35] The Commonwealth argues that the amount of damages awarded should have been discounted in accordance with the prospect of valid termination by the Commonwealth and that, in assessing this prospect, it should be presumed that the Commonwealth would have acted so as to minimise its liability in conformity with The Mihalis Angelos [1971] 1 QB 164. The Commonwealth argues that both Davies J and Burchett J erred in failing to discount the damages they assessed.

Clause 2.24 provides:

> Whenever … the Contractor fails to carry out the Contract or comply with a condition of the Contract to the satisfaction of the Secretary then … the Secretary may, by notice in writing, require the Contractor to show cause in writing to the satisfaction of the Secretary, why the Contract or any specified portion thereof should not be cancelled. If the Contractor fails to show cause in writing, as so required, the Secretary shall be entitled to treat the Contract or any specified portion thereof as having been cancelled …

[Their Honours then set out the arguments of the parties and continued:] [97] Beaumont J resolved these competing arguments by holding that there was a 50 per cent possibility of cancellation pursuant to cl 2.24. But, in arriving at this conclusion, his Honour proceeded on the footing that the Secretary in exercising the power of cancellation was free to pursue the interests of the Commonwealth without any relevant qualification. The Full Court did not agree with that interpretation of the clause. The Full Court's more restricted view of the Secretary's power of cancellation led, quite naturally, to that court assessing the possibility of cancellation at 20 per cent.

We are not persuaded that this was an erroneous estimate …

Consequently, we are not persuaded that the Full Court was wrong in either its estimate or its conclusion that the amount of damages to be awarded should [98] not be discounted on account of an event which was unlikely to occur. It goes, virtually without saying, that we reject entirely the Commonwealth's contention that no damages should have been awarded on the ground that termination was probable.

Conclusion

Having dealt with the arguments of principle advanced by the Commonwealth in conformity with its grounds of appeal, there being no challenge, independently of those grounds of appeal, to the calculation of damages made by the Full Court of the Federal Court, we would dismiss the appeal.

BRENNAN J:

The measure of damages for breach of contract …

[26.40] [99] A plaintiff (as I shall call the party not in breach) seeking damages from a defendant (as I shall call the party in breach) bears the onus of proving both the loss sustained by reason of the breach and the damages for the loss … If a contract be profitable and is rescinded for breach, the profits lost and the costs actually and reasonably incurred in performance are proper subjects of compensation. If a contract be a loss contract, the costs actually and reasonably incurred in performance are the subject of compensation, but only to the extent that those losses would have been recovered had the contract been performed …

[100] In this case, the principal item of loss which the respondent (Amann) is seeking to recover is the net amount expended by it in preparing to perform the contract … forgoing any profits which it submits it would have earned but which it is unable to quantify. The amount so expended (net of its remainder value) was wasted by the repudiation of the contract by the appellant (the Commonwealth). It is a loss that falls comfortably within the rule in Hadley v Baxendale. The question is: what is the measure of damages for that loss?

The Commonwealth contends that there were no profits to be made; to the contrary, it contends that there was a demonstrable loss to be expected from performance of the contract. The resolution of this controversy depends … on the value to be attributed to the benefits to which Amann would have been entitled under the contract had the contract been performed … If the value of those benefits ($B) less [101] the amount which Amann would have had to expend but is now dispensed from expending in performance of any of its unperformed obligations under the contract ($y) exceeds the expenditure incurred by Amann in preparing to perform the contract ($x), Amann is entitled to recover $x; if the net benefit ($B $y) is less than the expenditure incurred ($x), Amann is entitled to recover no more than the net benefit, for that is all that it would have recouped had the contract been performed. The measure of Amann's damages thus depends on the value of the benefits which Amann would have been entitled to receive had the contract been performed ($B), $x and $y being agreed amounts. If $B cannot be quantified, the problem is this: does Amann fail because it has not proved that $B $y is sufficient to cover the $x it expended, or does the Commonwealth fail because it has not proved that $B $y is insufficient to cover the $x or has not proved the amount of the insufficiency?

A plaintiff's contractual benefits: $B

[26.45] Where a contract rescinded for breach is conditional or contingent, the benefits to which a plaintiff would have been entitled had the contract been performed are affected by the possibility that performance of the contract might have been dispensed with or abbreviated by non-fulfilment of the condition or the occurrence of the contingency. To apply the hypothesis that "the contract had been performed" in such a case, it is necessary to find whether the condition would have been fulfilled or whether the contingency would have occurred or, if the fact cannot be found, to make some estimate of the possibility of non-fulfilment of the condition or the occurrence of the contingency. Where damages are assessed after the time for fulfilling the condition or for the occurrence of the contingency has arrived (if there be a stipulated time), the court may be able to determine with some precision the benefits to which the plaintiff would have been entitled had the contract been performed. But, if no time be stipulated or if damages be assessed before the stipulated time has arrived, some estimate must be made as to the possibility of non-fulfilment of the condition or of the occurrence of the contingency. The estimate must be taken into account in assessing a plaintiff's damages. In this case, the manner in which account is to be taken of the possibility of early termination of the contract will have to be considered. It must always be assumed in assessing a plaintiff's damages that the defendant would have committed no further breach of the contract. [102] (That assumption eliminates the need to consider the possibility that further breaches might have been committed by the defendant and the countervailing possibility that compensatory damages for those breaches would have been recovered by the plaintiff.)

In evaluating a plaintiff's benefits under a contract, the court does not look solely at the express terms of the contract but evaluates the plaintiff's rights to benefits of any kind, whether those benefits are expressed by the terms of the contract or are ascertainable by reference to circumstances extrinsic to those terms. Thus a hairdresser's assistant who was wrongfully dismissed was held entitled to recover not only damages for lost wages but also a sum representing the tips which he would have received (Manubens v Leon [1919] 1 KB 208), and an artist's opportunity of gaining fame and reputation by performing a theatrical engagement must be evaluated in assessing damages when the engagement is wrongfully terminated: Herbert Clayton and Jack Waller Ltd v Oliver [1930] AC 209. In cases of this kind, the contract is found to contain by implication a promise to give the plaintiff an opportunity to acquire the unexpressed benefit (White v Australian and New Zealand Theatres Ltd (1943) 67 CLR 266 at 271, 273, 281; Withers v General Theatre Corp [1933] 2 KB 536 at 554), and damages are awarded for breach of that promise. They are not awarded in respect of benefits which the plaintiff has no contractual right to receive: Abrahams v Herbert Reiach Ltd [1922] 1 KB 477 at 482.

Unexpressed benefits are frequently of an intangible kind or are otherwise of uncertain value but difficulty in evaluating a contractual benefit is no barrier to recovery of damages where the defendant is bound to provide the benefit but has failed to do so: see Chaplin v Hicks …

When a commercial contract is breached, it would be erroneous to evaluate the benefits which a plaintiff would have been entitled to receive had the contract been performed by reference solely to the stipulated remuneration for performance if the plaintiff is entitled [103] to acquire, by performance of the contract, other commercial advantages. The hairdresser's assistant in Manubens v Leon was contractually entitled to be employed and it would not have been full compensation for his loss of employment to give him his wages without giving him his tips. An evaluation limited to benefits expressly stipulated would not truly reflect the situation in which the plaintiff would have been if the contract had been performed, nor would it lead to an award of damages which would place the plaintiff in that situation. The other commercial advantages must be evaluated, and evaluation may require consideration of the nature of the plaintiff's business, the opportunities available to the plaintiff to exploit the advantage and, if there be a market for a particular advantage, that market.

Among the commercial advantages to which a plaintiff might be entitled as of right by performing a contract is an opportunity to obtain a profitable engagement under another contract, an opportunity not amounting to a right to a further engagement. Thus, in TC Industrial Plant, where the plaintiff sought damages for breach of warranty of fitness of a stone crushing machine and the plaintiff's principal loss consisted in the cancellation of a contract with the Commonwealth for the supply of crushed aggregate to be produced by using the crusher, the plaintiff was held entitled to recover the profit which would have been earned under a probable extension of the supply contract had the plaintiff been able to perform the original supply contract …

In TC Industrial Plant, the second contract was almost certain to follow on successful performance of the first contract, but the underlying principle does not depend on the certainty of securing a second contract. Certainty is relevant to the value of the opportunity of obtaining a profitable engagement under a second contract, but the benefits to which a plaintiff is entitled under a contract may include an uncertain prospect of obtaining such an [104] engagement provided the prospect is sufficiently substantial to stamp it as a real commercial advantage. The relevant principle is that when performance of a contract by a defendant (including the permitting of the plaintiff to perform his obligations under the contract) would have resulted in the plaintiff's acquiring a particular commercial advantage but the advantage is lost by reason of the defendant's breach, the loss of the advantage is compensable and its value is to be taken into account in assessing a plaintiff's damages. If the advantage in question is a certain opportunity to secure a profitable second contract, the profits of the second contract can be recovered. Such an advantage is worth more than a merely preferential chance of securing such a contract but such a chance, like the chance in Chaplin v Hicks, has a value and the loss of the chance is a proper subject of compensatory damages.

However, to attribute a value to such a chance the court might have to engage in a degree of speculation, speculating as to the likelihood that a profitable contract would be available, what the likely profits would be and the likelihood that the plaintiff would secure the contract against competition by others. The value of the plaintiff's lost contractual benefits are then shrouded in uncertainty. In that event, who bears the onus of proving that the net value of the benefits ($B $y) are or are not sufficient to cover the expenditure incurred by the plaintiff prior to the breach of the first contract or, when the contract is rescinded for breach, prior to rescission?

The doctrine of reliance damages: an alternative method of assessment

[26.50] Where a contract has been rescinded for breach, the amount which a plaintiff has reasonably expended in reliance on the defendant's promise and which is wasted by reason of the defendant's breach of his promise is a proper subject of damages for breach of contract: McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission at 412, 414. Damages assessed for wasted expenditure incurred in reliance on the defendant's promise may be described as reliance damages to distinguish them from damages assessed for loss of the benefits which the plaintiff expected from performance of the contract (expectation damages). A plaintiff who seeks to recover reliance damages must ordinarily prove that the net value of the benefits to which he would have been entitled if the contract had been performed ($B $y) would have exceeded the wasted expenditure incurred in reliance on the defendant's promise ($x) [105] and, to the extent that he fails to do so, his claim will fail. To discharge the onus of proof, however, the plaintiff may be able to raise and rely on an inference that a party would not incur expenditure in reliance on the other party's promise without a reasonable expectation that, on performance of the contract, the expenditure would be recouped. That is an inference of varying strength according to the circumstances …

However, when a contract is rescinded for breach and that breach, by preventing the performance of the contract, has made it impossible for the plaintiff to prove that the net value of his contractual benefits ($B $y) exceeds the wasted expenditure incurred in reliance on the defendant's promise prior to rescission ($x), it is just to shift to the defendant the ultimate onus of proving that, had the contract been performed, the net value of the plaintiff's benefits would not have covered the expenditure he had incurred before rescission …

[106] The sufficient and necessary justification for shifting the onus to the party in breach in the assessment of damages for wasted expenditure incurred in reliance on the defendant's promise before rescission for breach is that the breach of the contract itself makes it impossible to undertake an assessment on the ordinary basis …

A plaintiff's inability to quantify his lost benefits is no justification by itself for casting on the defendant an onus to prove that the plaintiff would not have recouped reliance damages had the contract been performed. What justifies the reversal of the onus is the defendant's repudiation or breach which denies, prevents or precludes the existence of circumstances which would have [107] determined the value of the plaintiff's contractual benefits. Thus, in McRae's case …

The point of distinction between the method of assessment of expectation damages and the method of assessment of reliance damages is the reversal in the case of reliance damages of the onus of proof of the net value of the plaintiff's contractual benefits. There can be no duplication of reliance damages and expectation damages. The compensable losses in reliance damages do not include possible lost profits but both cover expenditure reasonably incurred in preparing to perform and in performing the contract within the limits prescribed by Robinson v Harman. The measure of damages prescribed by Robinson v Harman governs each method of assessment.

Where justification for reversing the onus exists, reliance [108] damages may be recovered; absent that justification, the plaintiff must recover expectation damages, if any, by proof of the value of benefits and the cost of performance; that is, by proof that $B $y is greater than $x. These are alternative methods of assessing damages, but the plaintiff does not have an election as to the method. The plaintiff who seeks recovery of reliance damages must show that justification for reversing the onus of proof exists. Otherwise, he must endeavour to prove his damages on the ordinary basis …

Of course, when a plaintiff advances a prima facie case for an assessment of reliance damages, the defendant may destroy or diminish the plaintiff's claim by proving that, had the contract been performed, the plaintiff's benefits after payment of the further costs of performance ($B $y) would not have been sufficient to cover the expenses reasonably incurred by the plaintiff prior to rescission in reliance on the contract …

The present case

[26.55] The breach consisted in the Commonwealth's unjustified repudiation of the contract on 12 September 1987. At 12 September 1987, Amann had committed itself … to expend $5 281 521 in the purchase of … aircraft which had a remainder value of only $917 329 when no longer required for coastal surveillance, and it had incurred other preliminary costs of $854 943. The Full Court of the Federal Court based its assessment of damages on the net expenditure thus incurred ($5 219 135) together with $143 049 paid to employees whose services were terminated consequent on the rescission of the contract and $113 000 paid to the Commonwealth under a clause of the contract requiring a deposit to secure due performance … Accordingly, that court awarded $5 475 184 damages plus interest. Amann looked to the contract to recoup the costs it had incurred.

[I]f the value of Amann's benefits had the contract been performed (net of the further costs of performance) [had] fallen short of $5 219 135, Amann must fail to the extent of the shortfall.

The total … to which Amann would have been entitled under the contract had it been fully performed was $17 107 462 together with a refund of the security deposit ($113 000) but, in order to perform the contract fully, Amann would have had to expend a further $15 801 899 to defray further capital expenditure, operating costs and borrowing costs … The Commonwealth submits that, had the contract been fully performed, no more would have been available to Amann to cover the costs it had incurred on 12 September 1987 than the surplus of the total payable under the contract over the further expenditure Amann would have had to incur to perform the contract fully. The Commonwealth submits that Amann's damages could not exceed the amount of that surplus ($1 418 563) [$17 107 462 ($15 801 899 + $113 000)] supplemented by the $143 049 termination pay which Amann would not have paid if the contract had proceeded. On this argument, and on the hypothesis that the contract had been fully performed, Amann's damages could not exceed $1 561 612 [$1 418 563 + $143 049].

I see no answer to this submission if the premise on which it is based is accepted; that is, that the only benefit of value to which Amann was entitled by performing the contract consisted in the amounts payable to it by the Commonwealth under the contract. If that be the true position, Amann would have made a loss even if the contracts had been fully performed …

For its part, Amann submits that by performing the contract it would have acquired a substantial commercial advantage in tendering for the next coastal surveillance contract and that advantage enhances the value of the first contract either directly, by adding the value of the commercial advantage to the stipulated remuneration and thus increasing the total benefits to which it would have been entitled under the contract, or indirectly, by enhancing the value of the aircraft used in coastal surveillance at the end of the first contract period and thus reducing the costs attributable to performance of the first contract.

(i) Was Amann contractually entitled to more than remuneration?

… [111] The commercial position was such that any successful tenderer who performed the contract for the stipulated period (three years) would be in a strong, if not unassailable, position to become the successful tenderer for a surveillance contract for the following period … The Commonwealth's promise to engage Amann to provide the service for three years carried with it the promise that Amann, by performing the contract, could work itself into a secure position as an equipped and established provider of the service and [112] could thereby acquire a most substantial advantage in tendering for any succeeding contract. This was not an incidental benefit flowing merely from a trader's reputation as a successful contractor; it was a benefit which was implicit in Amann's right to perform the particular contract, having regard to the nature of the work, the capital and equipment required to perform it, the Commonwealth's practice of letting tenders for the work and the limited competition among tenderers to do it. By repudiating the contract, the Commonwealth caused Amann to lose the commercial advantage it would have gained had the contract been performed. The loss of that advantage is compensable. The case is in this respect indistinguishable in principle from TC Industrial Plant, Manubens v Leon and Herbert Clayton and Jack Waller Ltd v Oliver. The commercial advantage which Amann lost is not to be mistaken for a right to renewal of its contract. Had there been a right to renewal, the loss of that right would have to be taken into account … But the Commonwealth cannot be held liable for the loss of a benefit which it had not expressly or impliedly promised Amann. It had not promised renewal; it had promised that Amann should be the provider of the service for three years. It is the commercial advantage inherent in being the provider of the service for three years that is the benefit to be valued.

(ii) What was the commercial advantage worth to Amann?

The period and conditions offered by the Commonwealth to tenderers for any subsequent contract, the possibility of renewed competition, the risk of damage to aircraft during the currency of the first contract, the vicissitudes of industrial relations, not to mention the possibility of radical changes in government policy, are among the factors which make an attempt to ascertain the value of the advantage by reference to circumstances which exclude three years of contract performance a speculative exercise. That is not to say that the advantage was valueless in 1987. To the contrary, the value of the advantage would have been substantial, but it cannot be quantified with any degree of accuracy. It follows that it is impossible to say whether or not the value of all the benefits to which Amann would have been entitled had the contract been performed ($B) would have exceeded the cost of performance by Amann ($x + $y). Nor is it possible to say whether there would have been a sufficient net value of the benefits to which Amann would have been entitled (that is, $B $y) to cover any more than [113] $1 561 612 of the expenditure which Amann had already incurred ($x).

The value of the commercial advantage that Amann would have acquired and could have exploited when the contract had been performed could be ascertained only at or near the end of the contract period and only in the light of the history of Amann's performance of the contract. The course of events by reference to which the value of that commercial advantage could be determined was aborted by the Commonwealth's repudiation of the contract. Of course, even if the contract had been performed, the value would have had to be assessed as a prospect of securing a profitable contract, not as a right to secure such a contract. Some estimate of that prospect would have had to be formed. Any uncertainty in the value of the advantage arising from the need to form such an estimate is not attributable to the Commonwealth's repudiation, but the repudiation did preclude the occurrence of the events which would have permitted in due time a true assessment of the value of the commercial advantage lost by reason of the repudiation. Amann is therefore entitled to an assessment of its damages as reliance damages and to cast upon the Commonwealth the onus of showing that, had the contract been performed, Amann would not have been entitled to benefits of sufficient net value to cover any part of the expenditure it had incurred prior to rescission or, alternatively, any part of that expenditure exceeding $1 561 612.

(iii) Would the power conferred by cl 2.24 have been exercised to terminate the contract?

… [114] In my view, the Commonwealth has failed to discharge that onus of showing that the Secretary would have terminated Amann's contract under cl 2.24. If the Commonwealth cannot establish that that contingency would have occurred, it cannot discharge the onus of proving that the net benefits to which Amann would have been entitled under the contract would not have covered the expenditure it had incurred in reliance on the contract prior to rescission.

Had Amann borne the onus of proving its damages as expectation damages, the assessment would have had to allow for the possibility that the power to terminate under cl 2.24 would have been exercised. That possibility, assessed at 20 per cent by the Full Court, would have reduced those damages. In the assessment of reliance damages, the possibility remains relevant to the value of Amann's contractual benefits. But the Commonwealth bears the [115] onus of proving that the possibility of termination under cl 2.24 reduces the net value of Amann's benefits to an amount less than its expectation damages. Had the contract not been repudiated, the circumstances would have revealed whether or not the contract would have been terminated under cl 2.24. The repudiation leaves that possibility uncertain and the Commonwealth must bear the consequences. Even if the Commonwealth be held to have proved that there was a 20 per cent possibility that the contract would have been terminated under cl 2.24, that finding does not enable the Commonwealth to discharge its onus. The Commonwealth remains unable to prove either that $B $y is less than $x or that 80 per cent of ($B $y) is less than $x.

(iv) Has the Commonwealth proved that Amann's net benefits would not have covered its expenditure?

The Commonwealth's principal argument was that it is impermissible to include in Amann's damages any allowance for benefits to be obtained under a second contract, for a loss of those benefits would flow not from repudiation of the first contract but from a decision not to enter into the second contract. However, Amann's situation is not to be assessed by attempting to quantify benefits under a second contract: it is right to say that the first contract confers no right to those benefits. But, for the reasons already given, the first contract did confer a right to acquire, by performance of the contract, a commercial advantage in tendering for a second contract and that advantage must be evaluated. The value of that advantage does reflect some expectation of profits to be earned under a second contract, and such an expectation, which would have value in the eyes of those engaged in the business of providing a surveillance service, is relevant to the evaluation of the tendering advantage to which Amann was contractually entitled. At all events, the Commonwealth has not shown that the advantage was valueless or was of insufficient value when added to the contractual remuneration to provide sufficient net benefits to cover the expenditure incurred by Amann prior to rescission. As the Commonwealth has failed to discharge its onus of proof, Amann is entitled to recover the expenditure incurred prior to rescission in preparing to perform and in performing the contract. That expenditure is the amount found by the Federal Court.

The appeal should be dismissed.

DEANE J:

Reliance damages

[26.60] … [126] In a case where a plaintiff has incurred expenditure either in procuring the contract or in its performance but it is impossible or difficult to establish the value of any benefits which the plaintiff would have derived from performance by the defendant, considerations of justice dictate that the plaintiff may rely on a presumption that the value of those benefits would have been at least equal to the total detriment which has been or would have been sustained by the plaintiff in doing whatever was reasonably necessary to procure and perform the contract. In my view, the rational basis of that presumption is that that total detriment represents what would reasonably have been in the contemplation of the parties themselves as the cost to the plaintiff of full performance by the defendant and constitutes some evidence, in proceedings between them, of the value of the total benefits which would have been derived by the plaintiff from such performance. It follows from it that, at least in a case where proof of value is impossible or difficult, it is presumed in the plaintiff's favour that the future net benefits (that is, excess of future benefit over future detriment) which would have been derived from performance of the contract would have been of a value sufficient to recoup the past net expenditure reasonably incurred in procuring or performing it. Where that presumption is operative, it enables the recovery by [127] a plaintiff of what are commonly referred to as "reliance damages", that is to say, damages equivalent to the wasted expenditure which has been reasonably incurred in reliance upon the assumption that the contractual promises of the defendant would be honoured. The presumption will be rebutted if it be self-evident or established that the plaintiff would have derived no financial or other benefit from performance of the contract or that any financial or other benefit which would have been derived from future performance would not have been sufficient in value to counterbalance the past expenditure. The presumption will not, however, be displaced merely by the circumstance that the benefits which the plaintiff would have obtained from performance by the defendant included the chance of some more remote benefit and it is a matter of speculation whether that ultimate benefit would have in fact been obtained or by the circumstance that the perceived "benefit" which the plaintiff sought and for which she incurred the past expenditure is something which is of value only to the plaintiff or which, for some other reason, is not capable of being objectively valued in monetary terms: see, for example, McRae at 414; Fink v Fink at 134–5, 143. If it be established that the plaintiff would not, in any event, have derived the "benefit" which she sought from performance by the defendant or that any "benefit" which would have been derived is capable of being valued in monetary terms and would, when so valued, have been inadequate to recoup the expenditure, the plaintiff's recovery will be limited to the extent (if at all) to which it has not been established that that expenditure would not have been recouped. Even in a case where it is established that the plaintiff would have incurred a loss if the contract had been fully performed, reliance damages can be recovered in respect of wasted expenditure to the extent (if at all) that the past net expenditure exceeds that ultimate loss since, to that extent, the expenditure would have been recouped if there had been no breach.

It should be apparent from what has been said above that an award of reliance damages does not represent the direct recovery of the wasted net expenditure. The basis of an award of reliance damages is the ordinary one in an action for repudiation or breach, namely, that the plaintiff is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation with respect to damages as if the repudiation or breach had not occurred. Such an award represents the recovery [128] of the wasted net expenditure only in the indirect sense that, in the assessment of damages, the net benefits which would have been derived but for the repudiation or breach are quantified in monetary terms by reference to the presumption that their value would have at least equalled that wasted expenditure. In other words, the wasted expenditure represents "an alternative measure of gains prevented": see Corbin on Contracts (1964), vol 5, p 192.

The general statements in the two preceding paragraphs may be susceptible to criticism on the grounds that they are dogmatic about some matters which still remain the subject of learned discussion and differences of opinion: see, for example, Owen, "Some Aspects of the Recovery of Reliance Damages in the Law of Contract" (1984) 4 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 393; Slawson, "The Role of Reliance in Contract Damages" (1990) 76 Cornell Law Review 197. They have been framed with the circumstances of the present case in mind and are not comprehensive in that they will be inadequate to deal with some particular problems which might arise in the assessment of damages in some of the circumstances to which they apply. Where, for example, the repudiation or breach of contract directly results in a detriment, such as an enforced expenditure of money, which would not otherwise have been sustained, the amount of that detriment will also be recoverable in a case where reliance damages are assessed on the presumption that the value of the benefits which the plaintiff would have derived from performance of the contract should be treated as at least equal in value to the total detriment which had been or would have been sustained by the plaintiff in doing whatever was reasonably necessary to procure and perform the contract. The reason why that is so is that when one compares the position which would have existed if the contract had been performed and the position which exists after its breach or repudiation, the comparison will disclose that, but for the breach or repudiation, net expenditure in procuring or performing the contract would (on the basis of the presumption) have been counterbalanced by the benefits resulting from performance, while expenditure consequent upon the repudiation or breach would not have been incurred at all.

The appeal: facts, issues and two problems …

[26.65] [129] There are two major problems involved in the comparison of the position in which Amann would have been placed if the Commonwealth had not repudiated the contract and the position in which it was placed after it had rescinded the contract on the ground of the Commonwealth's repudiation. The first problem is that, at the time of the Commonwealth's repudiation, Amann was itself in breach of the contract. Like the majority of the Full Federal Court, I consider that that existing breach of contract on the part of Amann was sufficient to found a proper exercise of the power of cancellation conferred upon the Secretary by cl 2.24 and that there was a significant possibility that, if the contract had not been repudiated by the Commonwealth, it would have been validly "cancelled" by the Secretary pursuant to that clause. If it had been so "cancelled", Amann would not have been entitled to the performance of the contract by the Commonwealth or to claim [130] damages for non-performance. The second problem also relates to the hypothetical situation which would have existed if the contract had not been repudiated. If the contract had turned out to represent a one-off involvement by Amann in aerial surveillance in this country and the aircraft acquired for performance of the contract could not, at the expiry of the contract, be sold locally at a value which reflected their special suitability for surveillance purposes, the contract would not have been a profitable one from Amann's point of view. In fact, however, Amann did not regard its involvement in aerial surveillance in this country as a one-off activity. To the contrary, a significant commercial advantage which Amann sought, and would have derived, from the contract if it had run its full course would have been the favourable position in which it would have been placed for obtaining a new contract with the Commonwealth for a further period of aerial surveillance of the northern coast. There are obvious difficulties about placing a value in monetary terms upon that favourable position.

Amann's claim for reliance damages

[26.70] It is convenient, for the moment, to put to one side the first of the above mentioned problems … There are two aspects of the second problem which are of present significance. The first is that it is impossible to do more than speculate about what Amann's approximate proportionate chance of obtaining a further contract after the expiry of the existing contract would have been if the contract had run its course. The most that can be said is that, at the end of the existing contract, Amann would have almost certainly enjoyed substantial advantages, in terms of experienced personnel and equipment held at depreciated values, over any potential new supplier of the relevant surveillance services and that, even if it had not itself won a further contract, there would have been a significant chance that it could sell its local undertaking or its aircraft to its successor for a price which reflected the special value of the aircraft (by reason of their equipment) to a supplier of coastal surveillance services. The second aspect is that one can also do no more than speculate about how advantageous to Amann any such future contract would have been if it had eventuated. The result is that it is impossible to do more than speculate about either the value to Amann of the chance of a further contract which would have existed at the end of the contract period or the price it would have obtained for its [131] equipment if the contract had been fully performed by the Commonwealth. It follows from the earlier discussion of relevant principles that, in these circumstances, Amann is entitled to found its claim for damages upon the presumption that the value of the contractual benefits which it would have derived from full performance by the Commonwealth would have at least equalled the expenditure incurred in obtaining the contract and in performance of it on its part. Clearly enough, the difficulty of assessing the value of the chance of a further contract or the resale value of the equipment makes it impossible for the Commonwealth to demonstrate that the total monetary value of any benefits which would have been derived by Amann from full performance would have been less than the total of its net expenditure. That being so, and subject to one important qualification, Amann is entitled to recover reliance damages equivalent to its wasted expenditure.

Amann's loss of an 80 per cent chance …

[26.75] The majority of the Full Court of the Federal Court concluded that there was a 20 per cent chance of cancellation [of the contract by the Secretary] … The 20 per cent chance that the contract would have been cancelled in any event is of a different nature from the chance that Amann may have obtained a further contract. The chance of a further contract was itself an ingredient of the net benefits which Amann would have obtained from performance of the contract by the Commonwealth and, as such, is accounted for by the presumption that the total value of those benefits would have at least equalled wasted net expenditure. In contrast, the 20 per cent chance of cancellation is not a contingency which has been factored into the net benefits which would have been derived from future performance of the contract for the purposes of that presumption. It is a superimposed risk which would have flowed not from performance of the contract but from Amann's own breach of the contract. That means that the combined effect of that presumption and the superimposed risk of cancellation is that what Amann lost by reason of the Commonwealth's repudiation was an 80 per cent [132] chance of recovering its wasted expenditure. In circumstances where damages are being assessed on the basis of what would have happened in a hypothetical situation and where it is a matter of speculation whether the Secretary would, in the exercise of the wide discretionary power entrusted to him, have actually cancelled the contract … it would be inappropriate and unjust to go beyond the determination that what Amann lost was an 80 per cent chance and, by reference to a balance of probability test, require the Commonwealth to pay damages assessed on the basis that there had been no possibility of cancellation and that Amann had lost not an 80 per cent but a 100 per cent chance of recoupment. In other words, the effect of the principles examined earlier in this judgment is that the case is one in which "the court must make an estimate as to what are the chances that a particular thing … would have happened and reflect those chances, whether they are more or less than even, in the amount of damages which it awards": Mallett v McMonagle [1970] AC 166 at 176, per Lord Diplock. That being so, the damages which Amann is entitled to recover from the Commonwealth are, for the reasons which I have endeavoured to explain in this judgment, limited to the value of an 80 per cent chance of recouping its wasted expenditure, that is to say, to 80 per cent of the value of that expenditure …

Conclusion

[133] In the result, the amount of the primary damages awarded to Amann by the Full Court of the Federal Court must be reduced by one fifth or 20 per cent …

TOOHEY J [stated that he was in general agreement with the principles enunciated in the joint judgment of Mason CJ and Dawson J but disagreed with them on the question of the onus of proof. His Honour said]:

[26.80] [140] In the circumstances of McRae the defendant could not even discharge an evidentiary onus. The nature of the breach made it, in a logical sense, impossible for the defendant to adduce evidence of what return the plaintiffs would or might have received. There was no evidence, as there was in the present case, of the possibility of alternative, future events. In the absence of evidence, the question was who should bear all the wasted cost; there was certainly no objective basis on which to discount the expenditure.

Therefore, since the primary question before the court in McRae [141] was whether damages could, in principle, be assessed by reference to expenditure at all and since it was theoretically impossible for the defendant to adduce any evidence as to expenditure, that case is not, in my view, authority for a general proposition that an onus of proof in the strict sense rests on the defendant to show that, even without his breach, the plaintiff would not have recovered the expenditure …

[142] On the other hand, to say that no strict onus is imposed on a defendant does not mean that, in circumstances of uncertainty, the burden remains throughout with the plaintiff. There is, in effect, an evidentiary onus on the defendant to show that receipts would not have equalled outlay by the plaintiff, though ultimately the aim is to determine what loss has occurred on the basis of all available evidence. It may be assumed, in the absence of evidence to the [143] contrary, that the plaintiff would have recovered his costs. Whether this is based on a presumption that persons would not enter into a contract if they were not able to recover at least their costs or on the basis of the proposition that, as a matter of policy, the party not in breach should in the absence of evidence be favoured does not matter. But there is no strict onus of proof on a defendant to demonstrate that the plaintiff would not have recovered his outlay, even if the contract had been fully performed. It follows from what has been said that the fairest method of assessing damages, and the method most appropriate for the implementation of the concept of compensation in circumstances of uncertainty, is to balance contingencies which are significant …

[145] One more factor should be considered when weighing contingencies. It is that the Commonwealth, in entering a contract for three years, notwithstanding a clear commercial base for the contract, had the incontestable right to act in a commercially perverse way. This is not to say that such a right renders the commercial reality of a contract irrelevant because, as I have said, the advantage accruing to Amann by being the most viable contractor at the end of the initial three years is a benefit arising from its contractual rights. However, it is to say that such a right – to act contrary to commercial prudence – must be given weight when determining the likelihood of non-renewal …

The fact remains that the Commonwealth had not committed itself contractually beyond a period of three years. It is true that commercial advantages would be a benefit accruing to Amann but the risk of that benefit (the risk of acquiring it and the risk of losing it) was, to the extent of the likelihood of non-renewal, for Amann to bear. This is to say, to the extent of the likelihood that the Commonwealth would have decided not to renew the contract – because Amann did not perform the contract to the satisfaction of the Commonwealth, because of altered commercial or technological circumstances or because the Commonwealth, for its own reasons, chose to forgo its own advantage in a renewal – the risk involved in Amann's disproportionate expenditure was its own …

[26.85] MCHUGH J: (dissenting) [161] In the ordinary case, a claim for reliance damages cannot be made because the application of the principle in Robinson v Harman makes any expenditure incurred in reliance on the defendant's promise irrelevant.

Where the breach of contract occurs after the plaintiff has incurred expense in preparing or performing the contract, the plaintiff's loss is ordinarily the difference between the value of the benefits which it would have received under the contract, as and from the date of breach, and the expense which the plaintiff would have incurred, as and from that date, in performing its own contractual obligations. In the ordinary case of repudiation, any expense which the plaintiff has incurred in preparing to perform or in performing the contract prior to breach is irrelevant to the assessment of the damages to be awarded. Except in very special circumstances, damages for breach of contract are assessed [162] by reference to the circumstances which existed at the date of breach: Wenham at 473; Miliangos v Frank (Textiles) Ltd [1976] AC 443 at 468; Johnson v Agnew [1980] AC 367 at 400–1. If a plaintiff has expended or incurred liabilities of $100 000 prior to breach and would have received $200 000 in the future if the defendant had performed its contractual obligations, the amount of the plaintiff's damages is the difference between the $200 000 and the expenditure which the plaintiff would have incurred in performing its future obligations. The $100 000 already expended or incurred is irrelevant …

[T]he most important class of case where the plaintiff is entitled to recover wasted expenditure is the one where the plaintiff cannot prove any loss of profit because the nature of the breach makes it impossible or too uncertain to ascertain whether the plaintiff would have made any profit or, if it would have, what the amount of that profit would have been. In McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission this court held (at 415) that, where the defendant had contracted to sell an "OIL TANKER lying on JOURMAUND REEF" and no such tanker existed, the plaintiff's damages were "to be measured by reference to expenditure incurred and wasted in reliance on the Commission's promise that a tanker existed at the place specified". Dixon and Fullagar JJ said (at 414):

> If we regard the case as a simple and normal case of breach by non-delivery, the plaintiffs have no starting point. The burden of proof is on them, and they cannot establish that they have suffered any damage unless they can show that a tanker delivered in performance of the contract would have had some value, and this they cannot show. But when the contract alleged is a contract that there was a tanker in a particular place, and the breach assigned is that there was no tanker there, and the damages claimed are measured by expenditure incurred on the faith of the promise that there was a tanker in that place, the plaintiffs are in a very different position. They have now a starting point. They can say: (1) this expense was [165] incurred; (2) it was incurred because you promised us that there was a tanker; (3) the fact that there was no tanker made it certain that this expense would be wasted. The plaintiffs have in this way a starting point. They make a prima facie case. The fact that the expense was wasted flowed prima facie from the fact that there was no tanker; and the first fact is damage, and the second fact is breach of contract. The burden is now thrown on the Commission of establishing that, if there had been a tanker, the expense incurred would equally have been wasted. This, of course, the Commission cannot establish. The fact is that the impossibility of assessing damages on the basis of a comparison between what was promised and what was delivered arises not because what was promised was valueless but because it is impossible to value a non-existent thing. It is the breach of contract itself which makes it impossible even to undertake an assessment on that basis. It is not impossible, however, to undertake an assessment on another basis, and, in so far as the Commission's breach of contract itself reduces the possibility of an accurate assessment, it is not for the Commission to complain.

In the Full Court in the present case, Burchett J took the view that the basis of decisions such as McRae is that, where parties have freely negotiated a contract in the ordinary course of commerce, proof of the incurring of expenditure appropriate to the performance of the contract raises a "prima facie inference" that it will be recouped from carrying out the contract …

With great respect to his Honour, I think that no such inference arises in commercial cases as a matter either of law or of commercial experience …

[166] I would reject the explanation that the basis of cases such as McRae is or ought to be that proof of expenditure gives rise to a prima facie inference that it will be recouped by the carrying out of the contract. The rule in McRae is satisfactorily based on the broad principle of justice that, if the breach of the defendant has made it impossible to ascertain whether or not the plaintiff would have made a profit from the performance of the contract, it is only fair that the defendant should reimburse the plaintiff for expenditure which it has wasted as a result of the breach.

… In a case like McRae, until the plaintiff proves that the defendant's breach has made it impossible to prove the outcome of the contract or the value of the defendant's promise, expenditure wasted in reliance on the defendant's promise is not recoverable. But once the plaintiff discharges that burden of proof, it is entitled [167] to be compensated for all expenditure wasted in reasonable reliance on the defendant's promise to perform its side of the contract.

Amann's loss

[26.90] It needs to be kept firmly in mind that, for the purpose of the principle in Robinson v Harman, the "loss" which Amann suffered as the result of the breach by the Commonwealth is not the same thing as any profit that it may have made under the contract or even any profit which it might have made on its operations in the post-breach period. In assessing any "profit" of Amann, any revenue obtained under the contract could properly be charged, wholly or proportionately, with costs and expenses already incurred as at the date of breach. But in assessing Amann's loss as the result of the breach, the only consideration is: what sum of money will place Amann "in the same situation … as if the contract had been performed"?

As at the date of breach, Amann had already paid or incurred a liability to pay $6 136 464 in acquiring aircraft and in other establishment costs. It appears that, if the contract had continued, Amann would have been liable to pay another $368 479 in respect of the acquisition of aircraft. Whether or not it had already incurred liability in respect of that payment is not clear. But the better view would seem to be that it was a liability which would be incurred in the future. I shall act on that basis. The learned trial judge also found that the cost to Amann of borrowing money to purchase the aircraft was $3 390 000. It was a liability, however, that had been incurred as at the date of breach. On the Full Court's findings of fact, Amann was liable to indemnify another company for the cost of the aircraft and would have to borrow to fund that liability. It is immaterial whether the precise sum would have been $3 390 000 or a larger or smaller sum. The important point is that, as at the date of breach, Amann had paid or had a liability to pay $6 136 464, part of which gave rise to a further liability in the form of interest payments or its equivalent of $3 390 000. The liability to pay the $3 390 000 or some equivalent sum had been incurred as at the date of breach. It was not a liability to be incurred in the future, as the figures put forward by the Commonwealth assumed. So as at the date of breach, Amann had paid or was liable to pay $9 526 464 ($6 136 464 + $3 390 000). Those payments and liabilities had to be recouped or met by Amann from the revenue generated by the contract or from its own or other sources. They had to be recouped or met whether the contract ran until its expiry date or was sooner terminated by Amann, the Commonwealth, the consent of the [168] parties or frustration of law. But they are irrelevant in determining how much better off Amann would have been if both parties had continued to perform their obligations under the contract. If Amann had abandoned the contract the moment before breach, those payments and liabilities would have existed. They were not liabilities which had to be incurred after 12 September 1987 if Amann was to earn the $17 107 462 in revenue to which it was entitled under the contract. Likewise, questions concerning the value of the aircraft are irrelevant to the computation of Amann's loss. Once those aircraft were committed to the surveillance contract and fitted out for that purpose, they had an intrinsic value of only $917 329. From Amann's point of view, after conversion their residual value was $917 329. And even if Amann had obtained any contract awarded in 1990 that would have been their value at the commencement of that contract. As at the date of breach, therefore, Amann had already lost the difference between the cost of acquiring those aircraft and their residual value.

If there had been no breach of contract by the Commonwealth, Amann had only two expenditures to incur in the future to obtain the $17 107 462 revenue which it would have derived under the contract. They were its operating costs, which Beaumont J assessed at $12 043 420, and the sum of $368 479 to be paid in respect of the acquisition of aircraft. It may be that three years of operations would have meant some small decline in the residual value of the aircraft. But no point was made about this, and it can be ignored. Accordingly, in my opinion, if the contract had continued instead of being breached and terminated, Amann would have been $4 695 563 ($17 107 462 ($12 043 420 + $368 479)) better off than it was immediately before the breach. As the result of the breach, Amann was also required to pay the sum of $143 049 in termination payments to its employees and a security deposit of $113 000 was wrongly forfeited. Both these amounts are recoverable as part of Amann's loss which, therefore, totals $4 951 612 …

[169] Amann's prima facie loss, therefore, is the sum of $4 951 612. I say prima facie because Amann says that it was also entitled to damages for the loss of the chance to earn profits under any contract let in 1990. Since it is common ground that, in the circumstances of the case, damages for loss of the chance are impossible to assess, Amann concedes that it [170] could not obtain any expectation damages for that loss of chance but says that it is entitled to reliance damages in accordance with the principle of McRae's case. Consequently, Amann says its loss is not $4 951 612 or whatever sum represents what can be calculated as expectation damages. Its loss is the pre-breach expenditure. On the other hand, the Commonwealth contends that Amann's prima facie loss must be discounted to allow for the contingency that the 1987 contract might have been terminated before its expiration because of Amann's own breaches of contract.

Reliance damages in this case

[26.95] If reliance damages are to be awarded to Amann, it can only be on one of two possible grounds: first, that the Commonwealth expressly or impliedly promised Amann that, if it performed the 1987 contract, it would obtain a commercial advantage which would enable it to earn profits under any contract let in 1990 and the value of that commercial advantage cannot be assessed because of the breach; second, that although the Commonwealth made no promise concerning the 1990 contract, one of the consequences of the breach of the 1987 contract is so uncertain or impossible to assess that it is just and proper to award reliance damages.

The promise of a commercial advantage

[26.100] If the Commonwealth promised Amann that performance of the 1987 contract would confer a commercial advantage on it and that, by reason of the breach of contract, the value of the commercial advantage could not be assessed, there would be no difficulty in applying McRae's case and holding that Amann was entitled to reliance damages. Amann's pre-breach expenditure would have been incurred in reliance on the Commonwealth's promise that a commercial benefit would flow from the performance of the contract. The claim by Amann would, therefore, be firmly rooted in reliance damages doctrine. But the evidence does not establish any express or implied promise by the Commonwealth that the 1987 contract would confer any implied commercial advantage on Amann.

In the absence of an express or implied contractual stipulation, the common law rejects the notion that a plaintiff claiming damages for breach of contract is entitled to be compensated for, or have taken into account, a commercial advantage or loss of opportunity to display business or professional skills or to enhance a professional or business reputation. Where the contract of an actor, producer or author has been wrongly terminated, damages may be recovered for [171] the loss of the opportunity to enhance his or her reputation: Marbe v George Edwardes (Daly's Theatre) Ltd [1928] 1 KB 269; Herbert Clayton and Jack Waller Ltd v Oliver; White v Australian and New Zealand Theatres Ltd; Joseph v National Magazine Co Ltd [1959] Ch 14. But the true explanation of these cases is that there is an implied promise on the part of the employer to afford the actor, producer or author such an opportunity: see Oliver at 218 per Lord Buckmaster; White at 271, 273, 281–2; and compare Re Golomb (1931) 144 LT 583 at 590–1 per Greer LJ. Whether the promise in these cases arises from business necessity or is implied by law, those cases are in a special category. They provide no foundation for supposing that there is any general rule that contractual promises in a business or professional context give rise to a further implied promise that the promisee will obtain the commercial advantages which are expected to flow from the performance of the contract. The fulfilment of such expectations is at the promisee's risk. In the absence of special facts peculiar to the contract in question, there is no ground for implying such a term into an ordinary commercial or professional contract as a matter of either fact or law. The contrary view would have far-reaching effects. It would mean, for example, that the householder who wrongly terminated a contract with an interior decorator would be liable for damages for depriving the decorator of the opportunity to enhance his or her reputation with the householder's friends and neighbours. In Re Golomb, in dismissing a claim "to recover damages for loss of prestige and (or) publicity" by a person who had not been appointed as a company director, Scrutton LJ said (at 587) that the claim was "one which has startled me very much" …

Nor is its claim supported by TC Industrial Plant where this court said (at 294) that, in assessing damages for breach of warranty of [172] fitness, regard could be had to the receipts and expenditure which the plaintiff would have obtained or incurred under a contract with the Commonwealth "and the probable extension thereof". Since the promisor had warranted that the machine was fit for the purpose of carrying out work of the relevant kind, the damages included what could be earned under the contract and what might have been earned under the extension in performing the work which the promisor had warranted the machine was fit to carry out.

There was no express promise and there were no facts peculiar to the 1987 contract which gave rise to an implied promise that if Amann performed the 1987 contract, it would obtain a commercial advantage which would enable it to earn profits under any contract let in 1990. Accordingly, Amann is not entitled to damages for breach of such a promise. This basis for claiming reliance damages must be rejected.

Reliance damages where a consequence of the breach is uncertain

[26.105] If reliance damages are to be awarded, it can only be upon the second ground to which I have referred, that is, that one of the consequences of the breach of contract by the Commonwealth is so uncertain or impossible to assess that it is just and proper to award Amann reliance damages. In other words, the claim for reliance damages is not because there is any claim that there has been a breach of any promise in relation to any contract to be let in 1990; it is because the breach of the promises made in the 1987 contract has caused a consequential loss to Amann which is impossible to assess. The claim, therefore, goes beyond the claim which this court accepted in McRae.

It is one thing to assess damages on a reliance basis when it is impossible or too uncertain to determine what the value of the defendant's promise would have been. It is another matter altogether to say that, although the value of the defendant's promise can be fully and accurately determined, reliance damages can be awarded because a consequence of the defendant's breach is too uncertain or impossible to evaluate. If the promise of the defendant can be valued, an award of expectation damages, based on the estimated outcome of the contract, gives the plaintiff all that it was entitled to receive in return for any moneys expended in reliance on the defendant's promise. Consequently, if Amann can be awarded "reliance" damages in this case – where the value of the Commonwealth's promise can be fully determined – it means that "reliance" damages can be awarded, not because money was expended in reliance on the defendant's promise and that promise [173] cannot be valued, but because the defendant's breach of promise may have caused a consequential loss to the plaintiff. To award "reliance" damages on such a basis would be contrary to the rationale of the reliance damages doctrine.

Consequently, I would reject the claim that reliance damages should be awarded in this case because Amann was entitled to have the loss of the chance of future profits taken into account in assessing damages. The loss of that chance flows from its expectations and not the Commonwealth's promise. Indeed, the fact that it was a Commonwealth contract under which there was a chance to make profits seems accidental. If the claim for reliance damages could succeed in this case, it would seem to make no difference that the breach had caused the loss of a chance to earn profits under some other contract to which the Commonwealth was not a party.

Moreover, even if, contrary to my view, reliance damages can be awarded in a case where the outcome of the contract and the value of the defendant's promise can be accurately determined, I would reject the claim on the facts of this case.

Causation

[26.110] The Commonwealth contended that the Full Court was not justified in attaching significance to Amann's prospects of obtaining a renewal or extension of the contract because "to include in the assessment of damages an allowance for that which would have been obtained under a renewed or extended contract is to compensate the contractor for loss resulting from a decision not to renew or extend rather than for loss resulting from the breach" (my italics). The Commonwealth argued that the breach did not prevent Amann from tendering for any further contract beyond 12 September 1990. The contention of the Commonwealth raises the question whether its breach of contract caused the loss of the chance of obtaining profits from any renewal or extension of the 1987 contract.

Absent any contrary contractual stipulation, a plaintiff is entitled to be compensated only for loss or damage which is the result of the defendant's breach. Loss or damage which flows from the plaintiff's inability to perform or obtain another contract is recoverable only if that loss or damage resulted from the breach and was reasonably foreseeable as likely to result from the breach: see Reg

Glass Pty Ltd v Rivers Locking Systems Pty Ltd (1968) 120 CLR 516 at 523. It is not enough that the parties contemplated that the contract would probably be [174] renewed or that loss or damage to the plaintiff might occur if the contract was not renewed. When the defendant has refused to promise that the contract would be renewed and the issue of renewal is at the risk of the plaintiff, it seems almost paradoxical to find that the defendant should have to pay damages to the plaintiff when the risk has been realised. Nevertheless, accepting for the purpose of the argument that, although the Commonwealth did not promise to renew the contract, it may have to pay damages for the loss of the chance of earning profits under a renewed contract, Amann could not succeed in that claim unless it proved that the Commonwealth's breach caused the loss of that chance.

In the Full Court, it appears to have been taken for granted that the breach caused the loss of the chance that the contract would be renewed. At all events, the members of the Full Court did not discuss the matter. They appear to have acted on the assumption that, if the parties contemplated that the contract would probably be renewed, Amann was entitled to have its damages assessed on the basis that it had lost the chance of earning profits under a renewal of the contract. But the contemplation of the parties goes to the issue of remoteness, not causation. Foreseeability is not relevant to the issue of causation in a civil case: Chapman v Hearse (1961) 106 CLR 112 at 122. The assumption made in the Full Court reflects the rule concerning remoteness of damage which is to be found in such cases as Hadley v Baxendale. That rule is an exclusionary rule. The contemplation of the parties marks the boundary of the liability for loss or damage caused by a breach of contract. It is a limit on, and not a ground of, liability. Consequently, the finding of Davies J that future "extensions of the contract were not only in the contemplation of both parties but probable" is not decisive of the issue of causation. The probability of renewal could have no relevance to that issue unless it also be found that the Commonwealth's breach of contract destroyed that probability. Under the issue of causation, the question is not whether the contract was likely to be renewed or whether the parties contemplated its renewal but whether any failure to renew it would be the result of the defendant's breach of contract …

[175] If the Commonwealth's breach of contract caused the loss of the chance of obtaining profits under a renewal or extension of the 1987 contract, it must be because it either prevented Amann from tendering for or effectively destroyed its chance of being awarded that contract. But nothing resulting from the Commonwealth's breach of contract prevented Amann from tendering for any contract offered in September 1990. The breach of contract did not affect Amann's capacity to tender for that contract. The capacity of its aircraft to carry out that contract was unaffected by the breach. Since Amann was entitled to recover damages for any loss arising under the 1987 contract, it would be in no worse financial position when tendering for any 1990 contract than it would have been if [176] there had been no breach. Of course, in the three-year period before any 1990 contract came up for tender, Amann may have elected to sell its aircraft, disband its personnel or abandon the business. But, if it did, any or all of those acts would be the result of a voluntary choice made by Amann. And, unless constrained by the conduct of the wrongdoer, a result which occurs because of the subsequent voluntary act of the plaintiff or a third party is not "caused" by the wrongdoer for the purposes of the common law doctrine of damages.

The present case is different, for example, from a case of a negligently caused injury which has resulted in a plaintiff suffering damage by reason of losing a chance of promotion. In such a case, the injury constrains the employer to reject any application for promotion and is rightly seen as a cause of the loss of the chance of promotion. But nothing in the Commonwealth's breach or anything directly flowing from it could dictate the result of or affect the tendering process for any contract offered in 1990. Even if any tender by Amann was rejected out of hand without any real consideration, it could be safely inferred that the cause of the rejection was not the Commonwealth's breach of contract but its perception of Amann's capacity and reliability.

Accordingly, in my opinion, Amann was not entitled to have its damages assessed on the basis that it should be compensated for the loss of the chance of obtaining profits under any further contracts. Both as a matter of principle and, in any event, on the facts of the case Amann's claim to have its damages assessed on a reliance basis fails. Subject to the discount argument considered below, Amann's loss for the purpose of the principle in Robinson v Harman was the sum of $4 695 563 together with the sum of $256 049 in respect of the security deposit forfeited and the termination expenses incurred.

Discount for the prospect of termination under cl 2.24

[26.115] When Amann accepted the repudiation of the Commonwealth, it was itself in breach of contract. In the Full Court, Davies J held that there was a 20 per cent chance that the contract would have been cancelled pursuant to the provisions of cl 2.24. However, his Honour thought that such a chance should not be taken into account in assessing damages. I agree with his Honour's construction of cl 2.24 and with his reasons for the conclusion that there was a 20 per cent chance that the Secretary would have terminated the contract by reason of Amann's breaches. In my opinion, however, since Amann had only an 80 per cent chance of [177] recovering the sum of $4 695 563 and the sum of $113 000 representing the security deposit, its damages should be reduced accordingly: see Malec v JC Hutton Pty Ltd (1990) 169 CLR 638 at 642–3. Just as in a personal injury case, the plaintiff's damages must be discounted for the general and specific contingencies applicable to his or her case, so in a contract case the plaintiff's damages must be discounted to cover any specific contingencies that may have prevented the plaintiff from recovering all the moneys which it had been promised.

Amann's damages, therefore, are 80 per cent of $4 808 563 ($4 695 563 and $113 000), which equals $3 846 850, together with the sum of $143 049 for termination payments to employees. That makes a total of $3 989 899. In addition, Amann is entitled to interest pursuant to s 51A of the Federal Court of Australia Act 1976 (Cth). The sum of $4 695 563 would have been earned over and not at the beginning of the three-year period of the contract. It is appropriate, therefore, that Amann should receive interest on only one half of 80 per cent of that sum for the period 12 September 1987 to 12 September 1990. Thereafter, it should receive interest on 80 per cent of $4 695 563 to the date of this judgment. It should also receive interest on 80 per cent of the sum of $113 000 (the security deposit) and on all of the sum of $143 049 (the termination payments) from 15 September 1987, the date of the termination of the contract.

The appeal should be allowed …

[GAUDRON J said that because of the uncertainties involved "it would not be possible, applying [the] usual method of valuation to make a reliable estimate of the value of Amann's contractual rights". Her Honour said that there was nothing in McRae to suggest that the defendant bears anything other than an evidentiary onus. In the present case, although the income which Amann would have received had the contract run its course would not have covered its outlay, it was necessary to take into account the value of the planes at the end of the three year period. It was likely that they would have a substantial value which would reflect the Commonwealth's need to contract for future aerial surveillance. That value made it impossible to say that the contract would have been unprofitable and supported the assumption that the value of Amann's contractual rights was no less than the expenditure wasted. Her Honour said that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

EXPECTATION DAMAGES

[26.120] Expectation damages are awarded to compensate a plaintiff for the loss of the benefit he or she expected to gain from performance of a contract. Often this measure is straightforward, for example, a plaintiff will be awarded the profit he or she expected to earn from the transaction.

Damages for breach of an obligation to build or repair

[26.122] In a case where the breach of contract involves defective work, an issue arises of whether the plaintiff should be awarded the difference between the market value of the property and the value it would have had if the contract had been properly performed or the cost of remedying the work. Bellgrove v Eldridge (1954) 90 CLR 613 and Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272; [2009] HCA 8, illustrate the concern shown by courts in such cases genuinely to compensate the plaintiff for his or her expectation loss.

Bellgrove v Eldridge

[26.125] Bellgrove v Eldridge (1954) 90 CLR 613 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: The appellant, a builder, entered into a contract with the respondent to build for her a two-storey "brick house villa" in accordance with certain plans and specifications for the sum of £3,500. The issue before the court concerned the respondent's claim for damages in respect of substantial departures from the specifications in the contract. The trial judge found that the appellant's failure to comply with the building specifications had resulted in grave instability in the building as erected. The trial judge based the respondent's damages on the cost of demolishing and re-erecting the building in accordance with the plans and specifications.]

DIXON CJ, WEBB AND TAYLOR JJ: [616] The first objection to [the finding of the trial judge] was a submission of law advanced by the appellant. This submission assumes the validity of all of his Honour's findings but asserts that there was evidence upon which a finding was not only justifiable but inevitable that the building was of some value, over and above demolition value, at the time of the breach. In particular, it was said, the building as it stood was saleable, at least, to some builders who were prepared to attempt the rectification of the existing defects by methods less drastic than demolition and rebuilding. This being so, it was contended, the proper measure of damages was the difference between the value of the house – and presumably the land upon which it stands – ascertained by reference to the amount which could be obtained for it on such a sale and the value which it would have borne if erected in accordance with the plans and specifications. To support this contention counsel for the respondent referred to the general proposition that damages when awarded should be of such an amount as will put an injured party in the same position as he would have been if he had not sustained the injury for which damages are claimed. Accordingly, it was said, damages should have been assessed by reference to the value of the building as it stands and the value it would have borne if erected in accordance with the plans and specifications since this was the true measure of the respondent's financial loss.

Whilst [617] we readily agree with the general proposition submitted to us and with the remarks of Lord Blackburn in Livingstone v Rawyards Coal Co (1880) 5 App Cas 25 at p 39 which were cited to us, we emphatically disagree with the submission that the application of that proposition or the general principle expounded by his Lordship produces the result contended for in this case. It is true that a difference in the values indicated may, in one sense, represent the respondent's financial loss. But it is not in any real sense so represented. In assessing damages in cases which are concerned with the sale of goods the measure, prima facie, to be applied where defective goods have been tendered and accepted, is the difference between the value of the goods at the time of delivery and the value they would have had if they had conformed to the contract. But in such cases the plaintiff sues for damages for a breach of warranty with respect to marketable commodities and this is in no real sense the position in cases such as the present.

In the present case, the respondent was entitled to have a building erected upon her land in accordance with the contract and the plans and specifications which formed part of it, and her damage is the loss which she has sustained by the failure of the appellant to perform his obligation to her. This loss cannot be measured by comparing the value of the building which has been erected with the value it would have borne if erected in accordance with the contract; her loss can, prima facie, be measured only by ascertaining the amount required to rectify the defects complained of and so give to her the equivalent of a building on her land which is substantially in accordance with the contract.

One or two illustrations are sufficient to show that the prima facie rule for assessing damages for a breach of warranty upon the sale of goods has no application to the present case. Departures from the plans and specifications forming part of a contract for the erection of a building may result in the completion of a building which, whilst differing in some particulars from that contracted for, is no less valuable. For instance, particular rooms in such a building may be finished in one colour instead of quite a different colour as specified. Is the owner in these circumstances without a remedy? In our opinion he is not; he is entitled to the reasonable cost of rectifying the departure or defect so far as that is possible. Subject to a qualification to which we shall refer presently the rule is, we think, correctly stated in Hudson on Building Contracts, 7th ed (1946), p 343.

> The measure of the damages recoverable by the building owner for the breach of a building contract is, it is submitted, the difference between the contract price of the work [618] or building contracted for and the cost of making the work or building conform to the contract, with the addition, in most cases, of the amount of profits or earnings lost by the breach.

Ample support for this proposition is to be found in Thornton v Place (1832) 1 M & Rob 218, 174 ER 74; Chapel v Hickes (1833) 2 C & M 214, 149 ER 738 and H Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee [1916] 1 KB 566. (See also Pearson-Burleigh Ltd v Pioneer Grain Co (1933) 1 DLR 714 and cf Forrest v Scottish County Investment Co Ltd [1915] SC 115 and Hardwick v Lincoln [1946] NZLR 309.)

But the work necessary to remedy defects in a building and so produce conformity with the plans and specifications may, and frequently will, require the removal or demolition of some part of the structure. And it is obvious that the necessary remedial work may call for the removal or demolition of a more or less substantial part of the building. Indeed – and such was held to be the position in the present case – there may well be cases where the only practicable method of producing conformity with plans and specifications is by demolishing the whole of the building and erecting another in its place. In none of these cases is anything more done than that work which is required to achieve conformity and the cost of the work, whether it be necessary to replace only a small part, or a substantial part, or, indeed, the whole of the building is, subject to the qualification which we have already mentioned and to which we shall refer, together with any appropriate consequential damages, the extent of the building owner's loss.

The qualification, however, to which this rule is subject is that, not only must the work undertaken be necessary to produce conformity, but that also, it must be a reasonable course to adopt. No one would doubt that where pursuant to a building contract calling for the erection of a house with cement rendered external walls of second-hand bricks, the builder has constructed the walls of new bricks of first quality the owner would not be entitled to the cost of demolishing the walls and re-erecting them in second-hand bricks. In such circumstances the work of demolition and re-erection would be quite unreasonable or it would, to use a term current in the United States, constitute "economic waste". (See Restatement of the Law of Contracts (1932) [346].) We prefer, however, to think that the building owner's right to undertake remedial works at the expense of a builder is not subject to any limit other than is to be found in the expressions "necessary" and "reasonable", for the expression "economic waste" appears [619] to us to go too far and would deny to a building owner the right to demolish a structure which, though satisfactory as a structure of a particular type, is quite different in character from that called for by the contract.

Many examples may, of course, be given of remedial work, which though necessary to produce conformity would not constitute a reasonable method of dealing with the situation and in such cases the true measure of the building owner's loss will be the diminution in value, if any, produced by the departure from the plans and specifications or by the defective workmanship or materials.

As to what remedial work is both "necessary" and "reasonable" in any particular case is a question of fact. But the question whether demolition and re-erection is a reasonable method of remedying defects does not arise when defective foundations seriously threaten the stability of a house and when the threat can be removed only by such a course. That work, in such circumstances, is obviously reasonable and in our opinion, may be undertaken at the expense of the builder.

As we have already said the appellant does not seek to challenge the finding of the learned trial judge that the existing foundations are such as to threaten the stability of the building and the question which arises in this case is therefore whether demolition and rebuilding is the only practicable method of dealing with the situation that has arisen. The learned trial judge thought it was and after hearing and considering the arguments on this appeal we agree with him. There was evidence from some witnesses in the case that stability might be assured by under-pinning the existing foundation, but Mr Ahearn, an architect, upon whose evidence the learned trial judge appears to have been prepared to rely, denied that this process, as described by earlier witnesses and involving the retention of the existing foundations, would constitute any remedy. He said that he would not consider that course at all. Apparently he did not consider such a course practical. He did, however, appear to concede that a practical solution would be "to chop out the existing footings and put in new". But on a careful reading of Mr Ahearn's evidence we have come to the conclusion that he did not advocate the piecemeal replacement of the foundations as a practical solution and that the extent of his apparent concession was merely that, if under-pinning of any kind should be decided upon, the whole of the foundations should be replaced. Any other form of under-pinning he regarded as useless. He then went on to say that the replacement of the foundations would present quite a problem from a practical point of view, that it could be done only in a piecemeal fashion by [620] removing and replacing three-foot sections at a time, and that "you would finish up not having a uniform run of footings right throughout your building". Mr Ahearn did not further enlarge upon the difficulties of this process, nor upon the question whether he regarded it as a satisfactory remedy for the present serious defects, but it is clear that the learned trial judge was satisfied that under-pinning or the replacement of the existing foundations in such a manner would constitute but a doubtful remedy. Not only do we think that his Honour's conclusion was justified, but after reading the evidence and considering the submissions of counsel we are satisfied that under-pinning by the piecemeal replacement of the foundations would, at the very best, constitute but a doubtful remedy. To give to the respondent the cost of a doubtful remedy would by no means adequately compensate her, for the employment of such a remedy could not in any sense be regarded as ensuring to her the equivalent of a substantial performance by the appellant of his contractual obligations.

It was suggested during the course of argument that if the respondent retains her present judgment and it is satisfied, she may or may not demolish the existing house and re-erect another. If she does not, it is said, she will still have a house together with the cost of erecting another one. To our mind this circumstance is quite immaterial and is but one variation of a feature which so often presents itself in the assessment of damages in cases where they must be assessed once and for all.

For the reasons which we have given we are of the opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

Tabcorp Holdings v Bowen Investments

[26.130] Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272; [2009] HCA 8 (Supreme Court of New South Wales Court of Appeal) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales (footnotes omitted).

[FACTS: The facts are summarised in the judgment.]

FRENCH CJ, GUMMOW, HEYDON, CRENNAN AND KIEFEL JJ: [1] On Monday 14 July 1997, Mrs Maria Bergamin arrived at an office building at 5 Bowen Crescent, Melbourne. There she found that the foyer of the building had been badly damaged. A glass and stone partition, timber panelling and stone floor tiles had been removed. She was shocked and dismayed to see what remained of the floor stone work being jack hammered. A large bin was filled with the debris of the foyer. This destruction had been carried out by a tenant, Tabcorp Holdings Ltd ("the Tenant"), the appellant in this appeal.

[2] Why was Mrs Bergamin shocked and dismayed? She was a director of the respondent, Bowen Investments Pty Ltd ("the Landlord"), a company which owned the building. She had taken particular care over and interest in the construction of the foyer. It was of high quality. It was made of special materials – San Francisco Green granite, Canberra York Grey granite, and sequence-matched crown-cut American cherry. The construction of the foyer had been completed less than six months earlier. The Tenant had taken possession under a lease granted by the Landlord less than six months earlier. The lease contained a covenant, cl 2.13, forbidding the Tenant to alter the premises without the prior written approval of the Landlord. Mrs Bergamin had on Thursday 10 July 1997 arranged for the Tenant to be told that the Landlord did not consent to any alteration to the foyer. Mrs Bergamin had informed the Tenant in writing on Friday 11 July 1997 that the Landlord could not consent until the Tenant's proposed alterations were examined at a site meeting at 11am on Monday 14 July 1997. It was when Mrs Bergamin arrived at 10.45am on 14 July 1997 in order to attend that site meeting that she observed the destruction which had taken place and which was continuing to take place. The trial judge specifically found that the Tenant was well aware that written consent from the Landlord to do what the Tenant had done was needed, and that that consent did not exist.

[3] Mrs Bergamin protested about what had happened, but the Tenant continued to alter the foyer and substitute a new foyer until the process was complete on 31 August 1997.

[4] The trial judge's description of the Tenant's conduct as involving "contumelious disregard" for the Landlord's rights was not hyperbolic. Nor has it been challenged.

[5] The Landlord pursued claims against the Tenant in the Federal Court of Australia based on many causes of action. Most of them were rejected by the trial judge (Tracey J) for reasons with which the Landlord does not now cavil. The only claim which the trial judge upheld was a claim for common law damages in relation to two breaches by the Tenant of cl 2.13: the destruction of the old foyer up to 14 July 1997, and the construction of a new foyer up to 31 August 1997. He gave judgment for the Landlord in the sum of $34,820: most of that figure was made up of the difference between the value of the property with the old foyer and the value of the property with the new foyer constructed by the Tenant. The Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia increased the judgment sum to $1.38m. That sum comprised $580,000 as the cost of restoring the foyer to its original condition and $800,000 for loss of rent while that restoration was taking place. In this appeal the Tenant seeks restoration of the trial judge's figure. The appeal should be dismissed for the following reasons.

The lease

[6] The lease was executed on 23 December 1996. It was for a term of 10 years commencing on 1 February 1997. An option to renew for five years until 2012 was exercised: the new lease began on 1 February 2006 and will expire on 31 January 2012. There is a further option to renew for five years until 2017.

[7] By cl 2.13, the Tenant covenanted:

> Not without the written approval of the Landlord first obtained (which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld or delayed) to make or permit to be made any substantial alteration or addition to the Demised Premises.

The Tenant also covenanted, by cl 2.10, to keep the premises in repair; by cl 2.11, to yield up the premises on the determination of the lease in good repair; and, by cl 2.12.4, to make good any breakage or damage.

The trial judge

[8] The trial judge held that it would be appropriate to award damages for breach of cl 2.13 based on reinstatement costs only "in a relatively narrow range of cases where a tenant has so damaged or modified premises that they are unlettable at the conclusion [of] the lease". In this regard he referred to Joyner v Week [1891] 2 QB 31 a case not cited by the parties. He went on to say that normally, however, "reinstatement costs will not be awarded unless there exists some special interest in reinstatement arising from a radical change to the usage to which the property can be put following renovations by the tenant". He then accepted expert evidence to the effect that whether the lease was to end in 2012 or 2017, the Tenant's changes to the foyer would occasion very little diminution in the value of the building. Accordingly he awarded only $34,820 in damages.

The Full Court

[9] According to Rares J, the arguments of the Landlord in the Full Court "were radically different from those which the Court identified and upon which the [Landlord] ultimately succeeded". The majority of the Full Court (Finkelstein and Gordon JJ) held:

> There can be no meaningful distinction between a full repair covenant and clause 2.13, at least as regards the extent to which the clause prohibits alterations or additions without approval. This is because relevantly the obligations are the same. Accordingly damages for breach of clause 2.13 are to be assessed on the same basis as for breach of a repair covenant.

They therefore saw as applicable authorities on repair covenants, of which they described cl 2.10 as an example. And they considered that the authorities on repair covenants held that the general rule for assessing damages for breach of a covenant by a lessee to deliver up the demised premises in repair is the cost of putting the premises into the state of repair required by the covenant. They described this rule as the rule in Joyner v Weeks. In examining whether the particular circumstances of the case should cause that "prima facie method" of calculating loss to be displaced, they said that but for a special condition in Heads of Agreement made on 15 May 2006, it would have been appropriate to take into account the fact of the renewal of the lease in 2007, the possibility that it might not end until 2017 and the lack of damage to the reversion, and thus uphold the trial judge's conclusion. But they said:

> [I]n this case the new lease and its consequences on possession must be left out of account because that is what the special condition requires. This means that damages must be assessed in an artificial environment — a notional world in which the lease expired by effluxion of time on 31 January 2007.

Hence they held that the Tenant had failed to displace the "prima facie method". Thus the majority awarded damages of $1.38m, based on the cost of reinstatement approach.

[10] Rares J took a different approach. He said that cll 2.10-2.12 "ensured that if structural alterations were made in breach of cl 2.13, the tenant had to make good its unauthorised changes when the term came to an end." For that reason, and applying Joyner v Weeks, he held that the correct basis for damages was the cost of reinstatement, not diminution in value of the land, but he would have allowed the parties to address further on relief.

The Tenant's complaints

[11] The Tenant made numerous complaints about the reasoning of the Full Court. It is convenient to put them on one side for the moment, because there is one short ground on which the Full Court's orders are plainly to be supported. It was not a ground squarely relied upon below, but it was explicitly raised by members of the bench in this Court and evidence could not have been given at the trial which by any possibility could have prevented the point from succeeding.

The role of cl 2.13

[12] At trial, the Landlord's only claim for damages for breach of contract was based on an alleged breach of cl 2.13. Accordingly, damages are to be assessed on that basis. Clause 2.13 is an express negative covenant. It serves a function of considerable practical utility in relation to the Landlord's capacity to protect its legitimate interest in preserving the physical character of the premises leased. That function is: provided the Landlord learned of a threat to make a substantial alteration to the premises without its written consent, a speedy application could be made for an interlocutory negative injunction, an appeal could be made to the modern understanding of the principles classically stated by Lord Cairns LC in Doherty v Allman (1878) 3 App Cas 709 at 2, and the status quo could readily be preserved. The clandestine conduct of the Tenant made it impossible for the Landlord to apply for an interlocutory negative injunction, but that does not detract from that aspect of cl 2.13 in assessing damages for its breach.

[13] Underlying the Tenant's submission that the appropriate measure of damages was the diminution in value of the reversion was an assumption that anyone who enters into a contract is at complete liberty to break it provided damages adequate to compensate the innocent party are paid. It is an assumption which at least one distinguished mind has shared. It has been dignified as "the doctrine of efficient breach". It led, in the Landlord's submission, to an attempt "arrogantly [to] impose a form of 'economic rationalism'" on the unwilling Landlord. The assumption underlying the Tenant's submission takes no account of the existence of equitable remedies, like decrees of specific performance and injunction, which ensure or encourage the performance of contracts rather than the payment of damages for breach. It is an assumption which underrates the extent to which those remedies are available. However, even if the assumption were correct it would not assist the Tenant. The Tenant's submission misunderstands the common law in relation to damages for breach of contract. The "ruling principle", confirmed in this Court on numerous occasions, with respect to damages at common law for breach of contract is that stated by Parke B in Robinson v Harman [1848] EngR 135; (1848) 1 Exch 850 at 855; 154 ER 363 at 365:

> The rule of the common law is, that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed.

Oliver J was correct to say in Radford v De Froberville (1848) 1 Exch 850 at 855; 154 ER 363 at 365 that the words "the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed" do not mean "as good a financial position as if the contract had been performed" (emphasis added). In some circumstances putting the innocent party into "the same situation … as if the contract had been performed" will coincide with placing the party into the same financial situation. Thus, in the case of the supply of defective goods, the prima facie measure of damages is the difference in value between the contract goods and the goods supplied. But as Staughton LJ explained in Ruxley Electronics Ltd v Forsyth [1994] 1 WLR 650 at 655; [1994] 3 All ER 801 at 806 such a measure of damages seeks only to reflect the financial consequences of a notional transaction whereby the buyer sells the defective goods on the market and purchases the contract goods. The buyer is thus placed in the "same situation … as if the contract had been performed", with the loss being the difference in market value. However, in cases where the contract is not for the sale of marketable commodities, selling the defective item and purchasing an item corresponding with the contract is not possible. In such cases, diminution in value damages will not restore the innocent party to the "same situation … as if the contract had been performed".

[14] In circumstances like the present, where the relevant covenant is in the form of cl 2.13, it is not the case that, in Oliver J's words [1977] 1 WLR 1262 at 1273; [1978] 1 All ER 33 at 44:

> the disappointment of the plaintiff's hopes and expectations from the contract becomes a relevant consideration only so far as it is measurable either by some deterioration of the plaintiff's financial situation or by some failure to obtain an amelioration of his financial situation.

To reason otherwise is to undermine a fundamental postulate inherent in cl 2.13.

[15] Similar thinking underlies a statement made by Dixon CJ, Webb and Taylor JJ in Bellgrove v Eldridge. A builder who had built a house which, in breach of contract, contained defective concrete and mortar, contended that the measure of damages was limited to diminution in value and did not extend to costs of rectification. Their Honours said (1954) 90 CLR 613 at 617 (emphasis in original):

> In the present case, the respondent was entitled to have a building erected upon her land in accordance with the contract and the plans and specifications which formed part of it, and > her damage is the loss which she has sustained by the failure of the appellant to perform his obligation to her. This loss cannot be measured by comparing the value of the building which has been erected with the value it would have borne if erected in accordance with the contract; her loss can, prima facie, be measured only by ascertaining the amount required to rectify the defects complained of and so give to her the equivalent of a building on her land which is substantially in accordance with the contract.

So here, the Landlord was contractually entitled to the preservation of the premises without alterations not consented to; its measure of damages is the loss sustained by the failure of the Tenant to perform that obligation; and that loss is the cost of restoring the premises to the condition in which they would have been if the obligation had not been breached.

[16] The Tenant relied heavily on findings by the trial judge that the Landlord had erected and leased the building for commercial purposes and that it was an investment property. The Tenant contended that the Landlord had never run a case that it valued the foyer for its aesthetic qualities as distinct from its having "pulling power" as a "leasing tool", and it relied on the trial judge's implicit finding, based on the resolution of conflicting expert evidence, that the old foyer was no more effective as a leasing tool than the new foyer. The answer to these submissions was put thus by Oliver J in Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 WLR 1262 at 1270; [1978] 1 All ER 33 at 42:

> Now, it may be that, viewed objectively, it is not to the plaintiff's financial advantage to be supplied with the article or service which he has stipulated. It may be that another person might say that what the plaintiff has stipulated for will not serve his commercial interests so well as some other scheme or course of action. And that may be quite right. But that, surely, must be for the plaintiff to judge. Pacta sunt servanda. If he contracts for the supply of that which he thinks serves his interests — be they commercial, aesthetic or merely eccentric — then if that which is contracted for is not supplied by the other contracting party I do not see why, in principle, he should not be compensated by being provided with the cost of supplying it through someone else or in a different way, subject to the proviso, of course, that he is seeking compensation for a genuine loss and not merely using a technical breach to secure an uncovenanted profit.

In Ruxley Electronics and Construction Ltd v Forsyth the latter half of the passage was quoted with approval by Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle [1996] AC 344 at 358 (Lords Keith of Kinkel and Bridge of Harwich concurring) and the passage was referred to with approval by Lord Mustill [1996] 1 AC 344 at 360 (Lords Keith of Kinkel and Bridge of Harwich concurring).

[17] The Tenant stressed that in Bellgrove v Eldridge this Court pointed out that there was a qualification to the rule it stated in regard to damages recoverable by a building owner for the breach of a building contract. "The qualification … is that, not only must the work undertaken be necessary to produce conformity, but that also, it must be a reasonable course to adopt." (1954) 90 CLR 613 at 618 The example which the Court gave of unreasonableness was the following (1954) 90 CLR 613 at 618:

> No one would doubt that where pursuant to a building contract calling for the erection of a house with cement rendered external walls of second-hand bricks, the builder has constructed the walls of new bricks of first quality the owner would not be entitled to the cost of demolishing the walls and re-erecting them in second-hand bricks.

That tends to indicate that the test of "unreasonableness" is only to be satisfied by fairly exceptional circumstances. The example given by the Court aligns closely with what Oliver J said in Radford v De Froberville, that is, that the diminution in value measure of damages will only apply where the innocent party is "merely using a technical breach to secure an uncovenanted profit". It is also important to note that the "reasonableness" exception was not found to exist in Bellgrove v Eldridge. Nothing in the reasoning in that case suggested that where the reasoning is applied to the present circumstances, the course which the Landlord proposed is unnecessary or unreasonable.

[18] As part of the same submission, the Tenant relied on Ruxley Electronics and Construction Ltd v Forsyth [1996] AC 344. The House of Lords there held in a building case that where the expenditure necessary to rectify the defect in the building was out of all proportion to the benefit to be obtained the appropriate measure of damages was not the cost of reinstatement but the diminution in the value of the work occasioned by the breach, even if that would result in a nominal award. The House rejected a claim for £21,560 damages for reconstructing a swimming pool that was 1 foot 6 inches too shallow. The House saw the following matters as indicating that the cost of reconstruction was not recoverable [1996] 1 AC 344 at 354-355 per Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle:

> The trial judge made the following findings which are relevant to this appeal: (1) the pool as constructed was perfectly safe to dive into; (2) there was no evidence that the shortfall in depth had decreased the value of the pool; (3) the only practicable method of achieving a pool of the required depth would be to demolish the existing pool and reconstruct a new one at a cost of £21,560; (4) he was not satisfied that the respondent intended to build a new pool at such a cost; (5) in addition such cost would be wholly disproportionate to the disadvantage of having a pool of a depth of only 6 feet as opposed to 7 feet 6 inches and it would therefore be unreasonable to carry out the works; and (6) that the respondent was entitled to damages for loss of amenity in the sum of £2,500.

Their Lordships quoted and referred to various passages in Bellgrove v Eldridge and Radford v De Froberville without dissent. Although they reversed the Court of Appeal, in which the leading judgment, that of Staughton LJ (Ruxley Electronics & Construction Ltd v Forsyth [1994] 1 WLR 650; [1994] 3 All ER 801), quoted various passages from Radford v De Froberville (including the last sentence of the one set out above at [16]), they did not disagree with what those cases said as a matter of principle, and seemed to consider that their decision was consistent with the principles stated by Oliver J. The result at which their Lordships arrived is on one view inconsistent with those principles, but for present purposes it is sufficient to say that the facts of Ruxley Electronics and Construction Ltd v Forsyth, which their Lordships evidently saw as quite exceptional, are plainly distinguishable from those of the present appeal.

[19] Further, the Landlord correctly submitted that the Tenant's submission misconstrued what this Court said in Bellgrove v Eldridge. The "qualification" referred to in the passage quoted above (see [17]) that the "work undertaken be necessary to produce conformity" meant, in that case, apt to conform with the plans and specifications which had not been conformed with. Applied to this case, the expression "necessary to produce conformity" means "apt to bring about conformity between the foyer as it would become after the damages had been spent in rebuilding it and the foyer as it was at the start of the lease". And the Landlord also correctly submitted that the requirement of reasonableness did not mean that any excess over the amount recoverable on a diminution in value was unreasonable. The Tenant's submissions rested on a loose principle of "reasonableness" which would radically undercut the bargain which the innocent party had contracted for and make it very difficult to determine in any particular case on what basis damages would be assessed. That principle should not be accepted.

[20] If the benefit of the covenant in cl 2.13 were to be secured to the Landlord, it is necessary that reinstatement damages be paid, and it is not unreasonable for the Landlord to insist on their payment.

[21] For these reasons the orders of the Full Court are upheld. It is thus not necessary either to set out, or to consider the merits of, the Tenant's complaints, because those complaints do not touch upon the validity of these reasons. It is desirable, however, to note briefly three matters which arose in argument.

The Landlord's case under Lord Cairns' Act (Not pursued) …

Betterment discount?

[24] In theory, if the Landlord employs the damages (with interest earned) after the lease expires in 2012 or 2017 on rebuilding the foyer, it would be better off than it would have been if cl 2.13 had not been breached. If it had not been breached, the Landlord would have retaken possession of the foyer which had been subjected to 15 or 20 years' wear and tear so that, as the trial judge found, the foyer would probably have to be refurbished.

[25] Had the Tenant requested a discount in the damages awarded against it to take account of this "betterment" problem, its application, if backed by appropriate evidence, may have had merit. But although the matter was raised by the Landlord below, the Tenant made no such application at any of the three levels of hearing: its position was that no reinstatement damages were awardable, and it did not contend that if any were awardable they should be discounted to allow for betterment. Accordingly nothing more need be said on the subject.

Date of assessment of damages

[26] Any reinstatement of the foyer by the Landlord would not take place until 2012 or 2017. Sometimes when damages are awarded in relation to loss arising from the need to spend money in future or from the suffering of a future incapacity, they are awarded on the basis of an estimate as to the amount required at a future date, and discounted down to present value, leaving the plaintiff to invest the damages and employ the increased sum at a future date. A second approach is to assess damages for breach of covenant as at the date of breach. In that event it would be normal to order that the damages carry interest from the date of breach. In this case a third approach was adopted. The damages figures selected by the Full Court were based on the Landlord's claim. The precise quantum of that claim was uncontroversial once reinstatement was accepted as the basis. The claim does not appear to have been based on 1997 costs, but on costs around the time of the trial, partly 2004 costs and partly 2006 costs. In other cases there may be controversies in relation to the date of assessment. But in the circumstances of this case, the potential difficulties can be put aside because the Tenant took no point about them in relation to the claim for damages at common law for breach of cl 2.13.

Orders

[22] The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

RELIANCE DAMAGES

[26.135] In cases where a plaintiff is unable to prove the value of the benefit, he or she expected to gain from performance of the contract, courts have held that the plaintiff may instead be able to recover damages compensating the plaintiff for expenditure incurred in reasonable reliance on the contract being performed. This measure of damages is discussed and illustrated in McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377 and Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64, extracted at [26.15].

DAMAGES FOR LOSS OF A CHANCE

[26.140] Courts have been prepared to award damages compensating a plaintiff for the loss of a chance or an opportunity of obtaining a benefit. The reason for such an award is that even a chance may be of value. Damages for loss of a chance are discussed in Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64, extracted at [26.15]. The award is illustrated in Howe v Teefy (1927) 27 SR (NSW) 301.

Howe v Teefy

[26.145] Howe v Teefy (1927) 27 SR (NSW) 301 (Supreme Court of New South Wales Full Court).

[FACTS: The defendant leased a racehorse to the plaintiff, who was a trainer, for a period of three years. After about three months, the defendant removed the horse from the plaintiff without justification. The plaintiff brought an action for, inter alia, breach of contract. The plaintiff claimed damages for the loss of opportunity to win prizes with the horse, to win bets placed by himself on the horse and to make profits from supplying information to other people. The jury awarded the plaintiff £250 in damages. The defendant appealed.]

STREET CJ: [304] This appeal is brought upon the ground that [the jury] should have been directed (1) that the prospective winnings of the plaintiff from bets and stable commissions were too remote and too contingent to be recovered as damages, and (2) that there was no evidence on which they could assess any such winnings and that only nominal damages should have been awarded.

Assuming that the damages claimed are capable of assessment, I do not think that it can be said that they are too remote. The determination of that question depends upon whether they were within the contemplation of both parties, that is whether both parties were aware of the circumstances with a view to which the plaintiff was leasing the horse. The sole object of the agreement was to give him a chance of making money by training and racing the horse, and what is complained of is that it was taken from him and that he was deprived of that chance. Nor does the fact that his opportunities of making money depended upon contingencies, including the volition of other people, suffice to render the damages for the defendant's breach of contract incapable of assessment. That was definitely decided by the Court of Appeal in Chaplin v Hicks ([1911] 2 KB 786). In that case the facts were that the defendant initiated a competition in a newspaper, by means of which [305] twelve women were to be selected out of those who sent in their photographs for the purpose of competing, and were to be given theatrical engagements. A large number of women, including the plaintiff, sent in their photographs, and, as the result of the system of voting adopted, she became one of fifty left in from among whom the defendant was to make his selection of the twelve who were to receive the promised appointments. The defendant wrote to her asking her to call and see him at a specified time, but the letter reached her too late to enable her to do so. She was not one of those selected, and she brought an action to recover damages on the ground that by reason of the defendant's breach of contract she had lost the chance of selection for an engagement. The jury found that he did not take reasonable means to give her an opportunity of presenting herself for selection, and assessed the damages at £100. Fletcher Moulton, LJ (as he then was) said (at 793, 794)

> Mr McCardie does not deny that there is a contract, nor that its terms [are] as the plaintiff alleges them to be, nor that it is enforceable, but he contends that the plaintiff can only recover nominal damages, say one shilling. To start with he puts it thus: where the expectation of the plaintiff depends on a contingency, only nominal damages are recoverable. Upon examination, this principle is obviously much too wide; everything that can happen in the future depends on a contingency, and such a principle would deprive a plaintiff of anything beyond nominal damages for a breach of contract where the damages could not be assessed with mathematical accuracy …

[306] The presence of contingencies, then, even when the volition of a third person comes into the matter, does not render the damages incapable of assessment though it may make the calculation of the pecuniary loss sustained incapable of being carried out with certainty or precision. The question in every case is has there been any actual loss resulting from the breach of contract complained of. There may be cases where it would be impossible to say that any assessable loss had resulted from a breach of contract, but, short of that, if a plaintiff has been deprived of something which has a monetary value, a jury is not relieved from the duty of assessing the loss merely because the calculation is a difficult one or because the circumstances do not admit of the damages being assessed with certainty. In Chaplin v Hicks (ante) Vaughan Williams LJ, speaking of the rule as to the measure of damages in the case of a breach of a contract for the delivery of goods, said (at 792):

> Sometimes, however, there is no market for the particular class of goods; but no one has ever suggested that, because there is no market, there are no damages. In such a case the jury must do the best they can, and it may be that the amount of their verdict will really be a matter of guesswork. But the fact that damages cannot be assessed with certainty does not relieve the wrongdoer of the necessity of paying damages for his breach of contract.

and Fletcher Moulton LJ, said (at 795)

I think that, where it is clear that there has been actual loss resulting from the breach of contract, which it is difficult to estimate in money, it is for the jury to do their best to estimate: it is not necessary that there should be an absolute measure of damages in each case. There are no doubt well settled rules as to the measure of damages in certain cases, but such accepted rules are only applicable where the breach is one that frequently occurs.

The test in every case is, as I say, whether the plaintiff was possessed of something which had a monetary value, and of which he was deprived by the defendant's breach of contract. In Chaplin v Hicks it was held that the right which the plaintiff had to belong to the limited class of competitors – the [307] fifty from whom the final twelve were to be drawn – was something of value, and that it was for the jury to estimate the pecuniary value of the loss which she had sustained in being deprived of that right. "It is true" said Vaughan Williams LJ (at 793) "that no market can be said to exist. None of the fifty competitors could have gone into the market and sold her right; her right was a personal right and incapable of transfer. But a jury might well take the view that such a right, if it could have been transferred, would have been of such value that everyone would recognise that a good price could be obtained for it."

In the present case the question is whether the plaintiff, by having the horse wrongfully taken out of his possession sustained any loss which had a monetary value and which he was entitled to have estimated by a jury. I think that it is clear that he was deprived of something which was of value. The injury which he sustained was the deprivation of his right under his agreement to train and race the horse, and make what profit he could out of doing so. Can it be said that that was a right which had no monetary value, and which no one would give money to possess? In Chaplin v Hicks the plaintiff had paid nothing to become a competitor, but she recovered damages for the breach of contract complained of. In this case the plaintiff agreed to pay a substantial price under his contract for the right to the advantages to be got from training and racing the horse, and he was afterwards deprived of his right by the defendant's breach of contract. How can it be said then that that right was incapable of estimation in money, and that the assessment of damages was not a matter for the jury? The calculation which they had to make was not how much he would probably have made in the shape of profit out of his use of the horse, but how much his chance of making that profit, by having the use of the horse, was worth in money. He was willing to pay for the right when he entered into the agreement, and, though the subsequent failure of the horse to win races was an element to be taken into consideration in calculating the value of the chance or right of which he was deprived, I do not think that it can be said that in being deprived of that right he did not suffer an injury which was capable of being calcu[308]lated in money. I think that he did, and I think that the jury's award cannot be interfered with.

Appeal dismissed.

[26.150] Note

Damages for loss of a chance may also be awarded for the loss of a commercial opportunity. See, for example, Schilling v Kidd Garrett Ltd [1977] 1 NZLR 243 (loss of opportunities in relation to an agency for the sale of imported goods); Sellars v Adelaide Petroleum NL

(1994) 179 CLR 332 (loss of a commercial opportunity to bargain), extracted at [33.190]; Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64, extracted at [26.15].

GAINS-BASED DAMAGES

[26.155] There is considerable academic debate about the possibility of awarding damages which, rather than compensating the plaintiff, are based on the gain made by the defendant in breaching the contract. There are two kinds of gains-based damages: restitutionary damages and disgorgement or account of profit damages. Neither category of damages has been recognised in Australia. They are established in England, although the line of cases that previously were commonly treated as involving restitutionary damages have recently been characterised by the Supreme Court as based on a category of compensationary damages, described as user or negotiation damages: see One Step (Support) Ltd v Morris-Garner [2018] UKSC 20; [2018] 2 WLR 1353; Prudential Assurance Co Ltd v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2018] UKSC 39; [2018] 3 WLR 652; Lloyd v Google LLC [2018] EWHC 2599 (QB).

Disgorgement damages require the defendant to account for any profit made by reason of his or her breach (see further Edelman, Gain-Based Damages: Contract, Tort, Equity and Intellectual Property (Hart Publishing, Oxford, 2002); Barnett, Accounting for Profit for Breach of Contract: Theory and Practice (Hart Publishing, Oxford, 2012)). The following extracts illustrate the different responses to these measures of damages taken in England by the House of Lords and in Australia by the Federal Court.

Attorney-General v Blake

[26.160] Attorney-General v Blake [2001] 1 AC 268 (House of Lords) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: The defendant, Blake, was a former member of the Secret Intelligence Service (SIS). In 1944, Blake signed an undertaking not to divulge any official information gained as a result of his employment. Between 1951 and 1960, he disclosed valuable secret information to the Soviet Union.

In 1961, Blake was convicted of spying and sentenced to 42 years' imprisonment, but in 1966 he escaped and went to live in Moscow. In 1989, Blake wrote an autobiography, substantial parts of which were based on information he had acquired in the course of his duties as an SIS officer. By s 1(1) of the Official Secrets Act 1989 (UK), it was an offence for a person who had been a member of the intelligence services without lawful authority to disclose any information relating to intelligence which was in his possession by virtue of his position as a member of those services. Blake entered into a publishing contract with a publisher under which he was to receive an advance of £50,000, a further £50,000 on delivery of the final manuscript and £50,000 on publication. The Crown had no knowledge of the book until its publication was announced in the press. After Blake had already received some £60,000, the Attorney-General brought a private law action against Blake, claiming damages for breach of fiduciary duty and payment of all moneys received and to be received by him from the publisher.

The trial judge dismissed the action on the grounds that the lifelong duty owed by members of the security services not to disclose secret or confidential information acquired during the course of their employment did not extend to information no longer secret or confidential and the disclosure of which would not damage the national interest, that Blake had not expressly contracted not to publish any information relating to the intelligence service without the Crown's prior approval, nor could such an equitable obligation be implied, and that the breaches of s 1(1) of the 1989 Act did not establish any breach of duty under the civil law for which the civil remedies sought could be claimed. The Attorney-General appealed, raising issues of public law and claiming an injunction to restrain the defendant from receiving any payment or other benefit resulting from his criminal conduct. The Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal on the private law issues. The Court held that while Blake was in breach of the undertaking he signed when he joined the service of the Crown and therefore in breach of contract, since the Crown could not establish loss, it was entitled to no more than nominal damages. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on the public law issues.

Blake appealed to the House of Lords. (Blake did not personally appear in court but was represented by counsel and solicitors acting pro bono.) The House of Lords held that the Court of Appeal had acted outside its jurisdiction in granting the injunction on public law grounds.]
LORD NICHOLLS OF BIRKENHEAD:

The private law claim

… [277] On 16 August 1944 Blake signed an Official Secrets Act declaration. This declaration included an undertaking:

> … I undertake not to divulge any official information gained by me as a result of my employment, either in the press or in book form. I also understand that these provisions apply not only during the period of service but also after employment has ceased.

This undertaking was contractually binding. Had Blake not signed it he would not have been employed. By submitting his manuscript for publication without first obtaining clearance Blake committed a breach of this undertaking. The Court of Appeal suggested that the Crown might have a private law claim to "restitutionary damages for breach of contract", and invited submissions on this issue. The Attorney-General decided that the Crown did not wish to advance argument on this point in the Court of Appeal. The Attorney-General, however, wished to keep the point open for a higher court. The Court of Appeal expressed the view, necessarily tentative in the circumstances, that the law of contract would be seriously defective if the court were unable to award restitutionary damages for breach of contract. The law is now sufficiently mature to recognise a restitutionary claim for profits made from a breach of contract in appropriate situations. These include cases of "skimped" performance, and cases where the defendant obtained his profit by doing "the very thing" he contracted not to do. The present case fell into the latter category: Blake earned his profit by doing the very thing he had promised not to do.

This matter was pursued in your Lordships' House. Prompted by an invitation from your Lordships, the Attorney-General advanced an argument that restitutionary principles ought to operate to enable the Crown to recover from Blake his profits arising from his breach of contract. It will be convenient to consider this private law claim first.

This is a subject on which there is a surprising dearth of judicial decision. By way of contrast, over the last 20 years there has been no lack of academic writing. This includes valuable comment on the Court of Appeal dicta in the [278] present case: by Janet O'Sullivan, Reflections on the Role of Restitutionary Damages to Protect Contractual Expectations (to be published), and Catherine Mitchell, "Remedial Inadequacy in Contract and the Role of Restitutionary Damages" (1999) 15 JCL 133. Most writers have favoured the view that in some circumstances the innocent party to a breach of contract should be able to compel the defendant to disgorge the profits he obtained from his breach of contract. However, there is a noticeable absence of any consensus on what are the circumstances in which this remedy should be available. Professor Burrows has described this as a devilishly difficult topic: see "No Restitutionary Damages for Breach of Contract" [1993] LMCLQ 453. The broad proposition that a wrongdoer should not be allowed to profit from his wrong has an obvious attraction. The corollary is that the person wronged may recover the amount of this profit when he has suffered no financially measurable loss. As Glidewell LJ observed in Halifax Building Society v Thomas [1996] Ch 217, 229, the corollary is not so obviously persuasive. In these choppy waters the common law and equity steered different courses. The effects of this are still being felt …

Breach of contract

[26.165] [282] Against this background I turn to consider the remedies available for breaches of contract. The basic remedy is an award of damages. In the much quoted words of Baron Parke, the rule of the common law is that where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same position as if the contract had been performed: Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Exch 850, 855. Leaving aside the anomalous exception of punitive damages, damages are compensatory. That is axiomatic. It is equally well established that an award of damages, assessed by reference to financial loss, is not always "adequate" as a remedy for a breach of contract. The law recognises that a party to a contract may have an interest in performance which is not readily measurable in terms of money. On breach the innocent party suffers a loss. He fails to obtain the benefit promised by the other party to the contract. To him the loss may be as important as financially measurable loss, or more so. An award of damages, assessed by reference to financial loss, will not recompense him properly. For him a financially assessed measure of damages is inadequate.

The classic example of this type of case, as every law student knows, is a contract for the sale of land. The buyer of a house may be attracted by features which have little or no impact on the value of the house. An award of damages, based on strictly financial criteria, would fail to recompense a disappointed buyer for this head of loss. The primary response of the law to this type of case is to ensure, if possible, that the contract is performed in accordance with its terms. The court may make orders compelling the party who has committed a breach of contract, or is threatening to do so, to carry out his contractual obligations. To this end the court has wide powers to grant injunctive relief. The court will, for instance, readily make orders for the specific performance of contracts for the sale of land, and sometimes it will do so in respect of contracts for the sale of goods. In Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58 the court made an order for the specific performance of a contract to make payments of money to a third party. The law recognised that the innocent party to the breach of contract had a legitimate interest in having the contract performed even though he himself would suffer no financial loss from its breach. Likewise, the court will compel the observance of negative obligations by granting injunctions. This may include a mandatory order to undo an existing breach, as where the court orders the defendant to pull down building works carried out in breach of covenant.

All this is trite law. In practice, these specific remedies go a long way towards providing suitable protection for innocent parties who will suffer loss from breaches of contract which are not adequately remediable by an award of damages. But these remedies are not always available. For instance, confidential information may be published in breach of a non-disclosure agreement before the innocent party has time to apply to the court for urgent relief. Then the breach is irreversible. Further, these specific remedies are discretionary. Contractual obligations vary infinitely. So do the circumstances in which breaches occur, and the circumstances in which remedies are sought. The court may, for instance, decline to grant specific relief on the ground that this would be oppressive.

An instance of this nature occurred in Wrotham Park Estate Co Ltd v Parkside Homes Ltd [1974] 1 WLR 798. For social and economic reasons the court refused to make a mandatory order for the demolition of houses [283] built on land burdened with a restrictive covenant. Instead, Brightman J made an award of damages under the jurisdiction which originated with Lord Cairns's Act. The existence of the new houses did not diminish the value of the benefited land by one farthing. The judge considered that if the plaintiffs were given a nominal sum, or no sum, justice would manifestly not have been done. He assessed the damages at 5% of the developer's anticipated profit, this being the amount of money which could reasonably have been demanded for a relaxation of the covenant. In reaching his conclusion the judge applied by analogy the cases mentioned above concerning the assessment of damages when a defendant has invaded another's property rights but without diminishing the value of the property. I consider he was right to do so. Property rights are superior to contractual rights in that, unlike contractual rights, property rights may survive against an indefinite class of persons. However, it is not easy to see why, as between the parties to a contract, a violation of a party's contractual rights should attract a lesser degree of remedy than a violation of his property rights. As Lionel D Smith has pointed out in his article "Disgorgement of the Profits of Breach of Contract: Property, Contract and 'Efficient Breach'" (1995) 24 Can BLJ 121, it is not clear why it should be any more permissible to expropriate personal rights than it is permissible to expropriate property rights.

I turn to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Surrey County Council v Bredero Homes Ltd [1993] 1 WLR 1361. A local authority had sold surplus land to a developer and obtained a covenant that the developer would develop the land in accordance with an existing planning permission. The sole purpose of the local authority in imposing the covenant was to enable it to share in the planning gain if, as happened, planning permission was subsequently granted for the erection of a larger number of houses. The purpose was that the developer would have to apply and pay for a relaxation of the covenant if it wanted to build more houses. In breach of covenant the developer completed the development in accordance with the later planning permission, and the local authority brought a claim for damages. The erection of the larger number of houses had not caused any financial loss to the local authority. The judge awarded nominal damages of £2, and the Court of Appeal dismissed the local authority's appeal. This is a difficult decision. It has attracted criticism from academic commentators and also in judgments of Sir Thomas Bingham MR and Millett LJ in Jaggard v Sawyer [1995] 1 WLR 269. I need not pursue the detailed criticisms. In the Bredero case Dillon LJ himself noted, at p 1364, that had the covenant been worded differently, there could have been provision for payment of an increased price if a further planning permission were forthcoming. That would have been enforceable. But, according to the Bredero decision, a covenant not to erect any further houses without permission, intended to achieve the same result, may be breached with impunity. That would be a sorry reflection on the law. Suffice to say, in so far as the Bredero decision is inconsistent with the approach adopted in the Wrotham Park case, the latter approach is to be preferred.

