Bargaining, Duress, and Economic Liberty

[1.05] RL Hale, "Bargaining, Duress, and Economic Liberty" (1943) 43 Columbia Law Review 603.

That men may live, they must either be in a position each to produce the material necessities of life for his own use, or there must be some adequate incentive for production of the goods and services which people other than the producers may enjoy, and some means by which individual consumers can acquire some portion of them. In thinly settled lands it may be possible for each family to produce most of the things needed to satisfy its own wants. The law has only to recognize each family's property right in its farm and its products, and protect that property from interference. But in a land as thickly settled as ours, such individualistic methods of providing for wants would be wholly inadequate. We have to resort to the more efficient process of machine production, with its widespread division of labor. Almost every article or service that is produced is the fruit of the combined efforts of countless people, each working on a fractional part of the product. But the product is consumed only in small part, if at all, by its producers. Other people consume it, and the producers of this product consume the products of other people's labor. Goods are turned out collectively and consumed individually. Individuals could conceivably be conscripted to contribute their respective efforts to the collective process of production, and the products could be rationed out to each for his individual consumption. These are not the methods of our free economy. We rely instead, for the most part, on bargaining.

There are few, if any, who own enough of the collective output of goods ready for consumption to satisfy their needs for more than a brief period in the future. Some persons own more than enough of certain [604] types of goods, but they must perforce acquire the use of other types as well. The owner of a shoe factory is in no danger of going ill-shod – he may wear his own shoes. But he cannot live on shoes alone. Like everyone else, he must buy food or starve. Even the producer and owner of food must as a rule buy other forms of food than those in which he has specialized. Any person, in order to live, must induce some of the owners of things which he needs, to permit him to use them. The owner has no legal obligation to grant the permission. But if offered enough money he will probably do so; for he, too, must obtain the permission of other owners to make use of their goods, and for this purpose he too needs money – more than he has at the outset. He needs it more than he needs his surplus of shoes. Indeed he values his right of ownership in the shoes solely for the power it gives him to obtain money with which to buy other things which he does not yet own.

The owner of the shoes or the food or any other product can insist on other people keeping their hands off his products. Should he so insist, the government will back him up with force. The owner of the money can likewise insist on other people keeping their hands off his money, and the government will likewise back him up with force. By threatening to maintain the legal barrier against the use of his shoes, their owner may be able to obtain a certain amount of money as the price of not carrying out his threat. And by threatening to maintain the legal barrier against the use of his money, the purchaser may be able to obtain a certain amount of shoes as the price of not withholding the money. A bargain is finally struck, each party consenting to its terms in order to avert the consequences with which the other threatens him.

This does not mean, of course, that in each purchase of a commodity, there is unfriendliness, or deliberation and haggling over terms. Market conditions may have standardized prices, so that each party knows that any haggling would be futile. Nevertheless the transaction is based on the bargaining power of the two parties. The seller would not part with the shoes, or produce them in the first place, if the law enabled him to get the buyer's money without doing so, nor would the buyer part with his money if the law enabled him to obtain the shoes without payment.

Of course the process of getting some part of the collective product of the community into the consumer's hands is more complex than our illustration indicates. There are usually intermediaries between the factory and the consumer – jobbers, wholesalers and retailers. But the illustration reveals the essentials of the process. It does not explain, however, how the shoes came into the ownership of the factory owner, or how, indeed, they came to be produced at all. Nor does it explain [605] how the money came into the possession of the purchaser. It merely makes clear that, without money, an individual has little chance of gaining access to any part of the goods produced. The law bars such access without the consent of some of those to whom it assigns the ownership of those goods.

How, then, does any purchaser obtain the money that will enable him to consume? We have already seen that the owner of products obtains it, by selling his products to buyers. But how did he come to be the owner of the products? The answer which first suggests itself is that he produced them. To the extent that this is true, it indicates that he made his contribution to the productive process, not by first making a bargain with consumers, but because he anticipated that his efforts would put him in a favorable position to make future bargains But the answer is not wholly true. The owner did not produce the shoes by his own efforts alone. Other people have taken part in the production too – not only his employees, but those who have advanced the necessary capital, or taken any part in the production of the raw materials and fuel which he uses, or in transporting them to his factory.

Yet of all these innumerable producers of the shoes, only the owner of the factory acquires title to them. The others have all, at one time or another, waived their claims to any share in the ownership of the shoes. They have done so in a series of bargaining transactions, in which they received money, or promises to pay money. Through this series of bargains, the owner of the plant has acquired the full right of ownership in the shoes. This right enables him, if he is successful, to obtain from his customers more than enough to repay all the outlays he has made to the other participants – enough more to compensate him for his risk and labor in organizing and managing the plant, and perhaps even more than this.

As a result of these innumerable bargains, the owner and the other participants in the production obtain their respective money income and these money incomes determine the share that each may obtain of the total goods and services turned out by the collective efforts of all the other members of society. And it is as a result of these bargains, or in anticipation of them, that each participant in these collective productive efforts makes his contribution. We rely on the bargaining process to serve the conflicting interests of individuals in securing a share of the collective output of society, and also to serve their common interest in the creation of that collective output.

Though these bargains lead to vast differences in the economic positions of different persons, whether as producers or as consumer these differences have all resulted from transactions into which each has [606] entered without any explicit requirement of law that he do so. But while there is no explicit legal requirement that one enter into any particular transaction, one's freedom to decline to do so is nevertheless circumscribed. One chooses to enter into any given transaction in order to avoid the threat of something worse – threats which impinge with unequal weight on different members of society. The fact that he exercised a choice does not indicate lack of compulsion. Even a slave makes a choice. The compulsion which drives him to work operates through his own will power. He makes the "voluntary" muscular movements which the work calls for, in order to escape some threat; and though he exercises will power and makes a choice, still, since he is making it under threat, his servitude is called "involuntary". And one who obeys some compulsory requirement of the law in order to avoid a penalty is likewise making a choice. If he has the physical power to disobey, his obedience is not a matter of physical necessity, but of choice. Yet no one would deny that the requirement of the law is a compulsory one. It restricts his liberty to act out of conformity to it.

Government has power to compel one to choose obedience, since it can threaten disobedience with death, imprisonment, or seizure of property. Private individuals are not permitted to make such threats to other individuals, save in exceptional circumstances such as self-defense. But there are other threats which may lawfully be made to induce a party to enter into a transaction. In the complex bargains made in the course of production, some parties who deal with the manufacturer surrender a portion of their property, others their liberty not to work for him, in order to avert his threat to withhold his money, while he, in turn, surrenders some part of the money he now owns, or some part of his right to keep from them money he may obtain in the future, to avert their threats of withholding from him their raw materials or their labor. And he may have surrendered property in the past, and the freedom to abstain from labor, in order to attain his position as owner of the plant and its products, and so to obtain the money with which to avert the threats of owners of the things he wishes to consume, to withhold those things from him. In consenting to enter into any bargain, each party yields to the threats of the other. In the absence of corrective legislation, each party, in order to induce the other to enter into a transaction, may generally threaten to exercise any of his legal rights and privileges, no matter how disadvantageous that exercise may be to the other party.

The Significance of Contract Theory

[1.15] JM Feinman, "The Significance of Contract Theory" (1990) 58 University of Cincinnati Law Review 1283.

[1285] This article begins by describing mainstream contract theory, which is known as neoclassical contract. Then it examines each of the principal competitors to neoclassical contract: death of contract theory, metatheory, relational contract, empirical contract theory, and critical legal studies. The article explains the core assertions of each theory and explains why each theory presents a fundamental challenge to neoclassical contract. It concludes by briefly considering the contract theories as expressions of political and professional ideology.

Theory is important. Theory, including legal theory, frames the way we look at problems, the facts and values we think relevant to their solution, and even what we consider to be problems at all. More is at stake in this debate than getting straight the views of some academic scholars; the meaning and content of contract law are at stake as well.

I. Neoclassical contract law

[1.20] Modern contract law is often usefully referred to as neoclassical contract law. This term aptly situates today's contract law in its historical context. The essential quality of neoclassical contract is that it is the product of the attempt to accommodate classical contract law and subsequent critiques of it. The word "neoclassical" suggests the partial nature of the accommodation, indicating that neoclassical contract has not so far departed from classical law that a wholly new name is appropriate.

Classical contract is the body of law usually associated with the age of Holmes, Williston, and the original Restatement of Contracts. [1286] Classical law in general was structured by a series of dichotomies which defined the relationships among legal actors … The most fundamental dichotomy was between the individual and the community. Therefore, relations among individuals were governed by private law, which was distinct from public law, which regulated relations between individuals and the state. Within private law, contract law embodied the dichotomy between individual and community by imagining a realm of private agreement in which individual freedom was protected from state coercion. The image that motivated this realm was the isolated bargain between independent, self-interested individuals. Steely-eyed bargainers carefully calculated their interests in a particular exchange, gave a promise or performance only in return for something else, and embodied their transaction in an agreement that carefully defined the terms of performance and therefore could provide the basis for a determinate remedy in case of breach.

Accordingly, as conceived by classical contract law, liability was always voluntarily assumed by the individual through his making of a promise or an agreement, unlike in tort law, in which liability was imposed by the legal system without regard for the individual's consent. Contract doctrines such as narrow formation rules and bargain consideration followed logically from these principles and assured that the individual actually had consented to a bargained-for exchange. When courts mechanically applied these abstract, formal doctrines, they protected the individual's right to assume contractual [1287] obligation or to avoid it at the same time as they provided a predictable basis for commercial transactions.

The problems of classical contract law quickly became apparent to judicial and scholarly commentators. Contractual liability, like all other legal liability, did not arise solely from the individual's choice but came from the court's imposition of legal obligation as a matter of public policy; a contract was binding because the court determined that imposing liability served social interests, not because the individual had voluntarily assumed liability through his manifestation of assent. Nor could the parties' words in creating the contract exclusively define the scope of liability; courts had to interpret, fill gaps, and even impose pre-contractual and quasi-contractual liability, either to make the parties' contract meaningful in its commercial context or to serve social interests other than individual choice, such as fairness. Because of the inherent limits of language and the infinite variability of facts, courts could not state doctrinal rules in such a way that they could be mechanically applied to all fact situations that might arise; moreover, the changing needs of commerce made it undesirable to attempt to do so …

As with classical law, neoclassical law can be evoked by presenting the image of its prototypical case as well as by describing its substance, method, and social role. The prototype of neoclassical contract posits parties in an economic relationship that is neither entirely isolated nor wholly encompassing. The parties seek individual advantage through the transaction, but their individual advantage is tied to the success of their mutual venture. The relationship arises through voluntary bargaining which defines the basic terms of the agreement, but the terms can only be understood by examining the context within which the agreement is reached, so that context sometimes supplies interpretations and additional terms.

Proceeding from this image, as a matter of substantive principle neoclassical contract law attempts to balance the individualist ideals [1288] of classical contract with communal standards of responsibility to others. The core remains the principle of freedom of contract, distinguishing contract from tort and other areas, but this principle is "tempered both within and without [contract's] formal structure by principles, such as reliance and unjust enrichment, that focus on fairness and the interdependence of parties rather than on parties' actual agreements." (Hillman, "The Crisis in Modern Contract Theory" (1988) 67 Texas Law Review 103 at 104). In deciding the scope of contractual liability, courts weigh the classical values of liberty, privacy, and efficiency against the values of trust, fairness, and cooperation, which have been identified as important by post-classical scholars … In contrast to classical law … neoclassical law tempers rigid logic by the use of policy analysis, empirical inquiry, and practical reason. Contract doctrine, more often formulated as general standards rather than mechanical rules, guides judges, sometimes quite strongly, but it allows them enough discretion in hard cases to reach just, socially desirable results.

Through this flexible body of principles and methods for their application, neoclassical contract serves the important social goal of supporting and regulating economic transactions. It does this in two general ways. First, it provides a framework for parties who engage in business planning. The framework helps them to create legal relations, to determine their content, to avoid them altogether, and to sort out difficulties when planning goes awry. Second, it provides a background set of norms for fair market relations. Even without the direct threat of enforcement, these norms are used by business people to set standards and limits for their conduct …

II. Death of contract theory

[1.25] [1289] The first challenge to neoclassical contract law to achieve wide attention was Grant Gilmore's pronouncement of the death of contract, first made in lectures in 1970 and published in 1974 … [T]he book created a storm of controversy, and the event set the stage for many of the critiques of contract that were to follow.

In The Death of Contract, Gilmore presented his own account of the rise and fall of classical contract law. Classical contract was the first general model of contract law, and it was heroically constructed out [1290] of little-known English cases to accord with the individualist ideology of the classical age. Langdell originated the model in his casebook and accompanying summary, Holmes provided philosophical support in The Common Law, and Williston filled out the doctrine in his treatise and in the Restatement of Contracts. "The theory seems to have been dedicated to the proposition that, ideally, no one should be liable to anyone for anything. Since the ideal was not attainable, the compromise solution was to restrict liability within the narrowest possible limits. Within those limits, however, liability was to be absolute." (Gilmore, 14)

Liability was limited in many ways. Strict formation rules required that the parties, not the court, dot the i's and cross the t's in the contract before it was binding. The formation rules exclusively defined contract liability; a person relied on another person's pre-contractual representations or conferred benefits on another without a contract at his own risk. The basic contract remedy was expectation damages, which were theoretically but often not practically fully compensatory; specific performance was seldom awarded, and punitive damages were out of the question because they belonged to the realm of tort law.

But the most powerful limitation on liability was the doctrine of bargained-for consideration, "newly-reformulated and put to some hitherto unsuspected uses." (Gilmore, 18) "Absent "consideration", the unhappy promisee has no right or claim. And nothing is "consideration" unless the parties have dealt with it on that footing." (Gilmore, 20) This narrow doctrine of consideration, once it was defined as the essence of classical contract law, was extended to a whole range of problems, such as the validity of offers stated to be open for a certain time and modification of existing contracts. In each case, the effect of the doctrine was to limit liability severely.

Classical contract was so extreme, however, that it could not long survive outside the rarefied air of law school classrooms. It suffered from the general defects of classical law. In particular, scholars such as Corbin demonstrated that it was inconsistent with much case law. Courts had, for example, often imposed contractual liability in situations in which there was not bargained-for exchange as required [1291] by the classical doctrine of consideration. Further, classical contract's individualist premises were undermined by the growing awareness of the validity of state intervention in the economy. After a schizophrenic period, which Gilmore illustrated by the clash of section 75 (on bargain consideration) and section 90 (on reliance) in the Restatement, judges avoided or manipulated the classical model and scholars ultimately rejected it. Since then, the boundaries of contract have been collapsing, allowing incursions by unjust enrichment in cases of benefit-based liability, by doctrines such as promissory estoppel in cases of reliance-based liability, and by tort law in areas such as products liability and third-party rights. As a result, contract law is being reabsorbed into tort law, which was before and now becomes again the residual category of civil liability.

The Death of Contract is good literature, bad history, and questionable theory … Mainstream contract scholars have revised Gilmore's death of contract thesis and assimilated the revision into neoclassical law. Gilmore's error, in this formulation, was to associate contract law too narrowly with the bargain model of contract. Classical contract may have been defective in emphasizing too strongly bargained-for exchanges, but modern contract law has substantially corrected the defect. All of the doctrines that Gilmore saw as undermining contract law have been drawn into it. Courts now provide remedies for pre-contractual reliance, fill gaps in parties' agreements, apply remedies flexibly, and so on. Bargain is no longer the exclusive principle in contract, but it is a substantial one that comfortably co-exists with newer elements such as reliance.

This interpretation misconceives the essence of Gilmore's argument. The death of contract thesis challenges the integrity of neoclassical contract law as an independent area of law and mode of [1292] inquiry; consequently, it undermines the substance and method of neoclassical contract law.

Neoclassical law retains a core assumption of classical contract law: that private agreement provides a distinctive area of legal and social process. This assumption defines the existence, independence, and scope of contract law. Contract law is distinct from tort law because the principles underlying promissory obligation are different than the principles underlying non-promissory obligation, and because exchange relationships are different than relationships that arise through accident or that do not have significant economic characteristics. Because distinctive factual, logical, and policy considerations underlie the definition of contract law, the rules about enforcement of contracts and remedies for breach are different than the liability rules and remedies applicable to situations not arising out of private agreement, such as to physical injuries addressed by tort law. The same considerations dictate the absence of liability in those cases falling within contract's traditional purview (situations of agreement and exchange) where the requirements of contract law have not been met.

The death of contract thesis challenges the distinctiveness of contract law. Its essential message is that contract is not really a special area in society or law, so the traditional justifications for contract doctrine are inadequate. Gilmore, restating the Realists' argument, asserted that contract is functionally identical to other areas of law. Contract law is simply another area in which the state exercises power by attaching positive and negative sanctions to forms of individual behavior; it is immaterial whether the behavior regulated is violating the standard of care for driving a car or for performing a promise.

Gilmore suggests two kinds of evidence, in law and in society, for contract's lack of distinctiveness. First, many doctrines have developed that have eroded the significance of bargain contract as a basis for liability. Promissory estoppel and unjust enrichment are two examples that have already been mentioned. Their influence has widened in recent years, so that traditional contract constructs such as the Statute of Frauds have become less important. Products liability [1293] has made much of contract warranty law obsolete. Most dramatically, the development of a general standard for civil obligation in a series of California cases has reduced the influence of contract law in a wide range of circumstances. Second, the prevailing social perception is that "[w]e are now all cogs in a machine, each dependent on the other" (Gilmore, at 95). In the transition from "nineteenth century individualism to the welfare state and beyond" (at 96), private agreement no longer seems to be a uniquely important form of social interaction. The second kind of evidence makes clear the significance of the first. What is most significant in the rise of non-bargain doctrines is not the number of cases that are now treated under the new rules, but the conceptual identity of all "contract" cases as resting on the imposition of liability for reasons of policy in an interdependent society.

A hypothetical illustrates the fusion of contract and tort and thereby the different ways of interpreting Gilmore's message. (This and subsequent examples are drawn from Hillman, above.) A television network (XYZ), in negotiations with a production company (MDM) concerning a spinoff series, encourages the company to begin producing the series prior to the conclusion of a formal agreement. The production company produces three episodes at a cost of three million dollars, but negotiations break down and no agreement is ever executed.

Under classical contract law, the network would not be liable to the production company because there was no express bargain supported by consideration. Under modern contract law, the network might be liable under promissory estoppel. This would be an application of the mainstream reformulation of the death of contract thesis; contract has correctly and successfully expanded to include reliance liability as an alternative to bargain. However, a death of contract theorist would point out that XYZ's liability in this case is not essentially contractual. MDM's loss is determined to be compensable because of the reasonableness of the relative conduct of both parties and the public policies that would be served by protecting MDM's reliance; for example, MDM has acted reasonably in beginning production, but XYZ has acted negligently in encouraging it [1294] to do so before an agreement has been consummated, and we wish to protect parties like MDM and discourage others from acting like XYZ. That the loss occurs in a setting which has characteristics which have traditionally caused contract law to be invoked is not decisive.