The Wrotham Park case, therefore, still shines, rather as a solitary beacon, showing that in contract as well as tort damages are not always narrowly confined to recoupment of financial loss. In a suitable case damages for breach of contract may be measured by the benefit gained by the [284] wrongdoer from the breach. The defendant must make a reasonable payment in respect of the benefit he has gained. In the present case the Crown seeks to go further. The claim is for all the profits of Blake's book which the publisher has not yet paid him. This raises the question whether an account of profits can ever be given as a remedy for breach of contract. The researches of counsel have been unable to discover any case where the court has made such an order on a claim for breach of contract. In Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106, 332, a decision which has proved controversial, Sir Robert Megarry V-C said that, as a matter of fundamental principle, the question of damages was "not one of making the defendant disgorge" his gains, in that case what he had saved by committing the wrong, but "one of compensating the plaintiff". In Occidental Worldwide Investment Corporation v Skibs A/S Avanti [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep 293, 337, Kerr J summarily rejected a claim for an account of profits when ship owners withdrew ships on a rising market.

There is a light sprinkling of cases where courts have made orders having the same effect as an order for an account of profits, but the courts seem always to have attached a different label. A person who, in breach of contract, sells land twice over must surrender his profits on the second sale to the original buyer. Since courts regularly make orders for the specific performance of contracts for the sale of land, a seller of land is, to an extent, regarded as holding the land on trust for the buyer: Lake v Bayliss [1974] 1 WLR 1073. In Reid-Newfoundland Co v Anglo-American Telegraph Co Ltd [1912] AC 555 a railway company agreed not to transmit any commercial messages over a particular telegraph wire except for the benefit and account of the telegraph company. The Privy Council held that the railway company was liable to account as a trustee for the profits it wrongfully made from its use of the wire for commercial purposes. In British Motor Trade Association v Gilbert [1951] 2 All ER 641 the plaintiff suffered no financial loss but the award of damages for breach of contract effectively stripped the wrongdoer of the profit he had made from his wrongful venture into the black market for new cars.

These cases illustrate that circumstances do arise when the just response to a breach of contract is that the wrongdoer should not be permitted to retain any profit from the breach. In these cases the courts have reached the desired result by straining existing concepts. Professor Peter Birks has deplored the "failure of jurisprudence when the law is forced into this kind of abusive instrumentalism"; see "Profits of Breach of Contract" (1993) 109 LQR 518, 520. Some years ago Professor Dawson suggested there is no inherent reason why the technique of equity courts in land contracts should not be more widely employed, not by granting remedies as the by-product of a phantom "trust" created by the contract, but as an alternative form of money judgment remedy. That well known ailment of lawyers, a hardening of the categories, ought not to be an obstacle: see "Restitution or Damages" (1959) 20 Ohio SLJ 175. My conclusion is that there seems to be no reason, in principle, why the court must in all circumstances rule out an account of profits as a remedy for breach of contract. I prefer to avoid the unhappy expression "restitutionary damages". Remedies are the law's response to a wrong (or, more precisely, to a cause of action). When, exceptionally, a just response to a breach of contract so requires, the court should be able to grant the discretionary [285] remedy of requiring a defendant to account to the plaintiff for the benefits he has received from his breach of contract. In the same way as a plaintiff's interest in performance of a contract may render it just and equitable for the court to make an order for specific performance or grant an injunction, so the plaintiff's interest in performance may make it just and equitable that the defendant should retain no benefit from his breach of contract. The state of the authorities encourages me to reach this conclusion, rather than the reverse.

The law recognises that damages are not always a sufficient remedy for breach of contract. This is the foundation of the court's jurisdiction to grant the remedies of specific performance and injunction. Even when awarding damages, the law does not adhere slavishly to the concept of compensation for financially measurable loss. When the circumstances require, damages are measured by reference to the benefit obtained by the wrongdoer. This applies to interference with property rights. Recently, the like approach has been adopted to breach of contract. Further, in certain circumstances an account of profits is ordered in preference to an award of damages. Sometimes the injured party is given the choice: either compensatory damages or an account of the wrongdoer's profits. Breach of confidence is an instance of this. If confidential information is wrongfully divulged in breach of a non-disclosure agreement, it would be nothing short of sophistry to say that an account of profits may be ordered in respect of the equitable wrong but not in respect of the breach of contract which governs the relationship between the parties. With the established authorities going thus far, I consider it would be only a modest step for the law to recognise openly that, exceptionally, an account of profits may be the most appropriate remedy for breach of contract. It is not as though this step would contradict some recognised principle applied consistently throughout the law to the grant or withholding of the remedy of an account of profits. No such principle is discernible.

The main argument against the availability of an account of profits as a remedy for breach of contract is that the circumstances where this remedy may be granted will be uncertain. This will have an unsettling effect on commercial contracts where certainty is important. I do not think these fears are well founded. I see no reason why, in practice, the availability of the remedy of an account of profits need disturb settled expectations in the commercial or consumer world. An account of profits will be appropriate only in exceptional circumstances. Normally the remedies of damages, specific performance and injunction, coupled with the characterisation of some contractual obligations as fiduciary, will provide an adequate response to a breach of contract. It will be only in exceptional cases, where those remedies are inadequate, that any question of accounting for profits will arise. No fixed rules can be prescribed. The court will have regard to all the circumstances, including the subject matter of the contract, the purpose of the contractual provision which has been breached, the circumstances in which the breach occurred, the consequences of the breach and the circumstances in which relief is being sought. A useful general guide, although not exhaustive, is whether the plaintiff had a legitimate interest in preventing the defendant's profit-making activity and, hence, in depriving him of his profit.

It would be difficult, and unwise, to attempt to be more specific. In the Court of Appeal [1998] Ch 439 Lord Woolf MR suggested there are at least [286] two situations in which justice requires the award of restitutionary damages where compensatory damages would be inadequate: see p 458. Lord Woolf MR was not there addressing the question of when an account of profits, in the conventional sense, should be available. But I should add that, so far as an account of profits is concerned, the suggested categorisation would not assist. The first suggested category was the case of "skimped" performance, where the defendant fails to provide the full extent of services he has contracted to provide. He should be liable to pay back the amount of expenditure he saved by the breach. This is a much discussed problem. But a part refund of the price agreed for services would not fall within the scope of an account of profits as ordinarily understood. Nor does an account of profits seem to be needed in this context. The resolution of the problem of cases of skimped performance, where the plaintiff does not get what was agreed, may best be found elsewhere. If a shopkeeper supplies inferior and cheaper goods than those ordered and paid for, he has to refund the difference in price. That would be the outcome of a claim for damages for breach of contract. That would be so, irrespective of whether the goods in fact served the intended purpose. There must be scope for a similar approach, without any straining of principle, in cases where the defendant provided inferior and cheaper services than those contracted for. The second suggested category was where the defendant has obtained his profit by doing the very thing he contracted not to do. This category is defined too widely to assist. The category is apt to embrace all express negative obligations. But something more is required than mere breach of such an obligation before an account of profits will be the appropriate remedy.

Lord Woolf MR [1998] Ch 439, 457, 458, also suggested three facts which should not be a sufficient ground for departing from the normal basis on which damages are awarded: the fact that the breach was cynical and deliberate; the fact that the breach enabled the defendant to enter into a more profitable contract elsewhere; and the fact that by entering into a new and more profitable contract the defendant put it out of his power to perform his contract with the plaintiff. I agree that none of these facts would be, by itself, a good reason for ordering an account of profits.

The present case

[26.170] The present case is exceptional. The context is employment as a member of the security and intelligence services. Secret information is the lifeblood of these services. In the 1950s Blake deliberately committed repeated breaches of his undertaking not to divulge official information gained as a result of his employment. He caused untold and immeasurable damage to the public interest he had committed himself to serve. In 1990 he published his autobiography, a further breach of his express undertaking. By this time the information disclosed was no longer confidential. In the ordinary course of commercial dealings the disclosure of non-confidential information might be regarded as venial. In the present case disclosure was also a criminal offence under the Official Secrets Acts, even though the information was no longer confidential. Section 1 of the Official Secrets Act 1989 draws a distinction in this regard between members of the security and intelligence services and other Crown servants. Under section 1(3) a person who is or has been a Crown servant is guilty of an offence if without lawful authority [287] he makes "a damaging disclosure" of information relating to security or intelligence. The offence is drawn more widely in the case of a present or past member of the security and intelligence services. Such a person is guilty of an offence if without lawful authority he discloses "any information" relating to security or intelligence which is or has been in his possession by virtue of his position as a member of those services. This distinction was approved in Parliament after debate when the legislation was being enacted.

Mr Clayton submitted that section 1(1) is drawn too widely and infringes article 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1953) (Cmd 8969). Section 1(1) criminalises disclosure of information when no damage results. It focuses on the status of the individual who makes the disclosure, rather than on the nature of the information itself. A non-damaging disclosure by a member of the security and intelligence services is criminal, but the identical non-damaging disclosure by a Crown servant is not.

This argument was raised for the first time in this House. Your Lordships are not equipped with the material necessary to decide the point. In the event this does not matter, because there is in the present case another consideration which is sufficient for the purposes of the Attorney-General.

When he joined the Secret Intelligence Service Blake expressly agreed in writing that he would not disclose official information, during or after his service, in book form or otherwise. He was employed on that basis. That was the basis on which he acquired official information. The Crown had and has a legitimate interest in preventing Blake profiting from the disclosure of official information, whether classified or not, while a member of the service and thereafter. Neither he, nor any other member of the service, should have a financial incentive to break his undertaking. It is of paramount importance that members of the service should have complete confidence in all their dealings with each other, and that those recruited as informers should have the like confidence. Undermining the willingness of prospective informers to co-operate with the services, or undermining the morale and trust between members of the services when engaged on secret and dangerous operations, would jeopardise the effectiveness of the service. An absolute rule against disclosure, visible to all, makes good sense.

In considering what would be a just response to a breach of Blake's undertaking the court has to take these considerations into account. The undertaking, if not a fiduciary obligation, was closely akin to a fiduciary obligation, where an account of profits is a standard remedy in the event of breach. Had the information which Blake has now disclosed still been confidential, an account of profits would have been ordered, almost as a matter of course. In the special circumstances of the intelligence services, the same conclusion should follow even though the information is no longer confidential. That would be a just response to the breach. I am reinforced in this view by noting that most of the profits from the book derive indirectly from the extremely serious and damaging breaches of the same undertaking committed by Blake in the 1950s. As already mentioned, but for his notoriety as an infamous spy his autobiography would not have commanded royalties of the magnitude Jonathan Cape agreed to pay.

As a footnote I observe that a similar conclusion, requiring the contract breaker to disgorge his profits, was reached in the majority decision of the United States Supreme Court in Snepp v United States (1980) 444 US 507. [288] The facts were strikingly similar. A former employee of the Central Intelligence Agency, whose conditions of employment included a promise not to divulge any information relating to the agency without prepublication clearance, published a book about the agency's activities in Vietnam. None of the information was classified, but an agent's violation of his non-disclosure obligation impaired the agency's ability to function properly. The court considered and rejected various forms of relief. The actual damage was not quantifiable, nominal damages were a hollow alternative, and punitive damages after a jury trial would be speculative and unusual. Even if recovered they would bear no relation to either the government's irreparable loss or Snepp's unjust gain. The court considered that a remedy which required Snepp "to disgorge the benefits of his faithlessness", was swift and sure, tailored to deter those who would place sensitive information at risk and, since the remedy reached only funds attributable to the breach, it could not saddle the former agent with exemplary damages out of all proportion to his gain. In order to achieve this result the court "imposed" a constructive trust on Snepp's profits. In this country, affording the plaintiff the remedy of an account of profits is a different means to the same end.

[26.175] LORD STEYN: [291] In the hearing before the House Mr Ross Cranston, the Solicitor General, in a thoughtful and careful speech argued for a recognition of an action for disgorgement of profits against a contract breaker where four conditions are fulfilled. (1) There has been a breach of a negative stipulation. (2) The contract breaker has obtained the profit by doing the very thing which he promised not to do. (3) The innocent party (in this case the Crown as represented by the Attorney-General) has a special interest over and above the hope of a benefit to be assessed in monetary terms. (4) Specific performance or an injunction is an ineffective or virtually ineffective remedy for the breach. The Solicitor General persuaded me that in the case of Blake each of these conditions is satisfied. But since I recognise that it would be wrong to create a remedy simply to cover this case, it is right that I should explain the specific considerations which lead me to conclude that it is right on a principled basis to develop the law in a way which covers this case and other cases sharing materially similar features.

My Lords, it has been held at first instance and in the Court of Appeal that Blake is not a fiduciary. This is not an issue before the House. But, as my noble and learned friend, Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, has observed, the [291] present case is closely analogous to that of fiduciaries: compare Reading v Attorney-General [1951] AC 507. If the information was still confidential, Blake would in my view have been liable as a fiduciary. That would be so despite the fact that he left the intelligence services many years ago. The distinctive feature of this case is, however, that Blake gave an undertaking not to divulge any information, confidential or otherwise, obtained by him during his work in the intelligence services. This obligation still applies to Blake. He was, therefore in regard to all information obtained by him in the intelligence services, confidential or not, in a very similar position to a fiduciary. The reason of the rule applying to fiduciaries applies to him. Secondly, I bear in mind that the enduring strength of the common law is that it has been developed on a case-by-case basis by judges for whom the attainment of practical justice was a major objective of their work. It is still one of the major moulding forces of judicial decision-making. These observations are almost banal: the public would be astonished if it was thought that judges did not conceive it as their prime duty to do practical justice whenever possible. A recent example of this process at work is White v Jones [1995] 2 AC 207 where by a majority the House of Lords held that a solicitor who caused loss to a third party by negligence in the preparation of a will is liable in damages. Subordinating conceptual difficulties to the needs of practical justice a majority, and notably Lord Goff of Chieveley, at pp 259–60, upheld the claim. For my part practical justice strongly militates in favour of granting an order for disgorgement of profits against Blake. The decision of the United States Supreme Court in Snepp v United States, 444 US 507 is instructive. On very similar facts the Supreme Court imposed a constructive trust on the intelligence officer's profits. Our law is also mature enough to provide a remedy in such a case but does so by the route of the exceptional recognition of a claim for disgorgement of profits against the contract breaker. In my view therefore there is a valid claim vesting in the Attorney-General against Blake for disgorgement of his gain.

… [293] My Lords, for these reasons, as well as the detailed and far more compelling reasons given by Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, I would make the order which he has proposed.

[LORD GOFF OF CHIEVELEY and LORD BROWNE-WILKINSON agreed with Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead. LORD HOBHOUSE OF WOODBOROUGH dissented.]

Appeal dismissed with costs.

The possibility of gains-based damages being awarded in response to a breach of contract has not been accepted in Australia. Considerable scepticism about the concept was expressed by Hill and Finkelstein JJ in Hospitality Group Pty Ltd v Australian Rugby Union Ltd [2001] FCA 1040; (2001) 110 FCR 157 after considering whether the remedy of account of profits might be available for breach of contract in Australian law, their Honours stated:

> [196] The general rule of the common law was laid down by Baron Parke in Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex 850; 154 ER 363. Parke B said that the aim of contract damages was to place the plaintiff in the same position he would have occupied had the contract been performed. See also Teacher v Calder [1899] AC 451. In Tito v Waddell (No 2) [1977] Ch 106, when considering the appropriate remedy for the failure by the British Phosphate Commissioners to restore Ocean Island following the termination of mining operations, Megarry VC said (at 332):
> > [I]t is fundamental to all questions of damages that they are to compensate the plaintiff for his loss or injury by putting him in the same position he would have been in had he not > suffered the wrong. The question is not one of making the defendant disgorge what he has saved by committing the wrong but one of compensating the plaintiff.

This principle has been accepted as correct by the High Court. See, eg, Wenham v Ella (1972) 127 CLR 454; Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64 ("Amann Aviation"). Moreover, as Mason CJ and Dawson J said in Amann Aviation (at 82):

> The corollary of the principle in Robinson v Harman is that a plaintiff is not entitled, by the award of damages upon breach, to be placed in a superior position to that which he or she would have been in had the contract been performed.

See also L Albert & Son v Armstrong Rubber Co, 178 F2d 182 (1949) and Restatement, Second, Contracts (1991) §349, both cited by Mason CJ and Dawson J. (As an aside, it is interesting to note that other jurisdictions have also had to grapple with the possibility of awarding account of profits for breach of contract, see, eg, the decision of the Supreme Court of Israel in Adras Building Materials Ltd v Harlow & Jones GmbH 42(1) P D (1988) 221.)

Whether or not the law of contract is "seriously defective" (Attorney-General v Blake [1998] Ch 439 at 457 per Lord Woolf MR), if the court is unable to award disgorgement damages (the terminology proposed by L Smith in "Disgorgement of the Profits of Breach of Contract: Property, Contract and 'Efficient Breach' " (1994) 24 Canadian Business Law Journal 121), the position in Australia is that the loss recoverable for breach of contract is limited to that laid down in Robinson v Harman (supra). That is, the aggrieved party is entitled only to compensation. If he has suffered no loss, he is not entitled to be compensated. In an appropriate case, the aggrieved party may be able to recover (by a claim in restitution) benefits that he has made available to the wrongdoer; for example, he may be able to recover the price paid under an incomplete contract or recover possession of goods sold but not paid for. Presently, however, it would be inconsistent with the current principles laid down by the High Court to confer a windfall on a plaintiff under the guise of damages for breach of contract.

DATE FOR ASSESSING DAMAGES

[26.185] As explained in Johnson v Perez (1988) 166 CLR 351, the time at which damages are assessed may significantly affect the amount awarded. The general rule is that damages are usually assessed at the date of the breach of contract although, as also discussed in Johnson v Perez, courts may depart from this rule in some exceptional cases.

Johnson v Perez

[26.190] Johnson v Perez; Creed v Perez (1988) 166 CLR 351 (High Court of Australia) – Appeals from the Supreme Court of Queensland, Full Court.

[FACTS: The respondent sued severally the two firms of solicitors, the appellants, for negligence in failing to prosecute two separate actions for damages against two of his previous employers. Those actions had been dismissed for want of prosecution and had become statute-barred. It was accepted that the respondent would have succeeded in both actions.]

MASON CJ: [355] The guiding principle in the assessment of damages is compensatory … However, the time as at which damages are assessed can significantly affect the amount actually awarded. This aspect of the assessment of compensation is particularly noticeable in the present era of inflation, with its fluctuating economic values …

When a court assesses damages, it converts the value of the injury into nominal terms; it fixes or liquidates that value. That conversion into monetary terms avoids the difficult task of inquiring into the value of goods and services over time and is necessary for the stability of economic legal relationships. The theory according to which damages are awarded by the courts is that a plaintiff's loss or injury can be adequately compensated by a lump or fixed sum of money which is not subsequently revised.

The practice of awarding fixed sums of money worked well when money values and prices were stable. However, in recent times inflation and changing economic values have created complications … The date of assessment determines which party, the plaintiff or the defendant, bears the risk of changing prices during the inevitable delay between the injury and the delivery of judgment. If an early date is used for assessment (the date of the injury for example) in an inflationary economy or where goods of the kind injured are appreciating, it is the plaintiff's position which is eroded. If a later date such as the date of judgment is used, it is the defendant who is exposed.

There is a general rule that damages for torts or breach of contract are assessed as at the date of breach or when the cause of action arises. But this rule is not universal; it must give way in particular cases to solutions best adapted to giving an injured [356] plaintiff that amount in damages which will most fairly compensate him for the wrong he has suffered: see Johnson v Agnew [1980] AC 367 at 400–1 … One established exception to the general rule relates to the assessment of damages for personal injury. The award for permanent disability takes into account the fall in the value of money since the accident … By choosing the date of judgment for assessment in these cases, courts have insulated plaintiffs from inflation. The general rule that damages are assessed as at the date of breach or when the cause of action arose has been applied more uniformly in contract than in tort and for good reason. But even in contract cases courts depart from the general rule whenever it is necessary to do so in the interests of justice. So, when a creditor seeks to enforce a debt payable in a foreign currency: "[t]he critical date is not so much the date when the cause of action arose but rather the date when the debt should have been paid": Cummings [357] v London Bullion Co Ltd [1952] 1 KB 327 at 336 per Denning LJ …

Likewise with contracts for the sale of goods. Where there is a market in which the injured party can buy a replacement, the date of non-delivery is usually deemed the appropriate date. But where there is no such market, a later date may be appropriate. As Oliver J noted in Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 WLR 1262 at 1285; [1978] 1 All ER 33 at 56, the rationale behind this rule lies "in the inquiry — at what date could the plaintiff reasonably have been expected to mitigate the damages by seeking an alternative to performance of the contractual obligation?" …

As I noted earlier, the choice of an early date for assessment leaves the injured party exposed to the deleterious effects of inflation. True it is that legal interest may be awarded from the date of breach, but this is often too low to remedy the effects of inflation and the loss of the use of the money … However, the preference for an early date is motivated, as Oliver J … suggest[s], by concerns about mitigation. This requirement of mitigation can in turn be explained [358] in part by notions of fairness to the party at fault. Once the injured party learns of the breach, he can minimise the loss for which the other will be required to compensate by immediately purchasing a replacement.

As we have seen, the assessment of damages for personal injury stands in a rather different position …

As a response to these problems many civil law jurisdictions have shifted the date of assessing the injury to the date of judgment. France made this change as early as 1942 … Other countries have used the conceptual device of the debt of value to achieve the same result. A debt of value, in contrast with a debt of money, has as its object neither a thing nor a sum of money but a value. The debt of value may be revalued in money terms if either the purchasing power of the currency changes or the [359] value of the particular good or interest shifts in relation to general price levels.

Although a preference for a later date of assessment in tort cases may be appropriate, a wholesale shift to the date of judgment would not adequately achieve the goal of accurate compensation. Take, for example, a shipload of petroleum destroyed en route to the harbour where it was to be sold the next day. After the intended date of sale, oil prices rise. Because the object is to restore the injured party to the position he would have been in save for the mishap, the court should not necessarily use the date of judgment but rather should consider the use to which the petroleum was to be put. It was to be sold immediately and the damages should reflect the price the injured party would have obtained on the intended date of sale. This in fact is what the House of Lords did in Bwllfa and Merthyr Dare Steam Collieries (1891) v Pontypridd Waterworks Co [1903] AC 426 …

Admittedly, where the injured party's intentions are not so patent as in these two examples, the determination of the time at which the injured good would have been converted to currency may present a difficult task …

[360] As the cases to which I have referred reveal, the principles governing the assessment of damages do not permit the application of rigid rules based on categories of actions. Instead, the injured party's intentions and the surrounding circumstances must be considered in light of the underlying principles in order to do justice between the parties. Where mitigation is possible, an early date for assessment may be appropriate. Where mitigation concerns are not relevant and the circumstances indicate that the injured party would have maintained possession of the good had the accident not occurred, the date of judgment is the most appropriate date for assessment. Where the circumstances indicate that the property or interest would in some other way have been converted into monetary terms between the time of injury and date of judgment, the date as at which the injury is assessed should reflect the time of the intended conversion.

In each of the appeals at hand, the solicitor's negligence caused the loss of a cause of action for personal injuries. Each of the injuries suffered by the respondent was the loss of a chance to recover on a cause of action. Unlike in Kitchen v Royal Air Force Association [1958] 1 WLR 563; [1958] 2 All ER 241 where it was by no means certain that the plaintiff's claim would have succeeded had her solicitors not negligently allowed it to become time barred, there is no question in these appeals whether the respondent would have succeeded in the personal injury actions. The sole issue is the value of those causes of actions. In these actions, mitigation concerns are inapposite as it was impossible for the respondent to limit the damage caused by the appellants' negligence. It is appropriate that the injured party be protected from the vicissitudes of depreciating currency and that the tortfeasor bear the risk of any appreciation. Otherwise, the compensatory object of the assessment of damages would be undermined.

Nevertheless, the respondent is not entitled to compensation beyond his loss. As Ryan J suggested in the Full Court, there has been an escalation in the awards for personal injury actions over the time between the date the actions would have been heard but for the appellants' negligence and the date of trial of these negligence actions. The respondent's personal injury actions, however, had it not been for the appellants' negligence, would have been converted into money at the earlier date. In the absence of the appellants' negligence the respondent would not have been entitled to benefit from that rise in personal injury awards. It is therefore appropriate [361] that the dates that the personal injury actions would have been converted be used as the dates of assessment.

I would allow the appeals.

[WILSON, TOOHEY and GAUDRON JJ, in a joint judgment, and DAWSON J also allowed the appeals. BRENNAN and DEANE JJ dissented.]

Appeals allowed.

[27.05] The major limitations on the recovery of damages for breach of contract are the principles of causation, remoteness and mitigation. A number of more specific rules may also limit the damages available in certain cases.

CAUSATION

[27.10] In order to recover damages for a breach of contract, a plaintiff must show a causal connection between the defendant's breach and the loss for which the plaintiff is seeking compensation. As a preliminary assessment of causation, the "but for" test is often relied upon. However, that test has its limitations. In March v E & MH Stramare (1991) 171 CLR 506, the High Court said that, ultimately, causation must be a matter of "common sense". March v E & M H Stramare Pty Ltd concerned the tort of negligence, but the principles discussed apply equally to a claim for damages for breach of contract. The principles were applied to a contract claim in Alexander v Cambridge Credit Corp Ltd (1987) 9 NSWLR 310, extracted at [27.20].

REMOTENESS OF DAMAGE

[27.15] In order for damages to be awarded for breach of contract, a plaintiff must show that the loss to be compensated was not too remote.

The general rule as to remoteness of damage in the law of contract is laid down in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch 341; 156 ER 145. Alderson B explained (at 355 (Exch); 151 (ER)):

> Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, that is, according to the usual course of > things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it.

The application of the rule is illustrated in Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd [1949] 2 KB 528. The contract in question was for the sale of a boiler by the defendants to the plaintiffs for use in the plaintiffs' laundry and dyeing business. The boiler was delivered to the plaintiffs some 20 weeks after the time fixed by the contract. The plaintiffs claimed damages for the loss of profit they would have made had the boiler been delivered on time. Included in this claim were the loss of a large number of new customers and the loss of a highly lucrative contract with the Ministry of Supply. The English Court of Appeal concluded that the plaintiffs could recover a general sum for the loss of profit. The defendants knew that the plaintiffs needed the boiler for immediate use in their laundry business but did not know the precise use to which the boiler was to be put. The court held that the defendants must reasonably be presumed to foresee some loss of business if the boiler was not delivered on time. However, the plaintiffs were not able to recover losses relating to the highly lucrative contracts. For the plaintiffs to recover the profits expected on the special contracts, the defendants would have had to know of the prospect of such contracts.

Somewhat more complex examples of the application of the remoteness rules are found in the two following cases.

Alexander v Cambridge Credit Corp

[27.20] Alexander v Cambridge Credit Corp Ltd (1987) 9 NSWLR 310 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Appeal from Rogers J.

[FACTS: In 1971, in breach of contract, the auditors (the defendants) of Cambridge Credit (the company) in their annual audit failed to qualify their report in relation to provisions for doubtful debts and certain other matters. In subsequent years, the defendants had similarly failed to qualify their reports, but action was brought only in relation to the 1971 breach. As a result of the breach, the value of the company was overstated. If the provisions had been made in the accounts, it would have been apparent that the company had breached the terms of a trust deed under which it had issued debentures, in which event the trustee for the debenture holders would (as the trial judge found) have put the company into receivership. In fact, the company continued to trade until 1974 when it was unable to pay an instalment of interest on its debentures and unsecured notes, and a receiver was appointed.

At the trial, Rogers J found that, after making certain adjustments, by the completion of the receivership, the sum to be obtained from the realisation of the assets would fall short of the sum required to meet liabilities by $155 million. He also held that if the company had gone into receivership in September 1971, the insufficiency of assets to meet liabilities would have been only $10 million. His assessment of the damage that the company suffered by reason of the defendants' breach of contract was $145 million. The defendants appealed.]

GLASS JA (dissenting): [312] In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed for the following reasons.

Finding of facts

The ultimate questions of liability must be approached upon a substratum of factual findings. I am satisfied that the evidence establishes the following facts.

1. Commencing in the year 1969 at the latest the defendants were aware that the company had incurred a number of substantial trading losses. [313]
2. The accounts prepared for the year ended June 1971 failed to make provision for a number of failed investments and irrecoverable debts.

3. It was not seriously in contest on the appeal that the extent of the under-provision was at least $7 million.
4. If the findings made by the trial judge are upheld the under-provision amounted to $9.1 million. I am satisfied that his findings … should not be disturbed.
5. If the accounts had been adjusted to provide for the $9.1 million deficiency, shareholders' funds would have been reduced in 1971 to $3.1 million.
6. The trust deed fixed a maximum ratio of debentures to shareholders' funds of 5 to 1. In lieu of the permitted issue of $16.5 million, debentures on issue totalled $56 million.
7. The trust deed also prohibited the company from issuing debentures exceeding three quarters of the value of liquid assets. His Honour found that on the defendants' own figures there were liquid assets of only $38 million being a little more than 50 per cent of the cover required for the $56 million on issue.
8. The failure of the auditors to qualify their report with respect to the shareholders' fund borrowing ratio was held to be a breach of contractual duty on their part. This conclusion is no longer in dispute.
9. The failure to qualify the report with respect to the liquid assets ratio was held not to be a breach of duty because it was done in accordance with legal advice. This conclusion is also unchallenged.
10. On the plaintiff's case the trust deed stipulated that if either borrowing ratio was breached, the trustee for the debenture holders had power to appoint a receiver and this would have been done by September 1971. His Honour upheld both of these contentions.
11. During the period from September 1971 to September 1974 the company continued to trade in the business of land developer. It bought large areas of land for development and sold developed land in lots. It borrowed large sums of money, raised capital, made modest profits and paid dividends. It entered into many joint ventures in the real estate field.
12. The financial position of the company during the three year period was not only affected by internal business decisions.
13. There were also events external to the company occurring during that period which affected the business of land development. The boom in land which had commenced before 1971 culminated in a slump, government authorities took active steps by way of monetary intervention which resulted in a credit squeeze and there were doubtless other contributing factors such as an excess of supply over demand.
14. There were other events of a character which affected only part of the market for real estate. Floods in Queensland of exceptional severity caused the Queensland government to prohibit the development of land subject to flooding. The company held a good deal of land affected by this ban.
15. During the whole of the three year period from the defendant's default in 1971 until the receivership in 1974 the company traded in breach of its two [314] borrowing ratios. The defendants failed to qualify their report in any year subsequent to 1971.
16. The net worth of the company in September 1971 was minus $10 million. In September 1974 it was minus $67 million.

The powers of the trustee under the trust deed

As previously mentioned the trust deed provided that in certain events the trustee had power to appoint a receiver … The purpose of having a trustee is to have action taken in precisely those circumstances and I do not doubt that the power would have been exercised … If the auditors had acted as they should have, the report would have been qualified, the trustee would have acted and a receiver would have been appointed by September 1971.

Was the plaintiff's damage caused by the failure to appoint a receiver in 1971?

[27.25] The trial judge held that the plaintiff had established that the collapse of the company in September 1974 was caused by the auditors' default as the company in its weakened financial state was vulnerable to such an event. Before this court, Mr Sperling QC, counsel for the plaintiff, did not attempt to support that finding. He submitted that the plaintiff's case on causation was now and always had been different from that upheld by his Honour. The plaintiff contended that the damage suffered by it was not the collapse of the company in 1974 but the deterioration in the company's financial position during the period September 1971 to September 1974 as a result of being in trade. The appointment of a receiver in 1974 was not the event causing detriment to the company. It marked the end of the three year period of trading activity in which the detriment suffered was the difference between a net worth of minus $10 million at the beginning and a net worth of minus $67 million at the end of the period. The question which attracted most attention in the written submissions and oral argument was whether that damage claimed by the plaintiff and so defined had been caused by the default in question.

The relevant principles of causation and remoteness

[27.30] In determining whether the plaintiff's proofs establish its claim for damages, I would direct myself that the following propositions are valid under Australian law and are the relevant principles for application. I do not propose to discuss in what respects the English law may be different.

1. The plaintiff must establish that the defendant's default caused the damage suffered and that he is responsible for it in law. [315]
2. There is no occasion to consider whether responsibility is incurred for the plaintiff's loss until it is first established that the defendant's default caused it: Chapman v Hearse (1961) 106 CLR 112 at 122.
3. The doctrine of remoteness marks out the limits beyond which a defendant is no longer liable for loss caused by him: Chapman v Hearse at 122.
4. It is irrelevant to inquire whether the defendants' default was the dominant, effective or real cause of the plaintiff's loss. If the evidence is suggestive of multiple causation, the inquiry to be made is whether the defendants' default was a cause of the plaintiff's loss: Fitzgerald v Penn (1954) 91 CLR 268 at 273.
5. The test of causation poses the question whether the plaintiff's loss would not have been suffered but for the defendants' default. The question is to be answered by applying that test in a practical commonsense way: Nader v Urban Transit Authority of New South Wales (1985) 2 NSWLR 501 at 530–1 and cases there cited.
6. If the defendants' conduct is in this sense a cause of the plaintiff's loss, the existence of another concurrent cause which combines to produce the loss is of no relevance.
7. If there is a consecutive event but for which the plaintiff would not have suffered the loss claimed, that intervening event may be described as a novus actus interveniens.
8. The evidentiary picture may be such that it is proper to think that the intervening event is in a practical common sense way the only cause of the loss to the exclusion of the earlier event: Mahony v J Kruschich (Demolitions) Pty Ltd (1985) 156 CLR 522 at 528.
9. Where, however, the earlier event remains a cause notwithstanding the intervention of a later event, it is necessary to consider whether the intervening event has metaphorically broken the chain linking the plaintiff's loss to the defendants' default which ex hypothesi was a cause of it. This is determined by principles of remoteness.
10. Where the defendant is a tortfeasor the intervention will not have that effect if the intervention is foreseeable as a possibility in a general sort of way: Mount Isa Mines Ltd v Pusey (1970) 125 CLR 383.
11. Where the default is a breach of contract, the intervention will not have the effect of terminating the defendants' responsibility for the loss caused by it, if the parties should have contemplated at the time of the contract that in the event of the sort of breach which did occur an intervention of that general kind was a serious possibility or a not unlikely occurrence: Koufos v C Czarnikow Ltd [1969] 1 AC 350.

Was the plaintiff's damage caused by the defendants' default?

[27.35] In considering how the causal question should be answered in a common sense way it is necessary to have regard to the events before the period began as well as the events which occurred during the period. The plaintiff submits that both kinds of event favour its submission. The company had a track record of failed investments. It was and continued to be in breach of its two borrowing ratios. During the three year period, so it is submitted, the company's business activities were marked by a number of features. It failed to realise land development stock held at September 1971. Instead it held much of it through the boom and into the slump. It acquired more land stock [316] by borrowing money on a grand scale with the intention of holding it for development and retained a good deal of that land through the boom and into the slump. It made modest profits but after three years trading its net worth had [decreased] from minus $10 million to minus $67 million.

Mr Bainton places reliance upon the facts found in accordance with paras 11 to 14. He submits that the company had recovered its financial health and was brought down by events subsequent to 1971. The question is a finely balanced one of deciding in a practical common sense way whether it was the failure to appoint a receiver which was one of the causes of the deterioration in its financial position. It seems to me that it is not wanting in practicality to say that the company was financially worse off in 1974 by $57 million because it had traded during that period and that being in trade was a cause of its damage. Some bad business decisions and external developments adverse to its business doubtless contributed to the deterioration. But the auditors by their default failed to close the company down in 1971. It was that failure which in a common sense way was a cause of the damage since but for the failure it would not have traded and in the events which happened would not have run down its assets in the calamitous way it did. Nor do I think that the intervening events constituted causes of the deterioration so as to exclude the fact that the plaintiff was in trade as another cause in a common sense way. It is not profitable in my view to consider what answer should be given when the evidentiary factors are different. If there had been a small breach of ratios followed by a return to complete financial health or an entry into a completely different line of business common sense would doubtless say that the failure to appoint the receiver was not a cause and its deterioration was caused only by subsequent events. But the evidence here in my view supports the common sense conclusion that but for this company's continuance in trade in the same line of business, under the same management in breach of the same ratios it would not have run down its assets. Being in trade when it should have been in receivership was a cause of the $57 million loss it suffered. If an unseaworthy vessel puts to sea because marine surveyors have negligently certified it, its loss will also be due to the marine hazards which cause it to founder. But it is equally true that its loss could not have occurred but for the fact that it put to sea as a result of a negligent survey.

Was the plaintiff's loss too remote from the defendants' default to be recoverable?

[27.40] The auditors were aware of substantial trading losses 1967–1971. They were aware that the trustee depended on them to ensure that the company was put into receivership when serious and irremediable breaches of both ratios were disclosed. The failure to close the company down in those circumstances carried with it the serious possibility that the exigencies of the market would inflict further serious loss. Those exigencies included business miscalculations, market fluctuations and economic change. The auditors of a land development company riding a boom should reasonably contemplate that the boom will be followed by a slump. A company in breach of both its borrowing ratios should be closed down by the combined action of auditor and trustee to avoid the risk of further deterioration. The failure to close it down produced the very developments which should have been contemplated [317] as serious possibilities in the event of that failure. The relevant loss, the remoteness of which is in question, is not the company's parlous position in 1974. It is the financial deterioration produced by three years trading to be measured by a comparison of its bad position in 1971 with its much worse position in 1974.

Quantification of damage

[27.45] Expert evidence established that the company's net worth deteriorated from minus $10 million in 1971 to minus $67 million in 1974. The trial judge added to $67 million the outstanding interest on debentures and after making certain adjustments entered judgment for $145 million. The plaintiffs are prepared to set off against the loss of $57 million, dividends paid in 1972, 1973 and 1974 totalling $3 291 000 yielding a total loss of $141 709 000. The difference between that sum and the amount of the judgment is of no practical consequence because of the insufficiency of funds to meet the judgment recovered …

[27.50] MCHUGH JA: [337] The principal issues in the appeal are whether there was a causal connection between the admitted breaches of the audit contract in 1971 and the later losses suffered by Cambridge and, if so, whether the losses were too remote from the breach of contract to be legally recoverable.

In my opinion the appeal should be allowed for each of the following reasons:

1. There was no causal connection between the auditors' breach of contract in 1971 and the loss or damage suffered by Cambridge.
2. In a practical sense, the sole cause of the loss or damage was the dramatic turn around in economic conditions in Australia in the period 1972–1974 coupled with the decisions of Cambridge to expand its borrowings and its investments in real estate.
3. The loss or damage and the manner of its occurrence was not within the reasonable contemplation of the parties when they made the audit contract in 1970.

[His Honour then reviewed the financial situation of Cambridge over the years 1971 to 1974 and continued:]

The trial judges' reasons for holding that the loss was the result of the breach of the audit contract

[27.55] [348] His Honour was satisfied that the breaches of duty committed by the auditors in relation to the 1971 accounts were factually the real, efficient cause of the 1974 collapse of Cambridge … Accordingly, he held that the losses suffered by Cambridge were the result of the auditors' breach.

Cambridge supports the verdict on different grounds

[27.60] In its submissions to this court, Cambridge did not attempt to support the learned trial judge's reasoning. Neither at the trial nor on this appeal did it assert that the damage which it suffered in consequence of the auditors' breach of contract was the result of a low capital base in 1971. Cambridge's case was that the auditors "could and should have acted in 1971 to close the company down and thereby prevent the situation from continuing". It argued [349] that, because of the auditors' breach of contract, the directors kept the company in trade. It contended that, if the auditors had taken the action that they should have taken in September 1971, the directors could not have caused the company to trade from September 1971 to September 1974. Cambridge submitted that the date of receivership simply marked the end of the period during which the directors wrongfully kept the company in trade and during which the relevant losses were sustained.

Counsel for Cambridge candidly acknowledged that, even if there had been an additional $10 million in Cambridge's equity base, as the accounts for 1971 falsely stated, it would not have avoided what happened in 1974. He said that, if Cambridge had had additional shareholders' funds of $10 million in 1971, they would probably have been lost in investment in real estate. He said that that observation "would seem to be sufficient to dispose of his Honour's approach". Moreover, since his Honour found that the deficiency of assets to meet liabilities in September 1974 was $67 million, it seems likely that Cambridge would have needed a great deal more than $10 million shareholders' funds if it was to have any chance of survival from September 1974 until the real estate market turned upwards. Further, as at 31 December 1973, borrowings by Cambridge of $41 773 034 were repayable within 12 months. There is no reason to suppose that the position was any better in September 1974. So, as at the date, Cambridge not only had a large deficiency in assets to meet liabilities but it also had a pressing need for a large sum of working capital. Even if Cambridge's accounts in 1971 had represented its true financial position, the catastrophe, which befell it in 1974, would still have occurred.

Causation

[27.65] To sustain its verdict against the auditors, Cambridge must show that "the loss suffered resulted from the breach" of the audit contract: Reg Glass Pty Ltd v Rivers Locking Systems Pty Ltd (1968) 120 CLR 516 at 523 per Barwick CJ, McTiernan and Menzies JJ. That is, Cambridge must prove a causal connection between the issue by the auditors of their erroneous certificates in 1971 and the loss of $145 million which represents the difference in the financial position of Cambridge on the basis of a hypothetical receivership in 1971 and the actual receivership in 1974.

Cambridge contended that, "but for" the breach of duty by the auditors in erroneously certifying the accounts and issuing the certificates in 1971, it would not have traded after September 1971 except to realise its assets in an orderly way. Thus it would not have made the additional losses which occurred as the result of trading in the period 1971–1974. A causal connection between the breach of contract and the loss of $145 million was therefore established. Counsel for the auditors retorted that on this Adam-and-Eve approach to causation the act of the Registrar of Companies in incorporating Cambridge ought to be regarded as the cause of its loss. He submitted that the real and efficient cause of Cambridge's loss had to be ascertained and that it was not the auditors' breach of contract. [351] Cambridge contended that the issue of causation is concluded once it is found that the auditors' breach was causally connected with the loss and that this was to be determined by applying the "but for" test. It asserted that the question of policy was subsumed under the test of remoteness of damages … The auditors submitted that between the "but for" test and the rules relating to remoteness of damage was a test of legal causation: Was the breach of contract the legal cause of the damage which Cambridge suffered? Legal cause was to be determined by asking whether the breach was the dominant or real and efficient cause of the damage …

[354] [T]he case upon which the auditors placed most reliance was the decision of the House of Lords in Monarch Steamship Co Ltd v Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A/B) [1949] AC 196. The facts are complicated but in essence a ship sailed in May 1939 from Manchuria in fulfilment of a charterparty to carry goods to a port in Sweden. She should have been in European waters by the middle of July, but her speed was slow owing to a longstanding defective condition of her boilers. By reason of repairs to her boilers at Port Said, the ship did not leave that port until 24 September. Meanwhile war had broken out. The Admiralty prohibited the ship from proceeding to Sweden and ordered her to discharge her cargo at Glasgow. The purchasers of the goods were put to additional expense in obtaining the carriage of the goods from Glasgow to the port in Sweden. The House of Lords unanimously held that the purchasers could recover this cost from the shipowners as the loss resulting from the shipowner's breach of contract in respect of unseaworthiness of the vessel. Lord Porter saw the Admiralty order as a new and independent cause. But he held (at 214–15) that the shipowner was responsible because it ought to have foreseen that a war would be likely to occur during the course of the voyage, if it was protracted, and that, if war occurred, the carriage of goods to the stipulated port might be prohibited. Lord Uthwatt and Lord Morton of Henryton both agreed with the speech of Lord Porter.

Lord du Parcq also agreed with the speech of Lord Porter on the question of causation. Lord Wright said (at 225) that the orders of the Admiralty were not "the immediate or dominant cause of the delay". His Lordship said (at 226) that Smith Hogg & Co Ltd v Black Sea and Baltic General Insurance Co Ltd [1940] AC 997 did not lay down any new law. What was emphasised in that case was that a voluntary act (negligent or not) of a human agent is not generally an independent or new cause which breaks the chain of causation so as to exclude from consideration the causal effect of the unseaworthiness …

[355] I do not think that the speeches in the Monarch Steamship case support the general proposition for which the auditors contended. In my opinion the ratio decidendi of the case was that the unseaworthiness remained a cause of the loss because the commencement of the War and the diversion of the ship was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of delay from unseaworthiness …

[357] In my opinion the above cases do not establish the proposition that a plaintiff in an action for breach of contract must prove that the breach of contract was the real and efficient or dominant cause of the loss which he suffered …

[358] Accordingly, to establish a causal connection between a breach of contract and the damage which the plaintiff has suffered, he needs only to show that the breach was a cause of the loss. This is to be decided by the application of common sense principles. In general, the application of the "but for" test will be sufficient to prove the necessary causal connection. But that test is only a guide. The ultimate question is whether, as a matter of common sense, the relevant act or omission was a cause.

Causation in this case

[27.70] In my opinion Cambridge failed to prove that the breach of contract by the auditors in 1971 was a cause of the loss of $145 million which it suffered …

What makes the present claim truly remarkable is that Cambridge does not assert that it relied on the certificates of the auditors or on their failure to qualify the accounts. Through its officers and particularly the managing director, Cambridge was well aware of the facts that gave rise to the finding that provision should have been made for its doubtful debts and investments. What Cambridge does is to seize on the finding that, if the trustee had known of the true financial position and the breaches of the ratios, it would have put Cambridge — no doubt against its will — into receivership in September 1971. Reliance by the trustee on the certificates issued in October and November 1971 is basic to Cambridge's case …

[359] Finally, it needs to be borne in mind that, although counsel for Cambridge did not acknowledge it, the case for Cambridge on the causation issue ultimately rests on the assumption that reliance by the trustee on the certificates of October/November 1971 continued throughout the trading period 1971–1974 even though a new certificate was given each six months and whenever a new debenture prospectus was issued. Moreover, Cambridge did not seek to prove that particular losses in respect of particular transactions were caused by the auditors' certificates …

In the proved circumstances of this case, I do not think that the issue of the certificates by the auditors constituted a cause of Cambridge's loss of $145 million. The existence of a company, as counsel for Cambridge conceded, cannot be a cause of its trading losses or profits. Yet that is what the case for Cambridge comes to. Except in the sense that the issue of the certificates induced the trustee not to take action against Cambridge and thereby permitted Cambridge to exist as a trader, the issuing of the certificates was not one of the conditions which were jointly necessary to produce the loss of $145 million. To assert in these circumstances that the issue of the certificates was a cause of the loss in my opinion is to depart from the common sense notion of causation which the common law champions. Moreover, whatever causal significance the certificates of the auditors in 1971 may have had in keeping the company in trade, their effect was well and truly spent by 1973 … The inherent weakness in the case made by Cambridge became apparent when its counsel was asked to identify the time when the loss occurred. He [360] said that the correct term was "damage" rather than "loss" and that the damage to the company arose from carrying on business between 1971 and 1974 …

These arguments either equate business decisions and investments with loss or damage — which they are not — or imply that the damage did not occur until the price of land collapsed in 1974. If the latter conclusion was intended, it demonstrates only too clearly that reliance by the trustee on the 1971 certificates was not a cause of the damage. By then at least five later lots of certificates, accounts and reports had been received by the trustee. If the argument of Cambridge has any plausibility, it arises from the insistence that it was unnecessary to examine what occurred in respect of the individual transactions. Yet many transactions after 1971 were profitable. Cambridge made profits in the years 1972 and 1973. It paid taxes on those profits. In 1972 it paid dividends of $1 107 000; in 1973 it paid dividends of $1 212 000; in 1974 it paid dividends of $972 000. Moreover, on the trial judge's findings, there was an increase in shareholders' funds of $6 572 002 between 30 June 1971 and 31 December 1973 after paying dividends and taxes. Cambridge conceded that even on its figures there was an increase in shareholders' funds of $1 614 348 during this period although, of course, $1 960 000 came from additional capital. These figures leave out the claim that the revaluation of the unsold real estate in 1973 showed that assets had increased by $40 million. Moreover, until 30 September 1974 Cambridge was able to meet all its current liabilities. The payment of interest and repayment of creditors continued until 30 September 1974. As late as 30 July 1974, Cambridge had $2 914 000 available in liquid funds. The argument that the breaches by the auditor allowed Cambridge to remain in trade and, therefore, was a cause of its loss of $145 million is rejected.

The intervening act/s in this case

[27.75] [362] If, contrary to my view, the breach of contract by the auditors in 1971 was a cause of the loss of $145 million by Cambridge, the collapse of the real estate market, as the result of the policies of the then Australian government, constituted a novus actus interveniens which in point of law broke the causal connection. Strictly speaking, it may be more correct to regard the novus actus interveniens as consisting of a package of the following factors which intervened after the auditors' breach of contract in 1971:

1. The expansionary budget of August 1972.
2. The unprecedented rate of monetary expansion in 1972–1973 brought about by the large current account surplus and the high rate of capital inflow.
3. The acceleration of inflation in early 1973.
4. The boom in land sales and the spectacular increase in the prices of land.

[His Honour then listed further matters and considered their effect on Cambridge's business. He continued:] [363] If, contrary to my view, there was a connection between the issue of the certificates in 1971 and this collapse, it was so superseded in potency by supervening events as not to rank as a cause either in common sense or in law. The package of economic factors together with the decisions of the directors of Cambridge to increase its borrowings and investment in real estate constituted a novus actus interveniens.

If … a defendant is liable for intervening events of a kind which he ought to reasonably foresee, then in my opinion the novus actus interveniens was beyond the reasonable foresight of an ordinary person or, if it matters, an auditor or businessman … The package of factors, together with the investment and borrowing decisions of the directors of Cambridge after 1971, were, in a practical sense, the sole cause of the loss of $145 million.

Remoteness

[27.80] Losses which result from a breach of contract are not compensable if they are too remote. So another question in this case is whether the loss of $145 million was too remote from the breach of contract even if it was causally connected. Sometimes the term "remoteness" is used in discussion of the issue of the causation-in-fact. But the more conventional use of the term "remoteness" is to describe the body of principles which limit the recovery of damages to those losses and damage which in a tort case were reasonably foreseeable and which in a contract case were within the reasonable contemplation of the parties. The principles relating to remoteness in contract were examined at length in Koufos v C Czarnikow Ltd [1969] 1 AC 350 where a division of opinion emerged among the Law Lords as to the degree of the likelihood of an event which had to be contemplated by the parties to the contract. Lord Reid and Lord Morris were of opinion that a defendant is legally responsible for any loss or damage arising from a result which is contemplated as "not unlikely". Lord Morris and Lord Hodson approved of liability for damage which was contemplated as "liable to result". Lord Pearce and Lord Upjohn approved of legal responsibility for loss or damage arising from a result which was contemplated as "a serious possibility or real danger".

In Reg Glass Pty Ltd v Rivers Locking Systems Pty Ltd the majority of the High Court said (at 523) that the measure of damages for breach of a [364] warranty in a contract involved two steps: "First that the loss suffered resulted from the breach, and secondly that the loss suffered was, when the contract was made, reasonably foreseeable as likely to result from such a breach." The second of these steps was an adoption of the second proposition in Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd [1949] 2 KB 528 at 536 which was rejected by the House of Lords in Koufos v C Czarnikow Ltd. Later High Court cases, however, appear to accept Lord Reid's speech in Koufos as correctly stating the law: Wenham v Ella at 471–2 and Burns v MAN Automotive (Aust) Pty Ltd (1986) 61 ALJR 80; 69 AIR 11 at 86 (ALJR), 20–1 (AIR); but see Brennan J at 25 …

In the present case, the auditors were content to accept that the test of remoteness was whether, at the time of contracting, there was in contemplation "a serious possibility of damage of the type in question". But they argued that, in applying that test, regard must be had to the facts and the results reached in the various cases in which the test of remoteness has been applied. I am content to adopt this approach in this case although I prefer the formulation of Lord Reid in Koufos v C Czarnikow Ltd.

The decision in Koufos resulted in a modification of the principles expounded in Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd at 539–40 which had extended the principles laid down in Hadley v Baxendale at 354–5; 15 1. In the latter case, Alderson B had said:

> the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, that is, according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it.

Baron Alderson went on to explain that, if the special circumstances were known to the parties, the damages resulting from the breach, which the parties would contemplate, "would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow" from a breach under those circumstances. If no special circumstances were known, the defendant could only be supposed to have contemplated "the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances, from such a breach" ….

[365] In Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd, the Court of Appeal restated these principles in a series of six propositions which extended the scope of liability. The court said (at 539) that a party could only recover "such part of the loss actually resulting as was at the time of the contract reasonably foreseeable as liable to result from the breach". And it was liable to result "if the loss (or some factor without which it would not have occurred) is a 'serious possibility' or a 'real danger' ": at 540 …

In Koufos there was, as I have indicated, a division of opinion as to the degree of likelihood of the result which had to be contemplated. Only Lords Pearce and Upjohn were prepared to adopt the "serious possibility" or "real danger" standard formulated in Victoria Laundry. But all the Law Lords agreed that the test of reasonable foreseeability laid down in that case was to be avoided. Thus Lord Upjohn said (at 422) that liability "should depend on their assumed common knowledge and contemplation and not on a foreseeable but most unlikely consequence".

In later cases (for example, H Parsons (Livestock) Ltd v Utley Ingham & Co Ltd [1978] QB 791 at 807), there has been a tendency to play down the distinction between reasonable foreseeability and reasonable contemplation as semantic only. However, I think that the difference is a real one which results in a significant narrowing of liability. The word "contemplation" seems to be used in Koufos in the sense of "thoughtful consideration" or perhaps "having in view in the future". It emphasises that, if the parties had thought about the matter, they would really have considered that the result had at least a "serious possibility" of occurring.

The actual decisions in Hadley v Baxendale and Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd bear out the proposition that the contemplation test limits the area of potential liability. For it was surely reasonably foreseeable as a serious possibility that the millshaft was required for the operation of the mill and that a launderer and dyer might have special contracts with a lucrative profit margin. Yet the losses of the plaintiffs arising from those circumstances were not recoverable.

An important matter in ascertaining whether the loss or damage is too remote is the extent to which the parties may be taken to have contemplated the events giving rise to that loss or damage. The parties need not contemplate the degree or extent of the loss or damage suffered: Wroth v Tyler [1974] Ch 30 at 61–2; H Parsons (Livestock) Ltd v Uttley Ingham & Co Ltd at 813 and South Coast Basalt Pty Ltd v R W Miller & Co Pty Ltd [1981] 1 NSWLR 356 at 364. Nor need they contemplate the precise details [366] of the events giving rise to the loss. It is sufficient that they contemplate the kind or type of loss or damage suffered. The most difficult question in determining the relevant kind of damage concerns the level of classification of the damage which the parties must have contemplated. Clearly the level must not be so high that the parties are required to contemplate the very loss in question or the precise manner of its occurrence. Nor must it be so low that any loss or damage, no matter how unusual in nature or occurrence, would fall within the classification. In the field of tort a similar problem arises …

Helpful guidance as to the proper level of characterisation is to be found in some of the decided cases. Thus in tort, injury by shock is a different kind of damage from injury by a blow: Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd v Morts Dock & Engineering Co Ltd: at 426 … In the field of contract it has been held that profit from a specially lucrative contract is not of the same kind as the loss of general business profits: Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd. It seems clear from these authorities that the parties must contemplate both the general nature of the loss or damage and the general manner of its occurrence: compare Chitty on Contracts (25th ed, 1983), pp 934–5.

Remoteness in this case

[27.85] Cambridge contended that, at the time of the making of the contract in 1970, the parties would have contemplated as a serious possibility that, if in 1971 the auditors failed to perform their contractual duty, damage would occur of such a kind "as was manifest in the deterioration" of Cambridge's financial position between September 1971 and September 1974 …

[367] If it is legitimate to look at the loss as a whole, I do not think that it belongs to the kind of loss or damage which the parties would have contemplated as being a serious possibility of occurring … In 1970 I do not think that the parties would have contemplated as a serious possibility that Cambridge might suffer damage in 1973 or 1974 by reason of events of the kind which then took place.

No doubt when making the audit contract they would have contemplated as a serious possibility that, if in breach of contract the auditors failed to draw attention to the need to write-off debts and investments, Cambridge might suffer damage by trading with insufficient equity capital. And they might well have contemplated a tightening of economic conditions. But in my opinion the damage which would be contemplated would be damage, speaking generally, in the period until the next audit.

The decisive consideration, however, is that the economic conditions encountered in 1974 were so different from the "tightening of economic [368] conditions" that the parties might have contemplated in 1970 as to be different in kind … Applying a phrase, which admittedly in Koufos was criticised, I think that the parties would not have thought that the losses in question were "on the cards" …

To impose liability upon the auditors in this case seems to me to exceed that which the auditors could fairly be regarded as having contemplated and been willing to accept. The track which the parties looked down in 1970 bore few, if any, resemblances to the track which Cambridge went down between 1972 and 1974.

Accordingly, even if there was a causal connection between the breach of contract in 1971 and the loss of $145 million and no novus actus interveniens, that loss was too remote to be recoverable in these proceedings.

The appeal should be allowed on the grounds so far argued …

[27.90] MAHONEY JA [agreed that the appeal should be upheld. In the course of his judgment he said]:

[335] [R]eference was made in argument to what has been described as the "but for" test of causality … In a sense, the company's case depends upon a "but for" view of causality. Its contention is that but for the defendants' breach, the company would not have remained in existence in 1971–1974 and therefore, but for that breach, it would not have suffered the fall in its net worth which occurred.

With respect to those who take a different view, I do not think that the "but for" test can be accepted as the test of causality in the law. It was stated by McHugh JA in the Nader case (at 531B) as being that "every necessary member of the group of conditions jointly sufficient to produce the injury or damage is a cause of that injury or damage." I do not mean by this quotation to state in full the subtlety or qualifications of the test: I refer to it in these terms for the purpose only of identification of it. But there are, in my respectful opinion, insuperable difficulties in accepting it as the definitive test of causality in the law. The first problem that I feel with that test is that it is in fact not the test which is applied. Where purportedly it determines the existence of a causal relationship, the determination is made by reference to other factors. Thus, assume I suffer loss because the defendant caused his revolver to fire a bullet into my chest. That loss could not have happened "but for" the manufacture of the revolver and the sale of it to the defendant. Yet ordinarily the manufacturer or the seller would not be held in law to have caused my loss. Their participation is something "but for" which my loss would not have occurred yet, for an unstated reason, they have not in the instant case caused the loss. Argument may be directed to many things: "novus actus interveniens" is not the only reason why they are excluded.

But, of course, the "but for" test may be formulated in a more elaborate [336] way and in the formulation of it the manufacture and the sale may be excluded. They are excluded, I think, by a process similar to, as it has been described, the formulation of a "causal field". In determining what, for the purpose of the instant discussion, is the causal relationship, there is first defined a causal field or, as it was described in the Nader case, the set of "necessary … group of conditions jointly sufficient to produce the injury or damage" … It is essential to this process of determining the causal field that many things, such as the manufacture and sale of the revolver, which are in truth "but for" conditions are excluded. And the reason for their exclusion is a reason of policy, definition, or the like, being a matter which is not determined by the mere application of "but for" considerations. It is, I think, for reasons of this kind that the "but for" test has been suggested by Hart and Honoré as in the end not acceptable and not an explanation of what the courts do in determining causality …

Appeal allowed on grounds so far argued.

Stuart v Condor Commercial Insulation

[27.95] Stuart Pty Ltd v Condor Commercial Insulation Pty Ltd [2006] NSWCA 334 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Appeal from Murrell J.

[FACTS: Stuart Pty Ltd (the appellant) was a construction company. It contracted with the Commonwealth of Australia to replace insulation in a number of residential properties in Sydney under the Sydney Aircraft Noise Insulation Program (SANIP). The appellant then sub-contracted this work to Condor Commercial Insulation Pty Ltd (the respondent), with each property subject to a separate agreement. SANIP cancelled its contract with the appellant after a fire broke out in one of the properties due to the respondent's negligence. The appellant brought proceedings against the respondent, claiming damages for the loss of profits that followed the termination of its contract with SANIP and its consequent inability to secure contracts for further unallocated houses under the program.

The trial judge found that the fire was the principal reason that SANIP suspended the allocation of work to the appellant and that the faulty workmanship led to the termination of the contract. However, the trial judge dismissed the appellant's claim for damages as too remote.]

Legal principles

BEAZLEY JA: [32] A party may recover damages for breach of contract:

> … such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, ie, according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it. (Hadley v Baxendale at 354 (emphasis added)).

[33] It is the second limb (italicised portion) of the rule with which this case is concerned.

[34] In C Czarnikow Ltd v Koufos [1969] 1 AC 350 the House of Lords was concerned with the question whether a shipowner was liable for the charterers' loss of profit, when, in breach of the charterparty, it had deviated from the proposed route whilst carrying a consignment of sugar, resulting in the ship being delayed by some nine or ten days. During that period sugar prices had dropped. The shipowner knew that the charterers were sugar merchants and that there was a sugar market in Basrah, the port of destination. It had no actual knowledge, however, that the charterer intended to sell the sugar promptly after its arrival.

[35] Lord Reid, after considering the rule in Hadley v Baxendale, stated at 385:

> I am satisfied that the court did not intend that every type of damage which was reasonably foreseeable by the parties when the contract was made should either be considered as arising naturally, ie, in the usual course of things, or be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties … the decision makes it clear that a type of damage which was plainly foreseeable as a real possibility but which would only occur in a small minority of cases cannot … be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties: the parties are not supposed to contemplate as grounds for the recovery of damage any type of loss or damage which on the knowledge available to the defendant would appear to him as only likely to occur in a small minority of cases.
>
> In cases like Hadley v Baxendale or the present case it is not enough that in fact the plaintiff's loss was directly caused by the defendant's breach of contract. It clearly was so caused in both. The crucial question is whether, on the information available to the defendant when the contract was made, he should, or the reasonable man in his position would, have realised … that loss of that kind should have been within his contemplation.
>
> His Lordship pointed out that the liability to pay damages under contract was more restricted than was the liability in tort.

[36] Lord Reid also reviewed a number of other cases, including R & H Hall Ltd v WH Pim (Junior) & Co Ltd (1928) 33 Com Cas 324; [1928] All ER 763. His Lordship continued at 388 that Hall's case established that damages were not too remote:

> [M]erely because, on the knowledge available to the defendant when the contract was made, the chance of the occurrence of the event which caused the damage would have appeared to him to be rather less than an even chance.
>
> His Lordship considered that it was "generally sufficient that [the event that caused the damage] would have appeared to the defendant as not unlikely to occur" (emphasis added), noting that probabilities usually could not be assessed with any degree of mathematical > accuracy. However, there is a difference between when a consequence of breach was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties and when a consequence was reasonably foreseeable: see Lord Reid at 385. As his Lordship pointed out, at 389, "a great many extremely unlikely results are reasonably foreseeable".

[37] Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest took a similar approach. He said at 396:

> On the facts of the present case it is however pertinent to pose the enquiry as to what the natural ordinary and sensible answer of the appellant would have been if he had asked himself what the result for the respondents would be if he (the appellant) in breach of contract and therefore unjustifiably caused his ship to arrive at Basrah some nine or ten days later than it could and should have arrived.

[38] His Lordship noted that the appellant did not know precisely what plans the respondent had for the sale of the sugar. Nonetheless, his Lordship considered that the appellant:

> … could and should at the very least have contemplated that if his ship was nine days later in arriving than it could and should have arrived some financial loss to the respondents or to an endorsee of the bill of lading might result.

[39] His Lordship stated that it was not necessary, for the contract breaker to be liable, that the loss that did result was one that could be seen as being certain to result. His Lordship continued at 397:

> If a party has suffered some special and peculiar loss in reference to some particular arrangements of his which were unknown to the other party and were not communicated to the other party and were not therefore in the contemplation of the parties at the time when they made their contract, then it would be unfair and unreasonable to charge the contract-breaker with such special and peculiar loss. If, however, there are no "special and extraordinary circumstances beyond the reasonable prevision of the parties" … then it becomes very largely a question of fact as to whether in any particular case a loss can "fairly and reasonably" be constituted as arising in the normal course of things.

[40] On that approach, his Lordship considered that the result in any particular case did not depend upon having to make a choice between phrases such as "liable to result" or "likely to result" or "not unlikely to result". As his Lordship observed, each of these phrases might be helpful but so might many others.

[41] Lord Hodson, at 410-411, considered that damage was recoverable if it was contemplated as "liable to result". Lord Pearce, at 414-5, used the expression "serious possibility or real danger".

[42] Lord Upjohn at 422, observed that the recovery of damages in tort and under contract was different and that under the second limb of Hadley v Baxendale the entitlement to damages depended upon the "assumed common knowledge and contemplation of the parties". At 424, his Lordship said that the question to be determined was:

> [W]hat as a practical matter is to be taken as within the contemplation of both parties as the result of a breach?

His Lordship remarked upon the variety of expressions that had been used in the cases, namely:

> [L]ikelihood; possibility must have been in the minds of both parties; a matter commercially to be taken into account; a serious possibility or a real danger; a grave risk and stated at 425, that he was prepared to adopt as the test a "real danger" or a "serious possibility".

(1993) 176 CLR 344 at 368. See also Simonius Vischer v Holt & Thompson [1979] 2 NSWLR 322 at 363. McHugh JA expressed a preference for Lord Reid's formulation.

[44] McHugh JA pointed out at 365 that the actual decisions in Hadley v Baxendale and Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd [1949] 2 KB 528 arose out of the proposition that "the contemplation test" limited the area of potential liability. In that regard, his Honour considered that an important matter in determining whether the loss or damage was too remote was:

> [T]he extent to which the parties may be taken to have contemplated the events giving rise to the loss or damage.

[45] His Honour considered that it was not necessary for the parties to contemplate the degree or extent of the loss that was in fact suffered or the precise details of the events giving rise to the loss. It was sufficient, for the contract breaker to be liable, that the parties contemplated the kind or type of loss or damage that was suffered. Under that approach general loss of profits is a recoverable loss but loss of profits from a specially lucrative contract of which a defendant was unaware is not. McHugh JA pointed out, at 366, that "the parties must contemplate both the general nature of the loss or damage and the general manner of its occurrence".

[46] It is apparent from his Honour's consideration of the principles that apply in determining whether a loss is recoverable within the second limb of Hadley v Baxendale, that it is the assumed or deemed contemplation of the parties that is relevant. However, as his Honour pointed out at 367, whilst it is unnecessary that the parties should have contemplated that the precise loss or damage would have occurred precisely in the way that it came about, it was necessary, in some general way, for the parties to contemplate both the type of damage suffered and the manner in which it occurred.

[47] In Seven Seas Properties Ltd v Al-Essa (No 2) [1993] 1 WLR 1083, the plaintiff had agreed to purchase a leasehold property from the defendants. On the same day as entering into that contract, the plaintiff on-sold the property to a third party at a profit. Both contracts were to be completed on the same day. Upon the defendants learning that the plaintiff had on-sold the property for a profit they refused to complete. The third party sued the plaintiff for loss of bargain. The plaintiff in turn sued the defendants claiming damages in respect of the losses it suffered from being unable to complete its contract with the third party.

[48] The plaintiff based its claim under the second limb in Hadley v Baxendale. It argued that, in the special circumstances known to the defendants, it might reasonably be supposed to have been in their contemplation that the plaintiff might enter into such a contract and that if it did so, a breach of contract by the defendant was liable, and indeed likely, to put the plaintiff in breach of any such contract of resale and would occasion loss or damage. The special circumstances relied upon were: the character of the premises, being a block of flats that needed refurbishment; the fact that property professionals were likely interested purchasers of the property who might be expected to buy in order to turn the property to account, as the opportunity might arise and to resell quickly if the price available was right; and the buoyant state of the property market at the time.

[49] Gavin Lightman QC, sitting as a deputy High Court judge, accepted that these special circumstances had been established. He then considered the circumstances in which the losses occasioned to a purchaser by reason of the existence of a subcontract were recoverable, noting that without more they were not recoverable under the first limb of Hadley v Baxendale. A defaulting party was liable under the second limb by way of damages for the losses which, as at the date of the contract, the defaulting party was on notice might be occasioned by a breach so that it might fairly be held that when entering into the contract the non-defaulting party had accepted such risk. Mr Lightman QC said that for that purpose, a party was on notice of facts actually known by him; known by his agent and in respect of which it was the agent's duty to communicate to him; and which he should reasonably have deduced from either of these sources of knowledge. He continued, at 1088, that the defaulting party:

> … will only be held to have accepted the risk if he was on notice of the purpose and intent of the plaintiff in entering into the contract with him, and the consequent exposure of the plaintiff to the risk of damage of the character in question in the event of the defendant's breach.

[50] In relation to a claim by a purchaser to recover losses arising under a sub contract, Mr Lightman QC held that it was necessary for the plaintiff to establish that the defendant was on notice at the date of the contract of the purpose and intent on the part of the plaintiff to enter into the subcontract and that the plaintiff's fulfilment of the subcontract depended upon the defendant's performance of his contractual obligations to the plaintiff.

[51] In Castle Constructions Pty Limited v Fekala Pty Limited [2006] NSWCA 133 at [39] Mason P stated, in relation to the second limb in Hadley v Baxendale, that:

> [T]he law is conscious of the injustice of visiting the party in breach with the consequences of a loss that was not within that party's reasonable contemplation when contracting.

[52] The reason for this is because, were it otherwise, the defaulting party may have lost the opportunity to make an informed decision as to whether or not to have accepted the risk. His Honour referred to the reasons of Gavin Lightman QC at 1088 to which I have referred. In my opinion, being in an informed position so as to decide whether to accept the risk would include having sufficient information to assess whether insurance cover for the risks concerned ought to be obtained.

[53] The same point was made in Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 WLR 1428, where the question arose as to whether a penalty clause in a contract was a genuine pre-estimate of loss. In discussing that question, Diplock LJ said, at 1447-1448:

> … the plaintiff may be able to show that owing to special circumstances outside "the ordinary course of things" a breach in those special circumstances would be liable to cause him a greater loss of which the stipulated sum does represent a genuine estimate. In the absence of any special clause in the contract, this enhanced loss due to the existence of such special circumstances would not be recoverable at common law from the defendant as damages for the breach under the so-called "second rule" in Hadley v Baxendale unless knowledge of the special circumstances had been brought home to the defendant at the time of the contract in such a way as to give rise to the inference that the defendant impliedly undertook to bear any special loss referable to a breach in those special circumstances.

[54] His Lordship recognised that the rationale for a defendant's liability under the "second rule" in Hadley v Baxendale is an implied undertaking by the defendant to the plaintiff to bear such loss. Actual knowledge of the special circumstances is relevant as one of the factors from which this undertaking can be implied. His Lordship also considered that in order to be liable under the second rule, the defendant should have acquired this knowledge from the plaintiff, or at least that he should know that the plaintiff knew that the defendant was possessed of it at the time the contract was entered into and so could reasonably foresee at that time that an enhanced loss was liable to result from a breach. His Lordship concluded that where both these factors are present, the defendant's conduct in entering into the contract without disclaiming liability for the foreseeable enhanced loss gives rise to the implication that the defendant undertakes to bear such loss.

[55] In Oxley County Council v Macdonald & Ors; Brambles Holdings Ltd v Macdonald & Ors [1999] NSWCA 126 this Court (Sheller JA, Priestley and Powell JJA agreeing) pointed out that remoteness is a question of fact: see Monarch Steamship Co Limited v Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A/B) [1949] AC 196 at 223; Wenham v Ella at 466-7. In Oxley and Brambles an employee of Oxley's had been injured whilst unloading equipment transported by Brambles. He sued both Oxley and Brambles and succeeded against both. Oxley and Brambles each brought a claim against the other for breach of contract.

[56] Oxley alleged breach of an implied term of the contract that it load the goods in a safe and proper manner so that they could be unloaded safely. It was held that such an implied term was an incident of the contract of carriage and had been breached. Sheller JA at [61] said that:

> … there could … be little doubt that if Oxley suffered damage as a result of the breach of [the] contract, the measure of damages would be the damages and costs Oxley was required to pay to the plaintiff and the costs Oxley incurred in defending the proceedings.

[57] His Honour considered that this followed from Florida Hotels Pty Limited v Mayo (1965) 113 CLR 591 at 598-9. Florida Hotels involved a similar situation where an employer was responsible to its employee plaintiff for a work place injury. The accident had occurred in part due to inadequate supervision by the architect. It was held that the possibility of liability of the employer for injury to its employees flowing from the consequences of lack of supervision of the architect must have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties and the architects were thus liable to the employer for the damages that the employer was required to pay to its injured employee.

[58] Oxley was responsible for the unloading. The Court found that Oxley was contractually obliged to do so without damaging Brambles' property or injuring Brambles' employee or contractor. The Court considered however that a claim to recover damages from Oxley being the amount of its liability to the injured plaintiff, was too remote. Sheller JA said at [69]:

> Brambles' claim in contract is not so clear. It was obliged to carry the goods to the Oxley depot and there deliver them on its truck. Oxley had the obligation of unloading. No doubt it was contractually obliged to do so so as not to damage Brambles' property or injure Brambles' employee or contractor. But the damages for breach of the contract which Brambles now claims to recover, being the amount of its liability to the plaintiff, were, in my opinion, too remote. I say this for the following reasons. The degree of probability that Oxley's breach of the contract would cause Brambles to suffer loss as the result of a claim against it by an employee of Oxley for injuries suffered was such as to make the loss wholly unpredictable; see generally Greig & Davis, The Law of Contract, at 1376. In my opinion, damages for the loss which Oxley suffered as a result of the injury to its employee and its liability as employer to that employee could fairly and reasonably be considered to arise according to the usual course of things from Brambles' breach of its contractual obligation to load and secure the goods with reasonable care and skill. However, I do not think that the possibility of Brambles' liability to Oxley's employee flowing from the consequence of Oxley's failure to unload the goods with reasonable care and skill could fairly and reasonably be considered to arise according to the usual course of things; compare Florida Hotels v Mayo at 598. Nor do I think such damages could reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as not unlikely to occur; compare Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex 341 at 355; 156 ER 145 at 151; Koufos v C Czarnikow Limited [1969] 1 AC 350 at 388; Alexander v Cambridge Credit Corporation (1987) 9 NSWLR 310 at 363 and following per McHugh JA.

[59] In Carter and Harland, Contract Law in Australia (2002, 4th ed), the learned authors state at [2128] that the most difficult aspect of the second limb "is the extent to which the defendant must have agreed to accept the risk of the damage". They refer to Diplock LJ's identification of the matters relevant to determining whether an undertaking to bear the risk of damage ought to be implied: see [53] above. The authors then state that:

> In order to rebut the presumption implied by actual knowledge [of the special circumstances] the defendant must show that there was no acceptance of the risk of liability for the damage.

[60] They indicate that, in commercial contracts, this might be achieved by an express clause in the contract, but that:

> [I]n respect of other types of contracts the defendant may perhaps rely on the fact that the price for performance is out of all proportion with the risk implied by the knowledge obtained.

[61] It is clear, however, that an express clause in the contract is not necessary, regardless of how one might characterise the contract: see Czarnikow v Koufos per Upjohn LJ at 421-422. See generally Greig and Davis, The Law of Contract (1987).

Conclusion on remoteness

[27.100] [88] In deciding whether the appellant has established an entitlement to damages under the second limb, the following matters require determination. The first is whether it could be said that the loss was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties. In this case, that question is, for the most part, although not solely, determined by having regard to the question whether the respondent was aware of special circumstances such as to enable the court to conclude that it would have been in the reasonable contemplation of both parties that the appellant would lose the SANIP contract if the respondent breached its contract with the appellant: see Robophone at 1447-1448. The second relates to the event that gave rise to the loss: see Czarnikow v Koufos at 385, in the extract set out at [36] above.

Was the loss in the reasonable contemplation of the parties?

[27.105] [89] The respondent submitted that it was apparent that the damages in this case were too remote when regard was had to the rationale that underlay the second limb in Hadley v Baxendale, namely, the circumstances in which a party would be fairly held to have accepted the risk of the loss that is claimed. It contended that that the type of damage which occurred here, being the loss of the appellant's contract with SANIP, was such as would occur only in a small minority of cases, and thus was not in the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time that they entered into the contract. Rather, the loss that the parties would reasonably have in their contemplation as a result of failing to perform the work in a good and workmanlike manner would be the carrying out of, or possibly the cost of carrying out, rectification work.

[90] In this case, there is no doubt that the appellant would have been liable to the homeowner for the loss caused by the fire and that loss would have been recoverable from the respondent under the first limb of Hadley v Baxendale notwithstanding the catastrophic result of the breach. But even if that loss was not recoverable under the first limb, it would have been recoverable under the second, because it would have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties that damage might be caused to a property where faulty work had been performed and that rectification work would have to be done. It is irrelevant that the parties had not contemplated that the damage to the property as a result of the faulty workmanship was a fire or that such damage was greater than the parties had contemplated. It was sufficient that the parties contemplated the general nature of the loss — on this example, namely, damage to property: see Alexander v Cambridge Credit at 336; Oxley County Council v Macdonald (see at [58] above).

[91] However, that is not the loss which is being claimed. The appellant claims damages for loss of its contract with SANIP, with whom the respondent had no contractual arrangement: cf Alexander v Cambridge Credit at 358. That contract was terminated in the circumstances already discussed — namely, that after an initial suspension of work during which time SANIP undertook an audit of the work undertaken by the appellant, all of which had been performed by the respondent, SANIP terminated the appellant's contract for the appellant's breach of contract, including a failure to properly supervise the work. The trial judge found that the fire was the principal reason that SANIP suspended the allocation of work to the appellant and that the laying of the insulation over the downlights was also one of the matters that led to the termination of contract.

[92] The question as to whether damage or loss would reasonably have been in the contemplation of the parties is an evaluative process. In this case, I am of the opinion that it would reasonably have been in the contemplation of the parties that if the respondent failed to perform the work in a good and workmanlike manner as required under its contract with the appellant, the appellant would most likely have replaced the respondent with another contractor. In that case, it may have suffered loss due to a delay in being able to find a new contractor. It may also have suffered loss because a new contractor may have quoted higher prices than those agreed between the appellant and the respondent so that the appellant's profit margin on each house was thereby reduced. Such losses would likely to have been recoverable under the second limb of Hadley v Baxendale. In my opinion, however, the loss in fact claimed is not one the risk of which the respondent is likely to have undertaken, even if it was aware of special circumstances relating to the contract.

[93] As Diplock LJ explained in the passage set out above at [53] above, if the appellant is able to show "that owing to special circumstances outside 'the ordinary course of things' a breach in those special circumstances would be liable to cause him a greater loss" than the stipulated sum, or I would add, damages claimable under the first limb of Hadley v Baxendale, then that greater loss is recoverable within the second limb.

[94] In this case the "special circumstance" is the appellant's contract with SANIP. The respondent knew of that contract and knew that the appellant expected it to be profitable and that there were a large number of houses upon which work was to be undertaken. Apart from that however, the respondent did not know its terms. On the approach taken in Robophone, that may be sufficient for the Court to infer or presume that the respondent undertook the risk, unless it could be established that there were other factors upon which any such inference could be rebutted.

[95] In this case, there are two particular considerations that are relevant to the "rebuttal" of any such inference. First, the supervision of the works was the responsibility of the appellant in the way I have explained above. The respondent did not undertake any contractual responsibility to supervise the work on behalf of the appellant and it was not paid for the supervision of the work. The only "supervision" undertaken by Condor was that Mr Kirkness, as the respondents' project manager, was required to ensure that the work was properly performed. That was work undertaken for Condor, as I have already said.

[96] Secondly, under its own contract with SANIP, the appellant remained responsible for the works. The loss claimed in this case is not a loss that arises directly as between the appellant and respondent. Rather, the loss relates to a contract between SANIP and the appellant allegedly caused by the breach of the contract between the appellant and the respondent. In circumstances where, under its contract with SANIP, the appellant remained responsible for all work carried out by sub-contractors, I am of the opinion that it would not have been in the reasonable contemplation of the respondent that poor workmanship on its part would result in the loss of the appellant's entire contract with SANIP. I also doubt that it would have been in the appellant's own reasonable contemplation.

[97] Further, the contract amount for the individual contracts between the appellant and the respondent was quite small and the respondent had no contractual right to any ongoing relationship. Rather, each house was the subject of a separate contract, although at the time that this contract was entered into, the respondent did have an expectation of being the beneficiary of the work allocated to the appellant by SANIP. However, in the absence of any contractual right to such work, and where each job involved a contract price of about $10,000, I consider that the contract price was so out of proportion to the risk of being liable for damages for the loss of the appellant's contract with SANIP not to be within the reasonable contemplation of the parties.

Was the event that caused the loss one that was "not unlikely to occur"?

[27.110] [98] Although the test for the second limb in Hadley v Baxendale is usually expressed in terms which focuses upon loss of the kind that was suffered and asks whether such loss would have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time that they entered into the contract, Lord Reid in Czarnikow v Koufos at 388 also considered it relevant to have regard to the event that gave rise to the loss. If the event would have appeared to the respondent as not unlikely to occur, that would be sufficient to establish liability.

[99] That is of particular significance in this case. The respondent's breach of contract was a failure to perform work in a good and workmanlike manner. That breach had an immediate catastrophic consequence — namely, a fire that destroyed a house. In the way in which the authorities permit reference to the "event" that gave rise to the loss, the "event" in this case, in my opinion, was the fire.

[100] The trial judge did not make a finding as to whether the fire was something that appeared to the defendant as "not unlikely" to occur. She did state that all witnesses agreed that it was bad building practice to put insulation directly over a downlight, as they could overheat, giving rise to a risk of fire. However, that comment was made in that part of her Honour's judgment dealing with the cause of the fire, where she was considering the expert evidence alone.

[101] An examination of the evidence of the respondent's witnesses, Mr Lambert and Mr Kirkness, reveals that neither had an understanding that a fire was "not unlikely" to occur, although it appears both knew it was bad building practice to place insulation over downlights. Mr Lambert knew that if there were downlights, special treatment was needed. No more was established from his evidence than that. Mr Kirkness agreed that it was a well-known potential hazard that insulation shouldn't come into contact with downlights. However, he denied that if the insulation was not kept away from the downlights there was a risk of fire. He said that if the insulation did come into contact:

> … it was probably more a potential that the down light would fail through overheating than the insulation catch fire because it was actually rated not to spread a fire through the roof. The idea of the insulation was to actually melt and pull away from the heat source, whether it be a down light, a faulty wire connection or anything like that … insulation is designed to not ignite and if it does ignite it will self-extinguish or the insulations that we were using would pull away from the heat source and not spread the flame. It was bad practice to put insulation over a down light because what would usually happen you would have the down light failing all the time.

He explained that the downlight would fail because of overheating.

[102] The respondent contended that the fire which occurred in the house some months after the insulation work had been completed was an unusual catastrophic event and was not one of which it could be said was "not unlikely to occur". Given the evidence to which I have just referred, this is correct and no other conclusion could have been reached on the evidence. Accordingly, this basis for the application of Hadley v Baxendale had not been made out.

[103] Accordingly, I agree with the trial judge's assessment that the cancellation of the appellant's contract with the resultant loss of profits on such balance of the work as might have been allocated to the appellant by SANIP was a loss that would not have been in the reasonable contemplation of the parties and was too remote.

[104] It follows that I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

IPP JA:

[27.115] [107] I agree generally with the reasons to be published by Beazley JA, which I have had the benefit of reading. I wish to set out in my own words my reasons for agreeing with the orders her Honour proposes. …

[119] In the present case, there is little doubt that Stuart's claimed loss of profits was reasonably foreseeable. This, however, is not to the point.

[120] In terms of the contract between Stuart and SANIP, Stuart remained responsible for the workmanship of any works it sub-contracted. Had Stuart complied with its contractual obligations to SANIP, it would have taken steps to ensure that the sub-contracted work included boxing the down-lights. As Beazley JA points out, prior to the work being done, when a representative of Stuart attended at the premises with representatives of the other parties to "scope" the works, Stuart's representative, like the others, failed to detect the presence of the down-lights. Stuart neither specified in the purchase order the work of boxing the down-lights nor, once the work was complete, did it physically verify whether down-lights in the dwelling had been boxed. I repeat: by failing to have the down-lights boxed, Stuart committed a breach of its contract with SANIP.

[121] In my view, it would not reasonably have been in Condor's contemplation when it entered into the contract with Stuart that not only would it (Condor) breach its contract with Stuart by missing the existence of the down-lights in the dwelling (and not boxing them), but Stuart, too, would breach its contract with SANIP by failing to detect the same down-lights (with the result that the insulation came into direct contact with the lights). For this reason I agree with the orders proposed by Beazley JA.

[122] There is another point to which Beazley JA draws attention. The trial judge stated that all witnesses agreed that if a down-light was not boxed, the light — when switched on — would heat the insulation and, eventually, the insulation could be set on fire. Beazley JA points out, however, that this finding ignores the evidence of Condor's witnesses who testified that the insulation was designed not to ignite and not to spread flames when heated. The finding, therefore, was made in error.

[123] The effect of the evidence of Condor's witnesses is that, because of their belief in the non-inflammable qualities of the insulating material, Condor did not contemplate that its breach in not boxing the down-lights would cause a fire to break out. In view of the trial judge's omission to have regard to this evidence, there is no reliable finding that Condor, reasonably, should have contemplated that such a breach would have caused a fire. For this reason, too, the appeal should succeed.

Appeal dismissed.

MITIGATION OF DAMAGE

[27.120] McGregor on Damages (19th ed, 2014), [250], states the principle of mitigation as follows:

> The principal meaning itself comprises three different, although closely inter-related, rules. This analysis into three rules, although clearly implicit in the cases, is one which has not formerly been given explicit statement in English law. It is submitted that such a division lends clarity to a difficult topic. The three rules are these:
>
> (1) The first and most important rule is that the plaintiff must take all reasonable steps to mitigate the loss to him consequent upon the defendant's wrong and cannot recover damages for any such loss which he could thus have avoided but has failed, through unreasonable action or inaction, to avoid. Put shortly, the plaintiff cannot recover for avoidable loss.
> (2) The second rule is the corollary of the first and is that, where the plaintiff does take reasonable steps to mitigate the loss to him consequent upon the defendant's wrong, he can recover for loss incurred in so doing; this is so even though the resulting damage is in the event greater than it would have been had the mitigating steps not been taken. Put shortly, the plaintiff can recover for loss incurred in reasonable attempts to avoid loss.

(3) The third rule is that, where the plaintiff does take steps to mitigate the loss to him consequent upon the defendant's wrong and these steps are successful, the defendant is entitled to the benefit accruing from the plaintiff's action and is liable only for the loss as lessened; this is so even though the plaintiff would not have been debarred under the first rule for recovering the whole loss, which would have accrued in the absence of his successful mitigating steps, by reason of these steps not being ones which were required of him under the first rule. Put shortly, the plaintiff cannot recover for avoided loss.

Reasonable steps in mitigation and the impecunious plaintiff

[27.125] Burns v MAN Automotive (Aust) Pty Ltd (1986) 161 CLR 653 raises the question of how the first of the three rules stated by McGregor (extracted at [27.120]) should be applied where the plaintiff's own impecuniosity prevented him or her from taking reasonable steps to mitigate the loss in question.

Burns v MAN Automotive (Aust)

[27.130] Burns v MAN Automotive (Aust) Pty Ltd (1986) 161 CLR 653 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: In 1977, Burns (the appellant), a road haulier, bought a prime mover from MAN Automotive (the respondent). The respondent warranted that the vehicle's engine had been fully reconditioned. The respondent knew that the appellant intended to use the vehicle in his business and should also have known that he was not in affluent circumstances. In July 1978, the appellant learned that the engine had not been fully reconditioned at the time he bought it and that it was very defective. The respondent would not rectify the state of the engine, although pressed by the appellant to do so. The appellant could not afford to pay the $7,000 to $8,000 required at that time to put the engine in the warranted condition. The defective state of the engine meant that the vehicle could not be used on interstate routes. Instead, until the end of 1979, the appellant used the vehicle within his own State, and the business was carried on at a loss. At the end of 1979, the vehicle broke down again, and a short time later, it was repossessed by the finance company, Esanda, involved in the transaction. The appellant sued the respondent in the Supreme Court of Queensland for damages for breach of warranty. The damages awarded to the appellant included a sum for loss of earnings for the period of four years after the date of purchase upon the footing that it was the period for which the engine would have been expected to operate efficiently if it had been fully reconditioned. The respondent appealed to the Full Court of the Supreme Court, which held that the appellant could not recover for loss of profits after the condition of the engine had been discovered in July 1978. The appellant appealed to the High Court against the reduction of damages.]

GIBBS CJ: [657] There can be no doubt that it was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties at the time when the contract was made that if the warranty was broken the appellant might lose the profits which he might otherwise have made in the business of an interstate haulier. According to the finding of the learned trial judge, the appellant might have been able, with the use of a prime mover whose engine had been fully reconditioned, to earn such profits for four years. The appellant had made known to representatives of the respondent the purpose for which he intended to use the vehicle, and if the engine was not in a fully reconditioned state a loss of profits was a serious possibility at the time when the contract was [658] made. In accordance with the rule in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex 341 [156 ER 145], as explained in Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd [1949] 2 KB 528; C Czarnikow Ltd v Koufos [1969] 1 AC 350; and Wenham v Ella (1972) 127 CLR 454, any loss of profits proved to have resulted from the fact that the engine was not fully reconditioned would, subject to the considerations which I am about to mention, be recoverable as damages for breach of warranty.

The learned judges in the Full Court of the Supreme Court restricted the damages for loss of profits to the loss incurred in the period which ended in July 1978. …

I consider that this is a case in which it is necessary to consider whether the appellant did what he could to mitigate the damage caused by the breach of warranty. As I have said, a loss of profits for the four years during which the reconditioned engine could probably have been used was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties as a consequence of a breach of the warranty. Notwithstanding the much criticized decision in Liesbosch, Dredger v Edison, SS (Owners) [1933] AC 449, any damage which resulted from a breach of the contract, and was reasonably within the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made, is recoverable even though the appellant's impecuniosity contributed to it: Monarch Steamship Co Ltd v Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A/B) [1949] AC 196, at 224; Trans Trust SPRL v Danubian Trading Co Ltd [1952] 2 QB 297, at 302, 306, 307. However, the appellant was bound to take all reasonable steps to mitigate the loss, and one course open to him to mitigate the damage, if he could have afforded to take it, was to have the engine reconditioned or to buy another to replace it. However, his impecuniosity prevented him from taking that course. The question arises whether it should be held that the appellant is [659] debarred from claiming such part of the damages as is attributable to his failure to take the necessary steps in mitigation, when he was unable to take those steps because of his lack of means.

That question must be answered in the negative. In Liesbosch, Dredger v Edison, SS (Owners) [1933] AC, pp 460-1 Lord Wright, in dealing with the effect of impecuniosity in the assessment of damages in tort, drew a distinction between the measure of damages and the victim's duty to minimize damage. After referring to a passage from the speech of Lord Collins in Clippens Oil Co Ltd v Edinburgh and District Water Trustees [1907] AC 291, at 303, which indicates that a wrongdoer is liable for the consequences flowing from his wrongful act notwithstanding that the victim was unable, by reason of lack of funds, to take the steps necessary to mitigate the loss, Lord Wright went on to say [1933] AC, at 461: "But, as I think it is clear that Lord Collins is here dealing not with measure of damage, but with the victim's duty to minimize damage, which is quite a different matter, the dictum is not in point."

The reason for this distinction is not altogether clear and the distinction has not always been observed: see, eg, Martindale v Duncan [1973] 1 WLR 574, at 577; [1973] 2 All ER 355, at 358. However, a plaintiff's duty to mitigate his damage does not require him to do what is unreasonable and it would seem unjust to prevent a plaintiff from recovering in full damages caused by a breach of contract simply because he lacked the means to avert the consequences of the breach. There are in the present case, the additional features that the financial difficulties of the appellant were largely brought about by the actions of the respondent in supplying him with a defective engine and refusing properly to rectify the defects, although the respondent should have known that the appellant lacked the financial resources that would have enabled him to pay to have the engine reconditioned. I respectfully agree with the statement of Megaw LJ in Dodd Properties v Canterbury City Council [1980] 1 WLR 433, at 453; [1980] 1 All ER 928, at 935:

> A plaintiff who is under a duty to mitigate is not obliged, in order to reduce the damages, to do that which he cannot afford to do: particularly where, as here, the plaintiffs' "financial stringency", so far as it was relevant at all, arose, as a matter of common sense, if not as a matter of law, solely as a consequence of the defendants' wrongdoing. ((1986) 161 CLR 653 at 660.)

Further, in Perry v Sidney Phillips & Son [1982] 1 WLR 1297, at 1307; [1982] 3 All ER 705, at 712, Kerr LJ said:

> If it is reasonably foreseeable that the plaintiff may be unable to mitigate or remedy the consequence of the other party's breach as soon as he would have done if he had been provided with the necessary means to do so from the other party, then it seems to me that the principle of The Liesbosch ([1933] AC 449) no longer applies in its full rigour.

… For these reasons it appears to me that the appellant is entitled to recover whatever damage it has been proved that he suffered by way of loss of profits that would otherwise have been earned during the four years of the effective life of the motor. However, there is another reason why the appellant did not do all that he reasonably could to mitigate his damage. It was not reasonable for him to carry on his business with the defective prime mover, once he knew that he was operating at a loss and should have known that he had no prospect of making a profit. As Connolly J pointed out, this was not a case of a purchaser locked into a business; the appellant was under no compulsion to go on losing money. In the calculation of damages it was not wrong to hold that the respondent should not be charged with actual losses incurred by the appellant after June 1978, although the appellant was entitled to any loss of profit suffered after that date, if such loss was proved … I would dismiss the appeal.

[27.135] WILSON, DEANE and DAWSON JJ: [666] In this Court counsel for the appellant argued that the Full Court failed to apply the established rule governing the assessment of damages in cases of breach of contract, namely, that the injured party is to be put into the position in which he would have been if the representation had been true. He argued that had the engine been fully reconditioned as warranted, the appellant could have expected to have four years or 200 000 miles of profitable interstate haulage. He was therefore entitled to receive as compensation for the breach of warranty all the net profits he could have expected to receive during those four years and, in addition, reimbursement of the losses he actually suffered in the two years during which he [667] persisted in operating his business at a loss … Counsel for the appellant correctly states the general rule of the common law which forms the starting point of a consideration of the assessment of damages. In Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex 850, at 855 [154 ER 363, at 365] Parke B expressed it as being that "where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract, he is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed". See also C Czarnikow Ltd v Koufos [1969] 1 AC 350, at 400, 414, 420. However, the submission overlooks the fact that the general principle is limited by the rule laid down by the Court of Exchequer in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex 341, at 354 [156 ER 145, at 151], that is to say:

> Where two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally, ie, according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties, at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it.

These well-known principles have been discussed by Gibbs J (as his Honour then was) in Wenham v Ella (1972) 127 CLR 454, at 471-2. His Honour reminds us that the rule in Hadley v Baxendale was expounded in C Czarnikow Ltd v Koufos, where Lord Reid said [1969] 1 AC, at 385:

> The crucial question is whether, on the information available to the defendant when the contract was made, he should, or the reasonable man in his position would, have realised that such loss was sufficiently likely to result from the breach of contract to make it proper to hold that the loss flowed naturally from the breach or that loss of that kind should have been within his contemplation.

This was a straightforward contract leading to the acquisition by the appellant of a chattel on hire-purchase. Within a month of his taking possession of the vehicle the appellant returned it to the respondent for repair or replacement of the fuel pump and injectors. His evidence was that he was then told by a servant of the [668] respondent that the engine had not been fully reconditioned. Had he established a breach of warranty at that time, the measure of damages would have been the cost of then reconditioning the engine, about $7 000, together with the resultant loss of profits whilst the vehicle was out of action. The Full Court may have been generous in their approach to the appellant's case in holding that it was not until July 1978 that he was fully apprised of the deplorable state of the engine; on the other hand, the holding may reflect a sensitive appreciation of the difficulty faced by the appellant in his struggle to make a success of the new venture with no financial resources behind him and his consequent inability to face the reality of his situation. But by July 1978 that reality could be disguised no longer.

We have given careful attention to the sad history of the appellant's experiences with the prime mover but in our opinion the Full Court's decision is not open to attack. It was not a case where the appellant was locked into a situation from which he could not escape, as was the case, eg, in Doyle v Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd [1969] 2 QB 158 and in Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215. In each of those cases the injured party was tricked into buying a business and in such cases different considerations may apply. The appellant accepted in July 1978 that he could no longer carry on interstate haulage operations. He decided to commit the vehicle to the less demanding and less profitable operation of carting machinery parts to coal mines in Queensland. If he was then unable to have the engine fully reconditioned, he could have terminated the hiring. Clause 5 of the hire-purchase agreement expressly secured to him the right to terminate the hiring at any time by returning the vehicle in accordance with s 12 of the Hire Purchase Act 1959 (Qld). There is no reason to suppose that he could not then have received adequate compensation by appropriate action against the respondent.

Furthermore, we think, with respect, that Connolly J was correct in saying that this was not a case of mitigation of damage at all. It called simply for a determination of that point in time, beyond which any damage suffered by the appellant could not be said to have been within the reasonable contemplation of the parties as flowing from the breach. The effect of impecuniosity upon an injured party's obligation to mitigate the damage flowing from a breach of contract was indeed irrelevant to that question. It may have been a relevant consideration if the Full Court had found that the appellant was to be fixed with knowledge of the breach of warranty in August 1977 or at the latest after the breakdown in [669] November 1977. In substance their Honours held that the stage at which the appellant's position had finally crystallized from the point of view of the assessment of damages under the ordinary principles of contract law was reached in July 1978. By then, the damages had come home in that it was obvious that the vehicle should either have been made good or the appellant's possession of it relinquished. Connolly J aptly summed up the matter by saying:

> The respondent [the appellant in this Court] was not, in my judgment, entitled to hang on and charge the appellant with the profits of a business which he himself had abandoned and with losses which he need never have incurred.

… We would dismiss the appeal.

[27.140] BRENNAN J (dissenting): [672] In contract, the starting point of a consideration of the assessment of damages is the general principle that the plaintiff is to be placed in the same situation as if the contract had been performed: Wenham v Ella (1972) 127 CLR 454, at 460, 471. The general principle is qualified so as to limit recovery to loss actually resulting which "was at the time of the contract reasonably foreseeable as liable to result from the breach", foreseeability depending on the knowledge of the parties (or of the party who later commits the breach) either imputed or actual: [673] Victoria Laundry (Windsor) Ltd v Newman Industries Ltd; Coulson & Co Ltd [1949] 2 KB 528, at 539. The two parts of the rule in Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex 341, at 354-5; 156 ER 145, at 151 treat of remoteness according to whether the knowledge on which foreseeability depends is knowledge of "the usual course of things" (which is imputed) or knowledge of other circumstances which make a breach liable to cause more loss (which must be actual knowledge). Provided a loss is foreseeable by reason of one or other kind of knowledge, it is not essential to identify which kind establishes foreseeability: cf Wenham v Ella (1972) 127 CLR, at 472.

In this case, the respondent knew that the prime mover was to be used by the appellant in inter-capital haulage in order to earn his income. I should have thought that it was manifest to the respondent that if the warranties were broken it was likely that the appellant would lose income which he would have earned and would incur costs that he would not have incurred if the prime mover had answered the warranties. Assuming, consistently with the Full Court's view, that the appellant would have earned profits, it was foreseeable that they would have been earned for the period during which the prime mover would have been fit for the purpose of inter-capital haulage had it been powered by a reconditioned engine. Moynihan J found that period to be four years or, perhaps, four years or the time taken to travel 200 000 miles whichever was the sooner. Losses actually incurred are in a different situation. Was it foreseeable that the appellant would persist in the incurring of losses during the whole of that period once it was obvious that he was engaged in a loss enterprise? In other words, do foreseeable losses stop short of the losses incurred at the stage when the injured party, acting reasonably, would mitigate the losses resulting from the breach of warranty? When an act on the part of the person to whom a warranty is given is needed to put an end to losses resulting from breach of the warranty, foreseeability provides no different limitation on damages from the limitation which is imposed by a failure to act reasonably in mitigation of damage. A party who, when he gives a warranty, has such knowledge that he can foresee that the loss which will result from a breach of the warranty will continue until the other party acts to stop the loss, can foresee that the loss will continue until it is reasonable to expect that the injured party will act to stop it. Foreseeability extends until it would be unreasonable for the injured party to fail to act to mitigate his loss, and the onus of proving such a failure is on the party in breach. [674] Unless the respondent showed that the appellant unreasonably failed to avoid the losses incurred after July 1978, those losses were as foreseeable after July 1978 as they were before.

Apart from foreseeability (in the sense explained in Victoria Laundry [1949] 2 KB 528), a plaintiff must show that the loss he seeks to recover results from the breach of contract relied on. If the loss results from some extraneous factor, the plaintiff fails to establish the essential causal link between the breach and the loss. It is in reference to this link that it is appropriate to consider Liesbosch, Dredger v Edison, SS (Owners) ("The Liesbosch") [1933] AC 449. According to Kerr LJ (Perry v Sidney Phillips & Son [1982] 1 WLR 1297, at 1307; [1982] 3 All ER 705, at 712) the authority of what Lord Wright said in The Liesbosch is consistently being attenuated in more recent decisions of the Court of Appeal. Whether that be so or not, there is no reason why Lord Wright's speech should be regarded as expressing a general principle limiting the assessment of damages in contract or tort. His Lordship was dealing with an assessment of damages allegedly suffered by the owners of a dredge which was sunk by the negligence of the defendant's steamship. The dredge had been committed to a contract between the owners and the Harbour Board of Patras for the construction of piers and quay walls at Patras. There was no doubt that the owners were entitled to recover the cost of obtaining another dredge to carry out the dredging work involved in performing their contract. A suitable dredge, the Adria, was hired but the plaintiffs incurred an extra expense in working the Adria above the expense which would have been incurred had they purchased a dredge. The question was whether the extra expense was recoverable. The owners incurred the extra expense because they were unable, by reason of impecuniosity, to finance the purchase of a dredge. Lord Wright held against the owners, saying ([1933] AC, at 460):

> But the appellants' actual loss in so far as it was due to their impecuniosity arose from that impecuniosity as a separate and concurrent cause, extraneous to and distinct in character from the tort; the impecuniosity was not traceable to the respondents' acts, and in my opinion was outside the legal purview of the consequences of these acts.

His Lordship was prepared to hold that the owners' financial embarrassment was too remote to be regarded as a consequence of the tort, but he preferred to regard it "as an independent cause" (scil, of the extra expense incurred by the owners in working the [675] Adria). Both remoteness and causation are matters of fact: see his Lordship's observation as to remoteness in Monarch Steamship Co Ltd v Karlshamns Olje fabriker (A/B) [1949] AC 196, at 223; Wenham v Ella (1972) 127 CLR, at 466 and his Lordship's view of the facts in The Liesbosch do not compel a similar finding in other cases.

There is no justification for treating impecuniosity in the present case as being either an extrinsic cause of lost profits after July 1978 or as making those profits too remote. In this case, the cause of the loss of profits from inter-capital haulage after July 1978 was the same as the cause of the loss of profits prior to that time, namely, the unfitness of the prime mover for the purpose. The appellant's decision to engage in supply haulage to central Queensland coal mines was taken in consequence of the unfitness of the prime mover for the warranted purpose. The reasonableness of the decision is critical to the question of mitigation but it is no novus actus which breaks the chain of causation between the breach of warranty and the lost profits and losses incurred after July 1978. The finding of fact which Lord Wright was prepared to make in The Liesbosch cannot be made here. The appellant's impecuniosity in this case was itself caused by or contributed to by the breach of warranties which founded the action. The appellant's losses incurred prior to July 1978 would have diminished any capacity he might otherwise have had to outlay $7 000 or $8 000 to have the engine reconditioned. The reasoning in The Liesbosch cannot be applied to such a case: Fox v Wood (1981) 148 CLR 438, at 446.

The limitation placed on the recovery of loss resulting from breach of contract when the loss would have been avoided by the injured party taking reasonable steps to mitigate the loss is not so draconian as to deny recovery to an impecunious victim who, if he were not impecunious, could have avoided the loss but who, being impecunious, has suffered it. The general principle, applicable as well in contract as in tort, is stated by Lord Collins in Clippens Oil Co Ltd v Edinburgh and District Water Trustees [1907] AC 291, at 303:

> It was contended that this implied that the defenders were entitled to measure the damages on the footing that it was the duty of the company to do all that was reasonably possible to mitigate the loss, and that if, through lack of funds, they were unable to incur the necessary expense of such remedial measures the defenders ought not to suffer for it. If this were the true construction to put upon the passage cited, I think there would be force in the observation, for in my opinion the wrong-doer must take his victim talem qualem, and if the position of the latter is aggravated because he is without the [676] means of mitigating it, so much the worse for the wrong-doer, who has got to be answerable for the consequences flowing from his tortious act.

The Liesbosch did not impair the authority of this principle, though it has sometimes been thought to do so: see Martindale v Duncan ([1973] 1 WLR 574, at 577; [1973] 2 All ER 355, at 358). In The Liesbosch Lord Wright referred to Lord Collins' dictum with approval but distinguished it as applying to mitigation, not to causation or remoteness, as Cantley J and Megaw and Donaldson LJJ observed in Dodd Properties (Kent) Ltd v Canterbury City Council ([1980] 1 WLR 433, at 443, 453, 459; [1979] 2 All ER 118, at 125; [1980] 1 All ER 928, at 935, 941).

The possible choices which confronted the appellant when he discovered in July 1978 that the engine which had been warranted reconditioned was in fact in a deplorable state were fourfold: to complain to the respondent and request it to recondition the engine, to deliver the prime mover to Esanda and terminate the hire-purchase agreement, to pay sufficient to repair the engine to a condition where the vehicle could be used for haulage work on a reduced scale, or to pay the full cost of reconditioning. Consider each of those choices. The first was not available. Though the appellant sought redress from the respondent it was refused. The respondent's mechanics were called to inspect the engine when it was dismantled in July 1978, but redress was not forthcoming. The second option would have left the appellant without any prospect of working his way out of the Esanda debt. In July 1978 his total liability to Esanda stood at $34 622.15. If the prime mover as warranted had been worth $31 000 in July 1977, it is unlikely that its resale with known defects in July 1978 would have brought enough to discharge the debt which the appellant would have owed Esanda if he had terminated the hire-purchase agreement and Esanda had resold the vehicle. However, it was reasonable to try to haul supplies to the central Queensland coal mines in an effort to earn sufficient to pay out the hire-purchase liability. That was the third choice and the one he took: by revising the hire-purchase agreement in July 1978, he obtained the money to pay for the needed repairs and he thus obtained a chance to use the vehicle profitably. The fourth choice would have involved an outlay of $7 000 to $8 000 which he did not have. He was not bound to take [677] it. I would apply to this case what Megaw LJ said in Dodd Properties [1980] 1 WLR, at 453; [1980] 1 All ER, at 935:

> A plaintiff who is under a duty to mitigate is not obliged, in order to reduce the damages, to do that which he cannot afford to do: particularly where, as here, the plaintiffs' "financial stringency", so far as it was relevant at all, arose as a matter of common sense, if not as a matter of law, solely as a consequence of the defendants' wrongdoing.

It would be wrong to find that the course taken by the appellant in having some repairs done to the engine in 1978 was an unreasonable step to take in mitigating his loss unless it appeared that he was bound to suffer further losses when he went back on the road. The respondent, on whom the onus lay, did not establish that fact. The respondent submitted that the appellant was losing money on inter-capital haulage in any event and that he was bound to suffer further losses if he went back on the road. What the respondent failed to show was that the appellant was bound to suffer losses when the prime mover went back on the road after July 1978.

Connolly J tested the validity of the assessment of loss terminating in July 1978 by postulating an action immediately prosecuted to judgment at that time. A judgment at that time would have yielded no more than $8 000 for the cost of reconditioning and losses already incurred. Of course, the recovery of the cost of reconditioning would make the adoption of the fourth choice the only reasonable step to take, for the appellant would have had in hand the means of putting an end to future losses and restoring the value of the prime mover. The postulate is invalid, however, for the reasonableness of the steps taken to mitigate must be assessed in the light of the appellant's actual financial situation, not by reference to a supposition which puts in his hands the money which he needed but did not have to put an end to the losses inflicted on him.

It follows that the assessment made by the Full Court must be set aside …

Attempts at mitigation which increase loss

[27.145] Simonius Vischer & Co v Holt & Thompson [1979] 2 NSWLR 322 applies McGregor's second principle of mitigation (at [27.140]), namely that a plaintiff can recover for loss incurred in taking reasonable steps to mitigate her or his loss, even though the resulting damage is greater than it would have been had the mitigating steps not been taken.

Simonius Vischer & Co v Holt & Thompson

[27.150] Simonius Vischer & Co v Holt & Thompson [1979] 2 NSWLR 322 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Appeal from Sheppard J.

[FACTS: The plaintiffs were a firm of wool brokers with their head office in Basel, Switzerland. They traded in Sydney in the wool futures market both as brokers and on their own account. Staff in the Sydney office of the firm consistently exceeded their authority in speculative operations and sought to conceal their conduct from the head office. As a result of these unauthorised activities, the firm lost over £200,000. They sued the defendants, who acted as the firm's auditors, alleging that the damage arose from the auditor's breach of duty in failing to discover the improper operations of the Sydney office. Breaches of duty in both tort and contract were alleged, but the trial was conducted as one of breach of contract. Sheppard J found for the plaintiffs. In the Court of Appeal, a number of issues were considered, but the case is extracted only on the mitigation point.]

SAMUELS JA: [355] The defendants next submitted that the plaintiffs had failed to act reasonably to mitigate their damage, reliance being placed upon the following circumstances which are not in dispute. In June 1965, as a result of the defendants' failure to reveal the Sydney office's excessive jobbing, the plaintiffs held a very large number of open jobbing contracts. They surveyed the market and concluded that it was likely to fall; and decided to hold the contracts in order to minimise the losses which would have been occasioned by an immediate closing out of all contracts. In fact the plaintiffs' prognosis was wrong; the market moved against them.

The defendant submitted that it was the plaintiffs' duty to close out all contracts once they had ascertained their position, and the degree to which they were at risk. Their decision to hold in anticipation of a favourable turn in the market meant that, thereafter, they retained these contracts as a speculation on their own account, so that the further losses which were incurred were not recoverable.

The learned judge found that the defendants had not proved that the plaintiffs' conduct was unreasonable. He evidently bore in mind that the situation in which the plaintiffs were placed was a consequence of the jobbing in excess of authority which the defendants' breaches had facilitated. The plaintiffs had to determine how they could best reduce the losses which had then accrued by reason of their large excess of sold contracts, and the price at which it would have been necessary to buy matching contracts. Their decision, his Honour found, was reasonably and bona fide made in an endeavour to restore their trading position at a time when they had not finally determined to sue the defendants, and were primarily concerned to secure their own situation.

In making this finding, Sheppard J applied the well known dictum of Lord Macmillan in Banco de Portugal v Waterlow & Sons Ltd [1932] AC 452 at 506. His Lordship said:

> Where the sufferer from a breach of contract finds himself in consequence of that breach placed in a position of embarrassment the measures which he may be driven to adopt in order to extricate himself ought not to be weighed in nice scales at the instance of the party whose breach of contract has occasioned the difficulty. It is often easy after an emergency has passed to criticise the steps which have been taken to meet it, but such criticism does not come well from those who have themselves created the emergency. The law is satisfied if the party placed in a difficult situation by reason of the breach of a duty owed to him has acted reasonably in the adoption of remedial measures, and he will not be held disentitled to recover the cost of such measures merely because the party in breach can suggest that other measures less burdensome to him might have been taken.

I think that that statement has considerable point in this case … and I am not at all disposed to think that the learned judge's conclusion was wrong.

The consequence, therefore, is that, as a result of reasonable steps to mitigate their damage, the plaintiffs suffered a further loss of money … [356] I think that the principle is that stated in McGregor on Damages (13th ed), p 167, para 237, namely that recovery is allowed: "for losses and expenses reasonably incurred in mitigation even although the resulting damage is in the event greater than it would have been had the mitigating steps not been taken."… It would seem to follow that, once the plaintiffs' conduct is found to have been reasonable, the defendants are bound to make good the loss thereby sustained. The defendants, however, contend that this result, which, I emphasise, is wholly supported by the principles to which I have referred, is ousted by the application of two cases: British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co Ltd v Underground Electric Railways Co of London Ltd [1912] AC 673, and Jamal v Moolla Dawood [1916] 1 AC 175. In the [357] British Westinghouse case, the plaintiff replaced deficient turbines which the defendant had supplied in breach of warranty, by others of greater power and efficiency which reduced operating costs and increased the plaintiff's profits. The plaintiff's claim to recover the cost of the substitutes as a consequential loss (no dispute arising as to the plaintiff's right to recover loss incurred by reason of the original turbines operating inadequately during their years of use) was rejected, because the consequential gain in profits and saved expenses was to be taken into account, and on balance no net loss was incurred on the purchase of the substitutes. Viscount Haldane LC said (at 689): when in the course of his business he (the plaintiff) has taken action arising out of the transaction, which action has diminished his loss, the effect in actual diminution of the loss he has suffered may be taken into account even though there was no duty on him to act.

I do not consider that the British Westinghouse case governs this case. First, it applies the rule (which has no present application) that there can be no recovery for loss which the plaintiff has in fact avoided, unless the benefit obtained is wholly collateral (for example, the proceeds of insurance (Bradburn v Great Western Railway Co (1874) LR 10 Exch 1)), which explains Viscount Haldane's later statement (at 690 and 691) that the benefit "must be one arising out of the consequences of the breach and in the ordinary course of business", and must "arise out of the transactions the subject matter of the contract". There is no question in the present case of a nett avoided loss, and it does not follow that Viscount Haldane's statement has any application to loss incurred (not avoided) in a reasonable attempt to mitigate.

Secondly, in the British Westinghouse case, the plaintiff claimed the loss caused by the excessive operating costs of the defective turbines while the plaintiff was using them prior to the installation of the new turbines. This claim was, in substance, one for a loss of profits which would have continued while the plaintiff continued to use the defendant's turbines, at least during their estimated life. But the plaintiff, in order to maintain that claim, was bound to show that it had taken reasonable steps in mitigation by acquiring a substitute. This the plaintiff did. It did acquire substitutes. Its final claim was to recover its loss of profit (arising from excessive costs) up to the installation of the new turbines, as to which there was no dispute; and, in addition, the cost of obtaining the new turbines. And the ratio of the case was that, since the new turbines were markedly superior to the old (even if the old turbines had been up to standard), the savings in cost, and consequential gain in profits, thereby obtained must be brought to account in reduction of the plaintiff's damages. In effect, the plaintiff's claim for loss of profits, which the purchase of new turbines mitigated, was diminished.

This reasoning has no application to the present case, where the measure of damages has been quite differently formulated, there being no claim for any loss of the profits which the plaintiffs would have earned had the defendants performed their contract, save for one immaterial exception.

Jamal v Moolla Dawood Sons & Co is no more than an illustration of the normal measure of damages where a buyer wrongfully [358] refuses to accept goods, which is prima facie the difference between the contract price and the market price at the date of the breach; the loss being crystallised at that point subsequent events are irrelevant: see s 52(2) and (3) of the Sale of Goods Act 1923 and R Pagnan & Fratelli v Corbisa Industrial Agropacuaria Limitada [1970] 1 WLR 1306 at 1314; [1970] 1 All ER 165 at 169. That rule does not apply to the present case … [367] I would therefore dismiss the appeal …

Appeal dismissed.

Mitigation and subsequent transactions

Clark v Macourt

[27.155] Clark v Macourt [2013] HCA 56; (2013) 253 CLR 1 – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales Court of Appeal (Hayne, Crennan, Bell, Gageler and Keane JJ).

HAYNE J: [1] The appellant and respondent were registered medical practitioners who each specialised in providing assisted reproductive technology services. In 2002, the appellant agreed to buy assets of St George Fertility Centre Pty Ltd, a company which was controlled by the respondent and which provided medical and assisted reproductive technology services to patients. The company ("the vendor") agreed to sell certain assets of the practice, including a stock of frozen donated sperm. The respondent guaranteed the vendor's obligations under the contract.

[2] The vendor warranted that the identification of donors of the sperm complied with specified guidelines. There is now no dispute that, of the stock of sperm delivered, 1,996 straws which the appellant would have expected to be able to use were not as warranted and were unusable.

[3] The appellant could not buy suitable replacement sperm in Australia but could in the United States of America. The primary judge found that buying 1,996 straws of replacement sperm from the American supplier ("Xytex") would have cost about $1 million at the time the contract was breached. The purchase price for the assets (including the stock of frozen donated sperm) was less than $400,000. The appellant accepted that ethically she could not charge, and in fact had not charged, any patient a fee for using donated sperm greater than the amount the appellant had outlaid to acquire it.

[4] How should the appellant's damages for breach of warranty be fixed?

The proceedings

[5] In the Supreme Court of New South Wales, Macready AsJ entered judgment for the appellant against the vendor for breach of warranty, and against the respondent as guarantor of the vendor's obligations, for damages to be assessed. Those orders were not the subject of appeal. On the assessment of damages, the primary judge (Gzell J) assessed (St George Fertility Centre Pty Ltd v Clark [2011] NSWSC 1276) the damages for breach of warranty as the amount that the appellant would have had to pay Xytex (at the time the contract was breached) to buy 1,996 straws of sperm. On appeal, the Court of Appeal (Beazley and Barrett JJA and Tobias AJA) held (Macourt v Clark [2012] NSWCA 367) that the appellant should have no damages for the vendor's breach of warranty. The appellant had bought straws of sperm from Xytex to use in treating patients and had charged each patient a fee which covered the costs the appellant had incurred in buying the straws that were used in treating that patient. The Court of Appeal held that the appellant had thus avoided any loss she would otherwise have sustained.

[6] By special leave, the appellant appealed to this court seeking orders reinstating the award of damages made by the primary judge. The appeal should be allowed.

Principles

[7] At no stage of this litigation has either party submitted that the assessment of the damages due for the vendor's breach of contractual warranty called for the modification of any principle, let alone the application of some new principle. There was, therefore, no dispute in this court, or in the courts below, that a plaintiff who sues for breach of contract is to be awarded as damages "that sum of money which will put the party who has been injured ... in the same position as he [or she] would have been in if he [or she] had not sustained the wrong for which he [or she] is now getting his [or her] compensation or reparation" (Livingstone v Rawyards Coal Co (1880) 5 App Cas 25 at 39). Nor was there, or could there have been, any dispute that when a contract has been breached, the position in which the plaintiff is to be put, by an award of damages, is the position in which the plaintiff would have been if the contract had been performed (Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272 at 286 [13]; [2009] HCA 8. See also Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Exch 850 at 855; 154 ER 363 at 365).

[8] The only dispute between the parties was about how these principles were to be applied in this case. Any difficulty encountered in applying these principles stems ultimately from the failure, when speaking of "compensation" for "loss", to identify what "loss" is being compensated. Identification of the relevant loss does not depend (as much of the respondent's argument assumed) on whether the contract can be classified as a contract for the sale of goods.

[9] Three different forms of "loss" might be identified. First, there might be a loss constituted by the amount by which the promisee is worse off because the promisor did not perform the contract. That amount would include the value of whatever the promisee outlaid in reliance on the promise being fulfilled. Second, the loss might be assessed by looking not at the promisee's position but at what the defaulting promisor gained by making the promise but not performing it. Third, there is the loss of the value of what the promisee would have received if the promise had been performed.

[10] Subject to some limitations, none of which was said to be engaged in this case, damages for breach of contract must be measured (Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272 at 286 [13]) by reference to the third kind of loss: the loss of the value of what the promisee would have received if the promise had been performed.

[11] As Professor Fuller and Mr Perdue wrote, (Fuller and Perdue, "The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages: 1" (1936) 46 Yale Law Journal 52 at 53) many years ago:

> This seems on the face of things a queer kind of "compensation". ... In actuality the loss which the plaintiff suffers (deprivation of the expectancy) is not a datum of nature but the reflection of a normative order. It appears as a "loss" only by reference to an unstated ought. Consequently, when the law gauges damages by the value of the promised performance it is not merely measuring a quantum, but is seeking an end, however vaguely conceived this end may be.

As those authors demonstrated (Fuller and Perdue, "The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages: 1" (1936) 46 Yale Law Journal 52 at 62), the protection which the law thus gives to the expectation that a contract will be performed can be seen as resting on, first, "the need for curing and preventing the harms occasioned by reliance" upon the expectation of performance, and second, "on the need for facilitating reliance on business agreements". The loss which is compensated reflects a normative order in which contracts must be performed.

Valuing what should have been received

[12] Under the contract which the appellant made, she should have received 1,996 more straws of sperm having the warranted qualities than she did receive. The relevant question in the litigation was: what was the value of what the appellant did not receive? The answer she proffered in this court was that it was the amount it would have cost (at the date of the breach of warranty) to acquire 1,996 straws of sperm from Xytex. That answer should be accepted.

[13] The answer depends upon determining the content of the unperformed promise. The answer does not depend upon whether the contract can be described as one for the sale of goods or for the sale of a business. How much the appellant paid for the benefit of the promise is not relevant. It does not matter whether the value of what she did not receive was more than the price she had agreed to pay under the contract or (if it could have been determined) the price she had agreed to pay for the stock of sperm. The extent to which the appellant could have turned the performance of the promise to profit would be relevant only if the appellant had claimed for loss of profit. She did not. She sought, and was rightly allowed by the primary judge, the value of what should have been, but was not, delivered under the contract.

Mitigation?

[14] As already noted, however, the Court of Appeal concluded ([2012] NSWCA 367 at [127] per Tobias AJA (Beazley and Barrett JJA agreeing)) that the appellant had mitigated her loss by buying replacement sperm from Xytex. In respect of "the loss of each straw of replacement sperm actually sourced from Xytex" before the date of assessment of damages, Tobias AJA concluded that the chief component of the appellant's "loss" would be "the sum (if any) representing that part of the overall cost of acquisition of that straw not recouped from a patient". And in respect of "the residue of the 'lost' 1996 straws over and above those in fact replaced by Xytex sperm up to the date of trial", Tobias AJA concluded ([2012] NSWCA 367 at [129]) that "the appropriate course would have been to assume that [the appellant] would continue to source straws of donor sperm from Xytex at a cost consistent with that which had prevailed since August 2005, and that she would continue to recoup from patients the same proportion of that cost as she had done in the past" ([2012] NSWCA 367 at [130]). On this footing, Tobias AJA concluded ([2012] NSWCA 367 at [130]) that the appellant's damages in respect of straws not "replaced" would be "the aggregate of the discounted present value of the un-recouped balances (if any) of that cost as at the date of their assessment" (emphasis added).

[15] Two points must be made about this analysis. First, the calculations described would reveal whether, and to what extent, the appellant was, or would be, worse off as a result of the breach of warranty. That is, the calculations of the net amount which the appellant had outlaid, and would thereafter have to outlay, would reveal the amount needed to put the appellant in the position she would have been in if the contract had not been made. The calculations would not, and did not, identify the value of what the appellant would have received if the contract had been performed.

[16] Second, the reference to mitigation of damage was apt to mislead. In order to explain why, it is necessary to say something about what is meant by "mitigation" of damage.

[17] For present purposes, "mitigation" can be seen as embracing two separate ideas (cf Chitty on Contracts, 31st ed (2012), Vol 1 at 1805-1806 [26-077]). First, a plaintiff cannot recover damages for a loss which he or she ought to have avoided, and second, a plaintiff cannot recover damages for a loss which he or she did avoid.

[18] The Court of Appeal's analysis, and the respondent's argument in this court, both depended upon engaging the second of these propositions. In this court, the respondent submitted, correctly, that it is a proposition recognised in the speech of Viscount Haldane LC in British Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co Ltd v Underground Electric Railways Co of London Ltd [1912] AC 673 at 689-690. But there remains for consideration how the proposition applied in this case.

[19] The appellant's subsequent purchases and use of replacement sperm left her neither better nor worse off than she was before she undertook those transactions. In particular, unlike British Westinghouse and other cases referred to (Staniforth v Lyall (1830) 7 Bing 169; 131 ER 65; Erie County Natural Gas and Fuel Co v Carroll [1911] AC 105; Wertheim v Chicoutimi Pulp Co [1911] AC 301) in the speech of Viscount Haldane, the appellant obtained no relevant benefit from her subsequent purchases of sperm. The purchases replaced what the vendor had agreed to supply.

[20] The purchase price paid for the replacement sperm revealed the value of what was lost when the vendor did not perform the contract. But the commercial consequences flowing from the appellant's subsequent use of those replacements would have been relevant to assessing the value of what should have been supplied under the contract only if she had obtained some advantage from their use, or if she had alleged that the replacement transactions had left her even worse off than she already was as a result of the vendor's breach.

[21] If she had obtained some advantage, the value of the advantage would have mitigated the loss she otherwise suffered. If she had been left even worse off (for example by losing profit that otherwise would have been made), that additional loss may have aggravated her primary loss. But the appellant was not shown to have obtained any advantage from the later transactions and she did not claim that they had left her any worse off. Those transactions neither mitigated nor aggravated the loss she suffered from the vendor not supplying what it had agreed to supply. The value of that loss was revealed by what the appellant paid to buy replacement sperm from Xytex.

[22] Showing that the appellant had charged, or could charge, third parties (her patients) the amount she had paid to acquire replacement sperm from Xytex was irrelevant to deciding what was the value of what the vendor should have, but had not, supplied. If the contract had been performed according to its terms, the appellant would have had a stock of sperm having the warranted qualities which she could use as she chose. She could have stored it, given it away or used it in her practice. In particular, she could have used it in her practice and charged her patients nothing for its supply. But because the vendor breached the contract, the appellant could put herself in the position she should have been in (if the contract had been performed) only by buying replacement sperm from Xytex. Whatever transactions she then chose to make with her patients are irrelevant to determining the value of what should have been, but was not, provided under the contract.

Conclusion

[23] For these reasons, and for the reasons given by Keane J (with which I agree generally), the appeal should be allowed. Consequential orders should be made in the terms sought by the appellant.

[27.160] CRENNAN and BELL JJ: … [25] The issue on the appeal is the measure of damages recoverable by the appellant, as purchaser of assets of a business, when the vendor promised to deliver stock complying with a warranty, but did not do so. We agree that the assessment of damages undertaken by the primary judge required assessment of the value of what should have been delivered in accordance with the vendor's contractual promise to the appellant (reasons for judgment of Keane J at [111]; see also reasons for judgment of Hayne J at [13]).

[26] The applicable principle, confirmed in Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd and traceable to Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272 at 286 [13]; [2009] HCA 8 is that damages for breach of contract are to put the promisee, so far as money can do it, in the same situation as if the contract had been performed as promised. Different, even cumulative, heads of damage may be pleaded by a plaintiff, depending on the type of contract involved and the kinds of breach and damage occasioned, provided there is no double recovery.

[27] In Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd ((1991) 174 CLR 64 at 82; [1991] HCA 54) Mason CJ and Dawson J said:

> "expectation damages", "damages for loss of profits", "reliance damages" and "damages for wasted expenditure" are simply manifestations of the central principle enunciated in Robinson v Harman rather than discrete and truly alternative measures of damages which a party not in breach may elect to claim.

Their Honours went on to observe that the corollary of the principle in Robinson v Harman is that a plaintiff is not entitled, by an award of damages for breach of contract, to be placed in a superior position to that in which he or she would have been had the contract been performed ((1991) 174 CLR 64 at 82). The plaintiff's loss must be genuine (Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 WLR 1262 at 1270; [1978] 1 All ER 33 at 42) and the expenses incurred in putting himself or herself in the position in which he or she would have been, had the contract been performed, must be reasonable (Erie County Natural Gas and Fuel Co v Carroll [1911] AC 105 at 118; Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272 at 288-290 [17]-[19]). The onus of proof in respect of a claim for contract damages is on the plaintiff (Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64 at 80 per Mason CJ and Dawson J).

[28] It is the plaintiff's objectively determined expectation of recoupment of expenses which is protected by an award of damages for loss of a bargain (Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64 at 85 per Mason CJ and Dawson J). This explains the prima facie measure of damages at common law in respect of a sale of goods stated in Barrow v Arnaud ((1846) 8 QB 595 at 609-610; 115 ER 1000 at 1006; see also Hussey v Eels [1990] 2 QB 227; see further McGregor, McGregor on Damages, 18th ed (2009) at 780 [20-004]), and codified subsequently in sale of goods legislation. The measure is the market price of goods at the contractual time for delivery, less the contract price (if the latter has not been paid to the seller). This is the amount of money theoretically needed to put the promisee in the position which would have been achieved if the contract had been performed. Subject to being displaced for some reason, this is the applicable measure, notwithstanding the circumstance that a buyer is a non-profit organisation (Diamond Cutting Works Federation Ltd v Triefus & Co Ltd [1956] 1 Lloyd's Rep 216) or that the buyer is constrained in relation to market regulation and control as to the price at which the buyer could sell to a subsequent purchaser (British Motor Trade Association v Gilbert [1951] 2 All ER 641; Mouat v Betts Motors Ltd [1959] AC 71 at 82).

[29] Whilst the second limb of Hadley v Baxendale ((1854) 9 Exch 341; 156 ER 145) in respect of indirect loss is frequently invoked on behalf of a buyer when a figure higher than the normal measure of damages should apply, there is no reason in principle why it cannot also be relied on by a seller if the facts and circumstances are such that a figure lower than, or different from, the normal measure of damage should apply—for example, when the actual loss suffered is less than the prima facie measure of damages (Bence Graphics International Ltd v Fasson UK Ltd [1998] QB 87; cf Slater v Hoyle & Smith [1920] 2 KB 11; see also McGregor, McGregor on Damages, 18th ed (2009) at 816-818 [20-065]-[20-067]; Beale (ed), Chitty on Contracts, 31st ed (2012), vol 2 at 1666 [43-452]).

[30] Resolution of this appeal does not turn on any distinction between a contract for the sale of goods and a contract for the sale of a business, or on the respondent's invocation of the second limb of Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Exch 341; 156 ER 145 on the basis that replacement costs of non-compliant sperm would be passed on to patients. It is sufficient to dispose of the appeal on the basis that no facts or circumstances were proven which displaced the application of the normal measure of contract damages put forward by the appellant.

[31] It was uncontroversial that, at all material times, assisted reproductive technology businesses conducted in New South Wales were subject to a statutory and regulatory regime. The appellant, as cross-claimant, obtained summary judgment in her favour, by consent, on the basis of admissions that the St George sperm failed to comply with the extant regulatory regime (Code of Practice for Assisted Reproductive Technology Units of the Reproductive Technology Accreditation Committee). In seeking summary judgment against the vendor and the respondent (as guarantor) on the basis of certain claims, the appellant abandoned other claims including a claim for loss of profits in respect of embryos, a claim for loss of profits in respect of donor sperm having been abandoned at some point earlier in time.

[32] This reduced the issue before the primary judge to an assessment of the value of the St George sperm which had not been delivered in accordance with the vendor's warranty. On the nature of the damages claimed, the appellant's pleadings stated:

> the damages ... are in the nature of compensation which, so far as possible gives her the benefit of her bargain under the Deed by giving her, so far as money is capable of doing so, something equivalent to the value of the worthless Sperm delivered to her, as opposed to damages to compensate her specifically for her outlay to Xytex (the amount actually paid and payable to Xytex being no more than evidence of an appropriate measure of damages).

[33] The applicable regulatory scheme was such that a medical practitioner treating a patient was ethically bound not to treat donor sperm as a commodity, by profiting when using donor sperm for a patient's treatment. It also appeared to be uncontroversial that costs in relation to donor sperm which might be passed on to a patient included the costs of acquisition of donor sperm and related items such as storage costs.

[34] The appellant gave evidence that Xytex Corporation ("Xytex") operated a business in which Xytex supplied donated sperm to buyers, which included both patients and medical practitioners. The appellant also gave uncontested evidence that in her business, during the period from 2002 to 2005, she used donor sperm from different local and overseas sources which included the St George sperm, her clinic's stock and stock obtained from Cryos International Sperm Bank, Queensland Fertility Clinic, Westmead Fertility Centre and Xytex. The appellant gave evidence that she did not make a profit from patients when using donor sperm which she had purchased and that there was always a "buffer" between the real costs to her and those passed on to a patient. Evidence was also given by and on behalf of the appellant of unsuccessful efforts to recruit local sperm donors through newspaper advertising in 2005, when the appellant had exhausted her stock of St George sperm which complied with the warranty. Further, evidence that a shortage of donors was occasioned in 2005 by requirements for donor identification was not disputed.

[35] The respondent conceded in the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales that some part of the sale price for the assets of the business related to the transfer of the St George sperm from the business to the appellant. Further, there was no issue that the appellant had used 504 straws of St George sperm which had complied with the warranty given.

[36] In leading evidence of the costs of acquiring the Xytex sperm, the appellant discharged the onus on her to show the recoupment costs necessary to restore her to the position in which she would have been, absent the vendor's breach of warranty.

[37] It was conceded that the costs of Xytex sperm which the appellant passed on to patients equalled the acquisition and other costs incurred by her. Importantly, contested issues concerning the Xytex sperm appeared not to include an assertion that the appellant could have obtained replacement sperm more cheaply than she acquired such sperm from Xytex. The emphasis in the respondent's case was otherwise. It was contended on behalf of the respondent that Xytex sperm was not compliant with regulatory guidelines. That challenge failed before the primary judge. Then, it was contended that, since the appellant could pass on to patients the reasonable costs of procuring the replacement sperm, she had wholly mitigated her loss. This was the basis of the respondent's success in the Court of Appeal. Such an approach fails to take into account that the circumstances of the appellant's subsequent dealings with patients did not avoid, or increase or diminish, the loss of her bargain for delivery of St George sperm which was compliant with the warranty.

[38] Regulatory constraints on a promisee's subsequent dealings with goods have no necessary relationship with the market price which a promisee may pay to be in as good a position as if a promisor had performed. In Mouat v Betts Motors Ltd, on behalf of the Privy Council, Lord Denning described the entitlements of a buyer of goods claiming the normal measure of contract damages, when the market in such goods is subject to price controls. He said:

> It does not lie in [the seller's] mouth to say that, if he had fulfilled his covenant, the [buyers] could only resell the car for £1,207. That was a matter peculiar to the [buyers] which was no concern of his. The [buyers] were entitled in law to be put into as good a position as if he had fulfilled his covenant: and to do this they were entitled to go into the market and buy a similar car at the market price ... This rule applies even though the only available market is a surreptitious market which is fed by persons who have broken their covenants.

[39] Issue having been joined, and the forensic contest having been fought as described, there was neither cross-examination of the appellant, nor production of any evidence in chief on behalf of the respondent, directed to the proposition that the acquisition costs of Xytex sperm were not an appropriate proxy for the value of the St George sperm, had it been compliant with the vendor's warranty. There being no evidence on the point, the respondent cannot sustain an argument that the measure of damages proven by the appellant was not the correct measure to be applied or that it should be displaced by some other measure. The submission, in the respondent's notice of contention, that "the cost of the acquisition of replacement Xytex sperm was not an appropriate proxy" for the value of the St George sperm must be rejected. There was no error in the decision of the primary judge.

[27.165] GAGELER J: [40] This appeal concerns the measure of damages for breach of a warranty in a contract for the sale of a business. Its unusual facts give rise to unusual difficulties. ...

Analysis

[59] Choosing between the competing approaches of the primary judge and of the Court of Appeal requires a return to first principles: Haines v Bendall (1991) 172 CLR 60 at 63; [1991] HCA 15 (references omitted):

> The settled principle governing the assessment of compensatory damages, whether in actions of tort or contract, is that the injured party should receive compensation in a sum which, so far as money can do, will put that party in the same position as he or she would have been in if the contract had been performed or the tort had not been committed. Compensation is the cardinal concept. It is the "one principle that is absolutely firm, and which must control all else". Cognate with this concept is the rule, described ... as universal, that a plaintiff cannot recover more than he or she has lost.

[60] The assessment of compensatory damages for breach of contract at common law is accordingly subject to the "ruling principle" that the injured party "is, so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation, with respect to damages, as if the contract had been performed" (Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272 at 286 [13]; [2009] HCA 8, quoting Robinson v Harman (1848) 1 Ex 850 at 855; 154 ER 363 at 365) as well as to its corollary that the injured party "is not entitled, by the award of damages upon breach, to be placed in a superior position to that which he or she would have been in had the contract been performed" (Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64 at 82; [1991] HCA 54).

[61] The "expectation interest" sometimes identified as protected by an award of damages for breach of contract at common law is a reflection of that ruling principle and of its corollary. The expectation interest is no less, but no more, than the interest protected by seeking "to give [a] promisee the value of the expectancy which the promise created" (Fuller and Perdue, "The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages: 1" (1936) 46 Yale Law Journal 52 at 54). In other words, it is the interest of the injured party "in having the benefit of [the contractual] bargain by being put in as good a position as he [or she] would have been in had the contract been performed" (Restatement, 2nd, Contracts, §344).

[62] The common law does not compensate an injured party for the non-fulfilment of an expectation which could not reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of other parties when they made the contract as the probable result of breach (European Bank Ltd v Evans (2010) 240 CLR 432 at 438 [12]-[13]; [2010] HCA 6, referring to Hadley v Baxendale (1854) 9 Ex 341; 156 ER 145). That limitation can for present purposes be put to one side.

[63] Dr Clark accepts the Court of Appeal's identification of her loss as the cost to her of acquiring replacement sperm from an alternative source, and properly points out that her need to acquire replacement sperm from an alternative source can reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of all parties, when they made the contract in 2002, as the probable result of breach of warranty by the company. Dr Clark has at no stage suggested that her loss is to be identified as the difference between the value of the business she acquired and the value of the business for which she contracted (Senate Electrical Wholesalers Ltd v Alcatel Submarine Networks Ltd [1999] 2 Lloyd's Rep 423 at 429) and at an early stage abandoned a claim that a component of her loss was consequential loss of profits in the conduct of her business. She has at every stage sought substantial, not merely nominal, damages.

[64] Dr Macourt, for his part, points to the remarkable prospect of being saddled, if the primary judge's measure were to be upheld, with an obligation to pay Dr Clark $1,020,252.70 in damages as a consequence of the company in effect failing to deliver one asset of a business which the company ended up selling to Dr Clark for a total price of only $386,950.91. But Dr Macourt does not seek to attach any particular legal significance to the disparity between those two figures (Cf Ruxley Electronics and Construction Ltd v Forsyth [1996] AC 344, referred to in Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272 at 289 [18]).

[65] The precise question in the appeal, given the way in which issue has been joined between the parties, is therefore limited to asking: which of the competing approaches to the assessment of damages adopted by the primary judge and by the Court of Appeal goes furthest in placing Dr Clark, so far as money can achieve the result, in the same position she would have been in had the company complied with its contractual obligation and had she thereby been able to use in the normal course of her practice a further 1,996 straws of the frozen sperm delivered to her by the company?

[66] In answering that question, statements of subsidiary principle framed in the context of working out the ruling principle in standard categories of case must be approached with circumspection (Wenham v Ella (1972) 127 CLR 454 at 467; [1972] HCA 43, quoting Monarch Steamship Co Ltd v Karlshamns Oljefabriker (A/B) [1949] AC 196 at 223). There is, as has often been pointed out, "a danger in elevating into general principles what are in truth mere applications to particular facts or situations of the overriding general principle" (Radford v De Froberville [1977] 1 WLR 1262 at 1270; [1978] 1 All ER 33 at 42, citing Admiralty Commissioners v SS Susquehanna [1926] AC 655 at 661 and Admiralty Commissioners v SS Chekiang [1926] AC 637 at 643-644). The measure appropriate in a particular case "cannot be divorced from the [claimant's] personal position and obligations, both legal and moral, or from what the [claimant] ought reasonably to do by way of mitigation" ([1977] 1 WLR 1262 at 1270; [1978] 1 All ER 33 at 42), and a rigid distinction cannot always be drawn between measure and mitigation ([1977] 1 WLR 1262 at 1272-1273; [1978] 1 All ER 33 at 44).

[67] To measure a buyer's damages as the difference, as at the date of delivery, between what the buyer would have obtained in a hypothetical sale of contractually non-compliant goods delivered and what the buyer would have paid in a hypothetical purchase to obtain delivery of contractually compliant goods from another seller is ordinarily appropriate in the standard category of case where a seller fails to deliver marketable goods to a buyer in compliance with a contractual warranty (Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272 at 286 [13]. See also Wertheim v Chicoutimi Pulp Co [1911] AC 301 at 307-308; Slater v Hoyle & Smith [1920] 2 KB 11). That is because the measure ordinarily gives to the buyer the monetary equivalent of the value to the buyer of the performance of the contract by the seller. The value to the buyer of having ownership of, and control over, contractually compliant goods that can be bought and sold in a market as at the time of delivery ordinarily equates to the market value of those goods at that date. The market value of goods is not ordinarily dependent on circumstances peculiar to an individual seller or individual buyer. Accordingly, it ordinarily makes no difference why the buyer chose to purchase the goods (Tabcorp Holdings Ltd v Bowen Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 236 CLR 272 at 287-288 [16]) or whether the buyer could be expected actually to realise the monetary equivalent of that value by re-selling or otherwise disposing of the goods (Eg, Diamond Cutting Works Federation Ltd v Triefus & Co Ltd [1956] 1 Lloyd's Rep 216 at 227).

[68] This case does not fit within that standard category. The critical difference does not lie in the difference between a sale of goods and the sale of a business or in such difficulty as may exist in allocating some part of the overall purchase price for the business to a particular asset. The critical difference lies in the limited value to the buyer (Dr Clark) of the performance of the contract by the seller (the company) given the peculiar nature of the asset (frozen sperm) which the company was obliged to deliver under the contract.

[69] There is no suggestion that the frozen sperm was of any use to Dr Clark, or would have been of any use to another purchaser of the company's assets, other than for the treatment of patients in the normal course of practice. In using frozen sperm for the treatment of patients, Dr Clark was in 2002 ethically bound not to charge patients more than the costs and expenses of acquiring the sperm, whatever those costs and expenses happened to be. Dr Clark's evidence before the primary judge about those ethical obligations was unequivocal. She considered it unethical to profit from buying or selling sperm, was not doing so, and had never done so. A technical submission made on her behalf, that the ethical guidelines published by the National Health and Medical Research Council, on their proper construction, did not have that effect, is to be rejected. The guidelines had the effect Dr Clark acknowledged in her evidence.

[70] The value to Dr Clark of the company delivering frozen sperm in 2002 in compliance with the contract could not, in those circumstances, be equated with the value to a buyer of having dominion over contractually compliant goods of a nature which would be available to be re-sold by the buyer in a market at the time of delivery. The value to Dr Clark of the company delivering contractually compliant frozen sperm lay rather in Dr Clark gaining control over a stock of frozen sperm which she could then use for the treatment of her patients in the normal course of her practice. That is to say, if she had been able to take possession from the company of contractually compliant frozen sperm, Dr Clark would have had the benefit of being relieved of the need thereafter to source sperm from somewhere else as and when she needed sperm to treat her patients.

[71] The primary judge found that the company's failure to deliver 3,500 contractually compliant straws of frozen sperm deprived Dr Clark of the expected use in the normal course of her practice of 1,996 of those straws. To what extent was Dr Clark worse off in that factual position of non-fulfilment of her contractual expectation of taking possession of frozen sperm of which she could have used 1,996 straws in the normal course of her practice than she would have been in the counterfactual position of having that contractual expectation fulfilled? Dr Clark was worse off to the extent that later she was forced to incur, but was not able to recoup from her patients, the additional costs of sourcing 1,996 straws of sperm from an alternative supplier.

Conclusion

[72] The appropriate measure of Dr Clark's loss is so much of the cost to Dr Clark of sourcing 1,996 straws of replacement sperm for the treatment of her patients as she had been, and would be, unable to recoup from those patients. That measure, adopted by the Court of Appeal, is appropriate because it yields an amount which places Dr Clark in the same position as if the contract had been performed so as to provide her with the expected use in the normal course of her practice of 1,996 straws of the frozen sperm delivered to her by the company.

[73] To Dr Clark's protest that adoption of that measure leaves her without an award of damages in circumstances where the company has been found to have breached its warranty, the answer lies in the way she has chosen to put her case. She has made a forensic choice to eschew the measure which, together with the Court of Appeal, I would hold to be the appropriate measure.

[74] The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

[KEANE J also agreed that the appeal should be allowed and consequential orders should be made.]

LIMITATIONS RELATING TO SPECIFIC TYPES OF CLAIM

Disappointment, distress, loss of reputation

[27.175] Damages are not generally awarded to compensate non-pecuniary losses, such as disappointment, anxiety, distress or loss of reputation occurring on breach of contract. However, as the High Court confirmed in Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344, that this restrictive rule is subject to a number of exceptions, which are discussed in that case.

Baltic Shipping v Dillon

[27.180] Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: On 16 February 1986, the cruise vessel, the "Mikhail Lermontov", struck a shoal off Cape Jackson, on the north-eastern tip of the South Island of New Zealand, was holed and sank. The cruise had commenced in Sydney on 7 February 1986 and was scheduled to end on the vessel's return to Sydney on 21 February 1986. The appellant was the owner and operator of the vessel. The respondent was a passenger. As a result of the sinking, the respondent lost possessions and suffered certain injuries. The respondent commenced proceedings against the appellant in the Admiralty Division of the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The appellant at first contested liability but, at a late stage, made certain admissions of negligence. The trial judge entered judgment for damages in favour of the respondent. Included in the award of damages were amounts of $1,417 described as "Restitution of fare" and $5,000 described as "Compensation for disappointment and distress at the loss of entertainment [and facilities for enjoyment which had been promised]". The total sum awarded was

$51,396, of which $35,000 was paid for personal injury. An appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed by a majority of the court. The appellant then appealed to the High Court.]

MASON CJ: [348]

The claim for restitution of the fare: Basis on which the claim is advanced

[T]he respondent claimed: "return of the full fare in the sum of $2 205 as for a total failure of consideration." By cl 7 of the defence, the appellant simply denied that there had been a total failure of consideration. At trial, the respondent's claim was refined so as to extend only to the balance of the fare not already refunded by the appellant, that balance being $1 417.50 … [349] In this court, the appellant contends that the majority in the Court of Appeal erred in holding that the respondent was entitled to restitution of the whole of the fare. In support of this contention, the appellant submits that there was not a total failure of consideration arising from the fact that the contract of carriage was entire. The appellant also submits that a plaintiff cannot pursue both a claim for restitution of the consideration paid under a contract and a claim for damages for breach of that contract … However, if restitution is available and such damages are recoverable, questions of double compensation arise.

[27.185] Is the fare recoverable on the ground of total failure of consideration or otherwise?

[350] An entire contract or, perhaps more accurately, an entire obligation is one in which the consideration for the payment of money or for the rendering of some other counter-performance is entire and indivisible. In Steele v Tardiani (1946) 72 CLR 386 at 401 Dixon J cited the general proposition stated in Williams' Notes to Saunders (6th ed, 1845), vol 1: Pordage v Cole (1669) 1 Wms Saund 319 at 320 n (c); 85 ER 449 at 453:

> Where the consideration for the payment of money is entire and indivisible, as where the benefit expected by the defendant under the agreement is to result from the enjoyment of every part of the consideration jointly, so that the money payable is neither apportioned by the contract, nor capable of being apportioned by a jury, no action is maintainable, if any part of the consideration has failed; for, being entire, by failing partially, it fails altogether.

The concept of an entire contract is material when a court is called upon to decide whether complete performance by one party is a condition precedent to the other's liability to pay the stipulated price or to render an agreed counter-performance. If this were a case in which the appellant sought to enforce a promise to pay the cruise fare at the conclusion of the voyage the concept would have a part to play; then, if the appellant's obligations were entire, on the facts as I have stated them the appellant's incomplete performance of its obligations would not entitle it to recover.

When, however, an innocent party seeks to recover money paid in advance under a contract in expectation of the entire performance by the contract-breaker of its obligations under the contract and the contract-breaker renders an incomplete performance, in general, the innocent party cannot recover unless there has been a total failure of consideration. If the incomplete performance results in the innocent party receiving and retaining any substantial part of the benefit expected under the contract, there will not be a total failure of consideration.

In the context of the recovery of money paid on the footing that there has been a total failure of consideration, it is the performance [351] of the defendant's promise, not the promise itself, which is the relevant consideration: Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32 at 48. In that context, the receipt and retention by the plaintiff of any part of the bargained-for benefit will preclude recovery, unless the contract otherwise provides or the circumstances give rise to a fresh contract. So, in Whincup v Hughes (1871) LR 6 CP 78, the plaintiff apprenticed his son to a watchmaker for six years for a premium which was paid. The watchmaker died after one year. No part of the premium could be recovered. That was because there was not a total failure of consideration. A qualification to this general rule, more apparent than real, has been introduced in the case of contracts where a seller is bound to vest title to chattels or goods in a buyer and the buyer seeks to recover the price paid when it turns out that title has not been passed. Even if the buyer has had the use and enjoyment of chattels or goods purportedly supplied under the contract for a limited time, the use and enjoyment of the chattels or goods has been held not to amount to the receipt of part of the contractual consideration. Where the buyer is entitled under the contract to good title and lawful possession but receives only unlawful possession, he or she does not receive any part of what he or she bargained for. And thus, it is held, there is a total failure of consideration. As this Court stated in David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank (1992) 66 ALJR 768 at 779: "the notion of total failure of consideration now looks to the benefit bargained for by the plaintiff rather than any benefit which might have been received in fact."

An alternative basis for the recovery of money paid in advance pursuant to a contract in expectation of the receipt of the consideration to be provided by the defendant may arise when the defendant's right to retain the payment is conditional upon performance of his or her obligations under the contract. This basis of recovery has a superficial, but not a close, resemblance to the concept of an entire contract. In this class of case the plaintiff may be entitled to recover so long as the payment remains conditional.

So, in Dies v British & International Mining & Finance Corp [1939] 1 KB 724, the plaintiff bought arms for the price of £135 000, paying £100 000 in advance. Though unwilling or unable to take delivery, the plaintiff succeeded in recovering the payment, [352] notwithstanding that Stable J held that there was not a total failure of consideration. There can, of course, be no such failure when the plaintiff's unwillingness or refusal to perform the contract on his or her part is the cause of the defendant's non-performance. The decision is explicable either on the ground that the seller accepted the plaintiff's repudiation and thus itself effected the discharge of the contract or on the ground that the payment was a mere part payment, the right to which depended upon performance of the contract and was thus conditional. Of the two explanations, the second is to be preferred because it is in closer accord with the judgment of Stable J. His Lordship said (at 743):

> [W]here the language used in a contract is neutral, the general rule is that the law confers on the purchaser the right to recover his money, and that to enable the seller to keep it he must be able to point to some language in the contract from which the inference to be drawn is that the parties intended and agreed that he should.

This statement in turn accords with the distinction drawn by Lord Denman CJ (to which Stable J referred) in Palmer v Temple (1839) 9 Ad & E 508 at 520-1; 112 ER 1304 at 1309 between a deposit which was to be forfeited if the plaintiff should not perform the contract and a mere part payment the right to which depended upon performance of the contract. The statement also accords with the point made by Dixon J in McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd, where he said ((1933) 48 CLR 457 at 477):

> When a contract stipulates for payment of part of the purchase money in advance, the purchaser relying only on the vendor's promise to give him a conveyance, the vendor is entitled to enforce payment before the time has arrived for conveying the land; yet his title to retain the money has been considered not to be absolute but conditional upon the subsequent completion of the contract.

The question whether an advance payment, not being a deposit or earnest of performance, is absolute or conditional is one of construction. In determining that question it is material to ascertain whether the payee is required by the contract to perform work and incur expense before completing this performance of his or her obligations under the contract. If the payee is so required then, unless the contract manifests a contrary intention, it would be [353] unreasonable to hold that the payee's right to retain the payment is conditional upon performance of the contractual obligations: see Hyundai Shipbuilding & Heavy Industries Co Ltd v Pournaras [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep 502; Hyundai Heavy Industries Co Ltd v Papadopoulos [1980] 1 WLR 1129.

I have come to the conclusion in the present case that the respondent is not entitled to recover the cruise fare on either of the grounds just discussed. The consequence of the respondent's enjoyment of the benefits provided under the contract during the first eight full days of the cruise is that the failure of consideration was partial, not total … Nor is there any acceptable foundation for holding that the advance payment of the cruise fare created in the appellant no more than a right to retain the payment conditional upon its complete performance of its entire obligations under the contract. As the contract called for performance by the appellant of its contractual obligations from the very commencement of the voyage and continuously thereafter, the advance payment should be regarded as the provision of consideration for each and every substantial benefit expected under the contract. It would not be reasonable to treat the appellant's right to retain the fare as conditional upon complete performance when the appellant is under a liability to provide substantial benefits to the respondent during the course of the voyage. After all, the return of the respondent to Sydney at the end of the voyage, though an important element in the performance of the appellant's obligations, was but one of many elements. In order to illustrate the magnitude of the step which the respondent asks the Court to take, it is sufficient to pose two questions … Would the respondent be entitled to a return of the fare if, owing to failure of the ship's engines, the ship was unable to proceed on the last leg of the cruise to Sydney and it became necessary to airlift the respondent to Sydney? Would the fare be recoverable if, owing to a hurricane, the ship was compelled to omit a visit to one of the scheduled ports of call? The answer in each case must be a resounding negative.

[27.190] The combination of a claim for restitution and a claim for damages

[354] In view of my conclusion that the respondent cannot succeed in her restitutionary claim for recoupment of the fare, there is no necessity for me to consider whether the two claims can be maintained. However, as the question has been argued, I should record my view of the question. There is authority to suggest that the claims are alternative and not cumulative: for example, Walstab v Spottiswoode (1846) 15 M & W 501 at 514; 3 ER 947 at 953 per Pollock CB. But Lord Denning MR was clearly of the view that the claims may be concurrent. In Heywood v Wellers [1976] QB 446 at 458 …

[355] Similarly, in Millar's Machinery Co Ltd v David Way & Son (1935) 40 Com Cas 204, the Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from a decision of Branson J in which such a dual award was made …

And Treitel says in relation to claims for loss of bargain, reliance loss and restitution (The Law of Contract (8th ed, 1991), p 834):

> There is sometimes said to be an inconsistency between combining the various types of claim …
> The true principle is not that there is any logical objection to combining the various types of claim, but that the plaintiff cannot combine them so as to recover more than once for the same loss … The point has been well put by Corbin: "full damages and complete restitution … will not both be given for the same breach of contract.": Corbin on Contracts, §1221; emphasis added by Treitel.

[However, elsewhere he appears to treat the claims as alternatives: pp 923-33.] The action to recover money paid on a total failure of consideration is on a common money count for money had and received to the use of the plaintiff. (Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32 at 61-3. To the extent that it is necessary to say so, this decision correctly reflects the law in Australia and, to the extent that it is inconsistent, should be preferred to the decision of this court in Re Continental C & G Rubber Co Pty Ltd (1919) 27 CLR 194.) The action evolved from the writ of indebitatus assumpsit. It is available only if the contract [356] has been discharged, either for breach or following frustration, and if there has been a total, and not merely partial, failure of consideration … Unconditionally accrued rights, including accrued rights to sue for damages for prior breach of the contract, are not affected by the discharge. Prepayments can, in general, be recovered, but the position of deposits or earnests is not entirely clear, the better view being that they are not recoverable if paid to provide a sanction against withdrawal: Mayson v Clouet [1924] AC 980.

In 1846, when Pollock CB held in Walstab v Spottiswoode that it was not possible to combine a claim for damages with one for restitution, the restitutionary action was brought on the writ of indebitatus assumpsit. Subsequently, Lord Wright said in Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd at 63:

> The writ of indebitatus assumpsit involved at least two averments, the debt or obligation and the assumpsit. The former was the basis of the claim and was the real cause of action. The latter was merely fictitious and could not be traversed, but was necessary to enable the convenient and liberal form of action to be used in such cases.

The action was, as Lord Mansfield said in Moses v Macferlan (1760) 2 Burr 1005 at 1008; 97 ER 676 at 678 "quasi ex contractu" and founded on an obligation imposed by law and accommodated within the system of formal pleading by means of the fictitious assumpsit or promise. It was necessary to plead the fictitious assumpsit until the enactment of s 3 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 (Eng). And even then its influence continued. The abolition of the forms of action inspired an analysis of the sources of obligation in the common law in terms of a rigid [357] dichotomy between contract and tort. In that context, there was little room for restitutionary obligation imposed by law except as a "quasi-contractual" appendix to the law of contract. As a result, until recently, restitutionary claims were disallowed when a promise could not be implied in fact. However, since Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 such an approach no longer represents the law in Australia. But, in the circumstances prevailing in 1846, it is not difficult to see that a plaintiff would necessarily be put to an election between the real and fictitious promises. In cases of tort it is equally plain that there had to be a choice between an action on a fictitious assumpsit (waiving the tort) and seeking damages for the tort …

Conclusion: the respondent cannot recover the fare and damages for breach of contract

[27.195] [359] The old forms of action cannot provide the answer today. But in my view, Walstab v Spottiswoode and the earlier cases support the view expressed by Corbin and Treitel that full damages and complete restitution will not be given for the same breach of contract. There are several reasons. First, restitution of the contractual consideration removes, at least notionally, the basis on which the plaintiff is entitled to call on the defendant to perform his or her contractual obligations. More particularly, the continued retention by the defendant is regarded, on the language of Lord Mansfield, as "against conscience" or, in the modern terminology, as an unjust enrichment of the defendant because the condition upon which it was paid, namely, performance by the defendant may not have occurred: see Fibrosa [1943] AC 32 at 65-7 per Lord Wright. But, equally, that performance, for deficiencies in which damages are sought, was conditional on payment by the plaintiff. Recovery of the money paid destroys performance of that condition. Secondly, the plaintiff will almost always be protected by an award of damages for breach of contract, which in appropriate cases will include an amount for substitute performance or an amount representing the plaintiff's reliance loss. It should be noted that nothing said here is inconsistent with McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377.

I would therefore conclude that, even if the respondent had an entitlement to recover the cruise fare, Carruthers J and the majority of the Court of Appeal erred in allowing restitution of the balance of the fare along with damages for breach of contract. The consequences of this conclusion will be considered below in light of the conclusion to be reached with regard to the award of damages for disappointment and distress …

The claim for damages for disappointment and distress

[27.200] [On the question of awarding damages for disappointment and distress, Mason CJ considered the authorities and the various possibilities and continued:] [359]

[I]t is evident that, while the innocent party to a contract will generally be disappointed if the defendant does not perform the contract, the innocent party's disappointment and distress are seldom so significant as to attract an award of damages on that score. For that reason, if for no other, it is preferable to adopt the rule that damages for disappointment and distress are not recoverable unless they proceed from physical inconvenience caused by the breach or unless the contract is one the object of which is to provide enjoyment, relaxation or freedom from molestation. In cases falling within the last-mentioned category, the damages flow directly from the breach of contract, the promise being to provide enjoyment, relaxation or freedom from molestation. In these situations the court is not driven to invoke notions such as "reasonably foreseeable" or "within the reasonable contemplation of the parties" because the breach results in a failure to provide the promised benefits. [T]his approach … is to be preferred to the artificial expedient of saying that damages of the kind under consideration will be awarded for breaches of non-commercial contracts but not for breaches of commercial contracts …

[His Honour said that $5 000 would provide fair compensation.]

MCHUGH J [held that there was no total failure of consideration, that once the passenger began to enjoy the promised benefits the right of the shipowner to retain the fare became unconditional. He agreed that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover the price of her fare on the basis of restitution. His Honour continued]:

The general rule relating to damages for distress and disappointment

Damages for breach of contract cannot ordinarily be awarded for distress or disappointment arising from that breach. In Hamlin v Great Northern Railway Co (1856) 1 H & N 408 at 411; 156 ER 1261 at 1262, Pollock CB said:

> In actions for breaches of contract the damages must be such as are capable of being appreciated or estimated … but it may be laid down as a rule, that generally in actions upon contracts no damages can be given which cannot be stated specifically, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover whatever damages naturally result from the breach of contract, but not damages for the disappointment of mind occasioned by the breach of contract.

(This passage was cited with approval by Dixon and McTiernan JJ in Fink v Fink (1946) 74 CLR 127 at 142–3.)

In Hamlin, the defendant, in breach of contract, failed to carry the plaintiff to his destination in accordance with the advertised time-table, forcing the plaintiff to obtain overnight accommodation in the course of his journey and to buy a new ticket to resume his journey. The plaintiff sued for breach of contract alleging that, [395] in consequence of the delay, he failed to keep appointments with customers and was detained for longer than he should have been. The Court of Exchequer held that he was entitled only to nominal damages "and such other damages of a pecuniary kind as he may have really sustained as a direct consequence of the breach of contract": at 411; 1262.

The rule that damages cannot be recovered for distress arising out of a breach of an ordinary contract was substantially confirmed in Addis v Gramophone Co Ltd [1909] AC 488 where the House of Lords set aside an award of damages for "the abrupt and oppressive way in which the plaintiff's services were discontinued, and the loss he sustained from the discredit thus thrown upon him". Lord Loreburn LC said (at 491) "that indemnity cannot include compensation either for the injured feelings of the servant, or for the loss he may sustain from the fact that his having been dismissed of itself makes it more difficult for him to obtain fresh employment." After the decision in Addis, the general rule was so firmly established in England and Australia that in Fink v Fink (at 144) Dixon and McTiernan JJ could say that, in an action for breach of contract, "[r]esentment, disappointment and the loss of esteem of friends are not proper elements".

Various explanations of the rationale of this rule have been proffered. None of them is satisfactory. The rationale implicit in Hamlin was that damages for disappointment (or distress) are not awarded because they cannot be assessed accurately. Yet in many actions of tort (for example, defamation, malicious prosecution and false imprisonment), damages for distress can be awarded …

[396] While it can be accepted that not all principles relating to an award of damages in tort ought to be applicable in an action for breach of contract, it is difficult to see why no damages should be awarded for distress or disappointment arising directly from the breach of contract itself. Difficulty of assessment does not stop courts awarding those damages in actions in tort. If the plaintiff is denied recovery for distress or disappointment in a contract case, the award of damages will fail to fulfil the objective of compensating the plaintiff for the harm which he or she has suffered as the result of the defendant's breach. Another explanation for the general rule is that disappointment and distress arising from breach of contract are not within the contemplation of the parties to ordinary, particularly commercial, contracts. But such an explanation does not accord with everyday experience relating to the making of contracts. The parties to many contracts, including many commercial contracts, are fully aware, when they make them, that breach will result in disappointment and sometimes distress to the innocent party.

Treitel contends that the ordinary rule is sensible because "anxiety is an almost inevitable concomitant of expectations based on promises, so that a contracting party must be deemed to take the risk to it": Treitel, The Law of Contract (8th ed, 1991), p 878. However, the proposition that "anxiety is an almost inevitable concomitant of expectations based on promises", while generally true, does not explain why the injured party should have to bear the risk of this particular head of damage while being entitled to be compensated for other damage flowing from breach of contract. Furthermore, the proposition that the "party must be deemed to take the risk of it" merely records the result of the rule and is not an explanation of it …

Allowing damages for distress and disappointment would increase the cost of entering into contracts. But it is at least arguable that the cost of meeting such claims does not outweigh the demands of [397] distributive justice in ensuring that individuals are properly compensated for the harm which they suffer by reason of breaches of contracts. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that the unexpressed basis for the general rule was the instinctive fear of the common law judges that to allow damages for disappointment or distress consequent upon breach of an ordinary contract would be to inflate damage awards in contract cases, particularly in commercial cases where the breach has been accompanied by high handed behaviour. (But see Hayes v Dodd [1990] 2 All ER 815 at 823 where Staughton LJ said that he would not view with enthusiasm the prospect that every shipowner, having successfully claimed unpaid freight or demurrage, would be able to add a claim for mental distress suffered while waiting for his money.) At the same time, it must be acknowledged that the common law judges have admitted significant exceptions to the general rule. Moreover, they have often sought to justify these exceptions by propositions which undermine the general rule itself.

[27.205] The exceptions

From an early period, the common law allowed damages for injured feelings and wounded pride consequent upon a breach of a promise of marriage. Moreover, soon after the decision in Hamlin, the Court of Exchequer held that damages for "inconveniences and annoyances" could be awarded for breach of contract. In Burton v Pinkerton (1867) LR 2 Ex 340, the plaintiff had agreed to serve as a seaman on a ship "upon an ordinary commercial voyage". However, in breach of contract, the defendant placed the ship under the control of a foreign government which was at war, causing the plaintiff to leave the ship at a foreign port. The court held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages for the inconveniences and annoyances arising from the defendant's breach of contract.

Nine years after Burton, the Queen's Bench held that a plaintiff was entitled to damages for the inconvenience of having to walk home in the early hours of the morning when a train failed to stop at the station for which he had bought a ticket: Hobbs v London & South Western Railway Co (1875) LR 10 QB 111. Cockburn CJ said (at 116) that:

> if the jury are satisfied that in the particular instance personal inconvenience or suffering has been occasioned, and that it has [398] been occasioned as the immediate effect of the breach of the contract, I can see no reasonable principle why that should not be compensated for.

His Lordship said that Hamlin did not decide that personal inconvenience, however serious, was not to be taken into account as a subject matter of damages. Blackburn J asserted that in Hamlin there was no inconvenience at all, saying that "sleeping at Grimsby instead of Hull seems really to be nothing". Mellor J said (at 122):

> that for the mere inconvenience, such as annoyance and loss of temper, or vexation, or for being disappointed in a particular thing which you have set your mind upon, without real physical inconvenience resulting, you cannot recover damages. That is purely sentimental, and not a case where the word inconvenience, as I here use it, would apply.

But his Lordship went on to say (at 123) that: "where the inconvenience is real and substantial arising from being obliged to walk home, I cannot see why that should not be capable of being assessed as damages in respect of inconvenience."

Some years earlier in Kemp v Sober (1851) 1 Sim 9 (NS) 517; 61 ER 200, Lord Cranworth VC had held that "the feeling of anxiety" was the suffering of damage for the purpose of obtaining an injunction to restrain a breach of covenant not to carry on a business or calling. Notwithstanding the exceptions admitted in these cases, the general rule laid down in Addis was almost automatically applied until the post-war period. Burton and Hobbs seem to have been largely ignored …

In Bailey v Bullock [1950] 2 All ER 1167, however, Barry J distinguished Addis and applied Burton and Hobbs to award damages for "inconvenience and discomfort" where a solicitor in breach of his retainer had failed to obtain possession of the plaintiff's house and, as a result, the plaintiff was compelled to live with his parents-in-law in circum-[399]stances of physical inconvenience. Barry J said (at 1171) that the "inconvenience should have been reasonably contemplated by the defendants as a probable result of their failure to perform their contractual duties".

The decision in Bailey was followed in Stedman v Swan's Tours (1951) 95 Sol J 727 where the English Court of Appeal awarded damages for "appreciable inconvenience and discomfort" arising from a breach of contract by the defendants in failing to arrange first class hotel accommodation at a resort. Stedman was relied upon by Zelling J in Athens-Macdonald Travel Service Pty Ltd v Kazis [1970] SASR 264 where the plaintiff was awarded damages for the substantial inconvenience and discomfort which arose during a holiday in Cyprus as the result of the defendant's failure to make the necessary travel arrangements. In Jarvis v Swans Tours Ltd [1973] QB 233, the Court of Appeal made further inroads to the rule in Addis by making an award of damages for "loss of enjoyment" where the plaintiff's skiing holiday did not measure up to the promises in the defendant's brochure. Lord Denning MR thought that Hamlin and Hobbs no longer stated the law accurately. His Lordship said (at 237-8):

> In a proper case damages for mental distress can be recovered in contract, just as damages for shock can be recovered in tort. One such case is a contract for a holiday, or any other contract to provide entertainment and enjoyment. If the contracting party breaks his contract, damages can be given for the disappointment, the distress, the upset and frustration caused by the breach….

[400] Damages for disappointment have been awarded in other "holiday" cases. The decision in Jarvis was soon extended beyond the area of holiday contracts. At first, the rationale of an award of damages for distress in contract cases was explained as being the contemplation of the parties that the breach might give rise to distress. In Cox v Philips Industries Ltd [1976] 1 WLR 638, at 644 Lawson J held that damages could be awarded for vexation, frustration and distress if "it was in the contemplation of the parties" that such damage would result from breach. His Lordship awarded damages for the "depression, vexation and frustration" which arose from the defendant's breach of contract in relegating the plaintiff, its employee, to a position of lesser responsibility. In Heywood v Wellers [1976] QB 446, the Court of Appeal, like Lawson J in Cox, appeared to regard "the contemplation" of the parties as the basis for awarding damages for distress. The court awarded the plaintiff damages for the mental distress arising from the failure of her solicitors, in breach of their retainer, to obtain an order restraining a man from molesting her. Although Jarvis and Jackson v Horizon Holidays were cited in argument, Lord Denning MR said that what the plaintiff had suffered was within the contemplation of the defendants "within the rule in Hadley v Baxendale". James LJ cited Jarvis for the proposition that the damages were payable because it was "within the contemplation of the contracting parties that a foreseeable result of a breach of the contract will be to cause vexation, frustration, or distress".

Bridge LJ said that the damages were recoverable because the plaintiff had suffered mental distress which was "the direct and inevitable consequence of the solicitor's negligent failure to obtain the very relief which it was the sole purpose of the litigation to secure". His Lordship said that a clear distinction could be drawn between mental distress which arose in that situation and mental distress which arose as an incidental consequence of the misconduct of litigation by a solicitor and which was not recoverable.

However, recent English cases have decisively rejected the view that the contemplation of the parties is the basis upon which damages for distress or disappointment are awarded for breach of [401] contract. Instead, they have concluded that such damages are recoverable only when the object of the contract is to provide enjoyment, pleasure or freedom from distress or where the distress is consequent upon the suffering of physical inconvenience. In Bliss v South East Thames Regional Health Authority [1987] 1 ICR 700 the Court of Appeal expressly rejected the statement of Lawson J in Cox that damages could be recovered for breach of a contract of employment if distress arising from the breach was within the contemplation of the parties …

The approach … in Bliss was approved by the Court of Appeal in Hayes v Dodd [1990] 2 All ER 815 Staughton LJ said (at 824):

> I am not convinced that it is enough to ask whether mental distress was reasonably foreseeable as a consequence, or even whether it should reasonably have been contemplated as not unlikely to result from a breach of contract. It seems to me that damages for mental distress in contract are, as a matter of policy, limited to certain classes of case. I would broadly follow the classification provided by Dillon LJ in Bliss v South East Thames Regional Health Authority: "… where the contract which has been broken was itself a contract to provide peace of mind or freedom from distress …"

It may be that the class is somewhat wider than that. But it should not, in my judgment, include any case where the object of the contract was not comfort or pleasure, or the relief or [sic] discomfort, but simply carrying on a commercial activity with a view to profit.

[402] In Hayes, the Court of Appeal set aside damages for anguish and vexation arising from the negligence of solicitors who had been retained on a purchase of a commercial property.

In Watts v Morrow [1991] 1 WLR 1421 at 1442, the Court of Appeal held that "in the case of the ordinary surveyor's contract, damages are only recoverable for distress caused by physical consequences of the breach of contract" …

No uniformity of approach to the question of damages for distress for breach of contract is discernible in the decisions of other courts in the British Commonwealth. Decisions in Australia, Canada and New Zealand are spread along a spectrum from acceptance of Addis to rejection of that decision.

Apart from the decision of Zelling J in Athens-Macdonald Travel Service Pty Ltd and the decision of the Court of Appeal in the present case, Australian courts have paid little attention to the developments in England in the last 40 years concerning the award of damages for distress arising from breach of contract. In Allison v Hewitt (1974) 3 NSWDCR 193 and Falko v James McEwan & Co [1977] VR 447, Jarvis was distinguished on the basis that it applied to holiday situations and not to ordinary commercial contracts … [403] In Canada, the Supreme Court has taken a view contrary to that taken by the English Court of Appeal in Bliss, Hayes and Watts …

In New Zealand, the demise of the Addis rule seems imminent, if it has not already occurred …

[27.210] The applicable rule

[404] If the matter were free from authority, the object of an award of damages for breach of contract and the principles of causation and remoteness would require the conclusion that damage for disappointment or distress, resulting from breach of contract, was compensable if it was within the reasonable contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. No doubt in most cases, the disappointment would be so negligible that the damage suffered could be regarded as de minimis and ignored. But in other cases, it seems unreasonable that the party in breach should escape liability even though, at the time of making the contract, that person knew that breach might result in the other party suffering disappointment …

However, the rule in Addis has stood for the best part of a century. In this country it has suffered little, if any, inroad by judicial decision. Furthermore, in Fink, two of the three members of the majority accepted the common law rule to be that stated by Pollock CB in Hamlin.

It is still open to this court to declare that damages for distress [405] and disappointment in contract cases are not subject to any special rules. However, I do not think that the step should be taken in this case. Counsel for Mrs Dillon did not argue that the general rule laid down in Hamlin and confirmed in Addis should be rejected. He was content to rely on the modern English decisions. Consequently, the court did not have the benefit of argument concerning the social and economic consequences of a decision which overturned the rule formulated in Hamlin. On the other hand, having regard to the decisions in Burton and Hobbs, the developments in England, Canada and New Zealand in the last 40 years and the requirements of basic principle, this court should not accept everything that was said by Pollock CB in Hamlin or by the House of Lords in Addis …

In the result, the court should not presently reject the general rule enunciated in Hamlin and substantially confirmed in Addis. At the same time, it should recognise that damages for distress or disappointment are recoverable in an action for breach of contract if it arises from breach of an express or implied term that the promisor will provide the promisee with pleasure or enjoyment or personal protection or if it is consequent upon the suffering or physical injury or physical inconvenience. The question whether the general rule enunciated in Hamlin should be overruled can be considered when the court has heard full argument on the question.

[27.215] Mrs Dillon's right to damages for distress and disappointment

[406] The contract between Mrs Dillon and Baltic was one in which Baltic impliedly promised to provide a pleasurable and enjoyable cruise for 14 days. Its failure to do so means that it must pay damages for the distress and disappointment suffered by Mrs Dillon … If Mrs Dillon retained both the sum of $1 417 and the sum of $5 000, her compensation would be unreasonably excessive. If the appeal is allowed on the restitution issue and dismissed on the distress issue, however, the sum of $5 000 will be fair compensation for the general damage which she suffered over and above the loss of her valuables and personal injuries …

[Brennan J drew a distinction between a case where a contract is expressed to protect a promisee from disappointment of mind and a case where disappointment of mind is merely a mental reaction to breach citing Heywood v Wellers. His Honour said (at 370):

> That was a case of a solicitor's negligence in prosecuting proceedings in accordance with his retainer. Bridge LJ said:
> > There is, I think, a clear distinction to be drawn between mental distress which is an incidental consequence to the client of the misconduct of litigation by his solicitor, on the one hand, and mental distress on the other hand which is the direct and inevitable consequence of the solicitor's negligent failure to obtain the very relief which it was the sole purpose of the litigation to secure. The first does not sound in damages: the second does.

His Honour said that the plaintiff was promised "a holiday cruise, an interlude to refresh the mind and relax the spirits" but that instead she was shipwrecked, an "event provoking severe tension of mind and depression of spirit". Brennan J continued (at 371):

> The damage inevitably and directly consequent on the breach of promise to carry her safely (or to use all reasonable care to carry her safely) to her destination was not simply > a non-performance of the contract of carriage but an exposure to danger and infliction of mental distress … [372] It was such an inevitable and direct result of that breach that it is proper to hold that it flowed naturally from the breach. An award of damages for "disappointment and distress" was therefore right in principle.

His Honour agreed that an award of $5 000 damages was appropriate.]

[DEANE and DAWSON JJ in a joint judgment agreed that there had been no total failure of consideration and that the fare was irrecoverable. Their Honours said that they agreed with the general rule that a plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages for disappointment of mind, distress and injured feelings occasioned by a breach of contract, but that the present case fell within a category to which the general rule does not apply, and that where the very object of the contract is to provide pleasure, relaxation, peace of mind or freedom from molestation, damages will be awarded if the fruit of the contract is not provided. TOOHEY J in a short judgment agreed with Mason CJ.]

[GAUDRON J agreed that the fare could not be recovered back as there had not been total failure of consideration and further, that as Baltic had provided some consideration, Baltic's right to retain the fare money became unconditional. Her Honour agreed with Mason CJ on the right to recover damages for disappointment and distress.]

[The High Court ordered that the order made by Carruthers J for restitution of the fare and so much of the award for interest as related to the order for restitution be set aside.]

Appeal allowed.

Contributory negligence

[27.220] Legislation throughout Australia has abolished the common law doctrine of contributory negligence, which provided a complete defence to an action for the tort of negligence. Instead, the legislation permits a court to apportion responsibility between the parties to reduce the damages awarded to a plaintiff whose negligence has contributed to his or her own damage to the extent that is "just and equitable": see Civil Law (Wrongs Act) 2002 (ACT), s 102; Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1965 (NSW), s 9(1); Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (NT), s 16(1); Law Reform Act 1995 (Qld), s 10(1); Law Reform (Contributory Negligence and Apportionment of Liability) Act 2001 (SA), s 7; Wrongs Act 1954 (Tas), s 4; Wrongs Act 1958 (Vic), s 26(1); Law Reform (Contributory Negligence and Tortfeasors' Contribution) Act 1947 (WA), s 4(1).

Under the common law, the doctrine of contributory negligence never applied to the law of contract. In Astley v Austrust [1999] HCA 6; (1999) 197 CLR 1, the High Court held that apportionment legislation will not apply to reduce an award of damages for breach of contract on grounds of contributory negligence. This position has been altered by legislation in all States and Territories: see Civil Law (Wrongs Act) 2002 (ACT), s 101; Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1965 (NSW), s 8; Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act (NT), s 15; Law Reform Act 1995 (Qld), s 5; Law Reform (Contributory Negligence and Apportionment of Liability) Act 2001 (SA), s 3; Wrongs Act 1954 (Tas), s 2; Wrongs Act 1958 (Vic), s 25; Law Reform (Contributory Negligence and Tortfeasors' Contribution) Act 1947 (WA), s 3A.

Loss of bargain damages and termination under a term

Shevill v Builders Licensing Board

[27.225] Shevill v Builders Licensing Board (1982) 149 CLR 620 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Shevills, the appellants, were the guarantors of due performance by the lessee of the terms of a lease by the respondent, of certain land for a term of three years from 7 March 1976. The lease reserved a yearly rent of $36,655, which the lessee covenanted to pay in advance in equal monthly instalments.

Clause 9(a) of the lease provided that if the rent should remain unpaid for a period of 14 days or if there was any breach or default in any of the provisions of the lease or if winding-up or bankruptcy proceedings should be taken against the lessee, the lessor had the right to re-enter the premises:

> but without prejudice to any other remedy which the lessor has or might or otherwise would have for arrears of rent or breach of covenants or for damages as a result of any such event and thereupon the lessor should be freed and discharged from any action suit claim or demand by or obligation to the lessee under or by virtue of this lease.

The lessee was constantly in arrears with the rent. The largest debit balance was $6,971.25 in June 1977, but payments subsequently reduced the balance. In June and July 1977, three cheques given in the payment of rent were dishonoured.]

GIBBS CJ [stated the facts and continued]: [624] It is unnecessary to go further into the details of the evidence. It is enough to say that the only possible inference is that the lessee was experiencing financial difficulty … It is however impossible to conclude that the lessee was unwilling to comply with its obligations. Finally, on 3 August 1977, two months' rent (amounting to $5 442.50) remained unpaid. On that date the respondent issued and served a statement of claim claiming possession of the land. It was conceded that the effect was to forfeit the lease, although the lessee did not in fact give up possession until ordered to do so in October 1977. The respondent, in the present proceedings, claimed $5 442.50, the rent due to 3 August 1977, and damages for breach of the covenants of the lease and interest. At some time after the proceedings were commenced the arrears of rent were paid. The learned trial judge gave judgment for the respondent for damages of $41 261 plus interest. Damages were assessed by having regard to the amount which the respondent would have [625] received by way of rent during the remainder of the term and after giving credit for the amounts of rent which it was able to receive from the property during that period. The amount of the assessment is not contested.

It is not now disputed that the appellants are liable under the guarantee for whatever damages are payable by the lessee to the respondent. The question for decision is whether the lessee is in the circumstances liable for damages.

The primary submission made on behalf of the respondent was that since the breaches of contract committed by the lessee entitled the respondent to terminate the contract, it followed that when the respondent exercised its right to do so it became entitled to damages for loss of the benefits which performance of the contract would have conferred upon it. This submission treated the breaches of the covenant to pay rent as a breach of an essential term of the contract. In the alternative it was submitted that the conduct of the lessee revealed such an unwillingness or inability to perform the contract as to amount to a repudiation of it …

[A] contract may be repudiated if one party renounces his liabilities under it — if he evinces an intention no longer to be bound by the contract … or shows that he intends to fulfil the contract only in a manner substantially inconsistent with his [626] obligations and not in any other way … The present case was not one of this kind … A third situation in which a right to rescission arises is where there has been a breach of a fundamental or essential term of the contract …

[627] The test accepted in Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks (1951) 83 CLR 322 at 337, is whether the term "is of such importance to the promisee that he would not have entered into the contract unless he had been assured of a strict or a substantial performance of the promise, as the case may be, and that this ought to have been apparent to the promisor" … It is clear that a covenant to pay rent in advance at specified times would not, without more, be a fundamental or essential term having the effect that any failure, however slight, to make payment at the specified times would entitle the lessor to terminate the lease. However, the parties to a contract may stipulate that a term will be treated as having a fundamental character although in itself it may seem of little importance, and effect must be given to any such agreement (see Wickman Tools v Schuler AG [1974] AC 235 at 251) … In the present case cl 9(a) undoubtedly gave to the respondent a right to re-enter if rent should be unpaid for 14 days … However, the respondent's argument is that because cl 9(a) gave a right to re-enter for any breach of cl 3 that resulted in rent being unpaid for 14 days, the covenant in cl 3 as to payment, together with the provisions of cl 9(a), became an essential term, or at least gave the respondent the same rights as are available under the general law to a party who elects to terminate a contract for repudiation or fundamental breach.

In my opinion it does not follow from the fact that the contract gave the respondent the right to terminate the contract that it conferred on it the further right to recover damages as compensation for the loss it will sustain as a result of the failure of the lessee to pay the rent and observe the covenants for the rest of the term. Clause 9(a) specifies a number of circumstances in which the rights [628] conferred by that clause will arise. The first of those circumstances — (where the rent is unpaid for 14 days) — is not described by reference to any breach, although it necessarily involves a default. The second case — that in which the lessee commits or suffers to occur any breach or default in the observance of any of the covenants of the lease — does depend entirely upon the lessee causing or suffering a breach to occur. The other conditions on which re-entry is available do not necessarily involve a breach of any covenant or condition of the lease. In some cases, whether or not there has been a breach, the right of re-entry given by cl 9(a) may become available although the circumstances would not suggest that the position of the lessor under the lease has been substantially affected or threatened. For example, a lessee, who usually makes prompt payment of the rent, may allow a small amount of rent to fall in arrears for 14 days. He may commit a minor breach of covenant, such as an insignificant failure to paint or repair or keep the premises clean. He may make an arrangement with his creditors the effect of which will nevertheless be that he can continue to pay the rent fully and on time. In all these circumstances the lessor is given the right to re-enter. However it would require very clear words to bring about the result, which in some circumstances would be quite unjust, that whenever a lessor could exercise the right given by the clause to re-enter, he could also recover damages for the loss resulting from the failure of the lessee to carry out all the covenants of the lease; covenants which, in some cases, the lessee might have been both willing and able to perform had it not been for the re-entry.

The words of cl 9(a) afford no support to the respondent's argument. The rights which the lessor is to have if any of the circumstances mentioned in the clause exist are exhaustively defined by the clause. There are preserved to the lessor: "any action or other remedy which the lessor has or might or otherwise could have for arrears of rent or breach of covenants or for damages as a result of any such event" …

[His Honour then discussed the meaning of cl 9(a).] [629] The clause does not confer a right to recover damages which result from the fact that the lessee will pay no further rent during the remainder of the term. It does not refer to damages for the loss of the benefits conferred by the lease as a whole. Although cl 9(a) deals with the situation in which the lessor may bring the lease to an end, there is nothing in its provisions to indicate any intention to give to a lessor who exercises the right to re-enter the same rights as would have been available to him if he had accepted a repudiation of the contract or had rescinded it on the ground that the lessee had committed a breach of an essential term. It would have been easy, although inequitable, to provide that in any of the circumstances mentioned in cl 9(a) the lessor would be entitled to damages for loss of the benefits which performance of the covenants of the lease would have conferred on him in the future. However, the rights of the lessor are limited to the recovery of arrears of rent and damages for breaches and other events that occurred before re-entry. Assuming that non-payment of the rent was an "event", damage caused by the fact that the lessor chose to re-enter, and thereby absolved the lessee from the obligation to pay rent during the remainder of the term, did not result from that event within the meaning of the clause on its proper construction. The main argument which was submitted on behalf of the respondent must therefore fail.

In my opinion the alternative argument submitted on behalf of the respondent is also unsuccessful. It may be that cl 9(a) excludes the rights that would ordinarily flow from an accepted repudiation of the contract. Whether or not that is so, the evidence does not reveal that the lessee committed breaches which went to the root of the contract. Counsel for the respondent relied particularly on the submission that the circumstances made it probable that the lessee would have continued to be late with its payments of the rent. We were referred to Maple Flock Co v Universal Furniture Products [630] (Wembley) Ltd [1934] 1 KB 148 … The evidence in the present case made it possible to infer that the lessee would have continued to find it difficult to make prompt payments of rent, but it did not show how long the difficulties of the lessee were likely to last or whether its financial position was likely to improve or to deteriorate. They did not show that the rent would not be paid — in fact, in the past, the rent had rarely been more than two months in arrears … It is in my opinion not possible to conclude that there was a fundamental breach of the contract which would have entitled the respondent to rescind it under the general law, and to recover damages for total breach.

For these reasons in my opinion the respondent was entitled to recover the arrears of rent but was not entitled to the damages which the learned trial judge awarded … [MURPHY and BRENNAN JJ agreed essentially with the judgment of Gibbs CJ. WILSON J in a separate judgment agreed that the lessor was not entitled to damages for loss of the contract.]

[27.230] Note

The parties may avoid the restriction on loss of bargain damages in Shevill v Builders Licensing Board (1982) 149 CLR 620 through careful drafting. In Gumland Property Holdings Pty Limited v Duffy Bros Fruit Market (Campbelltown) Pty Ltd [2008] HCA 10; (2008) 234 CLR 237, the High Court confirmed that such provisions may be effective and that effect should be given to the clearly expressed intentions of the parties in such cases.

Liquidated damages and penalties

[28.90] WHAT ARE THE CONSEQUENCES OF A STIPULATION BEING A PENALTY? 811

THE PENALTIES DOCTRINE

[28.05] The penalties doctrine applies to contractual stipulations that impose additional liability for the non-observance of a primary stipulation imposed in terrorem of the satisfaction of that primary stipulation. In Australia, the doctrine applies both to stipulations providing for the payment of money in the event of breach of contract and to stipulations imposing additional liability on the occurrence or non-occurrence of events that are not obligations under the contract.

There are three stages to the penalty analysis:

- first, whether the penalties doctrine is engaged;
- second, whether the impugned stipulation is penal; and
- third, the consequences of a determination that a stipulation is penal.

See Australia Capital Financial Management Pty Ltd v Linfield Developments Pty Ltd [2017] NSWCA 99, [357].

IS THE PENALTIES DOCTRINE ENGAGED?

[28.10] Until the decision of the High Court in Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2012] HCA 30; (2012) 247 CLR 205, the modern doctrine of penalties was understood only to apply to contractual terms that specified amount payable to one party on the event of breach by the other. In this case, the High Court affirmed the continued application of the equitable penalties doctrine, which has a wider jurisdiction.

Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd

[28.40] Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2012] HCA 30; (2012) 247 CLR 205 (High Court of Australia) – removal of appeal to the Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia pursuant to s 40(1) of the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth).

[FACTS: Over 30,000 customers commenced representative proceedings against their bank seeking declarations that honour, dishonour and non-payment fees in respect of various retail and business deposit accounts and late-payment and over-limit fees in respect of consumer and commercial credit card accounts were void or unenforceable as penalties. A question arose of whether the fees were payable only upon breach of contract by the customers and, if so, whether the fees were capable of being characterised as penalties. The primary judge held that only the late-payment fees were payable upon breach of contract. Following the decision of the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales in Interstar Wholesale Finance Pty Ltd v Integral Home Loans Pty Ltd (2008) 257 ALR 292, the primary judge held that the penalty doctrine was limited to breaches of contract and thus could be applied only to the late-payment fees. The applicants applied for leave to appeal to the Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia. On the application of the applicants for leave, French CJ and Crennan J removed that application to the High Court.]

FRENCH CJ, GUMMOW, CRENNEN, KEIFEL AND BELL JJ:

The penalty doctrine

[9] Mason and Deane JJ observed in Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 445; [1983] HCA 11 that, as the term suggests, a penalty is in the nature of a punishment for non-observance of a contractual stipulation and consists, upon breach, of the imposition of an additional or different liability.

[10] In general terms, a stipulation prima facie imposes a penalty on a party ("the first party") if, as a matter of substance, it is collateral (or accessory) to a primary stipulation in favour of a second party and this collateral stipulation, upon the failure of the primary stipulation, imposes upon the first party an additional detriment, the penalty, to the benefit of the second party (Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v Stewart (1919) 27 CLR 119; [1919] HCA 63 at 128-129 and 131; Acron Pacific Ltd v Offshore Oil NL (1985) 157 CLR 514; [1985] HCA 63 at 520). In that sense, the collateral or accessory stipulation is described as being in the nature of a security for and in terrorem of the satisfaction of the primary stipulation (Rolfe v Peterson (1772) 2 Bro PC 436 at 442; 1 ER 1048 at 1052; Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 86; cf, as to irrevocable letters of credit and "performance bonds", the proceeds of which are in substitution for performance by a contractor, Fletcher Construction Australia Ltd v Varnsdorf Pty Ltd [1998] 3 VR 812; Mason, "'I'll have my bond; speak not against my bond': Constructive trusts and surplus proceeds from performance bonds" (2012) 6 Journal of Equity 74 at 81-83). If compensation can be made to the second party for the prejudice suffered by failure of the primary stipulation, the collateral stipulation and the penalty are enforced only to the extent of that compensation. The first party is relieved to that degree from liability to satisfy the collateral stipulation.

[11] It has been established at least since the decision of Lord Macclesfield in Peachy v Duke of Somerset (1720) 1 Strange 447; 93 ER 626 that the penalty doctrine is not engaged if the prejudice or damage to the interests of the second party by the failure of the primary stipulation is insusceptible of evaluation and assessment in money terms. It is the availability of compensation which generates the "equity" upon which the court intervenes; without it, the parties are left to their legal rights and obligations. The point is illustrated by Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v Stewart (1919) 27 CLR 119. A bond was given by the appellant in the sum of £500 on condition that it pay £50 if and so often as its members in combination should go on strike. Isaacs and Rich JJ ((1919) 27 CLR 119, at 131 – 132) emphasised that, whilst refusal to work almost inevitably would cause loss to employers, "no one can ever tell how much loss is sustained by not doing business" and on the principle stated by Lord Macclesfield no relief was to be given against payment of the £50.

[12] It should be noted that the primary stipulation may be the occurrence or non-occurrence of an event which need not be the payment of money (Story, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence as Administered in England and America, 13th ed (1886), Vol 2 at [1314]). Further, the penalty imposed upon the first party upon failure of the primary stipulation need not be a requirement to pay to the second party a sum of money.

[13] In Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 at 1034-1035 and 1039 respectively; [1989] 1 All ER 621 at 628 and 632 Dillon LJ and Nicholls LJ explained that there is no distinction in principle here between a stipulation upon default for the transfer (or the use) (See Forestry Commission (NSW) v Stefanetto (1976) 133 CLR 507 at 519-521 per Mason J; [1976] HCA 3) of property and a payment of money; such a distinction would elevate form over substance. In that case, cl 6(b) of a share sale contract provided that upon default in payment of an instalment of the purchase price the purchaser was obliged to retransfer the shares to the vendors upon payment of a stipulated sum to the purchaser. The Court of Appeal held that cl 6(b) had the characteristics of a penalty clause. It ordered that either the shares be sold by the purchaser and the amount of the unpaid instalments be paid to the assignee of the vendors; or the current value of the shares, the aggregate of the unpaid instalments and amounts charged on the shares be ascertained and, if this was less than the sum presently due from the vendors under cl 6(b), effect be given to cl 6(b).

[14] It will already be apparent that an understanding of the penalty doctrine requires more than a brief backward glance. In his reasons in Austin v United Dominions Corporation Ltd [1984] 2 NSWLR 612 at 626; affd sub nom AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170; [1986] HCA 63 (Gibbs CJ, Mason and Wilson JJ; Deane and Dawson JJ dissenting) after referring to the common law and statutory developments which had occurred by the first half of the 18th century, and noting that the equitable origin of the penalty doctrine was accepted throughout the 18th century, Priestley JA continued:

> In the latter part of the eighteenth century and through much of the nineteenth century the courts showed restlessness with their longstanding duty to relieve against penalties. This has been attributed to the fact that during this period the principle of freedom of contract reached its zenith: see Atiyah, The Rise and Fall of Freedom of Contract (1979) at 414-416. Whatever the reason, during the nineteenth century the way in which the law concerning penalties originated and the way in which that law became incorporated in the common law were to some extent lost sight of. At the same time the operation of that law was clarified by the recognition of the distinction between a penalty and a genuine pre-estimate of liquidated damages.

[15] The formulation of that distinction between a penalty and a pre-estimate of liquidated damages which was made by Lord Dunedin in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 86-87 has been described as a product of centuries of equity jurisprudence (Rossiter, Penalties and Forfeiture, (1992) at 33). It was recently applied by this court in Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656 at 662-663 [11]-[12]; [2005] HCA 71. See also the opinion of Douglas J in Priebe & Sons Inc v United States 332 US 407 at 411-412 (1947)). But the present dispute requires attention at an anterior stage of analysis, namely identification of those criteria by which the penalty doctrine is engaged.

The course of the Federal Court litigation

[28.45] [16] The litigation was instituted and has been conducted in the Victorian District Registry of the Federal Court. Section 5 of the Federal Court Act creates the Federal Court as a court of law and equity. The governing law for the litigation is the common law of Australia as modified by applicable federal and Victorian statute law (Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth), s 80).

[17] Before this court there is that part of a pending application for leave to appeal to the Full Court of the Federal Court removed into this court by order made 11 May 2012. That order removed grounds 1-4 of the proposed appeal by the applicants from the answers to certain separate questions given by the primary judge (Gordon J) (Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2011) 288 ALR 611) on 13 December 2011. The interlocutory nature of the proceeding before her Honour necessitates the grant of leave for an appeal to the Full Court (Federal Court Act, s 24(1A)) and delineates the process which has been removed into this court.

[18] Shortly put, grounds 1-4 of the proposed Full Court appeal concern the nature and scope of the jurisdiction to relieve against penalties and the question whether relief is available only after the penalty is imposed upon a breach of contract.

[19] The Federal Court litigation concerns fees identified as honour, dishonour, and non-payment fees charged by the ANZ in respect of various retail deposit accounts and business deposit accounts, and fees identified as over limit and late payment fees charged by the ANZ in respect of consumer credit card accounts and commercial credit card accounts; these fees were identified in the reasons of the primary judge as "exception fees".

[20] The substance of the relevant, but awkwardly expressed, separate questions before the primary judge was to ask whether the exception fees were payable upon breach by the applicants of contractual obligations to the ANZ, and, in the alternative, to ask whether it had been the responsibility of the applicants to see that the circumstances occasioning the imposition of the exception fees did not arise. If there was an affirmative answer to either of the alternative questions, it then was asked whether the fees were "capable of being characterised as a penalty by reason of that fact".

[21] The primary judge found that the late payment fee was payable upon breach of contract and therefore was capable of characterisation as a penalty. The ANZ has not sought to appeal against that finding.

[22] However, in respect of the honour, dishonour, non-payment and over limit fees the primary judge held that these were not charged by the ANZ upon breach of contract by the customer, nor was the occurrence of the event upon which the fees were charged (overdrawing the account or credit limit or attempting to do so) an event which the customer had an obligation or responsibility to avoid ((2011) 288 ALR 611 at 667-668 [205]-[208]). Having thus answered in the negative each of the alternative questions, the primary judge held it was unnecessary to answer the question whether these fees were capable of characterisation as a penalty.

[23] However, her Honour did find that under the pre-existing terms agreed between them, these fees were charged by the ANZ as a consequence of the decision of the ANZ to afford or to decline the provision of further accommodation to the customer. The ANZ did so respectively by approving or authorising payment on an "instruction" issued to it by the customer, or by refusing to do so, where the honouring of the "instruction" would have the effect of overdrawing the customer's account or exceeding the account credit limit. But the separate questions were not so framed as to ask whether, by reason of these conclusions just mentioned, the fees were incapable of characterisation as penalties. Hence, the proposed grounds of appeal which are presently before this court (grounds 1-4) do not include an express challenge to those significant findings. Nevertheless, it will be necessary in these reasons to make further reference to them (At [79]). Ground 6, which is not before this court, asserts error by her Honour in failing to characterise the fees as payable on breach.

[26] The principal findings of the primary judge made irrelevant the concession by the ANZ that it did not determine the quantum of these fees by reference to a sum which would have constituted a genuine pre-estimate of the damage the ANZ might suffer as a consequence of permitting the overdrawing of an account.

[27] The applicants plead that the fees in question were imposed upon or in default of the occurrence of stipulated events but were "out of all proportion" to the loss or damage which might have been sustained by the ANZ by reason of the occurrence of those events.

[28] The applicants also submit to this court that these fees were charged "for a service with no content". Further, the applicants contend that despite the form of the honour fee, with the provision of further accommodation by the ANZ to the customer, in substance it is a disguised penalty.

The Interstar decision

[28.50] [29] In reaching her conclusion respecting the scope of the penalty doctrine, the primary judge, with respect quite properly, followed what had been decided by the New South Wales Court of Appeal in Interstar Wholesale Finance Pty Ltd v Integral Home Loans Pty Ltd (2008) 257 ALR 292. In that case the Court of Appeal held ((2008) 257 ALR 292 at 321-330) that the primary judge (Brereton J) (Integral Home Loans Pty Ltd v Interstar Wholesale Finance Pty Ltd (2007) Aust Contract Reports 90-261 at 90,037; Integral Home Loans Pty Ltd v Interstar Wholesale Finance Pty Ltd (No 2) [2007] NSWSC 592) had erred in denying that the doctrine had ceased to be one of equity and now was wholly legal in nature and in concluding that the doctrine was not limited to the failure of stipulations which were breaches of contract.

[30] The appellants in Interstar were finance companies and the respondents conducted the business of "mortgage originators". Upon the happening of any one of a range of events, the appellants were empowered to terminate agreements, under which they made to the respondents payments described as commissions. Not all of these events were breaches of those agreements by the respondents and not all were acts or omissions over which the respondents had control …. The respondents successfully contended at first instance that the event giving rise to the penalty, as the act or event upon which liability was conditioned, could be the termination of the agreements even if the ground for termination was not breach thereof. Brereton J held that the termination clause was a penalty provision and wholly void ([2007] NSWSC 592 at [7], [49]) and that the respondents were entitled to continued receipt of the commissions. The Court of Appeal held that the agreements conferred no accrued rights upon the respondents, so that upon termination there was no forfeiture of accrued property for the collateral purpose of encouraging compliance with the contract and no engagement of the penalty doctrine; further, the character of the provisions was to define entitlement to the commissions ((2008) 257 ALR 292 at 319).

[31] These holdings would have been sufficient for the Court of Appeal to dispose of the case. However, the court went on, with reference to observations of Mason and Wilson JJ in AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (AMEV-UDC) (1986) 162 CLR 170 at 191, to state that "[t]he modern rule against penalties is a rule of law, not equity" (2008) 257 ALR 292 at 320). The Court of Appeal also, with particular reference to the speech of Lord Roskill in Exports Credits Guarantee Dept v Universal Oil Products Co (ECGD) [1983] 1 WLR 399; [1983] 2 All ER 205 at 402-404, 223-224 said that the limits of the doctrine of penalties arise "from the consequences of breach of contract" and so reflect "the public policy of keeping commercial parties to their bargains" ((2008) 257 ALR 292 at 324).

[32] The applicants seek in this court to challenge these statements in Interstar. For the reasons which follow that challenge should succeed.

Bonds, contracts and the meanings of "condition"

[33] Before proceeding further with the challenge which the applicants seek to make to Interstar, something first should be said about the nature of the bond because it was here that equity first intervened. This, in turn, involves consideration of the use of the term "condition" in the relevant legal discourse. Like the term "rescission" (see Westralian Farmers Ltd v Commonwealth Agricultural Service Engineers Ltd (1936) 54 CLR 361; [1936] HCA 6 at 379-380 (CLR); Johnson v Agnew [1980] AC 367 at 392-393 and 396-397), the term "condition" has several distinct meanings and applications. This must clearly be kept in mind to avoid engendering confusion of legal principle.

[34] Unlike a simple contract containing an exchange of promises, which are classified as conditions or warranties, a bond is an instrument under seal, usually a deed poll, whereby the obligor is bound to the obligee. The ordinary form of bond in use in modern times is not merely for a certain money payment, but is accompanied by a condition in the nature of a defeasance, the performance or occurrence of which discharges the bond.