Assume instead that during the negotiations the network had expressly reserved the right not to contract with the production company, but MDM produced the episodes anyway. In that case, modern contract law would say that the bargain theory protects the network from liability, and reliance cannot intrude. XYZ's choice was shown by the express lack of consent, and it ought to be protected because it manifested a desire to avoid contract. MDM's reliance in the face of that manifestation is unreasonable, because express lack of bargain trumps unreasonable reliance.

From the death of contract perspective, however, that answer shows the inadequacy and arbitrariness of modern contract. The first hypothetical demonstrated that consent is only one of many concerns that are relevant to the determination of "contractual" liability. Also important are a very long list of other factors, that can be summarized doctrinally in a test such as the California six-part test for general civil liability alluded to above or that are often simply referred to as "public policy". The death of contract thesis asserts, therefore, that this hypothetical is no more exclusively a contract question than is the initial hypothetical. Whether MDM's reliance ought to be protected is determined on precisely the same basis as is any other question of law, including tort law.

Death of contract theory, then, denies the integrity of contract law. It suggests that scholars who would otherwise be concerned with contract law and theory should look outward to other fields of law and to other methods of inquiry. Doing so may produce a general theory of civil obligation or a new theory of contract. As it has happened, there has been movement in both of those directions, through metatheories and relational contract, covered in the next two sections.

III. Metatheory

[1.30] Taken to its extreme, the death of contract view that contract is not materially different in substance or method from other areas of [1295] legal inquiry could lead one to develop an approach that encompasses all legal events, deciding all cases or at least a large portion of them without regard for factual variations or traditional classifications. This kind of approach has been attempted by several groups of scholars, notably those that advocate economic analysis of law and rights or entitlements theories. I call this kind of an approach "metatheory", because it transcends the usual structures of legal analysis …

[1296] … A metatheory rejects contract's anti-theoretical posture by asserting that a systematic approach can determine the content of contract law. A systematic approach includes a limited set of fundamental principles and a defined method of applying them. Neither the principles nor the method are unique to contract law. Instead, the principles are common to the whole range of legal categories, and the method of their application does not vary from one category to another. The use of such a systematic approach means that the analysis operates only on a single dimension, thereby rejecting the multi-dimensional nature of neoclassical law …

Economic analysis of law begins with the hypothesis that people seek to maximize their welfare. It is implicit in this hypothesis that people respond to incentives, altering their behavior to increase their welfare. When people are allowed to shape their behavior to maximize their welfare, especially through voluntary exchanges with others, resources gravitate to their most valuable uses, increasing what is known as allocative efficiency. Allocative efficiency provides the economic criterion for evaluating legal doctrines and decisions. These core ideas have been developed and supplemented in a large, diverse body of literature on contract law and other subjects. The standard work on law and economics is R Posner Economic Analysis of Law.

If once the law and economics movement could have been accused of dogged but narrow application of a single idea, the charge cannot be made now. For example, law and economics scholars have addressed the peculiar problems of relational contracting and [1297] problems of transaction costs and lack of information that complicate economic analysis of contract issues. Nevertheless, all strains of the movement illustrate the turn to metatheory. Law and economics seems peculiarly well suited to examination of contract law because of its emphasis on voluntary exchange. However, proponents assert that economic thinking applies across the whole range of human behavior, and therefore across the whole range of law. In contract, as elsewhere, basic economic analysis can be applied to determine efficiency largely to the exclusion of other forms of analysis.

Rights or entitlement theories apply an equally rigorous, focused method, although their concern is with the morality of legal rules rather than with the rules' consequences. An entitlement theory begins with a moral principle about the individual's place among his fellows. Through philosophical reason, the principle is used to define the legal entitlements that a person should have, including how entitlements may be acquired, used, transferred, and protected: see C Fried, Contract as Promise (1981); Barnett "A Consent Theory of Contract" (1986) 86 Columbia Law Review 269 …

Suppose a television production company wishes to discharge a minor actress on its series to substitute a more popular one, figuring that it can pay the minor actress for her monetary loss and still profit from the presence of the substitute. Rights theorists would consider whether the minor actress's contract created an entitlement that may not be infringed, while law and economics scholars would consider whether the breach is efficient. Using either approach, the analysis could be quite complex, but it is focused by the demands of the theory in a way that everyday legal method is not.

[1298] The virtue of a metatheory is also its vice. From the neoclassical perspective, the attempt to recognize the commonalities among contractual and noncontractual situations may be valid and the attempt to make contract theory more rigorous may be useful, but the attempt to subject all situations to a limited theory is neither. "Attempts to reduce contract to a simple abstraction leave too much unexplained or distort too much to fit the theory." (Hillman, above, 122–3) …

The methodological premises of neoclassical law (anti-theoretical and multi-dimensional) and of metatheories (strongly theoretical and unidimensional) are fundamentally opposed to each other. Accordingly, metatheories necessarily provide a direct challenge to neoclassical law.

The difficulty of absorbing metatheoretical insights can be seen in neoclassical law's attempt to incorporate the economic concept of efficient breach. The theory of efficient breach asserts that a party ought to be encouraged to breach a contract where its gains from an alternative opportunity exceed the other party's losses from the breacher's non-performance. Neoclassical law has accepted this concept as a principle of contract remedies. However, it is important to define the way in which this concept has become part of the law. Neoclassical scholars have adopted this principle on the same basis that they make other legal judgments, by using the anti-theoretical, multi-dimensional neoclassical method, not through adoption of the metatheory in which the concept originated. The embrace of efficient breach is understandable; the concept seems to be a contemporary analogue to Holmes's notion that the only consequence of a breach is the duty to pay damages, and it nicely fits with the desire to define remedies that protect the expectation interest. [1299] Alternatively, if efficient breach had been adopted on the basis of efficiency, then how could arguments about efficiency have been resisted elsewhere in the law? To the extent that values other than efficiency or modes of analysis other than economic analysis are used, the metatheory has been rejected.

IV. Relational contract theory

[1.35] Relational contract theory, largely developed by Ian Macneil, is widely misunderstood and, as misunderstood, is usually shrugged off by mainstream scholars. Part of the misunderstanding may arise from Macneil's style of presentation, which usually does not observe the style of traditional legal scholarship; the greater share of the misunderstanding is due to the fundamental opposition between the goals and methods of relational contract theory and those of neoclassical scholarship. See Macneil, The New Social Contract (1980), "Contracts: Adjustment of Long Term Economic Relations Under Classical, Neoclassical and Relational Contract Law" (1978) 72 Northwestern University Law Review 854, "Values in Contract Law: Internal and External" (1983) 78 Northwestern University Law Review 340; the most concise statement of the theory is in "Relational Contract Theory as Sociology" (1987) 143 Journal of Institutional and Theoretical Economics 272, 274–6.

In the mainstream view, the core assertions of relational contract theory are that the dominant form of contract, relational contract, [1300] "occurs over time through continuous interactions between parties", so that "one must investigate the social conditions that form the foundation of parties' bargains in order to comprehend the relational norms and hence to understand contract." (Hillman, above at 124). Classical contract, with its focus on a distinct moment of contract formation, could not accommodate these concerns. However, mainstream scholars assert that, contrary to the opinion of relational extremists, modern contract law recognizes the existence of relational contracts, though not their dominance, and is well equipped to investigate the social contexts of such agreements to determine their legal effect. For example, where an actress in a TV series suddenly becomes very popular, whether her employer is required to renegotiate her contract depends on the parties' intentions, which can be determined accurately through neoclassical methods and doctrines by examining course of dealing, usage of trade, and the meaning of good faith in the context. Thus neoclassical contract already embodies the important parts of relational contract; the rest consists of unnecessary flights of theoretical fancy …

However, the mainstream view of relational contract is simplistic and partial. Relational contract theory begins with some very basic observations and insights about people's interaction in organized society. Any society in which specialization of labor exists will include exchange, and exchange always occurs in a relational context. In any society, even the most capitalistic, individualistic one, the production and distribution of goods and services is carried on through a variety of exchange mechanisms, of which discrete, self-maximizing [1301] exchange on a market (the paradigm of neoclassical contract) will be a very small part. More commonly, exchange occurs within relations that involve more elements and are of longer duration than does an isolated, discrete exchange. Moreover, even the most discrete contract is an event that is always situated within a framework of non-discrete relations which must be examined to understand the discrete contract. Accordingly, as an initial empirical and conceptual matter, thinking about contract ought to begin with relational exchange, not discrete contract. Recognizing, as neoclassical contract does, that some contracts are more extensive than discrete bargains is not enough; relational contract theory stresses that all contracts are relational to some extent, and truly relational contracts predominate.

The second step in relational contract theory is to examine in more detail the behavior exhibited by parties along the spectrum of discrete and relational exchange. All exchanges require certain kinds of behavior, such as a common means of communication between the parties, a minimum amount of solidarity, and some reciprocity.

Some exchanges are relatively discrete, involving short duration, limited party interactions, and precise measurement of the value of the objects exchanged. A common example is the purchase of gasoline by a traveller along a major highway in an area in which she has never been before and is not likely to be again. Notice, however, that the relational characteristics are important even in this discrete transaction: a common means of communication between the driver and the gas attendant, the use of a credit card, customs about pumping gas before requiring payment, etc.

Other exchanges are more relational, involving significant duration, many facets of the parties' lives, and the exchange of values that cannot easily be quantified. The employment relationship of a law school professor illustrates. The distinction between discrete and relational exchanges is perhaps the most important way of categorizing exchanges.

The different types of exchange behavior observed give rise to norms, "a case of an "is" creating an "ought."" The norms parallel the categories of behavior that have been conceptualized; some norms are common to all exchanges, while others are associated more strongly with discrete and relational exchanges, respectively. [1302] Solidarity and reciprocity, for example, are norms that are common to all contracts. In discrete contracts the norms of implementation of planning and effectuation of consent are intensified by the distinctive elements of discrete exchanges. On the other hand, in relational contracts other common contract norms, such as maintaining the integrity of one's role within the relation and harmonizing the relation with the surrounding social matrix, are more important because of the more extensive characteristics of relational exchanges.

In Macneil's view, these immanent norms can be developed and applied to constitute "more precise, intellectually coherent principles which are nevertheless sufficiently open-textured for effective use in the law of modern contractual relations." When used to analyze a particular situation, this conceptual framework certainly emphasizes different elements more than does neoclassical law, and arguably provides a richer analysis. In addition, the framework brings to light certain features of many exchanges that neoclassical law undervalues or ignores because of its emphasis on relatively discrete, value-maximizing agreements. Values other than wealth maximization figure importantly in exchanges, even discrete contracts and market exchanges because the non-economic, non-market aspects of relations pervade market transactions. Sometimes relations are not mutually favorable to all parties because they arise out of social situations of inequality, so the values may include elements of coercion and dependence, contrary to the neoclassical assumption of rough equality. In other situations, values such as trust, cooperation, reciprocity, and role integrity are essential to the relationship.

Relational contract theory goes one step further and considers the difference between examining the norms of a relation and imposing norms through legal intervention. Even where the legal system articulates and applies the same norm as is internally generated in the relation, imposing the norm on the relation from the outside transforms the norm and has different practical consequences than [1303] would internal generation of it. Imposing a norm of proper dealing between workers and managers through the National Labor Relations Act results in a much different situation than would arise through the spontaneous development of the same norm within a firm. As before, important differences arise in the imposition of discrete and relational norms. Thus, neoclassical contract's assumptions about the effects of contract law on people's behavior are inadequately developed.

Relational contract presents a fundamental challenge to the assumptions, method, and content of neoclassical law. It does not simply provide modest insights about non-discrete exchanges and the importance of context that can be absorbed by neoclassical contract. A brief relational discussion of the hypothetical about the obligation to renegotiate the popular TV actress's contract illustrates the difference.

The neoclassical treatment of the hypothetical focuses on the discrete agreement between the actress and her employer and uses limited relational context to ascertain the parties' actual or constructive intentions as to the right to renegotiate. In the relational view, this is a fundamental error. The parties' actual intentions are only one element of the setting, and framing the issue as one concerning their supposed intentions leads down the wrong path. Relational contract would begin by associating the situation more closely with either a discrete or relational prototype; in this case, probably the latter. That association suggests the norms that figure into the controversy most strongly. Although it is very difficult to discuss relational contracts in the bare hypothetical style of neoclassical contract, the norms of flexibility and contractual solidarity probably would be very important here. Returning to the factual setting, broadly construed, the court would consider how those norms are manifest in the parties' action, the community's actions and understanding, the broader society's values, and the legal system's principles. That inquiry suggests the choices to be made: not what would the parties have done, but what kind of relationship is most desirable in this setting. What the parties would have done is but one element that goes into that assessment. Finally, the effect of legal intervention in support of these norms must be considered. This may be particularly troublesome in the setting described, because [1304] the resort to law may upset the operation of several of the most important values of the relation; imposing a norm of flexibility may cause parties to be more precise in specifying the terms of their contracts and therefore less flexible.

At this point advocates of relational contract and neoclassical contract share a similar problem. Once the problem of norms has been framed, how is it to be decided? To some extent, that is less important than the framing itself; relational contract improves the process of understanding what is at stake in a dispute, so it is a more desirable method on those grounds. Relational contract theory suggests that solving the problem begins with the definition of norms which are immanent in the context. To some extent that definition suggests a solution, but in a complex relation the norms may be very complicated. Furthermore, the solution also depends on harmonization with the social matrix, which is everything in society that is conceptualized as being mostly outside the particular contract. Harmonization with the social matrix introduces the possibility of also applying diffuse norms and values not arising out of the relation; there must be a fit between the relational solution and more general values. Thus, the application of the norms identified, internal and external, may be more or less determinate. In the hypothetical, it is something of an open question whether contractual solidarity indicates that the actress ought to stick to her deal because television production is a risky business or that her employer ought to share its windfall with her. When the application of norms is less determinate, relational theory may raise more questions than it answers, but the questions tend to be different ones than are raised by neoclassical contract law.

V. Empirical contract theory

[1.40] One of the things that relational contract does better than neoclassical contract is to investigate the ways in which contracting operates in the world and the ways in which contract law affects contracting behavior. This type of investigation has been the particular focus of empirical contract theory. "Empirical" and "theory" may seem to be an odd conjunction, but empirical contract theory depends on both empirical study and conceptualization of the results of the study.

Neoclassical scholars believe that contract law is detached yet functional. Law is the province of lawyers and judges, and it is shaped by them through the professional discourse of legal reasoning. [1305] Law is not for lawyers, though; it serves the needs of the society. Contract law, in particular, facilitates commerce by permitting parties to invoke or avoid legal obligation, providing standards that define the legal consequences of different types of behavior (thereby providing direct incentives through legal sanctions and indirect incentives through the threat of sanctions), and, more generally, establishing a set of background norms that define legitimate market relations. In sum, contract law is a significant immediate and background force in everyday economic relations. Empirical contract theory disputes this picture of contract law's functional role. In the empirical view, contract law is not irrelevant to the world of commerce, but it is of much more limited relevance than neoclassical law assumes. Indeed, one cannot speak in accurate general terms about the relevance of contract law; when contract law does operate, it does so in particular ways, to particular parties, in particular situations, and only empirical investigation can make clear those particularities. Empirical contract's focus on particularity makes it difficult to generalize about the use and non-use of contract law, but in this section I summarize some of the findings of the school. Especially useful introductions are Macaulay, "An Empirical View of Contract" (1985) Wisconsin Law Review 465, and "Elegant Models, Empirical Pictures, and the Complexities of Contract" (1977) 11 Law & Society Review 507.

The most general finding of empirical contract theory is the marginality of contract law in the world of commerce. As a general matter, the substance and form of state-enforced norms and the system [1306] of adjudication through which they are invoked are not among the most important elements of the incentive structure facing people in business. Other factors, such as relations with one's suppliers and customers, the need for prompt performance, and advantages in market situations are usually more important. Therefore, when "contracting", people do not usually consciously shape their conduct to conform to the requirements of the law or to achieve certain legal effects; indeed, often business people are unlikely to know of the content of the law or of the legal consequences of their actions. Even when disputes arise, the law tends to figure less prominently in parties' approaches to resolving the disputes than do non-legal factors, such as norms of the business community and economic considerations.

If law in general is marginal, contract law is even more marginal. Contract law has long been thought of as general and residual, concerned with behavior that more specific bodies of law do not treat adequately or at all. In contracting, though, those more specific bodies of law figure more prominently than the law of the Restatement of Contracts and the Uniform Commercial Code. Statutory and administrative regulation, such as labor and corporate law, are more likely to affect behavior than the residual and therefore marginal law of contract. In terms of process, forums other than courts adjudicating contract law disputes are often used when legal intervention is desired.

Business people are not irrational in giving short shrift to contract law. Legal form and legal liability typically have a relatively low position in the incentive structure of people in business. However, paying little attention to law is not the same as not being careful and deliberative. People in business plan a great deal, but relatively little of that planning is primarily directed at achieving a particular legal position. Furthermore, their behavior reflects the common phenomenon that rationality among real people is not the self-interested market calculating conceived by economic analysis or by neoclassical contract, but the less analytical process of life in a community. People in commercial communities, like people in other communities, often observe customary practices and standards without regard for their immediate self-interest, sometimes even to the detriment of their immediate interest.

[1307] Of course, contract law is used sometimes, both as a planning tool and as a means of dispute resolution. When it is used, it is seldom used in the way posited by neoclassical law: as a means of effectuating general public values. The parties themselves are only concerned with obtaining some advantage, not with effectuating the law's values. As Stewart Macaulay, doyen of empirical contract theory states, "Loopholes, salvage operations, the bureaucratic process of debt collection, and evasions of responsibility account for a large proportion of contract activity found in the real world of the courts." In none of these instances is the process designed to or likely to further academic values such as "protecting legitimate expectations". The process of implementing values is profoundly influenced by factors both inside and outside contract law, such as the limits of the remedies provided by contract law and the availability and cost of lawyers. This can be seen clearly by imagining a typical negotiation about a contract dispute, in which the parties' rights under contract law often are not the most important factor determining how the dispute is resolved. Likely to be more important are the costs of litigation, the relative economic positions of the parties, and their familiarity with the legal process involved. Moreover, even the notion of contract rights is often unhelpful; the law's values and their doctrinal embodiment are so vague and conflicting that results are largely indeterminate.