[35] One meaning of "condition" is an important, vital, or material promise, the breach of which will repudiate a contract; the term "breach of contract" is used in contrast to "breach of warranty". But as Professor Stoljar pointed out in his article "The Contractual Concept of Condition" ((1953) 69 Law Quarterly Review 485 at 486-487) while the obligation under a bond may be said to be conditioned upon the occurrence of a particular event, it is important to note that the term "condition" is not used here in the sense just described with respect to breaches of contract.

[36] The distinction is drawn as follows in Williston, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts (Fourth ed (2000), §42:15; see also Halsbury, The Laws of England, 1st ed (1908), Vol 3 at 80):

> The common early form of contractual obligation was a bond upon condition, so that in the early books the word "obligation" without more is used to designate such a bond. The purpose of the bond obviously was, and still is, to secure performance of the condition, but instead of attempting to secure this result by exacting a promise from the obligor to perform > the condition, there is an acknowledgment of indebtedness – in effect a promise to pay a sum of money if the condition is not performed.

[37] In these reasons the term "stipulation" has been used when describing the penalty doctrine (at [10]-[11]). This reflects the origin of the penal obligation or condition, as known today, in the stipulations (stipulatio) in Roman law at a period where stipulations for the payment of money were alone valid. The practical method at that period of stipulating for the performance of a collateral act was to make the payment of a money sum conditional on the non-performance of the desired act; that sum might be recovered in full even if it exceeded the value of the stipulated act or forbearance (Loyd, "Penalties and Forfeitures" (1915) 29 Harvard Law Review 117).

[38] Williston wrote that it came to be recognised in Roman law that the amount stated in a stipulation and named as a penalty might be reduced if found to be excessive (Williston, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts, rev ed (1957), Vol 3, §792. See also Loyd, "Penalties and Forfeitures", (1915) 29 Harvard Law Review 117 at 117-118). But in the early common law the bond, regarded as a penal sum, secured strict performance of the principal obligation. In modern civil law systems the subject is not dealt with on uniform principles (Williston, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts, rev ed (1957), Vol 3, §792). It is said, for example, that the Louisiana courts have confused the principles of the governing Civil Code and their French derivation (Cox, "Penal Clauses and Liquidated Damages, a Comparative Survey" (1958) 33 Tulane Law Review 180 at 186-187) with the common law concept of liquidated damages (Cox, "Penal Clauses and Liquidated Damages, a Comparative Survey", (1958) 33 Tulane Law Review 180 at 192). Section 343 of the German Civil Code, which came into force in 1900, provides that upon the motion of the obligor a "disproportionately high" penalty may be reduced, by a judgment, to an appropriate amount, after taking into account "every legitimate interest" of the obligee, not merely the obligee's economic interest (Zimmermann, The Law of Obligations, (1996) at 107-108).

[39] The condition in a bond must not be unlawful, for example, in general or unreasonable restraint of trade (Mitchel v Reynolds (1711) P Wms 181; 24 ER 347). However, the condition may be an occurrence or event which need not be some act or omission of the obligor, analogous to a contractual promise by the obligor. Moreover, the condition is not invalid merely because it provides for the performance of an act or the happening of an event which is improbable, albeit, at the outset (With respect to supervening impossibility, see Williston, A Treatise on the Law of Contracts, 4th ed (2000), §42:17), not impossible. Thus, in Campbell v French (1795) 6 TR 200 at 211; 101 ER 510 at 516, Lord Kenyon, in delivering the opinion of the Court of King's Bench, said:

> The general law respecting conditions is extremely well settled in a vast variety of books and cases; and, without detailing them, it is sufficient to say that they will be found in Rolle's Abridgment, and in Coke upon Littleton; and the uncontrolled result from them all is, that if the condition be an impossible condition, the bond becomes single, but if the condition be only improbable, as in the instance put, if the Pope of Rome should come here to-morrow, yet that condition is a good condition however improbable it may be.

It also should be noted that from the time of Lord Nottingham, the "conditions" which attracted relief in equity extended beyond those described as such in bonds and simple contracts, and to provisions which were secured by a determinable estate in land and to conditions for the vesting of an estate ("Pitcarne v Bruce" (1676) Lord Nottingham's Chancery Cases, Volume II, Selden Society Vol 79 (1961), Case 587; Yale, "Introduction" at 20).

[40] While an action in debt for the sum of the bond was the remedy for enforcement of the bond at law, equity looked to what was involved in satisfaction of the condition for which the bond was security. However, as noted above (at [10]), unless the failure of the condition was compensible there was no "handle" for equity to intervene (Lord Macclesfield, in Peachy v Duke of Somerset (1721) 1 Strange 447 at 453; 93 ER 626 at 630, said that "it is the recompence that gives this court a handle to grant relief"). A further example of this requirement for equitable intervention is presented by the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Clark v Barnard 108 US 436 at 455-459 (1883). A bond was given to the government by the holder of a statutory franchise for the completion of an item of public infrastructure by a given date; the prejudice to the body politic by failure to complete did not sound in damages.

[41] Williston describes the position as follows (Fourth ed (2000), §42:15):

> The court of equity early assumed jurisdiction to limit the recovery in an action on a bond to the damages actually suffered by the obligee, regarding the literal enforcement of the obligation as unconscientious. Although some eminent authorities expressed disapproval of the doctrine of equitable relief against penalties and forfeitures as "a principle long acknowledged in this court but utterly without foundation," others of equal note have urged that "[t]here is no more intrinsic sanctity in stipulations by contract than in other solemn acts of the parties which are constantly interfered with by courts of equity upon the broad grounds of public policy on the pure principles of natural justice."
> A distinction was taken at an early day between bonds "where the party might be put in as good a plight as where the condition itself was literally performed," and cases "where the condition was collateral and no recompense or value could be put on the breach of it." In the former case, equity would give relief; in the latter case, it would not; and this distinction has developed into the modern distinction between penalties and liquidated damages. (footnotes omitted)

[42] If the condition of the bond was the conveyance or settlement of an estate or interest in land, or the non-performance of certain acts, for example, by way of competition with a former business partner, a court of equity might treat the condition as evidence of an agreement to convey (Parks v Wilson (1724) 10 Mod 515 at 518; 88 ER 832 at 833; Prebble v Boghurst (1818) 1 Swans 309 at 318-319; 36 ER 402 at 407-408; Evans, Appendix to Pothier, A Treatise on the Law of Obligations, or Contracts, (1806), Vol 2, Appendix XII at 81-85), or of a non-competition covenant (Hardy v Martin (1783) 1 Cox 26; 29 ER 1046; National Provincial Bank of England v Marshall (1888) 40 Ch D 112). In such cases, specific performance then might be decreed or an injunction granted to enforce the negative covenant; damages would be an inadequate remedy and so it would be no answer by the defendant to offer to pay the sum fixed by the bond. But, contrary to what the ANZ submitted, these cases do not establish any general proposition as to the contractual character of the condition in a bond.

[43] Some analogy to the issues which presently arise is presented by those concerning the nature of a deposit which were considered in Federal Cmr of Taxation v Reliance Carpet Co Pty Ltd (2008) 236 CLR 342; [2008] HCA 22 at 349-352 [22]-[27] (CLR). The law respecting bonds, like that respecting deposits, was received from Roman law and developed before the rise of what might be called the modern law of contract. The courts of equity did not treat their jurisdiction to relieve against penalties and forfeitures as extending to forfeiture of a deposit, being an amount paid as an earnest of performance (NLS Pty Ltd v Hughes (1966) 120 CLR 583; [1966] HCA 63 at 589 (CLR)). Those courts did, however, relieve against stipulations which were penal conditions in bonds.

[44] The courts of equity went on to extend their jurisdiction to deal with stipulations which were penal provisions in simple contracts. But it does not follow that that extension was a change to the nature of the jurisdiction. In particular, the requirement that equity intervene to ensure the recovery of no more than compensation, accommodated the "fundamental principle" of modern contract law to redress breach by adequate compensation (Farnsworth, Contracts, 4th ed (2004), §12.18; cf Attorney General v Blake [2001] 1 AC 268 at 284-285).

[45] Enough has been said to show that (a) the first field for the operation of the equitable doctrine concerned the enforcement of bonds, (b) with respect to bonds, the expressions "obligation" and "condition" are not employed in the same or corresponding sense as appears in dealing with the breach of contractual promises, and (c) it does not follow, as the ANZ would have it, that in a simple contract the only stipulations which engage the penalty doctrine must be those which are contractual promises broken by the promisor.

Limited scope of the penalty doctrine?

[28.55] [46] Thus, while the ANZ maintains that the penalty doctrine has the limited scope, respecting breaches of contract, which in Interstar the Court of Appeal identified with ECGD, this limitation should not be accepted.

[47] What was in issue in ECGD was a defence to an action upon an indemnity given to a guarantor which was a government body to hold the guarantor harmless by reimbursement of moneys it paid to answer calls on the guarantee. The circumstance, as was the case in ECGD, that this might turn out to have been a commercially improvident arrangement for the indemnifier would not attract the intervention of equity when the indemnity was called upon by the guarantor. The liability of the indemnifier would mirror the loss incurred by the guarantor. It was in that particular situation that Lord Roskill said in ECGD [1983] 1 WLR 399 at 403; [1983] 2 All ER 205 at 224:

> [P]erhaps the main purpose, of the law relating to penalty clauses is to prevent a plaintiff recovering a sum of money in respect of a breach of contract committed by a defendant which bears little or no relationship to the loss actually suffered by the plaintiff as a result of the breach by the defendant.

[48] In AMEV-UDC Gibbs CJ (1986) 162 CLR 170 at 174 emphasised that this court was not required to consider the proposition, said to be derived from ECGD, that no clause which provided for the payment of money on the happening of a specified event other than a breach of a contractual duty owed by the contemplated payor to the contemplated payee could ever be a penalty.

[49] Brereton J in Interstar (2007) Aust Contract Reports 90-261 at 90,044 rejected the submission that liability to pay, forfeit or suffer the retention of money or property which engages the penalty doctrine may never be triggered by the failure in occurrence of an event which is stipulated in a prior agreement between the parties but is not itself the subject of a contractual promise between them. Brereton J pointed to the regard paid by equity to substance rather than merely to form and referred to the grant of relief in the case of penal bonds for non-performance of a condition which was not the subject of any contractual promise ((2007) Aust Contract Reports 90-261 at 90,044). These are significant considerations. They are not displaced by fixing solely upon a breach of contract by the party seeking relief from an alleged penalty.

[50] In Interstar the Court of Appeal misunderstood the scope of the penalty doctrine. The question whether in a given case the operation of a stipulation which is not a contractual promise may attract the penalty doctrine is not foreclosed by the rejection in the Court of Appeal of what had been said by Brereton J at first instance.

The common law action of assumpsit

[51] There remains for consideration the further proposition in Interstar which, rather than acknowledging the concurrent administration in New South Wales (as elsewhere) of law and equity, appears to treat the penalty doctrine as having disappeared from equity by absorption into the common law action of assumpsit. This proposition should be rejected.

[52] It will be recalled that the common law courts developed assumpsit as a general remedy for breach of agreements not under seal, simple contracts, for which an action for breach of covenant would not lie. Moreover, assumpsit was extended to certain cases where there was no more than an implied undertaking to pay, thus giving the occasion for the unhappy expression "quasi-contract" (Anson wrote that where "for purposes of pleading" obligations acquired "the form of agreement", the term "quasi-contract" was used "for want of a better name": Ansons, Principles of the English Law of Contract, 10th ed (1903) at 382).

[53] With respect to money bonds, by the time of Lord Nottingham, who was Lord Chancellor 1673-1682, and thus well before the statutes dealing with the procedure in actions upon bonds (8 &

9 Will III, c 11 (1696); 4 & 5 Anne, c 16 (1705). The relevant statutory texts are set out in Newland, "Equitable Relief Against Penalties", (2011) 85 Australian Law Journal 434 at 442), the common law courts significantly revised their procedures with respect to trials of actions pleaded in assumpsit. They did so in the fashion described by Lord Nottingham in his handbook (first published only in 1965) "Prolegomena of Chancery and Equity" and repeated by Priestley JA in Austin ([1984] 2 NSWLR 612 at 625-626. See also Simpson, "The Penal Bond with Conditional Defeasance", (1966) 82 Law Quarterly Review 392 at 419):

> The settling of the chancery practice of relieving penalties brought a prompt response from the common law courts. Lord Nottingham recorded it in his Prolegomena, in Ch V headed "Equitas Sequitur Legem", as follows:
> 10. In the midst of those cases which refer to this head, it may be worth the while a little to invert the rule, and to consider how far lex sequitur equitatem, that is, to observe how courts of law have changed their rules and, when they saw that equity would relieve, have chosen rather to relieve the parties themselves than send them hither.
> 11. Thus in all suits on bonds it's now become the course of the Court, that, if the defendant will pay the principal and interest and charges, the plaintiff shall be obliged to accept it till plea pleaded, else the defendant shall have a perpetual imparlance (An imparlance denoted the time given to the defendant to plead either of course or in the discretion of the court (Mellor v Walker (1671) 2 Wms Saund 1 at 1 note (2) [85 ER 524 at 530]), and a perpetual imparlance would have had the effect of a permanent stay), and all this to prevent a suit in Chancery, which otherwise would give the same relief (at 203).
> The position thus reached was regulated at common law by statute in 1696 in regard to plaintiffs suing for penalties for non-performance of covenants or agreements (8 & 9 Will III, c 11, s 8) and in 1705 in regard to money bonds (4 & 5 Anne, c 3, s 12). Practice in England based on the Statutes of William and Anne had the effect of making the law concerning penalties as familiar to the common law courts as in chancery.

[54] The effect of the statute of 1705 upon the enforcement of a money bond was that the debtor was discharged on paying principal, interest and costs; with respect to other bonds and covenants with a penalty the statute of 1696 enabled damages to be assessed for such breaches as were proved, execution being stayed on payment of the amount assessed and costs, but with the judgment remaining to answer any further breach (White and Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, 9th ed (1928), Vol 2 at 224. See also AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170 at 202 per Deane J; Instruments Act 1958 (Vic), s 30).

[55] Writing in 1769, Blackstone had identified as one of the advances made since the revolution of 1688, "the liberality of sentiment, which (though late) has now taken possession of our courts of common law, and induced them to adopt (where facts can be clearly ascertained) the same principles of redress as have prevailed in our courts of equity, from the time Lord Nottingham presided there" (Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, (1769), bk 4 at 435). This adoption of equitable doctrine by the common law courts, in the period before the introduction of the Judicature system, was not limited to the principles concerning penalties. The trend was the subject of comment in 1845 by the standard text Law Studies written by Samuel Warren (Second ed (1845) at 300-302. A recent observation of this "fusion by convergence" is made by Professor Polden in The Oxford History of the Laws of England, Vol XI (2010) at 757). For example, Parke B spoke in Smith v Winter ((1838) 4 M & W 454 at 464 [150 ER 1507 at 1512]) of the equitable doctrine with respect to the discharge of sureties having "crept into the law"; the result was that a parol agreement by the creditor to give time to the principal debtor might be pleaded to an action at law on a guarantee not given under seal (Rowlatt, The Law of Principal and Surety, 3rd ed (1936) at 252-254. However, as de Colyar noted (A Treatise on the Law of Guarantees, 3rd ed (1897) at 424-425), "of course the surety was still at liberty to resort to a court of equity for relief").

[56] The position established in the common law courts with respect to penalties was exemplified by the remarks of Lord Mansfield in Lowe v Peers (1768) 4 Burr 2225 at 2228-2229; 98 ER 160 at 162, Lord Ellenborough in Wilbeam v Ashton (1807) 1 Camp 78; 170 ER 883, Tindal CJ in Kemble v Farren (1829) 6 Bing 141 at 148; 130 ER 1234 at 1237, and Parke B in Horner v Flintoff (1842) 9 M & W 678 at 680-681; 152 ER 287 at 287-288, Galsworthy v Strutt (1848) 1 Ex 659 at 662-666; 154 ER 280 at 282-283 and Atkyns v Kinnier (1850) 4 Ex 776 at 783-784; 154 ER 1429 at 1432-1433. In Kemble v Farren (1829) 6 Bing 141 at 148; 130 ER 1234 at 1237, an action in assumpsit by the manager of the Covent Garden Theatre against an actor who had failed to meet an engagement at that theatre, Tindal CJ said:

> But that a very large sum should become immediately payable, in consequence of the nonpayment of a very small sum, and that the former should not be considered as a penalty, appears to be a contradiction in terms; the case being precisely that in which courts of equity have always relieved, and against which courts of law have, in modern times, endeavoured to relieve, by directing juries to assess the real damages sustained by the breach of the agreement.

[57] In Reynolds v Bridge (1856) 6 El & Bl 528 at 541; 119 ER 961 at 966, a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, Coleridge J referred to Astley v Weldon; Kemble v Farren and Atkyns v Kinnier and concluded that:

> the principle seems to be, that, if you find a covenant the breach of which will occasion a damage, not uncertain, but such as is capable of being ascertained, as where there is a particular sum to be paid which is much less than the sum named as payable upon the breach, there it is held that the last named sum is specified by way of penalty, because a Court of equity would limit the amount to be actually paid.

[58] To the above English authorities it may be added that by the mid-19th century, common law courts in the United States "almost universally" adopted a practice whereby, although judgment for the full amount of the bond was entered, the courts then proceeded to "chancery the bond"; execution issued only for the just amount found to be due on a reference to a master, assessor, or jury (Merwin, The Principles of Equity and Equity Pleading, (1895) at 220). It also should be noted that where in Chancery it appeared that the sum in question was a penalty, the court would direct an issue of quantum damnificatus for jury determination (AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170 at 187; Astley v Weldon (1801) 2 Bos & Pul 346 at 350-351; 126 ER 1318 at 1321 per Lord Eldon; Hardy v Martin (1783) 1 Cox 26; 29 ER 1046; Daniell, The Practice of the High Court of Chancery, 5th ed (1871), Vol 1 at 1008-1010).

[59] However, the common law courts were constrained by the limitations of their remedies and procedures. Thus, they lacked the procedures to take complex accounts and the remedy of injunction to restrain, for example, attempts by the defendant to recover the amount of a bond by an action at law (Edwards-Wood v Baldwin (1863) 4 Giff 613; 66 ER 851. The Common Law Procedure Act 1854 (UK) (17 & 18 Vict, c 125) was directed to enlarging the jurisdiction of the common law courts, having regard to the inconvenience of concurrent proceedings necessary in certain cases to establish a right in a common law court and to obtain a remedy in Chancery. However, the power of the common law courts to grant injunctions under that Act was limited to restraining the repetition or continuation of breaches of contract in respect of which the plaintiff was entitled to bring an action for damages (Sections 79 and 82).

[60] Where the collateral stipulation relieved against was one not for the payment of money but for the transfer or use of property, there was no scope in an assumpsit action for what Nicholls LJ called "the scaling down exercise" by which a court of equity would tailor specific relief to ensure adequate compensation, but no more (Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026; [1989] 1 All ER 621 at 1042 and 1045-1046 (WLR), 634, 636-637 (All ER)). This had to await the arrival of the united court administration under the Judicature system. Further, as Lord Eldon pointed out in Seton v Slade

(1802) 7 Ves Jun 265 at 273-274; 32 ER 108 at 111, where the condition of the bond was a temporal stipulation, it remained the position that in equity time was not of the essence.

[61] The developments in the practice of the common law courts in assumpsit actions before the introduction of the Judicature system did not somehow supplant the equity jurisdiction cf AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170 at 201; Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pty Ltd v Greenham [1966] 2 NSWR 717 at 72.

[62] Moreover, the applicants correctly submit that the ANZ can point to no reason in principle why the scope of the equitable doctrine should be restricted to those cases today where, hypothetically, an assumpsit action would have lain at common law in the 19th century. Indeed, considerations of principle point in the other direction. It is undoubtedly the case that in fields of private and public law the principles of equity continue to develop by principled advances of traditional doctrine (Australian Broadcasting Corporation v Lenah Game Meats Pty Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 199; [2001] HCA 63 at 241 [90]). Sir Anthony Mason has noted that while the common law comprised rules which traditionally existed as a body of customary law, equity "made no secret of its evolutionary development" (Mason, "The Impact of Equitable Doctrine on the Law of Contract", (1998) 27 Anglo-American Law Review 1 at 3. See also PGA v R (2012) [2012] HCA 21 [20]-[21]; Watt, Equity Stirring, (2009) at 231-232). Why, with respect to the penalty doctrine, that evolutionary process should be restricted by hypothetical assumpsit actions is not apparent.

[63] A further point is that, to the extent that the common law courts had so developed their procedures and the action in assumpsit by the second half of the 19th century as in some situations to speak with courts of equity with the same voice, there was at that time, and within the terms of the Judicature legislation, no "conflict or variance … with reference to the same matter"; and so there was no occasion under the statute for the doctrine of equity to "prevail" (Judicature Act 1873 (UK), s 24(11). See Supreme Court Act 1986 (Vic), s 29). It should be emphasised that, in any event, under the Judicature legislation it is equity not the law that is to prevail. In Interstar the Court of Appeal thus had no basis for the proposition that the penalty doctrine is a rule of law not of equity.

AMEV-UDC in the High Court

[28.60] [64] That counsel for the successful respondent in AMEV-UDC was well aware of the pre-Judicature developments in the common law courts is apparent from the citation ((1986) 162 CLR 170 at 172-173) of Lord Eldon's judgment in Astley v Weldon (1801) 2 Bos & Pul 346; 126 ER 1318, which was delivered when he was Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas.

[65] There is, with respect, no ground upon which to cavil with four of the five propositions distilled from the history of the penalty doctrine and stated in AMEV-UDC by Mason and Wilson JJ as follows ((1986) 162 CLR 170 at 190):

> (1) equity would only relieve where compensation could be made for the actual damage suffered by the party seeking to recover the penalty; (2) the actual damage suffered by the party was assessed in an action at common law, such as an action of covenant, or upon a special issue quantum damnificatus which could be joined in an action on the case … (3) the expression "actual damage" seems to have been used in contradistinction to "agreed sum" or "liquidated" or "stipulated" damages, not by way of opposition to damage which was recoverable at law; (4) there seems to have been no instance of equity awarding compensation over and above the amount awarded as common law damages, other than cases in which equity would not relieve against the penalty; and (5) relief was granted, in the case of penal bonds, where there was no express contractual promise to perform the condition (see Hardy v Martin (1783) 1 Cox 26; 29 ER 1046), though it seems such a promise could in many cases readily be implied.

[66] However, as noted earlier in these reasons under the heading "Bonds, contracts and the meanings of 'condition' ", a reference such as that in proposition (5) to the implication into a bond of an "express contractual promise to perform the condition" tends to obscure the path taken by the common law courts in developing the action in assumpsit.

[67] The upshot is that at first instance in Interstar (2007) Aust Contract Reports 90-261 at 90,037, Brereton J properly understood the significance of what had been said by Mason and Wilson JJ, when he concluded:

> [T]heir Honours' judgment does not decide that relief against a penalty is available only when it is conditioned upon a breach of contract; to the contrary, it suggests that relief may be granted in cases of penalties for non-performance of a condition, although there is no express contractual promise to perform the condition – apparently on the basis that despite the absence of such an express promise, a penalty conditioned on failure of a condition is for these purposes in substance equivalent to a promise that the condition will be satisfied.

[68] A further statement by Mason and Wilson JJ in AMEV-UDC (1986) 162 CLR 170 at 191, that it was the effect of the Judicature system which led:

> to the conclusion that the equitable jurisdiction to relieve against penalties withered on the vine for the simple reason that, except perhaps in very unusual circumstances, it offered no prospect of relief which was not ordinarily available in proceedings to recover a stipulated sum or, alternatively, damages, overlooks the proposition that the only relevant effect of the Judicature system, as explained above, was upon the procedures in the unified court system not upon substantive doctrine. Thereafter, in whatever court the action was brought in respect of a penalty, a money remedy, declaratory and injunctive relief and the taking of an account were available in that one action.

The Dunlop Case

[69] Extensive reference was made by the primary judge to the decision of the House of Lords in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79. The conduct of that litigation illustrates the operation just mentioned of the Judicature system. Something more should be said on that matter.

[70] The appellant in Dunlop was a manufacturer of motor tyres and related products which it sold under the registered trade mark "Dunlop". It allowed trade purchasers discounts from the list prices, but in order to prevent under-selling insisted that the trade purchasers agree not to sell to private buyers at less than list prices or to trade buyers at less than list prices after deducting certain discounts. The trade purchasers also agreed, as agents for the appellant, to obtain from their trade customers similar undertakings to observe list prices of the appellant.

[71] It appeared to follow from the then recent decision of Kekewich J in Elliman, Sons & Co Ltd v Carrington & Son Ltd [1901] 2 Ch 275 that resale price maintenance stipulations of this nature were not contracts in restraint of trade (See Heydon, The Restraint of Trade Doctrine, 3rd ed (2008) at 248-249). No challenge to that decision was made in Dunlop.

[72] A company curiously styled A. Pellant Ltd had a contract with the appellant under which it received considerable quantities of the appellant's products. Before supplying these goods to the respondent as sub-purchaser, A. Pellant Ltd, as required by its contract with the appellant, required the respondent to enter into a contract with it, as agent for the appellant (cf Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] AC 847). The contract obliged the respondent on its part to observe the restrictions described above. This contract contained the clause:

> We agree to pay to [the appellant] the sum of £5 for each and every tyre, cover or tube sold or offered in breach of this agreement, as and by way of liquidated damages and not as a penalty, but without prejudice to any other rights or remedies [A. Pellant Limited] or [the appellant] may have hereunder.

The contract appears to have been in a standard form, and was headed "Price Maintenance Agreement to be entered into by trade purchasers of Dunlop Motor Tyres" (See [1915] AC 79 at 80-81, where the full text is set out).

[73] The appellant commenced an action in the King's Bench Division, seeking an equitable remedy, namely an injunction to restrain further breaches of this contract by the respondent, in particular, by making further sales of a tyre cover for £3.12.11 per item instead of the list price of £4.1.0. The appellant also sought damages. One of the defences pleaded was that the sum of £5 stipulated in the contract was a penalty.

[74] The primary judge (Phillimore J) granted the injunction and also directed an inquiry as to damages. The Court of Appeal (Vaughan Williams and Swinfen Eady LJJ; Kennedy LJ dissenting) held that the stipulation as to £5 was a penalty and, moreover, the appellant was entitled only to nominal damages in the sum of £2. On the other hand, at the earlier inquiry before the Master, evidence had been accepted that price cutting by a particular firm soon became generally known and the local agents of the appellant suffered a loss of business and resorted for supplies to other firms, thereby upsetting the selling organisation of the appellant. The Master had assessed the damages at £250.

[75] In the House of Lords, Lord Atkinson summarised the evidence directed to showing that even if the sum agreed appeared imprecise as a pre-estimate of damage, it protected the appellant's interest in preventing undercutting, which would disorganise its trading system (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 91-93). Thus the critical issue, determined in favour of the appellant, was whether the sum agreed was commensurate with the interest protected by the bargain.

[76] The effect of the decision of the House of Lords was to restore the outcome at first instance and the award made by the Master upon the inquiry.

[77] The litigation in Dunlop, where in the one court, and in the same proceeding, legal and equitable remedies were sought by the plaintiff and the defendant raised the penalty doctrine in its defence, illustrates the place of the penalty doctrine in a court where there is a unified administration of law and equity but equitable doctrines retain their identity.

Conclusion

[28.70] [78] The upshot is that the restrictions upon the penalty doctrine urged by the Court of Appeal in Interstar should not be accepted. The primary judge erred in concluding, in effect, that in the absence of contractual breach or an obligation or responsibility on the customer to avoid the occurrence of an event upon which the relevant fees were charged, no question arose as to whether the fees were capable of characterisation as penalties.

[79] Indeed, a further issue appears to have been presented by her Honour's findings set out above (at [23]). This may be stated as being whether the requirement to pay the fees in question was not enjoyed by the ANZ as security for performance by the customer of its other obligations to the ANZ, or whether the fees were charged by the ANZ, as specified in pre-existing arrangements with the customer, and ANZ, respectively, for the further accommodation provided to the customer by its authorising payments upon instructions by the customer upon which the ANZ otherwise was not obliged to act, or upon refusal of that accommodation.

[80] The operative distinction would be that upon which the majority of the New South Wales Court of Appeal (Jacobs JA and Holmes JA) decided Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pty Ltd v Greenham [1966] 2 NSWR 717 at 723-724 and 727. Their Honours contrasted a stipulation attracting the penalty doctrine and one giving rise consensually to an additional obligation. This distinction had been identified long before, by Lord St Leonards in French v Macale (1842) 2 Drury and Warren 269 at 275-276. (The case was decided when, as Sir Edward Sugden, Lord St Leonards was Lord Chancellor of Ireland), as follows:

> [I]t appears, that the question for the Court to ascertain is, whether the party is restricted by covenant from doing the particular act, although if he do it a payment is reserved; or whether

> according to the true construction of the contract, its meaning is, that the one party shall have a right to do the act, on payment of what is agreed upon as an equivalent. If a man let meadow land for two guineas an acre, and the contract is, that if the tenant choose to employ it in tillage, he may do so, paying an additional rent of two guineas an acre, no doubt this is a perfectly good and unobjectionable contract; the breaking up the land is not inconsistent with the contract, which provides, that in case the act is done the landlord is to receive an increased rent (To the same effect were remarks of Lord Loughborough in Hardy v Martin (1783) 1 Cox 26 at 27 [29 ER 1046 at 1046-1047]) (emphasis added)

[81] The English and United States authorities in which the distinction thereafter was applied are collected and discussed in the treatise by Pomeroy (Pomeroy, A Treatise on Equity Jurisprudence, 5th ed (1941), Vol 2, §437), under the heading "Stipulations not Penalties – Alternative Stipulations".

[82] In Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, the contract for the hiring of films to exhibitors for public showing conferred the right to one screening only. The exhibitor was obliged to pay for each additional screening a sum equivalent to four times the original fee. The questions of construction of the contract were resolved by Jacobs JA and Holmes JA in such a fashion that the penalty doctrine had no application. Jacobs JA concluded ([1966] 2 NSWR 717 at 723):

> There is no right in the exhibitor to use the film otherwise than on an authorized occasion. If he does so then he must be taken to have exercised an option so to do under the agreement, if the agreement so provides. The agreement provides that he may exercise such an option in one event only, namely, that he pay a hiring fee of four times the usual hiring fee.

[83] But it should be emphasised that the determination, with respect to the relevant exception fees, of live issues of this nature is entirely a matter upon further trial, along with the grounds upon which the applicants submit the penalty doctrine does apply to those fees.

Appeal allowed.

[28.75] Note

1. The question as to whether the honour, dishonor, over-limit and late-payment fees in dispute in Andrews could be reviewed as penalties was considered by the Federal Court in Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2015] FCAFC 50. The primary judge found that the late-payment fees constituted penalties. The primary judge found that the other kinds of fees were not able to be reviewed as penalties because they were fees charged to the customer of the bank for additional services. The Full Federal Court upheld the primary judge's treatment of the various honour, dishonor and over-limit fees, agreeing that fees in question were payable in respect to financial accommodation.
2. Whether the late-payment fees were invalid as penalties was considered by the High Court in Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2016] HCA 28; 258 CLR 525.
3. For different views on this decision, see Carter, Courtney, Peden, Stewart, Tolhurst, "Contractual Penalties: Resurrecting the Equitable Jurisdiction" (2013) 30 Journal of Contract Law 99; Peel, "The Rule Against Penalties" (2013) Law Quarterly Review 129.

IS THE IMPUGNED STIPULATION PENAL?

> (1) Though the parties to a contract who use the words "penalty" or "liquidated damages" may prima facie be supposed to mean what they say, yet the expression used is not conclusive. The court must find out whether the payment stipulated is in truth a penalty or liquidated damages …
> (2) The essence of a penalty is a payment of money stipulated as in terrorem of the offending party; the essence of liquidated damages is a genuine covenanted pre-estimate of damage …
>
> (3) The question whether a sum stipulated is penalty or liquidated damages is a question of construction to be decided upon the terms and inherent circumstances of each particular contract, judged of as at the time of the making of the contract, not as at the time of the breach …
>
> (4) To assist this task of construction various tests have been suggested, which if applicable to the case under consideration may prove helpful, or even conclusive. Such are:
>
> (a) It will be held to be penalty if the sum stipulated for is extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss that could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach …
>
> (b) It will be held to be a penalty if the breach consists only in not paying a sum of money, and the sum stipulated is a sum greater than the sum which ought to have been paid …
>
> (c) There is a presumption (but no more) that it is penalty when "a single lump sum is made payable by way of compensation, on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage" …
>
> On the other hand:
> (d) It is no obstacle to the sum stipulated being a genuine pre-estimate of damage, that the consequences of the breach are such as to make precise pre-estimation almost an impossibility. On the contrary, that is just the situation when it is probable that pre-estimated damage was the true bargain between the parties.

It appears that these considerations may also be used in assessing whether a secondary stipulation imposing a sum payable on the failure of a primary stipulation not involving breach is a penalty. The modern approach for assessing whether a term is a penalty is discussed in Paciocccо v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2016] HCA 28; 258 CLR 525, which involves the next stage of the class action in Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2012] HCA 30; (2012) 247 CLR 205.

Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Limited

[28.85] Paciocccо v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2016] HCA 28; 258 CLR 525 – Appeal from Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: Credit card accounts held by Paciocco with the ANZ bank entitled the bank to charge a late-payment fee if Paciocco failed to make the minimum monthly payment stated on the monthly statement of account by the due date shown on the statement. Until December 2009, the fee was fixed at $35. From December 2009, it was reduced to $20. In representative proceedings in the Federal Court of Australia, Paciocco argued that the late-payment fees were unenforceable as penalties. Paciocco brought expert evidence that the amounts necessary to restore the bank to the position it would have been in had Paciocco not failed to make the minimum monthly payment by the due date were on average $2.60. This amount consisted of the variable or incremental operational costs incurred by the bank in ensuring that the late-payments were made. The bank brought expert evidence that the maximum amount of costs that it could conceivably have incurred as a result of late-payments exceeded the late-payment fee, as they included increases in loss provisions and in the costs of holding regulatory capital, together with operational costs attributable to collection activities.]

KIEFEL J:

Relevant aspects of Dunlop

[546] [26] The aspect of Dunlop which assumes particular importance in this case is the recognition that a sum stipulated for payment on default may be intended to protect an interest that is different from, and greater than, an interest in compensation for loss caused directly by the breach of contract. This is most evident from the speech of Lord Atkinson. It has already been observed that equity recognised that there may be injury to interests for which compensation cannot be made and to which the doctrine of penalties cannot be applied to provide relief. That will usually be because of the nature of the interest protected by the provision for payment on default.

[27] In Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd, it was said ((2005) 224 CLR 656, 663 [12]) that Dunlop continues to express the law to be applied with respect to penalties in Australia. As the primary judge in these proceedings observed (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 258 [17]), the principles in Dunlop were not affected by the decision of this Court in Andrews. But this does not mean that those principles are confined, or that they are limited, to the "tests" propounded by Lord Dunedin, or that what was said in Dunlop does not require further explication.

[547] [29] The fact that the decision in Dunlop itself, and Lord Atkinson's reasons with respect to it, assume importance in this case does not deny the significance of the requirement stated by Lord Dunedin (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 87), that the sum stipulated be "extravagant and unconscionable" before it can be characterised as a penalty. As explained below, it is these words that, by their extreme nature, identify the penal character of a penalty. The question which may be identified as arising from this aspect of the decision in Dunlop, which is appropriate to a case of this kind, is whether a provision for the payment of a sum of money on default is out of all proportion to the interests of the party which it is the purpose of the provision to protect. This interest may be of a business or financial nature.

The Dunlop "tests"

[30] The distinction drawn by Lord Dunedin between liquidated damages and a penalty, whilst useful, should not be understood as a limiting rule. It does not mean that if no pre-estimate is made at the time a contract is entered into, as is the case here, a sum stipulated will be a penalty. Nor does it mean that a sum reflecting, or attempting to reflect, other kinds of loss or damage to a party's interests beyond those directly caused by the breach will be a penalty. Indeed the provision in Dunlop, which was held not to be a penalty, was of this kind.

[31] The question whether a sum to be paid on default is a penalty, as distinct from liquidated damages, was said by Lord Dunedin (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 86-87) to be a question of construction, but his Lordship is not to be taken to suggest that it will be answered by the language of the contract alone. This is evident from the reference to the "inherent circumstances" of the contract, which includes the position of the party whose interests are to be protected by the stipulation for the payment of the sum on default.

[32] Lord Dunedin offered (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 87-88) four "tests" to assist "this task of construction". They [548] were couched in the language of their time and were intended as guidance only. Tests tend, over time, to encourage literal application. Especially is this so where the basal purpose of the larger principle, or policy, of the law is not stated. That policy has not changed over time. It is that a sum may not be stipulated for payment on default if it is stipulated as a threat over the person obliged to perform; it may not be stipulated where the purpose and effect of requiring payment is to punish the defaulting party. This latter prohibition has found expression in modern times, as is evident from the passage from Legione v Hateley referred to above (Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 445) and also from judgments in Cavendish (Cavendish Square Holding BV v Makdessi [2015] 3 WLR 1373 at 1392 [32]; [2016] 2 All ER 519 at 538 per Lord Neuberger and Lord Sumption; at 1434 [148]; 577-578 per Lord Mance; at 1462 [243]; 605 per Lord Hodge). It may be inferred from this policy that a sum stipulated for payment on default is a penalty if it bears no relation to the possible damage to or interest of the innocent party.

[33] The first, and principal, "test" stated by Lord Dunedin (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 87 (4(a)) is that a sum stipulated will be a penalty if it is:

> extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss that could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach.

If the "test" is understood to convey that only loss in the nature of damages directly flowing from the breach is to be considered, then it is unduly restrictive, though no doubt it remains useful to many cases.

[34] The terms "extravagant" and "unconscionable" (and also "exorbitant") had been used in Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Castaneda, where the Earl of Halsbury LC said (Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Castaneda [1905] AC 6 at 10) that the jurisdiction given to the court to interfere in an agreement between parties was with respect to an agreement which was "unconscionable and extravagant, and one which no Court ought to allow to be enforced". Even earlier, the Scottish Court of Session in Forrest v Henderson, Coulborn & Co had said (Forrest v Henderson, Coulborn & Co (1869) 8 Mac 187 at 193; see also at 201) that "equity will interfere to prevent the claim being maintained to an exorbitant and unconscionable amount". As explained below, "extravagant", "exorbitant" and "unconscionable" are "strong words" (*Cavendish Square Holding BV v Makdess*i [2015] 3 WLR 1373 at 1473-1474 [293]; [2016] 2 All ER 519 at 615); despite the different expressions used, they all describe the plainly excessive nature of the stipulation in comparison with the interest sought to be protected by that stipulation.

[549] [35] The second "test" (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at (4(b)).) was said to be merely a corollary of the first, and concerns the case where the breach is constituted by a mere failure to pay a sum of money. The sum stipulated to be paid in the event of a breach will be a penalty if it is greater than the sum which ought to be paid. This reflects equity's concerns about penal bonds and its view that the tender of principal together with interest thereon is sufficient compensation. This "test" has a narrow range of operation and is confined to the simplest of cases. It does not take into account that damages for breach may now include interest by way of damages and opportunity costs (Hungerfords v Walker (1989) 171 CLR 125). It says nothing about the damage to a party's wider commercial interests, for example to its trading, which was the real issue in Dunlop. And it says nothing about the financial effects for which the ANZ contends.

[36] The third "test" (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 87 (4(c)) is stated as a presumption ("(but no more)") that a sum will be a penalty where it is a single sum made payable on the occurrence of one or more of several events, some of which may occasion serious, and others only inconsequential, damage. The presumption derives from what was said by Lord Watson in Lord Elphinstone v Monkland Iron & Coal Co Ltd ((1886) 11 App Cas 332 at 342):

> When a single [lump] sum is made payable by way of compensation, on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage, the presumption is that the parties intended the sum to be penal, and subject to modification.

[37] However, the provision for payment in that case was not in fact of that kind. It was referable to a single obligation and the sum to be paid bore "a strict proportion to the extent to which that obligation is left unfulfilled" (Lord Elphinstone v Monkland Iron & Coal Co Ltd (1886) 11 App Cas 332 at 345 per Lord Herschell LC; see also at 342-343 per Lord Watson). In Ringrow, this Court said (Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656 at 668 [28]) that this reasoning "did not require there to be a strict proportion; it merely relied, as a step towards the conclusion that the compensation was not inordinate or extravagant, on the fact that the compensation bore a strict proportion to the unfulfilled obligation".

[38] Further, because a provision of the kind mentioned is merely a presumption, it may be rebutted. In Dunlop, Lord Atkinson [550] observed (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 95-96) that it was there rebutted by the fact that the damage caused by default may be of such an uncertain nature that it cannot be accurately ascertained.

[39] The last "test" (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage & Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 at 87-88 (4(d))) stated by Lord Dunedin in Dunlop refers to just such a circumstance. It identifies the case where the parties agree a figure although a forecast of loss, in reality, is almost impossible. Nevertheless, the sum agreed may not be a penalty, indeed it is likely that in circumstances such as these it is not. His Lordship said:

> It is no obstacle to the sum stipulated being a genuine pre-estimate of damage, that the consequences of the breach are such as to make precise pre-estimation almost an impossibility. On the contrary, that is just the situation when it is probable that pre-estimated damage was the true bargain between the parties.

A similar observation had been made in Clydebank (Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Castaneda [1905] AC 6 at 11).

[40] What Lord Dunedin was pointing to is damage of a kind which is different from that for which liquidated damages could be assessed. It will be different because the interests of the party which are intended to be protected by the provision in question extend beyond an interest in the recovery of compensation for loss caused by the obligation. This was the situation in Dunlop.

A sum out of all proportion to the interests protected

553 [54] In Ringrow, it was held (Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656 at 669 [31]-[32]) that a sum which was merely disproportionate to the loss suffered would not qualify as penal. It was explained that exceptions from freedom of contract "require good reason to attract judicial intervention to set aside the bargains upon which parties of full capacity have agreed", which is why the law on penalties is expressed as an exceptional rule and in exceptional language. The Court went on:

> It explains why the propounded penalty must be judged 'extravagant and unconscionable in amount'. It is not enough that it should be lacking in proportion. It must be 'out of all proportion'.

554 In Cavendish, Lord Neuberger and Lord Sumption said (148) that the true test is whether the provision is a secondary obligation which imposes a detriment on the party in breach "out of all proportion to any legitimate interest of the innocent party in the enforcement of the primary obligation".

[55] Australian and United Kingdom law are not alone in maintaining a standard to be applied to a requirement to pay money, or some other detriment, which is imposed in the event of default. In many other western legal systems something like the penalty doctrine exists. In Andrews, reference was made (149) to s 343 of the German Civil Code, which provides that a "disproportionately high" penalty may be reduced by a court after taking into account "every legitimate interest" of the party for whose benefit the stipulated sum is made. Such interests are not limited to that party's economic interests. In Cavendish, Lord Hodge referred (150) to provisions in other modern civil codes and international instruments which use tests such as whether the sum stipulated is "manifestly excessive" or "substantially disproportionate" in order to modify or restrict contractual penalties.

The Late Payment Fee: a penalty?

[57] The ANZ's interests in this case are not as diffuse as those considered in Dunlop, Clydebank and Cavendish. The ANZ did not suggest that the injury to its interests was not capable of some kind of estimation in money's worth. In the hearing before the primary judge it abandoned the claim, made in its defence, that the costs occasioned to it by late payments were impossible to calculate and argued instead that they were very difficult to calculate. On this appeal the appellants accepted that, being realistic, the law should allow a "measure of latitude" where pre-estimation of loss is difficult. Certainly there needs to be some recognition of the difficulties attending any such exercise and that there may, in some cases, be differences in approach to the proper methodology to be employed. But it also needs to be borne in mind that this task is not one which calls for precision. The conclusion to be reached, after all, is whether the sum is "out of all proportion" to the interests said to be damaged in the event of default.

[58] It is important at this point to identify the ANZ's interests. The ANZ had an interest in receiving timeous repayment of the credit that it extended to its customers, including the appellants. As explained below, late payment impacted the ANZ's interests in three relevant respects: through operational costs, loss provisioning and increases in regulatory capital costs.

[60] As to the first category of costs, as the primary judge explained (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 284 [144]-[145]), the ANZ is required to estimate the impairments to its financial assets in order that its financial statements reflect a fair value of what is likely to be collected from what is outstanding. It is required to make provision in its accounts for what it may not recover, albeit that the potential loss is expressed as a current cost.

556 [63] As to the second category of costs, the ANZ is also required to hold regulatory capital to cover unexpected losses, a buffer of a kind. An increase in the risk of default increases the amount of regulatory capital which is required to be held.

[64] The primary judge accepted (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 286 [154]) that regulatory capital has a cost to the ANZ, by way of the loss of additional return it could otherwise make on the amount held as regulatory capital. But her Honour did not accept (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 287 [155]) that it should be taken into account in calculating loss or damage as a result of late payment.

[65] It was her Honour's view (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 287 [155]) that loss provisions and regulatory capital costs are part of the costs of running a bank in Australia. Banks may, and do, seek damages for default, but they are limited to the sums outstanding, enforcement costs and interest. However, as has been explained, the question is not what the ANZ could recover in an action for breach of contract, but rather whether the costs to it and the effects upon its financial interests by default may be taken into account in assessing whether the Late Payment Fees are penalties.

557 [67] The primary judge accepted (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 290 [173]) that whilst the actual losses suffered by the ANZ by reason of the late payments could not be precisely determined, they were probably no more than $3 for each event of late payment (based on Mr Regan's evidence) and in any event much less than the $20 or $35 charged as a Late Payment Fee. They were therefore extravagant and unconscionable.

Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Limited cont.

[68] Mr Inglis' evidence identified the costs to which the ANZ would be subject in the event of a late payment as a range which exceeded the amounts of the Late Payment Fee (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 411). His calculations were criticised (Paciocco v Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 289-290 [170]-[171]) as overly generous. It is not necessary to resolve any such controversy. The effect of Mr Inglis' evidence was to identify potential costs to the ANZ, from late payments, which reflect injuries to its financial position. They were real because they had to be taken into account by the ANZ. The evidence called for the appellants did not address damage of this kind. It cannot therefore be concluded that the sums of $20 and $35 were out of all proportion to the interests so identified.

Conclusion and orders

[69] It may be accepted that it is difficult to measure the loss to the ANZ as a result of a late payment. Consistently with Clydebank, Dunlop, Ringrow and Andrews, the relevant question in this case is whether the Late Payment Fee is out of all proportion to the ANZ's interest in receiving timeous payment of the minimum Monthly Payment. Applying this test, the appellants did not establish that the Late Payment Fee was a penalty. The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

[Kiefel held that the appeal concerning whether the Late-Payment Fee contravened certain statutory provisions should also be dismissed with costs, for the reasons given by Keane J.]

GAGELER J: [152] The unintended consequence of lucidity is sometimes rigidity. Over the century after Dunlop, in the course of being "applied countless times in this and other courts" (Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656 at 663 [12]; [2005] HCA 71), Lord Dunedin's explication of principle came to acquire a quasi-statutory status. Unfortunately, that status sometimes obscured its essential meaning.

[153] In AMEV-UDC, after noting with reference to Clydebank and Dunlop the historic concept of an amount which was agreed to be paid on breach of contract being a penalty if it is "extravagant, exorbitant or unconscionable", Mason and Wilson JJ observed ((1986) 162 CLR 170 at 190):

> This concept has been eroded by more recent decisions which, in the interests of greater certainty, have struck down provisions for the payment of an agreed sum merely because it may be greater than the amount of damages which could possibly be awarded for the breach of contract in respect of which the agreed sum is to be paid.

The more recent decisions to which their Honours referred were for the 577 most part cases decided towards the middle of the twentieth century in the context of hire purchase agreements, before the advent of modern consumer protection legislation (eg Cooden Engineering Co Ltd v Stanford [1953] 1 QB 86).

[154] In terms subsequently to receive the unanimous endorsement of this Court in Ringrow (2005) 224 CLR 656 at 669 [31], Mason and Wilson JJ continued ((1986) 162 CLR 170 at 190):

> However, there is much to be said for the view that the courts should return to the Clydebank and Dunlop concept, thereby allowing parties to a contract greater latitude in determining what their rights and liabilities will be, so that an agreed sum is only characterized as a penalty if it is out of all proportion to damage likely to be suffered as a result of breach.

[156] [After] quoting with approval the observation of Mason and Wilson JJ in AMEV-UDC, this Court said in Ringrow (2005) 224 CLR 656 at 669 [32]:

> Exceptions from … freedom of contract require good reason to attract judicial intervention to set aside the bargains upon which parties of full capacity have agreed. That is why the law on penalties is, and is expressed to be, an exception from the general rule. It is why it is expressed in exceptional language. It explains why the propounded penalty must be judged

'extravagant and unconscionable in amount'. It is not enough that it should be lacking in proportion. It must be 'out of all proportion'.

Framing the inquiry

[157] In O'Dea v Allstates Leasing System (WA) Pty Ltd (1983) 152 CLR 359 at 383; [1983] HCA 3, Wilson J asked of the stipulation in issue in that case whether it "can be considered to be a 'genuine pre-estimate of the creditor's … probable or possible interest in the due performance of the principal obligation' " (citing Hills) or "whether it is a penalty inserted 'merely to secure the enjoyment of a collateral object' " (citing Sloman v Walter). That succinct framing of the inquiry is consistent with Andrews and Dunlop. It is also very useful.

[158] The ultimate question of whether a stipulation imposing a detriment on a contracting party in the event of non-observance of another stipulation is a penalty is reflected in the formulation Wilson J drew from Sloman v Walter. To ask whether a stipulation serves merely to secure the enjoyment of a collateral object is to ask whether the conclusion objectively to be drawn from the totality of the circumstances is that the only purpose of the stipulation was to punish: to impose a detriment on a contracting party in the event that a principal contractual stipulation is not observed, in order to deter non-observance of that principal stipulation. To ask that question in the context of a stipulation for the payment of money on breach of contract accords with the statement of Lord Dunedin in Dunlop that "[t]he essence of a penalty is a payment of money stipulated as in terrorem of the offending party".

[166] Framing the inquiry in terms of whether the stipulation in issue is properly characterised as having no purpose other than to punish compels a more tailored inquiry into the commercial circumstances within which the parties entered into the contract containing the stipulation than might be involved in asking, as did the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom in Cavendish, whether the stipulation serves a "legitimate interest" ([2015] 3 WLR 1373 at 1392 [32]; see also [2015] 3 WLR 1373 at 1435 [152]). That is not, of course, to say that the differently framed inquiries might not lead to the same result.

[Gageler J held that the late-payment fee was not a penalty. Gageler J also held that ANZ did not engage in "unconscionable conduct" within the meaning of ss 12CB and 12CC of the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act 2001 (Cth) and ss 8 and 8A of the Fair Trading Act 1999 (Vic). Nor were the credit card contracts "unjust" within the meaning of s 76 of the National Credit Code in Sch 1 to the National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (Cth). The terms which entitled the bank to charge the late payment fees were also not "unfair" within the meaning of s 12BG of the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act 2001 (Cth) and s 32W of the Fair Trading Act 1999 (Vic).]

Orders

[203] Both appeals should be dismissed with costs.

[204] KEANE J: [Keane J concluded that the late-payment fee was not a penalty.]

The statutory claims

[286] Three statutory regimes were invoked by the appellants:

(a) a regime which prohibited "unconscionable conduct" in connection with the supply of financial services, operated 617 concurrently by s 12CB of the Australian Securities and Investments Commission Act 2001 (Cth) ("the ASIC Act") and s 8 of the Fair Trading Act 1999 (Vic) ("the FTA"), until the latter was replaced by the Australian Consumer Law ("the ACL") (Section 8 of the FTA was repealed on 1 July 2012 by s 233 of the Australian Consumer Law and Fair Trading Act 2012 (Vic). But at the relevant time, s 8 of the FTA was in terms materially similar to s 12CB of the ASIC Act);

Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Limited cont.

(b) a regime which regulated the provision of credit and allowed for the reopening of "unjust transactions" (the term "unjust" including "unconscionable, harsh or oppressive") under s 76 of the National Credit Code, in force pursuant to the National Consumer Credit Protection Act 2009 (Cth); and

(c) a regime which rendered void "unfair" contractual terms pursuant to Pt 2B of the FTA and ss 12BF and 12BG of the ASIC Act.

[287] Each of the regimes did not apply throughout the whole of the period to which the statutory claims relate, and the regimes were subject to amendment. However, nothing turns on that fact.

[288] Some general observations by way of overview of the statutory claims will aid an understanding of what follows. First, as the primary judge noted (Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 311 [290]), there was no allegation of any dishonesty or abuse of market power by ANZ, or that ANZ concealed the requirements of the late payment fee from Mr Paciocco, or that he was unable to understand the effect of the contracts in that regard, or that he entered into the contracts as the result of the exercise of financial pressure placed upon him by ANZ. The primary judge also noted that Mr Paciocco was under no obligation to use the card accounts and was free to terminate them should he so choose (Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 280 [122]). Importantly, the primary judge observed that (Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2014) 309 ALR 249 at 317 [324]):

> Mr Paciocco did not contend that there was anything unusual or exceptional in the manner in which the card accounts were entered into or in their terms. On the contrary, it was common ground that similar terms were offered by ANZ's competitors. (citations omitted)

[289] Given that the appellants did not suggest that ANZ dealt with Mr Paciocco in any way less favourably than he would have been treated by any other supplier of credit card facilities, and in the absence 618 of an allegation that the market in which this state of affairs prevailed was itself brought about by unlawful conduct, or an allegation that Mr Paciocco was driven to agree to ANZ's terms by financial pressures of which the bank was aware, the appellants' statutory claims take on an air of unreality.

[290] The appellants seek to stigmatise as unconscionable or unfair or unjust an activity in the marketplace in which nothing materially distinguishes the situation and conduct of either Mr Paciocco or ANZ from any of the other participants in that activity. It may be said that ANZ and its competitors have dealt "unconscionably" or "unfairly" or "unjustly" with all of their customers in that, in a careless or partisan use of language, all banks may be said to do so as a matter of course. But to argue that conduct by one participant in a market, which is an unremarkable example of conduct engaged in by all participants in that market, is unconscionable, or unjust or unfair, in breach of the statutory norms, without any suggestion that the market itself is unlawfully skewed, is something of a stretch. And the argument falls distinctly short of the mark in this particular case, given that there was no suggestion that Mr Paciocco was driven to seek the card accounts as a result of "pressure put upon [him] by [his] poverty" (O'Rorke v Bolingbroke (1877) 2 App Cas 814 at 822; Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447 at 474), or that Mr Paciocco incurred the late payment fees as a result of financial difficulties which prevented him from making timely payment in accordance with his contractual obligations. As has been seen, Mr Paciocco chose to pay late, and thereby incur the late payment fee, as a matter of his own convenience.

[291] In these circumstances, it would have been surprising if either Court below had held that ANZ took advantage of Mr Paciocco in a way which would meet the statutory descriptions of "unconscionable conduct", "unjust transactions" or "unfair terms".

Conclusion

[305] Both appeals should be dismissed with costs.

Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Limited cont.

[FRENCH CJ agreed with Kiefel J on the penalty claim and with Keane J on the statutory claims. In response to the views expressed in Cavendish Square Holding BV v Makdessi [2016] 2 All ER 519, 541 by Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC and Lord Sumption JSC (with whom Lord Carnwath JSC agreed), that the scope of the law as stated in Andrews was "a radical departure from the previous understanding of the law", French CJ stated:

> [7] In any event, emphatic disagreement between our jurisdictions in relation to the common law and equitable doctrines, while infrequent, is not novel. The countries of the common law world have a shared heritage which they owe to the unwritten law of the United Kingdom. That shared heritage offers the undoubted advantage, but does not import the necessity, of development proceeding on similar lines.

NETTLE J dissented in holding the fee was a penalty and did not decide the statutory claims.]

Appeals dismissed.

WHAT ARE THE CONSEQUENCES OF A STIPULATION BEING A PENALTY?

[28.90] The consequence of a term providing for a sum payable in event of breach being a penalty, as opposed to an agreed damages clause, is that it is void. The party relying on the term must instead seek common law damages as compensation for any losses arising from the breach. In equity the consequence of a term providing for the payment of money on the failure of a condition is that the term is voidable, that is liable to be set aide at the discretion of the party affected by it, to the extent of the invalidity. The relationship between these different consequences is still to be worked out in Australian law. DEBTS AND LIQUIDATED SUMS

[29.05] In Young v Queensland Trustees Ltd (1956) 99 CLR 560, 569, the High Court, explained the nature of the action for debt as follows:

> A debt recoverable under an indebitatus count was not and is not now conceived of simply as a cause of action for breach of duty or obligation. In other words it is a mistake to regard the liability to pay a debt of a kind formerly recoverable in debt or indebitatus as no more than the result of a breach of contract, a breach which the creditor must affirmatively allege and prove.

The idea that a debt or, more generally, a liquidated sum, is something separate and distinct, and more tangible than a mere action for damages, is one that is deeply rooted in English law. There is perhaps no a priori reason why this distinction should have developed, and the reason is probably to be found in the history of the development of the specific enforcement of money claims. See further see Lücke, "Specific Performance at Common Law" (1965) 2 University of Tasmania Law Review 125.

REQUIREMENTS OF AN ACTION FOR DEBT

[29.10] Generally, an action for a debt will only arise upon an "executed consideration", which in this context means performance of the contract by the party claiming payment (the plaintiff), for example, the price of goods sold and delivered. However, in some cases a sum may be recovered as a debt or liquidated sum where payable on a fixed day, regardless of whether the consideration has been executed, for example a payment of an instalment of a purchase price. See further McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457 at [29.85]. What amounts to sufficient performance of a plaintiff's contractual obligations to entitle the plaintiff to claim payment of a debt depends on a distinction between entire and divisible obligations, and on the doctrine of substantial performance.

Entire obligations

[29.15] An entire obligation is one that must be wholly performed for a plaintiff to be entitled to recover any of the payment for that performance specified in the contract. Thus, it is sometimes said that the plaintiff's complete performance is a condition precedent to the defendant's obligation to pay.

Divisible obligations

[29.20] A contract is likely to be divisible where the work to be done, and the payments for that work, are divided by the contract into corresponding segments. Where a contract is divisible, the plaintiff will be entitled to payment for each segment or part of the work that has been fully performed. This type of arrangement is illustrated in Steele v Tardiani (1946) 72 CLR 386. Steele v Tardiani also discusses the situations where, even though the relevant part of a contract was not substantially performed, payment for the work done might be claimed on the basis of quantum meruit. On such claims, see further Chapter 10.

Steele v Tardiani

[29.25] Steele v Tardiani (1946) 72 CLR 386 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: The plaintiffs, Mario Tardiani, Marina Pola and Alfio de Mauro, were three Italian internees, who, by an order made pursuant to the provisions of the National Security (Aliens Control) Regulations, had been released from internment and permitted to accept employment from the defendant Edward Beevor Steele. The plaintiffs were not employed to cut any specified amount but rather were to be paid at a price per ton, and all parties were entitled to terminate the contract at any time. The trial judge found that the contract was to cut firewood into lengths each six feet long and 6 inches in diameter, that payment was to be made at the rate of 8s per ton, and that the plaintiffs had cut 1,500 tons split into lengths varying from 6 to 15 inches in diameter. He held that the defendant was liable under the contract to accept and pay for the firewood cut into proper dimensions, and that he was also liable to pay a fair price for the other firewood because he had in fact accepted the benefit of the plaintiffs' work in taking possession of the firewood and selling it. He awarded the plaintiffs £367 17s 10d making allowance for the cost of splitting some of the wood to six inches in diameter.

The Full Court held that the contract was for firewood to be cut to varying lengths and diameters and awarded the plaintiffs £400. The defendant appealed to the High Court.]

DIXON J: [401] Taking, therefore, the defendant's contract to have been to pay so much per ton for firewood cut to a length of about six feet and to a width or diameter of about six inches, it is clear that, for the greater part of the wood they cut, the plaintiffs failed to split the wood to the required width. Upon what basis then can they recover remuneration in respect of work incompletely performed? It is true that they were not employed to do a single piece of work under one entire contract so that, until the whole had been substantially performed, they would obtain no right to any payment. In that sense, it is not like the contract to build two houses for a single lump sum made by the unsuccessful plaintiff in Sumpter v Hedges [1898] 1 QB 673. The contract … in the present case is infinitely divisible. For I assume that the amount per ton fixed … eight shillings, is but a rate of remuneration to be applied to the actual firewood cut according to the requirements of the contract, even to hundredweights and quarters …. Moreover, it would seem that the plaintiffs were employed under a contract of service and one continuing until terminated by either side. But it can hardly be denied that the consideration which the employees were to give for the remuneration is firewood cut according to contract and, so to speak, only those billets or sticks can be counted which qualify by substantial or reasonable compliance with the specifications. In this sense the terms of remuneration are "entire", or, in other words, each divisible application of the contract is entire and is only satisfied by performance, not partial, but substantially complete. For such a case falls within the general proposition stated in E V Williams' Notes to Saunders (6th ed 1845), vol 1: Pordage v Cole (1669) 1 Wms Saund 319l at 320d and e; 85 ER 449:

> Where the consideration for the payment of money is entire and indivisible, as where the benefit expected by the defendant under the agreement is to result from the enjoyment of every part of the consideration jointly, so that the money payable is neither apportioned by the contract, nor capable of being apportioned by a jury, no action is maintainable, if any part of the consideration has failed; for, being entire, by failing partially, it fails altogether.

[402] It is impossible, therefore, for the plaintiffs in respect of timber not split to about six inches in width to recover upon the special contract while it remains thus open and unperformed; unless, that is, there are grounds in the facts of the case for treating them as dispensed from the necessity of splitting the wood to such a width as a condition of payment. To recover under a quantum meruit for wood split to substantially different widths from that required, the plaintiffs must show circumstances removing their right to remuneration from the exact conditions of the special contract. For, if no more appears, the fact of such a contract, open and, to that extent, unperformed, excludes any implied obligation on the part of the defendant to pay a fair and reasonable remuneration for the work done by the plaintiffs in cutting his timber to dimensions outside those allowed by the contract. It is not enough that the work has been beneficial to him by turning his standing timber into the more valuable form of firewood.

> It is a commonplace of the law that there can be no implied contract as to matters covered by an express contract until the express contract is displaced …. But where work is done outside the contract, and the benefit of the work is taken, a contract may be implied to pay for the work so done at the current rate of remuneration, and the terms of the express contract may remain binding in so far as they are not inconsistent with the implied contract: per Scrutton LJ, Steven v Bromley & Son [1919] 2 KB 722 at 727.

But, "taking the benefit of the work" means that the defendant has done so in the exercise of some choice that was actually open to him. As it is put in a recent treatise, "[a]n implicit promise to pay connotes a benefit received by the promisor, but the receipt of the benefit is not in itself enough to raise the implication. No promise can be inferred unless it is open to the beneficiary either to accept or to reject the benefit of the work": Cheshire and Fifoot, Law of Contract (1st ed, 1945), pp 352, 353. The chief example of work of which the advantage must be received and in that sense accepted by the person for whom it is done, is that of the erection or repair of a building upon the land of the person benefiting, but not erected or repaired according to the conditions of the contract. Of such a case Lord Campbell CJ speaks as follows in Munro v Butt (1858) 8 El & Bl 738 at 752–3; 120 ER 275 at 280:

> Now, admitting that in the case of an independent chattel, a piece of furniture for example, to be made under a special contract, and some term, which in itself amounted to a condition precedent, being unperformed, if the party for whom it was to be made had yet [403] accepted it, an action might, upon obvious grounds, be maintained, either on the special contract with a dispensation of the conditions alleged, or an implied contract to pay for it according to its value; it does not seem to us that there are any grounds from which the same conclusion can possibly follow in respect of a building to be erected, or repairs done, or alterations made, to a building on a man's own land, from the mere fact of his taking possession.

It is to be noted that Lord Campbell referred to recovery in the case he contemplates on the special contract on the ground of dispensation with exact performance and to recovery upon a quantum meruit on a new contract implied or imputed. To these two positions he again referred, after describing the dilemma in which a building owner is placed by [an] incomplete execution of the contract. The Lord Chief Justice said at 753, 754; 280:

> How then does mere possession raise any inference of a waiver of the conditions precedent of the special contract, or of the entering into a new one? If indeed the defendant had done any thing, coupled with the taking possession, which had prevented the performance of the special contract, as if he had forbidden the surveyor from entering to inspect the work, or if, the failure in complete performance being very slight, the defendant had used any language, or done any act, from which acquiescence on his part might have been reasonably inferred, the case would have been very different.

No doubt the instances given by Lord Campbell, such things as conduct betokening actual acquiescence and acts calculated to prevent completion, were in the mind of Collins LJ in Sumpter v Hedges [1898] 1 QB 673 at 676 when he said:

> Where, as in the case of work done on land, the circumstances are such as to give the defendant no option whether he will take the benefit of the work or not, then one must look to other facts than the mere taking the benefit of the work in order to ground the inference of a new contract …. The mere fact that a defendant is in possession of what he cannot help keeping, or even has done work upon it, afford no grounds for such an inference.

It is upon these principles that the defendant relies in support of his appeal against the decision by which he has been held liable to the plaintiffs for the value of the work done by them in cutting firewood to the quantity estimated, nearly all of it being in excess of the contract width or diameter. The defendant says that his trees were cut upon his land and the firewood left lying there was his. What was he to do? By what step could he actively "reject" the [404] advantage which the transmutation of his standing trees into firewood necessarily gave him, however unsuitable to his purpose might be the actual lengths and widths? Was he to allow the wood to rot on the ground? What practical choice had he except to make it clear to the plaintiffs that, to obtain payment, they must split the wood to the contract width, and, when they refused or failed to do so, to employ other labour for the purpose of reducing its width or "diameter" so far as otherwise he was unable to dispose of the firewood. Why should he be precluded from selling his wood in the shape the plaintiffs wrongfully left it? It was his wood and why should his dealing with it imply a new contract with the plaintiffs?

If it were true that he made it clear to the plaintiffs before they departed that they must complete their contract by splitting the wood to the specified width, these considerations would indeed place him in a strong position. If his evidence were accepted, the plaintiffs would occupy the situation of a party who abandons a special contract to perform work on the property of another before completing the work and leaves that other party no effective choice in accepting or rejecting the benefit. But the defendant's evidence was not accepted by the judge at the trial, who, on the contrary, held that, as the timber cut, whether over six feet or not in length and whether over six inches or not in width, was sold by the defendant, he must pay a reasonable sum for that which he took and sold, even though it did not strictly comply with the terms of the original contract. What detailed facts the learned judge found on which to base this conclusion there is no express statement to show. But the rejection of the defendant's testimony generally is involved in other findings and I think that we must take it that the defendant did not base his refusal or failure to pay the plaintiffs on their failure to split the wood to the specified width, or, at all events, did not express to the plaintiffs his insistence or desire that they should so cut it.

On the other hand, there is evidence, which his Honour may have accepted, and which the learned judges of the Full Court certainly treated as representing fact, which would authorise a conclusion adverse to the defendant. Upon the evidence it would be open to conclude that the defendant considered that the plaintiffs were bound by the restrictions imposed upon them to go on working for him and that it was for this reason that he did not pay them regularly, that he allowed them to continue cutting timber and splitting it to a [405] width of more than six inches and raised no objection, that notwithstanding this disconformity with the direction or stipulation he had originally given or made, he afterwards promised to pay for the wood cut if and when it was delivered to a buyer or buyers, that he suffered them to leave his employment without informing them that they must split the firewood again in order to reduce its diameter, if they were to be paid, he then having reason to suppose that they did not consider that he was insisting on this requirement and, indeed, that his reliance upon diameter or width was an afterthought. In such circumstances, it would be proper to treat the failure in complete performance as possessing little importance to the defendant and as acquiesced in by him, with the consequence that the subsequent sale of the firewood might rightly be regarded by the learned judge as a taking of the benefit of the work and so, as involving either a dispensation from precise performance or an implication at law of a new obligation to pay the value of the work done.

The actual finding made by the judge at the trial is general, but as it is consistent with his Honour's having proceeded on the foregoing views of the facts, which are open on the evidence, I do not think the defendant should succeed in his attack upon the conclusion that he is bound to pay a fair and reasonable rate of remuneration in respect of the timber actually cut, even though much of it exceeded the stipulated width ….

[29.30] LATHAM CJ: [393] The appellant pressed upon the court the rule established in Cutter v Powell (1795) 6 TR 320; 101 ER 573, (and see Sumpter v Hedges), that if work is done under a special contract no payment can be recovered under the contract until the work is completed. The application of this principal to the present case means that under the contract found to [394] have been made between the parties the plaintiffs cannot recover any payment for any firewood not cut in accordance with the terms of the contract, that is, split to a diameter of six inches. In order to recover any payment in respect of such firewood the plaintiffs must claim upon a quantum meruit and such a claim cannot be allowed unless there is evidence of a fresh contract to pay for that firewood. It is strongly (and rightly) argued that the plaintiffs could not put the defendant in the position of having to pay for firewood not in accordance with the contract merely because he used or sold that firewood. Such use or sale is not in itself evidence of a new contract. The plaintiffs could not impose a new contract upon the defendant upon the basis that, unless he left the firewood to decay upon the ground, he became bound to pay them as if he had employed them on other than the contractual terms. But there is, I think, sufficient evidence to support an inference of a new contract in the present case. The relevant facts have been carefully analysed by my brother Dixon in his reasons for judgment and I agree with the conclusion upon this matter which he has reached. The learned trial judge calculated the value of the work by making an estimate of the quantity of firewood which was in accordance with the contract and of the quantity which was not in accordance with the contract and made a deduction from the contract price in respect of the whole quantity by making an estimate of the work which would be necessary to make all the firewood accord with the contract. Such an estimate could not be precise, but there was evidence to support the finding made and the judgment on this part of the case should, in my opinion, be allowed to stand ….

Legislation

[29.35] The right to payment for work rendered under a contract that has not been fully performed may, in some cases, be affected by legislation. The application of apportionment legislation is illustrated by Nemeth v Bayswater Road Pty Ltd [1988] 2 Qd R 406.

Nemeth v Bayswater Road

[29.40] Nemeth v Bayswater Road Pty Ltd [1988] 2 Qd R 406 (Full Court of the Supreme Court of Queensland) – Appeal from District Court.

[FACTS: Under an agreement for the hire of an aircraft to take effect from 1 February 1986, the appellants agreed to pay $2,200 per calendar month payable at the end of each month. On 16 February, the aircraft crashed, and the contract was thereby frustrated.]

McPHERSON J: [418] Under the contract … it is clear that the monthly sum of $2 200 was payable at the end of each month. At common law interest on money lent accrued due from day to day; but, generally speaking and subject to that exception, payments due at specified dates did not accrue due unless and until the relevant date for payment arrived. This meant that, in the case of a lease determined between two rent days, no rent, or any amount on account of rent, was payable in respect of occupation for the incomplete period before termination … In England the matter attracted legislative attention during the 19th century, culminating in the Apportionment Act 1870, the provisions of which were adopted in Queensland by ss 231 and 232 of the Property Law Act 1986. So far as relevant, those provisions are as follows:

(1) All rents, annuities, dividends, and other periodical payments in the nature of income whether reserved or made payable under an instrument in writing or otherwise shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly.

(2) The apportioned part of any such rent, annuity, or other payment shall be payable or recoverable in the case of a continuing rent, annuity, or other such payment, when the entire portion of which such apportioned part forms part becomes due and payable, and not before; and in the case of a rent annuity or other such payment determined by re-entry, death, or otherwise, when the next entire portion of the same would have been payable if the same had not so determined, and not before.

The monthly utilisation payments under the … contract in the present case cannot be regarded as "rent" in the proper sense of that term or as defined in s 231 of the Act. On the other hand, I do not think it can be doubted that they amount to "other periodical payments in the nature of income … whether … made payable under an instrument in writing or otherwise …". Under s 232(2) the apportioned part is not payable or recoverable until the entire portion becomes due and payable; but that would have happened here at the last moment of 28 February 1986, which was well past when the action was instituted. The monthly payment due … therefore seems to me to be apportionable and therefore due in respect of the incomplete period running from 1 February to 16 February 1986. I reach this conclusion with some hesitation because the applicability of s 232 was not the subject of submissions before us, and I notice that in Re Lucas (1885) 55 LJ Ch 101 at 103, Bowen LJ expressed a doubt whether the Act of 1870 "made rent due from day to day in every sense".

On the other hand, Woodfall, Landlord and Tenant (28th ed), para 1-0772, p 308, does not question [419] that the Act allows recovery of rent pro rata where the tenancy is determined in the middle of the period, and there is a considered decision of Manisty J, reported only in Cababe's and Ellis's Reports to the effect that the Apportionment Act applies to rent in respect of an incomplete period like this: see Hartcup & Co v Bell (1883) Cab & El 19. The effect of the Apportionment Act was summed up by Fry J in Re South Kensington Co-operative Stores (1881) 17 Ch D 161 at 165, who said:

> It declared that rents should be apportionable like interest on money lent. Now, how did the law stand before this Act was passed? Plainly in this way, that rent neither accrued due, nor was payable except on the day on which it was reserved; whereas interest or money lent accrued due de die in diem, although it might be payable at certain specified days. The effect of the section is to declare that rent, like interest, accrues due from day to day, and that the payments or rent, like the payments of interest, when they are periodical, shall be apportioned in respect of the time at which the rent, like the interest, accrued due.

See also Moriarty v Regent's Garage and Engineering Co Ltd [1921] 1 KB 423, which was a case of apportionment of salary. In the result I am persuaded that s 232 does apply to the monthly utilisation fee of $2 200 in this case, and in consequence that the plaintiff was on that account properly awarded the amount of $1 257.14 calculated for the fractional period from 1 to 16 February, 1986 on the basis of 16/28 of the whole monthly sum …

Substantial performance

[29.50] Where a plaintiff has substantially performed his or her obligations under the contract, the doctrine of substantial performance may allow recovery of the contract price, less a payment of damages to the other party as compensation for the incomplete work. What level of performance amounts to substantial performance was considered in Hoenig v Isaacs [1952] 2 All ER 176 and Bolton v Mahdeva [1972] 1 WLR 1009.

Hoenig v Isaacs

[29.55] Hoenig v Isaacs [1952] 2 All ER 176 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Sir Lionel Leach, Official Referee.

[FACTS: The plaintiff was an interior decorator and furniture designer. The defendant, the owner of a one-room flat, employed the plaintiff to decorate it and provide it with furniture, including bedstead and wardrobe and bookcase fitments, for a sum of £750. The plaintiff claimed to have carried out the work in compliance with the contract and requested payment of £350, being the balance of the money owing under the contract. The defendant alleged that the plaintiff had failed to perform his contract, and, alternatively, that the work was done negligently, unskilfully, and in an unworkmanlike manner. The official referee held that the door of a wardrobe required replacing, and that a bookshelf, which was too short, would have to be remade, which would require alteration being made to a bookcase. The official referee held that there had been a substantial compliance with the contract and that the defendant was liable for £750 less the cost of remedying the defects, which he assessed at £55 18s 2d, and he gave judgment for £294 1s 10d.]

SOMERVELL LJ: [177] Counsel for the defendant submits that the decision of the official referee is wrong in law. He submits that this is an entire contract which, on the findings of fact, has not been performed. On the well-known principle applied to the facts of that case in Cutter v Powell (1795) 6 Term Rep 320; 101 ER 573, he submitted that the plaintiff cannot, therefore, recover on his contract …

The official referee regarded the principle laid down in H Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee [1916] 1 KB 566, as applicable. The contract in that case was for repairs to a house. The official referee before whom the case came in the first instance found that the work as completed did not accord with the contract in certain respects. He proceeded to hold that the plaintiff could not recover any part of the contract price or any sum in respect of the contract work. This decision was reversed in the Divisional Court and their decision was affirmed by this court. In support of the official referee's decision it was argued that the plaintiff could not recover either on the contract or on a quantum meruit. No new contract on the latter basis could be implied from the fact that the defendant by continuing to live in her house had enjoyed the benefit of what had been done.

[178] In Eshelby v Federated European Bank Ltd [1932] 1 KB 423 at 421 Greer LJ clearly felt some difficulty about H Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee as possibly inconsistent with Cutter v Powell and the cases following that decision and deciding that where work is to be done for a sum named neither that sum nor any part of it can be recovered while the work remains undone. We were referred to a number of these cases and I have considered those authorities and others. Each case turns on the construction of the contract …

Sinclair v Bowles (1829) 9 B & C 92; 109 ER 35 is often cited as an illustration of the Cutter v Powell principle. The plaintiff had undertaken to repair chandeliers and make them "complete" or "perfect". This he, quite plainly on the evidence and findings of the jury, failed to do. It may, perhaps, be regarded as a case where, on the construction of the contract, having regard to the subject matter, there was no scope for terms collateral to the main purpose.

The principle that fulfilment of every term is not necessarily a condition precedent in a contract for a lump sum is usually tracked back to a short judgment of Lord Mansfield CJ in Boone v Eyre (1779) 1 Hy Bl 273n; 126 ER 160 – the sale of the plantation with its slaves … One is very familiar with the application of this principle in the law relating to the sale of goods. Quoad stipulations which are conditions, the Cutter v Powell principle is applicable. If they are not all performed the other party can repudiate, but there will not have been, as there was in Cutter v Powell, a partial performance. But there may be other terms, collateral to the main purpose, the breach of which in English law gives rise to a claim for damages, but not to a right to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated: see definition of warranty, Sale of Goods Act 1893, s 62(1).

In a contract to erect buildings on the defendant's land for a lump sum, the builder can recover nothing on the contract if he stops before the work is completed in the ordinary sense – in other words, abandons the contract. He is also usually in a difficulty in recovering on a quantum meruit because no new contract can be inferred from the mere fact that the defendant remains in possession of his land: Sumpter v Hedges [1898] 1 QB 673. In Appleby v Myers (1867) LR 2 CP 651, while the work was in progress the premises and the work so far done on them were destroyed by fire and the court held both parties excused. At the end [179] of his judgment Blackburn J, after referring to Cutter v Powell; Sinclair v Bowles and that line of cases, said (at 661): "the plaintiffs, having contracted to do an entire work for a specific sum, can recover nothing unless the work be done."

In H Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee Lord Cozens-Hardy MR, I think, had this principle in mind when he said (at 578): "The work was finished — and when I say this I do not wish to prejudice matters, but I cannot think of a better word to use at the moment."

The question here is whether in a contract for work and labour for a lump sum payable on completion the defendant can repudiate liability under the contract on the ground that the work though "finished" or "done" is in some respects not in accordance with the contract … The learned official referee regarded H Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee as laying down that the price must be paid subject to set-off or counterclaim if there was a substantial compliance with the contract. I think on the facts of this case where the work was finished in the ordinary sense, though in part defective, this is right. It expresses in a convenient epithet what is put from another angle in the Sale of Goods Act 1893. The buyer cannot reject if he proves only the breach of a term collateral to the main purpose. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the first point of counsel for the defendant fails.

The learned official referee found that there was substantial compliance. Bearing in mind that there is no appeal on fact, was there evidence on which he could so find? The learned official referee having, as I hold, properly directed himself, this becomes, I think, a question of fact. The case on this point was, I think, near the border line, and if the finding had been the other way I do not think we would have interfered. Even if I had felt we could interfere, the defendant would be in a further difficulty. The contract included a number of chattels. If the defendant wished to repudiate his liability under the contract [180] he should not, I think, have used those articles, which he could have avoided using. On this view, though it is not necessary to decide it, I think he put himself in the same position as a buyer of goods who by accepting them elects to treat a breach of condition as a breach of warranty …

[29.60] DENNING LJ: [180] This case raises the familiar question: Was entire performance a condition precedent to payment? That depends on the true construction of the contract. In this case … the essential terms were set down in the letter of 25 April 1950. It describes the work which was to be done and concludes with these words: "The foregoing, complete, for the sum of £750 net. Terms of payment are net cash, as the work proceeds; and balance on completion."

The question of law that was debated before us was whether the plaintiff was entitled in this action to sue for the £350 balance of the contract price as he had done. The defendant said that he was only entitled to sue on a quantum meruit. The defendant was anxious to insist on a quantum meruit, because he said that the contract price was unreasonably high. He wished, therefore, to reject that price altogether and simply to pay a reasonable price for all the work that was done. This would obviously mean an inquiry into the value of every item, including all the many items which were in compliance with the contract as well as the three which fell short of it. That is what the defendant wanted. The plaintiff resisted this course and refused to claim on a quantum meruit. He said that he was entitled to the balance of £350 less a deduction for the defects.

In determining this issue the first question is whether, on the true construction of the contract, entire performance was a condition precedent to payment. It was a lump sum contract, but that does not mean that entire performance was a condition precedent to payment. When a contract provides for a specific sum to be paid on completion of specified work, the courts lean against a construction of the contract which would deprive the contractor of any payment at all simply because there are some defects or omissions. The promise to complete the work is, therefore, construed as a term of the contract, but not [181] as a condition. It is not every breach of that term which absolves the employer from his promise to pay the price, but only a breach which goes to the root of the contract, such as an abandonment of the work when it is only half done. Unless the breach does go to the root of the matter, the employer cannot resist payment of the price. He must pay it and bring a cross-claim for the defects and omissions, or, alternatively, set them up in diminution of the price. The measure is the amount which the work is worth less by reason of the defects and omissions, and is usually calculated by the cost of making them good …

It is, of course, always open to the parties by express words to make entire performance a condition precedent. A familiar instance is when the contract provides for progress payments to be made as the work proceeds, but for retention money to be held until completion. Then entire performance is usually a condition precedent to payment of the retention money, but not, of course, to the progress payments. The contractor is entitled to payment pro rata as the work proceeds, less a deduction for retention money. But he is not entitled to the retention money until the work is entirely finished, without defects or omissions. In the present case the contract provided for "net cash, as the work proceeds; and balance on completion". If the balance could be regarded as retention money, then it might well be that the contractor ought to have done all the work correctly, without defects or omissions, in order to be entitled to the balance. But I do not think the balance should be regarded as retention money. Retention money is usually only ten per cent, or 15 per cent, whereas this balance was more than 50 per cent. I think this contract should be regarded as an ordinary lump sum contract. It was substantially performed. The contractor is entitled, therefore, to the contract price, less a deduction for the defects.

Even if entire performance was a condition precedent, nevertheless the result would be the same, because I think the condition was waived. It is always open to a party to waive a condition which is inserted for his benefit. What amounts to a waiver depends on the circumstances. If this was an entire contract, then, when the plaintiff tendered the work to the defendant as being a fulfilment of the contract, the defendant could have refused to accept it until the defects were made good, in which case he would not have been liable for the balance of the price until they were made good. But he did not refuse to accept the work. On the contrary, he entered into possession of the flat and used the furniture as his own, including the defective items. That was a clear waiver of the condition precedent. Just as in a sale of goods the buyer who accepts the goods can no longer treat a breach of condition as giving a right to reject but only a right to damages, so also in a contract for work and labour an employer who takes the benefit of the work can no longer treat entire performance as a condition precedent, but only as a term giving rise to damages. The case becomes then an ordinary lump sum contract governed by the principles laid down in Mondel v Steel (1841) 8 M & W 858; 151 ER 1288 and H Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee. The employer must, therefore, pay the contract price subject to a deduction for defects or omissions ….

Appeal dismissed.

Bolton v Mahdeva

[29.65] Bolton v Mahdeva [1972] 1 WLR 1009 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from County Court.

[FACTS: The plaintiff agreed to install a combined heating and hot water system in the defendant's home for a price of £560. The defendant alleged that the work was improperly done and that the plaintiff had wholly failed to perform the contract. The trial judge held that the defendant was entitled to set off £174.50 for the defects. There were certain other amounts to be taken into account, and judgment was given to the plaintiff for £431.50. The defendant appealed.]

CAIRNS LJ: [1011] The main question in the case is whether the defects in workmanship found by the judge to be such as to cost £174 to repair – that is, between one third and one quarter of the contract price – were of such a character and amount that the plaintiff could not be said to have substantially performed his contract. That is, in my view, clearly the legal principle which has to be applied to cases of this kind.

The rule which was laid down many years ago in Cutter v Powell (1795) 6 Term Rep 320; 101 ER 573 in relation to lump sum contracts was that unless the contracting party had performed the whole of his contract, he was not entitled to recover anything. That strong rule must now be read in the [1012] light of certain more recent cases to which I shall briefly refer. The first of those cases is H Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee [1916] 1 KB 566 … [1013] Perhaps the most helpful case is the most recent one of Hoenig v Isaacs [1952] 2 All ER 176 … In considering whether there was substantial performance I am of opinion that it is relevant to take into account both the nature of the defects and the proportion between the cost of rectifying them and the contract price. It would be wrong to say that the contractor is only entitled to payment if the defects are so trifling as to be covered by the de minimis rule …

[1014] Now, certainly it appears to me that the nature and amount of the defects in this case were far different from those which the court had to consider in H Dakin & Co Ltd v Lee and Hoenig v Isaacs. For my part, I find it impossible to say that the judge was right in reaching the conclusion that in those circumstances the contract had been substantially performed. The contract was a contract to install a central heating system. If a central heating system when installed is such that it does not heat the house adequately and is such, further, that fumes are given out, so as to make living rooms uncomfortable, and if the putting right of those defects is not something which can be done by some slight amendment of the system, then I think that the contract is not substantially performed … Taking those matters into account and the other matters making up the total of £174, I have reached the conclusion that the judge was wrong in saying that this contract had been substantially completed; and, on my view of the law, it follows that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover under that contract …

BUCKLEY LJ: [1015] I agree.

[29.70] SACHS LJ: I agree that this appeal should be allowed, for the reasons given by Cairns LJ …

When, however, one looks at the aggregate of the number of defects that [the trial judge] held to have been established, at the importance of some of those defects, and at the way in which some of them prevented the installation being one that did what was intended, I find myself, like Cairns LJ, quite unable to agree that there was a substantial performance by the plaintiff of this lump sum contract. It is not merely that so very much of the work was shoddy, but it is the general ineffectiveness of it for its primary purpose that leads me to that conclusion.

So far as the law is concerned, I would merely add that it seems to me to be compactly and accurately stated in Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract (7th ed, 1969), p 492, in the following terms: "the present rule is that so long as there is a substantial performance the contractor is entitled to the stipulated price, subject only to a cross-action or counterclaim for the omissions or defects in execution" and, to "cross-action or counterclaim", I would of course add "set-off". The converse, however, is equally correct – if there is not a substantial performance, the contractor cannot recover. It is upon the application of that converse rule that the plaintiff's case here fails. This rule does not work hardly upon a contractor if only he is prepared to remedy the defects before seeking to resort to litigation to recover the lump sum. It is entirely the fault of the contractor in this instant case that he has placed himself in a difficulty by his refusal on 4 December 1969, to remedy the defects of which complaint was being made …

Appeal allowed.

[29.75] Note

In Zamperoni Decorators Pty Ltd v Lo Presti [1983] VR 338, a painting contractor who completed work that was substandard was held to be entitled to the stipulated contract price ($1,200), but subject to reduction by the amount required to rectify the defective work ($600). Anderson J said, at 342:

> In deciding whether or not there has been substantial performance the court has considerable latitude. It is on the whole of the evidence that the court acts. It is required in the ultimate to act justly, and while in particular instances it is proper to hold that there had not been substantial performance with the consequence that the contractor fails in his claim, the court may regard defects, even though substantial but capable of remedying, as not justifying the denial of all reward to the contractor, but denying him an amount sufficient to pay for the remedying of the defects.

Payment independent of performance

[29.80] In some cases, the parties may make the payment of a particular sum of money, independent of performance of the contract. Where payment is independent of performance, the sum will be owing as a debt when the time for payment arises. The right of the plaintiff to claim or retain the sum even if performance is not subsequently rendered is discussed in McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457.

McDonald v Dennys Lascelles

[29.85] McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: The Rye Grazing Co, the purchasers, entered into a contract for the purchase of certain land from the vendor who was himself a purchaser of the land under a contract of sale. The vendor assigned to Dennys Lascelles Ltd, his interest under the contract with the purchasers, which, however, made default in payment of an instalment of the purchase money. In consideration of allowing the purchasers further time to pay, McDonald, with another, guaranteed payment of the instalment but the instalment was never paid. When it appeared to the purchasers that the vendor would be unable to complete the contract, the purchasers repudiated the contract, which repudiation was accepted by the vendor and Dennys Lascelles Ltd. Dennys Lascelles Ltd then brought an action against McDonald and his co-guarantor for the recovery of the amount of the instalment guaranteed by them.]

DIXON J: [475] It thus appears necessary to consider with some degree of exactness what are the material rights and obligations of vendor and purchaser with respect to instalments. It must be borne in mind that the instalment in dispute was overdue when the contract came to an end. According to the terms of the contract, it was originally due and payable on 24 January 1930. Was it then recoverable as a sum certain in money? Convincing reasons for an affirmative answer have been given in Victoria and in New Zealand. Sir John Salmond has stated the principles determining this conclusion:

> As a general rule, on the failure or refusal of a purchaser to complete an executory contract for the purchase of land the vendor is not entitled to sue for the purchase money as a debt. He is entitled merely to sue for specific performance or for damages for the loss of his bargain. It is only when the contract has been completed by the execution and acceptance of a conveyance that unpaid purchase money may become a debt and can be recovered accordingly. This general rule is sufficiently illustrated and established by the case of Laird v Pim (1841) 7 M & W 474; 151 ER 852. The sale of land is in this respect similar to the sale of goods. In the case of goods sold and delivered, and [476] of goods bargained and sold, the property in each case having passed to the buyer, the seller's remedy is to sue for the price. But if under any executory contract the buyer wrongfully refuses to accept the goods the seller's only remedy is an action for damages. The general rule, however, that in an executory contract for the sale of land the vendor cannot sue for the price is excluded whenever a contrary intention is shown by the express terms of the contract. And it seems established by authority that a contrary intention is sufficiently shown in all cases in which by the express terms of the contract the purchase money or any part thereof is made payable on a fixed day, not being the agreed day for the completion of the contract by conveyance. In all such cases the purchase money or such part thereof becomes, on the day so fixed for its payment, a debt immediately recoverable by the vendor irrespective of the question whether a conveyance has been executed and notwithstanding the fact that the purchaser may have repudiated his contract. Notwithstanding such repudiation the vendor is not bound to sue for damages or specific performance, but may recover the agreed purchase money: Ruddenklau v Charlesworth [1925] NZLR 161 at 164, 165.

In Reynolds v Fury [1921] VLR 14 at 17, the Full Court of Victoria, after a very full examination of the authorities, decided that instalments of purchase money, which, by the conditions of a contract of sale of land are payable at fixed times before conveyance, become immediately recoverable as debts or liquidated demands, notwithstanding that the sale has not yet been completed by conveyance.

From this it follows that after 24 January 1930, subject to the vendors' agreement to forbear between a date about 18 March 1930, when the conditions stipulated for their forbearance were complied with, and 24 January 1931, the instalment might have been recovered from the sub-purchasers as a liquidated demand. Did the subsequent discharge of the second contract relieve the sub-purchasers of this liability? When a party to a simple contract, upon a breach by the other contracting party of a condition of the contract, elects to treat the contract as no longer binding upon him, the contract is not rescinded as from the beginning. Both parties [477] are discharged from the further performance of the contract, but rights are not divested or discharged which have already been unconditionally acquired. Rights and obligations which arise from the partial execution of the contract and causes of action which have accrued from its breach alike continue unaffected. When a contract is rescinded because of matters which affect its formation, as in the case of fraud, the parties are to be rehabilitated and restored, so far as may be, to the position they occupied before the contract was made. But when a contract, which is not void or voidable at law, or liable to be set aside in equity, is dissolved at the election of one party because the other has not observed an essential condition or has committed a breach going to its root, the contract is determined so far as it is executory only and the party in default is liable for damages for its breach … It does not, however, necessarily follow from these principles that when, under an executory contract for the sale of property, the price or part of it is paid or payable in advance, the seller may both retain what he had received, or recover overdue instalments, and at the same time treat himself as relieved from the obligation of transferring the property to the buyer. When a contract stipulates for payment of part of the purchase money in advance, the purchaser relying only on the vendor's promise to give him a conveyance, the vendor is entitled to enforce payment before the time has arrived for conveying the land; yet his title to retain the money has been considered not to be absolute but conditional upon the subsequent completion of the contract. "The very idea of payment falls to the ground when both have treated the bargain as at an end; and from that moment the vendor holds the money advanced to the use of the purchaser": Palmer v Temple (1839) 9 Ad & E 508 at 520, 521; 112 ER 1304 at 1309.

In Laird v Pim (at 478; 854) Parke B says: "It is clear he cannot [478] have the land and its value too"; the case, however, was one in which conveyance and payment were contemporaneous conditions … It is now beyond question that instalments already paid may be recovered by a defaulting purchaser when the vendor elects to discharge the contract: Mayson v Clouet [1924] AC 980. Although the parties might by express agreement give the vendor an absolute right at law to retain the instalments in the event of the contract going off, yet in equity such a contract is considered to involve a forfeiture from which the purchaser is entitled to be relieved: see the judgment of Long Innes J in Pitt v Curotta (1931) 31 SR (NSW) 477 at 480–2. The view adopted in Re Dagenham (Thames) Dock Co; Ex parte Hulse (1873) LR 8 Ch 1022, seems to have been that relief should be granted, not against the forfeiture of the instalments, but against the forfeiture of the estate under a contract which involved the retention of the purchase money: and this may have been the ground upon which Lord Moulton proceeded in Kilmer v British Columbia Orchard Lands Ltd [1913] AC 319, notwithstanding the explanation of that case given in Steedman v Drinkle [1916] 1 AC 275, and Brickles v Snell [1916] 2 AC 599. However, these cases establish the purchaser's right to recover the instalments, other than the deposit, although the contract is not carried into execution. If a vendor under a contract containing an express power to forfeit instalments at first determined the contract and retained the instalments but afterwards resiled from his former election to treat the contract as discharged and insisted that, if the purchaser was unwilling to forfeit his instalments according to the tenor of the agreement, he should at least carry out the sale, perhaps the purchaser as a term of equitable relief against forfeiture would be required to carry out his contract. But, where there is no express agreement excluding the implication made at law, by which the instalments become repayable upon the discharge of the obligation to convey and the purchaser has a legal right to the return of the purchase money already paid which makes it needless to resort to equity and submit to equity as a condition of obtaining relief, the [479] vendor appears to be unable to deduct from the amount of the instalments the amount of his loss occasioned by the purchaser's abandonment of the contract. A vendor may, of course, counterclaim for damages in the action in which the purchaser seeks to recover the instalments.

In the present case, the contract of resale contains no provision for the retention or forfeiture of the instalments. If, therefore, the instalment originally due on 24 January 1930, had been paid by the purchasers to the vendors, they would, in my opinion, have been entitled to recover it from the vendors. The right so to recover it is legal and not equitable. It arises out of the nature of the contract itself. This would be so even if the second contract was rescinded by the vendors upon the purchasers' default. If in the present case the purchasers' claim to rescind this contract were justified, an instalment already paid would have been recoverable as on an ordinary failure of consideration. But, if the difference be material, I am disposed to think that the purchasers' claim to rescind was not, in the circumstances, well founded and that the second contract should be treated as discharged by the vendors' acceptance of the repudiation by the purchasers involved in their attempt to rescind. It appears to me inevitably to follow from the principles upon which instalments paid are recoverable that an unpaid overdue instalment ceases to be payable by the purchasers when the contract is discharged. The fact that the contract was assigned does not increase or vary the purchasers' liabilities under it, and, accordingly, I think that the purchasers upon the subsale ceased to be liable for the instalment guaranteed.

The second question remains, namely whether the cesser of the sub-purchasers' liability for the instalment of £1 000 operates to discharge the sureties …

[His Honour then considered the guarantee and held that it amounted to no more than a collateral undertaking securing the primary liability to pay the instalment. Accordingly, the guarantors' liability was also extinguished. In the course of this part of his judgment his Honour said:]

[480] In the present case, not only is the principal debtor relieved from personal liability to pay the instalments but the vendor's just title both to obtain and to retain the instalment altogether ceases. If there had been no assignment and if the instalment had been duly paid, it would have become the vendors' duty to repay it. It is, perhaps, uncertain whether, if the payment of the instalment had been duly made to the plaintiff, as assignee, the liability to repay it would have fallen upon it or upon its assignors, the vendors, because it is not clear that the obligation to repay it does not arise out of contractual implication by which the assignee would not be bound, as distinguished from an independent duty springing simply from the receipt of the money and the subsequent discharge of the contract.

[RICH, STARKE and MCTIERNAN JJ delivered judgments to a similar effect. EVATT J dissented.]

[29.90] Note

Is it possible for an accrued right to exist in respect of a sum of money due for payment after termination? In Westralian Farmers Ltd v Commonwealth Agricultural Service Engineers Ltd (1935) 54 CLR 361 Dixon and Evatt JJ made the following statement (at 379–80):

> In general the termination of an executory agreement out of the performance of which pecuniary demands may arise imports that, just as on the one side no further acts of performance can be required, so, on the other side, no liability can be brought into existence if it depends upon a further act of performance. If the title to rights consists of vestitive facts which would result from the further execution of the contract but which have not been brought about before the agreement terminates, the rights cannot arise. But if all the facts have occurred which entitle one party to such a right as a debt, a distinct chose in action which for many purposes is conceived as possessing proprietary characteristics, the fact that the right to payment is future or is contingent upon some event, not involving further performance of the contract, does not prevent it maturing into an immediately enforceable obligation.

This approach was adopted in Elkoury v Farrow Mortgage Services Pty Ltd (1993) 114 ALR 541.

DEPOSITS

[29.95] A category of case in which the right to payment is considered independent of the performance of the contract concerns deposits. A deposit is a percentage of the overall purchase price payable by a purchaser on entering into a contract of sale. The deposit is paid by the purchaser in return for the vendor entering into the transaction. Generally, if the transaction goes ahead, the deposit is treated as part of the purchase price. However, if the vendor, in breach of contract, does not complete the transaction, the purchaser will generally be entitled to recover the deposit. If the transaction is not completed by reason of the default of the purchaser, the vendor will retain the deposit. A vendor's right to retain a deposit following breach by the purchaser is not conditional upon the subsequent completion of the transaction. Bot v Ristevski [1981] VR 120 considers what should be the result if the deposit, although due, has not actually been paid when a vendor terminates the contract because of the purchaser's breach.

Bot v Ristevski

[29.100] Bot v Ristevski [1981] VR 120 (Supreme Court of Victoria) – Trial of Action.

[FACTS: The plaintiffs/vendors sold a house and land to the defendants/purchasers for a price payable by a part deposit on the signing of the sale note, the balance of the deposit payable within seven days thereafter and the residue of the purchase price at a later date. After payment of this initial part deposit but before the rest of the deposit was paid, the defendants wrongfully repudiated the contract, which repudiation was accepted by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs sued for the unpaid portion of the deposit.]

BROOKING J: [121] By the sale note, the balance of the deposit was payable within seven days of 28 January 1976. Once this seven day period has expired, the plaintiffs were entitled to sue the defendants for the unpaid balance, $1 800, as a debt. The question is whether the plaintiffs have lost this right by electing to discharge the contract in reliance upon the defendants' repudiation.

It is clear that the determination of a contract by the acceptance of a repudiation does not in general affect rights which have already been acquired by reason of the contract. The contrary view … was finally disposed of in this country … by the judgment of Sir Owen Dixon in McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457 at 476–7 …

The right of action for debt which arose in the present case on 5 February 1976 in consequence of the purchasers' failure to pay the balance of the deposit within seven days of the sale note will, then, not have been extinguished by the subsequent determination of the contract unless the right to recover the balance of the deposit was conditional upon the subsequent completion of the contract.

[Brooking J quoted from Dixon J's judgment in McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd: "It does not, however … Mayson v Clouet [1924] AC 980" see [29.85].] [123] Where the vendor discharges a contract for breach, the contract may expressly empower him to forfeit instalments of purchase money payable in advance of conveyance or transfer, so as to make it necessary for the purchaser to invoke equitable relief against forfeiture. If the contract gives no express power of forfeiture, the purchaser may recover by action at law instalments of purchase money paid in advance of conveyance or transfer and will have a good defence at law to an action by the vendor claiming payment of instalments of purchase money which were overdue by the time when the contract was discharged. The vendor's title to retain or recover the purchase money is conditional upon the subsequent completion of the contract by conveyance or transfer: if the contract is not completed, the consideration wholly fails: McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd …

The vendor's title to retain or recover a deposit is not conditional in this sense, and accordingly it will not be defeated or divested by the subsequent discharge of the contract: Ettridge v Vermin Board of the District of Murat Bay [1928] SASR 124 … True it is that a deposit wears two aspects: if the purchase is carried out, it goes against the purchase money, but its primary purpose is that it is a guarantee that the purchaser means business … There is no failure of consideration if the land is not conveyed or transferred, for the purchaser has had the benefit of the entry into the contract of sale by the vendor:

> Here the purchaser made an unconditional promise to pay a deposit immediately and, although if the contract was completed the moneys would according to ordinary principles be credited towards the purchase price and until then would constitute an earnest for performance, the agreement to pay was not in consideration of conveyance but was in consideration of the contract. It was the price or part of the price of the vendor's promise to sell: Farrant v Leburn [1970] WAR 179 at 184.

The decision of Pennycuick J [in Lowe v Hope [1970] Ch 94] was influenced by the notion that a vendor who determines the contract by accepting a repudiation cannot assert rights which arise under the contract and must, because [124] of the need for restitutio in integrum, return to the purchaser what he, the vendor, has received under the contract, the vendor's right to retain the deposit being viewed as an exception to the general rule. This notion arose from the failure to distinguish between rescission for some extrinsic collateral cause and the discharge of contracts for breach a failure for which the noted text writer, Cyprian Williams, must bear much of the responsibility. The erroneous conception was never allowed to take root in Australia …

In the same way it is my respectful view that McMullin J, in Johnson v Jones [1972] NZLR 313, while mindful of the principle laid down by Sir Owen Dixon in McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd, failed to give effect to it in respect of the debt which had arisen for the balance of the deposit. The fact that the vendor might have insisted upon payment before rescinding, which appears to be the ground on which his Honour held the principle to be inapplicable, does not, as it seems to me, afford any reason for treating the debt as extinguished in consequence of the determination of the contract. (In the statement of the principle at [1972] NZLR 313 at 318 of the report the word "conditionally" is plainly to be read as "unconditionally".)

In Lyon v Magnet Nominees Pty Ltd [1978] VR 673, Harris J adopted the reasoning in Lowe v Hope. His Honour does briefly discuss the principle laid down by Sir Owen Dixon but does not appear to have been referred to the consideration given to the application of that principle in Farrant v Leburn [1970] WAR 179.

In Lowe v Hope, Pennycuick J, after citing a passage by Cyprian Williams, continued ([1970] Ch 98; [1969] 3 All ER 608):

> Applying those principles in relation to a deposit payable under the contract of sale but not in fact paid by the purchaser, it seems to me that the vendor having elected to bring the contract to an end by rescission is not entitled to insist on the performance of the contract in relation to the deposit. This is admittedly so, in so far as the deposit bears the character of part of the unpaid purchase price. It seems to me it must equally be so, in so far as the deposit bears the character of a pledge; for once the vendor has rescinded the contract there are no outstanding obligations of the purchaser in respect of which the vendor can be entitled to be protected by a pledge.

It would, I think, be quite contrary to principle that a vendor having rescinded a contract so that the contract is at an end should at that stage be entitled to insist that the purchaser shall hand over to him a contractual pledge with a view to its forfeiture.

I prefer to approach the problem by asking whether an unconditional right to recover and retain the deposit arose before the contract was discharged. If such a right did arise, it will survive the determination of the contract, and if the money has been paid before discharge the purchaser will not get it back, while if the money has not been paid before discharge the purchaser will be compelled to pay it. Whether the vendor obtained an unconditional right to recover [125] and retain the deposit will depend upon whether the discharge of the contract will give rise to a total failure of the consideration for payment of the deposit. If it will, then the consequence of discharge will be that the vendor cannot recover the deposit, if unpaid, or retain it, if paid. Either there was an unconditional right to recover and retain the deposit, or there was not. Pennycuick J thought it contrary to principle that once the vendor had determined the contract, so that there were no outstanding obligations of the purchaser in respect of which the vendor might be protected by a pledge, the vendor should be entitled to get in the pledge with a view to its forfeiture. But if, as I believe, the question what constitutes the consideration will determine not only whether the deposit unpaid may despite the discharge be recovered, but also whether the deposit paid must in consequence of the discharge be refunded, those who contend that the unpaid vendor cannot recover must recognise that the paid vendor should repay, a proposition manifestly untenable.

If the matter may be discussed in terms, not of failure of consideration, but of construction of the contract (Harrison v Holland and Hannen and Cubitts Ltd (1922) 91 LJKB 337 at 340–1, per Younger LJ; but see the report in [1922] 1 KB 211, 213), I see no foundation for an implication that if the contract is discharged for breach the deposit is to be forfeited if it has been paid before the date of discharge but not if the purchaser, in breach of contract, has failed to pay it before the date of discharge. Why should it be implied that the purchaser is to be in a better position if, as a result of breaking his contract, he has not paid the deposit? Compare the remarks of Horridge J in Dewar v Mintoft [1912] 2 KB 373 at 387, and those of Willes J in Hinton v Sparkes (1868) LR 3 CP 161 at 166 …

[His Honour then considered a large number of authorities generally relating to the issue and continued:] [129] Principle and authority have combined to lead me to the conclusion that … a vendor who discharges the contract in consequence of the purchaser's repudiation of it can recover a deposit that should have been paid before the contract was discharged and that I should not follow Lyon v Magnet Nominees Pty Ltd. (The plaintiff's claim in Dewar [130] v Mintoft appears to have been framed as one for damages; the action should have been for debt, not damages.) The claim by the present plaintiffs for payment of the balance of the deposit succeeds.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

MITIGATION AND THE ACTION FOR DEBT

[29.110] The principles of mitigation do not apply to an action for a debt due under the contract. Thus, at least in principle, where a plaintiff chooses not to accept a repudiation of the contract, the plaintiff may be able to complete his or her obligations under the contract and sue in debt for the contract price. This result assumes that continued performance of the contract by the plaintiff does not require the co-operation of the other party. Other possible limitations are discussed in the following case.

Clea Shipping Corp v Bulk Oil Int'l (The "Alaskan Trader") (No 2)

[29.115] Clea Shipping Corp v Bulk Oil International Ltd (The "Alaskan Trader") (No 2) [1984] 1 All ER 129 (Queen's Bench Division, Commercial Court) – Appeal from Arbitrator.

[FACTS: On 19 October 1979, Bulk Oil, the *charterer*s, chartered the "Alaskan Trader" from Clea Shipping, the owners, for a period of two years. She was delivered to the charterers on 20 December 1979 and made a number of voyages. On 19 October 1980, the ship suffered a serious engine breakdown which, it was clear, would take several months to repair. The charterers said that they had no further use for the ship, charter rates having declined substantially. The owners nevertheless proceeded with repairs, which were completed by 7 April 1981, and then put the ship with a full crew at the disposal of the charterers. The charterers refused to give the master any orders, and the ship remained at anchor with a full crew ready to sail until 5 December 1981, the date of expiry of the charter. She was then sold for scrap. The charterers continued to pay hire without prejudice for the period 8 April to 5 December 1981 and at arbitration claimed back the hire. The arbitrator found that the owners had no legitimate interest in keeping the charter alive or in claiming hire rather than claiming damages and held that the charterers were entitled to reclaim the hire but were liable in damages.]

LLOYD J: [131] The owners argued that they were entitled to retain the hire, since they had kept the vessel at the disposal of the charterers throughout the period. They relied on the decision of the House of Lords in White and Carter (Councils) Ltd v McGregor [1962] 2 AC 413, and the decision of Kerr J in The Odenfeld [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep 357. The charterers on the other hand argued that the owners ought, in all reason, to have accepted the charterers' conduct as a repudiation of the charter, and claimed damages. Even if no alternative employment could be found for the vessel, it would have been a great deal cheaper to lay the vessel up, rather than maintain her with a full crew on board. They relied on the decision of the Court of Appeal in Attica Sea Carriers Corp v Ferrostaal Poseidon Bulk Reederei GmbH (The Puerto Buitrago) [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep 250 …

[132] When the matter came before Bingham J on the application for leave to appeal, he ordered the arbitrator to expand his reasons for saying: "the owners had no legitimate interest in pursuing their claim for hire rather than a claim for damages."

The explanation for the arbitrator's use of that language becomes evident when one looks at the speech of Lord Reid in White and Carter v McGregor. The arbitrator complied with Bingham J's order in a further lengthy document which has been put before me … In White and Carter v McGregor the plaintiffs agreed to display advertisements for the defendant's garage on litter bins in the neighbourhood for a period of three years. The very same day the defendant said he did not wish to go on with the contract. The plaintiff declined to accept the repudiation. They went ahead with the contract, and sued for the agreed price in debt. It was held by the House of Lords that they were justified. The minority, while conceding that an unaccepted repudiation does not put an end to the contract, nevertheless held that the plaintiffs' only remedy lay in damages, since it was obviously not a suitable case for specific performance. Lord Hodson, with whom Lord Tucker agreed, drew no distinction between anticipatory breach, and breach at the date of performance. In either case the innocent party has an unfettered right of election. He said (at 445):

> When the assistance of the court is not required the innocent party can choose whether he will accept repudiation and sue for damages for anticipatory breach or await the date of performance by the guilty party. Then, if there is failure in performance, his rights are preserved.
> It may be unfortunate that the appellants have saddled themselves with an unwanted contract causing an apparent waste of time and money. No doubt this aspect impressed the Court of Session but there is no equity which can assist the respondent. It is trite that equity will not rewrite an [133] improvident contract where there is no disability on either side. There is no duty laid upon a party to a subsisting contract to vary it at the behest of the other party so as to deprive himself of the benefit given to him by the contract. To hold otherwise would be to introduce a novel equitable doctrine that a party was not to be held > to his contract unless the court in a given instance thought it reasonable so to do. In this case it would make an action for debt a claim for a discretionary remedy. This would introduce an uncertainty into the field of contract which appears to be unsupported by authority …

Lord Reid agreed with Lord Hodson and Lord Tucker that on the facts the plaintiffs' claim in debt must succeed. But his speech contains two important observations on the law. First, he pointed out that it is only in rare cases that the innocent party will be able to complete performance of his side of the contract, without the assent or co-operation of the party in breach … The peculiarity of White and Carter v McGregor, as Lord Reid pointed out (at 429) was that the plaintiffs could completely fulfil their part of the contract without any co-operation from the defendant.

The second observation as to the law was that a party might well be unable to enforce his contractual remedy if "he had no legitimate interest, financial or otherwise, in performing the contract rather than claiming damages." Lord Reid did not go far in explaining what he meant by legitimate interest except to say that the de minimis principle would apply. Obviously it would not be sufficient to establish that the innocent party was acting unreasonably. Otherwise Lord Reid would not have rejected the Lord President's formulation in Langford & Co Ltd v Dutch 1952 SC 15 that "the only reasonable and proper course" was for the pursuers to accept the repudiation. As Lord Reid said (at 430):

> It might be, but it never has been, the law that a person is only entitled to enforce his contractual rights in a reasonable way, and that a court will not support an attempt to enforce them in an unreasonable way. One reason why that is not the law is, no doubt, because it was thought that it would create too much uncertainty to require the court to decide whether it is reasonable or equitable to allow a party to enforce his full rights under a contract. The Lord President cannot have meant that.

Nor does Lord Reid go far in explaining the juristic basis on which the court can confine the plaintiffs' remedy to a claim for damages. All he says is that, in the absence of legitimate interest: "that might be regarded as a proper case for the exercise of the general equitable jurisdiction of the court." …

It is clear that, on the facts, no attempt had been made by the defendant to establish absence of legitimate interest. Accordingly, counsel for the owners was right when he submitted that the two observations which I have mentioned, were both, strictly speaking, obiter. I further accept that the language used by Lord Reid is tentative. But I do not accept counsel's submission that Lord Reid was merely recording the arguments of counsel, a possibility canvassed by Lord Justice Salmon and Lord Justice Buckley in Decro-Wall International SA v Practitioners in Marketing Ltd [1971] 1 WLR 361 … [134] Very soon afterwards, Decro-Wall v Marketing came before the Court of Appeal. That was a case of a sole agency agreement. The plaintiffs, a manufacturing company carrying on business in France, purported to terminate the agreement on the ground of an alleged repudiation by the defendants, an English marketing company. The defendants sought a declaration that the agreement was still subsisting, and an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from appointing another sole agent. It was argued for the plaintiffs that, if they were wrong in their main submission, then at least the defendants were obliged to accept their purported termination of the agreement as a repudiation. They relied on the first of the [649] two observations of Lord Reid in White and Carter v McGregor, namely, that the sole agency agreement could not be performed without the co-operation of the plaintiff manufacturers, and that therefore the contract had come to an end without any election by the defendants. The plaintiffs' argument was rejected. Both Lord Justice Salmon and Lord Justice Sachs made clear that it is not the right to elect which is limited by the first of Lord Reid's observations, but the range of remedies. You cannot claim remuneration under a contract if you have not earned it; if you are prevented from earning it, your only remedy is in damages. In the Decro-Wall case the defendants were not claiming remuneration. They were claiming a declaration and an injunction. Accordingly what Lord Reid had said was irrelevant to the case before them. Nothing was said in the Decro-Wall case about the second of the two observations of Lord Reid in White and Carter v McGregor.

The next case, on which Mr Cooke relied, is The Puerto Buitrago. In that case a vessel suffered an engine breakdown in the course of her service under a demise charter. There was a provision in the charter that the vessel should be drydocked before redelivery, and any repairs found to be necessary were to be carried out at charterers' expense. The repairs were estimated to cost $2 million. The value of the vessel when repaired would only have been $1 million. The charterers declined to carry out the repairs. They purported to redeliver the vessel in her unrepaired state. The owners refused to accept redelivery. They argued that the charterers were bound to repair the vessel, and that hire continued to be payable until they had. The Court of Appeal decided in favour of the charterers. They held, on a preliminary question of law, that the obligation to repair was not a condition precedent to the right to redeliver. But they went on to consider three other questions of law which had been agreed between the parties, but which only arose if they were wrong on the first question of law. For the purpose of the fourth question, they assumed that the charterers were in breach by insisting on redelivering the vessel without first repairing her. On that assumption the fourth question was whether the owners were obliged to accept the charterers' conduct as a repudiation. The owners argued not. They relied on White and Carter v McGregor. The Court of Appeal rejected the owners' argument. Lord Denning MR said that White and Carter v McGregor > has no application whatever in a case where the plaintiff ought, in all reason, to accept the repudiation and sue for damages — provided that damages would provide an adequate remedy for any loss suffered by him. The reason is because, by suing for the money, the plaintiff is seeking to enforce specific performance of the contract — and he should not be allowed to do so when damages would be an adequate remedy.

> What is the alternative which the shipowners present to the charterers? Either the charterers must pay the charter hire for years to come, whilst the vessel lies idle and useless for want of repair. Or the charterers must do repairs which would cost twice as much as the ship would be worth when repaired — after which the [135] shipowners might sell it as scrap, making the repairs a useless waste of money. In short, on either alternative, the shipowners seek to compel specific performance of one or other of the provisions of the charter — with most unjust and unreasonable consequences — when damages would be an adequate remedy. I do not think the law allows them to do this.

Orr LJ confined his judgment to the fourth question. He set out the two passages from Lord Reid's speech which contain the two observations I have mentioned. He then continued …

In that passage Orr LJ was distinguishing White and Carter v McGregor on two separate grounds. First, unlike White and Carter v McGregor the charterparty could not be performed without the co-operation of the charterers. Second, unlike White and Carter v McGregor, the charterers had set out to prove (and presumably had proved) that the owners had no legitimate interest in claiming hire rather than damages. Browne LJ specifically agreed with Lord Denning MR, and Orr LJ on the fourth question.

Counsel for the owners argued that what the Court of Appeal said on the fourth question was obiter. Even if I assume that to be so, there is, at the very least, the strong persuasive authority of the majority of the Court of Appeal – Orr and Browne LJJ — in support of what Lord Reid had said in White and Carter v McGregor that the absence of a legitimate interest is a ground on which the owners may be compelled to accept damages in lieu of hire.

Lastly, there is Gator Shipping Corp v Trans-Asiatic Oil Ltd SA and Occidental Shipping Establishment (The Odenfeld) [1978] 2 Lloyd's Rep 357 …

There were a number of preliminary issues for determination by the court. The third issue was whether, on the assumption that the charterers had repudiated the charterparty, the owners ought to have accepted the repudiation. Kerr J held not. He was invited to consider White and Carter v McGregor, Decro-Wall, and The Puerto Buitrago. He took the view that The Puerto Buitrago was an extreme case on the facts. Nevertheless he accepted the importance of the case as: > a presently binding authority on this court in limiting or qualifying the generality of the principle of a virtually unfettered right of election in favour of the innocent party.

[136] I do not know whether by referring to a presently binding authority, Kerr J was indicating that in his view the case may have been wrongly decided. For present purposes it does not matter. Kerr J's own formulation of the law, derived from The Puerto Buitrago and Decro-Wall was that:

> any fetter on the innocent party's right of election whether or not to accept a repudiation will only be applied in extreme cases, viz where damages would be an adequate remedy and where an election to keep the contract alive would be wholly unreasonable …

In the light of these authorities, I must return to the facts of the present case. It may be convenient to repeat a few sentences from para 30 of the award:

> I am satisfied that this commercial absurdity is not justified by a proper interpretation of the decided cases. I consider that the analogy of a contract between master and servant applies more closely to a time charter than the analogy of a simple debt. The owner supplies the vessel and crew; the charterer supplies fuel oil, pays disbursements and gives orders.
>
> The charterers were also able to satisfy me that at that stage the owners had no legitimate interest in pursuing their claim for hire rather than a claim for damages.
> In these respects the present case differs materially from the case of White and Carter v McGregor, and is more closely analogous to the case of The Puerto Buitrago where the judgments of Lord Denning and Lord Orr are particularly in point.

It seems to me that the arbitrator is here distinguishing clearly between the two observations or limitations on the general principle to which Lord Reid had drawn attention in his speech. He is saying that a time charter is more analogous to a contract between master and servant than a simple debt, that is, that it is a contract which calls for co-operation between both parties. He is also saying – "The charterers were also able to satisfy me" – that the owners had no legitimate interest in pursuing their claim for hire as distinct from damages. I will take the legitimate interest point first.

In addition to arguing that what Lord Reid had said about legitimate interest was only a quotation from counsel, and in any event obiter – arguments with which I have already dealt – counsel for the owners submitted that Lord Reid was, quite simply, wrong. It seems to me that it would be difficult for me to take that view in the light of what was said by all three members of the Court of Appeal in The Puerto Buitrago. Whether one takes Lord Reid's language, which was adopted by Orr and Browne LJJ in The Puerto Buitrago, or Lord Denning MR's language in that case ("in all reason"), or Kerr J's language in The Odenfeld ("wholly unreasonable, quite unrealistic, unreasonable and untenable"), there comes a point at which the court will cease, on general equitable principles, to allow the innocent party to enforce his contract according to its strict legal terms. How [137] one defines that point is obviously a matter of some difficulty; for it involves drawing a line between conduct which is merely unreasonable (see per Lord Reid in White and Carter v McGregor criticising the Lord President in Langford Co Ltd v Dutch) and conduct which is wholly unreasonable: see per Kerr J in The Odenfeld. But however difficult it may be to define the point, that there is such a point seems to me to have been accepted both by the Court of Appeal in The Puerto Buitrago and by Kerr J in The Odenfeld.

I appreciate that the House of Lords has recently re-emphasised the importance of certainty in commercial contracts, when holding that there is no equitable jurisdiction to relieve against the consequences of the withdrawal clause in a time charter: Scandinavian Trading Tanker Co AB v Flota Petrolera Ecuatoriana (The Scaptrade) [1983] 1 Lloyd's Rep 146. I appreciate, too, that the importance of certainty was one of the main reasons urged by Lord Hodson in White and Carter v McGregor in upholding the innocent party's unfettered right to elect. But for reasons already mentioned, it seems to me that this court is bound to hold that there is some fetter, if only in extreme cases; and for want of a better way of describing that fetter, it is safest for this court to use the language of Lord Reid, which, as I have already mentioned, was adopted by a majority of the Court of Appeal in The Puerto Buitrago.

I would add only two observations of my own. First, although the point is sometimes put in terms of the innocent party being obliged to accept the repudiation (it is so put by the arbitrator in the last sentence of para 31 of his award), I think it is more accurate to say that it is the court which, on equitable grounds, refuses to allow the innocent party to enforce his full contractual rights. It is, as Sachs LJ said in Decro-Wall the range of remedies which is limited, not the right to elect. The court is not exercising a dispensing power; nor is it rewriting an improvident contract. It is simply refusing a certain kind of relief. In America, the courts take the uncomplicated view that whether the repudiation is accepted or not, the innocent party is always obliged to mitigate his damages: see Williston on Contracts, para 1298; Corbin on Contracts, para 983; Professor Sir AL Goodhart (1962) 78 LQR 263 at 267.

Second, on the point of uncertainty, it is of course true that the existence of a fetter on the right to claim hire, even if it only be exercised in extreme cases, necessarily introduces an element of uncertainty. Thus it can be said with force that bankers need to know where they are when accepting an assignment of charter hire as security for their loan. On the other hand, absolute certainty can never be attained. Mr Cooke gave as an example the doctrine of frustration which may import a degree of uncertainty into commercial contracts of all kinds …

On the facts of The Odenfeld, Kerr J held on various grounds that the owners had ample justification for enforcing their claim for hire, at least until September 1976, although he went on to hold that the owners must be taken to have accepted the charterers' repudiation when they laid up the vessel in July 1976. Kerr J did not use the language of "legitimate interest". But he must be taken to have found that the charterers had failed to prove absence of legitimate interest on the part of the owners in claiming hire. One of the grounds on which Kerr J so found was the difficulty in calculating damages.

In the present case, by contrast, the arbitrator has found, and found clearly, that the owners had no legitimate interest in pursuing their claim for hire. In my view that finding is conclusive of this appeal …

[139] For the reasons I have given I would dismiss the charterers' appeal and uphold the award.

Appeal dismissed.

For further discussion of the issues raised in this case, see Carter, "White & Carter v McGregor – How Unreasonable" (2012) 118 Law Quarterly Review 490; Liu, "The White & Carter Principle: A Restatement" (2011) 74 Modern Law Review 171.

PENALTIES AND THE ACCELERATION OF A DEBT

[29.120] In O'Dea v Allstates Leasing System (WA) Pty Ltd (1983) 152 CLR 359, 366, Gibbs CJ approved the principle that:

> [I]f a sum of money is payable by instalments, and it is provided that in the event of one instalment not being punctually paid the whole sum shall immediately become payable, the acceleration of payment is not a penalty: Protector Loan Co v Grice (1880) 5 QBD 592.

CHAPTER 30

Specific performance and injunctions

[30.10] SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE 835
[30.15] Dougan v Ley 835
[30.45] INJUNCTIONS 839
[30.45] Curro v Beyond Productions Pty Ltd 839
[30.60] DAMAGES UNDER LORD CAIRNS' ACT 844
[30.65] Supreme Court Act 1986 (Vic), s 38 844
[30.70] JC Williamson v Lukey & Mulholland 844

[30.05] In most cases, a plaintiff complaining of a breach of contract will be limited to the common law remedy of damages. The equitable remedy of specific performance is available only where damages will not be adequate, such as where the subject matter of the contract is unique (see Dougan v Ley (1946) 71 CLR 142, extracted at [30.15]). Specific performance is most commonly granted in respect of contracts for the sale of land. The courts are less restrictive in their approach to granting injunctions to restrain breaches of contract but will generally grant an injunction only in respect of a negative stipulation, that is, a promise not to do something (see Curro v Beyond Productions Pty Ltd (1993) 30 NSWLR 337, extracted at [30.45] and JC Williamson Ltd v Lukey & Mulholland (1931) 45 CLR 282, extracted at [30.70]).

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE

[30.10] There are three essential requirements for a decree of specific performance: the contract must have been made for valuable consideration, it must be enforceable (in the sense of not being subject to any of the vitiating factors discussed in Part IX) and damages must, in the circumstances, be inadequate. Specific performance is a discretionary remedy, and the court will take a wide range of factors into account in exercising its discretion. These include the likelihood that the continued supervision of the court will be required to enforce the decree, whether the contract involves the performance of personal services, whether the plaintiff has delayed in seeking relief, whether the plaintiff is in breach of the contract, whether the plaintiff is ready and willing to perform, whether the decree would cause hardship to the defendant and whether the decree is likely to be futile. See JC Williamson Ltd v Lukey & Mulholland (1931) 45 CLR 282, extracted at [30.70].

Dougan v Ley

[30.15] Dougan v Ley (1946) 71 CLR 142 (High Court of Australia) – On Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Dougan (the appellant) verbally agreed to sell a taxi-cab, together with the benefit of registration and an operating licence, to Ley and Nash (the respondents) for a sum of £1,850. The applicable legislation provided that the registration and licence could only be transferred to a person who satisfied the Commissioner for Road Transport and Tramways that he was a fit and proper person to hold such registration and licence. The appellant refused to complete the transaction, and the respondents sought specific performance. The appellant claimed that an award of damages at common law would adequately compensate the respondents. Witnesses gave evidence that the number of licences to operate taxi-cabs in Sydney was limited to 950, that there were relatively few sales and that it was difficult to purchase a taxi-cab. One witness suggested that there were six persons desirous of purchasing a taxi-cab for every willing seller. A few days before the hearing, Ley and Nash bought another taxi-cab for £1,900. The trial judge, Roper J, decreed specific performance. Dougan appealed to the High Court of Australia.]

DIXON J: [148] Roper J, who heard the suit, declared that the agreement should be specifically performed and decreed the appellant to do all things and execute all documents which are proper and necessary in order to enable the plaintiffs to present a proper application to the Commissioner for Road Transport and Tramways for the granting of a transfer of the registration and licence of the taxi-cab, and further [149] decreed that in the event of such an application being granted the respondents should pay to the appellant the balance of purchase money due from them and that the appellant should thereupon deliver the taxi-cab to them (1945) 63 WN (NSW) 224.

[Dixon J reviewed the legislation governing the transfer of the registration and licence and continued:] It follows that the appellant is bound to take certain formal steps and the respondents, on their part, must satisfy the Commissioner of their fitness and that they will have the use, control and management of the vehicle. There is nothing in this, in respect of either side, calling for the continued supervision of the Court. The appeal is based primarily upon the contention that the contract is not one appropriate for the equitable remedy of specific performance.

The subject matter, it is said, is the sale of a chattel and, in general, a suit for the specific performance of an agreement to sell and deliver chattels will not be entertained. But, when the substance of the matter is considered, the agreement is not of this simple character. The legislation has resulted in a restriction upon the number of registered and licensed vehicles with which the calling of taxi-driving may be pursued. The contract is in fact for the transfer of a valuable privilege annexed to a chattel. Of the amount of the consideration, somewhat the greater part appears to represent the registration and licence and the lesser part the vehicle itself. The number of taxi-cabs licensed for the city and suburbs of Sydney which had not been already sold once since the commencement of Act No 22 of 1945 was shown to be only 880. Thirty-seven taxis had, according to the [150] evidence, been sold since that date and the prices paid for the licences of the vehicles were said to have averaged £1 318. The subject of the sale is thus shown to be a special right attached to a chattel, transferable only with it, and numerically restricted.

Though in earlier times the absence of an adequate theory of simple contract had led to the interposition of chancery on wider grounds, by the seventeenth century, if not before, it had come to be "taken for a good cause of dismission" of a bill "in most causes, to say that he" the plaintiff "hath remedy at the common law" (circa 1602) Cary 20; 21 ER 11. So it became the received doctrine that the foundation of decrees for specific performance was "that damages at law would not give the party the compensation to which he was entitled; that is, would not put him in a situation as beneficial to him as if the agreement were specifically performed" (per Lord Redesdale, Harnett v Yeilding (1805) 2 Sch & Lef 549, 553; 9 ER 98, 100, 101).

> The Court gives specific performance instead of damages, only when it can by that means do more perfect and complete justice (per Lord Selborne, Wilson v Northampton and Banbury Junction Railway Co (1874) LR 9 Ch 279, 284).

In the case of goods or securities obtainable upon the market, damages at law place the disappointed buyer or seller in as good a position as delivery of the articles or receipt of the price because it enables him to go upon the market. But damages at law for the refusal of a vendor of land to go on with the contract might not be a complete remedy to the purchaser, to whom the land might have a special value (Adderley v Dixon (1824) 1 Sim & St 607, 610; 57 ER 239, 240), and the vendor's failure to complete through defect of title left the purchaser without any adequate remedy at law (Flureau v Thornhill (1776) 2 Black W 1078, 96 ER 635; Bain v Fothergill (1874) LR 7 HL 158, 201, 207–10). But specific performance is also the right of a vendor of land against a defaulting purchaser. "It has been said, but has long since been overruled, that a seller may go to law, as he only wants the money, whereas the purchaser wants the estate; but a seller wants the exact sum agreed to be paid to him, and he wants to divest himself legally of the estate, which after the contract was no longer vested in him beneficially" (per Lord St Leonards, Eastern Counties Railway Co v Hawkes (1855) 5 HLC 331, 376; 10 ER 928, 945).

But apart from land, a contract for which has always been considered a proper subject of specific performance, the question raised for the Court of Chancery was to say in what circumstances equity [151] considered the purchaser entitled to the specific thing contracted to be sold or the vendor to divest himself of it and receive the price, rather than in either case being bound to accept damages as the price of the loss of the contract.

It was not difficult to say that a purchaser of "articles of unusual beauty rarity and distinction" was entitled to obtain them in specie (Falcke v Gray (1859) 4 Drew 651, 658; 62 ER 250, 252). Though a less obvious case, it was settled that "a certain number of railway shares of a particular description, which railway shares are limited in number" and are not to be obtained by going on the share market, are a subject in respect of which a contract of sale will be enforced specifically (Duncuft v Albrecht (1841) 12 Sim 189, 199; 59 ER 1104, 1108). But though it is within the power of a court of equity to decree specific performance of a contract for the sale and purchase of shares, yet when shares are dealt in largely on the market and anyone can go and buy them, there is no reason why they should not be in the same position as government stock is, in a contract for its sale and purchase (per Parker J, Stern v Schwabacher; Re Schwabacher (1907) 98 LT 127, 128). Where chattels are sold or otherwise disposed of by contract as part of the particular equipment of a business, there is ground for equity granting specific relief. There appears to be no direct case of specific performance, but compare North v Great Northern Railway Co (1860) 2 Giff 64, 68, 69; 66 ER 28, 30; Nutbrown v Thornton (1804) 10 Ves Jun 160; 32 ER 805.

In the present case I think that we should have no difficulty in concluding that, because of the limited number of vehicles registered and licensed as taxi-cabs, because of the extent to which the price represents the value of the licence, and because of the essentiality to the purchasers' calling of the chattel and the licence annexed thereto, we should treat the contract as within the scope of the remedy of specific performance.

An answer was attempted on the part of the appellant to the effect that the respondents in fact succeeded in buying another taxi-cab. This, I think, is not material. It was not an election on their part to obtain a substitute at the expense, in damages, of the appellant. They were entitled to obtain an additional car, if they could, for their business without prejudicing their right to obtain in specie the taxi-cab registration and licence already contracted for.

An argument was advanced that there was a lack of mutuality because, as against the respondents as purchasers, the contract could [152] not be enforced without a continued supervision or superintendence, which the Court would not undertake: cf Peto v Brightons Uckfield and Tunbridge Wells Railway Co (1863) 1 H & M 468; 71 ER 205; Pickering v Bishop of Ely (1843) 2 Y & CCC 249, 266–8; 63 ER 108, 117, 118. But it is evident from the nature of the statutory provision that the argument is misconceived. All the respondents must do is to submit the materials for satisfying the Commissioner. If they fail to satisfy him the decree has no further operation ….

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

[30.20] WILLIAMS J: [153] It is clear that the Court of Equity will not decree specific performance of a contract where a money payment, or in other words damages, will afford an adequate remedy for the breach, and that this is the position in the case of most forms of personal property, such as goods which can be readily purchased in the market and Government stock and shares in listed companies which can be readily purchased on the Stock Exchange. But it is equally clear that the Court of Equity will decree specific performance of contracts for the sale of chattels which are unique or have for some other reason a special or peculiar value. The contract of 2nd November was not a mere contract for the purchase of a chattel. It was a contract for the purchase of a chattel adapted to carry on a particular business, and of the registration and licence without which that business could not be carried on. It was therefore a contract of a composite character. The evidence shows that if the purchase money had been apportioned, the greater sum would have been attributable to the purchase of the registration and licence. This registration and licence were both capable of being renewed annually and of being transferred to another vehicle which replaced the existing taxi-cab.

The Court of Equity can intervene to protect the rights of persons who have interests in licences which are necessary to enable them to carry on business (Leney & Sons Ltd v Callingham and Thompson [1908] 1 KB 79, 85). It can also intervene where chattels are of special value to a person in order to carry on his business (North v Great Northern Railway Co (1860) 2 Giff, at 68; 66 ER, 30). The present composite contract incorporates both these features. The fact that there were a number of other taxi-cabs whose registrations and licences were still capable of being transferred at the date of the suit and that the respondents might have purchased one of these cabs in lieu of the appellant's vehicle is immaterial. It is equally immaterial that the respondents, after suit brought, managed to purchase another taxi-cab. If personal [154] property is of such a nature that it can be the subject matter of a suit for specific performance, the subsequent purchase of similar property could no more affect the rights of the purchaser to specific performance than the subsequent purchase of another block of entirely comparable land in a subdivision adjoining the block already purchased could affect the right of the purchaser to have the previous contract specifically performed. I agree with his Honour's statement that "this particular chattel, with the rights which come from registration and the licence as a taxi-cab, is of such a nature that this Court can properly entertain a suit for specific performance in regard to this sale".

I also agree with him that the second ground fails …. Where the steps which are required to obtain the consent are defined and capable of supervision it is well within the competence of the Court of Equity to compel the parties to take such steps. In the present case it is the respondents who must attempt to satisfy the Commissioner in the two respects already mentioned. They must place before him such evidence as he may reasonably require for this purpose. An order that the respondents should do so would be analogous to the order set out in Egan v Ross (1928) 29 SR (NSW) 382, 388. The contract was not, therefore, wanting in mutuality at the date that it was made. But even if it had been, the better opinion would appear to be that a contract is capable of being specifically performed if, notwithstanding that it was not mutually enforceable at that date, it has become mutually enforceable at the date the suit is [155] instituted. Even if the respondents could not have been ordered to take such steps in a suit instituted by the vendor, they have offered by their statement of claim to do everything that is necessary to complete the contract. There was, therefore, no want of mutuality from the date the suit was brought (Queensland Insurance Co Ltd v Australian Mutual Fire Insurance Society Ltd (1941) 41 SR (NSW) 195, 202; Hume v Munro [No 2] (1943) 67 CLR 461, 483, 484).

For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

[RICH J delivered a judgment in which he reached the same result. STARKE J agreed that the appeal should be dismissed, for the reasons given by the trial judge. MCTIERNAN J agreed with Dixon J.]

Appeal dismissed.

INJUNCTIONS

Curro v Beyond Productions Pty Ltd

[30.45] Curro v Beyond Productions Pty Ltd (1993) 30 NSWLR 337 (New South Wales Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Cole J.

[FACTS: Tracey Curro, a television presenter, and her company Talking Heads Productions (the defendants/appellants) entered into contracts with Beyond Productions, the producer of the documentary program "Beyond 2000" (the plaintiff/respondent). The service agreement with Miss Curro obliged her (cl 1) to provide her services to assist in the presentation of the program "Beyond 2000".

She also agreed that she would not (cl 2(iii)):

> … engage in any other presentation activity during the term of this Agreement, including the making of any advertisement or commercial announcement whether for use on television or radio or in the print media or any exploitation of her role as a presenter of the Programs without the prior written consent of Beyond, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld.

The services agreement of the same date between the defendants and Beyond provided (cl 1) that Talking Heads would provide the services of Miss Curro as writer/producer to assist in the writing of the scripts for segments of the programs and the production of such segments.

By cl 2(iii) of the services agreement, Miss Curro promised "not to enter into any engagement or carry on any activity which might reasonably be expected to prevent her from rendering to Beyond her services under this Agreement".

The contracts were made in August 1991 for an original term of one year. Beyond had options to renew the contracts in July 1992 and July 1993 for further one-year terms. Beyond exercised the 1992 option, so the contracts were due to expire in August 1993 or August 1994 if Beyond exercised the final option in July 1993.

On 29 January 1993, Miss Curro advised Beyond that she had been approached by Channel 9 (Nine) to work as a television reporter for its program "60 Minutes" and that she wished to accept the offer. On 15 February, Miss Curro and Talking Heads entered into contracts with Nine to work on "60 Minutes". On 31 March, Cole J granted orders restraining the defendant, Miss Curro, from acting in breach of the negative promises in her contracts with the plaintiff. The defendants appealed. They argued that the promises were void as unreasonable restraints of trade and that the court could not properly enforce them by injunction. The appeal was heard by Meagher, Handley and Cripps JJA. The Court of Appeal handed down its judgment on 7 May.]

THE COURT:

Restraint of trade

[341] The appellants' submission on this issue was that the agreements as a whole, or in the alternative the negative promises in cl 2(iii) in each contract were void as unreasonable restraints of trade. There is a preliminary question whether the restraint of trade principles apply at all in the present case. In Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd [1968] AC 269, 328–9, Lord Pearce said:

> The doctrine does not apply to ordinary commercial contracts for the regulation and promotion of trade during the existence of the contract, provided that any prevention of work outside the contract, [342] viewed as a whole, is directed towards the absorption of the parties' services and not their sterilisation. Sole agencies are a normal and necessary incident of commerce and those who desire the benefits of a sole agency must deny themselves the opportunities of other agencies. So, too, in the case of a film-star who may tie herself to a company in order to obtain from them the benefits of stardom ….

When a contract only ties the parties during the continuance of the contract, and the negative ties are only those which are incidental and normal to the positive commercial arrangements at which the contract aims, even though those ties exclude all dealings with others, there is no restraint of trade within the meaning of the doctrine and no question of reasonableness arises … if during the contract one of the parties is too unilaterally fettered so that the contract loses its character of a contract for the regulation and promotion of trade and acquires the predominant character of a contract in restraint of trade. In that case … the question whether it is reasonable arises. See also at 294, 307, 320, 336 and Queensland Co-operative Milling Association v Pamag Pty Ltd (1973) 133 CLR 260, Amoco Australia Pty Ltd v Rocca Bros Motor Engineering Co Pty Ltd (1973) 133 CLR 288 and Quadramain Pty Ltd v Sevastopol Investments Pty Ltd (1976) 133 CLR 390. There is much to be said for the view that no question of restraint of trade arises at all in this case, but we will consider the submissions of the appellants on the assumption that it does.

The contracts were said to be unreasonable because Beyond was not bound by their terms to provide Miss Curro or Talking Heads with any work. It could simply elect to pay their remuneration, give them no work, and keep Miss Curro's talents "sterilised" for up to three years …. Ordinarily an employee cannot demand to be given work and the obligation of the employer is limited to payment of the agreed remuneration: Turner v Sawdon & Co [1901] 2 KB 653. As Dixon J said, this is an application of the principle that "they also serve who only stand and wait": see Automatic Fire Sprinklers Pty Ltd v Watson (1946) 72 CLR 435, 467. However there is a well-established exception to this general rule in the case of actors and others in a similar position who are vitally interested in opportunities to perform or exercise a skill or talent in public … [343] Success as a television presenter no less than as an actor or actress, in the words of Sir John Romilly MR "entirely depends on pleasing the public and upon being constantly before the public": Fechter v Montgomery (1863) 33 Beav 22,; 55 ER 274, 276 and see Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks (1951) 83 CLR 322, 338. In the circumstances the presumed intention of the parties was that Beyond impliedly contracted to give Miss Curro a reasonable opportunity of performing services of the kind specified in Schedule 1 of the agreements and of appearing before the public. This did not mean that she was entitled to appear as host or presenter in any particular program since Beyond retained a broad [344] managerial discretion to make use of her services as and when required: see also Grimston v Cuningham [1894] 1 QB 125. However she was entitled to be given work of appropriate quality to keep her name and talents before the public with reasonable frequency.

In our opinion therefore Beyond had no contractual right to sterilise Miss Curro's services and keep her away from the viewing public. On the contrary any attempt by Beyond to act in that way would be a repudiatory breach entitling Miss Curro to rescind and sue for damages: see Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks (especially at 337–8). The contracts as such are therefore not in unreasonable restraint of trade.

The next question is whether the negative promises themselves are unreasonable restraints of trade. The question that must be asked is whether those restrictions exceed what is reasonably necessary for the protection of the legitimate interests of Beyond: see Buckley v Tutty (1971) 125 CLR 353 at 376 and A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay (formerly Instone) [1974] 1 WLR 1308, 1310. The onus of establishing the reasonableness of the restraint lies upon the party seeking its enforcement: Buckley v Tutty (at 377). The validity of the restraint is to be tested at the time of entering into the contract and by reference to what the restraint entitles or requires the parties to do rather than what they intend to do or have actually done: Adamson v New South Wales Rugby League Ltd (1991) 31 FCR 242, 285 per Gummow J. Further, as Lord Pearce said in Esso Petroleum Co Ltd v Harper's Garage (Stourport) Ltd (at 323): "It is important that the court, in weighing the question of reasonableness, should give full weight to commercial practices and to the generality of contracts made freely by parties bargaining on equal terms."

See also Queensland Co-operative Milling Association v Pamag Pty Ltd (at 268) and A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay (formerly Instone) (at 1314).

The negative promises in this case do not continue in force after the contracts have expired. It is therefore necessary to identify the legitimate interests of Beyond while the contracts are on foot which would be protected by those promises. Beyond would always have an interest in protecting its investment in unfinished stories on which Miss Curro had been engaged, it might need her services for further filming or voice-over recording and therefore had a real interest in her fulfilling her contractual obligations in relation to those stories. When Miss Curro and Talking Heads repudiated their contracts Beyond had twenty-one unfinished stories on which she had worked. At that stage these would have taken ten weeks to script and post-production work would have required further time after that. As at 25 February, the date for compilation of Miss Curro's last story was scheduled for 9 June with a tentative on-air date of 3 July. When the trial started there were still some fourteen unfinished stories for which she had been responsible. Although Nine agreed to her working for Beyond after 15 March to finish these stories, this was conditional upon that work not interfering with her obligations to 60 Minutes. It is clear that there would always be a substantial interval between the commencement of work by Miss Curro on a story and the date when it would be broadcast.

[345] Beyond also had an interest in retaining Miss Curro's services and preventing her from appearing on a rival television program because of its obligations to Seven. The contract with Seven required Beyond to use its best endeavours to ensure that its presenters did not appear in other television programs or in television, radio or theatrical commercials without the written consent of Seven which it undertook not to unreasonably withhold. Beyond cannot replace a presenter without the written consent of Seven which again, cannot be unreasonably withheld. Moreover his Honour was entitled to conclude as he did that Beyond has its own interest in its presenters not appearing on shows such as 60 Minutes while their stories were appearing on Beyond 2000 because of the differences between the two programs. Beyond had previously refused to consent to Miss Curro producing an advertisement for skin lotions because they were seen as inconsistent with the reputation of Beyond 2000 for objectivity, integrity, and scientific accuracy. Miss Curro accepted that Beyond's concerns in relation to those advertisements were genuine and realistic.

Negative promises of this type, express or implied, are common in the entertainment industry. They date back to Lumley v Wagner (1852) 1 De GM & G 604; 42 ER 687, or earlier and were found in the contracts in White v Australian and New Zealand Theatres Ltd and Associated Newspapers Ltd v Bancks. Indeed, Miss Curro accepted greater contractual restrictions in the contracts she entered into with Nine in February.

Beyond was obliged to give Miss Curro a reasonable opportunity to do her work. Any sterilisation of her services would result from a calculated decision by her to withdraw them from Beyond. Beyond had legitimate commercial reasons for including those negative promises in the agreements. Miss Curro had competent legal advice from her husband and her solicitor before she entered into the contracts. The parties were in an equal bargaining position and at the time Miss Curro had another offer of employment at higher remuneration. She did not then object to the restraints or seek to have them modified. In these circumstances we agree with Cole J that the negative promises were not unreasonable restraints of trade.

Mr Campbell relied on the decision of the House of Lords in A Schroeder Music Publishing Co Ltd v Macaulay (formerly Instone). A twenty-one year old composer signed an agreement to provide his exclusive services to the publisher for five years and assigned to it the world copyright in his compositions during that period. His remuneration consisted only of royalties on published works but the publishers were under no obligation to publish. They had, but the composer did not, the right to terminate the agreement at any time on one month's notice. If the composer's royalties exceeded £5 000 during the term of the contract it was automatically extended for a further five years. The House of Lords had little difficulty affirming the unanimous decisions below and holding that the restraints on the composer were contrary to public policy and void. Lord Reid said (at 1314; 622):

> Any contract by which a person engages to give his exclusive services to another for a period necessarily involves extensive restriction during that period of the common law right to exercise any lawful activity he chooses in such manner as he thinks best. Normally the doctrine of restraint of trade has no application to such restrictions: they require no [346] justification. But if contractual restrictions appear to be unnecessary or … oppressive … they must be justified before they can be enforced.

He later described the agreement in that case, not unfairly one might think, as "one-sided" (at 1315; 622). That decision is of no assistance to Miss Curro in this case, except by way of contrast. Her negative promises are neither unnecessary nor oppressive.

The appellants relied upon Miss Curro's so-called right to work as entitling her to change jobs without being restrained from breaching her contractual obligations which might otherwise stand in the way. However as Hohfeld demonstrated long ago there is no such right in the strict sense, merely liberty, and this distinction has been recognised by the courts. In Forbes v New South Wales Trotting Club Ltd (1979) 143 CLR 242, 260–1, Barwick CJ said:

> … To convert the doctrine that … there should be no unreasonable restraint on employment into a doctrine that every man has a "right to work", is, in my opinion, to depart radically from … the common law … It is in the public interest that a man should be able to exercise his capacity to work. The law does not enforce a right to exercise that capacity: it does no more than remove the unreasonable impediment upon its exercise.

This passage was approved in Hepples v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1992) 173 CLR 492, 502, 527, 549.

Injunctions

[30.50] Cole J granted the injunctions pursuant to the doctrine of Lumley v Wagner. The appellants challenge both the continuing authority of that case and its applicability in the present circumstances. In our view Cole J was correct, and the challenges to his judgment on these bases must fail.

Whilst it would be impossible in the time available to make a detailed analysis of all the relevant cases, or even to discuss adequately those which were referred to, we shall endeavour to state in a concise form what we understand to be the law on this topic. Until recently, it could be summarised as reflecting three principles: first, that under the doctrine enunciated by Lord Cairns LC in Doherty v Allman (1878) 3 App Cas 709, 720, a court of equity would always grant an injunction to enforce a negative contractual promise made for consideration; secondly, that, by way of exception a negative promise would not be enforced by injunction if that would have the practical effect of compelling specific performance of a contract of personal service or if it would force the defendant either to perform that contract or remain idle (with overtones of destitution); and thirdly, by way of exception to the exception, in the case of special services a promise not to take employment with a competitor, would, under the doctrine of Lumley v Wagner, be restrained.

It is no longer possible to state the law with such precision. The first rule enunciated in Doherty v Allman can no longer be maintained. Academic writers have long doubted the principle expressed in such wide terms and the High Court has now rejected it: Dalgety Wine Estates Pty Ltd v Rizzon (1979) 141 CLR 552. The second rule has been departed from in England in Hill v CA Parsons & Co Ltd [1972] Ch 305 which was followed in Evans Marshall & Co Ltd v Bertola SA [1973] 1 WLR 349 at 379–80; [1973] 1 All ER 992, 1005 [347] and by the Federal Court in Turner v A/asian Coal and Shale Employees' Federation (1984) 6 FCR 177, 192–3 and Gregory v Philip Morris Ltd (1988) 80 ALR 455, 481–2.

As to the third rule, which is in question here, Lumley v Wagner has been much discussed. It has, with varying degrees of enthusiasm, been followed by Australian courts. This is so in New South Wales (see Atlas Steels (Australia) Pty Ltd v Atlas Steels Ltd (1948) 49 SR (NSW) 157; Warner Brothers Pictures Inc v Ingolia [1965] NSWR 988, Harrigan v Brown [1967] 1 NSWR 342), in Victoria (see Buckenara v Hawthorn Football Club Ltd [1988] VR 39, Hawthorn Football Club Ltd v Harding [1988] VR 49), and in England (Warner Brothers Pictures, Inc v Nelson [1937] 1 KB 209). The argument for the appellants that this Court should not follow Lumley v Wagner cannot be accepted.

Lumley v Wagner concerned a contract by which Mme Wagner, a famous German opera singer, promised to sing operatic roles for the plaintiff at Her Majesty's Theatre for a three months [sic] season. It contained a provision that she would sing nowhere else during the contract; she threatened to commit a breach of the contract by singing for a rival impresario at Covent Garden and the court restrained the breach.

The doctrine has always been said to apply to contracts for "special services". This includes contracts by opera singers (Lumley v Wagner), movie stars (Warner Brothers v Nelson), actresses (Warner Brothers v Ingolia), rock singers (Harrigan v Brown), football players (Buckenara v Hawthorn Football Club, Hawthorn Football Club v Harding) and newspaper production managers (Evening Standard Co Ltd v Henderson [1987] ICR 588). How many other occupations fit within this category can be left to the course of subsequent decisions. Learned counsel for the appellants argued that one reason why Lumley v Wagner should be rejected is that no satisfactory definition of "special services" can be formulated. That is true but it is also true that of many other terms of practical utility, both non-legal (for example, beauty, elegance) and legal (for example, reasonableness, unconscionability).

Lord St Leonards LC in Lumley v Wagner pointed out that the injunction would not compel Mme Wagner to perform her contract with Mr Lumley. Failure to sing for Mr Lumley would not be a breach of the injunction. On the other hand, on the facts in that case obedience to the injunction would not confront her with a choice between service with Mr Lumley and destitute idleness. She could employ her energies in some other occupation or perhaps return to Germany. The injunction was also of short duration. The contract was for three months from 1 April 1852. The Vice-Chancellor granted an injunction on 8 May, and the Chancellor dismissed Miss [sic] Wagner's appeal on 26 May. There was therefore no impediment to the court taking the attitude to defendants in Mme Wagner's position that "it will not suffer them to depart from their contracts at their pleasure, leaving the party with whom they have contracted to the mere chance of any damages which a jury may give. The exercise of this jurisdiction has, I believe, had a wholesome tendency towards the maintenance of … good faith" (at 619; 693). This rationale for such injunctions should be emphasised as learned counsel for the appellants at times seemed aghast at the suggestion that a court of equity should hold parties to their contracts.

In some cases an attempt to obtain an injunction based on Lumley v [348] Wagner has failed. One such decision is Page One Records Ltd v Britton [1968] 1 WLR 157. A group of "musicians" promised not to employ another manager during the four years of their contract with the plaintiff. The court refused to restrain the "musicians" from continuing a clear breach of this promise. However, there were significant features which distinguish it from Lumley v Wagner and other cases in which an injunction has been granted. The injunction sought was for four years which is a long time in this context, and it would have compelled the defendants to re-employ the plaintiff or go out of business. In Warren v Mendy [1989] 1 WLR 853, the Court of Appeal refused to restrain a boxer from employing a new manager, but again the decision is explicable on the facts: the injunction sought was for about two and a half years; the defendant acted in good faith, his relationship with the plaintiff broke down before he sought a new manager, a boxer has a very short career, and the trial judge had found that an injunction would compel the defendant to perform a contract for personal services. These decisions do not justify the conclusion urged on us by learned counsel for the appellants that some modern "rule" has displaced Lumley v Wagner.

The appellant also relied on a lack of mutuality. This however is a discretionary and not an absolute defence to proceedings such as these. As Nourse LJ said in Warren v Mendy (at 866; 113): "… We very much doubt whether a want of mutuality alone would now be decisive in a case of (this) kind."

We are of the view that the authorities establish that in a Lumley v Wagner case, an injunction will still be granted when the balance of discretionary factors is in the plaintiff's favour. In the present case, to grant the injunction sought is not to order specific performance of the service and services contracts. Miss Curro could comply with the injunctions without resuming work for Beyond. She would not be forced to choose between service with Beyond or idleness. Other employments would be open to her. There is no question of her being destitute. Damages would not be an adequate remedy.

… The injunctions do no more than oblige Miss Curro to comply with negative promises which are part of a fair and freely negotiated bargain made less than two years ago. We see no reason at all why she should not be ordered to keep her word. These considerations alone would require that any judicial discretion be exercised in its favour.

Appeal dismissed.

[30.55] Note

The fascinating background to Lumley v Wagner (1852) 1 De GM & G 604; 42 ER 687 is discussed by SM Waddams, "Johanna Wagner and the Rival Opera Houses" (2001) 117 Law Quarterly Review 431.

DAMAGES UNDER LORD CAIRNS' ACT

[30.60] Legislation in each Australian State and Territory empowers the court to grant damages either in addition to or instead of specific performance or an injunction. These provisions are based on English legislation known as Lord Cairns' Act (Chancery Amendment Act 1858 (Imp) 21 & 22 Vict c 27). The power to grant "equitable damages" or "Lord Cairns' Act damages" is particularly important where damages are unavailable at common law (because the contract fails to comply with a statutory requirement of writing), but specific performance is unsuitable in the circumstances. Damages in lieu of specific performance were granted in Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387, extracted at [9.35].

The Victorian provision is set out following this section. Equivalent provisions are: Supreme Court Act 1970 (NSW), s 68; Civil Proceedings Act 2011 (Qld), s 8; Supreme Court Act 1935 (SA), s 30; Supreme Court Civil Procedure Act 1932 (Tas), s 11(13); Supreme Court Act 1935 (WA), s 25(10). For the Australian Capital Territory and Northern Territory, see Supreme Court Act 1933 (ACT), ss 26 and 27; Supreme Court Act (NT), ss 14(1)(b), 62 and 63 and see Brooks v Wyatt (1994) 99 NTR 12, 27–28.

[30.65] Supreme Court Act 1986 (Vic), s 38.

> 38. Damages in addition to or in place of other remedies
>
> If the Court has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction or specific performance, it may award damages in addition to, or in substitution for, an injunction or specific performance.

JC Williamson v Lukey & Mulholland

[30.70] JC Williamson Ltd v Lukey & Mulholland (1931) 45 CLR 282 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: JC Williamson Ltd (the defendant/appellant), who was the lessee of a theatre, entered into an oral agreement with Lukey and Mulholland (the plaintiffs/respondents). It was agreed that the respondents would take over the lease of a shop near the theatre, and during the term of the lease, they would, in return for a fee paid to the appellant, have the exclusive right to sell "confectionary, ice-cream and non-intoxicating drinks" in the theatre. The other conditions were not expressly agreed, but the parties understood from their experience that:

- the appellants were required to employ a sufficient number of staff to carry around confectionary and drinks;

- the dress, deportment and conduct of the staff would be under the control of the theatre manager;
- the appellants would be obliged to maintain an adequate supply of confectionary of the kind and quality usually sold in the theatre; and
- on compliance with these conditions, the appellants would admit the respondents and their staff into the theatre from the time it opened until a reasonable time after the last interval.

The appellant terminated the agreement before the term expired and granted exclusive "sweet rights" to another party. The respondents sought:

1. specific performance of the agreement;
2. an injunction to restrain the appellant from preventing the plaintiffs from exercising the right to sell sweets;
3. an injunction to prevent the appellant from granting exclusive rights to the other party; or
4. damages.

The trial judge, Lowe J, found that the contract was "an agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year" which was unenforceable under s 128 of the Instruments Act 1928 (Vic) in the absence of a note or memorandum in writing. Since there was part performance of the agreement, however, Lowe J awarded damages in lieu of an injunction under s 62(4) of the Supreme Court Act 1928 (the applicable Lord Cairns' Act provision). An appeal to the High Court was successful.]

STARKE J: [291] It is clear enough, in the case of some oral contracts, that if they be partly performed by one of the parties, that may in equity preclude the other from denying the contract or relying upon the Statute of Frauds, and Lowe J held that this doctrine applied to all contracts in which a Court of equity would entertain a suit if the alleged contract had been in writing (Donnell v Bennett [1883] 22 Ch D 835; Metropolitan Electric Supply Co v Ginder [1901] 2 Ch 799, 808; Fry on Specific Performance, 6th ed, p 283, s 593). This proposition goes beyond any decided case (see McManus v Cooke [1887] 35 Ch D 681), but, as Fry J said, the authorities are tending in that direction. However, I accept the proposition for the purposes of this case. Would then a Court of equity have entertained a suit upon the agreement found by the learned Judge? Courts of equity have, no doubt, exercised jurisdiction to enforce contracts specifically and to restrain the breach of contracts which such a Court would specifically enforce and to restrain the breach of negative stipulations in contracts whether in the particular case the Court would or would not specifically enforce the whole contract (Doherty v Allman [1878] 3 AC 709; McEacharn v Colton [1902] AC 104; Lumley v Wagner (1852) 1 De GM & G 604; 42 ER 687; Whitwood Chemical Co v Hardman [1891] 2 Ch 416; Manchester Ship Canal Co v Manchester Racecourse Co [1901] 2 Ch 37). But over and over again it is asserted in the books that a Court of equity will not compel one party to perform his part of a contract unless justice can be done as regards the other party (Kernot v Potter (1862) 3 De GF & J 447; 45 ER 951; Stocker v Wedderburn (1857) 3 K & J 393; 69 ER 1162; Frith v Frith [1906] AC 254). Nor will it as a rule enforce [293] contracts of personal service or any other contract the execution whereof would require continued superintendence by the Court (Ryan v Mutual Tontine Westminster Chambers Association [1893] 1 Ch 116; Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association v New York Life Insurance Co (1896) 75 LT 528; South Wales Railway Co v Wythes (1854) 5 De GM & G 880; 43 ER 1112).

The enforcement of the stipulations in the agreement found in the present case relating to the lease do not call for consideration: they have been carried out. The "sweet rights" stipulated for in the agreement are, therefore, all that need be considered. I pass by possible vagueness of the agreement in relation to these rights: how far the parties stipulated, if at all, for the control of such rights by the appellant. And I assume that it would have been enforceable by law if it, or a note or memorandum thereof, had been in writing. It is clear that the Statute of Frauds is a complete answer at law to any action for damages arising from breach of the agreement. Again, it is clear, on the principles already referred to, that no Court of equity would have enforced, specifically or by way of injunction, the right of the respondents to sell sweets in the theatre. Nor would any such Court have enforced the right of the appellant to supervise and control the right of selling sweets in the theatre.

The enforcement of either right would have required a continued and effective superintendence of acts and services which would be impossible for any Court. So we limit our consideration to the stipulation that the respondents should have the exclusive right to sell sweets in the theatre. This positive stipulation imports the negative that no other person should be allowed the right of selling sweets in the theatre. Indeed, the substance of the stipulation is that no other person should be allowed to sell sweets in the theatre: Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Co v London and North-Western Railway Co (1873) 16 Eq 433; Manchester Ship Canal Co v Manchester Racecourse Co [1901] 2 Ch 37; Metropolitan Electric Supply Co Ltd v Ginder [1901] 2 Ch 799). Lowe J concluded that a Court of equity had authority to and would enforce such a stipulation, though it would not or could not otherwise enforce the agreement, specifically or by means of [294] an injunction. But it is just at this point that I am unable to agree with the learned Judge. His view really means that one stipulation of the sweets agreement can be enforced whilst every other stipulation is unenforceable, both at law and in equity. If parts of an agreement are separable and distinct from the rest, I can understand that a Court of equity might in a proper case enforce those parts and leave the parties to their remedies at law as to the rest of the agreement, especially where those remedies would be adequate and just. But it is contrary to all equitable principles to enforce part of an agreement and leave the parties without any remedy whatever as to all other obligations of that agreement. It would result substantially in very different legal obligations, and great injustice to both parties. In the present case the respondents would have no redress if the appellant refused to allow them to sell sweets in the theatre, and the appellant could not recover the charges payable in respect of the sweet rights or have any redress if the respondents violated its directions as to the dress, deportment and behaviour of their employees. Indeed, I dissent entirely from the notion that this agreement can be divided into two parts, one enforceable and the other wholly unenforceable. Consequently, in my opinion, a Court of equity would, in the case before us, have had no jurisdiction or authority whatever to enforce the stipulation giving the respondents the exclusive right of selling sweets in the theatre by restraining the appellant from permitting or allowing any other person to sell them. The Supreme Court Act 1928, s 62(4) (Lord Cairns' Act), gives power to the Court to award damages to a party injured in addition to or in substitution for an injunction restraining the breach of a contract. But under this section the respondents must make out that they are entitled to an equitable remedy before they can get damages (Elmore v Pirrie (1887) 57 LT 533). And damages at law for breach of the agreement they cannot have by reason of the Statute of Frauds. The result is that the judgment ought to be reversed, though I sympathize with the learned Judge in his anxiety to give legal effect to what, at least, was an honourable understanding between the parties, especially when its violation involved serious loss to the respondents.

[30.75] DIXON J: [295] By s 62(4) of the Supreme Court Act 1928 (Vic) it is enacted that in all cases in which the court entertains an application for an injunction against a breach of any covenant, contract or agreement, or against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act, or for the specific performance of any covenant, contract or agreement, the court may, if it thinks fit, award damages to the party injured either in addition to or in substitution for such injunction or specific performance, and such damages may be assessed in such manner as the court directs … That power is confined to cases in which there is a title to equitable relief, cases in which there are the ingredients that enable the court, if it thought fit, to exercise its power of decreeing specific performance or of granting an injunction: Ferguson v Wilson [1866] 2 Ch App 77.

By the judgment under appeal Lowe J exercised the authority given by the enactment and awarded damages in lieu of an injunction for breach of an agreement. He held, rightly, I think, that the agreement in question was one that was not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, but, notwithstanding [296] that the agreement was not in writing and there was no memorandum or note thereof, he considered that it might be enforced by injunction, because the plaintiff had acted in part performance of the agreement.

The question upon this appeal is whether an injunction might have been granted to enforce the agreement upon the ground of part performance. The defendant company, against which damages have been awarded in substitution for an injunction, was the lessee of a theatre where it conducted dramatic entertainments. Its directors were able to control the letting of a shop nearby in which confectionery was sold. The company entered into an oral agreement with the plaintiffs that, if they should take over an existing lease of this shop and take an extension of the lease for five years, the plaintiffs, during the term so extended in consideration of a weekly payment of £14 during the performance of musical comedy and of £12 during other performances, should have an exclusive right to sell confectionery, ice cream and non-intoxicating drinks to members of the audience in the theatre. The conditions involved were not discussed, but they seem to have been understood by the parties, who were experienced in such matters and were aware of the manner in which the sale of confectionery had been conducted in the theatre. It appears from the evidence that implied in the agreement were terms to the effect that the plaintiffs should have a movable stand and showcase near the entrance to the stalls and another at the dress circle; that they should employ a sufficient number of boys to carry round supplies of confectionery and drinks in the gallery; that the boys should be appropriately and uniformly clad in a manner approved by the manager of the theatre; that their conduct and deportment should be under the control of the manager of the theatre; that the plaintiffs should maintain a sufficient supply of a kind and quality of confectionery usually sold in the different parts of such a theatre, and that upon compliance with these conditions the plaintiffs and their servants should be admitted to the theatre and its precincts from the time when the theatre opened for a performance until a reasonable time after the last interval. A variation of the agreement was afterwards made by which the plaintiffs were allowed to put boys in the dress circle and stalls as well as in the gallery. It was also agreed that the boys [297] employed by the plaintiffs should be clothed in a particular uniform.

The plaintiffs entered upon the performance of the agreement, and by their servants, sold confectionery from the stands and showcases and in the auditory, and they duly made the weekly payments. But before the term of the agreement expired the company purported to bring it to an end, contending that no fixed period had been agreed upon, and so renounced the contract.

An action of damages could not but fail, because, when a common law remedy is sought, part performance never did and does not now afford an answer to the Statute of Frauds. Equitable relief is obtainable, notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds, by a party who in pursuance of his contract has done acts of performance consistent only with some such contract subsisting, but, if the doctrine is not confined to cases in which a decree might be made for the specific performance of the contract, it is at least true that the doctrine arose in the administration of that relief and has not been resorted to except for that purpose. It must be remembered that, although the remedy of specific performance is commonly applied in aid of a legal right, it extends to cases where, for one reason or another, there is no remedy at law, as well as to cases where the remedy at law is inadequate. See Fry on Specific Performance (6th ed), ss 49–60. But it is evident from a mere statement of the nature of the agreement in this case that it falls outside the scope of the remedy of specific performance. The parties meant their oral contract to be a final expression of obligation for the regulation of their future relations. It was not an agreement preliminary to a further transaction which, when carried out, should define their relative positions. Unlike a contract to assure property, it did not require the parties to adopt a formal instrument or to do some act in the law which should thereafter afford the measure of their rights and duties. Specific performance, in the proper sense, is a remedy to compel the execution in specie of a contract which requires some definite thing to be done before the transaction is complete and the parties' rights are settled and defined in the manner intended. Moreover, the remedy is not available unless complete relief can be given, and the contract carried into full and final execution so that the parties are put in the relation contemplated by their agreement. Specific performance is inapplicable when the [298] continued supervision of the court is necessary in order to ensure the fulfilment of the contract. It is not a form of relief which can be granted if the contract involves the performance by one party of services to the other or requires their continual co-operation. The doctrine of the Court of Chancery was against decreeing one party to perform specifically obligations which the contract imposed upon him, if it was unable to secure to him the performance by the other contracting party of the conditions upon which those obligations depended, and could only leave him to his action of damages at law in the event of the conditions being unperformed.

In the present case the condition of the contract which entitles the plaintiffs and their servants to admission for the purpose of selling confectionery in the theatre is concurrent with the conditions governing the time, place and manner of supply, the character of the goods supplied, and the appearance, dress and behaviour of their servants. It would be contrary to principle to bind the company by a decree to perform its obligations leaving it only a remedy sounding in damages in the event of a breach by the plaintiffs of the conditions to be observed by them. It would be equally contrary to principle for the court to undertake the supervision of the specific fulfilment of these conditions. It, therefore, could not be contended that a decree of specific performance might be made, and it was recognised that if the plaintiffs are entitled to any equitable remedy, it must be by way of injunction. But the reason why specific performance of the contract could not be decreed ought not to be forgotten in considering whether an injunction might be granted upon the ground of part performance. An injunction is a remedy appropriate to restrain the violation of a provision or term of a contract which is the final expression of the parties' legal relations. But, in granting an injunction for this purpose, the courts of equity acted in aid of a legal right. Before Sir John Rolt's Act (25 & 26 Vict c 42) a perpetual injunction was not granted restraining breaches of such an agreement until the right had been tried at law. The remedy of injunction was, of course, appropriate to and was and is freely used for the protection of equitable interests and rights, but in matters of contract, as in matters of tort, it does not appear to have been used except in aid of a legal right unless in a case falling within the [299] scope of the remedy of specific performance, for example, McManus v Cooke (1887) 35 Ch D 681 … If, however, a clear legal duty is imposed by contract to refrain from some act, then, prima facie, an injunction should go to restrain the doing of that act. It appears to be of little importance now whether the duty is imposed by a term of the contract expressed in negative or affirmative language.

It is said that the agreement in this case imposed upon the company a duty not to revoke, during the term contracted for, the licence to the plaintiffs to go into the theatre to sell confectionery, and, during the term, to admit to the theatre no one else for the purpose of selling confectionery. To grant an injunction restraining the defendants from doing either of these things may appear an indirect way of compelling specific performance of the company's part of the agreement. Probably the true rule is that an injunction should not be granted which compels, in substance, the defendant to perform his side of the agreement when the continuance of his obligation to do so depends upon the future conduct of the plaintiff in observing conditions to be fulfilled by him. If the contract is one the execution of which the court cannot superintend, it does not seem to be in accordance with principle to bind one party to performance in specie leaving him to a remedy in damages only if the other fails to fulfil the conditions on his side to be observed. But, perhaps, if a clear and [300] negative duty is imposed even by such a contract, an injunction may be granted when the remedy at law is inadequate to the right, at least when, by dissolving the injunction in the event of the plaintiff's own subsequent breach of condition, the parties may be restored to the relative position they occupied before suit. But, assuming the agreement between the parties in this case should be interpreted in a way which would give rise to a negative duty of the required character either not to revoke the licence or not to admit a stranger to sell confectionery, yet that duty is not enforceable at law because the contract is not evidenced by writing. Thus no injunction can be granted in aid of a legal right to enforce the duty, and the injunction must be founded upon an equitable title to its performance.

The agreement gives no equitable interest, and the equity must arise, if at all, from part performance. Moreover, it must not be forgotten that, by reason of the Statute of Frauds, the conditions of the contract to be observed on the part of the plaintiffs may be broken by them with impunity; for not even an action for damages upon the contract could lie at the suit of the company. The plaintiffs must, therefore, rely upon acts of part performance to give them an equity to the independent enforcement of the negative duty incurred by the company, although the remainder of the contract is entirely unenforceable on either side both at law and in equity.

In cases of specific performance, the party is said to be charged upon the equities arising out of the acts of part performance and not merely upon the contract. The acts of part performance must be such as to be consistent only with the existence of a contract between the parties, and to have been done in actual performance of that which in fact existed. But in such a case the equity which so arises is to have the entire contract carried into execution by both sides. Because the acts done upon the faith of the contract could not have taken place if it had not been made, and the contract is of a kind, which it is considered equitable to enforce in specie, a party who has so acted in partial execution of the contract obtains an equity to its complete performance. But in a case like the present which, because of the nature of the agreement, lies outside the scope of the remedy of specific performance, no equity [301] can arise to have the contract carried into complete execution. No equity could be set up save to have a distinct negative duty separately enforced. It may well be that such an equity can never be found in agreement unless the agreement gives rise to an enforceable legal right. But, if it conceivably may arise from acts of part performance, those acts must be of such a nature as to make it right to enforce the negative duty separately, and they must do more than give rise to considerations in favour of requiring performance in specie of the entire contract. Acts which merely argue the existence of a contract which is outside the scope of equitable remedies cannot suffice. When breach of a negative stipulation is enjoined, that term of the contract is enforced irrespective of the remaining provisions. The equity to its enforcement is found in the nature of the negative stipulation itself considered as a separate obligation. If the party against whom an injunction is sought is to be charged not merely upon the negative contract, but upon the equities arising out of acts of part performance, surely to give rise to the equities the acts of part performance relied upon must directly relate to the negative duty. It may perhaps be true that, because of the negative character of the obligations to which an injunction is appropriate, acts of part performance can seldom, if ever, directly relate to such obligations. This may be the reason why no case has been found in which acts of part performance have been relied upon as affording a title to an injunction restraining breach of a negative agreement. But, however this may be, in this case there are no acts of part performance which are referable unequivocally to the existence of anything more than some contract enabling the plaintiffs to sell confectionery and the like in the theatre. There are no acts which directly relate to the existence of a duty not to revoke the licence, or of a duty not to admit a stranger to sell confectionery. It is, therefore, unnecessary to decide whether in such a case as the present anything but a legal right enforceable at law will support the injunction. It is enough to say that no acts of part performance have taken place from which a negative equitable obligation arises.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the case was not one in which the court would entertain an application for an injunction, and that the judgment should be reversed.

[30.80] EVATT J: [308] I do not deem it necessary, however, to express a concluding opinion as to whether the remedy of injunction could have been obtained by the plaintiffs in the action, because I hold that the doctrine of part performance does not apply to cases where the only equitable remedy available is that of injunction, and the court refuses to enforce the contract as a whole …

[309] The justification for intervention by the Court of Chancery was, indeed, the vital necessity, in the interests of justice, of ordering completion of an agreement which had been performed by one part to such an extent that a substantial alteration of position had resulted …

[310] But in the case of an application to a court of equity for the prevention of the breach of some particular negative stipulation of a contract, the jurisdiction exercised expressly disclaims the right of acting in personam so as to secure completion. And the justification for the application of the doctrine of part performance ceases to exist if only a part of the contract within the statute is enforced. The very name of the doctrine – "part performance" – indicates that the object is always to enlarge part performance into complete performance. If a negative stipulation in an agreement within s 4 of the statute were of itself and by itself enforceable in equity, the result would be the procuring of an injunction by one party whilst the defendant in equity would not only ex concessis be unable there to enforce the rest of the agreement but would be unable because of the statute to enforce his rights at law …

[GAVAN DUFFY CJ agreed with the judgment of Dixon J. MCTIERNAN J delivered a judgment in which he reached the same result.]

OVERVIEW

[31.05] People often enter into contracts under the influence of some mistake relating to the contract. If the mistake in question has been positively induced by the other party to the contract, the mistaken party may very well successfully claim some form of relief on the basis of misrepresentation or misleading conduct: see Chapters 32 and 33. This chapter is generally not concerned with such mistakes but rather with mistakes that are self-induced or spontaneous. Mistakes of this kind are much less likely to afford mistaken parties a remedy. Equity has been more accommodating than the common law in this respect. The scope for equitable intervention in cases of mistake may now be broader in Australia than in England (cf Great Peace Shipping Ltd v Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd (The Great Peace) [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2003] QB 679, extracted at [31.65] with Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422, extracted at [31.150]).

Some terminology: types of mistakes

[31.08] For the purpose of determining the law's likely response to mistake, it is useful to distinguish two categories of case.

1. Those where the parties are in agreement but both erroneously assume some matter to be true. There is a common mistake as to this matter (although such mistakes are sometimes less accurately described as mutual).
2. Those where the parties are so much at cross purposes that it can be said that, subjectively speaking, they are not in agreement, for example, they intend to contract on different terms. One party, A, may promise to pay $200 per month, whereas the other party, B, believes the promise is to pay $200 per week. The parties have misunderstood one another. The mistake in such a case is described as mutual. However, if the understanding of one of the parties accords with what a reasonable person would think was intended (ie, if one person is right and the other is wrong on an objective interpretation), the mistake can be described as unilateral.

How should the law respond to mistake

[31.10] There are two quite different theories about whether common law contract doctrines should offer relief against mistake: the constructionist and the civilian.

Under the constructionist theory, the law provides no relief against mistake. Problems of mistake are solved not by reference to a separate doctrine but by applying the rules of contract law relating to formation of contract and construction or interpretation of terms (McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377). The application of these rules may result in a finding that no contract was formed or that a contract was formed but that the parties are released from the contract because of failure of a condition. McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377, extracted at [31.35], provides an example of a case resolved on a constructionist basis.

The civilian theory, deriving from Roman law, presents a distinct doctrine of mistake which is influenced by the notion of consensus. On this view, a fundamental error destroys the consensus ad idem which is essential to contract and a finding that the contract is rendered void by the mistake can be justified on this basis (see eg, Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671, extracted at [31.60]). This requires a court to identify the substance of the contract and to determine whether the mistake relates to that substance or merely some collateral matter, such as quality or attributes. Bell v Lever Brothers Ltd [1932] AC 161, extracted at [31.50], demonstrates the influence of civilian theory on common law principles.

Equity

[31.15] If the constructionist approach suggests that a party labouring under a mistake is bound by the obligation, and the limited circumstances in which the common law holds contracts void for mistake do not apply, the contract may nevertheless be voidable in equity because of the mistake. Equity's jurisdiction to set aside contracts on the basis of mistake allows it to fulfil its broader role of ensuring that the enforcement of common law rights is not unconscionable (see MacMillan, Mistakes in Contract Law (2010), Ch 3). The tendency of the courts has been to narrow the operation of the common law and deal with problems of mistake by using equitable principles. In England, this trend may be reversing: see Great

Peace Shipping Ltd v Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd (The Great Peace) [2003] EWCA Civ 1407; [2003] QB 679, extracted at [31.65].

Unlike the common law, equity treats a contract affected by operative mistake as voidable rather than void ab initio. In order for the contract to be set aside, it must be possible to restore the parties substantially to the positions they were in before the contract was made. A contract may be rescinded on terms which aim at achieving fairness between the parties. (For a detailed examination of rescission, see Chapter 39.)

Remedy: rescission or rectification

[31.20] A mistaken party who wishes to avoid a contract entered into under a mistake may claim that the contract is void at common law or, in the alternative, can be set aside or "rescinded" in equity. Rescission is not the only form of relief available in equity. Equity can refuse to grant specific performance on the ground of mistake or grant specific performance on terms. Also, as we will see in this chapter, the remedy of rectification is available in respect of agreements which have been mistakenly recorded. Rescission and rectification are entirely different remedies. In the case of the former, the court sets aside the contract and restores the parties to their original positions. In the latter case, the court amends the contract to reflect the parties' actual agreement. The fact that a rectification order keeps a contract on foot might justify the application of a less demanding test in cases of rectification vis-á-vis rescission.

COMMON MISTAKE

[31.25] This group of cases (following) is concerned with the situation where the parties have reached consensus ad idem but have made the same false assumption in respect of a fundamental matter, such as the very existence of the subject matter or an important quality of the subject matter. Less commonly, the parties may also have made a mistake about the terms of the contract. The question is whether such a contract should stand; or whether it is void (or voidable) for mistake.

Common law: the constructionist approach

[31.30] There are two ways of dealing with common mistake at common law. The first involves construing the contract, in accordance with ordinary principles of contractual interpretation, to determine where the risk of the mistake lies. The second involves a principle of law which recognises that the contract may be void for common mistake in certain circumstances. Although the High Court has expressed a preference for the former, it has not ruled out the possibility that the Australian common law includes a doctrine that, in limited circumstances, renders contracts void on the basis of common mistake.

The constructionist approach may release a mistaken party from a contract if, through the application of ordinary contractual principles, the contract is void or brought to an end. Any relief that is provided to a mistaken party is incidental to the findings that flow from the application of ordinary contract law principles. Consider the following example. A contracts to sell B his art collection, presently housed overseas. Both the parties assume the art collection is in existence, but in fact it has recently perished in a fire. On a constructionist approach there are several different ways of interpreting this problem. One interpretation is that A has promised that the art collection exists, that is, he has taken the risk that the art collection may no longer exist. If this is the correct interpretation then there is a valid contract, and A is liable to B for breach of his promise. A second interpretation is that B took the risk that the art collection may have perished, that is, she promised to pay for the chance that the collection was extant. If this is the correct interpretation, once again there is a valid contract, and B is liable for breach if she does not pay. There is one final constructionist device that may relieve the parties of their obligations. The court may find that the contract is subject to an implied condition in the contract that the collection is extant. If that implied condition precedent ceases to be met (because the collection has been destroyed) both parties are released from their contractual obligations.

McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission

[31.35] McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from Webb J.

[FACTS: The Commonwealth Disposals Commission (the Commission), which was authorised to make contracts on behalf of the Commonwealth, invited tenders "for the purchase of an oil tanker lying on Jourmaund Reef, which is approximately 100 miles north of Samarai. The vessel is said to contain oil". The plaintiffs, who were brothers trading in partnership, submitted a tender of £285. They were notified by letter that this tender had been accepted and that a "sales advice note to cover this transaction" would be forwarded. A few days later, the plaintiffs received the note. It described the subject of the sale as: "One (1) Oil Tanker including contents wrecked on Jourmaund Reef approximately 100 miles north of Samarai. Price £285."

The plaintiffs were unable to locate Jourmaund Reef on a map and so they asked the Commissioner to give them the precise latitude and longitude of the tanker. This was duly given to them as being: "Latitude 11 degrees 16 1/2 minutes South: Longitude 151 degrees 58 minutes East."

In point of fact, there was no oil tanker lying anywhere near this location, although there was a wrecked barge at a point about 11 miles east of the location specified. The officers of the Commission had made a "reckless and irresponsible" mistake in thinking they had a tanker to sell. They had relied on mere gossip. The plaintiffs however had no reason to suspect this. They incurred considerable expense in fitting out a salvage expedition, only to discover that they had purchased a non-existent tanker.

The plaintiffs commenced an action claiming damages against the Commission. They based their claim on three alternative grounds. First, they claimed damages for breach of a contract to sell a tanker lying at the place specified. Secondly, they claimed damages for a fraudulent representation that there was a tanker lying at the place specified. Finally, they claimed damages for a negligent failure to disclose that there was no tanker at the place specified after that fact became known to the Commissioner.

At the trial of the action, Webb J held that the contract for the sale of the tanker was void and therefore could not give rise to a claim for damages for breach. He based his decision on this aspect of the case on Couturier v Hastie (1852) 8 Ex 40; 155 ER 1250; (1853) 9 Ex 102; 156 ER 43; (1856) 5 HLC 673; 10 ER 1065. His Honour held, however, that the plaintiffs had made out their claim in deceit and awarded £756 10s damages. This did not include any sum in respect of the salvage expedition, which his Honour held to be too remote a consequence of the deceit. The plaintiffs appealed to the Full Court.]

DIXON AND FULLAGAR JJ: [402] The first question to be determined is whether a contract was made between the plaintiffs and the Commission. The argument that the contract was void, or, in other words, that there was no contract, was based, as has been observed, on Couturier v Hastie. It is true that Couturier v Hastie has been commonly treated in the textbooks as a case of a contract avoided by mutual mistake, and it is found cited in the company of such cases as Gompertz v Bartlett (1853) 2 El & Bl 849; 118 ER 985, and Strickland v Turner (1852) 7 Ex 208; 155 ER 919. Section 7 of the English Sale of Goods Act 1893, is generally regarded as expressing the effect of the case. The case has not, however, been universally regarded as resting on mistake, and Sir Frederick Pollock, in his preface to Vol 101 of the Revised Reports, p vi, says: "Couturier v Hastie shows how a large proportion of the cases which swell the rubric of relief against mistake in the textbooks (with or without protest from the text writer) are really cases of construction."

And in Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 691, Denning LJ observed that the cases which it had been usual to classify under the head of "mistake" needed reconsideration since the decision of the House of Lords in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161. No occasion seems to have arisen for a close examination of Couturier v Hastie but such an occasion does now arise.

The facts of the case were simple enough. A question of del credere agency was involved, which has no relevance to the present case, and the facts may be stated without reference to that question. A sold to B: "1 180 quarters of Salonica Indian corn of fair average quality when shipped, at 27/- per quarter fob, and including freight and insurance, to a safe port in the United Kingdom, payment [403] at two months from date upon handing over shipping documents."

At the date of the contract, the vessel containing the corn had sailed from Salonica, but, having encountered very heavy weather, had put in at Tunis. Here the cargo had been found to have become so heated and fermented that it could not be safely carried further. It had accordingly been landed at Tunis and sold there. These facts were unknown to either party at the date of the contract. On discovering them, B repudiated the contract. After the expiration of the two months mentioned in the contract, A, being able and willing to hand over the shipping documents, sued B for the price. The case came on for trial before Martin B and a jury. Martin B directed the jury that "the contract imported that, at the time of the sale, the corn was in existence as such, and capable of delivery": (1852) 8 Ex 47; 155 ER 1253 at 1254. The jury found a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff had leave to move. The Court of Exchequer (Parke B and Alderson B, Pollock CB dissenting) made absolute a rule to enter a verdict for the plaintiff. This decision was reversed in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and the House of Lords, after consulting the judges, affirmed the decision of the Exchequer Chamber, so that the defendant ultimately had judgment.

In considering Couturier v Hastie, it is necessary to remember that it was, in substance, a case in which a vendor was suing for the price of goods which he was unable to deliver. If there had been nothing more in the case, it would probably never have been reported: indeed the action would probably never have been brought. But the vendor founded his claim on the provision for "payment upon handing over shipping documents". He was not called upon to prove a tender of the documents, because the defendant had "repudiated" the contract, but he was able and willing to hand them over, and his argument was, in effect that by handing them over he would be doing all that the contract required of him. The question thus raised would seem to depend entirely on the construction of the contract, and it appears really to have been so treated throughout.

[Their Honours then examined the judgments in Couturier v Hastie:] [405] In Bell v Lever Bros Ltd at 218–22, Lord Atkin, though he does not mention Couturier v Hastie itself, discusses Gompertz v Bartlett and Gurney v Womersley (1854) 4 El & Bl 133; 119 ER 51, and other cases which have sometimes been regarded as turning on mistake avoiding a contract ab initio, and His Lordship concludes the discussion with a very important observation. He says (at 222):

> In these cases I am inclined to think that the true analysis is that there is a contract, but that the one party is not able to supply the very thing, whether goods or services, that the other party contracted to take; and therefore [406] the contract is unenforceable by the one if executory, while, if executed, the other can recover back money paid on the ground of failure of the consideration …

The observation of Lord Atkin in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd at 222 seems entirely appropriate to Couturier v Hastie. In that case there was a failure of consideration, and the purchaser was not bound to pay the price; if he had paid it before the truth was discovered, he could have recovered it back as money had and received. The construction of the contract was the vital thing in the case because, and only because, on the construction of the contract depended the question whether the consideration had really failed, the vendor maintaining that, since he was able to hand over the shipping documents, it had not failed. The truth is that the question whether the contract was void, or the vendor excused from performance by reason of the non-existence of the [407] supposed subject matter, did not arise in Couturier v Hastie. It would have arisen if the purchaser had suffered loss through non-delivery of the corn and had sued the vendor for damages. If it had so arisen, we think that the real question would have been whether the contract was subject to an implied condition precedent that the goods were in existence. Prima facie, one would think, there would be no such implied condition precedent, the position being simply that the vendor promised that the goods were in existence … So in Barr v Gibson (1838) 3 M & W 390; 150 ER 1196, where the contract was for the sale of a ship, Parke B said (at 400; 1201): "And therefore the sale in this case of a ship implies a contract that the subject of transfer did exist in the character of a ship."

It should be noted in this connection that in Solle v Butcher at 691, 692 Denning LJ said that the doctrine of French law, as enunciated by Pothier, is no part of English law. His Lordship was without doubt thinking of the passage quoted from Pothier in a note to the report of the argument in the House of Lords in Couturier v Hastie (1856) 5 HLC 673 at 678; 10 ER 1065 at 1067, 1068. Although we would not be prepared to assent to everything that is said by Denning LJ in the course of this judgment, we respectfully agree with this observation. When once the common law had made up its mind that a promise supported by consideration ought to be performed, it was inevitable that the theorisings of the civilians about "mistake" should mean little or nothing to it. On the other hand, the question whether a promisor was excused from performance by existing or supervening impossibility without fault on his part was a practical everyday question of which the common law has been vividly conscious, as witness Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B & S 826; 122 ER 309, with its innumerable (if sometimes dubious) successors. But here too the common law has generally been true to its theory of simple contract, and it has always regarded the fundamental question as being: "What did the promisor really promise?" Did he promise to perform his part at all events, or only subject to the [408] mutually contemplated original or continued existence of a particular subject matter? So questions of intention or "presumed intention" arise, and these must be determined in the light of the words used by the parties and reasonable inferences from all the surrounding circumstances. That the problem is fundamentally one of construction is shown clearly by Clifford v Watts (1870) LR 5 CP 577.

If the view so far indicated be correct, as we believe it to be, it seems clear that the case of Couturier v Hastie does not compel one to say that the contract in the present case was void. But, even if the view that Couturier v Hastie was a case of a void contract be correct, we would still think that it could not govern the present case. Denning LJ indeed says in Solle v Butcher (at 692): "Neither party can rely on his own mistake to say it was a nullity from the beginning, no matter that it was a mistake which to his mind was fundamental, and no matter that the other party knew he was under a mistake. A fortiori if the other party did not know of the mistake, but shared it."

But, even if this be not wholly and strictly correct, yet at least it must be true to say that a party cannot rely on mutual mistake where the mistake consists of a belief which is, on the one hand, entertained by him without any reasonable ground, and, on the other hand, deliberately induced by him in the mind of the other party …

[409] But, even if [the officers of the Commission] be credited with a real belief in the existence of a tanker, they were guilty of the grossest negligence. It is impossible to say that they had any reasonable ground for such a belief. Having no reasonable grounds for such a belief, they asserted by their advertisement to the world at large, and by their later specification of locality to the plaintiffs, that they had a tanker to sell. They must have known that any tenderer would rely implicitly on their assertion of the existence of a tanker, and they must have known that the plaintiffs would rely implicitly on their later assertion of the existence of a tanker in the latitude and longitude given. They took no steps to verify what they were asserting, and any "mistake" that existed was induced by their own culpable conduct. In these circumstances it seems out of the question that they should be able to assert that no contract was concluded. It is not unfair or inaccurate to say that the only "mistake" the plaintiffs made was that they believed what the Commission told them.

The position so far, then, may be summed up as follows. It was not decided in Couturier v Hastie that the contract in that case was void. The question whether it was void or not did not arise. If it had arisen, as in an action by the purchaser for damages, it would have turned on the ulterior question whether the contract was subject to an implied condition precedent. Whatever might then have been held on the facts of Couturier v Hastie it is impossible in this case to imply any such term. The terms of the contract and the surrounding circumstances clearly exclude any such implication. The buyers relied upon, and acted upon, the assertion of the seller that there was a tanker in existence. It is not a case in which the parties can be seen to have proceeded on the basis of a common assumption of fact so as to justify the conclusion that the correctness of the assumption was intended by both parties to be a condition precedent to the creation of contractual obligations. The officers of the Commission made an assumption, but the plaintiffs did not make an assumption in the same sense. They knew nothing except what the Commission had told them. If they had been asked, they would certainly not have said: "Of course, if there is no tanker, there is no contract." They would have said: "We shall have to go and take possession of the tanker. We simply accept the [410] Commission's assurance that there is a tanker and the Commission's promise to give us that tanker." The only proper construction of the contract is that it included a promise by the Commission that there was a tanker in the position specified. The Commission contracted that there was a tanker there …

If, on the other hand, the case of Couturier v Hastie and this case ought to be treated as cases raising a question of "mistake", then the Commission cannot in this case rely on any mistake as avoiding the contract, because any mistake was induced by the serious fault of their own servants, who asserted the existence of a tanker recklessly and without any reasonable ground. There was a contract, and the Commission contracted that a tanker existed in the position specified. Since there was no such tanker, there has been a breach of contract, and the plaintiffs are entitled to damages for that breach.

Before proceeding to consider the measure of damages, one other matter should be briefly mentioned. The contract was made in Melbourne, and it would seem that its proper law is Victorian law. Section 11 of the Victorian Goods Act 1928 corresponds to s 6 of the English Sale of Goods Act 1893, and provides: "where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods, and the goods without the knowledge of the seller have perished at the time when the contract is made the contract is void."

This has been generally supposed to represent the legislature's view of the effect of Couturier v Hastie. Whether it correctly represents the effect of the decision in that case or not, it seems clear that the section has no application to the facts of the present case. Here the goods never existed, and the seller ought to have known that they did not exist.

The conclusion that there was an enforceable contract makes it unnecessary to consider the other two causes of action raised by the plaintiffs. As to each of these, the plaintiffs would have been, to say the least, faced with serious obstacles ….

[McTiernan J concurred in the conclusions reached by Dixon and Fullagar JJ.]

Appeal allowed and judgment for £3,285 entered for the plaintiff.

Common law response: does the common law provide relief against common mistake?

[31.45] If the constructionist analysis suggests that a contract remains on foot, it is then necessary to consider whether either the common law or equity might provide relief on the basis of the mistake. We will consider the common law first.

In McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377, the High Court displayed a definite preference for resolving issues of mistake on a constructionist basis by looking at what the promisor really promised. The court did not, however, rule out the possibility that the Australian common law includes a principle rendering contracts void for common mistake. In Bell v Lever Brothers Ltd [1932] AC 161, Lord Atkin found that the common law provided relief in limited circumstances.

Bell v Lever Brothers

[31.50] Bell v Lever Brothers Ltd [1932] AC 161 (House of Lords) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: Lever Bros Ltd held more than 99 per cent of the share capital of Niger Co Ltd. It appointed Bell to be the managing director of the latter company for five years at an annual salary of £8,000. Three years later the Niger Co Ltd was amalgamated with another company and it became necessary to terminate Bell's contract. Lever Bros Ltd agreed to pay him £30,000 as compensation for loss of his employment. After this money had been paid over, it was discovered that Bell had committed several breaches of duty that would have entitled Lever Bros Ltd to have dismissed him without any compensation. Lever Bros Ltd commenced an action against Bell in which it claimed, inter alia, that the compensation agreement was void for mistake and hence that it was entitled to recover the money it had paid over. Lever Bros Ltd was successful in the lower courts and Bell appealed to the House of Lords.]

LORD ATKIN: [217] My Lords, the rules of law dealing with the effect of mistake on contract appear to be established with reasonable clearness. If mistake operates at all it operates so as to negative or in some cases to nullify consent. The parties may be mistaken in the identity of the contracting parties, or in the existence of the subject matter of the contract at the date of the contract, or in the quality of the subject matter of the contract. These mistakes may be by one party, or by both, and the legal effect may depend upon the class of mistake above mentioned. Thus a mistaken belief by A that he is contracting with B, whereas in fact he is contracting with C, will negative consent where it is clear that the intent of A was to contract only with B. So the agreement of A and B to purchase a specific article is void if in fact the article had perished before the date of sale. In this case, though the parties in fact were agreed about the subject matter, yet a consent to transfer or take delivery of something not existent is deemed useless, the consent is nullified. As codified in the Sale of Goods Act the contract is expressed to be void if the seller was in ignorance of the destruction of the specific chattel. I apprehend that if the seller with knowledge that a chattel was destroyed purported to sell it to a purchaser, the latter might sue for damages for non-delivery though the former could not sue for non-acceptance, but I know of no case where a seller has so committed himself. This is a case where mutual mistake certainly and unilateral mistake [218] by the seller of goods will prevent a contract from arising. Corresponding to mistake as to the existence of the subject matter is mistake as to title in cases where, unknown to the parties, the buyer is already the owner of that which the seller purports to sell to him. The parties intended to effectuate a transfer of ownership: such a transfer is impossible: the stipulation is naturali ratione inutilis. This is the case of Cooper v Phibbs (1867) LR 2 HL 149, where A agreed to take a lease of a fishery from B, though contrary to the belief of both parties at the time A was tenant for life of the fishery and B appears to have had no title at all. To such a case Lord Westbury applied the principle that if parties contract under a mutual mistake and misapprehension as to their relative and respective rights the result is that the agreement is liable to be set aside as having proceeded upon a common mistake. Applied to the context the statement is only subject to the criticism that the agreement would appear to be void rather than voidable. Applied to mistake as to rights generally it would appear to be too wide. Even where the vendor has no title, though both parties think he has, the correct view would appear to be there is a contract but that the vendor has either committed a breach of a stipulation as to title, or is not able to perform his contract. The contract is unenforceable by him but is not void.

Mistake as to quality of the thing contracted for raises more difficult questions. In such a case a mistake will not affect assent unless it is the mistake of both parties, and is as to the existence of some quality which makes the thing without the quality essentially different from the thing as it was believed to be. Of course it may appear that the parties contracted that the article should possess the quality which one or other or both mistakenly believed it to possess. But in such a case there is a contract and the inquiry is a different one, being whether the contract as to quality amounts to a condition or a warranty, a different branch of the law …

[223] We are now in a position to apply to the facts of this case the law as to mistake so far as it has been stated. It is essential on this part of the discussion to keep in mind the finding of the jury acquitting the defendants of fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment in procuring the agreements in question. Grave injustice may be done to the defendants and confusion introduced into the legal conclusion, unless it is quite clear that in considering mistake in this case no suggestion of fraud is admissible and cannot strictly be regarded by the judge who has to determine the legal issues raised. The agreement which is said to be void is the agreement contained in the letter of 19 March 1929, that Bell would retire from the board of the Niger Co and its subsidiaries, and that in consideration of his doing so Levers would pay him as compensation for the termination of his agreements and consequent loss of office the sum of £30 000 in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims and demands of any kind against Lever Bros, the Niger Co or its subsidiaries. The agreement, which as part of the contract was terminated, had been broken so that it could be repudiated. Is an agreement to terminate a broken contract different in kind from an agreement to terminate an unbroken contract, assuming that the breach has given the one party the right to declare the contract at an end? I feel the weight of the plaintiffs' contention that a contract immediately determinable is a different thing from a contract for an unexpired term, and that the difference in kind can be illustrated by the immense price of release from the longer contract as compared with the shorter. And I agree that an agreement to take an assignment of a lease for five years is not the same thing as to take an assignment of a lease for three years, still less a term for a few months. But on the whole, I have come to the conclusion that it would be wrong to decide that an agreement to terminate a definite specified contract is void if it turns out that the agreement had already been broken and could have been terminated otherwise. The contract released is the identical contract in both cases, and the party paying for release gets exactly [224] what he bargains for. It seems immaterial that he could have got the same result in another way, or that if he had known the true facts he would not have entered into the bargain. A buys B's horse; he thinks the horse is sound and he pays the price of a sound horse; he would certainly not have bought the horse if he had known as the fact is that the horse is unsound. If B has made no representation as to soundness and has not contracted that the horse is sound, A is bound and cannot recover back the price. A buys a picture from B; both A and B believe it to be the work of an old master, and a high price is paid. It turns out to be a modern copy. A has no remedy in the absence of representation or warranty. A agrees to take on lease or to buy from B an unfurnished dwelling house. The house is in fact uninhabitable. A would never have entered into the bargain if he had known the fact. A has no remedy, and the position is the same whether B knew the facts or not, so long as he made no representation or gave no warranty. A buys a roadside garage business from B abutting on a public thoroughfare; unknown to A, but known to B, it has already been decided to construct a bypass road which will divert substantially the whole of the traffic from passing A's garage. Again A has no remedy. All these cases involve hardship on A and benefit B, as most people would say, unjustly. They can be supported on the ground that it is of paramount importance that contracts should be observed, and that if parties honestly comply with the essentials of the formation of contracts, that is, agree in the same terms on the same subject matter, they are bound, and must rely on the stipulations of the contract for protection from the effect of facts unknown to them.

This brings the discussion to the alternative mode of expressing the result of a mutual mistake. It is said that in such a case as the present there is to be implied a stipulation in the contract that a condition of its efficacy is that the facts should be as understood by both parties; namely, that the contract could not be terminated till the end of the current term. The question of the existence of conditions, express [225] or implied, is obviously one that affects not the formation of contract, but the investigation of the terms of the contract when made. A condition derives its efficacy from the consent of the parties, express or implied. They have agreed, but on what terms. One term may be that unless the facts are or are not of a particular nature, or unless an event has or has not happened, the contract is not to take effect. With regard to future facts such a condition is obviously contractual. Till the event occurs the parties are bound. Thus the condition (the exact terms of which need not here be investigated) that is generally accepted as underlying the principle of the frustration cases is contractual, an implied condition. Sir John Simon formulated for the assistance of your Lordships a proposition which should be recorded:

> Whenever it is to be inferred from the terms of a contract or its surrounding circumstances that the consensus has been reached upon the basis of a particular contractual assumption, and that assumption is not true, the contract is avoided, that is, it is void ab initio if the assumption is of present fact and it ceases to bind if the assumption is of future fact.

I think few would demur to this statement, but its value depends upon the meaning of "a contractual assumption", and also upon the true meaning to be attached to "basis", a metaphor which may mislead. When used expressly in contracts, for instance, in policies of insurance, which state that the truth of the statements in the proposal is to be the basis of the contract of insurance, the meaning is clear. The truth of the statements is made a condition of the contract, which failing, the contract is void unless the condition is waived. The proposition does not amount to more than this that, if the contract expressly or impliedly contains a term that a particular assumption is a condition of the contract, the contract is avoided if the assumption is not true. But we have not advanced far on the inquiry how to ascertain whether the contract does contain such a condition. Various words are to be found to define the state of things which make a condition. "In the contemplation of both parties fundamental to the continued validity of the contract", "a [226] foundation essential to its existence", "a fundamental reason for making it", are phrases found in the important judgment of Scrutton LJ in the present case. The first two phrases appear to me to be unexceptionable. They cover the case of a contract to serve in a particular place, the existence of which is fundamental to the service, or to procure the services of a professional vocalist, whose continued health is essential to performance. But "a fundamental reason for making a contract" may, with respect, be misleading. The reason of one party only is presumably not intended, but in the cases I have suggested above, of the sale of a horse or of a picture, it might be said that the fundamental reason for making the contract was the belief of both parties that the horse was sound or the picture of an old master, yet in neither case would the condition as I think exist. Nothing is more dangerous than to allow oneself liberty to construct for the parties contracts which they have not in terms made by importing implications which would appear to make the contract more businesslike or more just. The implications to be made are to be no more than are "necessary" for giving business efficacy to the transaction, and it appears to me that, both as to the existing facts and future facts, a condition would not be implied unless the new state of facts makes the contract something different in kind from the contract in the original state of facts. Thus, in Krell v Henry [1903] 2 KB 740 at 754, Vaughan Williams LJ finds that the subject of the contract was "rooms to view the procession": the postponement, therefore, made the rooms not rooms to view the procession. This also is the test finally chosen by Lord Sumner in Bank Line v Arthur Capel & Co [1919] AC 435, agreeing with Lord Dunedin in Metropolitan Water Board v Dick Kerr [1918] AC 119 at 128, where, dealing with the criterion for determining the effect of interruption in "frustrating" a contract, he says: "An interruption may be so long as to destroy the identity of the work or service, when resumed, with the work or service when interrupted."