Finally, empirical theory suggests that when contract law does operate, it always operates in context. This is a point more general than the neoclassical notion that courts must be attentive to setting in deciding cases. It indicates that the neoclassical paradigm of a market transaction between parties, each of whom has significant bargaining power, is misleading, and that therefore the idea of a general law of contract is illusory. Although there are contexts of relative equality among bargainers, other kinds of settings are much more numerous. There are competitive contexts in which the economic dependence of one party on another is the essential feature so that bargaining is one-sided. An example is the relationship between a small financially weak supplier of component parts and a much more powerful buyer, such as an automobile manufacturer. There are contexts in which dependence is heightened by the extensiveness of the relationships between [1308] the parties and there is little bargaining at all. The position of an ordinary employee in a large enterprise illustrates. There are contexts in which norms of cooperation and continuity predominate, and contexts in which those norms are virtually absent. Each of these contexts requires a different treatment, and the differences make general principles of contract law not particularly useful as tools for structuring analysis.

What all this suggests is that the neoclassical assumption that contract law is detached lawyer's law is accurate, but that its assumption that the lawyers' process produces a socially effective product is inaccurate …

Empirical theory goes on to suggest what contract law does do, as well as what it does not do. Contract law is not an important tool of commercial regulation, but it does have a purpose: It is primarily an arena for the production of professional ideology and elite values about commercial behavior, and secondarily a self-serving exercise for law professors …

VI. Critical contract theory

[1.45] The most extensive challenge to neoclassical contract, and in some respects the one that incorporates elements of all the others, is provided by critical contract theory. Critical legal studies has been widely attacked, in part because its tenets have been misunderstood, but also in part because its underlying message has been understood very well. Critical legal studies sometimes is regarded as merely a collection of well-known insights, such as that legal doctrine is not susceptible to mechanical application and that deciding cases involves a clash of conflicting values. Alternatively, it is attacked [1309] for being unsupported by the evidence, exaggerated, destructive, and for lacking an affirmative program. Each of these criticisms misstates important elements of critical contract theory and its relation to neoclassical law.

If critical legal studies can be said to have a core assertion, it is this: The conventional understanding of law is that it is presumed to be true, valid, and useful in an essentially non-ideological way, while law actually is a constructed reality, the form, substance, and method of which conceals its problematic, controversial, and ideological nature.

In the conventional, neoclassical understanding, contract law successfully regulates a distinct area of social interaction, the area of private agreements. The area is distinct in that all private agreements share more important characteristics with each other than they do with other forms of social intercourse. The regulation is successful because contract law reconciles private autonomy (freedom of contract) with public concerns (such as fairness) through a body of principles and a decision method that focus courts' attention on important social facts, public policies, and moral principles. While the reconciliation is never perfect, it does adapt well to problems that arise in the doctrine and to changing social conditions. Because the body of contract doctrine is predictable yet flexible, it effectively guides and controls parties' conduct.

In the critical understanding, contract law does none of these things, but it presents a powerful ideological image that does all of them. The discussion which follows in the text particularly draws on R Unger, The Critical Legal Studies Movement (1986); Dalton, "An Essay in the Deconstruction of Contract Doctrine" (1985) 94 Yale Law Journal 997; Feinman: "Critical Approaches to Contract Law" (1983) 30 UCLA Law Review 829, "Promissory Estoppel and Judicial Method" (1984) 97 Harvard Law Review 678, "The Meaning of Reliance: A Historical Perspective" (1984) Wisconsin Law Review 1373; Gabel & Feinman, "Contract Law as Ideology", in The Politics of Law 172 (D Kairys ed, 1982); and Kennedy, "Form and Substance in Private Law Adjudication" (1976) 89 Harvard Law Review 1685.

The beginning point, contract – the concept of a realm of private transactions – is itself a representation of social reality, rather than an element of an objective social reality. Classical contract law represented a world of totally autonomous individuals, free [1310] to transact on any terms they wished and thereby to control their own destinies. Neoclassical law presents a different image, of relatively autonomous individuals transacting in an environment regulated by trade custom and state intervention that alleviates the most extreme hardships of the market. Neither of these images is "true" or "accurate", but each of them first directs attention to the individual as the basic unit of social organization and to the extent to which the individual is an independent social actor, and then suggests that the interactions of individuals (in neoclassical law, within a regulated market) makes the existing social, economic, and political order essentially just and fair.

This type of ideological representation is especially powerful because it appears to be immanent in the definition of the situations addressed by contract law. For neoclassical law, the arrangement between an actress and her employer is not something that should be treated as a contracts case, it is a contracts case, so that all the imagery and values embodied in contract law are immediately present without being consciously invoked. This point, like the related point made by death of contract theory, presents a fundamental challenge to contract law, because it demonstrates that contract cases are not necessarily contracts cases; rather, they are social events that await classification and conceptualization by one or more of the many available bodies of law.

Although the implicit justification for this image is the status quo, for contract scholars and lawyers the perception of fairness rests on and is developed through the reconciliation of the traditional principle of freedom of contract and modern principles such as fairness and cooperation. Freedom of contract, of course, is grounded in the concept of choice: people should be free to choose which contracts they will enter into, on what terms, and which contracts they will avoid. Choice is restrained, however, by considerations of fairness, as to the means and ends of contracting. Most often, fairness is defined by conventional standards of market behavior.

[1311] For critical theory, the notion of choice and the accepted means of regulating it are inadequate bases for legal doctrine and decision. The concept of choice suggests that one's choice in entering into a contract is subsequently binding through legal enforcement, subject to qualifications introduced by fairness concerns. In every breach of contract case, however, the breaching party has made two choices: one to make a promise and second to fail to honor the promise. Deciding which of those choices to honor must depend on something other than the concept of protecting freedom of choice and binding people to their choices.

That something else is the set of principles and policies that underlie contract law. The arguments in support of a particular decision or rule, or of contract law as a whole, are seldom presented in a systematic way. The multi-dimensional, anti-theoretical nature of neoclassical contract causes this lack of order at the same time as it obscures it. Arguments about the legitimate expectations of the parties, the requirements of the factual setting, the bindingness of choice, or various "policies" are quite common but wholly unsatisfactory. Nevertheless, the principled basis of contract can be ordered in several meaningful ways.

One useful ordering of this material, and a common one in the critical literature, is to suggest that it coheres around two competing social visions, generally referred to as individualism and collectivism (or communitarianism). These two visions originate in a basic fact of human existence: other people are necessary for the development of one's personality and for the conditions of life, but they also threaten to inhibit one's freedom and harm one's way of life. This is the so-called fundamental contradiction: see Kennedy, "The Structure of Blackstone's Commentaries" (1979) 28 Buffalo Law Review 205, 211–18.

Individualism posits a world of independent actors, each of whom pursues her own subjectively determined interests without regard for the interests of others. Collectivism assumes a world of individuals who are essentially social beings that accept the benefits and responsibilities that come from living in society, which includes having others be concerned about them and showing equal concern for others.

[1312] In the critical view, neither social vision separately, nor both together, provide a determinate basis for neoclassical contract law. Because both individualist and collectivist social visions inhere in the human condition, a body of law based entirely on one of them at the expense of the other would be fundamentally illegitimate. Such a body of law would be unrealizable as well; the individualist and collectivist visions are so abstract that they do not provide a particular content for a body of law. Together, the visions present fundamental oppositions on every issue of doctrine. Critical analytic methods, including especially deconstruction, reveal these oppositions in cases that neoclassical law regards as easily settled.

What would be needed to resolve this opposition, in the absence of a determinate substantive content of contract law, is a determinate method of legal analysis. Usually neoclassical discussions of legal method are very vague. Nevertheless, the main elements of neoclassical method are clear, involving some application of precedent, some exercise of situation-sense, and some normative analysis.

In a particularized instance of the kind of ideological imagery discussed earlier, many neoclassical cases are addressed either through the simple application of doctrine or through the analysis of the facts out of which the case arises, in the expectation that either the doctrine or the facts bears an obviously correct solution. Both of these approaches obscure the complexity of the factual settings, which may be conceptualized in many different ways, and the opposition of values inherent in the doctrine. More troublesome cases may be subjected to policy analysis, in which competing values and interests are balanced to achieve a correct result. But balancing requires a scale, an objective measure by which the weights of the policies can be assessed and compared. The subjectivity of values in liberal society and the fundamental conflict between individual and collective interests deny that sort of objectivity.

Thus critical theory asserts that contract has neither a determinate content nor determinate method. Given the time that has been spent on this sort of discussion one would have thought it would be clear by now. However, there is a constant confusion, deliberate or otherwise, of the critical argument – doctrine is indeterminate – with the conventional argument – results frequently are predictable. Whether a particular promise should be enforced cannot be objectively decided within the bounds of neoclassical discourse. But that [1313] is not to say that we cannot predict how a court is likely to decide the question. Results are predictable, for reasons that bring us back to our starting point. While the choices available to a court are theoretically indeterminate, judges typically do not have a sense of that indeterminacy. The ideological function of contract law is to conceal those choices, to make results seem determinate when they are not.

This process of concealment is neither random nor accidental. Contract law may have a limited role for people who contract, but it has a significant role for lawyers and especially for scholars of contract law. Contract law is one of the arenas in which people develop and internalize images of society and of their role in it that justify their position and reduce alienation. As contract law is one realm of elite ideology, the concealment it produces typically legitimates the status quo. It is through this legitimation, rather than through the direct influence of doctrine, that contract can be seen as basically a conservative force; contract in the first instance oppresses understanding and imagination, not the underprivileged, but it is the lack of understanding and imagination that is a principal guardian of privilege.

VII. Conclusion: theories and theorists

[1.50] Most of contract law in casebooks, courts, and commerce deals with mundane transactions. Occasionally, though, an unusual or dramatic case becomes a vehicle for defining and testing our vision. One such case is Local 1330, United Steel Workers v United States Steel Corp (6th Cir 1980) 492 F Supp 1 (ND Ohio), aff'd 631 F 2d 1264, one of the first of a group of recent cases in which common law doctrines have been invoked to protect workers from the consequences of plant closings. In Local 1330, the workers asserted that promissory estoppel barred US Steel from closing two steel mills in Youngstown, Ohio, because company officials had stated that the mills would remain open if the workers improved the mills' [1314] profitability. The opinions of the district court and court of appeals revealed sensitive understanding both of the enormous importance of the case to the plaintiffs and their community and of the possibilities for remedy through contract law. Both courts rejected the plaintiffs' claim, though, because the doctrinal requirements of Restatement (Second) section 90 had not been met.

This is a representative neoclassical result. Contract law is seldom a vehicle for acts that are politically controversial or disruptive of the established economic and political order. If, within neoclassical law, the court had reached a conclusion favoring the plaintiffs, the result probably would have been a modest one, such as providing for severance pay as reliance damages, rather than a dramatic one, such as recognizing ownership rights in a factory arising from long-term employment and economic dependence. If the result had been dramatic, over time its radical potential would have been moderated by pressures from the social and legal settings.

This case embodies the strengths and limits of neoclassical contract. Because neoclassical law is not deterministic, the judges can consider the national economic transformation which produced the case and the workers' heroic struggle to save their jobs. However, because neoclassical law is structured by doctrine and by the social images which doctrine represents, the judges tend to limit the influence of such considerations on the decision. The doctrine and images focus the judges' inquiry more narrowly on issues such as the presence of a particular promise, as happened in Local 1330. Thus neoclassical contract is unlikely to be an effective vehicle for a thoroughgoing examination of the issues involved in such an important case.

[1315] This conclusion flows from the link between theories and the theorists who create and apply them. The critical message of indeterminacy suggests that Local 1330 could have come out very differently; neoclassical doctrine and principles include elements that theoretically could have been used for a radical result in the case. But neoclassical theory is associated with and used by theorists and judges of mainstream political and professional orientations, so the opportunities created by the indeterminacy are seldom realized.

The next question is whether any of the non-mainstream contract theories are likely to be better vehicles for dealing with this situation in all its fullness. In each case, the question concerns how the theory is likely to be applied by its adherents, not how some logic inherent in the theory compels the approach. From that perspective, each theory may be useful in different ways. A dramatic limiting case such as Local 1330 seems to validate elements of the theories' critiques of neoclassical law and reinforce their own strengths.

Death of contract theory asserts the lack of integrity of contract law and contract's identity with other areas of law. If contract is not distinct, then Local 1330 usefully can be addressed as a property case, or a tort case, or through some more generalized mode of analysis. Those avenues raise issues not easily seen through the lens of contract. When the insight about the common nature of many legal questions is extended, as it is by critical theory, then even more possibilities arise.

Metatheories likewise can suggest different ways of looking at a problem such as this. The weakness of a metatheory becomes especially apparent here, however. An issue so complex cannot be adequately addressed by a theory that proceeds rigorously from a limited basis. For example, neither the workers' interests nor the [1316] economic and social consequences of a court's decision to intervene or not can be easily captured in an analysis oriented exclusively toward efficiency.

Contrarily, relational contract theory seems especially powerful for multifaceted issues. Its employment of the relational contract as the prototype for analysis broadens the scope of factual inquiry far beyond specific acts of the workers' reliance on specific representations of their bosses. Its more complex normative structure frames many of the value issues involved as well. Both of these aspects are especially relevant in a case such as this, in which non-legal norms and the social matrix are intimately involved in the legal decision.

In support of that recognition of non-legal factors, empirical contract theory emphasizes the limited significance of contract law in dealing with events such as these. Both retrospectively, in dealing with the Youngstown crisis, and prospectively, in formulating legal standards for plant closings and similar events, contract law is only one of many forums in which the issues are disputed, and probably not the most important forum at that. Empirical contract theory cautions that the consequences of legal actions must be investigated, not assumed, especially in large events.

Finally, critical contract theory is particularly well suited for thinking about a case like Local 1330. Critical theory first reveals the extent to which structures of power are embedded in seemingly neutral constructs, like US Steel's "ownership" of the plants and the workers' need to prove "reliance" on a "promise". Once those structures are understood to be constructed ideology rather than factual or logical necessity, the case can be seen to involve the most fundamental issues about the way people live their lives in our society, and critical theory provides some devices for resolving those issues.

Considering more directly the political consequences of different contract theories presents one more view of the theories' significance and their relative merits. Here is a tentative but reasonable prediction on how different contract theorists would feel about extending the law to provide a remedy for the workers in Local 1330. At one extreme, law and economics and entitlements [1317] metatheorists are usually politically conservative, so one would expect them to be reluctant to constrain US Steel's freedom of action except in a limited way in a particularly egregious case. At the other extreme, critical scholars are left or left-leaning, so they would be more likely to favor empowering the workers. Everyone else would fall in between, without obvious differences. Just as an impression, empirical scholars tend to be more left-liberal than the average among neoclassical scholars. Relational scholars are diverse; Macneil himself seems drawn to small-is-beautiful politics, though perhaps of a conservative sort. It is difficult to predict how each of these would come out on Local 1330, although they are likely to be more sensitive to the possibilities for remedy and the limits of legal intervention.

There is a different political dimension that ought to be considered, too, namely the professional ideology of legal academics. The defining question here is how to reconcile the tension between law teachers' role as members of the legal profession who are responsible for training practicing lawyers with their positions as university academics engaged in independent scholarship. Neoclassical scholars largely adopt as their own the standards of the practicing branch of the profession, so that neoclassical scholarship resembles a slightly more abstract and detached form of normal legal reasoning. Non-mainstream scholars lean more to the academic side of their role, though in different ways. Metatheorists favor scientific or philosophical method, often but not always in support of established legal norms. Empirical theorists simultaneously focus more on law-in-action and lawyers' practice while they employ non-lawyerly methods, such as sociological investigation. Relational theorists seem more heavily academic. Critical scholars are critical in the technical sense of the term, which connotes the use of non-traditional academic inquiry that addresses practical issues in seemingly impractical ways. Death of Contract scholars, if there are any, are again idiosyncratic ….

[1318] Neoclassical scholarship is inescapably the scholarship of the center, of the status quo. Metatheory is the scholarship of the right, using claims of scientific or philosophical objectivity in support of conservative politics. Relational contract, empirical contract, and death of contract theory are more academic forms of scholarship that depart from the intellectual and political mainstream, and are therefore somewhat threatening to the center. Critical theory is the scholarship of radical alternatives. Seen that way, politics, broadly understood, is an important basis for the choice among contract theories.

Contract Law: Fulfilling the Reasonable Expectations of Honest Men

[1.60] J Steyn (A Lord of Appeal in Ordinary), "Contract Law: Fulfilling the Reasonable Expectations of Honest Men" (1997) 113 Law Quarterly Review 433.

A thread runs through our contract law that effect must be given to the reasonable expectations of honest men. Sometimes this is made explicit by judges; more often it is the implied basis of the court's decision. I would like to examine what this means, and to relate it to some parts of English contract law. It is an important subject for the future development of English contract law.

The modern view is that the reason for a rule is important. The rule ought to apply where reason requires it, and no further. But often the real purpose of a rule is debatable. The question can then only be solved by rational argument, and a judgment by an impartial judge. Once the purpose of a rule has been identified by effective and proper adjudication, it is an important and legitimate matter to enquire whether the rule as formulated fulfils that purpose. If it appears not to fulfil the purpose, it is potentially defective. At the very least a judge, and particularly an appellate court, is then entitled to re-examine the law to make doubly sure that the law indeed commands that a rule must be applied that does not make sense. Usually, it will be found, on conscientious and rigorous re-examination, that the common law solution is one which is meaningful and in accord with common sense. In that process of re-examination a judge is entitled to take into account that simple fairness ought to be the basis of every legal rule and, in a common law case, that the presumption in favour of the fair solution is powerful. These considerations are the framework in which one must approach the proposition that in contract law effect must be given to the reasonable expectations of honest men.

That leads me to a preliminary distinction. It is a defensible position for a legal system to give predominance to the subjective intentions of the parties. Such a policy can claim to be committed to the ideal of perfect individualised justice. But that is not the English way. Our law is generally based on an objective theory of contract. This involves adopting an external standard given life by using the concept of the reasonable man. The commercial advantage of the English approach is that it promotes certainty and predictability in the resolution of contractual disputes. And, as a matter of principle, it is not unfair to impute to contracting parties the intention that in the event of a dispute a neutral judge should decide the case applying an objective standard of reasonableness. That is then the context in which in English law one should interpret the proposition that effect must be given to the reasonable expectations of honest men.

The objective theory of contract

[1.65] [434] It is possible to refine the meaning of the proposition. Once one uses the external standard of reasonableness the reference to honest men adds little. Although the hypothetical reasonable man pursues his own commercial self-interest he is by definition not dishonest. The proposition can therefore be re-defined simply to say that the law must respect the reasonable expectations of the contracting parties. That brings me to consider what the reasonable expectations of the parties means. The expectations that will be protected are those that are, in an objective sense, common to both parties (Reiter and Swan, "Contracts and the Protection of Reasonable Expectations" in Studies in Contract Law, ed Reiter and Swan (1980), 1 at p 7). The law of contract is generally not concerned with the subjective expectations of a party. The law does not protect unreasonable expectations. It protects only expectations which satisfy an objective criterion of reasonableness. Reasonableness is a familiar concept and no definition is necessary. But it is, of course, right to stress that reasonableness postulates community values. It refers not to the standards of Lord Eldon's day. It is concerned with contemporary standards not of moral philosophers but of ordinary right thinking people. Sometimes those standards will receive their distinctive colour from the context of a consumer transaction, a business transaction or even a transnational financial transaction. And the usages and practices of dealings in those disparate fields will be prime evidence of what is reasonable.