We therefore get a common standard for mutual mistake, [227] and implied conditions whether as to existing or as to future facts. Does the state of the new facts destroy the identity of the subject matter as it was in the original state of facts? To apply the principle to the infinite combinations of facts that arise in actual experience will continue to be difficult, but if this case results in establishing order into what has been a somewhat confused and difficult branch of the law it will have served a useful purpose.

I have already stated my reasons for deciding that in the present case the identity of the subject matter was not destroyed by the mutual mistake, if any, and need not repeat them.

[31.55] LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE (dissenting): [208] The real question … is whether the erroneous assumption on the part of both parties to the agreements that the service contracts were undeterminable except by agreement was of such a fundamental character as to constitute an underlying assumption without which the parties would not have made the contract they in fact made, or whether it was only a common error as to a material element, but one not going to the root of the matter and not affecting the substance of the consideration.

With the knowledge that I am differing from the majority of your Lordships, I am unable to arrive at any conclusion except that in this case the erroneous assumption was essential to the contract which without it would not have been made.

It is true that the error was not one as to the terms of the service agreements, but it was one which, having regard to the matter on which the parties were negotiating, namely, the terms on which the service agreements were to be prematurely determined and the compensation to be paid therefor, was in my opinion as fundamental to the bargain as any error one can imagine …

[LORDS BLANESBURGH and THANKERTON delivered speeches agreeing with Lord Atkin that the appeal should be allowed. VISCOUNT HAILSHAM agreed with the dissenting speech of Lord Warrington of Clyffe.]

Appeal allowed.

[31.57] Note

The principle identified in Bell v Lever Brothers was applied in HWG Holdings Pty Ltd v Fairlie Court Pty Ltd [2015] VSC 519, where Sifris J found a contract to be void at common law for common mistake.

Rescission in equity

[31.58] A contract that is on foot at common law notwithstanding a common mistake may nonetheless be voidable in equity. Equity will intervene if the enforcement of legal rights amounts to unconscionable conduct in the circumstances. The leading case on this point is Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671, extracted at [31.60]. Denning LJ's influential speech which has been cited with approval by the High Court of Australia (Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422, 431) but was subsequently found by the English Court of Appeal to have been wrongly decided (see Great Peace Shipping Ltd v Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd (The Great Peace) [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2003] QB 679, extracted at [31.65]).

Solle v Butcher

[31.60] Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from the County Court.

[FACTS: Butcher (the landlord, defendant) leased a flat to Solle (the tenant, plaintiff) for a term of seven years at an annual rental of £250. The flat had previously been let to one Taylor at an annual rent of £140. Both Butcher and Solle believed that because of extensive structural alterations to the premises the flat was not governed by the Rent Restriction Acts 1920 and 1923. This view was incorrect and as a result the maximum permissible rent allowable under the Act, unless a notice of increase had been given to the tenant before the lease was signed, was £140 per annum.

Solle commenced an action in the County Court in which he claimed a declaration that the maximum permissible rent was £140 per annum and that he was entitled to recover the excess he had paid under the lease. Butcher resisted these claims on various grounds and counterclaimed for rescission of the lease on the basis of a common mistake. Judgment was entered for Solle, and Butcher appealed to the Court of Appeal.]

DENNING LJ: [690] So long as the lease stands the tenant's argument is unanswerable. The Rent Restriction Acts prevent the landlord from recovering any more than the standard rent unless a notice of intention to increase the rent is given either to the sitting tenant or to a prospective tenant; and, although errors or omissions in a notice are not necessarily fatal, nevertheless there must be a notice, however informal. In this case the landlord conceded that no notice was served before the new lease was granted. It follows that the raising of the rent from £140 to £250 was invalid, and the landlord can do nothing now to repair the omission because no fresh notice of increase can be effective so long as the lease continues. The landlord tried to overcome this difficulty by saying that the tenant was estopped from saying that the rent of £250 was invalid; but, just as parties cannot contract out of the Acts, so they cannot defeat them by any estoppel.

In this plight the landlord seeks to set aside the lease. He says, with truth, that it is unfair that the tenant should have the benefit of the lease for the outstanding five years of the term at £140 a year, when the proper rent is £250 a year. If he cannot give a notice of increase now, can he not avoid the lease? The only ground on which he can avoid it is on the ground of mistake. It is quite plain that the parties were under a mistake. They thought that the flat was not tied down to a controlled rent, whereas in fact it was. In order to see whether the lease can be avoided for this mistake it is necessary to remember that mistake is of two kinds:

(1) mistake which renders the contract void, that is, a nullity from the beginning, which is the kind of mistake which was dealt with by the courts of common law; and

(2) mistake which renders the contract not void, but voidable, that is, liable to be set aside on such terms as the court thinks fit, which is the kind of mistake which was dealt with by the [691] courts of equity.

Much of the difficulty which has attended this subject has arisen because, before the fusion of law and equity, the courts of common law, in order to do justice in the case in hand, extended this doctrine of mistake beyond its proper limits and held contracts to be void which were really only voidable, a process which was capable of being attended with much injustice to third persons who had bought goods or otherwise committed themselves on the faith that there was a contract. In the well known case of Cundy v Lindsay (1876) 1 QBD 348; (1878) 3 App Cas 459, Cundy suffered such an injustice. He bought the handkerchiefs from the rogue, Blenkarn, before the Judicature Acts came into operation. Since the fusion of law and equity, there is no reason to continue this process, and it will be found that only those contracts are now held void in which the mistake was such as to prevent the formation of any contract at all.

Let me first consider mistakes which render a contract a nullity. All previous decisions on this subject must now be read in the light of Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161 at 222, 224. The correct interpretation of that case, to my mind, is that, once a contract has been made, that is to say, once the parties, whatever their inmost states of mind, have to all outward appearances agreed with sufficient certainty in the same terms on the same subject matter, then the contract is good unless and until it is set aside for failure of some condition on which the existence of the contract depends, or for fraud, or on some equitable ground. Neither party can rely on his own mistake to say it was a nullity from the beginning, no matter that it was a mistake which to his mind was fundamental, and no matter that the other party knew that he was under a mistake. A fortiori, if the other party did not know of the mistake, but shared it. The cases where goods have perished at the time of sale, or belong to the buyer, are really contracts which are not void for mistake but are void by reason of an implied condition precedent, because the contract proceeded on the basic assumption that it was possible of performance ….

[692] Applying these principles, it is clear that here there was a contract. The parties agreed in the same terms on the same subject matter. It is true that the landlord was under a mistake which was to him fundamental; he would not for one moment have considered letting the flat for seven years if it meant that he could only charge £140 a year for it. He made the fundamental mistake of believing that the rent he could charge was not tied down to a controlled rent; but, whether it was his own mistake or a mistake common to both him and the tenant, it is not a ground for saying that the lease was from the beginning a nullity. Any other view would lead to remarkable results, for it would mean that, in the many cases where the parties mistakenly think a house is outside the Rent Restriction Acts when it is really within them, the tenancy would be a nullity, and the tenant would have to go, with the result that the tenants would not dare to seek to have their rents reduced to the permitted amounts lest they should be turned out.

Let me next consider mistakes which render a contract voidable, that is, liable to be set aside on some equitable ground. Whilst presupposing that a contract was good at law, or at any rate not void, the court of equity would often relieve a party from the consequences of his own mistake, so long as it could do so without injustice to third parties. The court, it was said, had power to set aside the contract whenever it was of opinion that it was unconscientious for the other party to avail himself of the legal advantage which he had obtained: Torrance v Bolton (1872) LR 8 Ch App 118 at 124 per James LJ.

The court had, of course, to define what it considered to be unconscientious, but in this respect equity has shown a progressive development. It is now clear that a contract will be set aside if the mistake of the one party has been induced by a material misrepresentation of the other, even though it was not fraudulent or fundamental, or if one party, knowing that the other is mistaken about the terms of an offer, or the identity of the person by whom it is made, lets him remain under his delusion and concludes a contract on the mistaken terms instead of pointing out the mistake. That is, I venture to think, the ground [693] on which the defendant in Smith v Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597, would be exempted nowadays, and on which, according to the view by Blackburn J of the facts, the contract in Lindsay v Cundy at 355; 459, was voidable and not void …

A contract is also liable in equity to be set aside if the parties were under a common misapprehension either as to facts or as to their relative and respective rights, provided that the misapprehension was fundamental and that the party seeking to set it aside was not himself at fault. That principle was first applied to private rights as long ago as 1730 in Lansdowne v Lansdowne (1730) Mos 364; 2 Jac & W 205; 37 ER 605 … Eighteen years later, in the time of Lord Harwicke, the same principle was applied in Bingham v Bingham (1748) 1 Ves Sen 126; 27 ER 934; Belt's Supplement 79.

If and in so far as those cases were compromises of disputed rights, they have been subjected to justifiable criticism, but, in cases where there is no element of compromise, but only of mistaken rights, the House of Lords in 1867 in the great case of Cooper v Phibbs (1867) LR 2 HL 149 at 170, affirmed the doctrine there acted on as correct. In that case an uncle had told his nephew, not [694] intending to misrepresent anything, but being in fact in error, that he (the uncle) was entitled to a fishery; and the nephew, after the uncle's death, acting in the belief of the truth of what the uncle had told him, entered into an agreement to rent the fishery from the uncle's daughters, whereas it actually belonged to the nephew himself. The mistake there as to the title to the fishery did not render the tenancy agreement a nullity. If it had done, the contract would have been void at law from the beginning and equity would have had to follow the law. There would have been no contract to set aside and no terms to impose. The House of Lords, however, held that the mistake was only such as to make it voidable, or, in Lord Westbury's words: "liable to be set aside" on such terms as the court thought fit to impose; and it was so set aside.

The principle so established by Cooper v Phibbs has been repeatedly acted on: see, for instance Earl Beauchamp v Winn (1873) LR 6 HL 223 at 234, and Huddersfield Banking Co Ltd v Lister [1895] 2 Ch 273. It is in no way impaired by Bell v Lever Bros Ltd which was treated in the House of Lords as a case at law depending on whether the contract was a nullity or not. If it had been considered on equitable grounds, the result might have been different. In any case, the principle of Cooper v Phibbs has been fully restored by Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society Ltd v William H Price Ltd [1934] AC 455 at 462–3.

Applying that principle to this case, the facts are that the plaintiff, the tenant, was a surveyor who was employed by the defendant, the landlord, not only to arrange finance for the purchase of the building and to negotiate with the rating authorities as to the new rateable values, but also to let the flats. He was the agent for letting and he clearly formed the view that the building was not controlled. He told the valuation officer so. He advised the defendant what were the rents which could be charged. He read to the defendant an opinion of counsel relating to the matter, and told him that in his opinion he could charge £250 and that there was no previous control. He said that the flats came outside the Act and that the defendant was "clear". The defendant relied on what the plaintiff told him, and authorised the plaintiff to let at the rentals which he had suggested. The plaintiff not only let the four other flats to other people for a long period of [695] years at the new rentals, but also took one himself for seven years at £250 a year. Now he turns round and says, quite unashamedly, that he wants to take advantage of the mistake to get the flat at £140 a year for seven years instead of the £250 a year, which is not only the rent he agreed to pay but also the fair and economic rent; and it is also the rent permitted by the Acts on compliance with the necessary formalities. If the rules of equity have become so rigid that they cannot remedy such an injustice, it is time we had a new equity, to make good the omissions of the old. But, in my view, the established rules are amply sufficient for this case …

The fact that the lease has been executed is no bar to this relief. No distinction can, in this respect, be taken between rescission for innocent misrepresentation and rescission for common misapprehension, for many of the common misapprehensions are due to innocent misrepresentation; and Cooper v Phibbs shows that rescission is available even after an agreement of tenancy has been executed and partly performed. The observations in Seddon v North Eastern Salt Co Ltd [1905] 1 Ch 326, have lost all authority since Scrutton LJ threw doubt on them in Lever Bros Ltd v Bell at 588, and the Privy Council actually set aside an executed agreement in MacKenzie v Royal Bank of Canada [1934] AC 468. If and in so far as Angel v Jay [1911] 1 KB 666, decided that an executed lease could not be [696] rescinded for an innocent misrepresentation, it was, in my opinion, a wrong decision. It would mean that innocent people would be deprived of their right of rescission before they had any opportunity of knowing they had it. I am aware that in Wilde v Gibson (1848) 1 HLC 605; 9 ER 897, Lord Campbell said that an executed conveyance could be set aside only on the ground of actual fraud, but this must be taken to be confined to misrepresentations as to defects of title on the conveyance of land.

In the ordinary way, of course, rescission is only granted when the parties can be restored to substantially the same position as that in which they were before the contract was made, but, as Lord Blackburn said in Erlanger v New Sombrero Phosphate Co (1878) 3 App Cas 1218 at 1278–9: "The practice has always been for a court of equity to give this relief whenever, by the exercise of its powers, it can do what is practically just, though it cannot restore the parties precisely to the state they were in before the contract."

That indeed was what was done in Cooper v Phibbs. Terms were imposed so as to do what was practically just. What terms then, should be imposed here? If the lease were set aside without any terms being imposed, it would mean that the plaintiff, the tenant, would have to go out and would have to pay a reasonable sum for his use and occupation. That would, however, not be just to the tenant …. I think that this court should … [697] … impose terms which will enable the tenant to choose either to stay on at the proper rent or to go out.

The terms will be complicated by reason of the Rent Restriction Acts, but it is not beyond the wit of man to devise them. Subject to any observations which the parties may desire to make, the terms which I suggest are these: the lease should only be set aside if the defendant is prepared to give an undertaking that he will permit the plaintiff to be a licensee of the premises pending the grant of a new lease. Then, whilst the plaintiff is a licensee, the defendant will in law be in possession of the premises, and will be able to serve on the plaintiff, as prospective tenant, a notice under s 7(4), of the Act of 1938 increasing the rent to the full permitted amount. The defendant must further be prepared to give an undertaking that he will serve such a notice within three weeks from the drawing up of the order, and that he will, if written request is made by the plaintiff, within one month of the service of the notice, grant him a new lease at the full permitted amount of rent, not, however, exceeding £250 a year, for a term expiring on 29 September 1954, subject in all other respects to the same covenants and conditions as in the rescinded lease. If there is any difference of opinion about the figures stated in the notice, that can, of course, be adjusted during the currency of the lease. If the plaintiff does not choose to accept the licence or the new lease, he must go out. He will not be entitled to the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts because, the lease being set aside, there will be no initial contractual tenancy from which a statutory tenancy can spring.

In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be allowed. The declaration that the standard rent of the flat is £140 a year should stand. An order should be made on the counterclaim that, on the defendant's giving the undertakings which I have mentioned, the lease be set aside. An account should be had to determine the sum payable for use and occupation. The plaintiff's claim for repayment of rent and for breach of covenant should be dismissed. In respect of his occupation after rescission and during the subsequent licence, the plaintiff will be liable to pay a reasonable sum for use and occupation. That sum should, prima facie, be assessed at the full amount permitted by the Acts, not, however, exceeding £250 a year. Mesne profits as against a trespasser [698] are assessed at the full amount permitted by the Acts, even though notices of increase have not been served, because that is the amount lost by the landlord. The same assessment should be made here, because the sums payable for use and occupation are not rent, and the statutory provisions about notices of increase do not apply to them. All necessary credits must, of course, be given in respect of past payments, and so forth.

[BUCKNILL LJ delivered a separate judgment in which he arrived at the same conclusion as Denning LJ. Jenkins LJ dissented.]

Appeal allowed.

Great Peace Shipping v Tsavliris Salvage (International) (The Great Peace)

[31.65] Great Peace Shipping Ltd v Tsavliris Salvage (International) Ltd (The Great Peace) [2002] EWCA Civ 1407; [2003] QB 679 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Toulson J.

[FACTS: The defendants contracted to provide salvage services to a ship (the Cape Providence), which had suffered serious structural damage in the South Indian Ocean. The nearest tug was five to six days away. The defendants were told by a third party that the claimants' ship (the Great Peace) was 35 miles away from the Cape Providence. After some negotiations, the defendants contracted with the claimants to charter the Great Peace until the tug arrived (for a minimum period of five days) to stand by the Cape Providence in case it became necessary to rescue the crew. The fee was agreed to be $16,500 per day with a minimum of "5 days due and earned upon Great Peace altering direction, being $82,500". The written agreement stipulated payment of a cancellation fee equal to the minimum hire fee. Almost immediately after the Great Peace changed course to rendezvous with the Cape Providence, the defendants became aware that the ships were in fact 410 miles apart. The defendants did not cancel the arrangement immediately but did so within a few hours, once they had located and made arrangements with a closer ship (the Nordfarer). The defendants refused to pay any amount to the claimants. The claimants sought payment of $82,500.]

THE COURT (LORD PHILLIPS OF WORTH MATRAVERS MR, MAY AND LAWS LJJ):

Introduction

[686] In 1931 in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161 Lord Atkin made a speech which he must have anticipated would be treated as the definitive exposition of the rules of law governing the effect of mistake on contract. In 1949 in Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 Denning LJ identified an equitable jurisdiction which permits the court to intervene where the parties have concluded an agreement that was binding in law under a common misapprehension of a fundamental nature as to the material facts or their respective rights. Over the last 50 years judges and jurists have wrestled with the problem of reconciling these two decisions and identifying with precision the principles that they lay down.

In the court below Toulson J used this case as a vehicle to review this difficult area of jurisprudence. He reached the bold conclusion that the view of the jurisdiction of the court expressed by Denning LJ in Solle v Butcher was "over-broad", by which he meant wrong. Equity neither gave a party a right to rescind a contract on grounds of common mistake nor conferred on the court a discretion to set aside a contract on such grounds.

The issues

[31.70] The defendants contended that the purported contract had been concluded by reason of a fundamental mistake of fact in that both parties proceeded on the fundamental assumption that the Great Peace was "in close proximity" to the Cape Providence, when she was not. It followed either that the contract was void in law, or that the contract was voidable and the defendants were entitled to relief in equity by way of rescission.

In oral argument in the court below, Mr Reeder for the defendants defined "close proximity" as meaning sufficiently close to enable the Cape Providence to have come up with the Great Peace in the space of a few hours ….

[690] Toulson J rejected the defendants' contentions and awarded the claimants the sum claimed. By this appeal the defendants reassert their defence based upon mistake.

The mistake in this case

[31.75] [691] In the present case the parties were agreed as to the express terms of the contract. The defendants agreed that the Great Peace would deviate towards the Cape Providence and, on reaching her, escort her so as to be on hand to save the lives of her crew, should she founder. The contractual services would terminate when the salvage tug came up with the casualty. The mistake relied upon by the defendants is as to an assumption that they claim underlay the terms expressly agreed. This was that the Great Peace was within a few hours sailing of the Cape Providence. They contend that this mistake was fundamental in that it would take the Great Peace about 39 hours to reach a position where she could render the services which were the object of the contractual adventure.

Thus what we are here concerned with is an allegation of a common mistaken assumption of fact which renders the service that will be provided if the contract is performed in accordance with its terms something different from the performance that the parties contemplated. This is the type of mistake which fell to be considered in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161. We shall describe it as "common mistake", although it is often alternatively described as "mutual mistake".

Mr Reeder for the defendants puts his case in two alternative ways. First he submits that performance of the contract in the circumstances as they turned out to be would have been fundamentally different from the performance contemplated by the parties, so much so that the effect of the mistake was to deprive the agreement of the consideration underlying it. Under common law, so he submits, the effect of such a mistake is to render the contract void. Mr Reeder draws a close analogy with the test to be applied when deciding whether a contract has been frustrated or whether there has been a fundamental breach. The foundation for this submission is Bell v Lever Bros Ltd.

If the facts of this case do not meet that test, Mr Reeder submits that they none the less give rise to a right of rescission in equity. He submits that such a right arises whenever the parties contract under a common mistake as to a matter that can properly be described as "fundamental" or "material" to the agreement in question. Here he draws an analogy with the test for rescission where one party, by innocent misrepresentation, induces the other to enter into a contract – indeed that is one situation where the parties contract under a common mistake. The foundation for this submission is Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671.

Bell v Lever Bros

[31.80] [697] It is generally accepted that the principles of the law of common mistake expounded by Lord Atkin in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161 were based on the common law. The issue raised by Mr Reeder's submissions is whether there subsists a separate doctrine of common mistake founded in equity which enables the court to intervene in circumstances where the mistake does not render the contract void under the common law principles. The first step is to identify the nature of the common law doctrine of mistake that was identified, or established, by Bell v Lever Bros Ltd.

[After discussing developments in the doctrine of frustration, the court continued, at 703] What do these developments in the law of frustration have to tell us about the law of common mistake? First that the theory of the implied term is as unrealistic when considering common mistake as when considering frustration. Where a fundamental assumption upon which an agreement is founded proves to be mistaken, it is not realistic to ask whether the parties impliedly agreed that in those circumstances the contract would not be binding. The avoidance of a contract on the ground of common mistake results from a rule of law under which, if it transpires that one or both of the parties have agreed to do something which it is impossible to perform, no obligation arises out of that agreement.

In considering whether performance of the contract is impossible, it is necessary to identify what it is that the parties agreed would be performed. This involves looking not only at the express terms, but at any implications that may arise out of the surrounding circumstances. In some cases it will be possible to identify details of the "contractual adventure" which go beyond the terms that are expressly spelt out, in others it will not.

Just as the doctrine of frustration only applies if the contract contains no provision that covers the situation, the same should be true of common mistake. If, on true construction of the contract, a party warrants that the subject matter of the contract exists, or that it will be possible to perform the contract, there will be no scope to hold the contract void on the ground of common mistake.

If one applies the passage from the judgment of Lord Alverstone CJ in Blakeley v Muller & Co 19 TLR 186, which we quoted above to a case of common mistake, it suggests that the following elements must be present if common mistake is to avoid a contract: (i) there must be a common assumption as to the existence of a state of affairs; (ii) there must be no warranty by either party that that state of affairs exists; (iii) the non-existence of the state of affairs must not be attributable to the fault of either party; (iv) the non-existence of the state of affairs must render performance of the contract impossible; (v) the state of affairs may be the existence, or a vital attribute, of the consideration to be provided or circumstances which must subsist if performance of the contractual adventure is to be possible.

The second and third of these elements are well exemplified by the decision of the High Court of Australia in McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377. The Commission invited tenders for the purchase of "an oil tanker lying on Jourmaund Reef … said to contain oil". The plaintiff tendered successfully for the purchase, fitted out a salvage expedition at great expense and proceeded to the reef. No tanker was to be found – it had never existed. The plaintiff claimed damages for breach of contract. The Commission argued that the contract was void because of a common mistake as to the existence of the tanker.

In the leading judgment Dixon and Fullagar JJ expressed doubt as to the existence of a doctrine of common mistake in contract. They considered that whether impossibility of performance discharged obligations, be the impossibility existing at the time of the contract or supervening thereafter, depended solely upon the construction of the contract. They went on, [704] however, to consider the position if this were not correct. They observed that the common assumption that the tanker existed was one that was created by the Commission, without any reasonable grounds for believing that it was true. They held, at 408:

> a party cannot rely on mutual mistake where the mistake consists of a belief which is, on the one hand, entertained by him without any reasonable ground, and, on the other hand, deliberately induced by him in the mind of the other party.

They held, at 410, that, on its proper construction, the contract included a promise by the Commission that the tanker existed in the position specified. Alternatively, they held that if the doctrine of mistake fell to be applied > then the Commission cannot in this case rely on any mistake as avoiding the contract, because any mistake was induced by the serious fault of their own servants, who asserted the existence of a tanker recklessly and without any reasonable ground.

This seems, if we may say so, an entirely satisfactory conclusion and one that can be reconciled with the English doctrine of mistake. That doctrine fills a gap in the contract where it transpires that it is impossible of performance without the fault of either party and the parties have not, expressly or by implication, dealt with their rights and obligations in that eventuality. In Associated Japanese Bank (International) Ltd v Crédit du Nord SA [1989] 1 WLR 255, 268 Steyn J observed:

> Logically, before one can turn to the rules as to mistake, whether at common law or in equity, one must first determine whether the contract itself, by express or implied condition precedent or otherwise, provides who bears the risk of the relevant mistake. It is at this hurdle that many pleas of mistake will either fail or prove to have been unnecessary. Only if the contract is silent on the point, is there scope for invoking mistake.

In William Sindall plc v Cambridgeshire County Council [1994] 1 WLR 1016, 1035 Hoffmann LJ commented that such allocation of risk can come about by rules of general law applicable to contract, such as "caveat emptor" in the law of sale of goods or the rule that a lessor or vendor of land does not impliedly warrant that the premises are fit for any particular purpose, so that this risk is allocated by the contract to the lessee or purchaser.

Thus, while we do not consider that the doctrine of common mistake can be satisfactorily explained by an implied term, an allegation that a contract is void for common mistake will often raise important issues of construction. Where it is possible to perform the letter of the contract, but it is alleged that there was a common mistake in relation to a fundamental assumption which renders performance of the essence of the obligation impossible, it will be necessary, by construing the contract in the light of all the material circumstances, to decide whether this is indeed the case. In performing this exercise, the test advanced by Diplock LJ, applicable alike to both frustration and to fundamental breach, in Hongkong Fir Shipping Co Ltd v Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd [1962] 2 QB 26 [705], 65-66 can be of assistance:

> Every synallagmatic contract contains in it the seeds of the problem: in what event will a party be relieved of his undertaking to do that which he has agreed to do but has not yet done? The contract may itself expressly define some of these events, as in the cancellation clause in a charterparty; but, human prescience being limited, it seldom does so exhaustively and often fails to do so at all. In some classes of contracts such as sale of goods, marine insurance, contracts of affreightment evidenced by bills of lading and those between parties to bills of exchange, Parliament has defined by statute some of the events not provided for expressly in individual contracts of that class; but where an event occurs the occurrence of which neither the parties nor Parliament have expressly stated will discharge one of the parties from further performance of his undertakings, it is for the court to determine whether the event has this effect or not. The test whether an event has this effect or not has been stated in a number of metaphors all of which I think amount to the same thing: does the occurrence of > the event deprive the party who has further undertakings still to perform of substantially the whole benefit which it was the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract that he should obtain as the consideration for performing those undertakings? This test is applicable whether or not the event occurs as a result of the default of one of the parties to the contract, but the consequences of the event are different in the two cases. Where the event occurs as a result of the default of one party, the party in default cannot rely upon it as relieving himself of the performance of any further undertakings on his part, and the innocent party, although entitled to, need not treat the event as relieving him of the further performance of his own undertakings. This is only a specific application of the fundamental legal and moral rule that a man should not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong. Where the event occurs as a result of the default of neither party, each is relieved of the further performance of his own undertakings, and their rights in respect of undertakings previously performed are now regulated by the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943.

This test may not, however, be adequate in the context of mistake, for there are cases where contracts have been held void for mistake, notwithstanding that the effect of the mistake was that the consideration proved to have substantially greater value than the parties had contemplated.

Once the court determines that unforeseen circumstances have, indeed, resulted in the contract being impossible of performance, it is next necessary to determine whether, on true construction of the contract, one or other party has undertaken responsibility for the subsistence of the assumed state of affairs. This is another way of asking whether one or other party has undertaken the risk that it may not prove possible to perform the contract, and the answer to this question may well be the same as the answer to the question of whether the impossibility of performance is attributable to the fault of one or other of the parties.

Circumstances where a contract is void as a result of common mistake are likely to be less common than instances of frustration. [706] Supervening events which defeat the contractual adventure will frequently not be the responsibility of either party. Where, however, the parties agree that something shall be done which is impossible at the time of making the agreement, it is much more likely that, on true construction of the agreement, one or other will have undertaken responsibility for the mistaken state of affairs. This may well explain why cases where contracts have been found to be void in consequence of common mistake are few and far between.

Lord Atkin himself gave no examples of cases where a contract was rendered void because of a mistake as to quality which made "the thing without the quality essentially different from the thing as it was believed to be". He gave a number of examples of mistakes which did not satisfy this test, which served to demonstrate just how narrow he considered the test to be. Indeed this is further demonstrated by the result reached on the facts of Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161 itself.

Mistake in equity

[31.85] [708] In Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 Denning LJ held that a court has an equitable power to set aside a contract that is binding in law on the ground of common mistake. Subsequently, as Lord Denning MR, in Magee v Pennine Insurance Co Ltd [1969] 2 QB 507, 514 said of Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161:

> I do not propose today to go through the speeches in that case. They have given enough trouble to commentators already. I would say simply this: a common mistake, even on a most fundamental matter, does not make a contract void at law: but it makes it voidable in equity. I analysed the cases in Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671, and I would repeat what I said there, at p 693: "A contract is also liable in equity to be set aside if the parties were under a common misapprehension either as to facts or as to their relative and respective rights, provided that the misapprehension was fundamental and that the party seeking to set it aside was not himself at fault."

[709] Toulson J has taken a different view. He has concluded that it is not possible to differentiate between the test of mistake identified in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd and that advanced by Lord Denning MR as giving rise to the equitable jurisdiction to rescind. He has examined the foundations upon which Lord Denning MR founded his decision in Solle v Butcher and found them defective. These are conclusions that we must review. If we agree with them the question will then arise of whether it was open to him, or is open to this court, to rule that the doctrine of common mistake leaves no room for the intervention of equity.

The following issues fall to be considered in relation to the effect of common mistake in equity. (1) Prior to Bell v Lever Bros Ltd was there established a doctrine under which equity permitted rescission of a contract on grounds of common mistake in circumstances where the contract was valid at common law? (2) Could such a doctrine stand with Bell v Lever Bros Ltd? (3) Is this court none the less bound to find that such a doctrine exists having regard to Solle v Butcher and subsequent decisions?

[718] Toulson J described [the decision by Denning LJ in Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671] as one which "sought to outflank Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161". We think that this was fair comment. It was not realistic to treat the House of Lords in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd as oblivious to principles of equity, nor to suggest that "if it had been considered on equitable grounds the result might have been different". For the reasons that we have given, we do not consider that Cooper v Phibbs LR 2 HL 149 demonstrated or established an equitable jurisdiction to grant rescission for common mistake in circumstances that fell short of those in which the common law held a contract void. In so far as this was in doubt, the House of Lords in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd delimited the ambit of operation of Cooper v Phibbs by holding, rightly or wrongly, that on the facts of that case the agreement in question was void at law and by holding that, on the facts in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd, the mistake had not had the effect of rendering the contract void.

In Bell v Lever Bros Ltd the House of Lords equated the circumstances which rendered a contract void for common mistake with those which discharged the obligations of the parties under the doctrine of frustration. Denning LJ rightly concluded that the facts of Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 [719] did not amount to such circumstances. The equitable jurisdiction that he then asserted was a significant extension of any jurisdiction exercised up to that point and one that was not readily reconcilable with the result in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd.

If the result in Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 extended beyond any previous decision the scope of the equitable jurisdiction to rescind a contract for common mistake, the terms of Denning LJ's judgment left unclear the precise parameters of the jurisdiction. The mistake had to be "fundamental", but how far did this extend beyond Lord Atkin's test [1932] AC 161, 218 of a mistake "as to the existence of some quality which makes the thing without the quality essentially different from the thing as it was believed to be"? The difficulty in answering this question was one of the factors that led Toulson J to conclude that there was no equitable jurisdiction to rescind on the ground of common mistake a contract that was valid in law. Was it open to him after half a century and is it open to this court to find that the equitable jurisdiction that Denning LJ identified in Solle v Butcher was a chimera?

Principles of both equity and common law have been developed by the judges and that is not a process which ceased with the Judicature Act. Does the doctrine of precedent require, or even permit, this court to hold that the jurisdiction that Denning LJ purported to exercise in Solle v Butcher does not exist because that decision was in conflict with that of the House of Lords in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd?

That question first requires consideration of the judgment of Bucknill LJ in Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671. He did not purport to agree with the statements of principle in the judgment of Denning LJ, which he had read in draft. He simply stated that he was applying the principle in Cooper v Phibbs LR 2 HL 149 to an agreement concluded under a mistake as to a matter of fundamental importance. None the less, he expressly concurred in ordering rescission on terms. He observed, at the end of his judgment [1950] 1 KB 671, 689, that the defendant had "established his point that the lease should be rescinded on the ground of common mistake, on a suitable undertaking being given by him as regards a new lease to the plaintiff". This was not a finding that was open to him if Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161 had established that common mistake had no effect on a contract unless it was so significant as to render the contract void. It follows that the majority decision in Solle v Butcher was based on the assumption of a jurisdiction founded in equity to order rescission of a contract binding in law.

[724] A number of cases, albeit a small number, in the course of the last 50 years have purported to follow Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671, yet none of them defines the test of mistake that gives rise to the equitable jurisdiction to rescind in a manner that distinguishes this from the test of a mistake that renders a contract void in law, as identified in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161. This is, perhaps, not surprising, for Denning LJ, the author of the test in Solle v Butcher, set Bell v Lever Bros Ltd at nought. It is possible to reconcile Solle v Butcher and Magee v Pennine Insurance Co Ltd [1969] 2 QB 507 with Bell v Lever Bros Ltd only by postulating that there are two categories of mistake, one that renders a contract void at law and one that renders it voidable in equity. Although later cases have proceeded on this basis, it is not possible to identify that proposition in the judgment of any of the three Lords Justices, Denning, Bucknill and Fenton Atkinson, who participated in the majority decisions in the former two cases. Nor, over 50 years, has it proved possible to define satisfactorily two different qualities of mistake, one operating in law and one in equity.

In Solle v Butcher Denning LJ identified the requirement of a common misapprehension that was "fundamental", and that adjective has been used to describe the mistake in those cases which have followed Solle v Butcher. We do not find it possible to distinguish, by a process of definition, a mistake which is "fundamental" from Lord Atkin's mistake as to quality which "makes the thing [contracted for] essentially different from the thing [that] it was believed to be": [1932] AC 161, 218.

A common factor in Solle v Butcher and the cases which have followed it can be identified. The effect of the mistake has been to make the contract a particularly bad bargain for one of the parties. Is there a principle of equity which justifies the court in rescinding a contract where a common mistake has produced this result?

> Equity is … a body of rules or principles which form an appendage to the general rules of law, or a gloss upon them. In origin at least, it represents the attempt of the English legal system to meet a problem which confronts all legal systems reaching a certain stage of development. In order to ensure the smooth running of society it is necessary to formulate general rules which work well enough in the majority of cases. [725] Sooner or later, however, cases arise in which, in some unforeseen set of facts, the general rules produce substantial unfairness. (Snell's Equity, 30th ed (2000), para 1-03.)

Thus the premise of equity's intrusion into the effects of the common law is that the common law rule in question is seen in the particular case to work injustice, and for some reason the common law cannot cure itself. But it is difficult to see how that can apply here. Cases of fraud and misrepresentation, and undue influence, are all catered for under other existing and uncontentious equitable rules. We are only concerned with the question whether relief might be given for common mistake in circumstances wider than those stipulated in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161. But that, surely, is a question as to where the common law should draw the line; not whether, given the common law rule, it needs to be mitigated by application of some other doctrine. The common law has drawn the line in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd. The effect of Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 is not to supplement or mitigate the common law: it is to say that Bell v Lever Bros Ltd was wrongly decided.

Our conclusion is that it is impossible to reconcile Solle v Butcher with Bell v Lever Bros Ltd. The jurisdiction asserted in the former case has not developed. It has been a fertile source of academic debate, but in practice it has given rise to a handful of cases that have merely emphasised the confusion of this area of our jurisprudence. In paras 110 to 121 of his judgment, Toulson J has demonstrated the extent of that confusion. If coherence is to be restored to this area of our law, it can only be by declaring that there is no jurisdiction to grant rescission of a contract on the ground of common mistake where that contract is valid and enforceable on ordinary principles of contract law. That is the conclusion of Toulson J. Do the principles of case precedent permit us to endorse it? What is the correct approach where this court concludes that a decision of the Court of Appeal cannot stand with an earlier decision of the House of Lords? There are two decisions which bear on this question.

[After considering those decisions, the court continued, at 726:] We have been in some doubt as to whether this line of authority goes far enough to permit us to hold that Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 is not good law …. In this case we have heard full argument, which has provided what we believe has been the first opportunity in this court for a full and mature consideration of the relation between Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161 and Solle v Butcher. In the light of that consideration we can see no way that Solle v Butcher can stand with Bell v Lever Bros Ltd. In these circumstances we can see no option but so to hold.

We can understand why the decision in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd did not find favour with Lord Denning MR. An equitable jurisdiction to grant rescission on terms where a common fundamental mistake has induced a contract gives greater flexibility than a doctrine of common law which holds the contract void in such circumstances. Just as the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943 was needed to temper the effect of the common law doctrine of frustration, so there is scope for legislation to give greater flexibility to our law of mistake than the common law allows.

The result in this case

[31.90] We revert to the question that we left unanswered at paragraph 94. It was unquestionably a common assumption of both parties when the contract was concluded that the two vessels were in sufficiently close proximity to enable the Great Peace to carry out the service that she was engaged to perform. Was the distance between the two vessels so great as to confound that assumption and to render the contractual adventure impossible of performance? If so, the defendants would have an arguable case that the contract was void under the principle in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161.

Toulson J addressed this issue, at para 56:

> Was the Great Peace so far away from the Cape Providence at the time of the contract as to defeat the contractual purpose — or in other words to turn it into something essentially different from that for which the parties bargained? This is a question of fact and degree, but in my view the answer is No. If it had been thought really necessary, the Cape [727] Providence could have altered course so that both vessels were heading toward each other. At a closing speed of 19 knots, it would have taken them about 22 hours to meet. A telling point is the reaction of the defendants on learning the true positions of the vessels. They did not want to cancel the agreement until they knew if they could find a nearer vessel to assist. Evidently the defendants did not regard the contract as devoid of purpose, or they would have cancelled at once.

Mr Reeder has attacked this paragraph on a number of grounds. He has submitted that the suggestion that the Cape Providence should have turned and steamed towards the Great Peace is unreal. We agree.

The defendants were sending a tug from Singapore in an attempt to salve the Cape Providence. The Great Peace was engaged by the defendants to act as a stand-by vessel to save human life, should this prove necessary, as an ancillary aspect of the salvage service. The suggestion that the Cape Providence should have turned and steamed away from the salvage tug which was on its way towards her in order to reduce the interval before the Great Peace was in attendance is unrealistic.

Next Mr Reeder submitted that it was not legitimate for the judge to have regard to the fact that the defendants did not want to cancel the agreement with the Great Peace until they knew whether they could get a nearer vessel to assist. We do not agree. This reaction was a telling indication that the fact that the vessels were considerably further apart than the defendants had believed did not mean that the services that the Great Peace was in a position to provide were essentially different from those which the parties had envisaged when the contract was concluded. The Great Peace would arrive in time to provide several days of escort service. The defendants would have wished the contract to be performed but for the adventitious arrival on the scene of a vessel prepared to perform the same services. The fact that the vessels were further apart than both parties had appreciated did not mean that it was impossible to perform the contractual adventure.

The parties entered into a binding contract for the hire of the Great Peace. That contract gave the defendants an express right to cancel the contract subject to the obligation to pay the "cancellation fee" of five days' hire. When they engaged the Nordfarer they cancelled the Great Peace. They became liable in consequence to pay the cancellation fee. There is no injustice in this result.

For the reasons that we have given, we would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

[31.95] Note

Australian courts are divided on the question whether, following The Great Peace, there remains an equitable jurisdiction in Australian law to set aside contracts for common mistake. In Australia Estates Pty Ltd v Cairns City Council [2005] QCA 328, [52] and [64], Atkinson J (with whom Jerrard J agreed) expressed the view that the law as stated in The Great Peace should be applied (see also Manna v Manna [2008] ACTSC 10; Menegazzo v PriceWaterhouseCoopers (A Firm) [2016] QSC 94, [117]–[124]). In Rees v Rees [2016] VSC 452, on the other hand, McMillan J declined to follow what was said in Australia Estates Pty Ltd v Cairns City Council and granted rescission of a deed on the basis of a common mistake.

Svanosio v McNamara

[31.100] Svanosio v McNamara (1956) 96 CLR 186 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: Executors of a deceased's estate (the vendor) entered into a contract with Svanosio (the purchaser) under which they agreed to sell to him certain general law land together with a victualler's licence in respect of a hotel erected thereon. The purchase price was £5,000, with £800 apportioned to the land and £4,200 in respect of the licence and goodwill. No survey was made and "only a cursory examination" was made of the vendor's title. The conveyance was executed and the licence transferred. It was discovered a few months later that the hotel was in fact only partially built on the land conveyed and that a substantial part of it stood on unalienated Crown land. Both parties had assumed that the hotel was erected on the land described in the conveyance.

Svanosio commenced an action against the executors in which he claimed a declaration that the contract was void for mistake and orders setting aside the conveyance and for the repayment of the purchase price. Martin J dismissed the action. Svanosio appealed to the High Court.]

McTIERNAN, WILLIAMS AND WEBB JJ: [205] The obligation of the vendor under an open contract is to prove his title strictly but open contracts are now rare and contracts, as in the present case, usually contain stipulations relating to the proof of title and giving the vendor the right to rescind the contract if the purchaser takes an objection with which he is unable to comply. Really there are three stages in the sale of land, first the making of the contract of sale, secondly the interval between the making of the contract and its completion to allow the purchaser to investigate the title, to survey the land and make any relevant inquiries as for instance as to tenancies and thirdly the completion of the contract by the conveyance of the land and the payment of the purchase money. It is in this interval between the making of the contract and its completion that the purchaser has the opportunity of satisfying himself whether or not the vendor can make a good title to the whole of the land described in the contract and if he cannot of exercising such rights as are given to him by the contract or the general law. The contract may, as in the present case, provide to some extent for the rights and obligations of the parties where the vendor is unable strictly to perform his obligation to make a good title to the whole of the land [206] sold. Condition 5 of the Fourth Schedule provides that no mistake in the description measurements or area of the land shall invalidate the sale unless the vendor rescinds pursuant to the last preceding condition. It may be that, in the present case, even with this condition in the contract, the court would not have granted specific performance of the contract even with compensation at the suit of the vendors if the mistake had been discovered prior to completion and would have rescinded the contract if the purchaser had been unwilling to complete. Such questions could have arisen if the purchaser had objected in the second stage but it would be useless to discuss them now because the plaintiff did not object to the title as he could have done and in accordance with the third condition in the Schedule must be deemed to have accepted the title. Having accepted the title the plaintiff could have had the land surveyed prior to completion to be certain that the hotel was erected wholly on the land sold. But he neglected to do so. He proceeded blindly to complete the contract.

As it has been said the contract contemplated and provided for a mistake in the description of the land. It gave a right to compensation in that event provided compensation was claimed at the proper time. But the contention is that the contract, nevertheless, was void or voidable because it would not have been entered into but for the mistaken belief of both parties that the hotel building stood wholly on the subject land. Such a mistaken belief could not possibly avoid a contract which contemplates and provides for it. In Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161, Lord Atkin, in discussing the effect of mistake upon the validity of a contract, after referring to Cooper v Phibbs (1867) LR 2 HL 149, to which reference will be made hereafter, said: "Even where the vendor has no title, though both parties think he has, the correct view would appear to be that there is a contract: but that the vendor has either committed a breach of a stipulation as to title, or is not able to perform his contract. The contract is unenforceable by him but is not void": [1932] AC 161 at 218. The peculiar nature of a contract for the sale of land, and in particular the opportunity given to the purchaser of investigating the title and his right to rescind the contract if the vendor fails to show a good title and his alternative right if he so chooses to accept such title as the vendor has, and complete the contract either with or without compensation, places a contract for the sale of land in a special category. Upon the execution of the conveyance the rights and obligations of the parties under the contract are merged in the conveyance except in so far as the contract provides expressly or [207] impliedly that merger shall not take place, for instance where it is intended that a right to compensation given by the contract may be exercised even after completion: Knight Sugar Co Ltd v Alberta Railway & Irrigation Co [1938] 1 All ER 266 at 269. As a result the rights of a purchaser against the vendor, apart from those which arise under covenants for title, for quiet enjoyment etc, included in the conveyance itself or implied by statute, are very limited.

It is clear that a contract for the sale of land cannot be set aside on the ground that the purchaser was induced to enter into it by an innocent material misrepresentation or on the ground that the vendor has innocently concealed some defect of title after completion has taken place. Actual fraud must be proved … The finality of the transaction after conveyance has been emphasised in many cases …. It may be possible in exceptional cases to obtain relief on the ground of common mistake after a contract for the sale of land has been completed. But the cases must be very rare. They are unlikely to go beyond cases where there has been a total failure of consideration. One case is where it is found, after completion, that the purchaser and not the vendor is the owner of the land so that the purchaser is really paying for his own property. In Bingham v Bingham (1748) 1 Ves Sen 126; 27 ER 934, (see also Belts Supplement Ves Sen Supp 79; 28 ER 462), the plaintiff had contracted to purchase land from the defendant, to which the defendant had no title although he believed that he had, which was the property of the plaintiff. The defendant conveyed the land to the plaintiff by deed of lease and re-lease. It was contended that it was the plaintiff's own fault as the title deeds had been produced to him and he had had time to examine the title and the maxim caveat emptor applied. But it was held that there was a plain mistake and a court would not suffer the defendant to run away with the money in consideration of the sale of an estate to which he had no right. This was a case where the mistake was so fundamental that there was a total failure of consideration. The plaintiff had paid to the [208] defendant the purchase money for land which was the property of the plaintiff. In Cooper v Phibbs there was also a total failure of consideration. The plaintiff had agreed to lease a fishery of which he was, unknown to him, the tenant for life from the defendant who had no title at all to the property. In Seddon v North Eastern Salt Co Ltd [1905] 1 Ch 326, Joyce J … held that the court will not grant rescission of an executed contract for the sale of a chattel or chose in action on the ground of an innocent misrepresentation. This principle was applied to an executed lease by the Divisional Court in Angel v Jay [1911] 1 KB 666, and by Devlin J in Edler v Auerbach [1950] 1 KB 359. In Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671, however, decided six weeks later, the Court of Appeal by a majority (Bucknill LJ and Denning LJ, Jenkins LJ dissenting) held that an executed lease can be set aside on the ground that the parties were induced to enter into it by a common mistake … In Leaf v International Galleries [1950] 2 KB 86, however, both [209] Evershed MR and Jenkins LJ reserved their opinions whether Seddon v North Eastern Salt Co Ltd was wrongly decided. We should certainly reserve our opinion on this point as it does not arise directly in the present case. In the case of the sale of land at any rate, relief has never been given on the ground of innocent misrepresentation after the contract has been executed and it is difficult to see why common mistake, unless it leads to a total failure of consideration, should be in any different position. There are dicta in the cases that relief can be given after the contract has been completed where there is a common mistake upon a material point although there is only a partial failure of consideration: Jones v Clifford (1876) 3 Ch D 779; Bettyes v Maynard (1882) 46 LT 766 at 769; Debenham v Sawbridge [1901] 2 Ch 98 at 109. But the proper principle appears to be that, in the case of a completed contract of sale, rescission is only possible on the ground of common mistake where, contrary to the belief of the parties, there is nothing to contract about as in Bingham v Bingham and Cooper v Phibbs.

Contracts for the sale of personal property have been said to be void for mistake where the property has ceased to exist at the date of the contract. Instances of such contracts will be found in the speech of Lord Thankerton (at 236) in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd. In Scott v Coulson [1903] 1 Ch 453 (affirmed [1903] 2 Ch 249), both parties supposed the assured to be alive whereas he was dead. In Couturier v Hastie (1856) 5 HLC 673; 10 ER 1065, the cargo sold was held not to have existed at the date of the sale. In Strickland v Turner (1852) 7 Ex 208; 155 ER 919, the annuitant was in fact dead at the date of the sale of the annuity. These are all cases where the subject matter was not in existence at the date of the sale. But even in these cases the contract is probably not void but merely unenforceable. The one party is unable to supply the very thing that the other party contracted to take and therefore the contract is unenforceable by the one if executory, while if executed the other can recover back money paid on the ground of total failure of consideration: McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377 at 403–8. But it would be hard to find an analogous example in the case of land because land does not cease to exist unless one can take the somewhat fanciful example suggested by Richards CB in Hitchcock v Giddings (1817) 4 Price 135; 146 ER 418, of an estate swept away by a flood. In Bettyes v [210] Maynard, Kay J referred to Earl Beauchamp v Winn (1873) LR 6 HL 223, as a case of a completed contract but, with all respect to that learned judge, the transaction does not appear to have proceeded beyond a contract for the exchange of two properties. In Solle v Butcher Denning LJ referred to the Privy Council setting aside an executed agreement in MacKenzie v Royal Bank of Canada [1934] AC 468, but, with all respect to that learned judge, the Privy Council does not seem to have done more than set aside a contract of guarantee on the ground of a material misrepresentation of fact. Shares were hypothecated to the bank as security for the performance of that contract but the rights of the parties depended on the guarantee and therefore rested in the contract. Neither of these cases appears really to support the conclusion that an executed contract for the sale of property can be rescinded for innocent material misrepresentation or for material common mistake. The only authority for that principle appears to be the decision of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Solle v Butcher, and from the scope of that decision completed contracts for the sale of land are carefully excluded. All that Scrutton LJ said about Seddon v North Eastern Salt Co Ltd, in Lever Bros Ltd v Bell (at 588) was that he reserved liberty to consider the decision so far as it decides that executed contracts cannot be rescinded for innocent and material misrepresentation. He did not seriously examine its correctness. The decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed on appeal by the House of Lords so that it is difficult to see why the observations of Joyce J in Seddon's case should have lost all authority simply because Scrutton LJ threw doubt upon them. In Legge v Croker (1811) 1 Ball & B 506, Manners LC held that an executed lease could not be set aside on the ground that the lessee had been induced to enter into it by a material but innocent misrepresentation. This decision seems to be in conflict with that of the Court of Appeal in Solle v Butcher yet Legge v Croker which was followed in Angel v Jay received the approval of Lord Selborne LC in Brownlie v Campbell (1880) 5 App Cas 925 at 938. At least it could be said that in the case of a sale of land nothing has occurred to throw doubt on the statement of Cozens Hardy J, as he then was, in Re Tyrell; Tyrell v Woodhouse (1900) 82 LT 675 at 675:

> counsel have not been able to discover a single instance of setting aside a purchase after conveyance except because of fraud or total failure of consideration as in [211] Bingham v Bingham and Hitchcock v Giddings (1817) 4 Price 135; 146 ER 418. In Jones v Clifford the court carefully guarded against deciding anything on this point. If I were to say mutual mistake, not being an error in the substance of what was purchased, justified rescission, every purchaser would be applying to get his purchase set aside. I am not prepared to be the first to give such a decision, and my own view is that there is no jurisdiction to set aside the purchase.

In the present case there was at most a partial failure of consideration. The defendants have been able to convey the whole of the land comprised in conveyance No 176, book 221 on which a large part of the hotel is erected, to give the plaintiff vacant possession of the hotel and the licence has been transferred to him. The contract between the parties was never void. It was at most liable to be set aside in equity not on the ground of mistake but for failure by the vendors to show a good title. A vendor need not have a good title at the date of the contract, it is sufficient if he can show that he can make title at the proper time for completion. A vendor can enter into a valid contract to sell land although he has no title at all. If he can enter into such a contract when he knows that he has none, how can it be said that the contract is void if he mistakenly believes that he has a good title? The purchaser can waive, if he chooses, all objections to the title and compel the vendor to execute a conveyance of the land even if he has no title to it at all. The purchaser may think it worth his while to complete the purchase simply to obtain vacant possession of the land taking his chance of it ripening into a possessory title in the future, or he may be prepared to take the chance of the vendor acquiring a good title in the future in which case equity would compel the vendor to make good his promise to convey the land to the purchaser when he subsequently acquired it. "A graft into the old stock" as the Master of the Rolls called it in Seabourne v Powel (1686) 2 Vern 11 at 12; 23 ER 619 at 620, as long ago as 1686. The principle is stated in Smith v Osborne (1857) 6 HLC 375 at 390; 10 ER 1340 at 1347.

The present case on analysis falls completely within the principle that, after the contract has been completed by the execution of the conveyance and the payment of the purchase money, the purchaser, apart from rights arising from the deed of conveyance or subsisting under the contract which do not merge in the deed, has no remedy at law or in equity in respect of any defects either in the title to or in the quantity or quality of the estate: Brett v Clouser (1880) 5 CPD 376 at 386–9. The conveyance having been executed the purchaser must take all the consequences: McCulloch v Gregory (1855) 1 K & J 286 at 291; 69 ER 466 at 468.

The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

[DIXON CJ and FULLAGAR J delivered a similar judgment in which they came to the conclusion that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

[31.105] Note

In Svanosio v McNamara (1956) 96 CLR 186, 195–6, Dixon CJ and Fullagar J stated that "it is difficult to conceive any circumstances in which equity could properly give relief by setting aside the contract unless there has been fraud". This reference to fraud was presumed by Mason ACJ, Murphy and Deane JJ in Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422, 431, to mean "fraud" in the wide equitable sense which includes unconscionable dealing.

RECTIFICATION FOR COMMON MISTAKE

[31.110] Sometimes, when parties reduce their agreement to writing, they fail to record their common intention accurately. Courts have an equitable power to rectify a written contract where the terms do not express the parties' common intention. As Campbell JA noted in Franklins Pty Ltd v Metcash Trading Ltd [2009] NSWCA 407; (2009) 76 NSWLR 603, [444], equity permits rectification in such circumstances because "it is unconscientious for a party to a contract to seek to apply the contract inconsistently with what he or she knows to be the common intention of the parties at the time that the written contract was entered".

Maralinga v Major Enterprises

[31.115] Maralinga Pty Ltd v Major Enterprises Pty Ltd (1973) 128 CLR 336 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Major Enterprises (the respondent) submitted for sale at auction a residential property at Vaucluse, Sydney. It was knocked down to Maralinga (the appellant) for $155,000. Before the sale, it had been made known to the appellant that the contract would incorporate the conditions contained in the standard form of contract approved by the Real Estate Institute of New South Wales. At the auction, the auctioneer stated that a deposit of 10 per cent of the price was to be paid on the signing of the contract and that the sale was subject to Special Condition 23 which he read out, as follows: "The property is sold subject to the demolition of all buildings and improvements to ground level by the Vendor Company at its own expense." He went on to say that the purchaser would have the option of requiring the vendor to demolish the very large house which was on the land. He added that the respondent was offering finance, that it required a cash payment of $75,000 and would allow the balance of the purchase price to remain on first mortgage over three years at 8 per cent fixed interest. The draft contract provided for the payment of the balance of the purchase price on completion and did not contain a provision for any part of the price to remain on mortgage for three years. The appellant was aware of the contents of the draft contract.

At the conclusion of the sale Mr Mutton, who signed the contract on behalf of the appellant, sought to obtain an alteration in Special Condition 23. He wanted the condition to more clearly reflect the notion that the purchaser had an option to require the vendor to demolish the building on the site, as the appellant wished to purchase the property as a residence for Mr Walsh, its principal shareholder. On the instructions of Mr Brady, the managing director of the respondent, this request was met with a curt refusal: "Sign it as it is or the deal is off." Faced with Mr Brady's ultimatum, Mr Mutton signed the contract in the form in which it had been presented.

The appellant sued for rectification and specific performance of the contract as rectified. The appellant sought to have the contract rectified in two respects: first, so that Special Condition 23 conferred an option on the purchaser to require the vendor to demolish the house on the land; secondly, so that in lieu of payment of cash on completion provision was made for a mortgage back to the vendor in the sum of $64,500 for three years at 8 per cent per annum.

The trial judge, Hope J, found that when Mr Mutton signed the contract he knew that it contained Special Condition 23 and provision for payment of cash on completion and that it did not contain the two provisions which the appellant now sought to have included in the contract. However, the judge also found that at the time Mr Mutton believed that Special Condition 23, although not clearly worded, would be interpreted as conferring an option on the purchaser. It was for this reason that Mr Mutton signed the contract without insisting on the amendment which he had proposed. The judge found further that Mr Mutton believed that the auctioneer's statement that $64,500 would be available on mortgage back to the vendor for three years at 8 per cent fixed interest per annum was enforceable as a warranty forming part of the contract or collateral to it. Although the statement conflicted with an express term of the written contract calling for the payment of cash on completion, Mr Mutton evidently attributed no significance to that circumstance and, accordingly, did not request an amendment to the contract to cover the point.

Hope J expressed the view that rectification would have been available so far as special condition 23 was concerned but not as to the terms of payment; and as there was no request for performance of the contract rectified only as to the option, he dismissed the suit. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

MASON J: [348] The appellant's case is that it is entitled to rectification and specific performance on the ground that at the conclusion of the auction the parties had arrived at an oral, albeit unenforceable contract, incorporating the terms which it now seeks to have included in it. The written instrument does not accord with the antecedent agreement and should be reformed so as to give accurate expression to it, so the argument runs.

The first step in the argument is the proposition that the written instrument was intended by the parties merely to record the terms of the bargain reached when the property was knocked down to the appellant. The primary judge did not make a finding on this issue of fact, perhaps because the evidence did not lend itself to such a finding, but he came to conclusions which are relevant to it. His Honour found that Mr Mutton in signing the contract believed that he was executing a written instrument which, when taken together with the warranty as to finance which he considered to be enforceable, gave effect to the terms of the auction sale. But his Honour made it equally clear that Mr Mutton knew that the contract contained an inconsistent provision.

[349] The intentions of the respondent with respect to the written instrument are not as clear, because those acting for the respondent did not give evidence. The primary judge said, with reference to Mr Brady:

> In insisting upon the execution of the contract in the form which had been prepared, he was requiring the purchaser to sign a contract which he knew to be different in its effect to the basis on which the property had been knocked down to the purchaser, and I think that his firm decision as to the contract was the reason why he refused even to read Mr Mutton's draft clause which Mr Pillinger brought to show him.

Although Mr Brady did not give evidence, I am not persuaded that his Honour's conclusion was incorrect.

In these circumstances the statement that the written instrument was signed merely to record the terms of the oral bargain is in my view neither sufficient nor accurate. Both parties knew that the written instrument contained a provision for payment of cash on completion and that it differed from the terms of the antecedent bargain; yet they signed it. So in this respect the written instrument was not executed as the result of a mistaken belief as to what it contained. Mr Mutton was mistaken as to its effect but not as to its contents.

The conditions according to which relief by way of rectification will be granted have been variously stated. In Fowler v Fowler (1859) 4 De G & J 250 at 265; 45 ER 97 at 103, Lord Chelmsford LC said that the person seeking rectification must establish clearly: "that the alleged intention to which he desires [the instrument] to be made conformable continued concurrently in the minds of all parties down to the time of its execution, and also must be able to shew exactly and precisely the form to which the deed ought to be brought."

On other occasions statements have been made which emphasise that it is for the plaintiff to show that by the writing sought to be rectified the parties intended to record the terms of an antecedent oral bargain and that by common mistake there is a disconformity between the oral bargain and the writing: United States of America v Motor Trucks Ltd [1924] AC 196 at 200 per Earl of Birkenhead.

The difference in expression is not of importance. It is explained partly by the difference in the character of written instruments sought to be rectified and partly by the more recent desire to emphasise that the remedy is designed to relieve against the mistaken expression of the true agreement of the parties.

As Buckley LJ said in Lovell and Christmas Ltd v Wall (1911) 104 LT 85 at 93: [350] "For rectification it is not enough to set about to find what one or even both of the parties to the contract intended. What you have to find out is what intention was communicated by one side to the other, and with what common intention and common agreement they made their bargain."

What is of importance is that the purpose of the remedy is to make the instrument conform to the true agreement of the parties where the writing by common mistake fails to express that agreement accurately. And there has been a firm insistence on the requirement that the mistake as to the writing must be common to the parties and not merely unilateral, except in cases of a special class to which I shall later refer.

It is now settled that the existence of an antecedent agreement is not essential to the grant of relief by way of rectification. It may be granted in cases in which the instrument sought to be rectified constitutes the only agreement between the parties, but does not reflect their common intention: Shipley Urban District Council v Bradford Corporation [1936] Ch 375; Slee v Warke (1949) 86 CLR 271. But this circumstance does not affect what I have already said.

The strength of the appellant's case is that at the conclusion of the auction there was a valid albeit unenforceable agreement between the parties and the written instrument does not conform to it. Moreover, at all times up to the conclusion of the auction, the parties intended that a written contract would be executed to record the terms of the auction sale.

Even so, in order to succeed the appellant must show that the parties intended by the writing to give effect to the whole of the antecedent agreement and that by common mistake it failed to do so …

It may be asked why should a plaintiff be required to establish more than disconformity between the antecedent agreement and the written instrument. Why should he be called upon to show that the writing was intended to give effect to the whole of the oral [351] contract and that by common mistake the written instrument failed to do so? The answer lies in the circumstance that the court must be satisfied that the instrument does not reflect the true agreement of the parties. It cannot be so satisfied unless the writing was intended to record the earlier agreement and by the mistake of the parties it fails to do so. If the plaintiff fails to establish these elements he does not displace the hypothesis arising from execution of the written instrument, namely, that it is the true agreement of the parties.

Mr Mutton did not intend to give effect to the entire antecedent agreement by the writing. He was content to allow the auctioneer's statement as to finance to remain apart from the written contract. Furthermore, the appellant and the respondent, knowing through Mr Mutton and Mr Brady respectively that the contract contained a provision requiring payment of cash on completion, executed the contract with that knowledge.

Accordingly, the appellant has not shown that in this respect the instrument was intended to record the antecedent oral agreement or that the instrument by common mistake failed to conform to that agreement. The parties assented to a provision calling for payment of cash on completion which differed from that agreement. They were not mistaken as to the contents of the written instrument. Although Mr Mutton was mistaken in the reason which led him to accept the contract in its written form, the unilateral mistake which he made as to its legal effect was not a mistake of the kind that grounds rectification.

An alternative argument was advanced by the appellant based on a series of authorities which are said to decide that if one party to a transaction knows that the instrument contains a mistake in its favour but does nothing to correct it, he will be precluded from asserting that the mistake is unilateral and not common. In my opinion this principle has no application to this case as there was no relevant mistake on the part of the appellant as to the contents of the written contract.

In the result I am of opinion that the primary judge was correct in concluding that the appellant was not entitled to rectification by inserting in the contract a provision for finance conforming to the auctioneer's statement. There is little point in considering the appellant's case in so far as it relates to Special Condition 23 as the [352] appellant has always insisted on performance of the contract on the footing that it contained, or should contain, the provision for finance, but for my part I do not consider that the appellant established a case for rectification of the Special Condition.

Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal.

[MENZIES J agreed with Mason J. BARWICK CJ dissented.]

Appeal dismissed.

Pukallus v Cameron

[31.120] Pukallus v Cameron (1982) 180 CLR 447 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: The parties entered into a written contract for the sale of land described as "Subdivision 1 of Portion 1154". Both parties believed that subdivision 1 included a bore and an area of cultivated land which they inspected together before the contract was signed. After the sale was completed, the purchaser discovered that the area of land in question was part of subdivision 2. The purchaser sought rectification of the contract. The trial judge ordered rectification of the contract on the following basis:

> by omitting from the description of the property the reference to area and by including in the description all that land south of the boundary between Subdivisions 1 and 2 of Portion 1154 which lies north of a line drawn parallel to it across Subdivision 2 passing through the southernmost point of the 27 acres of agricultural land mentioned in the Statement of Claim.

The vendor successfully appealed to the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Queensland. The purchaser appealed to the High Court.]

WILSON J: [452] The case raises no issue as to the principles which govern the rectification of a contract. Those principles are not in dispute. There need not be a concluded antecedent contract, but there must be an intention common to both parties at the time of contract to include in their bargain a term which by mutual mistake is omitted therefrom: Crane v Hegeman-Harris Co Inc, [1939] 1 All ER 662, 664; Slee v Warke (1949) 86 CLR 271, 280; Joscelyne v Nissen [1970] 2 QB 86, 98; Maralinga Pty Ltd v Major Enterprises Pty Ltd (1973) 128 CLR 336, 350. So long as there is a continuing common intention of the parties, it may not be necessary to show that the accord found outward expression, notwithstanding the views expressed to the contrary in Joscelyne [1970] 2 QB, 98, and Maralinga (1973) 128 CLR, 350. The opposing view is argued by Mr Bromley QC in an article in the Law Quarterly Review [Leonard Bromley, "Rectification in Equity" (1971) 87 LQR 532]. It is unnecessary to pursue the distinction in the present case because the representation of the respondent and its acceptance by the appellants plainly established such an accord.

The second principle governing the rectification of a contract which is material to this case is that which requires the plaintiff to advance "convincing proof" (12) that the written contract does not embody the final intention of the parties. The omitted ingredient must be capable of such proof in clear and precise terms: Australian Gypsum Ltd and Australian Plaster Co Ltd v Hume Steel Ltd (1930) 45 CLR 54, 64; Slee v Warke (1949) 86 CLR, 281; Maralinga (1973) 128 CLR, 349. The Court must not assume for itself the task of making the contract for the parties.

[453] … There is no evidence to support a finding of an intention to contract for the sale of the bore and cultivated area. The intention was to effect a transfer of subdivision 1 of Portion 1154, a parcel of land which was thought erroneously, to include the bore and cultivated area. If the mistake had been discovered before the conveyance was effected, the appellants could no doubt have avoided the contract. In view of the uncertainty surrounding the location of the boundary which was manifest throughout the negotiations it would clearly have been prudent for the appellants to have undertaken their own survey or to have insisted on the respondent fulfilling his undertaking in that regard. The conditions of the contract which I have set out, excepting the paragraph numbered 33, emphasize both the customary opportunity and the responsibility resting on a purchaser of land.

Secondly, even if a new boundary was in contemplation, the appellants face the difficulty of proving the precise term which it is said was agreed between the parties and which through mutual mistake was not incorporated in the written contract. It is not enough merely to prove that the bore and twenty-seven acres of cultivated land were intended to be included in the land the subject of the sale. Although the learned trial judge made a finding in those terms, he recognized that the evidence required the fixation of a new boundary line parallel to the present southern boundary to subdivision 1. The evidence led for the appellants failed to establish such a line with any clarity.

[31.125] BRENNAN J: [457] In the present case, the parties had not identified, by reference to fences or other topographical features, the precise boundaries of the parcel the subject of the sale before they entered into the written contract. That contract identified the parcel according to its survey description, and no antecedent common intention was proved to displace the hypothesis that the survey description expresses the true contractual intention of the parties. On the contrary, the hypothesis is strengthened by cl 33 which provides that the vendor should reposition on the true southern boundary of subdivision 1 a fence which had been erected in the vicinity but not on that boundary.

Rectification of the contract to include a parcel of land lying outside and to the south of subdivision 1 could not be decreed merely on proof that the parties mistakenly believed that the bore and the cultivation lay within the boundaries of subdivision 1. Rectification could be decreed only upon proof that the parties intended that a further parcel of land, precisely identified, was to be included in the sale. In the absence of evidence of such an intention, the claim for rectification was bound to fail. There was no evidence tending to show that Mr Pukallus and Mr Cameron had agreed on a southern boundary corresponding with that fixed by the order of the learned trial judge. The mistake shared by Mr Pukallus and Mr Cameron was not a mistake as to the embodying of their [458] intention in the written contract. The only mistake was a mistake as to what features were within the boundaries of the land sold.

It follows that the order for rectification and the consequential orders made by the learned trial judge were rightly set aside by the Full Court.

[GIBBS CJ delivered a short judgment agreeing with Wilson J. MURPHY J dismissed the appeal on the basis that equitable relief is not available to set aside a conveyance of land made under a written contract "except for fraud or total failure of consideration or what practically amounts to total failure of consideration", citing Svanosio v McNamara (1956) 96 CLR 186, 198 and 206–12.]

Appeal dismissed.

1. The decision in Pukallus v Cameron should not be understood to mean that the mistake must relate to the words used, rather than their legal effect. The authorities were extensively reviewed by the New South Wales Court of Appeal in Commissioner of Stamp Duties v Carlenka Pty Ltd (1995) 41 NSWLR 329. In that case an amendment to a trust deed was intended to permit the distribution of income to a particular beneficiary. The words used had the additional unintended effect of entitling the beneficiary to share in the capital of the trust and this had adverse stamp duty consequences. The trial judge rectified the document by adding words that prevented the distribution of capital to the beneficiary. The Court of Appeal upheld the order for rectification, notwithstanding that the party signing the document intended to execute it in that form. The court concluded (at 340 and 343) that rectification overcomes "mistaken expression of the true agreement" and is available where the parties have deliberately "used words which, when properly construed, do not accord express their true intention". Rectification is available where the parties are mistaken as to the meaning or effect of the words they have used. The crucial requirement is that there must be a lack of correspondence between the form of the document and the common intention of the parties.
2. Rectification for common mistake was granted by the High Court in Simic v New South Wales Land and Housing Corporation [2016] HCA 47; (2016) 260 CLR 85. Performance bonds were issued by a bank pursuant to a construction contract entered into by the bank's customer. By mistake, the bonds were expressed to be in favour of "New South Wales Land & Housing Department" (a non-existent government department) rather than "New South Wales Land & Housing Corporation". They were rectified to accord with the intentions of the bank and its customer. Gageler, Nettle and Gordon JJ said:

> [103] Rectification is an equitable remedy, the purpose of which is to make a written instrument "conform to the true agreement of the parties where the writing by common mistake fails to express that agreement accurately" (Maralinga Pty Ltd v Major Enterprises Pty Ltd (1973) 128 CLR 336, 350; see also Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority (NSW) (1982) 149 CLR 337, 346). For relief by rectification, it must be demonstrated that, at the time of the execution of the written instrument sought to be rectified, there was an "agreement" between the parties in the sense that the parties had a "common intention", and that the written instrument was to conform to that agreement (Slee v Warke (1949) 86 CLR 271, 281; Maralinga (1973) 128 CLR 336, 350-351). Critically, it must also be demonstrated that the written instrument does not reflect the "agreement" because of a common mistake (Maralinga (1973) 128 CLR 336, 350-351). Unless those elements are established, the "hypothesis arising from execution of the written instrument, namely, that it is the true agreement of the parties" cannot be displaced (Maralinga (1973) 128 CLR 336, 350-351).
> [104] The issue may be approached by asking – what was the actual or true common intention of the parties (Ryledar Pty Ltd v Euphoric Pty Ltd (2007) 69 NSWLR 603, 642 [182], [185])? There is no requirement for communication of that common intention by express statement (Bishopsgate Insurance Australia Ltd v Commonwealth Engineering (NSW) Pty Ltd [1981] 1 NSWLR 429, 431; Bush v National Australia Bank Ltd (1992) 35 NSWLR 390, 405–406), but it must at least be the parties' actual intentions, viewed objectively from their words or actions, and must be correspondingly held by each party (Bush v National Australia Bank Ltd (1992) 35 NSWLR 390, 405-406). (Footnotes omitted)

3. In his influential judgment in Ryledar Pty Ltd v Euphoric Pty Ltd [2007] NSWCA 65; (2007) 69 NSWLR 603, [273]–[315], Campbell JA made a strong argument that, because rectification is concerned to prevent unconscientious departure from a "common intention", the parties' intentions must be sufficiently disclosed to one another to be understood as "common". His Honour also set out the following propositions:

> [182] It follows from the foregoing that first, the common intention which must be established by clear and convincing proof to justify rectification must be the actual or true common intention of the parties. Second, evidence of that intention may be ascertained not only from the external or outward expressions of the parties manifested by their objective words or conduct but also from evidence of their subjective states of mind.
> [183] Third, where, for instance, the correspondence between and/or conduct of the parties establishes a positive lack of an "objective" common intention, then that evidence must be taken in conjunction with the evidence (if any) of their subjective states of mind to determine whether the necessary common intention has been established. In the example posited, that would be highly unlikely.
>
> [184] Fourth, in Westland Savings Bank v Hancock [1987] 2 NZLR 21, 31 it was held by Tipping J that a party subsequently acting as if the instrument stood in the form into which it is sought to be rectified was strong evidence of that party's intention at the time to execute the instrument in its rectified form. Such conduct is obviously of significance but, depending on other evidence, if any, is not necessarily conclusive although in the absence of any such evidence it may be.
> [185] Fifth, it follows that where the correspondence and/or conduct positively establishes the necessary common intention, then assertions by the party opposing rectification of his or her subjective state of mind which is inconsistent with that party's outward manifestation of his or her intention, being unexpressed and uncommunicated, is unlikely to trump his or her expressed intention. But this is because that party is unlikely to be believed.

> [186] Sixth, whereas in the present case, the outward expression of the parties' common intention is at best inconclusive, then establishing that the subjective states of mind of the parties evinces the relevant common intention becomes critical if the necessary standard of proof to support an order for rectification is to be achieved.
> [187] I would therefore reject [the appellant's] submission that rectification in the present case must be ordered where an outward expression of the parties' common intention is said to be established by their correspondence and conduct notwithstanding the primary judge's finding that that intention was not in fact held by one or both parties in terms of their respective subjective states of mind.

MUTUAL MISTAKE

[31.130] We are now concerned with situations where the parties are so much at cross purposes that it can be said that, subjectively speaking, they are not in agreement; for example, they intend to contract on different terms. As noted earlier in this chapter, mistakes of this kind are described as either mutual or unilateral.

If A offers B a painting for US$5,000 and B accepts the offer, mistakenly thinking the price is AU$5,000, there is no actual coincidence of offer and acceptance. The mistakes are mutual in the sense that, assuming A did not know of B's mistake about the price, the parties are mistaken about each other's intentions. The effect of such mistakes tends to be resolved by common law construction principles. Adopting the objective approach used to construe contracts, the question becomes: "Did B appear to accept the US$5,000 offer?" If B did, then there would be a valid contract on A's terms despite B's mistake. If B then refuses to complete because she was mistaken, she will be in breach of the contract.

There are, however, situations in which principles of contractual interpretation do not clearly establish that one party was correct and the other mistaken. The mistake remains mutual. In Raffles v Wichelhaus (1864) 2 H & C 906; 159 ER 375, the defendant agreed to purchase 125 bags of cotton "to arrive ex 'Peerless' from Bombay". When the cotton arrived in London, the defendant refused to accept delivery. His defence was that he had been ready to receive cotton from the Peerless that sailed from Bombay in October, but the plaintiff proffered cotton from a different ship of the same name that left Bombay in December. The court gave judgment for the defendant but did not explain its reasons for doing so. It apparently accepted the argument that as each party intended a different ship, there was no consensus. It appears that no common intention could be objectively inferred from the conduct of the parties and the words of their agreement – the contract did not clearly identify which ship the goods were to be transported on other than by name. Because of the ambiguity, the agreement failed to meet the certainty requirement (see Chapter 6). Thus, no contract was formed. The mistaken party is not bound by the contract but this does not mean the court provided relief against mistake. Rather, under the ordinary principles of contract formation, no contract was formed.

Equity follows the law with regard to mutual mistakes. As the non-mistaken party is unaware of the mistake, there is no equitable basis for interfering with the common law outcome.

UNILATERAL MISTAKE AS TO TERMS: COMMON LAW (VOID) AND EQUITY (RESCISSION)

[31.135] Where the parties, subjectively speaking, are not in agreement, but the understanding of one of the parties accords with what a reasonable person would think was intended (ie that party's understanding reflects the correct objective interpretation of the contract), the mistake is described as unilateral.

As with common mistakes, the common law typically resolves instances of unilateral mistake through construction of the contract. To return to the painting example in the previous section, if a reasonable person would understand the buyer of a painting to have agreed to pay $US5,000 as the price of the painting, the buyer is bound to pay that price even if he or she thought the price was AU$5,000. The outcome may be different, however, if the non-mistaken party knows of the mistake. In Chwee Kin Keong v Digiland.com Pte Ltd [2005] SGCA 2; [2005] 1 SLR 502, the respondent had mistakenly posted the price of commercial laser printers on its website. It advertised the printers at $66 when in fact the model in question typically sold for well over $3,000. The description of the printer simply read "55". The appellants placed between them orders over the internet for 1,606 commercial laser printers. When the respondent became aware of the mistake it informed all customers who had placed orders that it would not be meeting the orders. The respondents unsuccessfully argued that the contract was conditional upon the printers being available. However, a separate argument by the respondent that the contract was void at common law by reason of mistake was successful. Chao Hick Tin JA (who delivered the judgment of the Singaporean Court of Appeal) noted that this finding involved a departure from the objective approach employed by the common law to determine whether a contract has come into being. His Honour justified this departure (at [31]) by noting that:

> The reason behind this exception is self-evident, as a party who is aware of the error made by the other party cannot claim that there is consensus ad idem. The law should not go to the aid of a party who knows that the objective appearance does not correspond with reality. It would go against the grain of justice if the law were to deem the mistaken party bound by such a contract.

If one party knows the other is mistaken, is it appropriate to treat the contract as void at law (by relaxing the objective approach), or is it preferable to treat the contract as valid at law (under the objective approach) and voidable in equity (which is less concerned about responding to the subjective)? The resolution of this question requires an examination of the following two cases: Smith v Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597, extracted at [31.140]; Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422, extracted at [31.150].

Smith v Hughes

[31.140] Smith v Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597 (Court of Queen's Bench) – Appeal from the County Court.

[FACTS: The plaintiff offered to sell to the defendant oats and exhibited a sample; the defendant took the sample and on the following day wrote to say that he would take the oats at the price of 34s per quarter. The defendant afterwards refused to accept the oats on the ground that they were new, and he thought he was buying old oats. The plaintiff, who knew the oats were new, refused to take them back and sued for the price. There was a conflict of evidence as to what took place between the plaintiff and the defendant. The judge left two questions to the jury:

1. Was the word "old" used? If so, there should be verdict for the defendant.
2. If the word "old" was not used, did the plaintiff believe the defendant to be under the impression that he was contracting for old oats? If so, verdict for the defendant.

The jury found for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed on the ground that the judge's direction to the jury was incorrect.]

BLACKBURN J: [607] I apprehend that if one of the parties intends to make a contract on one set of terms, and the other intends to make a contract on another set of terms, or, as it is sometimes expressed, if the parties are not ad idem, there is no contract, unless the circumstances are such as to preclude one of the parties from denying that he has agreed to the terms of the other. The rule of law is that stated in Freeman v Cooke (1848) 2 Ex 654; 18 LJ (Ex) 119; 154 ER 652. If, whatever a man's real intention may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would believe that he was assenting to the terms proposed by the other party, and that other party upon that belief enters into the contract with him, the man thus conducting himself would be equally bound as if he had intended to agree to the other party's terms.

The jury was directed that, if they believed the word "old" was used, they should find for the defendant; and this was right, for if that was the case, it is obvious that neither did the defendant intend to enter into a contract on the plaintiff's terms, [608] that is, to buy this parcel of oats without any stipulation as to their quality; nor could the plaintiff have been led to believe that he was intending to do so.

But the second direction raises the difficulty. I think that, if from that direction the jury would understand that they were first to consider whether they were satisfied that the defendant intended to buy this parcel of oats on the terms that it was part of his contract with the plaintiff that they were old oats, so as to have the warranty of the plaintiff to that effect, they were properly told that, if that was so, the defendant could not be bound to a contract without any such warranty, unless the plaintiff was misled. But I doubt whether the direction would bring to the minds of the jury the distinction between agreeing to take the oats under the belief that they were old, and agreeing to take the oats under the belief that the plaintiff contracted that they were old.

The difference is the same as that between buying a horse believed to be sound, and buying one believed to be warranted sound; but I doubt if it was made obvious to the jury.

[31.145] HANNEN J: [609] [O]ne of the parties to an apparent contract may, by his own fault, be precluded from setting up that he had entered into it in a different sense to that in which it was understood by the other party. Thus in the case of a sale by sample where the vendor, by mistake, exhibited a wrong sample, it was held that the contract was not avoided by this error of the vendor: Scott v Littledale (1858) 8 E & B 815; 27 LJ (QB) 201.

But if in the last mentioned case the purchaser, in the course of the negotiations preliminary to the contract, had discovered that the vendor was under a misapprehension as to the sample he was offering, the vendor would have been entitled to shew that he had not intended to enter into the contract by which the purchaser [610] sought to bind him. The rule of law applicable to such a case is a corollary from the rule of morality which Mr Pollock cited from Paley (Moral and Political Philosophy, Book III, ch v), that a promise is to be performed: "in that sense in which the promiser apprehended at the time the promisee received it", and may be thus expressed: "The promiser is not bound to fulfil a promise in a sense in which the promisee knew at the time the promiser did not intend it."

And in considering the question, in what sense a promisee is entitled to enforce a promise, it matters not in what way the knowledge of the meaning in which the promiser made it is brought to the mind of the promisee, whether by express words, or by conduct, or previous dealings, or other circumstances. If by any means he knows that there was no real agreement between him and the promiser, he is not entitled to insist that the promise shall be fulfilled in a sense to which the mind of the promiser did not assent.

If, therefore, in the present case, the plaintiff knew that the defendant, in dealing with him for oats, did so on the assumption that the plaintiff was contracting to sell him old oats, he was aware that the defendant apprehended the contract in a different sense to that in which he meant it, and he is thereby deprived of the right to insist that the defendant shall be bound by that which was only the apparent, and not the real bargain.

[COCKBURN CJ delivered a judgment in which he concluded that the trial judge was wrong in leaving the second question to the jury.]

Appeal allowed and order for a new trial.

Taylor v Johnson

[31.150] Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Mrs Johnson granted an option to Mr Taylor or his nominee to purchase two adjoining lots of vacant land, each comprising approximately five acres, for a total purchase price of $15,000. The option was exercised by Mr Taylor, and Mrs Johnson entered into a written contract for the sale of the land with Mr Taylor's nominees, his children. The purchase price was $15,000 as provided in the option. Subsequently, Mrs Johnson declined to perform the contract on the ground that she had mistakenly believed that the agreements provided for a price of $15,000 per acre of the subject land, which would have represented a total purchase price of approximately $150,000. The Taylors claimed specific performance and Mrs Johnson sought an order setting aside the contract of sale. Powell J found that the contract was binding on its terms and ordered specific performance. His Honour found that Mrs Johnson had in fact mistakenly believed that the consideration specified was $15,000 per acre but also found that Mr Taylor was unaware of her mistake. On appeal by Mrs Johnson to the New South Wales Court of Appeal, that court set aside the contract, holding that Mr Taylor believed that Mrs Johnson was probably mistaken as to what the option and contract stipulated as the price. Mr Taylor appealed to the High Court.]

MASON ACJ, MURPHY AND DEANE JJ: [428] The judgments of Blackburn and Hannen JJ in Smith v Hughes (1871) LR 6 QB 597 at 607, 609, provide support for the proposition that a contract is void if one party to the contract enters into it under a serious mistake as to the content or existence of a fundamental term and the other party has knowledge of that mistake. That approach accorded with what has been called the "subjective theory" of the nature of the assent necessary to constitute a valid contract: but compare Holland, The Elements of Jurisprudence (12th ed, 1916), pp 264–5. The "subjective theory", it will be recalled, was advanced by, among others, Williams in his Vendor and Purchaser (4th ed, 1936), p 748, fn (m), and is that the true consent of the parties is essential to a valid contract. The contrary view, namely that described as the "objective theory", was asserted by, among others, Holmes J in The Common Law (1881), Lecture IX, and is that the law is concerned, not with the real intentions of the parties, but with the outward manifestations of those intentions. In practice, as between the contracting parties, there is little difference in the result of the application of the two competing theories since allied with any assertion of the "subjective theory" is acceptance of one manifestation of the doctrine of estoppel which would ordinarily operate to preclude one, who had so conducted himself that a reasonable man would believe that he was assenting to the terms of a proposed contract, from leading evidence as to what his real intentions were.

As a matter of legal technique there is a significant difference between the two theories. This is best illustrated by setting out the [429] consequences which flow from the application of each theory to a case in which a contract is successfully impeached on the ground of unilateral mistake. According to the subjective theory, there is no binding contract either at common law or in equity, equity following the common law in this respect. Of course in deciding whether the contract is void ab initio for the unilateral mistake, regard will be had to the doctrine of estoppel in order to determine whether effect should be given to the claim that there has been unilateral mistake. On the other hand, according to the objective theory, there is a contract which, in conformity with the common law, continues to be binding, unless and until it is avoided in accordance with equitable principles which take as their foundation a contract valid at common law but transform it so that it becomes voidable. The important distinction between the two approaches is that, according to the subjective theory, the contract is void ab initio, whereas according to the objective theory, it is voidable only.

While the sounds of conflict have not been completely stilled, the clear trend in decided cases and academic writings has been to leave the objective theory in command of the field. It is unnecessary to examine the reasons for this. A convenient statement of them can be found in Williston on Contracts (3rd ed, 1970), vol 13, s 1537. In the United Kingdom, the decisive turning point leading to the near eclipse of the subjective theory was probably the speech of Lord Atkin in Bell v Lever Bros Ltd [1932] AC 161 at 217–27. In due course, Denning LJ, basing himself on Lord Atkin's speech, formulated a more general proposition than Lord Atkin's comments would, on analysis, warrant (see Lord Atkin's example of a case where "unilateral mistake by the seller of goods will prevent a contract from arising": at 217–18). In Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 at 691, Denning LJ said:

> once a contract has been made, that is to say, once the parties, whatever their inmost states of mind, have to all outward appearances agreed with sufficient certainty in the same terms on the same subject matter, then the contract is good unless and until it is set aside for failure of some condition on which the existence of the contract depends, or for fraud, or on some equitable ground.

His Lordship then went on to say:

> Neither party can rely on his own mistake to say it was a nullity from the beginning, no matter that it was a mistake which to his mind was fundamental, and no matter that the other party knew that he was under a mistake.

While the mistake in Solle v Butcher was a mistake of fact which [430] affected the operation of a formal written contract, it is plain that the above remarks of Denning LJ were intended to extend to a mistake as to the existence or content of an actual term of such a contract.

In McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377 at 407–8, and in Svanosio v McNamara (1956) 96 CLR 186 at 195–6, which were cases involving formal written contracts, Dixon CJ and Fullagar J referred with approval to the remarks of Denning LJ. In Svanosio, their Honours quoted those remarks and continued (at 196):

> "Mistake" might, of course, afford a ground on which equity would refuse specific performance of a contract, and there may be cases of "mistake" in which it would be so inequitable that a party should be held to his contract that equity would set it aside. No rule can be laid down a priori as to such cases (see an article by Blackburn in (1955) 7 Res Judicatae, at 43). But we would agree with Shatwell (1955) 33 Can BR 186 at 187 that it is difficult to conceive any circumstances in which equity could properly give relief by setting aside the contract unless there has been fraud or misrepresentation or a condition can be found expressed or implied in the contract.

Denning LJ, in Solle v Butcher, had likewise expressed the view that, in the absence of fraud or misrepresentation, resort must be had to equity to escape from the terms of a contract on the ground of unilateral mistake.

McRae and Svanosio, like Solle v Butcher, were not cases involving a mistake as to the existence or content of an actual term of the written contract. There is, however, nothing in the joint judgments of Dixon CJ and Fullagar J which would exclude such a case from their acceptance of the general proposition that neither party to a contract "can rely on his own mistake to say it was a nullity from the beginning, no matter that it was a mistake which to his mind was fundamental, and no matter that the other party knew that he was under a mistake". Whether that proposition should properly be accepted as applying in the case of an informal contract or in the case where there is a mistake as to the identity of the other party are questions which can be left to another day. It would seem that it does not apply in a case where the mistake is as to the nature of the contract. For the present, but not without hesitation (see, for example, Robert A Munro & Co v Meyer [1930] 2 KB 312 at 333–4; Chitty on Contracts (24th ed, 1977), vol 1, para 337; Joscelyne v [431] Nissen [1970] 2 QB 86 at 95–7), we are prepared to accept it as applicable to a case, such as the present, where the mistake is as to the existence or content of an actual term in a formal written contract. It therefore becomes necessary to consider the scope of the basis upon which relief in equity is available from the contractual consequences of unilateral mistake. Dixon CJ and Fullagar J referred, in the above passage from their judgment in Svanosio, to a difficulty in conceiving circumstances in which equity could properly give relief by setting aside the contract unless there had been fraud or misrepresentation or a condition could be found expressed or implied in the contract. Presumably, their Honours were referring to "fraud" in the wide equitable sense which includes unconscionable dealing. If they were not, we do not share the difficulty to which they referred. To the contrary, it seems to us that the reported cases, including Solle v Butcher itself, readily provide concrete examples of such circumstances.

In Torrance v Bolton (1872) LR 8 Ch App 118 at 124, James LJ (with whom Mellish LJ agreed) explained the basis upon which a contract for sale was set aside in a case of unilateral mistake as being the ordinary jurisdiction of equity "to deal with" any instrument or other transaction "in which the court is of opinion that it is unconscientious for a person to avail himself of the legal advantage which he has obtained." Special circumstances will ordinarily need to be shown before it would be unconscientious for one party to a written contract to enforce it against another party who was under a mistake as to its terms or its subject matter. In Solle v Butcher (at 692) Denning LJ gave, as examples of such special circumstances, the case where the mistake of the one party has been induced by a material misrepresentation of the other and the case where "one party, knowing that the other is mistaken about the terms of an offer, or the identity of the person by whom it is made, lets him remain under his delusion and concludes a contract on the mistaken terms instead of pointing out the mistake".

In Riverlate Properties Ltd v Paul [1975] Ch 133, the English Court of Appeal accepted (at 145) that a conveyance which included a building, due to a mistake on the part of one party which was known to the other party, could be rescinded, though rectification in that situation appeared to be a preferable remedy (see also, as to the rectification for unilateral mistake, Thomas Bates Ltd v Wyndham's Ltd [1981] 1 WLR 505 at 514–16).

[432] In the United States and Canada the rule that relief from contractual obligations on the ground of unilateral mistake will be granted where enforcement of the contract would be unconscionable is well established. Indeed, in those jurisdictions the rule is expressed to apply to all contracts, formal and informal, when one party knows or ought to know that the other party is mistaken: see, for example, McMaster University v Wilchar Construction Ltd (1971) 22 DLR (3d) 9 at 22 et seq; Stepps Investments Ltd v Security Capital Corp Ltd (1976) 73 DLR (3d) 351 at 362–4; Corbin on Contracts (1950), vol 3, s 608, p 671; Williston, s 1573. It has been said that the rule applies when one party knows that the other party is, or might well be, mistaken: Stepps at 359. The same result ensues when one party causes the other party's mistake: Corbin, s 610, p 692; Coleman v Holecek 542 F (2d) 532 at 535–6 (1976). And it matters not that the mistake is, or may be, due to negligence or want of care on the part of the party who is mistaken when the other party has not materially changed his position and third party rights are not in question: De Paola v City of New York 394 NYS (2d) 525 at 527–8 (1977). Professor Corbin (Corbin, s 610, p 692) summarised the United States position as follows: "There is practically universal agreement that, if the material mistake of one party was caused by the other, either purposely or innocently, or was known to him, or was of such character and accompanied by such circumstances that he has reason to know of it, the mistaken party has a right to rescission."

The particular proposition of law which we see as appropriate and adequate for disposing of the present appeal may be narrowly stated. It is that a party who has entered into a written contract under a serious mistake about its contents in relation to a fundamental term will be entitled in equity to an order rescinding the contract if the other party is aware that circumstances exist which indicate that the first party is entering the contract under some serious mistake or misapprehension about either the content or subject matter of that term and deliberately sets out to ensure that the first party does not become aware of the existence of his mistake or misapprehension. What we have said is sufficient to demonstrate the broad basis of support which the authorities provide for that proposition. Moreover, and perhaps more importantly, it is a principle which is best calculated to do justice between the parties to a contract in the situation which it contemplates. In such a [433] situation it is unfair that the mistaken party should be held to the written contract by the other party whose lack of precise knowledge of the first party's actual mistake proceeds from wilful ignorance because, knowing or having reason to know that there is some mistake or misapprehension, he engages deliberately in a course of conduct which is designed to inhibit discovery of it. Our comment can, for present purposes, be limited in its application to the case where the second party has not materially altered his position and the rights of strangers have not intervened.

Applying the abovementioned principle to the present case, it is apparent that the appeal must fail. It is now common ground between the parties that, at the time she signed both option and contract, Mrs Johnson mistakenly believed that the relevant document stipulated that the purchase price was $15 000 per acre whereas the stipulated purchase price was $15 000 in total. The stipulation as to price was plainly a fundamental term of the contract: see Webster v Cecil (1861) 30 Beav 62; 54 ER 812; Garrard v Frankel (1862) 30 Beav 445; 54 ER 961; Hartog v Colin and Shields [1939] 3 All ER 566. As we have already indicated, we are of the view that the proper inference to be drawn from the evidence is that, both at the time when Mrs Johnson executed the option and at the time when she executed the contract, Mr Taylor believed that she was under some serious mistake or misapprehension about either the terms (the price) or the subject matter (its value) of the relevant transaction. The avoidance of mention of the purchase price after the "idle curiosity" conversation and the circumstances in which Mr Taylor procured the execution of the option, including his wrong statement that he did not have a copy of the option which he could make available to Mrs Johnson, lead, in our view, plainly to the inference that he deliberately set out to ensure that Mrs Johnson did not become aware that she was being induced to grant the option and, subsequently, to enter into the contract by some material mistake or misapprehension as to its terms or subject matter.

[DAWSON J delivered a dissenting judgment, holding that the Court of Appeal should not have rejected the trial judge's finding that Mr Taylor had believed that Mrs Johnson intended to sell for the full price of $15,000.]

Appeal dismissed.

UNILATERAL MISTAKE AS TO TERMS: RECTIFICATION

[31.155] We have seen the courts have equitable power to rectify a contractual document where the document does not accurately record the common intention of the parties. In such a case, rectification cures common mistake. Rectification is also granted in cases of unilateral mistake where it would be unconscionable for the non-mistaken party to enforce the contract according to its terms.

Leibler v Air New Zealand

[31.160] Leibler v Air New Zealand Ltd (No 2) [1991] 1 VR 1 (Court of Appeal of the Victorian Supreme Court) – Appeal from the Victorian Supreme Court.

[FACTS: The parties entered into an agreement for the sale by Ninth Astjet Pty Ltd (NAPL) to a subsidiary of Air New Zealand (ANZ) of shares comprising a half-interest in Jetset, a company that operated a travel agency. NAPL was a company controlled by Leibler. Clause 10.9 of the draft agreement gave ANZ a right of pre-emption in respect of the remaining shares in the event that Leibler should die or become incapacitated. During further negotiations, it was agreed that the right of pre-emption would not be triggered by Leibler's death or incapacitation, but only by the Leibler family ceasing to control NAPL (which would, after the sale, retain half of the issued shares in Jetset). The parties agreed that cl 10.9 would be amended accordingly, but the purchaser's solicitors mistakenly deleted the clause entirely. The trial judge (Hansen J) found that Leibler and NAPL knew of the mistake and "deliberately refrained from drawing the mistaken deletion to the attention of ANZ, because the deletion of the clause was seen as beneficial to their interests". Hansen J held that the agreement should be rectified to include a right of pre-emption in the form of cl 10.9 with the amendments the parties had agreed would be made to that clause before it was accidentally deleted. The vendor appealed to the Court of Appeal claiming that rectification should not have been granted.]
KENNY JA:

Was a mistake of the kind identified by the respondents actually made by them at the time of executing the shareholders' agreement?

[35] The trial judge found that the respondents' claim based on common mistake could not be made out, Isi Leibler having intended to execute the shareholders' agreement without cl 10.9. Having regard to the course of the negotiations, this finding was plainly correct. His Honour did, however, accept that a case of unilateral mistake had been made out by the respondents (the plaintiffs at trial).

[36] The principles which govern an application for rectification of a contract on the ground of unilateral mistake can be briefly stated. If (1) one party, A, makes an agreement under a misapprehension that the agreement contains a particular provision which the agreement does not in fact contain; and (2) the other party, B, knows of the omission and that it is due to a mistake on A's part; and (3) lets A remain under the misapprehension and concludes the agreement on the mistaken basis in circumstances where equity would require B to take some step or steps, depending on those circumstances, to bring the mistake to A's attention; then (4) B will be precluded from relying upon A's execution of the agreement to resist A's claim for rectification to give effect to A's intention. Accordingly, the respondents' claim for rectification required them to prove that on 12 December 1985 when the shareholders' agreement was executed:

(1) they were under a misapprehension that the shareholders' agreement included a form of cl 10.9 as it stood on 28 October 1985, modified so as to take account of the matters agreed upon by Isi Leibler and Geary on that date;

(2) Isi Leibler and NAPL knew that the respondents were acting under that misapprehension in executing the shareholders' agreement; and

(3) the appellants let the respondents remain under the misapprehension and concluded the shareholders' agreement on the mistaken basis in circumstances in which equity required the appellants to take some step (which they did not take) to bring the mistake to the respondents' attention.

In setting out the elements of what is to be proved upon a claim for rectification based on unilateral mistake, I have not overlooked that some of the authorities have described these elements in different terms. I discuss these differences, where relevant, below.

[37] The case made by the respondents was that they had executed the shareholders' agreement in the mistaken belief that it contained a clause substantially in the form of cl 10.9 as it stood on 28 October 1985, modified to take account of the agreement reached between Isi Leibler and Geary [the Managing Director of ANZ] on that date. The trial judge stated that he was "well satisfied" that the respondents had executed the agreement under a misapprehension of this kind and he so found. The appellants have submitted that this finding was erroneous and that his Honour should have found that, at the time of executing the agreement, the respondents knew that cl 10.9 had been deleted from the shareholders' agreement and intended to execute the agreement as it stood on 12 December 1985.

[38] Before an order for rectification can be made on the ground of mistake, it must be shown, by convincing proof, that the respondents not only made a mistake but that the mistake made was precisely the one identified by them for the purposes of their claim for rectification: cf Kenny v Sholl (1905) 7 WALR 197 at 197 per Stone CJ The appellants submitted that the respondents' evidence fell well short of convincing evidence that, as at the date of execution, the respondents mistakenly believed a modified cl 10.9 remained. There was, as counsel for the appellants submitted, no direct evidence as to how the mistake occurred. What the evidence showed was that the clause had been deleted (rather than amended) by Shmith [ANZ's Melbourne solicitor] on 29 October 1985 upon the oral instruction of Lusk [ANZ's Auckland solicitor] that day. … No-one on ANZ's side could remember what precise instructions had been given, either to Lusk by Geary or Diamond, or to Shmith by Lusk. The inability on the part of ANZ's witnesses to recollect what had been said (or done by way of documentary review) was compounded by the fact that the relevant ANZ files (including those of Geary, Macfarlane and Searle) had been lost or destroyed before trial. Lusk did, however, give evidence to the effect that the deletion had been a mistake on his or Shmith's part. When Lusk was asked why he had not realised that there had been a mistake when he received Shmith's facsimile letter of 29 October 1985 [which noted that cl 10.9 had been deleted], Lusk had said:

> I had very little occasion to be checking closely what he [Shmith] was doing because he was a more senior practitioner than I was. He was on top of the issues.

Lusk [ultimately accepted he was in error].

[39] The trial judge found that "on a consideration of all the evidence, including my observation of the witnesses" there had been a mistake by Lusk and that he had not acted in conformity with his instructions in telling Shmith to delete cl 10.9 rather than to amend it, although his Honour did not make any finding as to why Lusk had made the mistake. His Honour also said:

> I am satisfied that in the time since Geary spoke to Isi Leibler on 28 October to the time when he spoke to Lusk on 29 October he (Geary) did not unilaterally and on his own behalf determine to delete from the transaction the second level protection which cl 10.9 provided ANZ … I am well satisfied that Lusk misunderstood his instructions …

[42] It was open to his Honour to find (as he did) that as at the end of 28 October 1985, there was consensus to the extent that ANZ would have a right of pre-emption if there was a change in the effective practical control of NAPL, but not if it came about by reason of the death (or incapacity) of Isi Leibler …

[44] The appellants submitted further that, even if Lusk or Shmith had made a mistake on 29 October 1985, there was no evidence that the mistake continued to infect ANZ's judgment as at the date of execution. Whilst I accept that the date of execution is the relevant date for the purposes of the respondents' claim, I reject this submission. The evidence of Geary and of the two ANZ executives principally involved in the negotiations, Macfarlane and Searle, showed that each thought that the shareholders' agreement included a form of cl 10.9, modified to take account of the agreement reached between Geary and Isi Leibler on 28 October. Their evidence also showed quite clearly how it was that no-one on ANZ's side discovered the mistake, notwithstanding that drafts of the shareholders' and other agreements, together with relevant correspondence, were regularly sent to their executive offices. Geary gave evidence that he dealt "with the concepts"; that it was not his function to review the documents; and that he relied on ANZ's management (and in particular, Macfarlane and Searle) as well as ANZ's lawyers to ensure that the concepts were reflected in the terms of the shareholders' agreement. Macfarlane, the leader of the ANZ negotiating team until just before 28 October 1985 when he went to Germany, gave evidence that he could not recall receiving any relevant documents in November 1985 after his return; that he did not review the 30 October draft of the shareholders' agreement; that he was not instructing Lusk in November 1985; and that he had left matters in the hands of Geary when he left for Germany.

[45] The trial judge found that Searle, the other ANZ executive in the negotiating team until he too left for Germany, had no accurate memory as to whether he reviewed the October 1985 draft …

[46] It must, I think, be borne in mind that his Honour had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses. Early in his reasons, dealing with another point, his Honour said that Geary, Macfarlane and Searle impressed him as "honest witnesses". It is apparent from his Honour's reasons that this observation was equally applicable to the evidence given by them generally. The evidence of these witnesses, if accepted, shows that nothing occurred at the ANZ management level after 28 October 1985 to correct their misapprehension that the shareholders' agreement contained a clause conferring a right of pre-emption (of the kind found in cl 10.9) modified to take account of the discussion between Geary and Isi Leibler on that day …

[48] … [I]t seems plain enough that it was open to the trial judge to find that, if Lusk mistakenly instructed Shmith to delete rather than amend cl 10.9 (or Shmith understood him to say so) so that ANZ's right of pre-emption was wholly removed (contrary to Geary's instructions), then the mistake would not, in all probability, have been noticed by Geary, Macfarlane or Searle. Geary, Macfarlane and Searle would have secured the execution of the shareholders' agreement in the mistaken belief that the agreement contained a right of pre-emption in ANZ's favour, modified to take account of the consensus reached by Geary and Isi Leibler on 28 October 1985 …

[55] It was also said by the appellants that Lusk and Shmith, as solicitors for ANZ, were acting as agents for the respondents with both actual and ostensible authority from the respondents to negotiate and draft the agreement and it was, therefore, not open to ANZ to rely on any misapprehension of the kind alleged. The appellants submitted that the law imputes to the respondents the knowledge of Shmith or Lusk that cl 10.9 had been deleted. I do not cavil at the proposition that, as against a third party, the law ordinarily imputes to a principal the knowledge gained by his agent for the purposes of and in the course of a transaction in which the agent acts for the principal: cf Sargent v ASL Developments Ltd (1974) 131 CLR 634 at 649 per Stephen J and 658 per Mason J; Strover v Harrington [1988] Ch 390 at 409-10; Vane v Vane (1873) LR 8 Ch App 383 at 399. I do not, however, find that proposition of assistance in the present case. If ANZ had a clear intention to enter into the shareholders' agreement on the basis that it contained a modified cl 10.9 and the appellants knew of that intention and that the deletion of the clause by ANZ's solicitors was a mistake, or very probably a mistake, then, the making of the mistake by ANZ's solicitors does not justify imputing to ANZ an intention other than their actual intention: cf Pigrem v Gaughran [1993] NPC 9; Weeds v Blaney (1977) 247 EG 211; (1978) Est Gaz Dig 902 and Bailey v Manos Breeder Farms Pty Ltd (unreported, SA Full Court, 5 April 1991). Accordingly, I do not accept the appellants' submission in this regard …

Did the appellants know as at the date of execution that the deletion of cl 10.9 was due to a mistake on the respondents' part?

[60] Plainly, the appellants knew that cl 10.9 had been wholly deleted from the shareholders' agreement. Shmith had told McQualter on 29 October that he had taken that step and McQualter had so advised Mark Leibler who, in turn, had so advised his brother, Isi Leibler. Whether there was, in this case, knowledge on the Jetset side that the deletion was due to a mistake was a question of fact to be decided on the evidence.

[61] The case for the respondents was that Isi Leibler well knew that the deletion of cl 10.9 was a mistake on ANZ's part and, given that at all material times he had control of NAPL, his knowledge was the knowledge of NAPL: see R v Roffel [1985] VR 511. Counsel for the respondents also argued that it would have been sufficient for the purposes of their claim if the evidence had shown no more than that Isi Leibler knew that there had probably been a mistake; or that he strongly suspected that there had been a mistake; or even that he ought to have known that there had been a mistake.

[62] The case for the appellants rested on the proposition that actual knowledge of the mistake was necessary. Strong support for this was derived from Agip SpA v Navigazione Alta Italia SpA [1984] 1 Lloyd's Rep 353 at 365; also [1983] 2 Lloyd's Rep 333 at 343. The Australian authorities may, however, support some lesser test. In Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422 at 432 the majority, discussing the availability of rescission for unilateral mistake, referred to the sufficiency of an awareness by the non-mistaken party "that circumstances exist which indicate that [the mistaken party] is entering the contract under some serious mistake about its content in relation to a or misapprehension". See also Misiaris v Saydels Pty Ltd at 58,448 and Commonwealth v VL Investment Pty Ltd at 63,894-5. I do not, however, need to resolve the question whether the test in Australia is less onerous than in England, because the trial judge's finding was as to the appellants' actual knowledge and, in my view, that finding cannot be set aside, having regard to the fact that it depended very much on his Honour's estimation of the relevant witnesses: cf Devries v Australian National Railways Commission (1993) 177 CLR 472 at 479 …

In the circumstances of the case, did the appellants' failure to bring the mistake to the respondents' attention justify an order for rectification?

[65] The case for the respondents was that Isi Leibler, knowing of ANZ's mistake, deliberately refrained from drawing the mistake to ANZ's attention. Both the Leiblers denied that they had deliberately acted, or refrained from acting, so that ANZ would not notice that it had lost its right of pre-emption. The case for the appellants both at trial and on appeal was that they had relied (as they were entitled to do) upon Shmith's advice. In written submissions, it was said on their behalf that:

> [They] did not deliberately set out to ensure that the respondents did not reconsider their decision to delete cl 10.9. Nor did they lie low. To the contrary, they immediately embarked upon vigorous negotiation of the precise form of amendments to cl 2.1(f).

I do not think the findings of the trial judge permit this court to accept this submission. His Honour found that the appellants (being the defendants at trial) had deliberately refrained from drawing the mistaken deletion of cl 10.9 to the attention of ANZ, because the deletion of the clause was seen as beneficial to their interests. As his Honour's reasons for judgment make clear, that finding depended on his Honour's appreciation of the cogency and credibility of the evidence given by relevant witnesses called on the defendants' behalf …

[67] … I think, open to the trial judge to find that, having regard to the unusual circumstances found in the case, equity would regard the failure (which his Honour found to be deliberate) on the appellants' part to take any step at all to bring the respondents' mistake to their attention as a sufficient basis upon which to make an order for rectification in the respondents' favour. I mention briefly just some of those circumstances. There are a number of other matters mentioned by his Honour but it is not, I think, necessary to refer to all of them. First, according to his Honour's findings, the deletion of the clause was completely at variance with the tenor of the discussion between Isi Leibler and Geary on 28 October. Secondly, the complexity of the negotiating and drafting involved in the entire transaction was patent. Thirdly, the fundamental importance of second level protection to ANZ was, on his Honour's findings, well known on the Jetset side. Fourthly, the relationship to be brought about by the transaction was to be a close one, involving a degree of trust. Further, there was his Honour's finding that, for practical purposes, a consensus about cl 2.1(f) had in fact been reached by the end of 29 October 1985. Had someone on the ANZ's side thought to look at cl 10.9 whilst the discussion on cl 2.1(f) continued after that date, the mistake might well have been discovered by

ANZ But his Honour found that no-one on the ANZ's side had in fact done so. In any event, the case for the defendants below was that they had never turned their minds to the possibility that ANZ had made a mistake. It was never said by them at trial that they did not bring the deletion of cl 10.9 to ANZ's attention because they thought that any mistake on ANZ's side would have been identified by ANZ in the course of later negotiations concerning cl 2.1(f). That was not the defendant's case. I do not think that, on the particular facts found by his Honour and on the case made by the defendants at trial, it can be said that his Honour erred in finding that the respondents were entitled to rectification.

[68] In Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422 at 432 the majority referred to the case in which the non-mistaken party deliberately sets out to ensure that the mistaken party does not become aware of the existence of a mistake. But the majority's reference to this circumstance was plainly not intended to be an exhaustive statement of what amounts to conduct entitling the mistaken party to rectification, even if it constitutes a particularly clear example: cf Commission for New Towns v Cooper (Great Britain) Ltd at 694 per Stuart-Smith LJ; Thomas Bates & Son Ltd v Wyndham's (Lingerie) Ltd at 1090 per Eveleigh LJ (Brightman LJ agreeing) and Deputy Commissioner of Taxation v Chamberlain (1990) 26 FCR 221 at 232 per Wilcox J. In some circumstances, as in the special circumstances of this case, it may be enough that the non-mistaken party chooses to leave the mistaken party under the misapprehension in executing the agreement: cf Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671 at 692-3; Misiaris v Saydels Pty Ltd at 58,449 per Young J. This is not a case in which the significance of the mistake was unknown to the appellants: contrast Agip SpA v Navigazione Alta Italia SpA at 366 where the defendants did not know of the plaintiffs' mistake or that the plaintiffs had attached a great deal of importance to the escalation clause …

[70] Before there can be rectification, the respondents were required to establish that, before the mistake was made, there had been a consensus as to what the shareholders' agreement should effect: see, eg, Pukallus v Cameron (1982) 180 CLR 447 at 452 and Maralinga Pty Ltd v Major Enterprises Pty Ltd (1973) 128 CLR 336 at 349. If, in the case of unilateral mistake, a plaintiff establishes, by convincing proof, that the executed document does not conform with the intention shared by the parties prior to the mistake coming to the attention of the non-mistaken party, and that intention is sufficiently precise and specific to be the subject of an order for rectification, then, rectification may, in appropriate circumstances, be granted: see Commissioner of Stamp Duties (NSW) v Carlenka Pty Ltd (1995) 41 NSWLR 329 at 343-4 per Sheller JA (with whom Mahoney AP and McLelland AJA agreed). In Carlenka the intention of the parties to a trust deed had been to make a certain company an income beneficiary, whereas the executed instrument made the company a capital beneficiary as well. The New South Wales Court of Appeal upheld an order for rectification so that the document conformed to the intention of the parties as at the date the deed was executed. But in Baird v BCE Holdings Pty Ltd (1996) 40 NSWLR 374, a case relied upon by the appellants, rectification was refused because no mistake had been made in putting the parties' agreement into effect. The mistake lay in the parties' misapprehension as to the tax implications of the transaction. That case was quite different from the present case in which the mistake made by ANZ was as to the contents of the shareholders' agreement, not as to the effect of its terms …

[73] Whilst sufficient evidence must be shown, by convincing proof, to have been agreed to establish that the parties had in fact reached a consensus with regard to the provision in question, it is not necessary that "the exact form of words in which the common intention is to be framed" be established so long as "in substance and in detail their intention is to be ascertained": see Crane v Hegeman-Harris Co Inc [1939] 1 All ER 662 at 669 per Simond J (approved on appeal, [1939] 4 All ER 68 at 72). See also Nadile v Protective Commissioner of New South Wales (unreported, NSW Supreme Court, Young J, 6 October 1993); GPI Leisure Corporation Ltd v Herdsman Investments Pty Ltd (No 4) (unreported, NSW Supreme Court, Young J, 17 August 1990) and State Bank of South Australia v Macintosh (unreported, NSW Supreme Court, Young J, 31 May 1995). In this case the concept of "effective practical control" had been introduced and agreed upon by the parties as early as July 1985 in recognition of the fact that the Leibler/Grant interests were held in trusts controlled by Isi Leibler and Grant. This concept was as apt for members of the Leibler family after Isi Leibler's death as it was for Isi Leibler himself in his lifetime. Further, as stated earlier, the trial judge found (as it was open to him to do) that the subject for discussion between Isi Leibler and Geary on 28 October 1985 was the position of Isi Leibler's immediate family, being a notion apparently well understood on both sides. Other matters were referred to by counsel for the appellants which, it was submitted, would not have been agreed upon on the Jetset side, but it is, I think, only necessary to say that I am not persuaded by the appellants' submissions in this regard. Given that, according to the findings of the trial judge, the parties believed that the discussion on 28 October 1985 between Isi Leibler and Geary had settled the remaining matters of substance (save perhaps for the "not unreasonably withholding consent" proviso in cl 2.1(f) which was in the main finalised the next day) it was, in my opinion, open to the trial judge to find that the substance of a modified cl 10.9 had in fact been agreed upon by the parties by 29 October and his Honour did not err in finding that the clause proposed by counsel for the respondents at the conclusion of the trial reflected that consensus.

[74] For the reasons stated, in the particular circumstances of this case it was, in my opinion, open to the trial judge to make the order for rectification which he did and I would dismiss the appeal.

[WINNEKE P and PHILLIPS JA, in a joint judgment, also allowed rectification and dismissed the appeal.]

Appeal dismissed.

MISTAKENLY SIGNED DOCUMENTS: NON EST FACTUM

[31.165] The Latin phrase "non est factum" means "it is not [his] deed". The plea was originally used where the plaintiff claimed that his or her signature or seal on a deed had been forged. It has been extended to cases where a party seeks to be released from a contract he or she has signed in error. The rule is that if a person proves that he or she signed a document without carelessness and believing it to be a document fundamentally different from what it was, he or she is not bound by the signature. However, the common law rule is quite strictly confined as it represents an exception to the rule that a person who signs a contract intends to adopt its terms. The class of persons who can avail themselves of the plea is limited to those who cannot read owing to blindness or illiteracy or who through no fault of their own are unable to have any understanding of the purport of a particular contract. One of the reasons that the plea is so narrowly confined is to protect innocent third parties who may have relied on the existence of a contract. Where there are no third parties involved, the High Court in Petelin v Cullen (1975) 132 CLR 355 suggests that the requirements of the plea may be less strictly applied.

Petelin v Cullen

[31.170] Petelin v Cullen (1975) 132 CLR 355 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Petelin (the appellant) was the owner of land at Liverpool. Cullen (the respondent) wished to buy that land for the purpose of development. In May 1969, he sought from Petelin an option to purchase. Cullen's agent, Mr Clements, handed to Petelin a document in the form of a letter granting the option to purchase for a consideration of $50 and advised Petelin to take it and to consult a solicitor in regard to it. Petelin spoke little English and could not read English. Petelin took the document away and brought it back later, signed by him, with certain parts of it excised. When he gave the document to Mr Clements, he received the cheque for $50. The document provided that in consideration of the sum of $50 the appellant agreed to give the option to purchase for the sum of $31,000 net to the vendor upon conditions set out in the form of contract approved by the Law Society and the Real Estate Institute of New South Wales and upon the basis that the purchase price was satisfied as to 10 per cent on the signing of the contract and as to the balance on completion. Six months later, Cullen, who was not in a position immediately to exercise the option, desired to seek an extension of the option for a further period of six months. Provision for such an extension had been made in the original document but it had been struck out before the document was signed. As Mr Clements had difficulty in arranging a meeting with Petelin a letter was written to him enclosing a cheque for $50. The letter was dated 11 November 1969, this is to say, shortly after the expiry of the previous option, and it read as follows:

> Please find enclosed a cheque for $50 for a further six months' extension of the options of your property. Both Mr Clements and myself have endeavoured to see you concerning this matter but have not been able to locate you. It would appear that my application will be dealt with in the next two months.

Mr Clements saw the appellant and said to him: "Did you receive the $50?" The appellant answered, "Yes". Mr Clements then said to him: "Have you got a paper like that?" and showed him a form of document proposing an extension of the option in the following terms: "I hereby extend for a further period of six months the option granted to you by me for the consideration of $50 receipt of which is hereby acknowledged." The appellant replied: "Yes, I received it." Mr Clements said either before or after the statement by the appellant: "Sign it that you received $50." The appellant signed the document. He said that he did not read it, and went on to say: "I only looked at it … I can read a little bit but the problem is I don't know what it means." The explanation given by Petelin as to why he thought he had received the second sum of $50 was that Mr Clements had said to him something like this at the time when the original cheque was handed over: "Here's the $50 and after six months you will receive another $50."

The option was exercised within the period of the second six months but Petelin refused to sign a contract. The respondent sought specific performance and the appellant pleaded non est factum.

The trial judge, Helsham J, found that the defence was made out. The appellant signed the extension of the option in the belief that it was a receipt, unaware that it was an extension of the option, having been told by the agent that he "must sign" the document. Further, the appellant did not read the document and was incapable of reading and understanding it. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

THE COURT (BARWICK CJ, MCTIERNAN, GIBBS, STEPHEN AND MASON JJ): [359] It was, we think, legitimate to regard the appellant's testimony in its entirety as amounting to a statement that he believed at the relevant time that he was signing a receipt … This conclusion to our mind, as will be seen later, disposes of the argument that the appellant failed to discharge the onus of showing that there was a radical difference between what he signed and what he thought he was signing.

The other ground on which the Court of Appeal decided the case adversely to the appellant was that he was careless in failing to take reasonable precautions to ascertain what was in the document. Consideration of this ground requires some examination of the defence of non est factum.

The principle which underlies the extension of the plea to cases in which a defendant has actually signed the instrument on which he is sued has not proved easy of precise formulation. The problem is that the principle must accommodate two policy considerations which pull in opposite directions: first, the injustice of holding a person to a bargain to which he has not brought a consenting mind; and, secondly, the necessity of holding a person who signs a document to that document, more particularly so as to protect innocent persons who rely on that signature when there is no reason to doubt its validity. The importance which the law assigns to the act of signing and to the protection of innocent persons who rely upon a signature is readily discerned in the statement that the plea is one "which must necessarily be kept within narrow limits" (Muskham Finance Ltd v Howard [1963] 1 QB 904 at 912) and in the qualifications attaching to the defence which are designed to achieve this objective.

The class of persons who can avail themselves of the defence is limited. It is available to those who are unable to read owing to blindness or illiteracy and who must rely on others for advice as to what they are signing; it is also available to those who through no fault of their own are unable to have any understanding of the [360] purport of a particular document. To make out the defence a defendant must show that he signed the document in the belief that it was radically different from what it was in fact and that, at least as against innocent persons, his failure to read and understand it was not due to carelessness on his part. Finally, it is accepted that there is a heavy onus on a defendant who seeks to establish the defence. All this is made clear by the recent decision of the House of Lords in Saunders v Anglia Building Society (Gallie v Lee) [1971] AC 1004, esp at 1019.

Before the learned judge no reference was made to that decision. This omission may explain why his Honour did not deal with the element of carelessness. However this may be, the Court of Appeal overruled his decision on the ground that absence of carelessness was a necessary or material element in the making out of the defence and that on the facts the appellant was careless.

It is now settled beyond any shadow of doubt that when we speak of negligence or carelessness in connection with non est factum we are not referring to the tort of negligence but to a mere failure to take reasonable precautions in ascertaining the character of a document before signing it. The insistence that such precautions should be taken as a condition of making out the defence is of fundamental importance when the defence is asserted against an innocent person, whether a third party to the transaction or not, who relies on the document and the signature which it bears and who is unaware of the circumstances in which it came to be executed. It is otherwise when the defence is asserted against the other party to the transaction who is aware of the circumstances in which it came to be executed and who knows (because the document was signed on his representation) or has reason to suspect that it was executed under some misapprehension as to its character. In such a case the law must give effect to the policy which requires that a person should not be held to a bargain to which he has not brought a consenting mind for there is no conflicting or countervailing consideration to be accommodated – no innocent person has placed reliance on the signature without reason to doubt its validity.

On this analysis the element of carelessness has no relevance for the present case. As the learned judge found, the appellant's belief that the document was a receipt was inspired by the agent's representation that the document acknowledged the payment of the sum of $50. It is scarcely to be conceived that the respondent was unaware of what his agent said and did; but even if he was not informed by the agent he must take responsibility for his action. Consequently as against the appellant, the respondent is not to be considered as an innocent person without knowledge or reason to doubt the validity of the appellant's signature.

[361] There are other reasons why it would be inappropriate to treat the respondent as an innocent party. It became apparent to Mr Clements when the original option was negotiated that the appellant had little appreciation of English and no capacity to understand the option agreement. Indeed, Mr Clements advised him to consult a solicitor. The appellant's difficulties in reading and understanding must have been present to Mr Clements' mind when the extension was signed; yet he contented himself with a demand that the document be signed and omitted to give an explanation of its character.

The matters to which we have referred would in any event support the independent conclusion that there was no carelessness on the part of the appellant …

The other element in the defence which requires to be mentioned is the necessity that the appellant should show that he believed the document to be radically different from what it was in fact. Once it is accepted that the primary judge could properly find that the appellant believed it to be a receipt, this point of contention disappears from the case. The respondent urged that the evidence was so slight as not to overcome the "heavy" onus which rested with the appellant. The existence of that onus unquestionably was present to the mind of the primary judge when he came to assess the credibility of the appellant. But once he accepted the appellant's evidence the question of onus in our opinion was set at rest. For these reasons we would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

In Perpetual Trustees Victoria Ltd v Ford [2008] NSWSC 29; (2008) 70 NSWLR 611 (affirmed on appeal: Ford v Perpetual Trustees Victoria Ltd [2009] NSWCA 186; (2009) 75 NSWLR 42), Harrison J held that a person who seeks to rely on the defence of non est factum does not need to establish that the other party had knowledge of the incapacity that led to the signing of the contract.

MISTAKE AS TO IDENTITY

[31.180] Consider the following example. A offers to sell a painting to B thinking that B is C. B accepts the offer. If B reasonably believed that the offer was made to him, his acceptance is effective, and he can enforce the promise by A.

The objective test ensures that B is not prejudiced by A's unexpressed intentions. If, however, B has deceived A into thinking he is C, is there a contract between A and B? If the dispute is between A and B, it is difficult to see why A should not be able to enforce the contract against B, if he so wishes. But if B wishes to enforce the contract against A, it is difficult to see why he should be able to do so, unless perhaps identity is immaterial. There is no question of B being prejudiced by this conclusion, as he knew of, and actually induced A's mistake. Therefore A could argue that the objective test should be abandoned in this case, and on application of a subjective test it will be revealed that there was no coincidence of offer and acceptance.

One difficulty with this conclusion is that if the contract is void then no property in the painting will pass to an innocent person D who purchases it from B. In fact, D will be liable to A in the tort conversion, as D's dealing with the goods constitutes a violation, however unwitting, of A's title.

In the present state of the law, the only way to protect the innocent third party is to hold that the original contract is not void at common law but voidable in equity. Equity, however, will not set aside the contract as property will have vested in the third party. The vesting of the property in third parties is a bar to rescission (see Chapter 39).

It is convenient to consider first the cases where the parties are not face to face and then the cases where the parties are face to face.

Parties not face to face

[31.185] In Cundy v Lindsay (1878) 3 App Cas 459, Alfred Blenkarn, who occupied a room in a house looking into Wood Street, Cheapside, wrote to Messrs Lindsay offering to purchase a considerable quantity of their goods. In the letter, Blenkarn gave his address as 37 Wood Street, Cheapside and deliberately signed it in such a way that it appeared as though Blenkiron & Co were purchasing the goods. There was a respectable firm of that name carrying on business at 123 Wood Street. Lindsay supplied and invoiced the goods to Blenkiron & Co at 37 Wood Street. Blenkarn disposed of the goods to Cundy who took them in ignorance of the fraud. Lindsay sued Cundy for conversion of the goods. Lindsay was unsuccessful at the trial but successful in the Court of Appeal. The House of Lords held that no contract had arisen (and in turn Cundy did not receive title to the goods). Lord Cairns LC said (at 465):

> I ask the question, how is it possible to imagine that in that state of things any contract could have risen between the respondents and Blenkarn, the dishonest man? Of him they knew nothing, and of him they never thought. With him they never intended to deal … and as between him and them there was no consensus of mind which could lead to any agreement or any contract whatever … [I]t is idle to talk of the property passing. The property remained, as it originally had been, the property of the respondents, and the title which was attempted to be given to the appellants was a title which could not be given to them.

Cundy v Lindsay was distinguished in King's Norton Metal Co Ltd v Edridge Merrett & Co (1897) 14 TLR 98. In that case, Wallis wrote to the plaintiffs on note paper bearing the name Hallam & Co asking for a quotation of prices for brass rivet wire. The prices were quoted and Hallam & Co ordered the wire which was delivered but never paid for. In fact, Hallam & Co did not exist and was only a cloak for Wallis. The wire was sold to the defendant, whom the plaintiff sued in conversion. The trial judge held that the property in the goods had passed to Wallis, who sold them to the defendants before the plaintiffs had avoided the contract, and accordingly the defendants were not liable in conversion. The Court of Appeal upheld this decision. AL Smith LJ said the question was (at 99): "With whom … did the plaintiffs contract to sell the goods? The Court of Appeal held that the plaintiff's intended to contract with the writer of the letters. If it could have been shown that there was a separate entity called Hallam & Co and another entity called Wallis, then the case might have come within the decision in Cundy v Lindsay." There was a contract made by the plaintiffs with the person who wrote the letters and by virtue of that contract property passed to him.

In Shogun Finance Ltd v Hudson [2003] UKHL 62; [2004] AC 919, a rogue dishonestly obtained the drivers' licence of Mr Durlabh Patel and used it to acquire a car on hire purchase from Shogun. The transaction was arranged through a car dealer who sent to Shogun an application form (on which the rogue had forged Patel's signature) and a copy of Patel's drivers' licence. Shogun checked Patel's credit and employment records before entering into the transaction and delivering the car to the rogue. The rogue sold the car to Hudson and then disappeared. Shogun sought to recover the value of the car from Hudson. The House of Lords held that Shogun's intention was to contract with the real Mr Patel. As a matter of construction, the written agreement clearly purported to be between Shogun and Patel but no contract could arise between them without Patel's authority. No contract could arise between the rogue and Shogun because there was no consensus ad idem between them. Accordingly, there was no contract and Hudson did not obtain title to the car. Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead and Lord Millett dissented on the basis, inter alia, that Cundy v Lindsay should no longer be followed.

Parties face to face

Lewis v Averay

[31.190] Lewis v Averary [1972] 1 QB 198 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Deputy Judge Ellison sitting at Bromley County Court.

[FACTS: Mr Lewis, a postgraduate student, owned a motor vehicle which he wanted to sell. On 8 May 1969, he showed it to a person who came to his flat and falsely claimed to be Richard Greene,

the well-known actor who played Robin Hood in a television series. The parties agreed on a price of £450, and the rogue wrote out a cheque for that amount. Mr Lewis was unwilling to hand over the car until the cheque was cleared. He asked the rogue if he had any proof that he was Richard Greene. The rogue then produced an official Pinewood Studios pass with the name "Richard Green" on it and a photograph of himself. Mr Lewis was satisfied and handed over the car and the logbook in return for the cheque. The cheque was later dishonoured. In the meantime, the rogue sold the car to Mr Averay, an innocent purchaser, for £200, and disappeared. Mr Lewis claimed the car was still his and sued Mr Averay for conversion. The trial judge awarded Lewis damages. Averay appealed to the Court of Appeal.]

LORD DENNING MR: [205] The real question in the case is whether on 8 May 1969, there was a contract of sale under which the property in the car passed from Mr Lewis to the rogue. If there was such a contract, then, even though it was voidable for fraud, nevertheless Mr Averay would get a good title to the car. But if there was no contract of sale by Mr Lewis to the rogue, either because there was, on the face of it, no agreement between the parties, or because any apparent agreement was a nullity and void ab initio for mistake, then no property would pass from Mr Lewis to the rogue. Mr Averay would not get a good title because the rogue had no property to pass to him.

There is no doubt that Mr Lewis was mistaken as to the identity of the person who handed him the cheque …

What is the effect of this mistake? There are two cases in our books which cannot, to my mind, be reconciled the one with the other. One of them is Phillips v Brooks Ltd [1919] 2 KB 243, where a jeweller had a ring for sale. The other is Ingram v Little [1961] 1 QB 31, where two ladies had a car for sale. In each case the story is very similar to the present. A plausible rogue comes along. The rogue says he likes the ring, or the car, as the case may be. He asks the price. The seller names it. The rogue says he is prepared to buy it at that price. He pulls out a cheque book. He writes, or prepares to write, a cheque for the price. The seller hesitates. He has never met this man before. He does not want to hand over the ring or the car not knowing whether the cheque will be met. The rogue notices the seller's hesitation. He is quick with his next move. He says to the jeweller, in Phillips v Brooks: "I am Sir George Bullough of 11 St James" Square'; or to the ladies in Ingram v Little: "I am PGM Hutchinson of Stanstead House, Stanstead Road, Caterham"; or to the post? graduate student in the present case: "I am Richard Greene, the film actor of the Robin Hood series." Each seller checks up the information. The jeweller looks up the directory and finds there is a Sir George Bullough at 11 St James' Square. [206] The ladies check up too. They look at the telephone directory and find there is a "PGM Hutchinson of Stanstead House, Stanstead Road, Caterham." The postgraduate student checks up too. He examines the official pass of the Pinewood Studios and finds that it is a pass for "Richard A Green" to the Pinewood Studios with this man's photograph on it. In each case the seller feels that his is sufficient confirmation of the man's identity. So he accepts the cheque signed by the rogue and lets him have the ring, in the one case, and the car and logbook in the other two cases. The rogue goes off and sells the goods to a third person who buys them in entire good faith and pays the price to the rogue. The rogue disappears. The original seller presents the cheque. It is dishonoured. Who is entitled to the goods? The original seller? Or the ultimate buyer? The courts have given different answers. In Phillips v Brooks, the ultimate buyer was held to be entitled to the ring. In Ingram v Little the original seller was held to be entitled to the car. In the present case the deputy County Court judge has held the original seller entitled.

It seems to me that the material facts in each case are quite indistinguishable the one from the other …

This case therefore raises the question: What is the effect of a mistake by one party as to the identity of the other? It has sometimes been said that if a party makes a mistake as to the identity of the person with whom he is contracting, there is no contract, or, if there is a contract, it is a nullity and void, so that no property can pass under it …

[I]n Ingram v Little, the majority of the court suggested that the difference between Phillips v Brooks and Ingram v Little was that in Phillips v Brooks the contract of sale was concluded (so as to pass the property to the rogue) before the rogue made the fraudulent misrepresentation (see [1961] 1 QB 31 at 51, 60) whereas in Ingram v Little the rogue made the fraudulent misrepresentation before the contract was concluded. My own view is that in each case the property in the goods did not pass until the seller let the rogue have the goods.

Again it has been suggested that a mistake as to the identity of a person is one thing, and a mistake as to his attributes is another. A mistake as to identity, it is said, avoids a contract, whereas a mistake as to attributes does not. But this is a distinction without a difference. A man's very name is one of his attributes. It is also a key to his identity. If then, he gives a false name, is it a mistake as to his identity? or a mistake as to his attributes? These fine distinctions do no good to the law.

[207] As I listened to the argument in this case, I felt it wrong that an innocent purchaser (who knew nothing of what passed between the seller and the rogue) should have his title depend on such refinements. After all, he has acted with complete circumspection and in entire good faith, whereas it was the seller who let the rogue have the goods and thus enabled him to commit the fraud. I do not, therefore, accept the theory that a mistake as to identity renders a contract void. I think the true principle is … this: When two parties have come to a contract – or rather what appears, on the face of it, to be a contract – the fact that one party is mistaken as to the identity of the other does not mean that there is no contract, or that the contract is a nullity and void from the beginning. It only means that the contract is voidable, that is, liable to be set aside at the instance of the mistaken person, so long as he does so before third parties have in good faith acquired rights under it ….

When a dealing is had between a seller like Mr Lewis and a person who is actually there present before him, then the presumption in law is that there is a contract, even though there is a fraudulent impersonation by the buyer representing himself as a different man than he is. There is a contract made with the very person there, who is present in person. It is liable no doubt to be avoided for fraud, but it is still a good contract under which title will pass unless and until it is avoided ….

Though I very much regret that either of these good and reliable gentlemen should suffer, in my judgment it is Mr Lewis who should do so. I think the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant.

[31.192] PHILLIMORE LJ: [208] [I]n Ingram v Little … the Court of Appeal, by a majority and in the very special and unusual facts of the case, decided that it had been sufficiently shown in the particular circumstances that, contrary to the prima facie presumption, the lady who was selling the motor car was not dealing with the person actually present. But in the present case I am bound to say that I do not think there was anything which could displace the prima facie presumption that Mr Lewis was dealing with the gentleman present there in the flat – the rogue. It seems to me that when, at the conclusion of the transaction, the car was handed over, the logbook was handed over, the cheque was accepted, and the receipts were given, it is really impossible to say that a contract had not been made. I think this case really is on all fours with Phillips v Brooks, which has been good law for over 50 years. True, the contract was induced by fraud, and Mr Lewis, when he discovered that he had been defrauded, was entitled to avoid it; but in the meanwhile the rogue had parted with the property in this motor car which he had obtained to Mr Averay, who bought it bona fide without any notice of the fraud, and accordingly he thereby, as I think, acquired a good title. This action was in my judgment one which was bound to fail. I think the judge was wrong in the decision to which he came and this appeal must be allowed.

[31.194] MEGAW LJ: [209] The well known textbook Cheshire and Fifoot on the Law of Contract (7th ed, 1969), pp 213, 214, deals with the question of invalidity of a contract by virtue of unilateral mistake, and in particular unilateral mistake relating to mistaken identity. The editors describe what in their submission are certain facts that must be established in order to enable one to avoid a contract on the basis of unilateral mistake by him as to the identity of the opposite party. The first of those facts is that at the time when he made the offer he regarded the identity of the offeree as a matter of vital importance. To translate that into the facts of the present case, it must be established that at the time of offering to sell his car to the rogue, Mr Lewis regarded the identity of the rogue as a matter of vital importance. In my view, Mr Titheridge is abundantly justified, on the notes of the evidence and on the findings of the judge, in his submission that the mistake of Mr Lewis went no further than a mistake as to the attributes of the rogue. It was simply a mistake as to the creditworthiness of the man who was there present and who described himself as Mr Green … When one looks at the evidence of the plaintiff, Mr Lewis himself, it is, I think, clear, as Mr Titheridge submits, that there was not here any evidence that would justify the finding that he, Mr Lewis, regarded the identity of the man who called himself Mr Green as a matter of vital importance.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Judgment entered for defendant.

[31.196] Note

Where a rogue (C) induces A to believe that he is in fact, B, the registered proprietor of land, and induces A to lend him money secured by a forged mortgage on B's land, is the contract between C and A void for mistake? In Porter v Latec Finance (Qld) Pty Ltd (1964) 111 CLR 177, three judges of the High Court expressed opinions on this question. Windeyer J considered such a contract void (at 200–1); so too did Kitto J (at 194). Barwick CJ considered the agreement to lend would be void, but not the loan itself (at 183).

ELECTRONIC TRANSACTIONS

[31.200] Commonwealth legislation as well as legislation in all the States and Territories may provide relief where a natural person makes an "input error" in the course of a transaction with an automated system (see Electronic Transactions Act 2001 (ACT), s 14D; Electronic Transactions Act 1999 (Cth), s 15D; Electronic Transactions Act 2000 (NSW), s 14D; Electronic Transactions (Northern Territory) Act (NT), s 14D; Electronic Transactions (Queensland) Act 2001 (Qld), s 26D; Electronic Communications Act 2000 (SA), s 14D; Electronic Transactions Act 2000 (Tas), s 12D; Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000 (Vic), s 14D; Electronic Transactions Act 2011 (WA), s 20). Where the system provides no opportunity to correct an "input error" the person making the error is entitled to "withdraw the portion of the communication in which the input error was made", provided he or she does so as soon as possible after learning of the error, and provided he or she has not received any material benefit from goods or services provided by the other party. The legislation specifically provides that the right to withdraw a portion of an electronic communication is not a right to rescind a contract. The consequences of withdrawal of the relevant portion of the communication are to be determined in accordance with applicable legal rules, but clearly in some circumstances this will undermine the validity of the contract. If, for example, a consumer booking a ticket for air travel over the internet accidentally booked a flight for the wrong date, and was not given an opportunity to correct the error, the withdrawal of that portion of the communication would undermine the validity of the contract, since the withdrawn communication identified the subject matter of the contract.

[32.05] During pre-contractual negotiations, a statement may be made by one party (the representor) that induces the other party (the representee) to enter the contract. For example, A, who is negotiating to sell a business to B, may say that the weekly takings of the business are $20,000. B may rely on this statement when deciding to enter into the contract to purchase the business. The statement may later be discovered by B to be an overstatement. What is the legal status of the statement as to weekly takings? What are the legal consequences of the falsity of the statement?

One possibility is that the statement becomes a term of the contract itself: see [12.105]. Another possibility is that it constitutes a collateral contract: see [12.145]. In both of these instances, the statement has contractual force: A has promised that the takings are $20,000. B has an action for damages for breach of contract if the takings are below $20,000 (see Chapter 26).

Another possibility is that the statement does not acquire contractual status at all. This might be because the statement is not sufficiently promissory in nature (see JJ Savage & Sons v Blakney (1970) 119 CLR 435, at [12.195]). B may nonetheless be able to obtain rescission of the contract on the basis of A's misrepresentation. Rescission means that the contract is set aside, and the parties are restored to their original positions. In this chapter, we examine the elements necessary to establish a prima facie right to rescission for misrepresentation. The nature of the remedy of rescission and potential bars to rescission are considered in Chapter 39.

General law misrepresentation is not as relevant to contracting parties today as it was in the past. In recent years, statutory law has become the most important source of relief for representees. Section 18(1) of the Australian Consumer Law prohibits misleading or deceptive conduct in trade or commerce. Persons who suffer loss as a result of a contravention of this provision have access to a wide range of remedies under the legislation, including, but not restricted to, damages and rescission. The prohibition against misleading or deceptive conduct in trade or commerce, and the remedies available if that prohibition is contravened, are considered in Chapter 33.

Although the general law of misrepresentation has been somewhat overshadowed by the legislation and the litigation it has generated, it remains important for at least three reasons. First, the legislation only applies where the person who engaged in misleading conduct did so "in trade or commerce". Thus, the general law may be the only source of relief for a representee who has been induced to enter into a contract outside the commercial and consumer contexts. Secondly, concepts formulated in the context of the general law are often adopted or adapted by judges in their interpretation of the legislative provisions. Thirdly, in practice, general law misrepresentation can be relied upon by litigants as an alternative to misleading or deceptive conduct, and relief is sometimes granted under the general law, even where the ACL applies (see, eg, Vadasz v Pioneer Concrete (SA) Pty Ltd (1995) 184 CLR 102.

POSITIVE MISREPRESENTATION OF FACT

Misrepresentation of fact

[32.10] If a representation is ambiguous, it will first have to be determined what it means before it can be determined whether it is false. In such a case "the sense in which a representation would be understood by a reasonable person in the position of the representee is prima facie the sense relevant to the question whether the representation is false": Krakowksi v Eurolynx Properties Pty Ltd (1995) 183 CLR 563, 576–7.

The representation must be a statement of existing fact, whether the representation be written, oral or implied by conduct. For other kinds of statements – mere puffs, representations of law or statements of opinion or future intent – generally no relief is available. However, the courts are adept at finding implied statements of fact in such representations, as the following cases illustrate.

Smith v Land & House Property Corp

[32.15] Smith v Land & House Property Corp (1884) 28 Ch D 7 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Denman J.

[FACTS: The plaintiffs advertised a hotel for sale by auction. It was stated in the particulars of sale that the "whole property is let to Mr Frederick Fleck (a most desirable tenant), at a rental of £400 per annum (clear of rates, taxes, insurance, etc), for an unexpired term of 27 1/2 years, thus offering a first-class investment".

The defendant company purchased the property for £4,700. Before the property was conveyed, Fleck became bankrupt and the defendant refused to complete. The plaintiffs sued for specific performance, and the defendant counterclaimed for rescission of the contract.

The evidence at the trial established that Fleck was in arrears with the rent at the time of the sale. Furthermore, the chairman of the board of directors swore that the company would not have bought the hotel but for the representation. He was not shaken in cross-examination and was believed by the trial judge who dismissed the action and on the counterclaim rescinded the contract. The plaintiffs appealed.]

BOWEN LJ: [15] In considering whether there was a misrepresentation, I will first deal with the argument that the particulars only contain a statement of opinion about the tenant. It is material to observe that it is often fallaciously assumed that a statement of opinion cannot involve the statement of a fact. In a case where the facts are equally well known to both parties, what one of them says to the other is frequently nothing but an expression of opinion. The statement of such opinion is in a sense a statement of a fact, about the condition of the man's own mind, but only of an irrelevant fact, for it is of no consequence what the opinion is. But if the facts are not equally known to both sides, then a statement of opinion by one who knows the facts best involves very often a statement of a material fact, for he impliedly states that he knows facts which justify his opinion. Now a landlord knows the relations between himself and his tenant, other persons either do not know them at all or do not know them equally well, and if the landlord says that he considers that the relations between himself and his tenant are satisfactory, he really avers that the facts peculiarly within his knowledge are such as to render that opinion reasonable. Now are the statements here statements which involve such a representation of material facts? They are statements on a subject as to which prima facie the vendors know everything and the purchasers nothing. The vendors state that the property is let to a most desirable tenant, what does that mean? I agree that it is not a guarantee that the tenant will go on paying his rent, but it is to my mind a guarantee of a different sort, and amounts at least to an assertion that nothing has occurred in the relations between the landlords and the tenant which can be considered to make the tenant an unsatisfactory one. That is an assertion of a specific fact. Was it a true assertion? Having regard to what took place between [16] Lady Day and Midsummer, I think that it was not. On 25 March, a quarter's rent became due. On 1 May, it was wholly unpaid and a distress was threatened. The tenant wrote to ask for time. The plaintiffs replied that the rent could not be allowed to remain over Whitsuntide. The tenant paid on 6 May £30, on 13 June £40, and remaining £30 shortly before the auction. Now could it at the time of the auction, be said that nothing had occurred to make Fleck an undesirable tenant? In my opinion a tenant who had paid his last quarter's rent by driblets under pressure must be regarded as an undesirable tenant …

[BAGGALLY and FRY LJJ delivered concurring judgments.]

Appeal dismissed.

Fitzpatrick v Michel

[32.20] Fitzpatrick v Michel (1928) 28 SR (NSW) 285 (Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – New Trial Motion.

[FACTS: The plaintiffs became tenants to the defendant of a block of flats under a lease for five years at a rental of £40 a week for the first six months and £45 a week for the residue of the term. They brought an action to recover damages for alleged fraudulent misrepresentation by the defendant's agent. The misrepresentation complained of was in respect of two separate matters:

1. that one of the flats had already been let to a Mr Rich for three years at a rental of six guineas a week;
2. that five of the flats that had water views would bring not less than six guineas a week each, and the others not less than five guineas a week each.

Evidence was given of representations to this effect being made by the agent. The plaintiff obtained a verdict of £3,510 at the trial. The defendant appealed.]

FERGUSON J: [288] The ground most strongly relied upon raised in effect the question of the correctness of the directions to the jury with respect to the representation that the flats would let for 6 guineas and 5 guineas a week. The learned judge was asked to direct the jury that this was a mere matter of opinion. He discussed with great care and at considerable length the distinction between expressions of opinion and statements of fact, but it is complained that some of the expressions used by him were calculated to mislead the jury as to the real nature of the issues they were to try.

It is not always easy to distinguish between expressions of opinion and statements of fact. An expression of opinion may be a statement of fact, and, as pointed out in more than one of the authorities cited to us, it always necessarily involves [289] a statement of fact; the fact that the opinion is held by the person expressing it. But it is necessary to bear clearly in mind an important distinction between statements made about existing facts and those made about the future. A jeweller may state that a ring is gold either as an expression of opinion or as a statement of fact. The fact that it is or is not gold is an existing fact, and if he knows that it is not, he is guilty of misrepresentation. But I doubt whether any statement that something will happen in the future can in the same sense be a statement of fact. A man of course may bind himself by a warranty that it will happen, but, leaving warranty out of the question, the statement can be no more than an expression of opinion or belief. To say that a flat will let for 6 guineas a week cannot be a statement to that effect as an existing fact, but it does involve certainly a representation that the person making it entertains that opinion, and possibly a representation that facts are known to him that justify that opinion. The distinction is one of substance, and may be illustrated by considering the nature of the evidence that would be sufficient to prove that the representation was false. To prove a breach of warranty that a flat would let for 6 guineas, it would be enough to show that no tenant could be found who was ready to take it at that rent, but that could not prove a false representation. In the case of breach of warranty, honesty of belief in the truth of the warranty is no defence, while it is a complete answer to a charge of false representation. If a statement is the honest expression of an opinion honestly entertained, it cannot be said that it involves any fraudulent misrepresentation of fact. Turning to the summing up of the learned judge, I think they were expressions which might reasonably have led the jury to the conclusion that it was open to them to find that the statement in itself was one of fact.

Verdict for the plaintiff set aside and new trial ordered.

[32.25] Note

1. A statement of future intention can in some circumstances constitute a representation of fact. In Edgington v Fitzmaurice (1885) 29 Ch D 459, the directors of a company issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions for debentures, stating that the object of the issue of debentures was to complete alterations to the buildings of the company, to purchase horses and vans and to develop the trade of the company. The real object of the loan, however, was to enable the directors to pay off pressing liabilities of the company. The plaintiff advanced money on some of the debentures relying on the statements in the prospectus. He sued the directors in deceit. Bowen LJ, in the course of delivering his judgment in favour of the plaintiff, said (at 482–3):

> But when we come to the third alleged misstatement I feel that the plaintiff's case is made out. I mean the statement of the objects for which the money was to be raised. These were stated to be to complete the alterations and additions to the buildings, to purchase horses and vans, and to develop the supply of fish. A mere suggestion of possible purposes to which a portion of the money might be applied would not have formed a basis for an action of deceit. There must be a misstatement of an existing fact: but the state of a man's mind is as much a fact as the state of his digestion. It is true that it is very difficult to prove what the state of a man's mind at a particular time is, but if it can be ascertained it is as much a fact as anything else. A misrepresentation as to the state of a man's mind is therefore, a misstatement of fact.

2. In Beach Petroleum NL v Johnson (1993) 43 FCR 1, 40, von Doussa J observed:

> The fact that a party is prepared to, and does, enter into the transaction in question amounts to an implied representation that that party has a present intention to carry out the promises made. Thus for a person to purchase goods on credit when at the time that person has no intention of paying for the goods amounts to deceit: Ex parte Whitaker; Re Shackleton (1875) LR 10 Ch App 446 at 449 and Re Eastgate; Ex parte Ward [1905] 1 KB 465.

Public Trustee v Taylor

[32.30] Public Trustee v Taylor [1978] VR 289 (Supreme Court of Victoria) – Trial of Action.

[FACTS: Before the commencement of an auction for the sale of a property, the plaintiff's agent, in advertisements in the press and on a board affixed to the front of the premises, described the property as follows: "Zoned: special use 10. Subject to road widening." Following the auction, at which the property was passed in, the property was sold to the defendant. In accordance with the terms of the contract, the defendant paid the plaintiff $11,000 by way of deposit. Before the due date for completion, the defendant purported to rescind the contract and demanded return of his deposit. The plaintiff claimed specific performance of the contract and damages for breach. The defendant claimed he was induced to enter the contract by the misrepresentation concerning the property made by the plaintiff's agent before the commencement of the auction. The purported zoning referred to uses of the land permitted by the Melbourne and Metropolitan Board of Works Planning Scheme. By Interim Development Order of the MMBW, the land was reserved for the purpose of a proposed main road and was not zoned for special use 10 as advertised. The representation as to zoning was false to the knowledge of the plaintiff's agent.]

KAYE J: [296] To decide whether the property was zoned as represented, it would have been necessary to consider provisions of Pt II of the Town and Country Planning Act 1961, the Melbourne and Metropolitan Planning Scheme Ordinance and its map No 39. The decision, therefore, would have been reached by applying the law, as found in the legislation, ordinance and map, to knowledge of the location of the property. The result achieved in this way was a conclusion of law, and the statement of it to another person was a representation of law. Delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Territorial & Auxiliary Forces Association of the County of London v Nichols [1949] 1 KB 35, 50, Scott LJ held that a statement that premises were controlled premises within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts constituted a representation of law. His Lordship said: "That is not a representation of fact; it is a statement of the result obtained by applying the provisions of the Act to the circumstances of the particular case."

The decision in Nichols' case was applied by the Privy Council in Kai Nam v Ma Kam Chan [1956] AC 358, in relation to a representation concerning whether certain premises were "an entirely new building" as described in the Hong Kong Landlord and Tenant Ordinance. Similarly, it has been stated by the [297] High Court, without deciding the matter, that there is a good deal to be said for the view that a representation made by a local government authority that certain land was within an area planned as a rural zone of a green belt of a proposed town planning scheme is a representation of law: Vitosh v Brisbane City Council (1960) 5 LGRA 342 at 345. It does not appear from the report of the case whether Nichols' case and Kai Nam v Ma Kam Chan were cited to the High Court, although the view expressed by it is consistent with the Privy Council and Court of Appeal judgments. My opinion, therefore, is that the representation by which the defendant was induced to enter into the contract was one of law.

Relying upon a passage appearing in Cheshire and Fifoot, Law of Contract (3rd Australian ed, 1974), p 284, Mr Berkeley submitted that a misrepresentation of law is not actionable. To the extent that a misrepresentation of law cannot found an estoppel, his submission is supported by authority: Nichols' case and Kai Nam v Ma Kam Chan. See also Spencer, Bower and Turner, Estoppel by Representation (2nd ed, 1966), 39–40. I am unable, however, to find support in Vitosh v Brisbane City Council for a proposition that a misstatement of law made fraudulently will not support an action for deceit. In that case, the High Court dismissed the plaintiff's appeal on the ground that, being an action for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation, the misrepresentations were neither as alleged in his statement of claim, nor false. The court did not suggest that, had the representations been made fraudulently, the action would have failed on the ground that they were statements of law.

There are, on the other hand, a number of cases where relief was granted to a party who had been induced to enter into an agreement by a misrepresentation of law made fraudulently and there are cases where the right to relief in such circumstances has been recognised: British Workman's & General Insurance Co Ltd v Cunliffe (1902) 18 TLR 502; Kettlewell v Refuge Assurance Co [1908] 1 KB 545; Tofts v Pearl Life Assurance Co Ltd [1915] 1 KB 189; and Oudaille v Lawson [1922] NZLR 259, 261. In Cunliffe's case a policy holder sought to recover a premium paid by him under an assurance policy on the life of another person. He was induced to enter into the policy by a representation made by the company's agent that he had an insurable interest. The Court of Appeal affirmed the Divisional Court's decision that he was entitled to recover the amount of premium paid although in the Divisional Court it had been found that the representation was made innocently. Significantly Romer LJ described the conduct of the agent as improper. Subsequently in Harse v Pearl Life Insurance Co [1904] 1 KB 558, 563, Collins MR explained that in Cunliffe's case the statement of law on which the assured acted was made fraudulently. It was similarly explained in Phillips v Royal London Assurance Co Ltd (1911) 105 LT 136, 137, and in Hughes v Liverpool Legal Society [1916] 2 KB 482, 486–7. The learned authors of Spencer Bower and Turner, Actionable Misrepresentation (3rd ed, 1974), p 61, para 42, after stating that it has been held or recognised in several authorities that if the law is fraudulently misstated, the representor would be held liable for misrepresentation, offer as an explanation for this principle that a statement of law implies a representation that the person professing to expound it believes it to be as stated by him. For my part, I agree with the explanation offered by the learned authors.

[298] It is therefore necessary to consider the consequences which flowed from the misrepresentation of law made fraudulently by the plaintiff's agent …

[299] In my view, the same rights and consequences should flow from the making of fraudulent misrepresentation of law by which a party was induced to enter into a contract and from the making of a fraudulent misrepresentation of fact. If a party might claim damages arising out of a fraudulent misrepresentation of law, a fortiori he should be entitled both to rescind a contract which was procured in the same way as well as to resist the enforcement of it by specific performance.

Some support for this conclusion is to be found in the judgment of Bowen LJ in West London Commercial Bank v Kitson (1884) 13 QBD 360, 362–3. There his Lordship declared: "I am not prepared to say – and I doubt whether, if a man who wilfully misrepresented the law – would be allowed in equity to retain any benefit he got by such misrepresentation."

His Lordship's statement was made, as I have already observed, in a case relating to a misrepresentation of fact. In Spencer Bower on Actionable Misrepresentation (2nd ed, 1927), p 57, in a footnote, this passage in his Lordship's judgment is described as follows:

> proposition worded with needless caution, for it cannot be supposed that, if a statement of law is a representation to the extent indicated for one purpose, it is not so for all, or that the application of the rule is confined to equity, or to proceedings for rescission.

See also 3rd ed (1974), of the same work, Spencer Bower and Turner, p 61.

Thus, I conclude it would be unconscionable to permit the plaintiff to gain from a fraudulent misrepresentation of law whether made by himself or by his agent.

It follows that the plaintiff's claim for specific performance ought to be denied and that the defendant is entitled to a declaration that he has validly rescinded the contract.

Order accordingly.

[32.35] Note

The distinction between law and fact is probably no longer supportable in Australia given the High Court's rejection of the distinction in the context of a claim for restitution of money paid under a mistake of fact (David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1992) 175 CLR 353, extracted at [10.30]).

Positive misrepresentation

[32.40] Generally, a contracting party cannot claim relief for the failure of the other party to disclose a material fact. In other words, there is no duty of disclosure and silence is not a basis for relief. There are, however, important exceptions to this rule. For example, a duty of disclosure may arise where a statement is literally true but gives rise to a false impression; or where a statement is true when made but is later rendered false by change of circumstances: see Davies v London & Provincial Marine Insurance Co (1878) 8 Ch 469, at [32.45]. Moreover, there are various classes of contract in which some unusual degree of disclosure is required. Where one party is in a much better position to know the material facts than the other party, a duty to disclose those facts is imposed in respect of certain types of contracts, known as contracts uberrimae fidei. The most important example of this category is the contract of insurance. There are statutory provisions dealing with the duties of disclosure owed by insured persons to insurers: see Marine Insurance Act 1909 (Cth), s 24; Insurance Contracts Act 1984 (Cth), s 21. Contracts of guarantee (or suretyship), on the other hand, are not regarded as contracts uberrimae fidei in the sense of requiring full disclosure. However, a limited duty of disclosure is imposed on the creditor in such cases.

Non-disclosure can in some circumstances amount to misleading or deceptive conduct (see Chapter 33). A duty of full disclosure is imposed on fiduciaries: see McKenzie v McDonald [1927] VLR 134, at [32.55]. Disclosure obligations can also arise in contracting situations considered elsewhere in this book. See, for example, unilateral mistake as to a fundamental term (Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422, at [31.150]); and unconscionable dealing (Commercial Bank of Australia Ltd v Amadio (1983) 151 CLR 447, at [36.30]).

Duties of particular disclosure are imposed on specific contracting parties by a variety of statutory provisions, such as corporations law, consumer credit laws, financial services law and land laws. Such provisions, however, are beyond the scope of this book.

Davies v London & Provincial Marine Insurance Co

[32.45] Davies v London & Provincial Marine Insurance Co (1878) 8 Ch D 469 (Chancery Division) – Trial of Action.

[FACTS: Major Daniell and Mr Burn, secretary and solicitor respectively of the defendant insurance company, believed that the retention of money by one of their agents, named Evans, amounted to a felony and directed his arrest. Some of Evans's friends, Mr Gee and Mr Humphreys, approached Major Daniell, and on 15 April 1877, Mr Burn, about reaching an arrangement that would ensure Evans was not arrested. Later that day, Mr Burn received legal advice that Evans's acts did not amount to a felony and the instructions for the arrest were withdrawn. Still later on that day, Mr Gee had a second interview with Mr Burn, who said that he would advise the company to take a sum of money from Evans as a security. He spoke of Evans's embezzlement and agreed that Evans would not be arrested before Tuesday. On 18 April, Mr Gee, Mr Humphreys and the plaintiff Davies, another friend of Evans, came to Mr Burn's office and arranged that £2,000 should be deposited with trustees for the security of the company. Nothing was said by Mr Burn about the withdrawal of the direction for arrest. The plaintiff sought to have the agreement of 18 April set aside.]

FRY J: [474] Where parties are contracting with one another, each may, unless there be a duty to disclose, observe silence even in regard to facts which he believes would be operative upon the mind of the other, and it rests upon those who say that there was a duty to disclose, to shew that the duty existed. Now undoubtedly that duty does in many cases exist. In the first place, if there be a pre-existing relationship between the parties, such as that of agent and principal, solicitor and client, guardian and ward, trustee and cestui que trust, then, if the parties can contract at all, they can only contract after the most ample disclosure of everything by the agent, by the solicitor, by the guardian, or by the trustee. The pre-existing relationship involves the duty of entire disclosure. In the next place, there are certain contracts which have been called contracts uberrimae fidei where, from their nature, the court requires disclosure from one of the contracting parties. Of that description there are well known instances to be found. One is a contract of [475] partnership, which requires that one of the partners should disclose to the other all material facts. So in the case of marine insurance, the person who proposes to insure a ship or goods must make an entire disclosure of everything material to the contract. Again, in ordinary contracts the duty may arise from circumstances which occur during the negotiation. Thus, for instance, if one of the negotiating parties has made a statement which is false in fact, but which he believes to be true and which is material to the contract, and during the course of the negotiation he discovers the falsity of that statement, he is under an obligation to correct his erroneous statement; although if he had said nothing he very likely might have been entitled to hold his tongue throughout. So, again, if a statement has been made which is true at the time, but which during the course of the negotiations becomes untrue, then the person who knows that it has become untrue is under an obligation to disclose to the other the change of circumstances.

It has been argued here that the contract between the surety (for in fact Davies was a surety for Evans) and the creditor, is one of those contracts which I have spoken of as being uberrimae fidei, and it has been said that such a contract can only be upheld in the case of there being the fullest disclosure by the intending creditor. I do not think that that proposition is sound in law. I think that, on the contrary, that contract is one in which there is no universal obligation to make disclosure, and therefore I shall not determine this case on that view. But I do think that the contract of suretyship is, as expressed by Lord Westbury in Williams v Bayley (1866) LR 1 HL 200, 219, one which "should be based upon the free and voluntary agency of the individual who enters into it". I think that principle is especially applicable here, because there is no consideration in this case, as in many cases of suretyship, for the contract so entered into; and therefore I think, to use the language of Lord Eldon in Turner v Harvey (1821) Jac 169, 178; 37 ER 814, 818, it is a contract in respect of which a very little is sufficient. Very little said which ought not to have been said, and very little not said which ought to have been said, would be sufficient to prevent the contract being valid. It is one, furthermore, in which I think that everything like pressure used by the intending creditor will have a very serious effect on the validity of the contract; and the case is stronger where that pressure is the result of maintaining a false conclusion in the mind of the person pressed.

[476] Now, to apply these observations to this case, it will have been seen, from what I have already said, that I think the payment of money into the bank on the 18 April was produced by what had been said by Major Daniell and by Mr Burn at the first interview on the 15 April; that it was produced by the belief that the company had a probable cause for prosecution; by the belief that, as a matter of fact, they did intend to prosecute; by the belief that the police were instructed to arrest Evans; and those things having been stated at the earlier interview of the 15th, it was, in my opinion, the duty of Mr Burn to state at the second interview that those facts no longer existed. I think that the language in which he assented to and upheld the erroneous impression of Mr Gee by speaking of Evans as a person who had embezzled, and by saying that the police should not arrest Evans until Tuesday, were sufficient circumstances in themselves to render it impossible that the payment of money produced by that pressure and by those representations should be valid. I think there was that little which is quite enough to prevent the contract from being upheld …

Judgment for the plaintiff.

[32.50] Note

1. In Curwen v Yan Yean Land Co Ltd (1891) 17 VLR 745, Lyon, a successful land speculator, induced Curwen to take shares in a company by representing that he and two other well-known speculators were also taking shares. This was true. However, the land that the company was to acquire belonged to Lyon and the two others, and the purchase price was very high. The Full Supreme Court upheld the setting aside of the contract. Higinbotham CJ said (at 751): "A true representation, coupled with concealment, thus became a positive misrepresentation calculated to deceive and which did in fact deceive the plaintiff to his detriment". A'Beckett J said (at 753): "the suppression of the fact that the persons represented as buyers are also sellers amounts to a misrepresentation."
2. In Westpac Banking Corporation v Robinson (1993) 30 NSWLR 668, 689–90, Clarke JA said:

> the rule concerning contracts of guarantee stands apart from the rule applicable in cases such as contracts uberrimae fidei and the general rule relating to contracts and requires disclosure of facts only if concealment of those facts would otherwise misrepresent the transaction which the guarantor is undertaking to guarantee. In general, it would only be the non-disclosure of those circumstances which were not naturally to be expected which would misrepresent the material features of that transaction …

Accordingly, it was held in that case that the bank was under no duty to disclose to a prospective guarantor of a customer's account the fact that the account had been overdrawn. Where a guarantee is required it is "naturally to be expected" that the bank is not satisfied with the customer's credit.

McKenzie v McDonald

[32.55] McKenzie v McDonald [1927] VLR 134 (Supreme Court of Victoria) – Trial of Action.

[FACTS: The plaintiff, a widow with pressing financial obligations, desired to sell a farm of which she was the owner in order to purchase a home in Melbourne of which she was in urgent need. She engaged the defendant, a real estate agent, to find a suitable home for her and to sell the farm. The agent, who was well acquainted with her financial and family problems, inspected the farm and obtained apparently reliable information as to what it was worth. He did not pass this information on to the plaintiff but wrote her a letter unduly deprecating the farm and suggesting that she accept a lower price than the one she was asking. Some time later, he wrote to her again, suggesting that she exchange the farm for a suburban house and dwelling which he owned on terms most advantageous to him and correspondingly disadvantageous to the plaintiff. On 25 September 1925, the plaintiff

signed the necessary contract to give effect to this scheme; and on 7 May 1926, the defendant resold the farm to a third party at an increased price and on extended terms. On 20 May 1926, the plaintiff commenced an action in which she claimed rescission of the agreement, the re-transfer of the properties, accounts and, alternatively, damages for deceit and negligence.]

DIXON AJ: [135] In this action the plaintiff complains that she was induced by the defendant's breach of duty to enter into and complete an agreement with the defendant for the exchange of her farm for his shop.

The breaches of duty relied upon are deceit, negligence as an agent and abuse of confidential relationship. The relief sought is, in substance, restoration of the parties to their former position or compensation for loss …

[143] The plaintiff impeaches the transaction of exchange upon the [144] ground that a confidential relationship had been established between herself and the defendant "in hac re", which placed him under a duty of full disclosure and impartial and fair dealing when he assumed the position of a contractor with her.

In Davies v London and Provincial Marine Insurance Co (1878) 8 Ch D 469, 474, Fry J says:

> If there be a pre-existing relationship between the parties, such as that of agent and principal, solicitor and client, guardian and ward, trustees and cestui que trust, then, if the parties can contract at all, they can only contract after the most ample disclosure of everything by the agent, by the solicitor, by the guardian, or by the trustee.

The relation referred to is one of confidence, but not necessarily one of influence: see Moody v Cox and Hatt [1917] 2 Ch 71, 80 per Lord Cozens Hardy.

In the statement of the categories of relations of confidence, principal and agency is commonly included, but it must be remembered that it is not every agent who stands in such a relation to his principal:

> No word is more commonly and constantly abused than the word "agent". A person may be spoken of as an "agent", and no doubt in the popular sense of the word may properly be said to be an "agent", although when it is attempted to suggest that he is an "agent" under such circumstances as create the legal obligations attaching to agency, that use of the word is only misleading: Kennedy v De Trafford [1879] AC 180, 188 per Lord Herschell.

[145] Did the defendant occupy such a position of confidence towards the plaintiff as to bring him within the equitable requirements of full disclosure and fair open dealing? In my opinion he did. He assumed the function of advising and assisting a woman in a difficult situation in the acquisition of a residence by means of the disposal or pledging of her property. He was necessarily furnished with an intimate knowledge of her financial position, her obligations, and family needs. He proceeded to advise her upon the wisdom and practicability of raising money by mortgage, and acted for her in an effort to do so. He undertook the sale of her farm, and acquired such information as he could in relation to it, and offered his counsel as to its condition and the price she had asked and in effect should ask. In this circumstance he was, in my opinion, an agent who came within "the rule of the court; which, however, does not prevent an agent from purchasing from his principal, but only requires that he shall deal with him at arm's length, and after a full disclosure of all that he knows with respect to the property": Murphy v O'Shea (1845) 2 Jones & Lat 422, 425; 69 ER 337, 339–40, per Sir E Sugden LC.

This is part of: "that great rule of the court, that he who bargains in matter of advantage with a person placing confidence in him is bound to show that a reasonable use has been made of that confidence; a rule applying to trustees, attorneys or anyone else": Gibson v Jeyes (1801) 6 Ves J 266, 278; 31 ER 1044, 1050 per Lord Eldon.

> A principle … resting upon grounds connected with the clearest principles of equity and the general security of contracts, viz that an agent to sell shall not convert himself into a purchaser unless he can make it perfectly clear that he furnished his employer with all the knowledge which he himself possessed: Lowther v Lord Lowther (1806) 13 Ves J 95, 103; 33 ER 230, 233 per Lord Erskin.

No attempt has been made by the defendant to show that he made a reasonable use of the confidence placed in him, or that he furnished the plaintiff with all the knowledge which he himself possessed. On the contrary, the evidence affirmatively proves, I think, that he set out to make a bargain with her as advantageous to himself as possible, and to that end suppressed the opinion he had obtained, [which] he knew to be well informed, that the land could be sold at £4 10s per acre, and that the tenant [146] might be expected to buy at that price, took no steps to find a purchaser, and wrote a misleading and untruthful report which he intended to dishearten his client … I think he misstated his motives and intentions, under-estimated somewhat the value of the farm, grossly over-estimated the value of the shop, and adopted a form of expression, in dealing with the income she would receive, likely to mislead her.

In these circumstances, the plaintiff was entitled to have the agreement of exchange of 25 September 1925, set aside.

[His Honour then held that as the rights of third parties had intervened in that the farm had been sold and remortgaged, it was proper to decree the payment of compensation rather than rescission. His Honour then dealt with the claims for damages for negligence and deceit and held that they had not been made out.]

Judgment for the plaintiff.

[32.60] Note

A fiduciary is a person who is reasonably expected by another (the beneficiary) to subordinate self-interest and act in the interests of the beneficiary. The primary obligations of a fiduciary are to avoid a conflict of interest between the duty to the beneficiary and the interests of the fiduciary and not to profit from the position of trust enjoyed by the fiduciary. If the fiduciary is entering into a contract with the beneficiary, full disclosure of all material facts to the beneficiary will be demanded.

In Hospital Products Ltd v United States Surgical Corp (1984) 156 CLR 41, 68 Gibbs CJ said:

> The archetype of a fiduciary is of course the trustee, but it is recognized by the decisions of the courts that there are other classes of persons who normally stand in a fiduciary relationship to one another — eg, partners, principal and agent, director and company, master and servant, solicitor and client, tenant-for-life and remainderman. There is no reason to suppose that these categories are closed. However, the difficulty is to suggest a test by which it may be determined whether a relationship, not within one of the accepted categories, is a fiduciary one.

RELIANCE BY THE REPRESENTEE

[32.65] A representee who is seeking relief must be able to establish a causal link between the misrepresentation (whether it be fraudulent, negligent or innocent) and the representee's entry into the contract. This link is established by proof of reliance on the misrepresentation. There are issues to be considered here about the actuality and materiality of the reliance and about the nexus between the representor and representee.

Materiality of misrepresentation

[32.70] Must the representation be "material", in the sense that it would induce a reasonable person to enter the contract?

Nicholas v Thompson

[32.75] Nicholas v Thompson [1924] VLR 554 (Supreme Court of Victoria, Full Court) – Appeal from Schutt J.

[FACTS: The plaintiffs, Alfred and George Nicholas, entered into two contracts with the defendant, Albert Thompson, under which they agreed to purchase the defendant's interest in a speculative venture concerning a new film process for £10,000. During the course of the negotiations, Thompson represented that he had been offered a very large sum of money for his interest and had refused to sell: para 3(f) of the statement of claim. In this action, the plaintiffs sought to rescind the contracts and to recover the £10,000 on the basis that the representation was fraudulent and had induced them to enter into the contracts. At the trial, the jury found that the representation made by Thompson was false to his knowledge and induced the plaintiffs to enter into the contract. Upon these findings, Schutt J entered judgment declaring that the contracts were void and directing that the defendant should repay the £10,000. The defendant appealed on various grounds.]

McARTHUR J: [574] Ground 7 is "that the learned judge should have held that the said alleged statements were not capable in law of being construed as a material representation." It is not misdirection that is complained of here. It is that the learned judge should have withdrawn altogether from the consideration of the jury the allegations contained in para 3(f) of the statement of claim.

Mr Cohen's contention was:

(1) that the statements were not and could not in law be regarded as representations of fact;

(2) that the statements were not and could not be regarded in law as material.

In an action such as this the representation relied upon must no doubt be a representation of fact as distinguished from a mere expression of opinion, including in the phrase "representation of fact" statement of belief or intention, which in some circumstances may be said to be statements of fact, as in Edgington v Fitzmaurice (1885) 29 Ch D 481.

The statement found by the jury to have been made by the defendant, that "he had been offered a very large sum of money for his interest, and that he had refused such offer", is, in my opinion, a statement of fact. That he had received an offer and that he had refused the offer are statements of definite facts; that he had been offered a very large sum of money is a statement of an indefinite fact, but it is nonetheless a statement of fact. It is capable of proof or disproof, it being (in the event of an issue being raised with regard to it) a question for the jury to say whether the amount proved to have been offered could reasonably be described as a very large amount or not …

[575] In support of his contention "that the statements were not and could not be regarded in law as material", Mr Cohen argued, first, that it is an essential part of the cause of action that the statement was a material statement; and, secondly, that to constitute a material statement the statement must be of such a nature that it would be likely to induce an ordinary, reasonable man (as distinguished from the particular plaintiff in the particular case) to enter into the contract. He pushed this argument to this length, that, even if a false statement were made for the purpose of inducing a person to enter into a contract, and such person were in fact thereby induced to do so, he would have no remedy against the person making the statement unless he could prove, not only that the statement induced him but that it was of such a nature that it would have been likely to have induced an ordinary reasonable man. In my opinion this argument is untenable.

In the first place, notwithstanding opinions to the contrary expressed by text writers (see Kerr on Fraud (5th ed), pp 43, 44; Spencer-Bower on Misrepresentation, p 11, art 28; Halsbury's Laws of England, vol XX, p 724, s 1722, written by Mr Spencer-Bower), I doubt whether it is strictly and technically an essential part of the [576] cause of action, which must be alleged and proved, that the statement was a material statement. If the defendant makes the statement for the purposes of inducing, and the plaintiff is thereby induced, that, I think, is sufficient: see Smith v Kay (1859) 7 HLC 750. In the form given in Bullen and Leake's Precedents of Pleading (3rd ed), pp 334–5, and (7th ed), pp 320–1, there is no allegation – no express allegation, at all events – that the statement was material. In the earlier edition the allegation is that the representation was made "with the intent to induce"; in the later edition it is "in order to induce".

In Smith v Kay the headnote, based on the judgment of Lord Chelmsford LC puts the proposition shortly thus: "When a party has practised a deception with a view to a particular end which has been attained by it, he cannot be allowed to deny its materiality."

Lord Chelmsford LC says (at 758):

> The bill, therefore, being taken to contain a sufficient statement of a case against Smith, the next objection which he makes is that the representation which is alleged, if proved, is immaterial, as it could not have been the cause of the securities being given.

And he says that the only point which could vitiate the securities would be a fraud dans locum contractui – that is, such a fraud as occasioned the contract:

> Now, it is contended [says his Lordship at 759] that this representation is wholly immaterial, that it was perfectly indifferent to Kay in what manner Smith became the holder of the bills, provided he gave consideration for them, and that if Kay had been told the whole truth he would equally have been willing to give the securities. But can it be permitted to a party who has practised a deception, with a view to a particular end which has been attained by it, to speculate upon what might have been the result if there had been a full communication of the truth? …

[577] The materiality of the statement is no doubt of great importance as evidence from which the inference may be drawn, first, that it was made for the purpose of inducing, and, secondly, that it did in fact induce (Lord Blackburn in Smith v Chadwick (1884) 9 App Cas 187, 196, and Lord Selbourne LC 190; and Lord Halsbury LC in Arnison v Smith (1889) 41 Ch D 348, 369) and no doubt in practice it has in almost all cases to be proved; but it does not appear to me to be, strictly speaking, an essential element of the cause of action …

But, supposing it is an essential element of the cause of action, the next question is: What is meant by "materiality"? It is defined thus in Lord Halsbury's Laws of England, vol XX, p 698, s 1681: "A representation is material when its tendency or its natural and probable result is to induce the representee to act on the faith of it in the kind of way in which he is proved to have in fact acted." And at 699, s 1683, the learned author goes on to say:

> It must [578] be remembered, however, that a tendency to induce means a tendency to induce the particular representee in the proved or admitted circumstances of the case. Where there is nothing special in such circumstances, it is sufficient to prove that, in the ordinary course of events, the natural and probable effect of the representation was to influence the mind of a normal representee in the manner alleged. But, to the knowledge of the representor, there may be special circumstances or peculiarities in the moral or mental constitution, or in the situation, of the representee, of such a character as to render the particular representation of the utmost importance to the particular representee to whom it was addressed, though it would be utterly inoperative on the mind of a normal person under normal conditions. In all such cases the representation is material as between the parties.

It is not necessary that the statement should be of such a nature that, if taken as true, it would add to the value of the subject matter of the representation. See, for example, such cases as Kent v Freehold Land & Brickmaking Co (1867) LR 4 Eq 588, and Lindsay Petroleum Co v Hurd (1874) LR 5 PC 221, where it was held that a false statement by the vendor of the price he gave for the property was a material misrepresentation of fact. And see that class of cases of which Phillips v Duke of Buckingham (1684) 1 Vern 227; 23 ER 432 and Gordon v Street [1899] 2 QB 641, are examples, where false statements as to the identity of the person with whom the representee is dealing were held to be material misrepresentations ….

[579] There was, I think, ample evidence in the present case to justify the jury in finding that, to the knowledge of the defendant, the relationship between the plaintiffs and defendant, and the special circumstances of the case, were such that the statement found to have been made by the defendant to the plaintiffs would be likely to operate on the minds of the plaintiffs as an inducing cause, and I am therefore of opinion that the statement was capable of being a material statement. I am also of opinion that the jury, having found that the plaintiffs were in fact induced by the statement to enter into the [580] contract, and the evidence being all one way, that the statement was made for the purpose of inducing them to do so, the defendant cannot now be heard to say that the statement was not material: Smith v Kay (1859) 7 HLC 750; 11 ER 299. For these reasons I am of the opinion that the seventh ground of appeal fails …

[WEIGALL AJ concurred. CUSSEN ACJ delivered a judgment concurring with McArthur J, in the course of which he said (at 566):

> The matter may be tested in this way. Supposing the defendant had admitted that the misrepresentation was made in order to induce, and that it did induce, could he insist that the plaintiffs were bound to prove, in addition, something not expressly alleged; namely, that it was material? I do not think so.]

Appeal dismissed.

Actuality of reliance

[32.80] Did the representee actually rely on the representation? In particular, is there reliance, for example, where the representee was influenced by other factors as well as the representation, or where the representor gave the representee an opportunity to discover the truth, or where the representee made her or his own investigations?

Redgrave v Hurd

[32.85] Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Fry J.

[FACTS: The plaintiff, a solicitor, published in the Law Times an advertisement headed "Law Partnership", stating that the advertiser, an elderly solicitor of moderate practice, with extensive connections, shortly retiring and having no successor, would first take as partner an efficient lawyer who would not object to purchasing the advertiser's suburban residence, value £1,600. The defendant answered the advertisement, and had an interview with the plaintiff, at which the latter stated that his business brought in about £300 a year. The defendant asked for details about the amount of business done for the last three years and asked for an interview for this purpose. At this interview, the plaintiff produced three summaries showing a business of not quite £200 a year. The defendant asked how the difference was made up, and the plaintiff showed him a number of papers which he said related to other business not included in the summaries. These papers, which the defendant did not examine, showed only a most trifling amount of business, and the gross returns of the business were in fact only about £200 a year. The defendant shortly afterwards signed an agreement to purchase the house for £1,600 and paid a deposit. The plaintiff refused to have any reference to the business inserted in the agreement. The defendant took possession, but finding, as he alleged, that the business was worthless, refused to complete. The plaintiff brought an action for specific performance. The defendant put in a defence, in which he disputed the right to specific performance on the ground of misrepresentations as to the business and by counterclaim claimed on the same ground to have the contract rescinded. The defendant also sought damages on the ground of the expenses he had been put to and the loss incurred by giving up his own practice.

Fry J held that the defendant having had opportunity afforded him of ascertaining the truth of the representations as to the amount of the business, and having to some extent, though carelessly and inefficiently, inquired into it, must be taken not to have relied on the representations and that the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance. The defendant appealed.]

BAGGALLAY LJ: [22] The mere fact that a party has the opportunity of investigating and ascertaining whether a representation [23] is true or false is not sufficient to deprive him of his right to rely on a misrepresentation as a defence to an action for specific performance. The person who has made the misrepresentation cannot be heard to say to the party to whom he has made that representation, "You chose to believe me when you might have doubted me, and gone further." The representation once made relieves the party from an investigation, even if the opportunity is afforded. I do not mean to say that there may not be certain circumstances of suspicion, which might put a person upon inquiry, and make it his duty to inquire, but under ordinary circumstances, the mere fact that he does not avail himself of the opportunity of testing the accuracy of the representation made to him will not enable the opposing party to succeed on that ground. The case of Rawlins v Wickham (1858) 3 De G & J 304; 44 ER 1285, is a very strong illustration of the application of that principle. There, a person who had been induced by false representations to enter into a partnership continued in that partnership for four years, and then for the first time discovered the fraud which had been practised upon him. He was held entitled to relief, though at any time during that period he might have investigated matters for himself. It is true that in the present case there was some investigation, but it was an investigation of a most cursory character, which could not have enabled the defendant to ascertain the truth or the falsity of the representation that had been made. So far, therefore, as the conclusions arrived at by the learned judge, upon consideration of the oral testimony on that second point are concerned, I am unable to agree with him …

[JESSEL MR and LUSH LJ delivered similar judgments. The defendant's counterclaim failed so far as damages were concerned because he had not pleaded knowledge on the part of the plaintiff that the allegations were untrue nor had he pleaded the allegations themselves in sufficient detail to found the action for deceit.]

Appeal allowed.

[32.90] Note

In Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215, 236 Wilson J (with the agreement of Gibbs CJ and Dawson J) said the principles relating to inducement can be stated as follows:

1. Notwithstanding that a representation is both false and fraudulent, if the representee does not rely upon it he has no case.
2. If a material representation is made which is calculated to induce the representee to enter into a contract and that person in fact enters into the contract there arises a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the representation.

3. The inference may be rebutted, for example, by showing that the representee, before he entered into the contract, either was possessed of actual knowledge of the true facts and knew them to be true or alternatively made it plain that whether he knew the true facts or not he did not rely on the representation.
4. The representation need not be the sole inducement. It is sufficient so long as it plays some part even if only a minor part in contributing to the formation of the contract.

In Edgington v Fitzmaurice (1885) 29 Ch D 459 (see facts set out at [32.25]) the plaintiff advanced money on the debentures relying on the misstatement in the prospectus issued by the directors, but also because he mistakenly thought that he would have a charge on the company's assets. Counsel for the defendant directors argued that it was this mistaken notion which really induced the plaintiff to advance his money. Replying to this argument Cotton LJ said:

> It is true that if he had not supposed he would have a charge he would not have taken the debentures, but if he also relied on the misstatement in the prospectus, his loss nonetheless resulted from that misstatement. It is not necessary to show that the misstatement was the sole cause of his acting as he did. If he acted on that misstatement, though he was influenced by an erroneous supposition, the defendants will be still liable.

Bowen LJ said (at 483) that if the plaintiff's mind "was disturbed by the misstatement of the defendant, and such disturbance was in part the cause of what he did, the mere fact of his also making a mistake himself could make no difference".

[33.05] Misleading or deceptive conduct is prohibited by s 18 of the Australian Consumer Law (ACL), which provides that: "[a] person shall not, in trade or commerce, engage in conduct that is misleading or deceptive or is likely to mislead or deceive".

The ACL also contained specific prohibitions against various kinds of false representations and misleading conduct: see Ch 3 of the ACL.

Section 18 does not create liability. Rather, it creates a statutory norm or standard of conduct in trade or commerce. A person who has suffered loss by conduct that breaches s 18 is entitled to damages to compensate them for that loss (s 236) (see [33.170]–[33.235]). The court is also given the power to grant any other order it thinks fit to prevent loss being suffered as a result of a breach of s 18, including declarations that a contract is void, or is to be varied, or that a person should refund money or return property (ACL, ss 237 and 243) (see [33.240]–[33.260]).

The provisions of the ACL considered in this chapter came into force on 1 January 2011. By necessity, this chapter extracts and discusses cases heard under the former regime. Thus, some familiarity with the former regime is necessary. Prior to the introduction of the ACL, s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) (TPA) prohibited corporations from engaging, in trade or commerce, in conduct that is misleading or deceptive or likely to mislead or deceive. Equivalent provisions in all States and Territories applied to persons who engaged in misleading or deceptive conduct in trade or commerce. The following table identifies the key provisions of the TPA which are referred to in the cases considered and identifies the equivalent provisions in the ACL.

Nature of provision	Former regime (TPA)	New Regime

THE TRADE OR COMMERCE LIMITATION

[33.10] In order to be caught by the statutory prohibition, the misleading or deceptive conduct must occur "in trade or commerce". Although this expression is generally given a wide meaning by the courts, it does constitute a limiting factor. The High Court considered the limitation imposed by the phrase in Concrete Constructions (NSW) Pty Ltd v Nelson (1990) 169 CLR 594, at [33.15]. The inapplicability of the statutory prohibitions to misleading conduct that induces a contract in a non-commercial context is illustrated by O'Brien v Smolonogov (1983) 53 ALR 107, at [33.25]. It is not necessary to show that the person engaging in the conduct was acting in trade or commerce in their own right (see Houghton v Arms [2006] HCA 69; (2006) 225 CLR 553). A misrepresentation that is not made in trade or commerce may be actionable under the general law (see Chapter 32).

Concrete Constructions (NSW) v Nelson

[33.15] Concrete Constructions (NSW) Pty Ltd v Nelson (1990) 169 CLR 594 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: The appellant (the company) was, in July 1987, constructing a building in Grosvenor Square, Sydney. The respondent (the worker) was one of the company's employees on the site. He sustained injuries when he fell to the bottom of an air-conditioning shaft while attempting to remove a grate positioned at the entry point of the shaft. He alleged that his injuries were caused by the conduct of the company's foreman who wrongly informed him that the grates at the entry points of the air-conditioning shafts were fixed by three bolts on each side and that it was safe to remove them in the manner explained by the foreman. The worker fell down the shaft when one of the grates gave way, by reason of the fact that it was not affixed by bolts or otherwise.

The worker instituted proceedings for damages against the company in the Federal Court. The statement of claim contained the above allegations about the cause of the worker's injury and, attributing the conduct of its foreman to the company, asserted that those injuries were occasioned to the worker "by reason of conduct of the company which was misleading or deceptive or liable to mislead or deceive". By consent, an order was made pursuant to the Federal Court Rules that the following question be decided before trial: "Do the facts pleaded and particularised in the statement of claim give rise to a cause of action?" That preliminary question was argued before Einfeld J in the Federal Court, who answered it in the affirmative. The company appealed to the High Court.]

MASON CJ, DEANE, DAWSON AND GAUDRON JJ: [600] The company's argument that the case does not fall within s 52 is essentially based upon the combined effect of the heading "Consumer Protection" and the section's express confinement of the scope of its provisions to conduct "in trade or commerce" ….

[601] It is well established that the words "trade" and "commerce", when used in the context of s 51(i) of the Constitution, are not terms of art but are terms of common knowledge of the widest import. The same may be said of those words as used in s 52(1) of the Act. Indeed, in the light of the provisions of s 6(2) of the Act which give an extended operation to s 52 and which clearly use the words "trade" and "commerce" in the sense which the words bear in s 51(i) of the Constitution, it would be difficult to maintain that those words were used in s 52 with some different meaning. The real problem involved in the construction of s 52 of the Act does not, however, spring from the use of the words "trade or commerce". It arises from the requirement that the conduct to which the section refers be "in" trade or commerce. Plainly enough, what is encompassed in the plenary grant of legislative power "with respect to … Trade and commerce" in s 51(i) of the Constitution is not of assistance on the question of the effect of the word "in" as part of the requirement that the conduct proscribed by s 52(1) of the Act be "in trade or commerce".

The phrase "in trade or commerce" in s 52 has a restrictive operation. It qualifies the prohibition against engaging in conduct of the specified kind. As a matter of language, a prohibition against engaging in conduct "in trade or commerce" can be construed as encompassing conduct in the course of the myriad of activities which are not, of their nature, of a trading or commercial character but which are undertaken in the course of, or as incidental to, the [603] carrying on of an overall trading or commercial business. If the words "in trade or commerce" in s 52 are construed in that sense, the provisions of the section would extend, for example, to a case where the misleading or deceptive conduct was a failure by a driver to give the correct handsignal when driving a truck in the course of a corporation's haulage business. It would also extend to a case, such as the present, where the alleged misleading or deceptive conduct consisted of the giving of inaccurate information by one employee to another in the course of carrying on the building activities of a commercial builder. Alternatively, the reference to conduct "in trade or commerce" in s 52 can be construed as referring only to conduct which is itself an aspect or element of activities or transactions which, of their nature, bear a trading or commercial character. So construed, to borrow and adapt words used by Dixon J in a different context in Bank of NSW v The Commonwealth (1948) 76 CLR 1, at 381, the words "in trade or commerce" refer to "the central conception" of trade or commerce and not to the "immense field of activities" in which corporations may engage in the course of, or for the purposes of, carrying on some overall trading or commercial business.

As a matter of mere language, the arguments favouring and militating against these alternative constructions of s 52 are fairly evenly balanced. The scope of the prohibition imposed by s 52 is, however, governed not only by "the terms in which it is created" but by "the context in which it is found" (see Yorke v Lucas (1985) 158 CLR 661, at 668; and, generally, Bank of NSW v The Commonwealth, at 285). In that regard, it is of particular significance that the words "trade" and "commerce" have

"about them a chameleon-like hue, readily adapting themselves to their surroundings" (O'Brien v Smolonogov (1983) 53 ALR 107, at 113, quoting Federal Commissioner of Taxation v Whitfords Beach Pty Ltd (1982) 150 CLR 355, at 378–9). Section 52(2) precludes limiting the scope of s 52(1) by implication drawn from the contents of other provisions of Pt V. Nonetheless, when the section is read in the context provided by other features of the Act, which is "An Act relating to certain Trade Practices", the narrower (ie the second) of the alternative constructions of the requirement "in trade or commerce" is the preferable one. Indeed, in the context of Pt V of the Act with its heading "Consumer Protection", it is plain that s 52 was not intended to extend to all conduct, regardless of its nature, in which a corporation might engage in the course of, or for [604] the purposes of, its overall trading or commercial business. Put differently, the section was not intended to impose, by a side-wind, an overlay of Commonwealth law upon every field of legislative control into which a corporation might stray for the purposes of, or in connection with, carrying on its trading or commercial activities. What the section is concerned with is the conduct of a corporation towards persons, be they consumers or not, with whom it (or those whose interests it represents or is seeking to promote) has or may have dealings in the course of those activities or transactions which, of their nature, bear a trading or commercial character. Such conduct includes, of course, promotional activities in relation to, or for the purposes of, the supply of goods or services to actual or potential consumers, be they identified persons or merely an unidentifiable section of the public.

In some areas, the dividing line between what is and what is not conduct "in trade or commerce" may be less clear and may require the identification of what imports a trading or commercial character to an activity which is not, without more, of that character. The point can be illustrated by reference to the examples mentioned above. The driving of a truck for the delivery of goods to a consumer and the construction of a building for another pursuant to a building contract are, no doubt, in trade or commerce in so far as the relationship between supplier and actual or potential customer or between builder and building owner is concerned. That being so, to drive a truck with a competitor's name upon it in order to mislead the customer or to conceal a defect in a building for the purpose of deceiving the building owner may well constitute misleading or deceptive conduct "in trade or commerce" for the purposes of s 52. On the other hand, the mere driving of a truck or construction of a building is not, without more, in trade or commerce and to engage in conduct in the course of those activities which is divorced from any relevant actual or potential trading or commercial relationship or dealing will not, of itself, constitute conduct "in trade or commerce" for the purposes of that section. That being so, the giving of a misleading handsignal by the driver of one of its trucks is not, in the relevant sense, conduct by a corporation "in trade or commerce". Nor, without more, is a misleading statement by one of a building company's own employees to another employee in the course of their ordinary activities. The position might well be different if the misleading statement was made in the course of, or for the purposes of, some trading or commercial dealing between the corporation and the particular employee.

The alleged misleading or deceptive conduct of the company's foreman in the present case consisted of an internal communication [605] by one employee to another employee in the course of their ordinary activities in and about the construction of a building. It follows from what has been said above that that conduct was not, for relevant purposes, conduct "in trade or commerce" and would not, if established, constitute a contravention of s 52 of the Act. That being so, the appeal must be allowed and the preliminary question which was answered by the learned primary judge in the affirmative must be answered in the negative.

[33.20] TOOHEY J: [612] The expression "in trade or commerce" recurs throughout Div 1. There [613] is a definition of "trade or commerce" in s 4(1) of the Act but it is geographical and does not assist in resolving the issue presently before the Court. Heydon, Trade Practices Law (1989) comments at par 11.210: "The better view is that 'in' means 'within, as part of'. It does not mean 'in connection with' or 'in relation to'. The view that 'in' means 'within' is supported by Larmer v Power Machinery Pty Ltd ((1977) 29 FLR 490, at 493). Even so limited, the expression 'in trade or commerce' is a broad one, as the s 52 cases indicate. While the conduct must be in the trade or commerce of the defendant, the party deceived need not be in actual or prospective trading relations with the defendant."

The present appeal proceeded on the assumption, tacit if not express, that the conduct said to have been misleading or deceptive must have been conduct in the trade or commerce of the appellant. No doubt, in most cases the focus will be on the nature of the defendant's business but the section is not so limited. It does not, in terms, refer to the trade or commerce of the particular corporation. It seems unlikely, given the nature of the activities with which Pt V, Div 1 of the Act is concerned, that it should be necessary to consider closely the character of a corporation's business and in particular to determine whether or not the conduct relied upon by an applicant or plaintiff can fairly be said to be in the trade or commerce of that corporation. Notions of ultra vires can hardly have a part to play in this area of the law. The position of the expression "in trade or commerce" in s 52(1), and indeed in other sections in Pt V, Div 1, suggests that it is trade or commerce in general terms with which the statute is concerned.

In my view, s 52(1) is aimed at conduct in which a corporation engages when that conduct takes place in a situation which fairly answers the description "in trade or commerce". The words "trade or commerce" are of wide import: see Re Ku-ring-gai Co-operative Building Society (No 12) Ltd ((1978) 36 FLR 134, at 139, 167). But their focus is on commercial activity, the providing of goods and services for reward. There is no reason why they should bear a different meaning to that which they bear in s 51(i) of the Constitution, particularly when regard is had to s 6(2) of the Act which seeks to give the Act an additional operation by reference to various heads of power in s 51 of the Constitution. It is of interest to note that in Larmer, which was decided fairly soon after the Act came into operation, Nimmo J said (76):

> I do not think that the expression "in trade or commerce" [614] should be given the narrow interpretation contended for by counsel for the company. On the contrary I think the provisions of the Trade Practices Act, including the definition given to the expression in s 4, demand that a very wide meaning be given to it. In my view, the expression is intended to cover the whole field in which the nation's trade or commerce is carried on. I reject the view that it is confined to any particular event which may occur in the conduct of a business which operates within that field.

Even taking such a broad view of s 52(1), the preposition "in" clearly operates by way of limitation. The question is not whether the conduct engaged in was in connexion with trade or commerce or in relation to trade or commerce. It must have been in trade or commerce. While there are dangers in seeking for the meaning of an expression through the substitution of another, the phrase "as part of trade or commerce" does, I think, come close to what is intended. Thus, when the appellant's foreman described the grates as being secured on either side with bolts, that statement must have been made as part of trade or commerce before an action could lie under s 52(1).

[BRENNAN and MCHUGH JJ delivered separate judgments in which they held that s 52 was not restricted to conduct that was of itself of a trading or commercial character, but extended to conduct occurring in the course of carrying on an activity or carrying out a transaction of a trading or commercial character. However, Brennan and McHugh JJ agreed, on other grounds, that the appeal should be allowed]

Appeal allowed.

[33.23] Notes

1. Reference is made in the above reasoning to the fact that s 52 was contained in Pt V of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) and that Pt V was entitled "Consumer Protection". Mason CJ, Deane, Dawson and Gaudron JJ refer to this in support of the conclusion that s 52 was "not intended to extend to all conduct, regardless of its nature, in which a corporation might engage in the course of, or for the purposes of, its overall trading or commercial business" (at 603–4). Section 18 of the ACL is not contained in a Chapter or Part of the ACL entitled "Consumer Protection". Rather, it is contained in C 2 of the ACL, which is entitled "General Protections". However, there is nothing to suggest that this will result in the courts giving the phrase "in trade or commerce" a different construction. As Kirby P noted in Public Service Association of New South Wales v Industrial Commission of New South Wales (1995) 1 NSWLR 627, 640:

   > There is a presumption, useful in statutory interpretation that where a provision of legislation has been passed upon by authoritative decisions of the courts and is later re-enacted, Parliament can be taken, in the absence of a clear intention to the contrary, to know and accept the interpretation given to the legislation.

2. In subsequent decisions, the narrower interpretation of the phrase "in trade or commerce" adopted by Mason CJ, Deane, Dawson and Gaudron JJ has been preferred over the broader interpretation offered by Brennan and McHugh JJ: see, for example, Houghton v Arms [2006] HCA 69; (2006) 225 CLR 553, at [33.35].

O'Brien v Smolonogov

[33.25] O'Brien v Smolonogov (1983) 53 ALR 107 (Federal Court of Australia, Full Court) – Appeal from a single judge of the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: The appellants acquired five adjoining portions of land of a total area of approximately 875 acres. The land was conditional leasehold under the Crown Lands Consolidation Act 1913 (NSW). In order to apply for permission to build on that land, it would have been necessary to convert it to freehold by paying the appropriate fees and obtaining consent and then amalgamating both portions into one. It was likely that the Shire Council would then grant permission to build on it. No building permit existed in relation to it.

After acquiring the land, the appellants decided that they would like to build on one portion, portion 106 (287 acres), and for the purposes of financing the building, to sell other parts of their holding. On 9 August 1981, they advertised portions 81 and 101 in the Sunday Telegraph. The advertisement was inserted under the classification "Farms, Stock, Stations" and read as follows: "JINDABYNE 282 acres, building permit OK magnificent views $45 000 542-1845 (SX)."

The advertisement was seen by the first respondent, who brought it to the attention of the second respondent (together, the respondents) and asked him to telephone the number advertised. The second respondent did so and spoke to the first appellant. In the course of this telephone conversation, the first appellant made the following statements about the property that were false or misleading: that the subject land was 13 miles from Jindabyne, was practically on the main road and only one or two gates from it; that there was no problem getting onto the land; that it was very good land; that he had a building permit to build on it and that there was no problem to build a house on it and to bring in materials; and that there was a permanent creek running through the property.

Following this conversation the parties, on 10 August 1981, entered into a written contract for sale. The contract provided for a purchase price of $50,000 and a deposit of $5,000 which was paid by the respondents. Completion was to take place within eight weeks of the date.

By notice dated 2 October 1981, the respondents purported to rescind the contract and demanded a return of the deposit with interest and costs on the grounds that they were induced to enter into the contract by the false representations. Proceedings were brought by the respondents against the appellants claiming that the appellants made false or misleading statements concerning certain land near Jindabyne contrary to the provisions of s 53A(1)(b) of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (the Act) [now ACL, s 30] and seeking (inter alia) to recover the loss or damage which they might have suffered by that conduct pursuant to s 82 of the Act [now ACL, s 236].

The trial judge held that he was satisfied, within the meaning of s 53A(1)(b) of the Act, that the false or misleading statements were made in connection with the possible sale of an interest in land and that they concerned either the location of the land, the characteristics of the land or the use to which the land was capable of being put or might lawfully be put. He declared that the contract of sale was and had been void since 2 October 1981; ordered the refund of the deposit and ordered that the appellants were liable to pay to the respondents by way of damages the legal and other costs reasonably incurred in connection with the contract and the purported rescission thereof. The appellants appealed to the Full Court of the Federal Court.]

FOX, SHEPPARD AND BEAUMONT JJ: [108] Since the appellants are individuals, s 53A cannot apply here unless the extended operation of Division I of Part V of the Act provided by s 6(3) is applicable. It is common ground that the extended operation provided for by s 6(3)(a), in its reference to the use of telephonic services, is available here since the respondents say that the offending conduct took place in the course of a telephone conversation (see The Queen v Australian Industrial Court; Ex parte CLM Holdings Pty Limited (1977) 136 CLR 235). The telephone conversation in question related to land owned by the appellants which they had advertised for sale and the alleged false or misleading statements concerned the location and characteristics of the land and the use to which it was capable of being put or might lawfully be put …

[110] It is submitted on behalf of the appellants that no contravention of s 53A occurred because the conduct impugned was not something done in trade or commerce. The statements relied on, the argument runs, were private in character and lacked the trade or commercial context required by the terms of s 53A …

[111] The learned Judge accepted that the sale of land by private contract, without more, may not be in trade or commerce but his Honour pointed to the fact that the conduct here complained of involved an invitation by the appellants to the public at large to treat with them. This was done by public advertisements inviting the conduct of negotiations over the telephone. In this way, the learned Judge held, the ordinary means of trade or commerce were utilised for the purpose of selling their land and it follows that the conduct of the appellants was something done in trade or commerce for the purposes of the Act (cf Bank of New South Wales v Commonwealth (1978) 76 CLR 1 at p 381).

Although the explanatory memorandum explaining the operation of the Trade Practices Bill, 1974 describes Part V of the Bill as prohibiting "a number of commercial practices that are unfair to consumers," (emphasis added), there does not appear to be any Australian authority squarely in point for present purposes … However, some guidance is given by the approach to this question taken in the United States. In a series of decisions under consumer protection legislation, the view has been consistently taken that a private sale of property by an individual is not conduct in trade or commerce for the purposes of that legislation except if done in the course of a business activity or otherwise arising in a "business context" …

[113] In the present case, it cannot be suggested that the lands acquired by the appellants became trading stock (see Federal Commissioner of Taxation v St Hubert's Island Pty Limited (In Liquidation) (1978) 138 CLR 211). Nor is it a case where the taxpayer's activities amounted to more than the mere realisation of a capital asset and constituted the carrying on of land development (see Federal Commissioner of Taxation v Whitfords Beach Pty Ltd (1982) 39 ALR 521). The land itself was not used for any business activity: it was not used for farming or grazing.

It follows, in our opinion, that the only possible feature of the case which could conceivably be relied upon to suggest that the impugned conduct occurred in trade or commerce was the resort by the appellants to a newspaper as a medium of public advertisement of the land and the use made by the parties of the telephone for the purpose of conducting negotiations. It is true, as the learned Judge observed, that the use of such facilities is common practice in the conduct of trade or commerce … [114] But, in our view, the mere use, by a person not acting in the course of carrying on a business, of facilities commonly employed in commercial transactions, cannot transform a dealing which lacks any business character into something done in trade or commerce. Of course, the facilities mentioned have applications which are not commercial in any sense: advertisements in newspapers and the telephone are used by persons for purposes which are not commercial at all. With all respect to the learned Judge, we are not persuaded that resort to them can create the business context required by the reference to "trade or commerce" in s 53A. The conduct complained of was not something done by the appellants in the course of carrying on a business and it lacked trading or commercial character as a transaction. It thus fell outside the scope of s 53A … The appeal should be allowed with costs.

Appeal allowed.

[33.30] Notes

1. Before it was repealed, s 53A(1)(b) of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) provided that "a corporation shall not, in trade or commerce, in connection with the sale or grant, or the possible sale or grant, of an interest in land or in connection with the promotion by any means of the sale or grant of an interest in land make a false or misleading representation concerning the nature of the interest in the land, the price payable for the land, the location of the land, the characteristics of the land, the use to which the land it capable of being put or may lawfully be put or the existence or availability of facilities associated with the land". Section 30 of the ACL replaces s 53A.
2. The sale by an individual of property or assets used for a business activity has been held to be in trade or commerce. In Havyn Pty Ltd v Webster [2005] NSWCA 182, the New South Wales Court of Appeal upheld the trial judge's finding that the sale of a block of six units let out by the respondent (who was an individual) was in trade or commerce.