It is of some relevance to consider the status of our proposition. It is certainly not a rule of law. It is possible to argue that it is a general principle of law, such as, for example, the principle that no man may benefit from his own wrongdoing. I prefer to regard it as the central objective of the law of contract. The function of the law of contract is to provide an effective and fair framework for contractual dealings. This function requires an adjudication based on the reasonable expectations of parties. It is right to acknowledge, however, that the reasonable expectations of parties cannot always prevail. Sometimes they must yield to countervailing principles and policies. For example, other values enshrined in law and public policy may render the contract defeasible. Nevertheless, the aim of protecting reasonable expectations remains constant (Reiter and Swan, op cit, supra at p 6).

It is now possible to examine how the English law of contract measures up to this policy. Inevitably, I will have to be selective. But I hope to look at topics that are of considerable practical importance. The first relates to the formation of contracts.

Offer and acceptance

[1.70] The classical doctrine is that a contract can only come into existence by the congruence of a matching offer and acceptance. As a general proposition this makes sense. But it does not solve all cases satisfactorily. Take, for example, the so-called battle of the forms cases, notably in the [435] field of negotiations for the conclusion of building and engineering contracts. Each party insists on contracting only on his own standard conditions. In the meantime the work starts. Payments are made. Often it is a fiction to identify an offer and acceptance. Yet reason tells us that neither party should be able to withdraw unilaterally from the transaction. The reasonable expectations of the parties, albeit that they are still in disagreement about minor details of the transaction, often demand that the court must recognise that a contract has come into existence. The greater the evidence of reliance, and the further along the road towards implementation the transaction is, the greater the prospect that the court will find a contract made and do its best, in accordance with the reasonable expectations of the parties, to spell out the terms of the contract (G Percy Trentham Ltd v Archital Luxfer Ltd [1993] 1 Lloyd's Rep 25).

The doctrine of privity

[1.75] That brings me to a serious blemish in the English law of contract. Some eighty years ago, in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge Co Ltd [1915] AC 847 the House of Lords held that English law does not recognise a contract for the benefit of a third party ….

Despite the condemnation by many judges and academic writers the privity rule still lingers on. The rule was laid down as being a self-evident proposition of logic. But the logic was flawed. It is indeed obvious that a bilateral contract cannot impose a burden on a stranger. But if for commercial or other good reasons two parties agree that one will confer a benefit on a third party, and the latter accepts the benefit, no legal logic demands that the stipulation be denied effect. Certainly, the doctrine of [436] consideration poses no problem: ex hypothesi the stipulation for the benefit of a third party is part of an agreement involving an exchange of promises between the contracting parties. The ruling in Dunlop Pneumatic is inconsistent with the prime function of the law of contract, which is to facilitate commercial dealings. It ignores the fact that parties in good faith rely on the agreement for the benefit of a third party. It fails to take into account that businessmen, for sensible reasons, sometimes wish to enter into such promises in favour of third parties. Confidence in promises is the lifeblood of commerce; and there can be no confidence if parties are not obliged to perform their promises. The privity rule causes particular difficulties where main contractors, subcontractors and consultants are linked in a network of contracts. The privity rule also frequently prevents a party to a bilateral contract from taking out an insurance policy for the benefit of a third party. Where there is no statutory inroad on the privity rule such a stipulation is unenforceable. Take also the common example of a buyer of goods from a distributor. As part of the distributorship agreement between the manufacturer and distributor a manufacturer's warranty is given for the benefit of the buyer. No consideration passes from the buyer to the manufacturer. The manufacturer's warranty is a classic contract for the benefit of a third party. It would be a serious defect in our contract law if businessmen were precluded by legal doctrine from conferring such benefits on third parties. Not surprisingly, judges display much ingenuity in inventing exceptions to the rule to avoid the inconvenience and unfairness of the rule. It is also noteworthy that a contract for the benefit of a third party is recognised in the legal systems of most European countries, as well as in much of the common law world, including the United States, New Zealand and parts of Australia. In an excellent report the English Law Commission has recommended that the rule be reversed by statute (Privity of Contract: Contracts for the Benefit of Third Parties, Law Com No 242, Cm 3329 (1996) [This recommendation has now been implemented: see below, Chapter 11 – eds]). Given decades of procrastination one would hope that the proposed legislation will now be enacted speedily. It is to be noted, however, that the Bill provides that the legislation should not be construed as preventing judicial development of third party rights. That is important because the legislation may not be comprehensive. The Law Commission's proposals require identification of the third party by name, as a member of a class or as answering a particular description. It may not give a remedy in all cases. It may therefore still be desirable for the House of Lords to review Dunlop Pneumatic in a suitable case.

The doctrine of consideration

[1.80] This brings me to the related topic of consideration. The classic model of English contract law is a bargain: and a bargain postulates an exchange. Consideration is therefore historically a fundamental doctrine of English law. Almost 90 pages are devoted to it in the ninth and latest edition of [437] Professor Treitel's book on contract law. At first glance it seems a highly technical doctrine. The question may be asked why the law should refuse to sanction a transaction for want of consideration where parties seriously intend to enter into legal relations and arrive at a concluded agreement. If the court refuses to enforce such a transaction for no reason other than that the parties neglected to provide for some minimal or derisory consideration, is it not arguably a decision contrary to good faith and the reasonable expectations of the parties? Some of these considerations may have led Lord Goff of Chieveley in The Pioneer Container ([1994] 2 AC 324, 335; see also White v Jones [1995] AC 207, 262–3; The Mahkutai [1996] AC 650, 663–5) to say that it is now open to question how long the principles of privity of contract and consideration will continue to be maintained. In my view the case for abandoning the privity rule is made out. But I have no radical proposals for the wholesale review of the doctrine of consideration. I am not persuaded that it is necessary. And great legal changes should only be embarked on when they are truly necessary. First, there are a few cases where even in modern times courts have decided that contractual claims must fail for want of consideration. On the other hand, on careful examination it will usually be found that such claims could have been decided on other grounds, eg the absence of an intention to enter into legal relations or the fact that the transaction was induced by duress. Once a serious intention to enter into legal relations and a concluded agreement is demonstrated in a commercial context there is virtually a presumption of consideration which will almost invariably prevail without a detailed search for some technical consideration (see The Eurymedon [1975] AC 154, 167). On balance it seems to me that in modern practice the restrictive influence of consideration has markedly receded in importance. Secondly, it seems to me that in recent times the courts have shown a readiness to hold that the rigidity of the doctrine of consideration must yield to practical justice and the needs of modern commerce. The landmark case is the decision of the Court of Appeal in 1990 in Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 QB 1. The important question arose whether there is sufficient consideration where one contracting party promised to pay an additional sum to the other contracting party simply in return for a further promise by the latter to perform his already existing contractual obligations. The orthodox view would have been that there was no consideration. But the Court of Appeal unanimously held that the defendants were bound by their promise since there was consideration in the form of the practical benefit inherent in the transactions. The court was obviously concerned that the doctrine of consideration should not restrict the ability of commercial contractors to make periodic consensual modifications, and even one-sided modifications, as the work under a construction contract proceeded. The [438] reasonable expectations of the parties prevailed over technical and conceptualistic reasoning.

Good faith

[1.85] Next I turn to the approach of English law to the concept of good faith. In the new jus commune of Europe there is a general principle that parties must negotiate in good faith, conclude contracts in good faith and carry out contracts in good faith. The important point to note is that in exercising his rights and performing his duties each party must act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing. And the parties may not exclude this duty (Principles of European Contract Law, Part 1: Performance,

Non-Performance and Remedies, prepared by the Commission on European Contract Law, ed Lando and Beale (1995), Art 1.106, p 53). The Principles of International Commercial Contracts published by Unidroit also provide that in international trade parties must act in accordance with good faith and fair dealing, and that they may not exclude or limit this duty (Art 1.7, pp 16–17). In the United States the influential Uniform Commercial Code is explicitly and squarely based on the concept of good faith. Elsewhere in the common law world, outside the United Kingdom, the principle of good faith in contract law is gradually gaining ground. It is the explicit basis of many international contracts. Since English law serves the international market place it cannot remain impervious to ideas of good faith, or of fair dealing. For my part I am quite confident that businessmen and indeed people on the Underground have no problem with the concept of good faith, or fair dealing. They understand very well what bad faith means. But English lawyers remain resolutely hostile to any incorporation of good faith principles into English law. The hostility is not usually bred from any great familiarity with the way in which the principle works in other systems. But it is intense. My impression is that the basis of the hostility is suspicion about what good faith means. If it were a wholly subjective notion, one could understand the scepticism. If it were an impractical and open-ended way of fastening contractual liability onto parties, it would deserve no place in international trade. But it is none of these things. While I accept that good faith is sometimes used in different senses I have in mind what I regard as the core meaning. Undoubtedly, good faith has a subjective requirement: the threshold requirement is that the party must act honestly. That is an unsurprising requirement and poses no difficulty for the English legal system. But good faith additionally sets an objective standard, viz, the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the conclusion and performance of the transaction concerned. For our purposes that is the important requirement (Farnsworth, "Good Faith in Contract Performance", in Good Faith and Fault in Contract Law, ed Beatson and Friedmann (1995), 154–90). Used in this sense judges in the greater part of the industrialised world usually have no great difficulty in identifying a case of bad faith. It is not clear why it should [439] perplex judges brought up in the English tradition. It is therefore surprising that the House of Lords in Walford v Miles held that an express agreement that parties must negotiate in good faith is unenforceable. Lord Ackner observed that the concept of a duty to carry on negotiations in good faith is inherently repugnant to the adversarial position of the parties when involved in negotiations ([1992] 2 AC 128 at p 138E. See Sir Patrick Neill QC (1992) 108 LQR 405). As the Unidroit principles make clear it is obvious that a party is free to negotiate and is not liable for a failure to reach an agreement. On the other hand, where a party negotiates in bad faith not intending to reach an agreement with the other party he is liable for losses caused to the other party. That is a line of reasoning not considered in Walford v Miles. The result of the decision is even more curious when one takes into account that the House of Lords regarded a best endeavours undertaking as enforceable. If the issue were to arise again, with the benefit of fuller argument, I would hope that the concept of good faith would not be rejected out of hand. There is no need for hostility to the concept: it is entirely practical and workable. Indeed from July 1995 the EC Directive on Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts has been in operation in England (Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations, SI 1994 No 3159). The Directive treats consumer transactions within its scope as unfair when they are contrary to good faith. It is likely to influence domestic English law. Given the needs of the international market place, and the primacy of European Union law, English lawyers cannot avoid grappling with the concept of good faith. But I have no heroic suggestion for the introduction of a general duty of good faith in our contract law. It is not necessary. As long as our courts always respect the reasonable expectations of parties our contract law can satisfactorily be left to develop in accordance with its own pragmatic traditions. And where in specific contexts duties of good faith are imposed on parties our legal system can readily accommodate such a well tried notion. After all, there is not a world of difference between the objective requirement of good faith and the reasonable expectations of parties.

The interpretation of written contracts

[1.90] That brings me to the interpretation of written contracts. Disputes about the meaning of contracts comprise one of the largest sources of contractual litigation, notably in respect of international contracts. The reason is, in the words of Oliver Wendell Holmes, that a word is not a transparent crystal. Clarity is the aim but absolute clarity is unattainable. And it is impossible for contracting parties to foresee all the vicissitudes of commercial fortune to which their contract will be exposed. Moreover, and quite understandably, business bargains have to be struck under great pressure of events and time. In passing I add that it is therefore particularly tiresome for judges to expatiate on the quality of draftsmanship of commercial contracts. Judges must simply do the best they can with the raw materials [440] they are given. Given the intractable nature of problems of construction, the solution of English law is not to ask what the parties subjectively intended but to ascertain what in the context of the contract the language means to an ordinary speaker of English. By and large the objective approach to questions of interpretation serves the needs of commerce. It tends to promote certainty in the law and predictability in dispute resolution. But I must examine the matter in a little more detail. There is the rule that the court is not permitted to use evidence of the pre-contractual negotiations of the parties or their subsequent conduct in aid of the construction of written contracts even if the material throws light on the subjective intentions of the parties. Logically, these rules follow from the primary rule that the task of the court is simply to ascertain the meaning of the language of the contract. And the rationality of the law is important. But, if these rules were absolute and unqualified the primary rule would sometimes defeat the reasonable expectations of commercial men. Pragmatically, it has been decided that if pre-contractual exchanges show that the parties attached an agreed meaning to ambiguous expressions that may be admitted in aid of interpretation. (The Karen Oltmann [1976] 2 Lloyd's Rep 708. See McLauchlan (1997) 113 LQR 237.) That is a substantial inroad into the primary rule in aid of the protection of the reasonable expectations of the contracting parties. More importantly, the courts have resorted to estoppel to temper the rigidity of orthodox rule regarding the inadmissibility of subsequent conduct. Thus in the Vistafjord [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep 343 the Court of Appeal authoritatively held that a party may be precluded by an estoppel by convention from raising a contention contrary to a common assumption of fact or law (including the interpretation of a contract) on which the parties have acted. The operation of the estoppel is flexible: it only prevails so far as it would be unjust if one of the parties resiled from the agreed assumption. By this means the reasonable expectations of parties can fairly be met. This is simply one of many examples of the percolation of promissory estoppel into contract law. Promissory estoppel is often used to soften the rigidity of classical contract law solutions in order to give effect to the reasonable expectations of parties.

The general approach of courts to problems of interpretation has undergone a substantial change in the last twenty-five years. There has been a shift away from a black-letter approach to questions of interpretation. The literalist methods of Lord Simonds are in decline. The purposive approach of Lord Reid and Lord Denning, MR, has prevailed. Two questions can be posed. First, what is literalism? This is easy. The tyrant Temures promised the garrison of Sebastia that no blood would be shed if they surrendered to him. They surrendered. He shed no blood. He [441] buried them all alive. (This example is given in The Works of William Paley (1838 edn) Vol 111, 60. Paley's moral philosophy influenced thinking on contract in the last century.) That is literalism. It has no place in modern law. Second, the significance of the trend towards purposive construction must be considered. It does not mean that judges now arrogate to themselves the power to rewrite contracts for parties. It signifies an awareness that a dictionary is of little help in solving problems of construction. Often there is no obvious or ordinary meaning of the language under consideration. There are competing interpretations to be considered. In choosing between alternatives a court should primarily be guided by the contextual scene in which the stipulation in question appears. And speaking generally commercially minded judges would regard the commercial purpose of the contract as more important than niceties of language. And, in the event of doubt, the working assumption will be that a fair construction best matches the reasonable expectations of the parties.

The implication of terms

[1.95] That brings me to the implication of terms. In systems of law where there is a general duty of good faith in the performance of contracts the need to supplement the written contract by implied terms is less than in the English system. In our system, however, the implication of terms fulfils an important function in promoting the reasonable expectations of parties. Three categories of implied terms can be identified. First, there are terms implied by virtue of the usages of trade and commerce. The assumption is that usages are taken for granted and therefore not spelled out in writing. The recognition of trade usages protects the reasonable expectations of the parties. Secondly, there are terms implied in fact, ie from the contextual scene of the particular contract. Such implied terms fulfil the role of ad hoc gap fillers. Often the expectations of the parties would be defeated if a term were not implied, eg sometimes a contract simply will not work unless a particular duty to co-operate is implied. The law has evolved practical tests for the permissibility of such an implication, such as the test of whether the term is necessary to give business efficacy to the contract or the less stringent test whether the conventional bystander, when faced with the problem, would immediately say "yes, it is obvious that there is such an implied term". The legal test for the implication of a term is the standard of strict necessity. And it is right that it should be so since courts ought not to supplement a contract by an implication unless it is perfectly obvious that it is necessary to give effect to the reasonable expectations of parties. It is, however, a myth to regard such an implied term as based on an inference of the actual intention of the parties. The reasonable expectations of the parties in an objective sense are controlling: they sometimes demand that such terms be imputed to the parties. The third category is terms implied by law. This occurs when incidents are impliedly annexed to particular forms of contracts, eg contracts for building work, contracts of [442] sale, hire, etc. Such implied terms operate as default rules. (There is an excellent discussion of terms implied by law by Rakoff, "Implied Terms: Of 'Default Rules' and 'Situation Sense'" in Good Faith and Fault in Contract Law, ed Beatson and Friedmann (1995), 191.) By and large such implied terms have crystallised in statute or case law. But there is scope for further development. In such new cases a broader approach than applied in the case of terms implied in fact must necessarily prevail. The proposed implication must fit the generality of cases. Indeed, despite some confusion in the authorities, it is tolerably clear that the court may take into account considerations of reasonableness in laying down the scope of terms to be implied in contracts of common occurrence (Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239; Scally v Southern Health and Social Services Board [1992] 1 AC 294). This function of the court is essential in providing a reasonable and fair framework for contracting. After all, there are many incidents of contracts of common occurrence which the parties cannot always be expected to reproduce in writing. This type of supplementation of contracts also fulfils an essential function in promoting the reasonable expectations of the parties.

Conclusion

[1.100] By way of conclusion I would acknowledge that the English law of contract is far from perfect. There is never a last and definitive word on the law. Yet there has been progress. In a more formalistic era courts sometimes neglected to consider the reason for a rule. But formalism is receding. Modern judges usually have well in mind the reason for a rule and in a contract case that means approaching the case from the point of view of the reasonable expectations of the parties. Where contract law is still deficient it will usually be found that the cause is that the reasonable expectations of the parties have been ignored or given inadequate weight. The most serious structural defect in English contract law is the privity rule. Otherwise English contract law is generally capable of safeguarding the reasonable expectations of parties by its own pragmatic methods. It is therefore not surprising that English standard form contracts are widely used in international transactions. Even more important is the fact that English proper law clauses are widely used in international trade. Businessmen tend to be knowledgeable and they vote for the legal system of their choice with proper law clauses. They recognise that the English law of contract is admirably designed to cope with the challenges of a modern and changing business world. It draws its strength and vitality from a close adherence to the reasonable expectations of the contracting parties.

The place of contract within private law

Contracts, Promises and the Law of Obligations

[2.05] PS Atiyah, "Contracts, Promises and the Law of Obligations" (1978) 94 Law Quarterly Review 193.

1. The distinction between voluntary and imposed obligations

For at least 100 years – and in many respects for more like twice that time – common lawyers have operated within a particular conceptual framework governing the law of obligations. Within this framework, the fundamental distinction has been that between obligations which are voluntarily assumed, and obligations which are imposed by law. The former constitutes the law of contract, the latter falls within the purview of the law of tort. There is, in addition, that somewhat anomalous body of law which came to be known as the law of quasi-contract, or in more modern times, as the law of restitution. This body of law was accommodated within the new conceptual framework by the academic lawyers and jurists from the 1860s onwards, and, after a considerable time lag, their ideas came to be part of the accepted orthodoxies. The law of quasi-contract, it came to be said, was part of the law of obligations which did not arise from voluntary acts of the will, but from positive rules of law. Quasi-contract thus took its place alongside tort law on one side of the great divide. Contract alone remained on the other side. Nobody ever paid much attention to … the place of equitable obligations in the great divide between voluntarily assumed and legally imposed obligations.

These broad distinctions reflected a set of values, and ways of thought which also exercised a most profound influence on the conceptual pattern which was imposed on Contract law itself. Contractual obligations came to be treated as being almost exclusively about promises, agreements, intentions, acts of will. The function of the law came to be seen as that of merely giving effect to the private-autonomy of contracting parties to make their own legal arrangements. It is, of course, well known indeed, has become part of the modern orthodoxy, that the private autonomy, this extreme freedom of contract, came to be abused by parties with greater bargaining power, and has been curtailed in a variety of ways, both by legislative activity and by the judges themselves. That is a familiar story and I do not wish to pursue it here. What I do wish to discuss is the conceptual framework of Contract and its place in the law of obligations as a whole. I want to suggest that, despite the increasing attacks upon freedom of contract, and the great divide between Contract and Tort, the conceptual apparatus which still dominates legal thinking on these issues is the apparatus of the nineteenth century. It goes, indeed, far beyond the law itself. Our very processes of thought, our language in political, moral or philosophical debate, is still dominated by this nineteenth-century heritage to an extent which, I venture to suggest, is rarely appreciated. I want to suggest, further, that this conceptual apparatus is not based on any objective truths, it does not derive from any eternal verities. It is the result, quite specifically of a nineteenth-century heritage, an amalgam of classical economics, of Benthamite radicalism, of liberal political ideals and of the law, itself created and moulded in the shadow of these movements. The result, I will argue, is that our basic conceptual apparatus, the fundamental characterisations and divisions which we impose on the phenomena with which we deal, do not reflect the values of our own times, but those of the last century. It is true that they reflect much that many will still think most admirable about the nineteenth century, the liberal tradition, the belief in the value and rights of the individual, adherence to an economic and social system which had the confidence to reward enterprise, initiative and success. But to recognise that many of the values of our society today are opposed to much that was admirable in the last century is not to denigrate our predecessors. And to argue the case for revising our concepts so that they conform more closely to the values of today involves no judgment that those values are better than the values of yesterday. Indeed, the revision may prove useful to those who think otherwise, for it will bring into greater relief precisely what is involved in today's values.

2. The paradigm of modern contract theory

[2.10] … If we were asked today to indulge in the fashionable exercise of constructing a model of a typical contract, I suspect most common lawyers would come up with something like this. A typical contract is, first, a bilateral executory agreement. It consists of an exchange of promises; the exchange is deliberately carried through, by the process of offer and acceptance, with the intention of creating a binding deal. When the offer is accepted, the agreement is consummated, and a contract comes into existence before anything is actually done by the parties. No performance is required, no benefit has to be rendered, no act of detrimental reliance is needed, to create the obligation. The contract is binding because the parties intend to be bound; it is their will, or intention, which creates the liability. It is true that the law has this technical requirement known as the doctrine of consideration, but except in rare and special cases, mutual promises are consideration for each other, and therefore the model, by definition, complies with the requirement of consideration.

When the contract is made, it binds each party to performance, or, in default, to a liability to pay damages in lieu. Prima facie these damages will represent the value of the innocent party's disappointed expectations. The plaintiff may, therefore, bring suit on a wholly executory contract, for example, because the defendant has attempted to cancel his offer or acceptance, or withdraw from the contract, and may recover damages for his disappointed expectations even though he has not relied upon the contract in any way, and even though the defendant has received no benefit under it. The whole model is suffused with the idea that the fundamental purpose of contract law is to give effect – within limits of course – to the intentions of the parties. It is their decision, and their free choice, which makes the contract binding, and determines its interpretation, and its result in the event of breach. It is, of course, a commonplace today that all legal obligations are, in the last resort, obligations created or at least recognised by the law, but the classical model of contract is easily enough adjusted to take account of this truism. The law of contract, it is said, consists of power-conferring rules. The law provides facilities for private parties to make use of them if they so wish. Those who wish to create legal obligations have only to comply with a simple set of rules and the result will be recognised by the law.

There is no doubt that this model has been of astonishing power. For 100 years it has had no serious rival. Today many lawyers would probably want to qualify it, or modify it in a variety of respects. Many would admit, perhaps insist, that the model is primarily useful in connection with the business transaction, and it does not fit the consumer transaction, or the family arrangement, or other agreements which cannot be characterised as business deals. Even in transactions among business men, many lawyers will want to qualify this model. At the least many will recognise that the role of free choice on the part of contracting parties has declined, and that courts may, in the interests of justice as they perceive it, sometimes impose solutions in the teeth of contracting parties' intent. But making all allowances for the necessary qualifications, I do not think it would be seriously disputed that this is the paradigm model of contract which we have inherited from nineteenth-century lawyers. Indeed, a glance at the Contract textbooks will confirm that the model is still alive and well.

The pervasiveness of this model is attested by the closely parallel set of ideas and values which underlie social and philosophical ideas about promises. The binding force of promises, the nature of promissory liability, the role of implication; the idea of a background set of conventions and practices enabling promises to be made, all these and many other topics have been the subject of much debate and discussion among moralists and philosophers. Perhaps it is not surprising that the model of promissory theory most widely adhered to among philosophers appears to correspond very closely to the model of contractual liability sketched above.

Before proceeding further to examine the reality of this model of contract, it is worth pausing to consider some of its underlying presuppositions which are rarely made explicit.

(a) Intentions rather than actions

The first of these is that the classical model assumes that contract law is fundamentally about what parties intend, and not about what they do. Here again, of course, qualifications, and important qualifications, have to be made. It is the manifestation of intention and not actual intention that matters most; and what the parties do is obviously crucial in measuring the extent to which performance falls short of promise. Nevertheless, classical contract theory assumes that contractual obligations are created by the intention of the parties and not by their actions. The classical model is thus concerned with executory arrangements, with forward-looking planning. Contracts have a chronology, a time sequence, as can be seen by looking at the Table of Contents of any Contract textbook published in the last 100 years. They are created first, and performed (or not performed) thereafter. In this respect, of course, contractual obligations necessarily differ from those on the other side of the great divide. The law of torts, and the law of quasi-contract are concerned with what parties do. It is human action, or inaction, which creates liability in tort, or in restitution. Among other results, this means that Contract lawyers focus on a different time sequence. In tort, or in restitutionary claims, it is the causing of damage or injury on the one hand, or the rendering of benefits on the other, which is the immediate object of interest. In contract, likewise, damage or injury may be caused, or benefits rendered, but it is not these consequences, or the actions giving rise to them which are the focus of attention of the classical model. It is the intention of the parties which (it is assumed) must necessarily precede the causing of the damage or the rendering of the benefits, and which is therefore the source of the obligation. I will suggest later that this difference in the time which is the focus of attention has led, not merely to an exaggeration of the role of intentional conduct in the creation of contractual obligations, but also to a minimisation of the role of intentional conduct in the creation of other forms of obligation.

(b) Contract as thing

The second presupposition of the classical model of contract is that a contract is a thing, which has some kind of objective existence prior to any performance or any act of the parties (see Arthur Leff, "Contract as Thing", 19 Am U Law Rev 131 (1970)). Of all the examples of legal reification, none is surely more powerful than this. A contract is a thing which is "made," is "broken," is "discharged". So powerful is this reification that most lawyers see nothing odd about the notion of anticipatory repudiation, that is, about the idea that a promise can be treated as broken even before its performance is due. The tendency to reify legal concepts is, in the case of contract, given powerful impetus by the fact that so many contractual arrangements are in written form. Even today, lawyers constantly use the words "the contract" to signify both the legal relations created by the law, and the piece of paper in which those relations (or some of them) are expressed. Here again, there is a profound difference in the lawyer's way of looking at legal obligations on the other side of the great divide. A contract may be a "thing" but nobody would conceptualise a quasi-contract or a tort as a thing. One reason why the tendency to reify the concept of contract has had important results is that it has reinforced the respect for the private autonomy of the contractual relationship. If a contract is a thing created by the contracting parties, it is easier to see it as a relationship within defined and limited parameters. Within these parameters, concepts such as fairness, justice, reasonableness have far less room to operate than they do with diffuse concepts like tort or quasi-contract.

(c) The deterrent role played by the courts

The third presupposition of the classical model of contract concerns the function of the court in the enforcement of contracts. I take it as axiomatic that, in principle, the judicial process is designed to serve either or both of two important social ends. The first is, by the threat of penalties or the promise of rewards, to encourage the citizenry to comply with socially desired standards of behaviour. And the second is to provide machinery for the settlement of disputes by peaceful and fair means. Now the classical model of Contract with its emphasis on intentional conduct and future planning, presupposes that the first of these two goals is the primary function of the courts in dealing with contractual litigation. The purpose of [198] contract law is to encourage people to pay their debts, keep their promises and generally be truthful in their dealings with each other. The enforcement of contracts, like the protection of property and the punishment of crime, is thus perceived as important primarily for its deterrent or hortatory purpose. It is no coincidence that these were historically linked together as the essential functions of the state even by Adam Smith and the classical economists. By contrast, other parts of the law of obligations are more likely to be dominated by the dispute-settlement functions of the courts, rather than by their deterrent or hortatory functions. In the law of quasi-contract, in particular, the court is almost invariably called upon to deal with a problem by resolving a conflict of equities. Some misfire has occurred, some untoward and unplanned benefit has been rendered. Is it right that the beneficiary should pay for it, or are there grounds on which it is more just that he should be permitted to retain an unpaid for benefit? It is not generally regarded as an important function of the court to discourage (for example) people from paying debts twice over, or rendering benefits to another without ensuring that there has been an agreement to pay for them. Similarly with the modern law of torts, the importance of the deterrent function of the law has declined at the expense of the dispute-settlement function. Increasingly, the emphasis is on the function of the court in dealing with what are essentially perceived as accidents. The court must patch up a dispute, pick up the pieces after an accident, resolve a difficult conflict of equities, but the court is primarily concerned with these parties in this particular situation, and not with threatening sanctions or offering rewards to future parties. Although some lawyers would still be prepared to defend the idea that the law of negligence has a value in discouraging negligent conduct, there can be no denying the decline in the relative importance of this aspect of the law. In the ordinary running down action, in particular, it has for some years been a commonplace that the presence of third party insurance on the one hand, and of criminal sanctions on the other, have tended to make the law of torts almost exclusively concerned with compensating the plaintiff rather than deterring future defendants.

(d) A single model of contract

The fourth presupposition of the classical model of Contract is that there is indeed one model, that it is possible and useful to think still in terms of general principles of Contract. The continued vitality of our textbooks and of our university law courses on Contract attest to the faith which lawyers still have in the generalising effect of the concept of Contract. We know, of course, that most contracts fall into particular categories, which have their own rules and qualifications derogating from the general law. There are, for example, special rules applicable to contracts of employment, consumer credit contracts, consumer sales, leases, mortgages, insurance contracts, house purchase, matrimonial agreements and many others. Indeed, there are few contracts today which are not governed by specific rules which in some measure derogate from the general law. But none of this has shaken the power of the classical model of Contract. This model is, without doubt, based on an economic model, that of the free market. Historically there is every reason to believe that this classical model grew up under the influence of the classical economists and of the philosophical radicals. There is no need to subscribe to the crude and exaggerated myth that these nineteenth century thinkers wanted to reduce all relationships to economic terms, or to encourage a purely materialist approach to all human motivation. But it is true that many of them saw much in the classical contract model which they felt was both admirable and applicable far beyond the commercial sphere. They thought it desirable that men should learn to order their lives according to some definite plan, that they should be encouraged to aim for particular goals, that they should co-operate with others in attempting to seek those goals, that those who let down their fellows should be made to pay the cost of doing so; they thought it desirable that men should be free to develop their skills and ambitions, and they accepted the natural corollary that some would rise and some would sink. It was partly for these reasons (though there were certainly others too) that the classical model of Contract was so unified, and no doubt, it was partly its unity which gave it so much power.

Contracts, Promises and the Law of Obligations cont.

In the law itself, it was the nineteenth century which very largely saw the supersession of the importance of special kinds of contract by the general principles of contract. It was, of course, an Age of Principles – principles of morality, principles of political economy, principles of justice, and principles of law. When Addison published his Treatise on Contracts in 1847 he insisted that Contract law was not a mere collection of positive rules but was founded "upon the broad and general principles of universal law." Indeed, he went further: "The law of contracts," be wrote in his Preface, "may justly indeed be said to be a universal law adapted to all times and races, and all places and circumstances, being founded upon those great and fundamental principles of right and wrong deduced from natural reason which are immutable and eternal." Naturally, a concept of Contract which could dismiss all differences of time and place, of circumstances and people, had no need for trivial distinctions between sale and hire-purchase, mortgages and leases, commercial and consumer contracts.

3. Defects in the classical model

[2.15] It is necessary now to cast a somewhat more critical eye at this conceptual structure. How far does it stand up to more detailed examination? Is it reconcilable with the value systems of the modern world, and in particular, of modern England? Is it even reconcilable with the developments in positive law which have taken place within this conceptual framework? Is it true that contractual obligations normally arise from agreements or exchanges of promises? How far is it true to suggest that contracts are intentionally made with a view to future performance? To what extent it is correct to regard contractual liability as depending on voluntarily assumed obligations? To what extent is it possible to adhere to the very concept of a single basic model of Contract?

Let me begin with this last question.

(a) The single model of contract

If we look at the law as it is stated in the books and the case law we shall see that the concept of contract is applied in a very wide range of situations and to a very large variety of relationships. Before it is possible to construct a model even of a typical or paradigm case of contract it is necessary to have some idea of what it is that we are trying to achieve. Typical of what? Paradigm of what? Quite apart from the circular nature of the definitional problem, it is hard to understand how one is to measure the typicality of a particular relationship. If we are concerned with the most numerous types of transaction then presumably the typical contract would be the bus ride, the train journey, or the supermarket purchase. But even this is somewhat speculative and only empirical research could actually tell us what are the most commonly made transactions. Alternatively, we may be concerned with the value of the transactions we are examining. Commercial transactions are doubtless typically of greater individual value than consumer transactions; but it is unlikely that they are of greater aggregate value. And anyhow commercial transactions are so far removed from the ordinary experience of the average person that it is hard to believe a contractual model based on the commercial transaction would today have a wide and pervasive application outside the particular sphere of business. A third possibility is that the typical contract is that of which practising lawyers have the most experience. But here again there are obvious difficulties. If we are concerned with the experience of solicitors, then there can be no doubt that house purchases and mortgages are the most typical of contracts. If we are concerned with the experience of a barrister in commercial chambers, then the typical contract might be an international sale, an insurance contract, a building contract, and it would almost certainly be a contract made by business parties.

The truth is, I would suggest, that there is no such thing as a typical contract at all. Moreover, modern society has plainly rejected the values of the market outside the increasingly narrow area in which the market is permitted to operate. The classical model of Contract thus continues to exist though with increasingly little content. The principles of Contract law sometimes govern new or marginal or residuary situations, but it is hard to see in what sense they can continue to be called general principles. They remain general only by default, only because they are being superceded by detailed ad hoc rules lacking any principle.

(b) The voluntary assumption of contractual obligations

Let me turn now to a more challenging question. To what extent is it true to say that contractual liabilities arise from agreement or promises or depend on the voluntary assumption of obligation? I want to begin by suggesting that the power of the classical model here derives largely from its stress on the executory contract. If two parties do exchange promises to carry out some performance at a future date, and if, immediately on the exchange of promises, a binding legal obligation comes at once into existence, then it seems inexorably to follow that the obligation is created by the agreement, by the intention of the parties. If they have done nothing to implement the agreement, if no actions have followed the exchange of promises, then manifestly the legal obligation cannot arise from anything except the exchange of promises. Thus far the classical model appears to be impregnable. But closer examination suggests that the area of impregnability is really rather small.

The first point to note is that wholly executory contracts are rarer, more ephemeral in practice, and somewhat less binding than the classical model of Contract would suggest. In the classical model as I have suggested, the executory transaction lies at the very heart of Contract. It is precisely because the classical model largely defines Contract in terms of executory transactions that it necessarily locates the source of contractual liability in what the parties intend rather than in what they do. But large numbers of contracts are regularly made in which the making and the performance, or at least part performance, are simultaneous or practically simultaneous events. Consider such simple transactions as the boarding of a bus, or a purchase of goods in a supermarket, or a loan of money. Is it really sensible to characterise these transactions as agreements or exchanges of promises? Is it meaningful or useful to claim that a person who boards a bus is promising to pay his fare? If so, would it not be just as meaningful to say that when he descends from the bus and crosses the road he promises to cross with all due care for the safety of other road users? I do not, of course, deny that all these transactions involve some element of voluntary conduct. People do not generally board buses, buy goods in a supermarket, or borrow money in their sleep. But they involve much else besides voluntary conduct. They usually involve the rendering of some benefit, or actions of detrimental reliance, or both. A person who is carried by a bus from point A to point B after voluntarily boarding the bus can normally be presumed to have derived some benefit from the arrangements. Does his liability to pay his fare have nothing to do with this element of benefit? A person who borrows money and actually receives the loan is, according to the classical model of Contract, liable to repay the money merely because he promised to repay it. The fact that he received the money appears to be largely irrelevant. It is not, indeed, wholly irrelevant in law, because of the doctrine of consideration, but in the classical model it is the intention or agreement or promise which is the source of the liability and not the consideration. The consideration is either a historical anachronism, a meaningless technicality, or if it has any rational function at all today, it is merely to provide evidence of the seriousness of a promise. Thus a person who borrows £100 is liable to repay it because he has promised; the actual receipt of the money is merely evidence of the seriousness of the promise.

(c) The importance of benefits rendered and detrimental reliance

If we look at a normative system not encumbered by the doctrine of consideration – say the moral basis of promissory liability – the position is even more starkly clear. An obligation to perform a promise to pay £100 is generally considered to be precisely the same whether the promise is to make a gift or to repay a loan. Since the basis of the obligation lies in the promise in both cases it makes not a particle of difference that in the former case the promisor receives nothing for his money, while in the latter case he has already received full value. Is it not evident that there is some grotesque distortion here?

Consider next the possibility of detrimental reliance by the promisee. Is it not manifest that a person who has actually worsened his position by reliance on a promise has a more powerful case for redress than one who has not acted in reliance on the promise at all? A person who has not relied on a promise (nor paid for it) may suffer a disappointment of his expectations, but he does not actually suffer a pecuniary loss. The disappointment of an expectation may of course be treated as a species of loss by definition, as indeed, the law generally does treat it, if the expectation derives from Contract.

But no definitional jugglery can actually equate the position of the party who suffers a diminution of his assets in reliance on a promise, and a person who suffers no such diminution.

But this is not all, for both in morality and in law the rendering of benefits and actions of detrimental reliance can give rise to obligations even where there was no promise at all. The law of quasi-contract is almost entirely concerned with situations in which one party is entitled to recompense for a benefit rendered to another even though the latter made no promise to pay for it. The rendering of a benefit is thus in some cases a sufficient ground for liability even without an agreement or promise to repay. Of course, the law of quasi-contract has "nothing at all" to do with the law of Contract, as classical contract theory tells us. But that is itself, as I shall suggest later, an idea which is quite unacceptable, both historically and analytically. And if the law of quasi-contracts concerns liability for the restitution of uncovenanted benefits, the law of torts and the law of trusts frequently provide redress for acts of reliance performed in the absence of an express promise. Moreover, the law of Contract itself, together with associated parts of the law sometimes characterised as distinct sets of rules, provide many examples of provisions plainly designed for the protection of acts of reasonable reliance, rather than for the imposition of promissory liability. The law of misrepresentations, of warranty, of estoppel and promissory estoppel, no matter how they are conceptualised, provide many illustrations of what can only be rationally regarded as reliance-based liability.

(d) The use of objective tests

And so far I have said nothing about one of the most obvious bodies of legal doctrine which is not easy to reconcile with the theory that contractual and promissory obligations rest on voluntary obligation. I refer, of course, to the so-called "objective-test" theory of contractual liability. Every law student is taught from his earliest days that contractual intent is not really what it seems; actual subjective intent is normally irrelevant. It is the appearance, the manifestation of intent that matters. Whenever a person is held bound by a promise or a contract contrary to his actual intent or understanding, it is plain that the liability is based not on some notion of a voluntary assumption of obligation, but on something else. And most frequently it will be found that that something else is the element of reasonable reliance. One party relies on a reasonable construction of an offer, or he accepts an offer, reasonably thinking it is still open when the offeror has revoked it but failed to communicate his revocation. All this is standard stuff but I suggest that cases of this type have for too long been regarded as of marginal importance only, as not affecting the fundamental basis and theory of liability. In a simple world of simple promises and contracts this might have been an acceptable perspective. But the arrival of written contracts and above all the standard printed form has surely rendered this approach much less defensible. A party who signs an elaborate printed document is almost invariably held bound by it not because of anything he intended; he is bound in the teeth of his intention and understandings except in some very exceptional cases of fraud and the like. The truth is he is bound not so much because of what he intends but because of what he does. Like the man who is bound to pay his fare because he boards a bus, the man who signs a written contract is liable because of what he does rather than what he intends. And he is liable because of what he does for the good reason that other parties are likely to rely upon what he does in ways which are reasonable and even necessary by the standards of our society.

What I suggest then, is that whenever benefits are rendered, wherever acts of reasonable reliance take place, obligations may arise, both morally and in law. These obligations are by no means confined to cases where explicit promises are given, for they may arise in cases where we would imply a promise, but they also arise in many cases where any attempt to imply a promise would be nothing but a bare fiction. The man who boards a bus without any intention of paying his fare is bound to pay it though it is difficult to see what reality there can be in claiming he impliedly promises to pay. The man who signs a document without reading it does not make an implied promise any more than an express promise in any genuine sense.

4. Rethinking the Law of Obligations

[2.20] These arguments, of course, require much greater development than I can give them here; but enough has been said to show that, if they stand up to further examination, they should suffice to dethrone the executory contract from the central place which it occupies in Contract theory. The consequences of this would be to require some drastic redrawing of the lines of the conceptual structure of contractual and promissory obligation. In the first place, the distinction between contract and quasi-contract would surely come crashing to the ground. This distinction was not anyhow indigenous to English law. It is well known that until the middle of the nineteenth century at least, the common lawyers distinguished between express and implied contracts not between contracts and quasi-contracts. To the early common lawyers, the important point in common between express and implied contracts was that both usually involved a claim for payment or reimbursement for a benefit which had been conferred by the plaintiff on the defendant. Whether the defendant had promised to pay for that benefit was a secondary question. In the nineteenth century, when the executory contract became the pivotal key to the law of obligations, when will theory flourished, and when, we may add, renewed study of the classics reminded common lawyers of the Roman law distinctions and terminology, the old common law distinction fell into disrepute. The process began with academics and writers like John Austin, Henry Maine and Martin Leake. Will theory, which emphasised the importance of free choice and the voluntary creation of obligations was plainly inconsistent with the indigenous common law. The newer ideas got into the books and after the lapse of a couple of generations into the Law Reports. They passed into orthodoxy. Everybody began to say that quasi-contracts had nothing to do with contracts. I am afraid that I said it myself. The Contract textbooks expelled the subject. Universities even began to run separate courses on the Law of Restitution.

Plainly, if the part-executed contract is to replace the executory contract as the centrepiece of Contract theory, we shall have to turn our back on these exciting new ideas. We may then discover that, far from being new, they derive from the intellectual climate of the early nineteenth century. Free choice in all things, rational planning, calculated risk assessment, and the severest limitation of the active role of State and judge, these are the themes which underlie the distinction between contract and quasi-contract. It is scarcely necessary to add that they are the themes of the last century.

A similar fate may well await the distinction between Contract and Tort when once the executory contract is removed from the central place in the law of obligations. I have already suggested that our nineteenth century heritage has led us to place undue emphasis on the extent to which contractual obligations depend upon intentions and the voluntary assumption of liability. But is it not equally true that, perhaps by way of reaction, Tort theory has swung too far in the opposite direction? In their reaction away from Contract, lawyers and judges have tended to stress the positive nature of tortious liability. Tort duties are imposed by law, not assumed by the parties. They are the reflection of society's standards of fairness and reasonableness and not the result of deliberate submission to a mutual binding arrangement, and so on. I want to suggest that all this has tended to draw far too sharp a line between Contract and Tort. It is not true that consent, intention, voluntary conduct is irrelevant to tort liabilities. The modern law of negligence is, in many respects, an offshoot of nineteenth century Contract law. Historically, the tort of negligence which dominates modern Tort law, grew almost entirely out of contractual-type arrangements. Personal injury actions brought against occupiers of premises, against employers, against railway companies were the forerunners of the modern running down case. The road accident between strangers was not the typical tort action of the last century. And even today it remains true that nearly all tort liabilities arise in the course of the performance of voluntary actions. A person who negligently injures another while driving his car is voluntarily on the road, voluntarily driving his car, and may be said to submit himself to the requirements of the law with as much or as little truth as the seller of goods. The liability of the bus company to pedestrians or other road users does not, in this perspective, differ significantly from its liability to passengers inside the bus. In both cases, I suggest, liability arises primarily from what is voluntarily done, from the element of reciprocal benefit and from the fact of reliance. It is, of course, true that the sharp distinctions drawn by the law between tortious and contractual liability have, over the years, led to various accretions of positive law.

In particular, contractual liability is often stricter than tortious liability. The seller of defective goods is liable even without proof of negligence for any injury caused by the goods to someone who can claim that he has contracted to buy them. But this distinction is, in a way, an illustration of the theme I am attempting to state. For here too, lawyers and reformers are rejecting the traditional approach. Most lawyers would today prefer to decide what the obligations of a vendor of goods should be, and would then construe his behaviour to support those obligations. Thus if it is thought, as it widely is, that a vendor of defective goods should be strictly liable to anyone who uses the goods and not only to those who buy the goods, the vendor can be said to give an implied warranty that his goods will be safe. But this implied warranty does not necessarily mean that the vendor is thought to voluntarily accept that liability; he voluntarily sells the goods, and the liability is imposed upon him. If we ask, further, why the obligations should be imposed, we will find, in most cases, that the twin elements of benefit and detriment underlie the judgment. In this particular case, for instance, it would be widely agreed that the vendor gets the benefit of the sale, that the purchaser or user relies upon him to distribute goods which are not dangerous, and that these two factors, together with the fact that the sale is a voluntary transaction, suffice to justify the obligation.

It is worth considering another example, where tort law is concerned primarily with the waiver or reduction of legal obligations, rather than its creation. The liability of a car driver to a passenger has, both in this country, and still more overseas, given rise to many shifts and devices for restricting the application of the normal rules of negligence. Whether this has been done by the former legislative exemption from carrying insurance to cover liability to passengers, or by invocation of the maxim volenti non fit injuria, or by denial of a duty of care, or by restricting liability to cases of gross negligence, it is surely not far-fetched to see the benefit to the passenger at the heart of the problem. The passenger who is a mere guest (as opposed to the fare-paying passenger) is deriving a gratuitous benefit from being carried in the vehicle. Is it right that he should be permitted to look this gift-horse in the mouth and sue the driver in the event of injury in an accident? The fact that an emphatic affirmative has, at least in this country, now been given to this question, does not, I think, detract from the value of this illustration.

I do not, of course, want to suggest that the whole law of obligations can be rewritten in terms of a few simple principles drawn from the notions of benefit and reliance. Society and social and economic relationships are too complex in the modern industrial world for oversimplifications of this nature. But what I do want to suggest is that the great divide between duties which are voluntarily assumed, and duties which are imposed by law is itself one of these oversimplifications. A more adequate and more unifying conceptual structure for the law of obligations can be built around the interrelationship between the concepts of reciprocal benefits, acts of reasonable reliance, and voluntary human conduct.

[3.05] It is generally accepted that four essential elements are necessary for contract formation: agreement, consideration, certainty and an intention to create legal relations. This chapter is concerned with the first of those elements. The existence of an agreement between the parties is usually analysed through the rules of offer and acceptance. These rules may be useful in determining whether or not the parties have reached agreement, when and where that agreement was made and on what terms. However, the rules of offer and acceptance are merely "an aid to analysis" (Greig and Davis, The Law of Contract (1987), p 246). They sometimes prove inconclusive or artificial. A contract can be made without an identifiable offer and acceptance, provided the parties have manifested their mutual assent.

The "acid test" in a case where offer and acceptance cannot be identified, according to Cooke J in Meates v Attorney-General [1983] NZLR 308, 377, "is whether, viewed as a whole and objectively from the point of view of reasonable persons on both sides, the dealings show a concluded bargain". The authorities on this point are reviewed by Heydon JA in Brambles Holdings Ltd v Bathurst City Council [2001] NSWCA 61; (2001) 53 NSWLR 153, extracted at [3.130]. Heydon JA concluded (at 179) that, in light of those authorities, in circumstances where the traditional approach cannot be applied it is relevant to ask:

- whether in all the circumstances an agreement can be inferred;
- whether mutual assent has been manifested; and
- whether a reasonable person in the position of each of the parties would think there was a concluded bargain.

OFFER

[3.10] "An offer is the manifestation of willingness to enter into a bargain, so made as to justify another person in understanding that his assent to that bargain is invited and will conclude it." (Restatement (Second) of Contracts, §24, American Law Institute, 1981).

Gibson v Manchester City Council

[3.15] Gibson v Manchester City Council [1979] 1 WLR 294 (House of Lords) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: In 1970, Manchester City Council, then controlled by the Conservative Party, adopted a scheme allowing tenants of council housing to purchase the freehold title to their homes. In furtherance of the scheme, the Council wrote a standard form letter to Robert Gibson in relation to the Council house he was renting. The letter said that the Council "may be prepared to sell the house to you" at a nominated purchase price and asked Gibson to complete an application form if he wished to make formal application to buy the house. Gibson completed an application form (leaving the purchase price blank) and returned it to the Council. Before formal contracts were prepared, local government elections were held in which control of the Council passed to the Labour Party. The Council then resolved to abandon the scheme and to complete only those sales for which a binding contract had been concluded. The Council denied that there was a binding contract with Gibson. Gibson claimed that a contract had come into existence, and sued to enforce it. The trial judge held that there had been an offer and acceptance, and so a binding contract had arisen. He ordered specific performance. The Council's appeal to the Court of Appeal was dismissed. The Council then appealed the House of Lords, using this as a test case to determine the status of arrangements with hundreds of tenants in a similar position to Gibson.]

LORD DIPLOCK [295] My Lords, this is an action for specific performance of what is claimed to be a contract for the sale of land. The only question in the appeal is of a kind with which the courts are very familiar. It is whether in the correspondence between the parties there can be found a legally enforceable contract for the sale by the Manchester Corporation to Mr Gibson of the dwelling house of which he was the occupying tenant at the relevant time in 1971. That question is one that, in my view, can be answered by applying to the particular documents relied upon by Mr Gibson as constituting the contract, well-[296]settled, indeed elementary, principles of English law …. The two documents principally relied upon by Mr Gibson were in standard forms used by the corporation in dealing with applications from tenants of council houses to purchase the freehold of their homes under a scheme that had been adopted by the council … [and later] abandoned …. [T]he only contract that is alleged is one made by letters accompanying documents passing between the parties. The outcome of this appeal depends upon their true construction.

In the Manchester County Court where the action started, the case was pleaded in the conventional way. The particulars of claim alleged an offer in writing by the corporation to sell the freehold interest in the house to Mr Gibson at a price of £2,180 and an acceptance in writing of that offer by Mr Gibson. The judge (Judge Bailey) followed the same conventional approach to the question that fell to be decided. He looked to see whether there was an offer of sale and an acceptance. He held that, upon their true construction, the documents relied upon as such in the particulars of claim did amount to an offer and an acceptance respectively and so constituted a legally enforceable contract. He ordered specific performance of an open contract for the sale to Mr Gibson of the freehold interest in the house at the price of £2,180.

The corporation's appeal against this judgment was dismissed by a majority of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR and Ormrod LJ); Geoffrey Lane LJ dissented. Lord Denning MR rejected what I have described as the conventional approach of looking to see whether upon the true construction of the documents relied upon there can be discerned an offer and acceptance. One ought, he said ([1978] 1 WLR 520 at 523H) to "look at the correspondence as a whole and at the conduct of the parties and see therefrom whether the parties have come to an agreement on everything that was material." This approach … led him however to the conclusion that there should be imported into the agreement to be specifically performed additional conditions, against use except as a private dwelling house and against advertising and a restriction not to sell or lease the property for five years. These are conditions which would not be implied by law in an [297] open contract for the sale of land. The reason for so varying the judge's order was that clauses in these terms were included in the standard form of "Agreement for Sale of a Council House" which … was entered into by the corporation and council tenants whose applications to purchase the freehold of their council house reached the stage at which contracts were exchanged. There was, however, no reference to this standard form of agreement in any of the documents said to constitute the contract relied on in the instant case, nor was there any evidence that Mr Gibson had knowledge of its terms at or before the time that the alleged contract was concluded.

Ormrod LJ, who agreed with Lord Denning MR, adopted a similar approach …

Geoffrey Lane LJ in a dissenting judgment, which for my part I find convincing, adopted the conventional approach. He found that upon the true construction of the documents relied upon as constituting the contract, there never was an offer by the corporation acceptance of which by Mr Gibson was capable in law of constituting a legally enforceable contract. It was but a step in the negotiations for a contract which, owing to the change in the political complexion of the council, never reached fruition.

My Lords, there may be certain types of contract, though I think they are exceptional, which do not fit easily into the normal analysis of a contract as being constituted by offer and acceptance; but a contract alleged to have been made by an exchange of correspondence between the parties in which the successive communications other than the first are in reply to one another, is not one of these. I can see no reason in the instant case for departing from the conventional approach of looking at the handful of documents relied upon as constituting the contract sued upon and seeing whether upon their true construction there is to be found in them a contractual offer by the corporation to sell the house to Mr Gibson and an acceptance of that offer by Mr Gibson. I venture to think that it was by departing from this conventional approach that the majority of the Court of Appeal was led into error.

The genesis of the relevant negotiations in the instant case is a form filled in by Mr Gibson on 28 November 1970, inquiring what would be the price of buying his council house … and expressing his interest in obtaining a mortgage from the corporation. The form was a detachable part of a brochure which had been circulated by the corporation to tenants who had previously expressed an interest in buying their houses. It contained details of a new scheme for selling council houses that had been recently adopted by the council. The scheme provided for a sale at market value less a discount dependent on the length of time the purchaser had been a council tenant. This, in the case of Mr Gibson, would have amounted to 20 per cent. The scheme also provided for the provision by the corporation of advances upon mortgage which might amount to as much as the whole of the purchase price.

As a result of that inquiry Mr Gibson's house was inspected by the corporation's valuer and on 10 February, 1971, the letter which is relied upon by Mr Gibson as the offer by the corporation to sell the house to him was sent from the City Treasurer's Department. It was in the following terms: [298]

> Dear Sir,
>
> Purchase of council house
> Your Reference Number 82463 03
>
> I refer to your request for details of the cost of buying your council house. The corporation may be prepared to sell the house to you at the purchase price of £2,725 less 20 per cent = £2,180 (freehold) …
> Maximum mortgage the corporation may grant: £2,177 repayable over 20 years. Annual fire insurance premium: £2.45

> Monthly repayment charge, calculated by:
> (i) flat rate repayment method £19.02
> If you wish to pay off some of the purchase price at the start and therefore require a mortgage for less than the amount quoted above, the monthly instalment will change; in these circumstances, I will supply new figures on request. The above repayment figures apply so long as the interest rate charged on home loans is 8.5 per cent. The interest rate will be subject to variation by the corporation after giving not less than three months' written notice, and if it changes, there will be an adjustment to the monthly instalment payable. This letter should not be regarded as firm offer of a mortgage.

My Lords, the words I have italicised seem to me, as they seemed to Geoffrey Lane LJ, to make it quite impossible to construe this letter as a contractual offer capable of being converted into a legally enforceable open contract for the sale of land by Mr Gibson's written acceptance of it. The words "may be prepared to sell" are fatal to this; so is the invitation, not, be it noted, to accept the offer, but "to make formal application to buy" upon the enclosed application form. It is, to quote Geoffrey Lane LJ, a letter setting out the financial terms on which it may be the council will be prepared to consider a sale and purchase in due course.

Both Ormrod LJ and the judge in the County Court reaching the conclusion that this letter was a firm offer to sell the freehold interest in the house for £2,180, attached importance to the fact that the second paragraph, dealing with the financial details of the mortgage of which Mr Gibson had asked for particulars, stated expressly: "This letter should not be regarded as a firm offer of a mortgage." The necessary implication from this, it is suggested, is that the first paragraph of the letter is to be regarded as a firm offer to sell despite the fact that this is plainly inconsistent with the express language of that paragraph. My Lords, with great respect, this surely must be fallacious. If the final sentence had been omitted the wording of the second paragraph, unlike that of the first, with its use of the indicative mood in such expressions as "the interest rate will change", might have been understood by council tenants to whom it was addressed as indicating a firm offer of a mortgage of the amount and on the terms for repayment stated if the council were prepared to sell the house at the stated price. But whether or not this be the explanation of [299] the presence of the last sentence in para 2, it cannot possibly affect the plain meaning of the words used in para 1.

Mr Gibson did fill in the application form enclosed with this letter. It was in three sections: s A headed "Application to buy a council house", s B "Application for a loan to buy a council house" and s C "Certificate to be completed by all applicants." He left blank the space for the purchase price in s A and sent the form to the corporation on 5 March 1971, with a covering letter in which he requested the corporation either to undertake at their own expense to carry out repairs to the tarmac path forming part of the premises or to make a deduction from the purchase price to cover the cost of repairs. The letter also intimated that Mr Gibson would like to make a down payment of £500 towards the purchase price instead of borrowing the whole amount on mortgage. In reply to the request made in this letter the corporation, by letter of 12 March 1971, said that the condition of the property had been taken into consideration in fixing the purchase price and that repairs to the tarmac by the corporation could not be authorised at this stage. This letter was acknowledged by Mr Gibson by his letter to the corporation of 18 March 1971, in which he asked the corporation to "carry on with the purchase as per my application already in your possession".

My Lords, the application form and letter of 18 March 1971, were relied on by Mr Gibson as an unconditional acceptance of the corporation's offer to sell the house; but this cannot be so unless there was a contractual offer by the corporation available for acceptance, and, for the reason already given I am of opinion that there was none. It is unnecessary to consider whether the application form and Mr Gibson's letters of 3 and 18 March 1971, are capable of amounting to a contractual offer by him to purchase the freehold interest in the house at a price of £2,180 on the terms of an open contract, for there is no suggestion that, even if it were, it was ever accepted by the corporation. Nor would it ever have been even if there had been no [abandonment of the scheme] as the policy of the corporation before the change required the incorporation in all agreements for sale of council houses to tenants of the conditions referred to by Lord Denning MR in his judgment and other conditions inconsistent with an open contract.

I therefore feel compelled to allow the appeal. One can sympathise with Mr Gibson's disappointment on finding that his expectations that he would be able to buy his council house at 20 per cent below its market value in the autumn of 1970 cannot be realised. Whether one thinks this makes it a hard case perhaps depends upon the political views that one holds about council housing policy. But hard cases offer a strong temptation to let them have their proverbial consequences. It is a temptation that the judicial mind must be vigilant to resist.

[Lord Edmund-Davies and Lord Russell of Killowen in separate judgments agreed that the appeal be allowed. Lord Fraser of Tullybelton agreed with Lord Diplock and Lord Russell. Lord Keith of Kinkel agreed with Lord Diplock.]

Appeal allowed.

In the preceding extract, Lord Diplock refers to the possibility of exceptional types of contracts which do not "fit easily into the normal analysis of offer and acceptance". Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Company

[3.25] Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Company [1893] 1 QB 256 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Hawkins J.

[FACTS: The defendants manufactured a device called a "Carbolic Smoke Ball", which was claimed to prevent colds and influenza. They placed the following advertisement in a number of newspapers, including the Pall Mall Gazette of 13 November 1891:

> £100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Company to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic influenza, colds, or any disease caused by taking cold, after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with each ball. £1 000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, Regent Street, shewing our sincerity in the matter.
> During the last epidemic of influenza many thousand carbolic smoke balls were sold as preventives against this disease, and in no ascertained case was the disease contracted by those using the carbolic smoke ball.
>
> One carbolic smoke ball will last a family several months, making it the cheapest remedy in the world at the price, 10s, post free. The ball can be refilled at a cost of 5s. Address, Carbolic Smoke Ball Company, 27 Princes Street, Hanover Square, London.

The plaintiff purchased a smoke ball from a chemist on the faith of the advertisement and used it in accordance with the manufacturer's directions from 20 November 1891 until 17 January 1892, when she contracted influenza. The trial judge held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the £100. The defendant appealed.]

LINDLEY LJ: [261] The first observation I will make is that we are not dealing with any inference of fact. We are dealing with an express promise to pay £100 in certain events. Read the advertisement how you will, and twist it about as you will, here is a distinct promise expressed in language which is perfectly unmistakable: "£100 reward will be paid by the Carbolic Smoke Ball Company to any person who contracts the influenza after having used the ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions supplied with each ball."

We must first consider whether this was intended to be a promise at all, or whether it was a mere puff which meant nothing. Was it a mere puff? My answer to that question is "No", and I base my answer upon this passage: "£1 000 is deposited with the Alliance Bank, shewing our sincerity in the matter."

Now, for what was that money deposited or that statement made except to negative the suggestion that this was a mere puff and meant nothing at all? The deposit is called in [262] aid by the advertiser as proof of his sincerity in the matter – that is, the sincerity of his promise to pay this £100 in the event which he has specified. I say this for the purpose of giving point to the observation that we are not inferring a promise; there is the promise, as plain as words can make it.

Then it is contended that it is not binding. In the first place, it is said that it is not made with anybody in particular. Now that point is common to the words of this advertisement and to the words of all other advertisements offering rewards. They are offers to anybody who performs the conditions named in the advertisement, and anybody who does perform the condition accepts the offer. In point of law this advertisement is an offer to pay £100 to anybody who will perform these conditions, and the performance of the conditions is the acceptance of the offer. That rests upon a string of authorities, the earliest of which is Williams v Carwardine (1833) 4 B & Ad 621; 110 ER 590, which has been followed by many other decisions upon advertisements offering rewards.

But then it is said: "Supposing that the performance of the conditions is an acceptance of the offer, that acceptance ought to have been notified."

Unquestionably, as a general proposition, when an offer is made, it is necessary in order to make a binding contract, not only that it should be accepted, but that the acceptance should be notified. But is that so in cases of this kind? I apprehend that they are an exception to that rule, or, if not an exception, they are open to the observation that the notification of the acceptance need not precede the performance. This offer is a continuing offer. It was never revoked, and if notice of acceptance is required – which I doubt very much, for I rather think the true view is that which was expressed and explained by Lord Blackburn in the case of Brogden v Metropolitan Ry Co (1877) 2 App Cas 666 at 692 – if notice of acceptance is required, the person who makes the offer gets the notice of acceptance contemporaneously with his notice of performance of the condition. If he gets notice of the acceptance before his offer is revoked, that in principle is all you want. I, however, think that the true view, in a case of this kind, is that the person who makes the offer shews by his language and from the nature of the transaction that he [263] does not expect and does not require notice of the acceptance apart from notice of the performance.

We, therefore, find here all the elements which are necessary to form a binding contract enforceable in point of law, subject to two observations. First of all it is said that this advertisement is so vague that you cannot really construe it as a promise – that the vagueness of the language shews that a legal promise was never intended or contemplated. The language is vague and uncertain in some respects, and particularly in this, that the £100 is to be paid to any person who contracts the increasing epidemic after having used the balls three times daily for two weeks. It is said, When are they to be used? According to the language of the advertisement no time is fixed, and, construing the offer most strongly against the person who has made it, one might infer that any time was meant. I do not think that was meant, and to hold the contrary would be pushing too far the doctrine of taking language most strongly against the person using it. I do not think that business people or reasonable people would understand the words as meaning that if you took a smoke ball and used it three times daily for two weeks you were to be guaranteed against influenza for the rest of your life, and I think it would be pushing the language of the advertisement too far to construe it as meaning that. But if it does not mean that, what does it mean? It is for the defendants to shew what it does mean; and it strikes me that there are two, and possibly three, reasonable constructions to be put on this advertisement, any one of which will answer the purpose of the plaintiff. Possibly it may be limited to persons catching the "increasing epidemic" (that is, the then prevailing epidemic), or any colds or diseases caused by taking cold, during the prevalence of the increasing epidemic. That is one suggestion; but it does not commend itself to me. Another suggested meaning is that you are warranted free from catching this epidemic, or colds or other diseases caused by taking cold, whilst you are using this remedy after using it for two weeks. If that is the meaning, the plaintiff is right, for she used the remedy for two weeks and went on using it till she got the epidemic. Another meaning, and the one which I rather prefer, is that the reward is offered to [264] any person who contracts the epidemic or other disease within a reasonable time after having used the smoke ball. Then it is asked, What is a reasonable time? It has been suggested that there is no standard of reasonableness; that it depends upon the reasonable time for a germ to develop! I do not feel pressed by that. It strikes me that a reasonable time may be ascertained in a business sense and in a sense satisfactory to a lawyer, in this way; find out from a chemist what the ingredients are; find out from a skilled physician how long the effect of such ingredients on the system could be reasonably expected to endure so as to protect a person from an epidemic or cold, and in that way you will get a standard to be laid before a jury, or a judge without a jury, by which they might exercise their judgment as to what a reasonable time would be. It strikes me, I confess, that the true construction of this advertisement is that £100 will be paid to anybody who uses this smoke ball three times daily for two weeks according to the printed directions, and who gets the influenza or cold or other diseases caused by taking cold within a reasonable time after so using it; and if that is the true construction, it is enough for the plaintiff.

I come now to the last point which I think requires attention – that is, the consideration. It has been argued that this is nudum pactum; that there is no consideration. We must apply to that argument the usual legal tests. Let us see whether there is no advantage to the defendants. It is said that the use of the ball is no advantage to them, and that what benefits them is the sale; and the case is put that a lot of these balls might be stolen, and that it would be no advantage to the defendants if the thief or other people used them. The answer to that, I think, is as follows. It is quite obvious that in the view of the advertisers a use by the public of their remedy, if they can only get the public to have confidence enough to use it, will react and produce a sale which is directly beneficial to them. Therefore, the advertisers get out of the use an advantage which is enough to constitute a consideration.

But there is another view. Does not the person who acts upon this advertisement and accepts the offer put himself to some inconvenience at the request of the defendants? Is it nothing [265] to use this ball three times daily for two weeks according to the directions at the request of the advertiser? Is that to go for nothing? It appears to me that there is a distinct inconvenience, not to say a detriment, to any person who so uses the smoke ball. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is ample consideration for the promise …

It appears to me, therefore, that the defendants must perform their promise, and, if they have been so unwary as to expose themselves to a great many actions, so much the worse for them.

[3.30] BOWEN LJ: I am of the same opinion. We were asked to say that this document was a contract too vague to be enforced.

The first observation which arises is that the document itself is not a contract at all, it is only an offer made to the public.

[266] The defendants contend next, that it is an offer the terms of which are too vague to be treated as a definite offer, inasmuch as there is no limit of time fixed for the catching of the influenza, and it cannot be supposed that the advertisers seriously meant to promise to pay money to every person who catches the influenza at any time after the inhaling of the smoke ball … It seems to me that in order to arrive at a right conclusion we must read this advertisement in its plain meaning, as the public would understand it. It was intended to be issued to the public and to be read by the public. How would any ordinary person reading this document construe it? It was intended unquestionably to have some effect, and I think the effect which it was intended to have, was to make people use the smoke ball, because the suggestions and allegations which it contains are directed immediately to the use of the smoke ball as distinct from the purchase of it … It is written in colloquial and popular language, and I think that it is equivalent to this: "£100 will be paid to any person who shall contract the increasing epidemic after having used the carbolic smoke ball three times daily for two weeks."

And it seems to me that the way in which the public would read it would be this, that if anybody, after the advertisement was published, used three times daily for two weeks the carbolic smoke ball, and then caught cold, he would be entitled to the reward. Then again it was said: "How long is this protection to endure? Is it to go on for ever, or for what limit of time?"

[267] I think that there are two constructions of this document, each of which is good sense, and each of which seems to me to satisfy the exigencies of the present action. It may mean that the protection is warranted to last during the epidemic, and it was during the epidemic that the plaintiff contracted the disease. I think, more probably, it means that the smoke ball will be a protection while it is in use. That seems to me the way in which an ordinary person would understand an advertisement about medicine, and about a specific against influenza … My brother, the Lord Justice who preceded me, thinks that the contract would be [268] sufficiently definite if you were to read it in the sense that the protection was to be warranted during a reasonable period after use. I have some difficulty myself on that point; but it is not necessary for me to consider it further, because the disease here was contracted during the use of the carbolic smoke ball …

It was also said that the contract is made with all the world – that is, with everybody; and that you cannot contract with everybody. It is not a contract made with all the world. There is the fallacy of the argument. It is an offer made to all the world; and why should not an offer be made to all the world which is to ripen into a contract with anybody who comes forward and performs the condition? It is an offer to become liable to any one who, before it is retracted, performs the condition, and, although the offer is made to the world, the contract is made with that limited portion of the public who come forward and perform the condition on the faith of the advertisement. It is not like cases in which you offer to negotiate, or you issue advertisements that you have got a stock of books to sell, or houses to let, in which case there is no offer to be bound by any contract. Such advertisements are offers to negotiate – offers to receive offers – offers to chaffer, as, I think, some learned judge in one of the cases has said. If this is an offer to be bound, then it is a contract the moment the person fulfils the condition …

[269] Then it was said that there was no notification of the acceptance of the contract. One cannot doubt that, as an ordinary rule of law, an acceptance of an offer made ought to be notified to the person who makes the offer, in order that the two minds may come together. Unless this is done the two minds may be apart, and there is not that consensus which is necessary according to the English law – I say nothing about the laws of other countries – to make a contract. But there is this clear gloss to be made upon that doctrine, that as notification of acceptance is required for the benefit of the person who makes the offer, the person who makes the offer may dispense with notice to himself if he thinks it desirable to do so, and I suppose there can be no doubt that where a person in an offer made by him to another person, expressly or impliedly intimates a particular mode of acceptance as sufficient to make the bargain binding, it is only necessary for the other person to whom such offer is made to follow the indicated method of acceptance; and if the person making the offer, expressly or impliedly intimates in his offer that it will be sufficient to act on the proposal without communicating [270] acceptance of it to himself, performance of the condition is a sufficient acceptance without notification …

Now, if that is the law, how are we to find out whether the person who makes the offer does intimate that notification of acceptance will not be necessary in order to constitute a binding bargain? In many cases you look to the offer itself. In many cases you extract from the character of the transaction that notification is not required, and in the advertisement cases it seems to me to follow as an inference to be drawn from the transaction itself that a person is not to notify his acceptance of the offer before he performs the condition, but that if he performs the condition notification is dispensed with.

It seems to me that from the point of view of common sense no other idea could be entertained. If I advertise to the world that my dog is lost, and that anybody who brings the dog to a particular place will be paid some money, are all the police or other persons whose business it is to find lost dogs to be expected to sit down and write me a note saying that they have accepted my proposal? Why, of course, they at once look after the dog, and as soon as they find the dog they have performed the condition. The essence of the transaction is that the dog should be found, and it is not necessary under such circumstances, as it seems to me, that in order to make the contract binding there should be any notification of acceptance. It follows from the nature of the thing that the performance of the condition is sufficient acceptance without the notification of it, and a person who makes an offer in an advertisement of that kind makes an offer which must be read by the light of that common sense reflection. He does, therefore, in his offer impliedly indicate that he does not require notification of the acceptance of the offer.

A further argument for the defendants was that this was a [271] nudum pactum – that there was no consideration for the promise – that taking the influenza was only a condition, and that the using the smoke ball was only a condition, and that there was no consideration at all; in fact, that there was no request, express or implied, to use the smoke ball … The short answer, to abstain from academical discussion, is, it seems to me, that there is here a request to use involved in the offer. Then as to the alleged want of consideration. The definition of "consideration" given in Selwyn's Nisi Prius (8th ed), p 47, which is cited and adopted by Tindal CJ, in the case Laythoarp v Bryant (1836) 2 Bing (NC) 735; 132 ER 283, is this:

> Any act of the plaintiff from which the defendant derives a benefit or advantage, or any labour, detriment, or inconvenience sustained by the plaintiff, provided such act is performed or such inconvenience suffered by the plaintiff, with the consent, either express or implied, of the defendant.

Can it be said here that if the person who reads this advertisement applies thrice daily, for such time as may seem to him tolerable, the carbolic smoke ball to his nostrils for a whole fortnight, he is doing nothing at all – that it is a mere act which is not to count towards consideration to support a promise (for the law does not require us to measure the adequacy of the consideration). Inconvenience sustained by one party at the request of the other is enough to create a consideration. I think, therefore, that it is consideration enough that the plaintiff took the trouble of using the smoke ball. But I think also that the defendants received a benefit from this user, for the use of the smoke ball was contemplated by the defendants as being indirectly a benefit to them, because the use of the smoke balls would promote their sale …

Appeal dismissed.

MacRobertson Miller Airline Services v Commissioner of State Taxation (WA)

[3.35] MacRobertson Miller Airline Services v Commissioner of State Taxation (WA) (1975) 133 CLR 125 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Western Australia.

[FACTS: A person wishing to take passage on MacRobertson Miller Airline Services would be advised, on inquiry, on what flights seats were available to her or his destination, and the fare. Having selected the flight, the prospective passenger was handed a ticket, on which were entered the appropriate details, in return for the fare. At the appropriate time, the passenger presented the ticket to secure her or his seat on the flight. A condition printed on the ticket provided that the airline reserved the right to abandon any flight or cancel any ticket or booking and that upon abandonment or cancellation, the passenger would be entitled to a refund of so much of the fare as was proportionate to the part of the flight abandoned or cancelled, and the airline would be under no other liability to the passenger for failure to carry her or him at the booked or scheduled time or at all.

It was necessary for stamp duty purposes to determine whether the ticket so issued was "an agreement or any memorandum of agreement". The Supreme Court of Western Australia found that it was. The airline appealed.]

BARWICK CJ: [132] It is, in my opinion, clear that the issuing airline operator does not by the terms of the ticket assume or offer to assume any obligation [133] to carry the intending passenger. Clauses 2 and 5 made this particularly clear. The case is not, in my opinion, one in which an obligation is assumed or an offer of an obligation made from or upon which obligations, exemptions or limitations are stipulated. The exemption of the ticket in this case fully occupies the whole area of possible obligation, leaving no room for the existence of a contract of carriage.

In my opinion, the proper legal analysis of the situation which arises on the making of a reservation for a seat upon a flight, the payment of the fare appropriate to that flight and the issue of a ticket as in this case, is that if, without any antecedent promise to do so, the airline operator in fact conveys the passenger in accordance with the reservation or any variant of it permissible under the terms of carriage indorsed on the ticket, the airline operator will have earned the fare which has been prepaid and be entitled to retain it: otherwise the amount which has been prepaid against the possibility of such carriage will be refunded. But if, in any case, the described carriage eventuates it shall be upon the indorsed terms of carriage. To this statement there is a possible qualification, namely, if the airline operator has been able, ready and willing to carry the passenger in accordance with the particulars on the ticket and the intending passenger has not presented himself in due time at the airline traffic office at the designated airport, the airline operator may claim to have earned the fare. In general, therefore, the entitlement of the airline company to retain the prepaid fare is dependent on the actual performance of carriage. The situation is an example of the payment of a reward for an act performed at request with no antecedent promise by the person performing the act to do so. The terms of carriage are akin to the terms of the prospectus in Edgar v Blick (1816) 1 Stark 464; 171 ER 531, and like them are not dutiable, though admissible to determine the rights of the passenger and airline in respect of the actual carriage.

In my opinion, therefore, the precise question in the stated case should be answered in the opposite sense to the answer given by the Supreme Court.

However, quite apart from the particular terms of the ticket in the instant case, the issue of a ticket by an airline operator neither constitutes an agreement nor a memorandum of an agreement. I apprehend that the normal procedure in making a reservation of a seat on an aeroplane flight is that inquiry is made of the airline operator or its agent, usually being a travel agent, whether, having regard to existing reservations, a seat is available on a nominated flight. If it is, the appropriate fare is paid or promised to be paid [134] and a ticket appropriate to the reservation issued. Now, supposing the airline ticket does not contain an express promise to carry the ticket holder on the nominated flight, it could (sic) be inferred from this procedure that the airline company by the issue of the ticket had bound itself by agreement to carry the intending passenger on the specified, or for that matter on any, flight, a promise which being broken would require the payment of damages. On a proper analysis of the procedure described, the airline operator was not in contractual relations with the intending passenger until it had provided him with a seat on the aeroplane. Then, in consideration of the fare prepaid, such obligations as the conditions of the ticket impose on the airline operator attached. The issue of the ticket, in my opinion, is mainly a receipt for the payment of the fare, though it also stipulates an occasion when the fare may not be refundable though actual carriage has not ensued. The payment made on the making of the reservation ought, in my opinion, to be regarded as no more than the prepayment of the fare payable for an actual carriage performed. Having regard to the known contingencies of airline operation it would be incongruous to infer the making of a promise to carry from the mere payment of the fare and its acknowledgment by the issue of a ticket. The ticket, apart from any specific terms it might contain, would not be regarded as entitling its holder to a place on a particular flight. It should be regarded as doing no more than denominate the carriage which, if performed, will earn the prepaid fare. If, as in the present case, the ticket contains terms of carriage, these will, given the performance of the denominated carriage, regulate the relationship of the parties during and in connection with such carriage and thus their respective rights in relation thereto.

It should be observed that in Hood v Anchor Line (Henderson Bros) Ltd [1918] AC 837, the question was whether a part of the ticket which had been issued by the steamship company formed part of the terms on which the actual carriage took place. The action was for negligence in the performance of that carriage. Thus, even if there had not been in that case an antecedent promise to carry, the condition by which the appellant was held to be bound would have been part of the terms governing the relationship of the parties during the performance of the actual carriage. But, in fact, the ticket issued by the ship owner in that case contained an express engagement "to provide passage with certain accommodation on a particular voyage". The ticket in that case, as Lord Findlay observed, "really professes to be a memorandum of the contract": [1918] AC 837 at 841.

[135] In any case, a promise to carry may be more appropriately made by a steamship company than by an airline operator. The marked degree of certainty on the one hand and of uncertainty on the other affords good ground for distinguishing the inferences which, apart from express provisions, might be drawn in the one case though not in the other.

Therefore, although the terms of the ticket in this case with their express and extensive limitations and exclusions preclude the existence of an antecedent contract of carriage, it is my opinion that, in any case, without the presence of these express provisions and in the absence of an express provision to carry, the ticket would not represent an agreement or a memorandum of agreement to satisfy the relevant portion of the schedule to the Stamp Act …

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal.

[3.40] STEPHEN J: Until 1970 the United Kingdom stamp duty legislation contained a similar provision and a wealth of authority as to its meaning has developed which is directly applicable to the provisions of the Western Australian legislation. It establishes that a document containing a written offer which is subsequently accepted orally or by conduct does not thereby become either an agreement or a memorandum thereof for the purposes of stamp duty …

[136] Accordingly, in the present appeal it will be critical to determine whether the issue by the appellant of its ticket was merely the making of an offer, to be later accepted either orally or by conduct, or whether, on the contrary, an agreement, of which it contained the terms, was concluded at or before the time of its issue, the ticket either being that agreement or being a memorandum of it. Each of these two latter possibilities will be excluded if the fact be that when the ticket was issued to the passenger no agreement had yet been concluded but instead awaited the passenger's acceptance of the offer constituted by the ticket …

A prospective passenger makes known his requirement, is informed whether and when the passage is available and the cost, a ticket is then written out in duplicate on a printed form and tendered to the passenger in return for the price; in due course, on the day of travel, the passenger uses his ticket to secure transport of his baggage and himself on the relevant aircraft.

It is to those facts that the accepted doctrine of the formation of contracts must be applied so as to determine whether the ticket is merely an offer, antecedent to agreement, or is itself the agreement or a memorandum of it.

This doctrine, of the formation of contracts by offer and acceptance, encounters difficulties when sought to be applied, outside the realms of commerce and conveyancing, to the everyday contractual situations which are a feature of life in modern urban communities. Contracts for the carriage of passengers, one of the most common classes of contract in a commuter society and one which ordinarily involves the attempted imposition of contractual restrictions upon the passenger's rights should he suffer loss or injury, provide an instance of these difficulties. The circumstances in which mass transportation occurs frequently permit of no time for prior negotiation, which would in any event usually be pointless with prevailing contracts of adhesion; moreover the transportation often will begin before there has been any communication at all between the passenger and the carrier's agent, the contract being "inferred from [137] the acquiescence of the carrier in the presence of the passenger on the conveyance":

Hood v Anchor Line (Henderson Bros) Ltd per Lord Dunedin; and see Wilkie v London Passenger Transport Board [1947] 1 All ER 258 at 259 per Lord Greene MR.

The conventional analysis of the formation of contracts for the carriage of passengers in those somewhat more leisurely transactions which involve the issue of a ticket in return for payment of a fare and the subsequent performance of the contract by the act of transportation, is to regard the ticket as the offer, the contract being made upon acceptance of that offer by the passenger, usually by conduct. Lord Denning describes this analysis, referring to the authorities which establish it, in Thornton v Shoe Lane Parking Ltd [1971] 2 QB 163 at 169. He does so in the course of demonstrating its inappropriateness in situations in which there in fact exists no opportunity either of considering the terms of the proffered contract or of declining to enter into it on the terms which are offered.

In the present case there is no such inappropriateness. It is just such a case as that for which the conventional analysis was devised. This analysis affords to the intending passenger an opportunity, no doubt but rarely availed of, of ascertaining the conditions which the carrier seeks to impose and of accepting or rejecting them. The conventional long-distance rail or passenger liner situation is therefore applicable, a ticket is purchased in advance of the carriage and that ticket constitutes an offer available for acceptance by the passenger. Although the economics of mass transportation in fact lead to an absence of much real choice on the passenger's part whether or not to accept conditions sought to be imposed, he at least retains the ability to learn of those conditions and to refuse to travel by the intended means if he sees fit.

The general run of so called "ticket cases" involving contracts of carriage has been concerned with mishaps occurring during transportation and with the effect, if any, which conditions, sought to be imposed upon the passenger by the ticket issued to him, may have upon his rights against the carrier. The precise time at which the carrier's offer is accepted has not been the central question, although it has been indirectly involved in the central question of whether or not the conditions on the ticket have been incorporated as terms of the contract. The authorities make it clear that, in the [138] absence of particular conduct on the part of the passenger, acceptance of the offer which a carrier makes when a ticket is issued does not occur immediately upon its receipt by the passenger; the whole concept of a passenger's acceptance of ticket conditions and of the need adequately to draw those conditions to his attention (Balmain New Ferry Co Ltd v Robertson (1906) 4 CLR 379 at 387 per Griffith CJ) is dependent upon this.

It is enough to refer to three authorities, over a span of almost a hundred years, in which, when the ticket itself contains conditions or a reference to conditions elsewhere available, the passenger's acceptance of the carrier's offer is treated as occurring some time after issue of the ticket. In Parker v

South Eastern Railway Co (1877) 2 CPD 416 at 426–8 Bramwell LJ, on three occasions referred to the passenger being afforded, if he wishes, the opportunity of reading the conditions on a ticket which is proffered to him before becoming bound by them, that is, before the contract can be regarded as concluded, and see also (1877) 2 CPD 416 at 425 per Baggallay LJ …

[139] The cases … are replete with references to passengers who elect not to read ticket conditions, no doubt the common behaviour of most passengers; they, it is said, do not thereby escape being bound by those conditions. This rule of law, which is directed to identifying the agreed terms of the particular contract, does not detract from but, rather, supports the proposition that acceptance, and the resultant formation of the contract, does not occur upon tender of the ticket. It occurs after that event, either when the passenger has by actual conduct intimated his acceptance of the offer, for instance by immediately boarding the vehicle in question, or, absent any such conduct, when a reasonable time has passed during which the passenger has had an opportunity of reading the conditions appearing on the ticket and has not then rejected the offer and demanded the return of his fare. In other words, acceptance will normally be by conduct and this conduct will consist either of an overt act consistent only with acceptance or, in its absence, of the passenger's failure to reject the offer after he has had an opportunity of learning of the conditions upon which carriage is offered.

Those cases in which a contract is concluded which incorporates ticket conditions despite the passenger's failure to read them are instances either of the occurrence of such an overt act or of the passing of a reasonable time without rejection. In the latter case there is involved the concept of effective acceptance without actual communication to the offeror; but when, as here, the offeree, by tendering his fare, has performed his part of the bargain in advance his acceptance may readily be inferred from his failure, within a reasonable time after receipt of his ticket, to reject the offer and demand the return of his fare: Williston on Contracts (3rd ed), vol 1, para 91C. What will be a reasonable time within which to reject proffered terms will be a question of fact in every case dependent upon all the circumstances, including, no doubt, the length and complexity of the conditions which form part of the offer. What Hawkins J in Watkins v Rymill (1883) 10 QBD 180, and Megaw LJ in the passage cited from the Shoe Lane Parking case [1971] 2 QB 163 at 173–4, each referred to as "a fair opportunity" of reading the tendered ticket will provide the test, recourse being had, for this purpose, to familiar standards of reasonableness.

If this, then, be the correct view of the time of formation of such a contract as the present one, it necessarily follows that in the [140] typical circumstances referred to in the stated case the completed ticket itself will not, when it comes into existence, then record any existing agreement nor itself be an agreement; it will be no more than a written offer open for acceptance. Hence it is not dutiable as an "agreement or any memorandum of an agreement" for the purposes of the Stamp Act.

The conditions appearing in the appellant's ticket are not easy to interpret; they appear to relieve the appellant very substantially from performance of those obligations relating to the carriage of the passenger which are to be implied from the description, in the ticket, of the destination, the flight number and the departure time and date. However I think it unnecessary to arrive at any conclusion as to whether the presence of these conditions is such as to prevent the formation of any contract between the appellant and its passenger before transportation commences. It is enough for me to conclude that at date of issue the ticket was not an agreement or any memorandum of agreement. I would therefore allow this appeal …

[JACOBS J also considered that the ticket was not an agreement or memorandum of agreement. In relation to cl 2, Jacobs J commented (at 148): "any enforceable promise to carry which might on the present assumption be implied between the airline and passenger from the issue of the ticket is negatived."]

Appeal allowed.

Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Boots Cash Chemists (Southern)

[3.50] Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain v Boots Cash Chemists (Southern) Ltd [1953] 1 QB 401 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Lord Goddard CJ.

[FACTS: The defendants (Boots) operated a self-service shop in one part of which certain drugs were displayed. This part of the shop was under the control of a registered pharmacist. A customer, having taken the goods, including drugs, which he wished to buy from the shelves, would put them in a wire basket provided for the purpose and take them to an attendant at the cash register at one of the shop's exits. Whenever a customer took drugs to the cash register the pharmacist supervised that part of the transaction and was authorised by the defendants to prevent a customer removing drugs if he saw fit. Two customers following this procedure purchased drugs. The Pharmacy and Poisons Act 1933 (UK) made it unlawful for a person to sell certain drugs unless "the sale is effected by, or under the supervision of, a registered pharmacist".

Lord Goddard had held that sales of the drugs in the manner described did not contravene the Act.]

SOMERVELL LJ: [405] The point taken by the plaintiffs is this: it is said that the purchase is complete if and when a customer going round the shelves takes an article and puts it in the receptacle which he or she is carrying, and that therefore, if that is right, when the customer comes to the pay desk, having completed the tour of the premises, the registered pharmacist, if so minded, has no power to say: "This drug ought not to be sold to this customer." Whether and in what circumstances he would have that power we need not inquire, but one can, of course, see that there is a difference if supervision can only be exercised at a time when the contract is completed …

Whether the view contended for by the plaintiffs is a right view depends on what are the legal implications of this layout – the invitation to the customer. Is a contract to be regarded as being completed when the article is put into the receptacle, or is this to be regarded as a more organised way of doing what is done already in many types of shops – and a bookseller is perhaps the best example – namely, enabling customers to have free access to what is in the shop, to look at the different articles, and then, ultimately, having got the ones which they wish to buy, to come up to the assistant saying "I want this"? The assistant in 999 times out of 1 000 says, "That is all right", and the money passes and [406] the transaction is completed. I agree with what the Lord Chief Justice has said, and with the reasons which he has given for his conclusion, that in the case of an ordinary shop, although goods are displayed and it is intended that customers should go and choose what they want, the contract is not completed until, the customer having indicated the articles which he needs, the shopkeeper, or someone on his behalf, accepts that offer. Then the contract is completed. I can see no reason at all, that being clearly the normal position, for drawing any different implication as a result of this layout.

The Lord Chief Justice, I think, expressed one of the most formidable difficulties in the way of the plaintiff's contention when he pointed out that, if the plaintiffs are right, once an article has been placed in the receptacle the customer himself is bound and would have no right, without paying for the first article, to substitute an article which he saw later of a similar kind and which he perhaps preferred. I can see no reason for implying from this self-service arrangement any implication other than that which the Lord Chief Justice found in it, namely, that it is a convenient method of enabling customers to see what there is and choose, and possibly put back and substitute, articles which they wish to have, and then to go up to the cashier and offer to buy what they have so far chosen. On that conclusion the case fails, because it is admitted that there was supervision in the sense required by the Act and at the appropriate moment of time. For these reasons, in my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

[3.55] BIRKETT LJ: [407] The Lord Chief Justice dealt with the matter in this way, and I would like to adopt his words ([1952] 2 QB 795 at 802):

> It seems to me, therefore, that the transaction is in no way different from the normal transaction in a shop in which there is no self-service scheme. I am quite satisfied it would be wrong to say that the shopkeeper is making an offer to sell every article in the shop to any person who might come in and that person can insist on buying any article by saying "I accept your offer."

Then he went on to deal with the illustration of the bookshop, and continued:

> Therefore, in my opinion, the mere fact that a customer picks up a bottle of medicine from the shelves in this case does not amount to an acceptance of an offer to sell. It is an offer by the customer to buy and there is no sale effected until the buyer's offer to buy is accepted by the acceptance of the price. The offer, the acceptance of the price, and therefore the sale take place under the supervision of the pharmacist. This is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the section …

[ROMER LJ in a brief judgment also agreed that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

Revocation of an offer

Goldsbrough Mort & Co v Quinn

[3.60] Goldsbrough Mort & Co Ltd v Quinn (1910) 10 CLR 674 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The facts are set out by Griffith CJ.]

GRIFFITH CJ: [677] This was a suit by the appellants for specific performance of an agreement, the terms of which are contained in a document dated 8 February 1909, and signed by the respondent in the following terms:

> I John Thomas Quinn in consideration of the sum of five shillings paid to me hereby grant to Goldsbrough, Mort & Co Ltd the right to purchase the whole of my freehold and conditional purchase and conditional lease lands situate near Canonbar, and known as Bena Billa, comprising about 2 590 acres, within one week from this date at the price of £1 10s per > acre, calculated on a freehold basis, and subject to the usual terms and conditions of sale relating to such lands, and upon the exercise of this option I agree to transfer the whole of the said lands to the said company or its nominee.

The respondent says that before the expiration of the week, and before acceptance of the offer by the appellants, he informed the appellants' solicitor, at whose office the document was drawn up and signed, that he repudiated the offer, alleging that it had been made under a mistake …. [678] The appellants, notwithstanding the alleged repudiation, but without any other notice of it, accepted the offer within the week.

The respondent contends that under these circumstances there never was any complete contract for sale of the land, that the only agreement evidenced by the document of 8 February was an agreement to make another agreement, which if made might have been enforced specifically, and that the only remedy for breach of the actual agreement is in damages …

All agreements consist, in substance, of an offer made by one party and accepted by the other. The offer and acceptance may be contemporaneous, or the offer may be made under such circumstances that it is to be regarded as a continuing offer subsisting at the moment of acceptance. At that point there is a consensus ad idem, that is, a contract. But an offer may be withdrawn at any time before acceptance. A mere promise to leave it open for a specified time makes no difference, because there is, as yet, no agreement, and the promise, if made without some distinct consideration, is nudum pactum and not binding. But if there is (as in the present case) a consideration for the promise it is binding. This is often expressed by saying that an option given for value is not revocable … I think that the true principle is that in such a case the real transaction is not an offer accompanied by a promise, but a contract for valuable consideration, viz, to sell the property (or whatever the subject matter may be) upon condition that the other party shall within the stipulated time bind himself to perform the terms of the offer embodied in the contract. I think that such a contract is not in principle distinguishable from a stipulation in a lease that the lessee shall have an option of purchase, which is in substance a contract to sell upon condition. The nature of the consideration for the promise is not material.

If, however, the only promise was a promise not to withdraw [679] the offer, I should have some difficulty in saying that a breach of it could not be properly compensated for in damages.

I think, therefore, that this point fails, and that a suit for specific performance may be maintained in respect of the contract constituted by the letter of 8 February, and its acceptance by the appellants.

[684] For these reasons I think that the appeal must be allowed.

[3.65] O'CONNOR J: [685] [I]t is necessary to advert to the form of the offer and to its effect. In substance it is an undertaking by the respondent to sell and transfer to the appellants the lands referred to at the price named on condition that the appellants on their part are willing to buy on those terms, and signify their assent within one week from 8 February 1909. In other words, it is an agreement to sell on a condition subsequent, the condition being the acceptance of the other party within the time named. The appellant's right under the contract is to accept within the week, and having fulfilled [686] the condition they were entitled to all the benefits of the contract. The respondent's refusal to perform his part by withdrawing his undertaking and preventing the appellants from accepting was a breach which entitled them to maintain an action for damages at law, or if the case were deemed to be one for specific performance, entitled them to a decree for that relief. But the document may