THE RELEVANT AUDIENCE

[33.40] In order to assess whether conduct is misleading or deceptive it is necessary to identify its likely effect on the audience to whom the conduct is directed. In most pre-contractual scenarios will have been made to specific individuals or small groups, such as another contracting party or a small group of potential contracting parties. The approach to be adopted in such circumstances is set out in Butcher v Lachlan Elder Realty Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 60; (2004) 218 CLR 592, at [33.50].

The approach to be adopted when the conduct is directed to the public at large (or sections of the public) was first set out by the High Court in Campomar Sociedad Limitada v Nike International Limited [2000] HCA 12; (2000) 202 CLR 45, [103] where the High Court stated:

> Where the persons [to whom the conduct is directed] are not identified individuals to whom a particular misrepresentation has been made … but are members of a class to which the conduct in question was directed in a general sense, it is necessary to isolate by some criterion a representative member of that class.

This observation was recently approved by French CJ in Campbell v Backoffice Investments Pty Ltd [2009] HCA 25; (2009) 238 CLR 304, [35].

Members of this group are expected to take reasonable care of their own interests by paying a reasonable level of attention to information provided. Furthermore, they would not react to the conduct in question in an extreme or fanciful way.

Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v TPG Internet Pty Ltd [2013] HCA 54; (2013) 250 CLR 640 (at [33.45]) demonstrates that the hypothetical members of the relevant class or the reasonable individual recipient of information may also be treated as having some knowledge of the subject matter to which the potentially misleading conduct relates.

ACCC v TPG Internet Pty Ltd

[33.45] Australian Competition and Consumer Commission v TPG Internet Pty Ltd [2013] HCA 54; (2013) 250 CLR 640 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: The Australian Competition and Consumer Commission argued that TPG's marketing methods were misleading. TPG published advertisements that prominently displayed an attractive monthly flat rate for broadband services and, much less prominently, disclosed that the rate in question was only available when broadband services were bundled with a TPG landline service (costing $30 per month). A set-up fee payable upon installation was equally less prominently displayed.

The primary judge identified the relevant class as "the broad class of Australian consumers around mainland capital cities who were users or potential users of broadband internets services". This group included first-time users but excluded those who knew little or nothing about broadband internet services. The trial judge found that such a group would be aware that such services can be sold bundled or unbundled and would not have a starting assumption as to whether there would be a bundling condition. Given the prominence of the dominant message about unlimited broadband services for a competitive monthly price, a reasonable member of the class identified would conclude that no conditions were attached. The trial judge's finding was upheld by the majority of the High Court. Gageler J dissented. He upheld the reasoning of the Full Federal Court, who had held that the dominant message would not create in the minds of the identified class the impression that there were or were no additional charges or conditions. As a result, the reasonable members of the relevant class would look at the whole advertisement to determine what, if any, conditions applied before reaching a conclusion on the matter.]

FRENCH CJ, CRENNAN, BELL AND KEANE JJ: [16] The advertisements in the second phase of the campaign were deployed from 7 October 2010 until 4 November 2011 ("the revised advertisements"). The revised advertisements were published on or in four national television stations, the same seven radio stations as the initial advertisements, a wider range of national and capital city newspapers, the TPG website and third party websites, national cinema screens, national magazines, coupon booklets left in letter boxes, brochures, public transport, billboards and noticeboards …

The findings and conclusions of the primary judge

[18] The primary judge proceeded to his conclusions on the basis that TPG's target audience consisted of "the broad class of Australian consumers around mainland capital cities who were users or potential users of broadband internet services." His Honour found that the target audience did not include people who knew little or nothing about broadband internet services. While users of ADSL2+ were more knowledgeable about such services than the general class of users or potential users of internet services, the primary judge found that "this does not impute a high level of knowledge about broadband internet to the ordinary or reasonable consumer."

The bundling condition

[19] His Honour found that the target audience included first time users of ADSL2+ services. The primary judge also found that, by virtue of the array of available internet options, the ordinary or reasonable consumer would not have any starting assumption as to whether TPG's offering was of a separate or bundled service, and would rely on the advertisement for information as to the service offered.

[20] The primary judge found that each advertisement had the same dominant message, namely: "Unlimited ADSL2+ for $29.99 per month". His Honour found that the "ordinary or reasonable consumer taking in only the dominant message would have the impression that the entire cost of the service is $29.99 per month, with no other charges and no obligation to acquire another service"; and the balance of the advertisement which contained that information was not given sufficient prominence to counter the effect of the headline claim.

[21] The primary judge held that the dominant message was false "because – as TPG conced[ed] – to acquire Unlimited ADSL2+ for $29.99 per month a consumer is also obliged to rent a home telephone line from TPG and to pay an additional $30 per month for it." …

The conclusions of the Full Court

[31] [T]he Full Court held that the revised television advertisement, initial and revised radio advertisements, initial and revised newspaper advertisements, initial and revised online advertisements and public transport advertisements were not misleading …

[33] The Full Court did not reject the primary judge's conclusions in relation to the misleading character of the advertisements simply on the basis of a different impression of the facts of the case or the inferences properly to be drawn from those facts. Close examination of the Full Court's reasons shows that their Honours' conclusion reflected differences in point of principle with the approach taken by the primary judge. It is necessary to identify those points of divergence and to note their influence on the conclusions of the Full Court before proceeding to a discussion of the reasons for upholding the approach of the primary judge …

The approach of the primary judge was correct

[45] First, the Full Court erred in holding that the primary judge was wrong to regard the "dominant message" of the advertisements as of crucial importance: neither of the statements of Gibbs CJ in Puxu which the Full Court applied was decisive in the circumstances of this case. Secondly, the Full Court erred in failing to appreciate that the tendency of TPG's advertisements to mislead was not neutralised by the Full Court's attribution of knowledge to members of the target audience that ADSL2+ services may be offered as a "bundle".

Puxu

[46] Puxu was a case in which the claim of misleading conduct rested "solely on the fact that the appellant sold goods which were virtually identical in appearance to those sold by the respondent". The case was determined on the basis that potential purchasers of furniture costing substantial sums of money were able to inspect the furniture which was on display in the retailer's showroom. The majority of the Court took the view that purchasers would, acting reasonably, pay attention to the label, brand or mark of the suite they were minded to buy and, as a result, would not be misled by similarities in the getup of rival products. It was in this context that the observations of Gibbs CJ cited above should be understood.

[47] This case is in stark contrast to Puxu in three respects. First, TPG's target audience did not consist of potential purchasers focused on the subject matter of their purchase in the calm of the showroom to which they had come with a substantial purchase in mind. Here, the advertisements were an unbidden intrusion on the consciousness of the target audience. The intrusion will not always be welcome. The very function of the advertisements was to arrest the attention of the target audience. But while the attention of the audience might have been arrested, it cannot have been expected to pay close attention to the advertisement; certainly not the attention focused on viewing and listening to the advertisements by the judges obliged to scrutinise them for the purposes of these proceedings. In such circumstances, the Full Court rightly recognised that "many persons will only absorb the general thrust". That being so, the attention given to the advertisement by an ordinary and reasonable person may well be "perfunctory", without being equated with a failure on the part of the members of the target audience to take reasonable care of their own interests.

[48] Secondly, the Full Court did not recognise that the tendency of the advertisements to mislead was to be determined, not by asking whether they were apt to induce consumers to enter into contracts with TPG, but by asking whether they were apt to bring them into negotiation with TPG rather than with one of its competitors on the basis of an erroneous belief engendered by the general thrust of TPG's message.

[49] It might be said, as TPG did, that consumers, acting reasonably in their own interest, could be expected to obtain a clear understanding of their rights and obligations before signing up with TPG; but to say that is to confuse the question whether the consumer has suffered loss with the anterior question as to whether the advertisement, viewed as a whole, has a tendency to lead a consumer into error. Thus, in Campbell v Backoffice Investments Pty Ltd French CJ noted that the question of characterisation as to whether conduct is misleading is "logically anterior to the question whether a person has suffered loss or damage thereby". French CJ observed that characterisation of conduct "generally requires consideration of whether the impugned conduct viewed as a whole has a tendency to lead a person into error" (at [25]). As observed earlier in these reasons, questions of carelessness by consumers in viewing advertisements may be relevant to that question of characterisation.

[50] It has long been recognised that a contravention of s 52 of the TPA may occur, not only when a contract has been concluded under the influence of a misleading advertisement, but also at the point where members of the target audience have been enticed into "the marketing web" by an erroneous belief engendered by an advertiser, even if the consumer may come to appreciate the true position before a transaction is concluded. That those consumers who signed up for TPG's package of services could be expected to understand fully the nature of their obligations to TPG by the time they actually became its customers is no answer to the question whether the advertisements were misleading.

[51] Thirdly, this is not a case where the tendency of TPG's advertisements to lead consumers into error arose because the target audience might be disposed, independently of TPG's conduct, to attend closely to some words of the advertisement and ignore the balance. The tendency of TPG's advertisements to lead consumers into error arose because the advertisements themselves selected some words for emphasis and relegated the balance to relative obscurity. To acknowledge, as the Full Court did, that "many persons will only absorb the general thrust" is to recognise the effectiveness of the selective presentation of information by TPG. The Full Court erred in failing to appreciate the implication of that finding.

[52] It was common ground that when a court is concerned to ascertain the mental impression created by a number of representations conveyed by one communication, it is wrong to attempt to analyse the separate effect of each representation. But in this case, the advertisements were presented to accentuate the attractive aspect of TPG's invitation relative to the conditions which were less attractive to potential customers. That consumers might absorb only the general thrust or dominant message was not a consequence of selective attention or an unexpected want of sceptical vigilance on their part; rather, it was an unremarkable consequence of TPG's advertising strategy. In these circumstances, the primary judge was correct to attribute significance to the "dominant message" presented by TPG's advertisements.

The knowledge base of the target audience

[53] It may be accepted that if the hypothetical reasonable consumer is taken to know that ADSL2+ services may be sold as part of a bundle with telephony services, then, if he or she brings that knowledge to bear in a conscious scrutiny of the terms of TPG's offer, he or she might be less likely to form the impression that the offer was of an ADSL2+ service available without a requirement to take and pay for an additional service from TPG. But the circumstance that many consumers might know that ADSL2+ services are commonly offered as a "bundle" was not apt to defuse the tendency of the advertisements to mislead, especially where the target audience is left only with the general thrust or dominant message after the evanescence of the advertisement.

[54] As the primary judge said, the vice of TPG's advertisements was that they required "consumers to find their way through to the truth past advertising stratagems which have the effect of misleading or being likely to mislead them". Given TPG's strategy, the primary judge was entitled to draw the inference that consumers might be enticed to enter into negotiation with TPG without appreciating that TPG's services were, in fact, being offered only as a "bundle". It is pertinent to note again that "many persons will only absorb the general thrust" and that the question is not whether consumers suffered loss by signing up to a contract to accept and pay for TPG's service …

[55] It has long been recognised that, where a representation is made in terms apt to create a particular mental impression in the representee, and is intended to do so, it may properly be inferred that it has had that effect. Such an inference may be drawn more readily where the business of the representor is to make such representations and where the representor's business benefits from creating such an impression.

[56] To say this is not to say that TPG acted with an intention to mislead or deceive: such an intention is not an element of the contravention charged against TPG, and there was no suggestion of such an intention in the ACCC's case. There can be no dispute, however, that TPG did intend to create an impression favourable to its offer in the mind of potential consumers; and that it did intend to emphasise the most attractive component of its offer in order to do so.

[57] It cannot be denied that the terms of the message and the manner in which it was conveyed were such that the impression TPG intended to create was distinctly not that which would have been produced by an advertisement which gave equal prominence to all the elements of the package it was offering to the public. In this regard, it is significant that, as the primary judge noted, TPG considered deploying just such an advertisement and chose not to adopt it, evidently opting to continue with its headline strategy.

[58] It was not open to the Full Court, in the proper exercise of its appellate function, to hold that TPG's advertisements were not misleading.

GAGELER J:

[74] The question the Full Court was obliged to determine for itself fell to be addressed against the following background. DSL broadband internet services, which have been supplied widely in Australia since 2003, are delivered over copper wires of the kind used to deliver home telephone services. By the time TPG launched its advertising campaign in 2010, DSL broadband internet services had for some years been marketed widely, had often been marketed bundled with home telephone line rental, and commonly had a setup fee. Until recently, it had not been possible to acquire DSL broadband internet services without actually having a home telephone service.

[75] Against that background, the essential difference between the Full Court and the primary judge concerned the level of sophistication each attributed to the ordinary and reasonable consumer or potential consumer of broadband internet services during the period of TPG's advertising campaign in 2010 and 2011.

[76] The Full Court considered that an ordinary consumer of broadband internet services who was sufficiently aware of DSL broadband internet services potentially to be misled by those advertisements would also be aware that DSL broadband internet services were often bundled with home telephone line rental and commonly had a setup fee. The consumer would not form an impression, merely from a headline reference to "Unlimited ADSL2+ $29.99 per month", that what was being advertised was a stand-alone DSL service for a stand-alone price of $29.99 per month. The consumer would look to the whole of the advertisement in the first place. Looking to the whole of the advertisement, the consumer would form an impression as to whether the headlined DSL service was or was not being bundled with home telephone line rental and did or did not have a setup fee.

[77] The question, as the Full Court saw it, was therefore not whether the fine print of an advertisement was sufficient to dispel a "dominant message" conveyed by its headline. The question was whether the ordinary and reasonable consumer or potential consumer of broadband internet services, looking with an open mind to the whole of the advertisement, would be likely in fact to have formed an impression that what was being advertised was a stand-alone DSL broadband internet service for a stand-alone price of $29.99 per month.

[78] In my opinion, the Full Court made no error of principle in framing the ultimate question of fact that way and it was open to the Full Court to answer that question in the way it did: yes for the initial television advertisements; but no for the other advertisements. The Full Court did not, as the ACCC sought to advance, err in the exercise of its appellate function.

[79] … The Full Court concluded that the ordinary and reasonable consumer, aware that the headlined DSL service might or might not be bundled with home telephone line rental and might or might not have a setup fee, and looking to the whole of the advertisement, would not be likely to have been led by the headline reference to unlimited DSL broadband internet services into thinking that what was being advertised was less than the bundle comprising all three components …

[81] Telling also in favour of the Full Court's conclusion that the hypothetical ordinary and reasonable consumer would not be likely to have been misled (although obviously not determinative of that conclusion) was the dearth of evidence of any actual consumer being misled by any advertisement, even to the point of doing no more than contacting TPG to make an inquiry, despite TPG's advertisements having run nationally for a period of some 13 months.

[82] Nothing for present purposes can, in my opinion, be made of TPG's choice to adopt a headline strategy in the advertisements, and to maintain that strategy in the face of ACCC opposition. Some other background facts are here important. TPG's pricing of two components of the bundle was unremarkable: TPG's competitors routinely charged $29.95 per month as the basic monthly access fee for a standard telephone service and between $80 and $200 for setup. The range of charges for basic telephone services had by 2010 been static for several years. The supply of DSL services, on the other hand, was hotly contested, with suppliers differentiating their services based on speed, usage quotas, period and price. The TPG offering was significant as being one of the first to have unlimited downloads.

[83] Within that market context, TPG understandably focussed in its advertisements on the component of its bundle which differentiated its services from those of its competitors and which TPG considered would be most attractive to consumers: unlimited downloads for $29.99 per month. It does not follow that TPG thereby intended to, was likely to, or did, lead consumers into error as to the existence of the other components.

[84] Given my view on contravention, my conclusions on penalty can be stated quite briefly. In circumstances where the Full Court overturned findings of fact by the primary judge which impacted on the extent of TPG's contravening conduct, the Full Court was obliged to go on to determine the appropriate penalty for itself. That is what the Full Court did in its separate and subsequent judgment on penalty, delivered nearly ten months after the primary judge had ordered, amongst other things, injunctions and corrective advertising. The Full Court did not ignore the importance of deterrence. The Full Court treated the remaining contraventions as serious. The Full Court nevertheless took into account the impact on TPG of the decision of the primary judge, including being required to write to customers telling them it had engaged in misleading and deceptive conduct and being forced immediately to terminate its advertising campaign, which the Full Court itself found not to breach the Act. I can see no error of principle in the Full Court's reasoning and cannot regard the size of the penalty it imposed as manifestly inadequate.

[85] I would dismiss the appeal.

Butcher v Lachlan Elder Realty

[33.50] Butcher v Lachlan Elder Realty Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 60; (2004) 218 CLR 592 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The appellants were the successful bidders at an auction for the sale of a waterfront house and land (the "Rednal land") at Pittwater in Sydney which they planned to live in, redevelop and then on-sell. Following the auction they entered into a written contract to purchase the property for $1.36 million and paid a deposit to the vendor of $200,000. The respondent was a suburban real estate agent who acted for the vendors. Prior to the auction an employee of the respondent provided the appellants with a brochure which reproduced a survey diagram of the property and told them that the brochure contained "all of the details of the property". The boundary of the freehold property was the mean high-water mark. The diagram clearly indicated that a swimming pool on the property was above the mean high-water mark and therefore within the boundaries of the freehold property. The brochure consisted of a single, double-sided piece of paper printed with photographs and a description of the property. On both sides of the sheet were the words:

> All information contained herein is gathered from sources we deem to be reliable. However, we cannot guarantee it's [sic] accuracy and interested persons should rely on their own enquiries.

Before the auction one of the appellants, accompanied by an architectural designer, inspected the property with a representative of Lachlan Elder and discussed the possibility of moving the pool to create a larger entertaining area. After entering into the contract the appellants discovered that the swimming pool in fact extended beyond the mean high-water mark onto reclaimed land and was therefore not entirely within the boundary of the freehold property. This made it impossible to move the pool as planned. The appellants refused to complete the contract. The vendor treated the deposit as forfeited. The appellant sought damages against the respondent for misleading or deceptive conduct. The trial judge held that the respondent had not engaged in misleading conduct because it had simply passed the information on and had disclaimed any representation about the accuracy of the diagram. The Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from the appellants. The appellants appealed to the High Court.]

GLEESON CJ, HAYNE AND HEYDON JJ:

[604] The relevant class addressed. Questions of allegedly misleading conduct, including questions as to what the conduct was, can be analysed from two points of view. One is employed in relation to "members of a class to which the conduct in question [is] directed in a general sense" (Campomar Sociedad Limitada v Nike International Ltd (2000) 202 CLR 45 at 85), [103] per Gleeson CJ, Gaudron, McHugh, Gummow, Kirby, Hayne and Callinan JJ). The other, urged by the purchasers here, is employed where the objects of the conduct are "identified individuals to whom a particular misrepresentation has been made or from whom a relevant fact, circumstance or proposal was withheld"; they are considered quite apart from any class into which they fall (Campomar Sociedad Limitada v Nike International Ltd (2000) 202 CLR 45 at 85, [102] – [103]). Adoption of the former point of view requires isolation by some criterion or criteria of a representative member of the class. To some extent the trial judge adopted the former approach, pointing out that the class – potential home buyers for Pittwater properties in a price range exceeding $1 million – was small (as suggested by the fact that only 100 brochures were printed), and its members could be expected to have access to legal advice.

The former approach is common when remedies other than those conferred by s 82 (or s 87) of the Act are under consideration. But the former approach is inappropriate, and the latter is inevitable, in cases like the present, where monetary relief is sought by a plaintiff who alleges that a particular misrepresentation was made to identified persons, of whom the plaintiff was one. The plaintiff must establish a causal link between the impugned conduct and the loss that is claimed. That depends on analysing the conduct of the defendant in relation to that plaintiff alone. So here, it is necessary to consider the character of the particular conduct of the particular agent in relation to the particular purchasers, bearing in mind what matters of fact each knew about the other as a result of the nature of their dealings and the conversations between them, or which each may be taken to have [605] known. Indeed, counsel for the purchasers conceded that the mere fact that a person had engaged in the conduct of supplying a document containing misleading information did not mean that that person had engaged in misleading conduct: it was crucial to examine the role of the person in question.

[33.55] The relevant principles. In Yorke v Lucas (1985) 158 CLR 661 at 666, Mason A-CJ, Wilson, Deane and Dawson JJ said that a corporation could contravene s 52 even though it acted honestly and reasonably:

> That does not, however, mean that a corporation which purports to do no more than pass on information supplied by another must nevertheless be engaging in misleading or deceptive conduct if the information turns out to be false. If the circumstances are such as to make it apparent that the corporation is not the source of the information and that it expressly or impliedly disclaims any belief in its truth or falsity, merely passing it on for what it is worth, we very much doubt that the corporation can properly be said to be itself engaging in conduct that is misleading or deceptive.

In applying those principles, it is important that the agent's conduct be viewed as a whole. It is not right to characterise the problem as one of analysing the effect of its "conduct" divorced from "disclaimers" about that "conduct" and divorced from other circumstances which might qualify its character. Everything relevant the agent did up to the time when the purchasers contracted to buy the Rednal land must be taken into account. It is also important to remember that the relevant question must not be reduced to a crude inquiry: "Did the agent realise the purchasers were relying on the diagram?" To do that would be impermissibly to dilute the strict liability which s 52 imposes.

For the following reasons, the agent did not engage in conduct towards the purchasers which was misleading. Whatever representation the vendor made to the purchasers by authorising the agent to issue the brochure, it was not made by the agent to the purchasers. The agent did no more than communicate what the vendor was representing, without adopting it or endorsing it. That conclusion flows from the nature of the parties, the character of the transaction contemplated, and the contents of the brochure itself.

[33.60] The nature of the parties. The parties were, on the one side, a company director and his de facto wife. They engaged in a carpet cleaning business conducted from their home. They were proposing to [606] engage in an investment for family purposes. The search for and making of that investment was the result of a three to five year plan designed to achieve long-term financial security, to educate their four children, and to provide for the wellbeing of the family. The plan involved making strategic investments in properties and shares. It involved the sale of an apparently valuable motor yacht. The purchasers were contemplating the expenditure of over $1 million to be funded by the sale of another piece of valuable land for over $1 million – land which, according to the agent, had had "absolutely magnificent" renovations effected and for which the purchasers hoped to get at least $1.2-1.3 million. The purchasers were persons who were quite wealthy, and certainly aspired to become wealthier, by means of complex property and financial dealings. The transcript of their oral evidence reveals each of the purchasers to have been intelligent, shrewd and self-reliant. No doubt they appeared that way to the officers of the agent.

On the other side, the relevant party was a suburban real estate agent – a corporation, a franchisee of L J Hooker, but still a suburban real estate agent, which took the name of the man who was its principal. Its office was Shop 2, 19 Bungan Street, Mona Vale. Nothing in the evidence suggests that it had more than a very small staff, or that the purchasers believed that it had more than a very small staff. The representation alleged was a representation about title. It is a matter of common experience that the skill of suburban real estate agents lies in making contracts on behalf of sellers with buyers, in locating persons who wish to sell real property and interesting in that real property persons who might wish to buy it, and in advising the former what prices are obtainable and the latter what prices might have to be paid. Suburban real estate agents do not hold themselves out – and this agent did not hold itself out – as possessing research skills or means of independently verifying title details about the properties they seek to sell. It is also a matter of common experience – and it was certainly the fact here – that real estate agents, while they carry out tasks on behalf of their principals, are not agents in the sense of creating legal relationships between their principals and others. Here, the agent was obviously an agent for the vendor, but only in a limited sense. The legal relationship to be created by any contract of purchase was to be created by the purchasers directly – by bidding at the auction and then signing a contract.

It is a matter of common experience that questions of title to land can be complex, both legally and factually. Hence they have to be dealt with by specialists. So far as the complexity is factual, the specialists are surveyors. So far as the complexity is legal, the specialists are solicitors or conveyancers, relying on specialists like surveyors. The skills of these specialists, and the problems on which those skills are brought to bear, are quite outside what suburban real estate agents hold themselves out as doing and are likely to be able to do.

[607] While Mr Butcher said he regarded the agent as an expert in appraising property values, the appeal papers do not record any evidence from the purchasers that they regarded the agent as an expert in surveying or in land title.

The character of the transaction. The transaction was the purchase of very expensive property, to be used as an investment – a means of gaining future profits. … The purchasers bought it despite the fact that, as they told the agent, they saw it as needing "a huge amount of" building work in the form of "major corrective renovations". They intended to carry on their carpet cleaning business from the premises. … The changes would also be expensive, for, as Mr Elder told the purchasers, "it would cost a fortune". The purchasers engaged appropriate professional advisers to assist them – Mr Gordon, an accountant; Mr Gillmer, an architectural designer and building consultant; and Mr Hindmarch, a licensed builder. They also engaged solicitors to assist with the actual process of making and completing the contract. …

The contents of the brochure. As counsel for the purchasers acknowledged, the diagram on the back of the brochure was a survey diagram and "looks like" a copy of an original prepared by a professional surveyor. Mr Butcher appreciated that it was a survey diagram. Mr Hindmarch recognised it as "a survey" or a "survey document", and rejected any suggestion that it was merely a sketch. The trial judge found that potential purchasers would be likely to assume that the diagram had been taken from an identification survey report. Not only was it plain that the diagram had not been made by the agent, the circumstances also negated any suggestion that the agent had adopted the surveyor's diagram as its own, or that it had verified its accuracy.

The losses allegedly suffered by the purchasers arose from their entry into the contract to buy the Rednal land on 18 February 1997. [608] Before they entered it, their solicitor had received a copy of the contract, and they themselves entered the contract by signing it. If they had not previously realised that the diagram in the brochure was from a survey not conducted by or on the instructions of the agent, they must have realised it then, because the contract annexed Mr Hannagan's survey report dated 4 August 1980, containing the survey diagram bearing that date.

[33.65] It is now necessary to consider the two disclaimers … the first at least establishes that [the agent] was trying not to make any representations about the accuracy of the information conveyed, save that it believed the sources of it to be reliable. If the disclaimers are examined from the point of view of a careful reader, they communicate the same message. In fact, Mr Butcher said that he did not notice either disclaimer when he received the brochure on or about 6 February 1997. Though he apparently studied the brochure, including the diagram, with sufficient care to pass on his impressions of it to Mr Gillmer and Mr Hindmarch, the evidence in the appeal papers does not suggest that he ever noticed them. There is no evidence in the appeal papers that Ms Radford noticed the disclaimers either. Yet, though the disclaimers were in small type, the brochure was a short document, there was very little written on it, and the disclaimers were there to be read. Only persons of very poor eyesight would find them illegible, and there is no evidence that the eyesight of Mr Butcher or Ms Radford was in any way defective.

The Court of Appeal declined to "accord [the disclaimers] decisive significance" (Harkins v Butcher (2002) 55 NSWLR 558 at 568), but they do have some significance. If the "conduct" of the agent is what a reasonable person in the position of the purchasers, taking into account what they knew, would make of the agent's behaviour, reasonable purchasers would have read the whole document, given its importance, its brevity, and their use of it as the source of instructions to professional advisers. There are circumstances in which the "conduct" of an agent would depend on different tests. For example, those tests might turn on what purchasers actually made of the agent's behaviour, whether they were acting reasonably or not, and they might also call for consideration of how the agent perceived the purchasers. Tests of that latter kind might be appropriate for plaintiffs of limited experience acting without professional advice in rushed circumstances. They are not appropriate in the present [609] circumstances. Hence, in the circumstances, the brochure, read as a whole, simply meant:

> The diagram records what a particular surveyor found on a survey in 1980. We are not surveyors. We did not do the survey. We did not engage any surveyor to do the survey. We believe the vendor and the surveyor are reliable, but we cannot guarantee the accuracy of the information they have provided. Whatever you rely on, you must rely on your own enquiries.

Hence it would have been plain to a reasonable purchaser that the agent was not the source of the information which was said to be misleading. The agent did not purport to do anything more than pass on information supplied by another or others. It both expressly and implicitly disclaimed any belief in the truth or falsity of that information. It did no more than state a belief in the reliability of the sources …

[610] Authorities analysed by the purchasers. Counsel for the purchasers submitted that the Federal Court had repeatedly held "that disclaimers of this nature are not likely to overturn the effect of otherwise misleading and deceptive conduct". However, the Federal Court authorities do not say that disclaimers cannot make clear who is and [611] who is not the author of misleading or deceptive conduct. While acknowledging that each case depended on its own facts, the purchasers relied on various authorities as supporting their argument.

In John G Glass Real Estate Pty Ltd v Karawi Constructions Pty Ltd (1993) ATPR ¶41-249, a real estate agent (John G Glass) placed a typed document emanating from the principal of a firm of consultants acting for the vendor with other materials in a folder with a glossy cover. The typed document showed that the net lettable area of a building being offered for sale was 180 m^2. In fact, the net lettable area was 137.4 m^2. John G Glass contended that the only representation it had made was that it had obtained the information in the brochure from the vendor; that it had not endorsed or approved the information in the brochure; and that it was no more than a conduit. These contentions relied on the following statement in the brochure on a page immediately before the back cover:

> The information contained herein has been prepared with care by our Company or it has been supplied to us by apparently reliable sources. In either case we have no reason to doubt its completeness or accuracy.
>
> However, neither John G Glass Real Estate Pty Ltd, its employees or its clients guarantee the information nor does it, or is it intended, to form part of any contract. Accordingly, all interested parties should make their own enquiries to verify the information as well as any additional or supporting information supplied and it is the responsibility of interested parties to satisfy themselves in all respects.

The Full Federal Court (Davies, Heerey and Whitlam JJ) upheld the trial judge's rejection of these contentions. Counsel for the purchasers here contended that if John G Glass there failed, with its "more ample disclaimer", going "much further than the suggested disclaimer here", the agent must fail in the present case. The case is distinguishable on two grounds.

The first ground of distinction is that in the brochure John G Glass held itself out as "consultants to institutional investors and to developers of major properties", and the Full Federal Court held that such an agent "would not be regarded by potential purchasers of properties as merely passing on information about the property 'for what it is worth and without any belief in its truth or falsity' " (at 41-359).

The second ground of distinction is that the Full Federal Court said that the net lettable area figure was "one of hard physical fact", and an essential matter in determining the profitability and value of the [612] building (at 41,359). The issue of whether there was a precise correspondence between the Pittwater boundary of the Rednal land and the "MHWM" line on the surveyor's diagram here, however, is not a matter of hard physical fact. What is more, there was nothing to indicate that the net lettable area figure had not been calculated by John G Glass itself: indeed, the part of the disclaimer which stated that some of the information had been "prepared with care by" John G Glass suggested that it had, since it is the type of information an estate agent might be capable of working out for itself. It is quite different from the survey diagram, which had obviously not been prepared by the agent here. Hence Handley JA's [the trial judge] succinct explanation of why the case was distinguishable is correct (Harkins v Butcher (2002) 55 NSWLR 558 at 570):

> In that case the agents claimed relevant expertise, adopted the figures as their own, and put them forward without any reference to their source. In the present case the agents claimed no relevant expertise, and the diagram itself indicated that it was the work of a professional surveyor.

Not only is the case distinguishable, but its reasoning in one respect is questionable. The Full Federal Court said (at 41,359):

> There was certainly no express disclaimer of the [estate agent's] belief in the truth of the information in the brochure — indeed there was an express assertion of such belief.

It does not seem quite correct to describe an estate agent which says it has no reason to doubt the accuracy of information but says it does not guarantee it, advises interested parties to make their own inquiries, and says interested parties have the responsibility of satisfying themselves in all respects, as making an "express assertion" of belief in the information.

Finally, contrary to what the purchasers submitted, while the disclaimer in John G Glass Real Estate Pty Ltd v Karawi Constructions Pty Ltd was longer, it was not "more ample", and did not go "much further", than the present disclaimers. It did not go as far, because its opening words, unlike any words in this brochure, acknowledged that the estate agent had prepared some of the information.

The purchasers next relied on Waltip Pty Ltd v Capalaba Park Shopping Centre Pty Ltd (1989) ATPR ¶40-975. In that case, Pincus J held that clauses in a deed of acknowledgment providing that no pre-contractual statements had been relied on before the parties entered a lease were of no [613] effect if the facts were to the contrary. Cases of that type concern a problem which is entirely different from the present problem, and cast no light on its solution.

The third case relied on was Benlist Pty Ltd v Olivetti Australia Pty Ltd (1990) ATPR ¶41-043. An estate agent issued a brochure promoting the sale of a substantial city building. The brochure said it was suitable for strata title subdivision. In fact, two encroachments presented obstacles to strata subdivision: one encroachment by a neighbouring building on the land the subject of the sale; and another encroachment by the building being sold onto the neighbouring land. The brochure contained the following clause:

> Chesterton International (NSW) Pty Limited for themselves and the vendors of this property whose Agent they are, give notice: (i) The particulars are set out as a general outline only for guidance of intending purchasers and do not constitute an offer or contract; (ii) All descriptions, dimensions, reference to conditions and necessary permissions for use and occupation and other details are given in good faith and are believed to be correct, but any intending purchasers should not rely on them as statements or representations of fact and must satisfy themselves by inspection or otherwise as to the correctness of each of them; (iii) No person in the employ of [Chesterton] has any authority to make or give a presentation or warrant whatsoever in relation to this property.

A question arose about whether that clause prevented a conclusion that the purchaser relied on the representation about strata title subdivision. Burchett J held that it did not. The purchasers in the present appeal relied on the following passage (Benlist Pty Ltd v Olivetti Australia Pty Ltd (1990) ATPR ¶41-043 at 51,590):

> It has been held on many occasions that the perpetrator of misleading conduct cannot, by resorting to such a clause, evade the operation of [the Act]. Of course, if the clause actually has the effect [of] erasing whatever is misleading in the conduct, the clause will be effective, not by any independent force of its own, but by actually modifying the conduct. However, I should think it would only be in rare cases that a formal disclaimer would have that effect.

Clause (i) of the disclaimer did not purport to modify the conduct. Nor did cl (iii), since, as Burchett J held, it merely prevented employees from binding the vendor by conduct outside the brochure. Burchett J dealt with cl (ii) as a matter of fact (Benlist Pty Ltd v Olivetti Australia Pty Ltd (1990) ATPR ¶41-043 at 51,590):

> In the present case, the suggestion of the suitability of the [614] building for strata title conversion might continue to influence the mind of a prospective purchaser notwithstanding his awareness of the existence of a disclaimer clause, which did not single out the particular representation, but purported to apply generally to every detail stated in the investment report. If it were permissible to avoid the operation of [the Act] by such a clause, it would be all too easy to make representations in the confidence that they would be acted upon, and then withdraw them in the confidence (equally important for the securing of the desired business) that the withdrawal would not be acted upon.

The conclusions that Burchett J reached as a matter of fact in that case – the implicit conclusion that the clause had not modified the conduct, and the explicit conclusion that despite being told to make its own inquiries the purchaser relied on the representation about strata title conversion – were no doubt open to him, but different conclusions are open in other cases. …

… [615] The purchasers submitted that the Court of Appeal in this case had failed to understand … that the misleading quality of the conduct of the agent in this case arose not only from the inclusion of the survey diagram, but from its juxtaposition with the photographs on the front of the brochure. The distinction relied on by the purchasers has a formal character, and will not always be satisfactory. Its soundness in particular contexts must depend on the circumstances of those contexts. There could be cases where the presentation by an agent of a principal's document to a plaintiff does involve the agent in making a representation about the objective truth of the document's contents; and there could be cases where the incorporation of a principal's document into another document prepared by an agent will not involve the agent in making a representation about any matter of objective truth, whether the principal's document is considered by itself or in con junction with [616] other material in the agent's document. For the reasons given above, the present circumstances fall within the latter category.

[33.70] Appropriate level of analysis. Finally, it is necessary to deal with a submission made by the purchasers that it was wrong to analyse the structure and language of the brochure too minutely. It is true that the level of analysis which is appropriate might vary from case to case. A more impressionistic analysis, concentrating on the immediate impact of the conduct, might be sounder where the document was only briefly looked at before a decision was made. In other cases a more detailed examination may be more appropriate. Here, the purchasers had the brochure for twelve days before the auction. They relied on it in instructing professional advisers, and they were embarking on a very serious venture. It is not inappropriate to look closely at the contents of the brochure before deciding whether the agent had made a representation.

[33.75] MCHUGH J (dissenting): [616] This case is concerned with the application of a statutory text, expressed in general terms, to particular facts. It falls within a class of case that rarely warrants the grant of special leave to appeal to this Court. But behind the ultimate issue in the case are other issues that affect every person who is induced to buy real estate in Australia by statements in sales brochures distributed by real estate agents. One of those issues is the extent to which estate agents engage in misleading or deceptive conduct when they distribute sales brochures that contain untrue or misleading statements prepared by others. Another issue is the extent to which agents can escape liability by relying on disclaimers about the authenticity of false statements contained in brochures prepared by them. …

[617] The ultimate issue in the appeal is whether, by distributing the brochure, the conduct of Lachlan Elder amounted to misleading or deceptive conduct or conduct that was likely to mislead or deceive in contravention of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) (the Act). In my opinion, it did. …

[625] The question whether conduct is misleading or deceptive or is likely to mislead or deceive is a question of fact. In determining whether a contravention of s 52 has occurred, the task of the court is to examine the relevant course of conduct as a whole. It is determined by reference to the alleged conduct in the light of the relevant surrounding facts and circumstances. It is an objective question the court must determine for itself (see Equity Access Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation [1990] ATPR ¶40-994 at 50, 950 per Hill J). It invites error to look at isolated parts of the corporation's conduct. The effect of any relevant statements or actions or any silence must be deduced from the whole course of conduct (see eg Trade Practices Commission v Lamova Publishing Corporation Pty Ltd (1979) 42 FLR 60 at 65-66 per Lockhart J). Thus, where the alleged contravention of s 52 relates primarily to a document, the effect of the document must be examined in the context of the evidence as a whole (See eg Lezam Pty Ltd v Seabridge Australia Pty Ltd (1992) 35 FCR 535 at 451 per Sheppard J, Hill J agreeing) …

[627] The decided cases … show that, by publishing erroneous information received from others, a corporation may engage in conduct that is or is likely to be misleading or deceptive. In determining whether a contravention of s 52 has occurred, two factors are important: (1) whether the corporation assumed responsibility for or adopted (or endorsed or used its name in association with) the information so that it would be reasonable for a recipient to rely on the information; and (2) whether the corporation disclaimed any belief in the truth or falsity of the information or disclaimed any personal responsibility for what it conveyed …

[629] However, the courts have held that in three situations a corporation does not contravene s 52 when it passes on erroneous information. They are: (1) where the circumstances make it apparent that the corporation is not the source of the information and that it expressly or impliedly disclaims any belief in its truth or falsity and is merely passing on the information for what it is worth (see Yorke (1985) 158 CLR 661 at 666); (2) where the corporation, while believing the information, expressly or impliedly [630] disclaims personal responsibility for what it conveys, for example, by disclaiming personal knowledge (Saints Gallery Pty Ltd v Plummer (1988) 80 ALR 525 at 530-531); and (3) where the corporation, while believing the information, ensures that its name is not used in association with the information (Amadio Pty Ltd v Henderson (1988) 81 FCR 149 at 257). …

Lachlan Elder engaged in conduct that was misleading

[631] In my opinion, the Court of Appeal erred in finding that the conduct of Lachlan Elder was not misleading or deceptive. In the courts below, the case turned on the nature of the "representation". However, the issue is whether the conduct of Lachlan Elder was misleading or deceptive or was likely to mislead or deceive, having regard to all the circumstances of the case. They included but were not limited to the [632] representations Lachlan Elder made, its actions (and inaction or silence) and the impression conveyed by its conduct. The phrase that best describes the relevant conduct of Lachlan Elder is "selling the Rednal Street property". In determining whether a breach of s 52 occurred, all that Lachlan Elder did in relation to the sale is relevant. Hence, the presence of and participation in the inspections of Lachlan Elder's staff, their knowledge of the purpose of the inspections and the conversations at those inspections as well as the distribution and content of the brochure must be considered. To focus on whether a representation was made and the content of the representation diverts attention from the substantive issue, that is, whether in all the circumstances Lachlan Elder engaged in misleading or deceptive conduct or conduct that was likely to mislead or deceive.

Accordingly, it is necessary to consider the whole conduct of Lachlan Elder in order to ascertain whether such conduct was misleading or deceptive or was likely to mislead or deceive persons in the class identified as reasonable potential purchasers of waterfront properties in the price range of over $1 million. Potential purchasers of such a property would have access to legal advice and would retain a solicitor who would advise them about matters such as the boundary of the property. No doubt, potential purchasers within the identified class would also have been aware that it was not part of a selling agent's functions to obtain a survey plan or to verify such a plan.

As I have shown, an extensive body of case law has developed concerning the circumstances in which corporations will be found to have engaged in conduct that is misleading or deceptive or is likely to mislead or deceive by passing on information supplied by a third party. This case falls within the category of a corporation not being the source of the information and believing in its accuracy but not expressly or impliedly disclaiming personal responsibility for what it conveys.

That Lachlan Elder incorporated the survey diagram in a brochure prepared for marketing purposes is a matter of great importance. The irresistible conclusion is that Lachlan Elder did so because it would influence potential purchasers to purchase the property. The importance that Lachlan Elder gave to the survey diagram is emphasised by its place in the brochure: the top right hand side of the second page.

Lachlan Elder contends that potential purchasers would have known and understood that the survey diagram was a reproduction of a survey report. That is clearly so: the diagram was a reproduction of a survey identification report and bore the date "4.8.80". Moreover, the brochure indicated that Lachlan Elder was not the source of all the information contained in it. The foot of the first page contained a disclaimer in the following terms:

> Lachlan Elder Realty Pty Ltd ACN 002 332 247. All information contained herein is gathered from sources we believe to be reliable. [633] However we cannot guarantee it's [sic] accuracy and interested persons should rely on their own enquiries.

However, the reproduction of the diagram in the brochure does not identify the author of the survey diagram, an omission that suggests that Lachlan Elder had adopted the diagram as its own. …

[634] What occurred at the subsequent inspection on 14 February 1997 is of cardinal importance in evaluating the conduct of Lachlan Elder. Mr Elder was present at a conversation that showed that the purchasers were intending to move the pool and were relying on the accuracy of the survey diagram to do so. On that occasion, Mr Gillmer, the architectural designer retained by the purchasers, advised Mr Butcher that the idea of "moving" the pool was feasible, based on the position of the high water mark indicated by Mr Butcher, in reliance on the diagram in the brochure (Butcher [2001] NSWSC 15 at 26 per Austin J). Mr Elder was sceptical about the proposal because he thought the plan would be expensive and that the pool would encroach on the mean high water mark. But everything he said was premised on the pool being within the boundary of the freehold land. In addition, Lachlan Elder was aware that Mr Butcher had attended the open for inspection of the Rednal Street property on 15 February 1997 with a builder and had taken advice from him.

The conduct of Mr Elder at the inspection on 14 February 1997 and the conduct of Lachlan Elder in distributing the brochure were significant factors in inducing the purchasers to buy the property. Lachlan Elder not only distributed a brochure containing an inaccurate survey diagram but at the inspection it did nothing to correct the misapprehension under which the purchasers laboured. …

[636] Lachlan Elder did not hold itself out as a professional surveyor or conveyancer or as having particular surveying or conveyancing expertise. However, it did hold itself out as a specialist for the sale of prestige properties in the Pittwater area and was in fact an experienced selling agent of properties in that area. In these circumstances potential purchasers of such properties would be unlikely to regard the agent as merely passing on information about the Rednal Street property, including the location of the swimming pool, "for what it is worth and without any belief in its truth or falsity". It is reasonable to expect potential purchasers, even potential purchasers advised by solicitors, to rely on the accuracy of a survey diagram reproduced in a promotional brochure for the sale of a property. …

[638] As I have indicated, the intent of the corporation is not relevant for the purposes of s 52. As a result, a disclaimer as to the truth or otherwise of a representation does not, of itself, absolve the corporation from liability.

This is not to say that a disclaimer should be ignored for the purposes of assessing whether a contravention of s 52 has occurred. As Miller notes in Miller's Annotated Trade Practices Act (25th ed, 2004 p 475), the [639] conduct must be considered as a whole. This requires consideration of whether the conduct in question, including any representations and the disclaimer, is misleading or deceptive or is likely to mislead or deceive. If a disclaimer clause has the effect of erasing whatever is misleading in the conduct, the clause will be effective, not by any independent force of its own, but by actually modifying the conduct. However, a formal disclaimer would have this effect only in rare cases. [His Honour then referred to Benlist Pty Ltd v Olivetti Australia Pty Ltd [1990] ATPR ¶41-043 at 51-590 – see above] …

[640] Handley JA did not accord the disclaimers (that appeared "in fine print at the foot of the front and back pages") "decisive significance" on the question of Lachlan Elder's liability under s 52 (Harkins (2002 55 NSWLR 558 at 568-569). Nevertheless, his Honour regarded the disclaimers as "relevant as showing that the agents did not accept responsibility for the accuracy of the information in the brochure" (Harkins (2002 55 NSWLR 558 at 569).

This finding of Handley JA, however, is inconsistent with the accepted line of Federal Court authority that a disclaimer is only effective if it actually modifies the impugned conduct such that the conduct as a whole may be seen as not misleading, not because the disclaimer has any independent force of its own. It is also inconsistent with the finding of the Full Federal Court in John G Glass Real Estate. A disclaimer in a promotional brochure may purport to represent that the corporation does not accept responsibility for the accuracy of the information in that brochure, but it will only be effective if it operates to modify the corporation's conduct.

The case law suggests that disclaimers that appear in small print at the foot of marketing brochures are rarely effective to prevent conduct from being found to be misleading or deceptive or likely to mislead or deceive. If misleading conduct has induced a contract, that fact cannot be negated by the mere circumstance that there is a statement to the contrary (see, eg, Bowler v Hilda Pty Ltd (1998) 80 FCR 191 at 207 per Heerey J; Burg Design Pty Ltd v Wolki (1999) 162 ALR 639 at 648-650, per Burchett J). …

[641] The disclaimer in the present case stated that Lachlan Elder "cannot guarantee [the information's] accuracy and interested persons should rely on their own enquiries". But that disclaimer does not allow Lachlan Elder to disclaim personal responsibility for the information conveyed by the inclusion of the survey diagram. In all the circumstances of the case – the prominent display of the survey diagram in the brochure, the conduct and statements of Mr Spring when he distributed the brochure to the purchasers, the subsequent conduct and statements of Messrs Spring and Elder, and the unavailability of the contract of sale until just before the auction – the disclaimer did not operate to obliterate the effect of Lachlan Elder's misleading or deceptive conduct. Moreover, as Burchett J acknowledged in Lezam (1992) 35 FCR 535 at 557, once misleading or deceptive conduct is shown, the Act prevails over the disclaimer. It would be contrary to the consumer protection objects of the statute and to public policy for disclaimers to deny a statutory remedy for offending conduct under the Act (Henjo Investments (1988) 39 FCR 546 at 561 per Lockhart J, Burchett and Foster JJ concurring; Lezam (1992) 35 FCR 535 at 557 per Burchett J). …

In my opinion, the appeal must be allowed.

[33.80] KIRBY J (dissenting):

A corporation engages in "conduct that is misleading"

[642] The simple facts of this case cannot escape certain fundamental realities. The respondent prepared, and an employee of the respondent on its behalf gave to the appellants, a one-sheet promotional pamphlet depicting (amongst other things) the boundary of the valuable waterfront property that the respondent was commissioned by Mr Harkins to sell. The respondent was acting for reward. The effective boundary so shown was designated by the initials "MHWM" (mean high-water mark). As portrayed in the pamphlet, the "MHWM" line (the boundary line) was well clear of a swimming pool erected in front of a house built on the subject land. It lay between the house and a deep waterfrontage with the Pittwater, an [643] inland waterway north of Sydney. In the courts below it was held that, contrary to the pamphlet, the boundary line actually ran through the swimming pool.

The appellants had made known to the respondent the fact that the location of the boundary line was important to them because of plans they had to relocate the swimming pool, so as to afford a larger open area in the front of the house for entertainment purposes. The appellants wished to use the property as their residence; but also in connection with a business in which they were engaged. But for the misdescription of the location of the boundary line of the property, the appellants would not have bid for the land at auction. Nor would they have agreed to execute a contract as they did. They wanted to buy a residence, not a "bundle of trouble". Under that contract, a substantial deposit of $200,000 was released to Mr Harkins (Butcher [2001] NSWSC 15 at [67]). In consequence of that fact and other proved circumstances, the appellants suffered loss and damage because of the respondent's misdescription of the property. That loss and damage flowed from the "conduct" of the respondent, a corporation, in the course of its business in preparing and distributing the pamphlet. It was conduct that was "misleading or deceptive or … likely to mislead or deceive". …

[644] An essential difference of approach: At the heart of the difference between my reasons and those of the majority lies a different conception of the intended operation of the provisions of the Act invoked in this case. If, in a transaction such as was entered into between the parties, liability under the Act may be escaped in circumstances such as these (and particularly by reliance on a printed disclaimer of the kind involved in this case) this Court might just as well fold up the Act and put it away so far as dealings between real estate agents and purchasers are concerned. By similar printed disclaimers, such agents and others like them will walk straight out of the operation of the Act in many and varied circumstances.

Neither the printed disclaimers nor the other circumstances the agent relies upon, permits it to avoid the Act. Adopting such a view of the Act would not only be contrary to its proclaimed objectives. It would also be destructive of the beneficial operation of the Act in requiring corporations, engaged in trade and commerce in Australia, to desist from conduct that is misleading or deceptive or likely to mislead or deceive.

The large purposes of the Act: The Act is intended, relevantly, to afford recovery to persons who suffer loss or damage by conduct in contravention of Pt V. Yet, in some ways more important, s 52(1) of the Act is addressed to the impugned conduct of corporations engaged in trade or commerce. That subsection sets standards for corporate behaviour, care and responsibility. Disclaimers there can be. But, if they are to be effective, the language of the Act, legal authority and legal principle suggest that they must be made much more clearly than those invoked here were.

Tiny printed disclaimers and inferences to be implied from the facts would not ordinarily have the effect of exempting a corporation from the regime established by the Act. The interpretation now adopted reduces the Act to a paltry thing of little real protection for the [645] multitude of persons whom the Parliament intended to protect. It is inappropriate for this Court to send a signal to the industry of corporate real estate agents, and other industries, that they can avoid the requirements of the Act by the simple expedient of publishing disclaimers illegible to many eyes and easily overlooked. It is no answer to the operation of the Act that those who suffer damage by "conduct that is misleading" can be expected to get their own solicitors and surveyors to advise them. In many cases, they can. But the Act takes effect first and independently of that entitlement. It imposes duties and liabilities. In this case, those duties and liabilities applied to the agent and were contravened. …

[646] The supposed contextual exemptions: So what are the reasons relied on by the agent to escape what seems to be a fairly clear case of a corporation engaging in "misleading" conduct? Various arguments have found favour with the majority. They do not convince me.

First, it is suggested that the agent did no more than to convey representations to the purchasers concerning the Rednal land that were being made by the vendor. I cannot accept this interpretation of the facts. It would impermissibly erode the operation of the Act which, by its terms, applies to corporations for their own conduct. The agent chose to convey the representations that it did. For that conduct, it must accept accountability measured against the requirements of the Act. …

[647] This was not a case where the agent was merely passing on information supplied by another within the words used by this Court in Yorke v Lucas ((1985) 158 CLR 661 at 666). Nor was it a case where the agent was simply passing on the information "for what it is worth". … The agent did not have to include in its pamphlet the diagram showing the boundary line designated by the mean high-water mark. Having done so, it was obliged to accept the legal consequences. Clearly, its conduct occurred in the performance of its professional activity as a corporate real estate agent. Moreover, it acted as it did for its own economic advantage. It stood to gain the agent's fee for the sale of the property. The more attractive it could make the property seem, the more likely was it to succeed in effecting a sale. …

[648] The only available inference therefore is that Mr Elder, for the agent, affirmed the correctness of the survey diagram by his response to Mr Butcher's plans to reposition the swimming pool (see Butcher [2001] NSWSC 15 at [16]-[17], [22], [26]). Certainly, he said nothing to indicate any doubts concerning the description in the diagram of the position of the mean high-water mark and the boundary that it apparently signified …

Secondly, I cannot agree that personal characteristics of the parties (joint reasons at 605-606) in some way exempted the agent from the obligations imposed by the Act to avoid "misleading" conduct in its pamphlet. For example, the facts that Mr Butcher had at one stage enjoyed a high profile as a former professional football player, was a successful businessman, had decided with Ms Radford to engage in a venture of prudent investment in real estate or was intelligent, shrewd and self-reliant are all ultimately irrelevant considerations. It may be true that the Act is vigilant to protect the weak, the impressionable and the vulnerable. But there is nothing in its language, or purpose, to exclude from its protection, in a proper case, domestic partners who rely on the printed material of a real estate agent when proceeding to purchase a significant parcel of land.

Throughout Australia it is not at all uncommon for individuals and couples to endeavour to improve their economic position by acquiring, and ultimately reselling, valuable parcels of real property. To exclude from the protections of the Act those who do so, because they are investors or shrewd and so forth is as irrelevant to the language and purpose of the Act as to exclude them because they were once professional footballers. The Act is a law of general application. It focuses on the conduct of corporations. None of the personal considerations nominated in this case, to exclude the purchasers from the Act's protection, is in the slightest convincing. …

The written disclaimers are ineffective

[651] The disclaimers' tiny typeface: As a matter of evaluation of the facts, it is misleading to read the disclaimers as if they appeared with equal prominence along with other details, as might be inferred from the reproduction of their text in judicial reasons. A number of larger typefaces are used in the document. The disclaimers, however, appear in a typeface that can only be described as tiny. That on the rear of the pamphlet is even smaller than that on its face. The only print appearing in the document that is smaller comprises some of the handwritten details of the surveyor's diagram, inferentially photo-reduced and reproduced on the reverse of the pamphlet.

A youth with 20/20 vision could possibly read the disclaimers without undue difficulty. But I doubt that any ordinary adult could do so without some form of magnification. I reproduce in these reasons both the disclaimers in the typeface in which they each appear in the agent's pamphlet and, for purposes of comparison, the typefaces appearing immediately next to them on the pamphlet page …

[653] Viewing disclaimers in context: Disclaimers of such a kind must be considered as they appear in a pamphlet designed to communicate information to the recipient. The cover comprises a large and arresting photograph of property with inserted smaller photographs, also attractive. The print size of most of the text is large and clear to read, must of it without the need for magnification. The diagram on the reverse is also clear enough. At least, this is so as it shows the boundary line, the subject of the present dispute.

In such a context, the typeface used for the printed disclaimers suggests (and I think was intended to suggest) that the ordinary person reading the pamphlet did not need to bother with information so insignificant that it could be reproduced in such a typeface. In the agent's document of attractive photographs and bold assertions … who would bother to read written disclaimers in such tiny print? …

[654] By holding that the printed disclaimer in this pamphlet was effective to exclude liability under the Act, this Court, in my respectful view, strikes a blow at the Act's intended operation. Henceforth, in effect, the Act may not operate to protect the ordinary recipient of the representations of corporations engaged in trade or commerce. Many such corporations will be encouraged by this decision to believe that they can avoid the burdens of the Act by the simple expedient of tucking away in an obscure place in minuscule typeface a disclaimer [655] such as now proves effective. This approach is contrary to the language and purpose of the Parliament.

The trend of authority on disclaimers: The approach that I favour is consistent with the way that intermediate courts have considered disclaimers when relied on by corporations that are otherwise in default of the Act. Of course, each case depends on its own facts and on the terms, size, prominence and context of the disclaimer in question. Also relevant is whether, on the particular question, the parties had the advantage of legal advice (H W Thompson Building Pty Ltd v Allen Property Services Pty Ltd (1983) 77 FLR 254 at 260). However, I could find no case where an Australian court has upheld a printed exemption with an equivalent lack of prominence, content and communicative force to that now upheld [case references omitted]. A similar unwillingness is observable in the courts of other countries [case references omitted], reluctant to allow claims to rescind land sale contracts for misrepresentation to be defeated by contractual exemptions …

[656] Disclaimers and commercial reality: In its nature, self-interest often inclines parties to attempt to limit proper warnings and to seduce consumers with attractive communications, unembarrassed by messages of restraint. Where the Act would otherwise attach, it is important for this Court, like virtually all intermediate courts before this case, to insist that, to be effective, written disclaimers must be clear, detailed and prominent. None of those adjectives applies to the two disclaimers in this case. So far as the written disclaimer on the reverse side of the pamphlet is concerned, a quick reading would suggest (as the joint reasons acknowledge (at 608)) that it is aimed to let the designer off the hook, saying nothing at all about the agent.

For centuries, lawyers have lamented the disinclination of their clients to read the fine print of documents. For a long time they have realised that it usually takes binding obligations of professional duty, a peculiar turn of mind and strong spectacles to combine in that result. Whatever they should do in theory, ordinary people cannot [657] be converted to reading hidden messages contained in tiny print. It requires a large measure of judicial self-deception to say that the purchasers should have read the written disclaimers invoked here. The decisions of the judges below in this case are out of line with the general approach of intermediate courts with larger experience in the application of the Act.

Expert commentary reinforces the conclusion: The approaches adopted by intermediate courts have not only been described by expert commentators. They have been strongly endorsed by them with reference to applicable considerations of legal principle and policy. …

[658] Similar conclusions have been reached by commentators in other countries [citations omitted]. The language of the Act, as well as legal authority, principle and policy suggest that this Court should not waver on this point. I dissent from the conclusion that we should do so in this case. …

[660] It follows that the appeal should be allowed with costs …

Appeal dismissed.

MISLEADING CONDUCT

[33.85] Conduct is misleading if it has the capacity to lead into or cause an error. However, the courts have not attempted to further define the words "misleading or deceptive". In Henjo Investments Pty Ltd v Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (1988) 39 FCR 546, 555 (at [33.252]) Lockhart J noted that there "is no need or warrant to search for other words to replace those used in the section itself". In Demagogue v Ramensky (1992) 39 FCR 31, 41 (see [33.135]) Black CJ set out the approach to be adopted when determining whether conduct is misleading or deceptive:

> [C]onsistently with regard to the natural meaning of the terms of s 52 [now ACL, s 18], the question is whether in the light of all the relevant circumstances constituted by acts, omissions, statements or silence, there has been conduct which is or is likely to be misleading or deceptive. Conduct answering that description may not always involve misrepresentation.

The context in which the representation is made will be important to determining the appropriate level of analysis expected of the reasonable class of persons or reasonable person to whom the conduct was directed. For example, the effects of representations contained in television advertisements are assessed on an impressionistic basis. In Pacific Dunlop Ltd v Hogan (1989) 23 FCR 553, 583 Burchett J noted that television advertisements "should not be seen as setting off a logical train of thought in the minds of television viewers". Furthermore, the reasonable member of the television viewing public is unlikely to pay close attention to the details of the advertisement. Thus, in assessing the impact of an advertisement courts should focus on the general impression the advertisement is likely to leave on the reasonable person. In other circumstances, the reasonable person will be expected to play close attention to the representations made. In Butcher v Lachlan Elder Realty Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 60; (2004) 218 CLR 592 (see [33.65]) a majority of the High Court held that the importance and brevity of the information contained in the brochure given to prospective purchasers of land meant that the reasonable person in the position of the purchaser would have paid close attention to the details of the brochure and read it in its entirety.

Section 18, unlike the general law of misrepresentation, is not in terms limited to positive misrepresentations of fact. Accordingly, statements of law are caught by the section. So too are sales puffs, if reasonably specific.

Silence

[33.90] In Henjo Investments Pty Ltd v Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (1988) 39 FCR 546 (at [33.252]) Lockhart J held that silence would be misleading where, on the facts, there was a duty to disclose the relevant information. However, the law has moved on from this approach (nevertheless, the factual outcome in Henjo remains sound). In Kimberley NZI Finance Ltd v Torero Pty Ltd [1989] ATPR (Digest) ¶46-054, 53,195 French J stated the test for when silence will be misleading as follows:

> [U]nless the circumstances are such as to give rise to the reasonable expectation that if some relevant fact exists it would be disclosed, it is difficult to see how mere silence could support the inference that the fact does not exist.

The reasonable expectation test was endorsed by the Full Federal Court in Demagogue Pty Ltd v Ramensky (1992) 39 FCR 31 (see [33.135]). In Miller & Associates Insurance Broking Pty Ltd v BMW Australia Finance Limited [2010] HCA 31; (2010) 241 CLR 357, [19] (at [33.95]) French CJ and Kiefel J noted that the reasonable expectation test "indicates an approach which can be taken to the characterisation, for the purposes of s 52 [now ACL, s 18], of conduct consisting of, or including, non-disclosure of information". Whether there is a reasonable expectation of disclosure is very much a matter of context: Nagy v Masters Diary Ltd (1996) 150 ALR 273, 273 and 291; E K Nominees Pty Ltd v Woolworths Ltd [2006] NSWSC 1172.

Although it is generally not necessary to show that the party engaging in the allegedly misleading conduct intended to mislead the other party, there is conflicting authority as to whether silence must be deliberate if it is to contravene the section. This possibility stems from the definition of conduct in s 2(2) of the ACL which reads as follows:

> In this Schedule: … (b) a reference to conduct, when that expression is used as a noun … is a reference to the doing of or the refusing to do any act …; (c) a reference to refusing to do an act includes a reference to — (i) refraining (otherwise than inadvertently) from doing that act … [emphasis added]

The issue of whether or not silence must be deliberate is yet to be resolved by the High Court.

Miller & Associates Insurance Broking v BMW Australia Finance

[33.95] Miller & Associates Insurance Broking Pty Ltd v BMW Australia Finance Limited [2010] HCA 31; (2010) 241 CLR 357 (High Court of Australia) [Footnotes omitted].

[FACTS: In late 2000, Miller & Associates Insurance Broking Pty Ltd (Miller), an insurance broker, negotiated an insurance premium funding loan with BMW Australia Finance Limited (BMW Finance) on behalf of its client Consolidated Timber Holdings Ltd (CTH). CTH used this money to purchase insurance from HIH Casualty and General Insurance Limited. When CTH defaulted on the loan, BMW Finance sued Miller in the Supreme Court of Victoria alleging that Miller had made misrepresentations about the policy for which the loan was sought and that these misrepresentations constituted misleading or deceptive conduct in breach of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) [which has since been repealed and replaced by s 18(1) of the ACL]. During the course of negotiations, Miller provided BMW Finance with a memorandum and certificate of insurance and the loan policy document. BMW Finance alleged that the memorandum and certificate conveyed the misrepresentation that the policy covered property and was assignable and cancellable. In addition, BMW Finance alleged that Miller's failure to disclose that the loan was neither assignable nor cancellable amounted to misleading or deceptive conduct.

At trial, Byrne J held that the certificate of insurance did not convey that the insurance policy was assignable and cancellable. Byrne J also noted that the relevant BMW Finance employees did not subject the certificate to careful analysis and jumped to the conclusion that the policy was cancellable, a conclusion that was not warranted by the terms of the certificate. With respect to the non-disclosure claim, Byrne J also rejected the non-disclosure claim on the basis that BMW was an experienced lender that had been provided with a copy of the insurance policy in question. BMW Finance successfully appealed to the Full Court of the Victorian Supreme Court. Robson AJA (with whom Neave JA agreed) held that the certificate of insurance conveyed the impression that the relevance insurance was property insurance. As property insurance is generally cancellable, Robson AJA held that the certificate was misleading. Robson AJA also held that Miller's non-disclosure was misleading. Ashley JA agreed with the trial judge's finding that the certificate did not convey a positive misrepresentation about the nature of the insurance policy but decided the appeal in favour of BMW Finance on the non-disclosure issue. Miller appealed to the High Court.]

FRENCH CJ AND KIEFEL J:

The pleading of misleading or deceptive conduct

[5] The cause of action for contravention of statutory prohibitions against conduct in trade or commerce that is misleading or deceptive or is likely to mislead or deceive has become a staple of civil litigation in Australian courts at all levels. Its frequent invocation, in cases to which it is applicable, reflects its simplicity relative to the torts of negligence, deceit and passing off. Its pleading, however, requires consideration of the words of the relevant statute and their judicial exposition since the cause of action first entered Australian law in 1974. It requires a clear identification of the conduct said to be misleading or deceptive. Where silence or non-disclosure is relied upon, the pleading should identify whether it is alleged of itself to be, in the circumstances of the case, misleading or deceptive conduct or whether it is an element of conduct, including other acts or omissions, said to be misleading or deceptive.

[6] … BMW began the relevant part of the pleading by alleging that it had a reasonable expectation that Miller would provide an accurate response in reply to its request for information about the policy and would not provide the memorandum and HIH certificate knowing, without disclosing, that the policy did not comply with BMW's security requirements … BMW then asserted that Miller did not, at any relevant time, make any disclosure to it of any information about the insurance other than that contained in the memorandum and in the HIH certificate …

Misleading or deceptive non-disclosure

[14] In determining whether there has been a contravention of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act, it is necessary to determine "whether in the light of all relevant circumstances constituted by acts, omissions, statements or silence, there has been conduct which is or is likely to be misleading or deceptive". The term "conduct" is to be understood according to its definition in s 4(2)(a) and (b) of the Trade Practices Act [now s 2(2)(a) and (b) of the ACL], which includes a reference to "refusing to do any act". That, in turn, includes a reference to "refraining (otherwise than inadvertently) from doing that act" [s 4(2)(c) of the Trade Practices Act, now s 2(2)(c) of the ACL].

[15] For conduct to be misleading or deceptive it is not necessary that it convey express or implied representations. It suffices that it leads or is likely to lead into error. BMW's case as pleaded, when its confusing overlaps are disentangled, was based upon conduct conveying representations either by the materials supplied to it by Miller or by the non-disclosure of which it complained.

[16] The circumstances in which silence or non-disclosure of information can be misleading or deceptive are various. The understanding of the place of silence or non-disclosure in the characterisation of conduct as misleading or deceptive was affected, in early decisions on s 52, by the view that the section was concerned with misrepresentations that would have been actionable under the general law. That view was linked to the proposition, expressed in Taco Co of Australia Inc v Taco Bell Pty Ltd [(1982) 42 ALR 177], that conduct could not be misleading or deceptive for the purposes of s 52 unless it conveyed a misrepresentation. It was also linked to the proposition that at general law "mere silence, with regard to a material fact, which there is no legal obligation to divulge, will not avoid a contract, although it operate as an injury to the party from whom it is concealed". In the early development of the law about misleading or deceptive conduct, there were rather cautiously expressed views about the role of silence, albeit the importance of the statutory words was acknowledged.

[17] The 1992 decision of the Full Court of the Federal Court in Demagogue Pty Ltd v Ramensky [(1992) 39 FCR 31] represented what has been described accurately as "an emphatic acknowledgement … of the unique nature of the statutory prohibition". The Full Court upheld the decision of the primary judge that a vendor of land had created a clear but erroneous impression in the purchasers that there was nothing unusual concerning access to the land and, in particular, had been silent as to the necessity of a grant of a licence by a statutory authority to enable such access.

[18] Gummow J, who wrote the leading judgment and with whom Black CJ and Cooper J agreed, said [at 38]:

> it should be no inhibition to giving effect to what, on its proper construction, is provided for in the legislation, that the result may be to achieve consequences and administer remedies which differ from those otherwise obtaining under the general law.

Silence, as Black CJ said in his concurring judgment, was to be assessed as a circumstance like any other [at 32]:

> the question is simply whether, having regard to all the relevant circumstances, there has been conduct that is misleading or deceptive or that is likely to mislead or deceive.

Gummow J referred to the limitation that "unless the circumstances are such as to give rise to the reasonable expectation that if some relevant fact exists it would be disclosed, it is difficult to see how mere silence could support the inference that the fact does not exist" [at 41].

[19] The language of reasonable expectation is not statutory. It indicates an approach which can be taken to the characterisation, for the purposes of s 52, of conduct consisting of, or including, non-disclosure of information. That approach may differ in its application according to whether the conduct is said to be misleading or deceptive to members of the public, or whether it arises between entities in commercial negotiations Campomar Sociedad, Limitada v Nike International Ltd (2000) 202 CLR 45 at 84–85 [101]; Campbell v Backoffice Investments Pty Ltd (2009) 238 CLR 304 at 319 [26]. An example in the former category is non-disclosure of material facts in a prospectus.

[20] In commercial dealings between individuals or individual entities, characterisation of conduct will be undertaken by reference to its circumstances and context. Silence may be a circumstance to be considered. The knowledge of the person to whom the conduct is directed may be relevant.

Also relevant, as in the present case, may be the existence of common assumptions and practices established between the parties or prevailing in the particular profession, trade or industry in which they carry on business. The judgment which looks to a reasonable expectation of disclosure as an aid to characterising non-disclosure as misleading or deceptive is objective. It is a practical approach to the application of the prohibition in s 52.

[21] To invoke the existence of a reasonable expectation that if a fact exists it will be disclosed is to do no more than direct attention to the effect or likely effect of non-disclosure unmediated by antecedent erroneous assumptions or beliefs or high moral expectations held by one person of another which exceed the requirements of the general law and the prohibition imposed by the statute. In that connection, Robson AJA in the Court of Appeal spoke of s 52 as making parties "strictly responsible to ensure they did not mislead or deceive their customer or trading partners". Such language, while no doubt intended to distinguish the necessary elements of misleading or deceptive conduct from those of torts such as deceit, negligence and passing off, may take on a life of its own. It may lead to the imposition of a requirement to volunteer information which travels beyond the statutory duty "to act in a way which does not mislead or deceive". Cicero, in his famous essay On Duties, seems to have contemplated such a standard when he wrote (Cicero, De Officiis, bk 3, ch 57, as translated by Grant in "A Practical Code of Behaviour", in Cicero: Selected Works, rev ed (1971) 157 at 180):

> Holding things back does not always amount to concealment; but it does when you want people, for your own profit, to be kept in the dark about something which you know and would be useful for them to know.

It would no doubt be regarded as an unrealistic expectation, inconsistent with the protection of that "superior smartness in dealing" of which Barton J wrote in W Scott, Fell & Co Ltd v Lloyd (1906) 4 CLR 572 at 580, that people who hold things back for their own profit are to be regarded as engaging in misleading or deceptive conduct. As Burchett J observed in Poseidon Ltd v Adelaide Petroleum NL (1991) 105 ALR 25 at 26, s 52 does not strike at the traditional secretiveness and obliquity of the bargaining process. But his Honour went on to remark that the bargaining process is not to be seen as a licence to deceive, and gave the example of a bargainer who had no intention of contracting on the terms discussed and whose silence was to achieve some undisclosed and ulterior purpose harmful to a competitor.

[22] However, as a general proposition, s 52 does not require a party to commercial negotiations to volunteer information which will be of assistance to the decision-making of the other party. A fortiori it does not impose on a party an obligation to volunteer information in order to avoid the consequences of the careless disregard, for its own interests, of another party of equal bargaining power and competence. Yet that appears to have been, in practical effect, the character of the obligation said to have rested upon Miller in this case.

[23] Reasonable expectation analysis is unnecessary in the case of a false representation where the undisclosed fact is the falsity of the representation. A party to precontractual negotiations who provides to another party a document containing a false representation which is not disclaimed will, in all probability, have engaged in misleading or deceptive conduct. When a document contains a statement that is true, non-disclosure of an important qualifying fact will be misleading or deceptive if the recipient would be misled, absent such disclosure, into believing that the statement was complete. In some cases it might not be necessary to invoke non-disclosure at all where a statement which is literally true, but incomplete in some material respect, conveys a false representation that it is complete.

Conclusions

[24] On the approach taken by Neave JA and Robson AJA, the HIH certificate conveyed a misrepresentation about the character of the policy. On that premise, Miller's failure to provide information about the nature of the policy was not necessary for their Honours' characterisation of its conduct in supplying the HIH certificate. In any event the premise was wrong for the reasons set out in the judgment of Heydon, Crennan and Bell JJ.

[25] If, as Ashley JA held, the HIH certificate did not convey a representation, the question then is what did Miller's "silence" add? Ashley JA said of the HIH certificate ((2009) 15 ANZ Insurance Cases ¶61-811 at 77,527 [20]):

> It was ambiguous. It neither plainly identified the insurance as ordinary property insurance, nor plainly identified the contrary. Miller knew that it did not relate to ordinary property insurance, and should be taken to have known that the insurance was non-cancellable. It knew the importance of insurance being cancellable to a premium funder. Those circumstances meant, in my opinion, that it was misleading for Miller to stay silent and not communicate to [BMW] a relevant situation which the HIH certificate tended to obfuscate. It cannot be said, for the reasons which I have stated, that provision of the copy policy satisfied the requirement that the uncertainty be cleared up.

[26] … [T]he preceding was not a statement that the HIH certificate was ambiguous in the sense that it was capable of being read as conveying, inter alia, a representation that the policy was a cancellable property insurance policy. Such a proposition could not sit with his Honour's rejection of the view of the other members of the Court of Appeal that the HIH certificate conveyed that representation. Given that the HIH certificate could not be read that way, the provision of further information would not have excluded a misleading construction. But his Honour having found, in the sense that the primary judge found, uncertainty in the meaning of the HIH certificate, he effectively found Miller was subject to a "requirement that the uncertainty be cleared up" [at 77,527 [20]]. Like the "strict responsibility" of which Robson AJA spoke, that duty travelled beyond the limits of the statutory prohibition. In our opinion, in the circumstances of the case, the alleged failure of Miller to volunteer information about the policy could not be said to have constituted misleading or deceptive conduct. In the event, a copy of the policy was put in the hands of BMW, who simply did not read it.

[27] For these reasons and the reasons set out in the judgment of Heydon, Crennan and Bell JJ, we agree that the appeal should be allowed.

HEYDON, CRENNAN AND BELL JJ:

The characterisation of Miller's conduct

[78] BMW's statutory claim for damages [under s 82 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth), now s 236 of the Australian Consumer Law] alleged contraventions of ss 52 and 53 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) [s 53 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth) has been repealed and replaced with s 29 of the ACL]. The focus at trial was on the claim under s 52. That section provides that "[a] corporation shall not, in trade or commerce, engage in conduct that is misleading or deceptive or is likely to mislead or deceive". "Engag[ing] in conduct" refers to doing or refusing to do any act [s 4(2)(a) Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth); s 2(2)(a) of the ACL]. "Refusing to do an act" includes refraining (otherwise than inadvertently) from doing that act [s 4(2)(c)(i) of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth), now s 2(2)(c) of the ACL].

[79] BMW put its case in two ways.

[80] The first was that Miller's conduct in supplying the HIH certificate in response to BMW's request for details of the insurance was misleading. This case depends upon finding that the HIH certificate misrepresented that the underlying policy was a cancellable property policy that was capable of providing security for the proposed loan.

[81] The second, wider, way in which the claim of misleading conduct was put arises from Miller's failure to inform BMW, in terms, that the policy for which funding was sought was not cancellable. This was characterised in the Court of Appeal as the "contextual silence" case. It was rejected by the primary judge, but it is the basis upon which each of the members of the Court of Appeal concluded that Miller had engaged in misleading conduct.

[82] BMW's pleaded contextual silence case was that Miller knew or ought to have known that the policy was non-cancellable and that this was capable of giving its conduct in failing to disclose that fact the quality of being misleading. In this Court, it was not in issue that Miller knew at all material times that the policy underlying the HIH certificate was a non-cancellable cost of production policy. BMW's pleaded case was that it had a reasonable expectation that Miller would not supply it with the HIH certificate in response to its request for details of the insurance without disclosing that the underlying policy was non-cancellable. This case does not depend upon acceptance of BMW's primary case that the HIH certificate misrepresented that the underlying policy was a cancellable property policy. As indicated earlier, this second and wider case is the one upon which each of the members of the Court of Appeal found that Miller had engaged in misleading conduct.

[83] It is convenient to commence with the first way BMW put its case. The question is whether the conclusion of the majority in the Court of Appeal that the HIH certificate conveyed a misrepresentation was correct.

BMW's first case: the HIH Certificate

[84] Neave JA and Robson AJA found that the endorsement on the HIH certificate, naming four properties and ascribing monetary limits to each, conveyed that it had been issued in respect of a policy of property insurance. Their Honours did not determine whether it conveyed the further representation that the underlying policy was cancellable, although such a conclusion may be implicit in the finding. Robson AJA assumed that the primary judge had treated cancellable and property insurance as being one and the same in the circumstances. It would seem that Robson AJA approached the issue on this basis …

[86] Several features of the HIH certificate should be noted. First, it was issued by HIH's Professional Indemnity Division and it provided for the statement of a "Profession". Secondly, Mr Mitchell [BMW Finance's expert witness] acknowledged that a term of five years is "highly unusual" for a property policy. He agreed that a "prudent broker" noting these two features of the HIH certificate and without more information would not have assumed that it related to a property policy. Thirdly, the premium was $3.75 million and the limit of indemnity was $12 million. Mr Reynolds [BMW Finance employee] said that this was an unusually high premium for a standard property policy. Mr Mitchell described the premium as "large". However, he did not draw any inference from that circumstance. His reticence arose from a fourth feature that is to be noted: the HIH certificate said nothing about the nature of the risks insured. The inference was open that "standard" property policies are cancellable. However, there was evidence that some property policies are not cancellable. Even if the endorsement on the HIH certificate was capable of conveying that the policy was one insuring against loss or damage to property, it cannot be said to have conveyed that it was a "standard" property policy and therefore cancellable. To the contrary, the HIH certificate had features that suggested that the policy was an unusual one.

[87] BMW's claim was that Miller's conduct was misleading. The claim was based on the ground that the HIH certificate conveyed a representation that the underlying insurance was a cancellable property policy. It did not convey that representation. Hence the primary judge and Ashley JA were right to reject that ground for concluding that Miller's conduct was misleading. The majority's conclusion that Miller's conduct was misleading is ultimately dependent upon their Honour's acceptance of the contextual silence case.

BMW's second case: silence

[88] Ashley JA upheld BMW's second case. That case is based on the supply of an "ambiguous" insurance certificate in circumstances in which Miller knew "that it was important to [BMW] that a policy which was to be funded was cancellable" and Miller failed, between October and early December 2000, to inform BMW that the policy was non-cancellable. His Honour said that any misleading impression created by the HIH certificate had not been overcome by the later supply of the policy, since there was no evident connection between the two. The reasoning of Neave JA and Robson AJA was to the same effect.

[89] The ambiguity in the HIH certificate that Ashley JA identified was that it "neither plainly identified the insurance as ordinary property insurance, nor plainly identified the contrary". In circumstances in which the HIH certificate was the only document in BMW's hands that unequivocally related to the insurance, his Honour said that it was misleading for Miller to stay silent and not communicate to BMW that the policy was not cancellable, a matter which his Honour said that the HIH certificate "tended to obfuscate". The ambiguity to which his Honour referred was not that the HIH certificate was susceptible of differing interpretations and that one interpretation was that it related to a cancellable property policy. As his Honour found, the HIH certificate did not convey the latter representation. One way of describing the ambiguity is that the HIH certificate may, or may not, have been issued in respect of a cancellable property policy.

[90] Putting to one side the primary judge's finding that Mr Reynolds and Mr Jones [BMW Finance employees] understood that the policy in the bundle was the policy underlying the HIH certificate, the differences between the two documents were capable of causing BMW not to appreciate that it was in possession of the policy to be funded. This would, as Ashley JA observed, leave BMW with the HIH certificate as the only document relating to the insurance.

[91] Was Miller's conduct in failing to inform BMW, in terms, that the policy to be funded was not cancellable, or that the policy in the bundle was the policy to be funded, misleading? That question requires close analysis of all of the circumstances of the transaction [Butcher v Lachlan Elder Realty Pty Ltd (2004) 218 CLR 592 at 604 [37] per Gleeson CJ, Hayne and Heydon JJ]. The parties were commercially sophisticated. They were experienced in their respective fields. The transaction involved the assessment by BMW of an application to lend Miller's client $3.975 million. The only document that Miller supplied in support of the application which appeared to relate to the policy to be funded did not disclose the nature of the risks insured. But it did put BMW on notice that the underlying policy may be an unusual one. BMW made no further inquiry. BMW's failure to make reasonable inquiries would not automatically defeat its statutory claim for damages for misleading conduct. However, given the history of this transaction, it is a circumstance that is relevant to whether Miller's conduct in failing to disclose its knowledge of the policy is correctly characterised as misleading …

[93] Miller knew that the cancellability of insurance was important to a premium lender's determination of a loan application. That was not in issue. However, given that Consolidated Timber's application had been approved by the lender, it is to be inferred that cancellability was not critical to the determination of this application. Mr Mitchell acknowledged, as inevitably he must have done, that where the broker understands that the lender (BMW) has approved the loan, as Miller did on 4 October 2000, it is to be inferred that "obviously up to a point the premium funder has been satisfied".

[94] In late October 2000, when Mr Jones of BMW spoke with Mr Merton, agent for Miller, and advised him that BMW would not be proceeding with the loan [note, BMW later agreed to approve the loan in December 2000], he said nothing to put Miller on notice that BMW was under a misapprehension that the policy was cancellable. It will be recalled that when the negotiations for the loan were renewed, Mr Reynolds asked Mr Merton about the availability of directors' guarantees to support the loan. It was not BMW's practice to seek security when lending for cancellable policies. Mr Mitchell acknowledged that recourse to directors' guarantees was a means adopted by premium lenders when funding non-cancellable policies.

[95] The December 2000 loan application related to the same insurance as the earlier application which BMW had approved. It was for the same amount. There was nothing in the conduct of the parties between November 2000 (when Mr Merton contacted Mr Reynolds and negotiations were resumed) and 12 December 2000 (when the application was approved) to convey that cancellability was important to the determination of this later application. The request for directors' guarantees suggested that it was not. There was no foundation for the conclusion that the known importance of cancellability gave rise to a reasonable expectation, in the circumstances of this transaction, that Miller would not supply the HIH certificate in response to BMW's request without disclosing at that time or later that the policy was not cancellable.

[96] The requirement of the provision of "full policy information", contained in BMW's quotation dated 8 December 2000, did not make Miller's failure to advise BMW that the policy was not a cancellable property policy misleading. Miller had supplied BMW with a copy of the policy. BMW was an experienced premium lender. The policy was not a lengthy document. It was apparent that it did not insure the holders against loss or damage to property. It did not contain a cancellation clause. Miller's failure to draw to BMW's attention a circumstance that the document itself disclosed was not misleading or deceptive.

[97] The finding that Miller engaged in misleading conduct cannot be sustained.

Appeal allowed.

Demagogue v Ramensky

[33.135] Demagogue Pty Ltd v Ramensky (1992) 39 FCR 31 (Federal Court of Australia, Full Court) – Appeal from a single judge of the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: Mr and Mrs Ramensky (the respondents) entered into a contract with Demagogue Pty Ltd (the appellant) to purchase an estate in part of a proposed building, being lot 5 on certain land at Noosa Heads. The contract recited that the appellant intended constructing a multi-level residential home unit building on the land, and that upon completion the land and building would be subdivided into lots and common property. When the respondents inspected the site with Mr Miller, the appellant's agent, they asked him about access to the property and he replied: "Well, look, of course there will be access. The developer will build a driveway to the road." Later at his office, Mr Miller showed the respondents a plan of the development attached to the contract which showed a driveway coming from the road. The respondents believed this represented the usual situation where vehicular access to a road from a block of home units would be over a driveway located on the common property of the site of the development. In fact, the driveway was a public road, the appellants having applied for and obtained a road licence over public land to provide access. Neither the appellant nor its agent revealed this to the respondents.

When the respondents discovered that access to the site was subject to a road licence in the name of the appellant, they rescinded the contract and initiated proceedings. The appellant cross-claimed seeking specific performance and, in lieu thereof, damages for breach of contract. The respondents resisted the claim for specific performance by reason of the hardship to them in being forced to an election between accepting a transfer of an interest in the road licence in order to have use and enjoyment of the property they purchased and settling the contract without any legal right to use the only practicable vehicular access.

Spender J declared that there had been a contravention of s 52 by the appellants and that the contract was void ab initio. He ordered the appellant to pay the deposit and consequential costs incurred by the respondents. The appellant appealed to the Full Court.]

GUMMOW J: [37] Two issues of importance arise on the appeal. The first concerns the circumstances in which misleading or deceptive conduct, for the purposes of s 52 may be constituted by a factual matrix which includes silence as well as overt activity. In particular, the appellant, at least initially, submitted that the parties as prospective vendor and purchaser were "at arms length" and there was no duty to disclose what did not amount to a latent defect in title. The second issue concerns the meaning of the phrase, in subss 87(1A) and (2)(a) of the Act, "will prevent or reduce the loss or damage suffered, or likely to be suffered …" The appellant submitted that it had not been shown that the property as sold was worth less than the contract price and that therefore the respondents could not point to any relevant "loss or damage" to enliven s 87 …

In dealing with both of these issues it is well to bear in mind that whilst contractual rights subsisted between the parties their relationship is not governed simply by the general law as to vendor and purchaser. The legislation regulates the existence and exercise of what would otherwise be the rights at general law and, in addition, itself creates new rights and remedies …

[38] For example, whatever the special rules at general law, no general rule can be laid down which determines the circumstances in which evidence of conversations in pre-contractual negotiations or discussions may be relied upon in a claim alleging contravention of s 52: Lezam Pty Ltd v Seabridge Australia Pty Ltd (1992) 107 ALR 291 at 297. Again, it should not be an inhibition upon giving to s 52 what otherwise would be its effect that the result may be to afford under ss 52 and 82 a remedy in damages for what the common law would classify as innocent misrepresentation. Restraint upon what otherwise might be the reach of these provisions of the statute is, in any event, provided by the need to show causation …

The counsel for the appellant placed reliance upon certain passages in the judgment of Bowen CJ in Rhone-Poulenc Agrochimie SA v UIM Chemical Services Pty Ltd (1986) 12 FCR 477 at 489–90. His Honour referred to certain relationships which at general law have been held to give rise to an obligation of disclosure. He said that the nature of relationships giving rise to an obligation to make disclosure might well prove useful in determining some of the cases arising under s 52 of the TPA. However, Bowen CJ also said:

> Where silence is relied on in order to show a breach of s 52 it will depend upon the circumstances whether the silence constitutes conduct which is misleading or deceptive. As in the case of other sections of the Trade Practices Act 1974 the court may gain assistance from consideration of cases at common law and in equity dealing with related types of situations. However, the court is not confined by such cases because it is concerned with the interpretation and application of the words of the particular statute.

Referring to the situation under the general law his Honour added (at 490):

> Vendors and purchasers have not generally been regarded as being, without more, in this type of relationship. There are occasions when a particular enactment or even the terms of a particular contract will impose an [39] obligation upon a vendor which will place the parties in a relationship of this type involving an obligation to make disclosure.

The general law has developed a distinction between the obligations of a vendor of disclosure as regards defects in title and defects as to quality of the property sold. Whilst the vendor's duty of disclosure is confined to latent defects in title, it applies to all such defects, whether known to the vendor or not. On the other hand, when the complaint of the purchaser is one going to the quality of the land sold or to the use to which it may be put, or is that owing to non-disclosed facts within the knowledge of the vendor its value will be less than the purchaser supposed, there is no duty of disclosure: Spencer Bower, The Law Relating to Actionable Non-Disclosure, 2nd edition, 1990, pp 135–6. The result is that in the absence of any misrepresentation or fraudulent concealment the vendor will incur no liability for failure to make [617] such disclosure: Harpum, "Selling Without Title: A Vendor's Duty of Disclosure?" (1992) 108 LQR 280 at 320 …

In the present case, it is accepted that the title the appellant promised by the contract to convey to the respondents did not include any rights over land outside the relevant parcel. The result was that there was, in the technical sense, no defect in title.

However, Professor Butt explains in his work The Standard Contract for Sale of Land in New South Wales, 1985, that if the vendor has represented that the land possesses certain advantages which an undisclosed latent defect [40] in quality falsifies, the vendor, at general law, will not be allowed to resist rescission by shielding behind the now false representation: Laurence v Lexcourt Holdings Ltd [1978] 2 All ER 810 at 815–17. Further, the learned author points out that in some circumstances silence, in the sense of refraining from comment, may amount to engaging in misleading or deceptive conduct for the purposes of s 52 of the Act.

"Conduct" within the meaning of s 52 includes refusing to do an act and refusal to do an act includes a reference to "refraining (otherwise than inadvertently) from doing that act": subs 4(2). But in any case where a failure to speak is relied upon the question must be whether in the particular circumstances the silence constitutes or is part of misleading or deceptive conduct. The expanded meaning given by s 4(2) to "conduct" should not distract attention from the fundamental issue in the case at hand.

Spender J indicated … that the present case concerns both a positive misrepresentation, as to the provision of vehicular access, and misleading conduct from the failure to say anything about the road licence, with the whole of the circumstances creating in the respondents the clear but erroneous impression that there was nothing unusual concerning access to the site.

In my view, to inquire in such a case whether an independent "duty to disclose" has arisen is to digress from the application of the terms of s 52. Thus, in Rhone-Poulenc the basic proposition for which the appellants unsuccessfully contended was that a manufacturer who sells a product it knows is bought by consumers for the purpose for which it was made, contravenes s 52 if the sale and use of the product is unlawful and the product is liable to forfeiture and the manufacturer has not made this known to consumers; see 12 FCR at 505–6, per Lockhart J. Again, in Henjo Investments Pty Ltd v Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (1988) 79 ALR 83, the positive statement on behalf of the restaurant vendor that the restaurant seated 128 people was, in the circumstances of the case, misleading when unqualified by words which distinguished the actual capacity from the licensed capacity, that being a matter of vital importance given the nature of the business being sold. In my view it is unhelpful to describe that result, involving as it does a contravention of s 52, as the product of the breach of any "duty" imposed upon the vendor by that section.

The use of the term "duty" is apt to suggest a necessary connection with the general law, which does not exist and is not required by the statute; cf Lam v Ausintel Investments Australia Pty Ltd (1990) ATPR 40-990 at 50,880–1. I agree with what was said by Samuels JA in Commonwealth Bank of Australia v Mehta (1991) 23 NSWLR 84 at 88:

> … silence is not misleading only where there is a duty to disclose at common law or in equity. It may simply be the element in all the circumstances of a case which renders the conduct in question misleading or deceptive …

[41] [C]onsistently with regard to the natural meaning of the terms of s 52, the question is whether in the light of all relevant circumstances constituted by acts, omissions, statements or silence, there has been conduct which is or is likely to be misleading or deceptive. Conduct answering that description may not always involve misrepresentation; see Henjo Investments Pty Ltd v Collins Marrickville Pty Ltd (1988) 79 ALR 83 at 93, per Lockhart J, and see Mr Justice French's paper "Trade Practices Act" in Finn ed, Essays on Torts, 1989, pp 186–8. I agree also with the remarks by French J in Kimberley NZI Finance Limited v Torero Pty Ltd (1989) ATPR (Digest) 46-054 at 53,195 where, after referring to various authorities, his Honour said:

> If in a particular case silence would, as a matter of fact, constitute misleading or deceptive conduct, sec 52 by virtue of its prohibition of such [619] conduct imposes its own statutory duty to make disclosure. The cases in which silence may be so characterised are no doubt many and various and it would be dangerous to essay any principle by which they might be exhaustively defined. However, unless the circumstances are such as to give rise to the reasonable expectation that if some relevant fact exists it would be disclosed, it is difficult to see how mere silence could support the inference that the fact does not exist.

As this passage suggests, one may give s 52 full effect without entirely doing away with what Barton J described as "superior smartness in dealing": W Scott, Fell and Company Limited v FH Lloyd (1906) 4 CLR 572 at 580. Nor does the application of s 52 in the manner suggested necessarily involve the outflanking by statute of developments in the law of contract, tort, fiduciary duty and estoppel of an obligation in certain cases to negotiate in good faith; see Coal Cliff Collieries Pty Ltd v Sijehama Pty Ltd (1991) 24 NSWLR 1, Walford v Miles (1992) 1 All ER 453 (HL), Peel, "Note" (1992) CLJ 211, Farnsworth Contract, 1982, 3.26. But, in Australia, discussion of these issues in the general law is plainly defective without close regard to the impact of the Act ….

In my view, the appellant has not shown any reason for departing from the findings of the primary Judge as to the engagement by the appellant in conduct contravening s 52. I should add that there is no challenge to his Honour's further finding that in entering the contract the respondents placed the necessary reliance upon the misleading conduct of the appellant.

There remains the complaint that there was no relevant loss or damage to attract the making of orders under sub-s 87(1A).

Section 82 provides for the recovery in an action of the amount of loss or damage. On the other hand, the powers of the Court under sub-s 87(1A) are expressed in terms that are permissive rather than mandatory. The appellant [42] submitted that the exercise of discretion by the primary Judge miscarried because his Honour wrongly acted on the footing that the appellant's conduct had been fraudulent. The presence or absence of fraud is a relevant factor in the exercise of powers under this provision: Munchies Management Pty Ltd v Belperio (1988) 84 ALR 700 at 714. The passage in question in the reasons of the primary Judge is as follows:

> In all the circumstances, in my opinion, (the respondents) are entitled to relief pursuant to s 87 of the Act. Demagogue deliberately chose to be silent about the question of the road licence in circumstances where its product was towards the top end of the range and where prospective purchasers were entitled to be told what in truth they were buying. (Emphasis supplied)

No case of common law fraud was pleaded and none found. But the evidence to which I have referred provides ample ground for inferring (i) that both at the time the draft contract was shown to the respondents and at the time of their execution of the contract the appellant was well aware of the need for a Road Licence to enable construction of a driveway to provide a practicable vehicular access to the Picture Point Terraces development and (ii) that the silence in the contract on this matter was not the result of inadvertence to the problem on the part of the appellant. The primary Judge's remarks should be understood in the light of his earlier finding as to contravention, in all the circumstances, of s 52. In this setting, the use by the primary Judge of the term "deliberately chose to be silent" is not open to objection. It indicates that the disclosure to the respondents which the appellant refrained from making was otherwise than inadvertent, and thus "conduct" within the terms of subs 4(2).

Where a contract is entered into as a result of fraudulent misrepresentation by the defendant and the plaintiff affirms the contract, an action in deceit requires proof of the difference in value between what was paid and what was acquired. Subsequent depreciation in value ordinarily should not be taken into account in determining the real value at the time of the purchase: Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215 at 220–2.

However, in the present case, the purchasers did not affirm the contract and seek damages under s 82, by analogy with damages in deceit. The burden of their case is that they should not be held to the contract because, as the primary Judge found, they would not have entered it but for the conduct of the appellant in contravention of s 52.

Section 4K of the Act states: "4K. In this Act: (a) a reference to loss or damage, other than a reference to the amount of any loss or damage, includes a reference to injury; and (b) a reference to the amount of any loss or damage includes a reference to damages in respect of an injury."

The phrase "loss or damage" appears in s 82 and in various sub-sections of s 87, particularly subss (1) and (1A). In my view, on this appeal nothing turns upon the circumstance that in a given case sub-s (1) may be attracted only by reason of the making of an application under s 82 to recover the amount of the loss or damage suffered by conduct in contravention in a provision of Part IV or V.

Section 82 is concerned with the recovery of "the amount of the loss or [43] damage" suffered by conduct in contravention of the Act. Subsection 87(1) requires that the Court consider that its order will compensate "in whole or in part" for the loss or damage or will prevent or reduce the loss or damage. Subsection 87(1A) requires that the orders concerned will compensate in whole or in part for the loss or damage suffered "or likely to be suffered", or will "prevent or reduce the loss or damage suffered, or likely to be suffered …".

Thus, whilst s 82 is concerned with the recovery of an amount representing the loss or damage, s 87 is concerned with compensation, whether in whole or in part, for loss or damage and with the reduction of loss or damage, and with the prevention of loss or damage which is likely to be suffered. In the phrase "likely to be suffered", the word "likely" speaks of a "real chance or possibility": State of Western Australia v Wardley Australia Limited (1990) 30 FCR 245 at 261.

One significant distinction between ss 82 and 87 is the quia timet operation of s 87. On the appeal to the High Court in Wardley Australia Limited v The State of Western Australia (28 October 1992, unrep) Mason CJ, Dawson, Gaudron and McHugh JJ said (p 9 of the Print): "The Act draws a clear distinction in Pt VI between loss or damage which may be recovered under s 82 and the likelihood of loss of damage which may be prevented, or, if not prevented, reduced by one of the remedies under s 87." Deane J said (p 27) that the statute in s 87 expressly distinguishes between the actual suffering of loss or damage and the likelihood (or contingency) that loss or damage will be suffered in the future. This emphasises that the phrase "the loss or damage", at least in s 87, may be concerned with more than pecuniary recovery as understood in the law of damages in tort; tort law postulates the commission, already accomplished, of a wrong: Leeds Industrial Co-operative Society Limited v Slack [1924] AC 851 at 859, 868–9.

Further, unlike the position at general law with the administration of the equitable remedy of rescission of contracts, orders under s 87 may be made not only against parties to the contract but also against third parties, being persons involved (within the meaning of s 75B) in the contravention as a result of which the plaintiff entered into the contract: Lezam Pty Ltd v Seabridge Australia Pty Ltd supra at 304, Munchies Management Pty Ltd v Belperio supra at 714.

The respondents complain that they entered into a contract as the result of reliance upon conduct which contravened s 52. Why should they not be described as having suffered loss or damage, within the meaning of s 87, by that very reliance and entry into legal relations from which they otherwise would have abstained? If that contract be declared void ab initio as provided for in sub-s 87(2)(a), will that not reduce this loss or damage?

It may well be that in a given case the contract is not financially disadvantageous to the complainant. But, at least in Australia, if a contract is rescinded in equity for some vitiating factor in its formation, it is not sufficient for the defendant to show that the transaction to which the complainant was improperly induced to assent, after all, contained terms which, viewed objectively, were not manifestly disadvantageous so that the complainant should freely have accepted them. The complainant is entitled to say that but for the unconscientious conduct of the defendant he or she would not have entered into any transaction with the defendant; see Cope "Undue Influence and Alleged Manifestly Disadvantageous Transactions" (1986) 60 ALJ 87 [44] at 96–7, where the High Court authorities are discussed, and cf Bank of Credit and Commerce International v Aboody [1990] 1 QB 923.

It would be an odd result if s 87 and s 4K were to be read in a contrary sense by giving too narrow a meaning to the phrase "loss or damage" …

Further, even if some pecuniary detriment (further propounded as a "real chance" or as presently existing) is required in all s 87 cases, that requirement is present here.

If the respondents' claim to relief under s 87 fails and the contract remains on foot, they have to answer, on this appeal, the claim against them for specific performance. If an order for specific performance were made against them it would require them to pay the contract price on what is now a fallen market. That would not provide a sufficient answer to the claim for specific performance. Movement in the value of the land since the date of the contract is not, in itself, a material consideration in formulation of a defence of hardship: Fitzgerald v Masters (1956) 95 CLR 420 at 433.

Nevertheless, in my view, the consequences of the administration of an order of specific performance does, within the meaning of s 87, entail a real chance or possibility of the suffering by the respondents of loss or damage even within the narrower reading of that phrase in s 87. Further, it would be accurate to say that the likelihood of the respondents suffering that loss or damage is something which is caused by and flows from the contravention of s 52. Specific performance is sought by the appellant of the contract into which the respondents would not have entered but for the appellant's contravention … [T]he respondents resist a decree of specific performance on various discretionary grounds. It is not necessary to determine whether such a defence is made out. It is sufficient to say that the defence is substantial and not colourable. Were the defence to succeed, the appellant would be left an inquiry as to damages for breach of contract by the respondents. The exposure of the respondents on such an inquiry would be in a significant order. Again, there is a real chance or possibility of the suffering by the respondents of loss or damage and again, in my view, that likelihood is sufficiently connected with the contravention of the Act by the appellant.

I conclude that the relief under s 87 was properly ordered by the primary Judge … the primary Judge acceded to the submission of the parties that the inquiry as to damages should be stood over pending the outcome of the other issues (Appeal Book 438, 448–9). His Honour preferred to act under s 87 on the footing that the need for the road licence, its conditions and annual fee, was a factor which adversely affected the value of a unit at Picture Point Terraces "in a non-trivial way". While the quantification of the loss and damage suffered by the respondents was left uncertain, these circumstances, in a not immaterial way, reduced the attractiveness and value of the units in the development. But, as I have [45] indicated, in my view it is sufficient to support the operation of s 87 in the present case that whether or not the real value of the property at the time of purchase was diminished in this way, at the trial there was sufficient likelihood of the suffering of loss or damage by the administration of the common law and equitable remedies on the contract sought against the respondents by the appellant ….

[46] The appeal should be dismissed with costs.

[BLACK CJ and COOPER J delivered judgments in which they agreed with Gummow J that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

Representations about future matters

[33.140] Statements about the future are governed by s 4 of the ACL.

(1) If

(a) a person makes a representation with respect to any future matter (including the doing of, or the refusing to do, any act); and

(b) the person does not have reasonable grounds for making the representation;

the representation shall be taken to be misleading.

(2) For the purposes of applying subsection (1) in relation to a proceeding concerning a representation made with respect to a future matter by:
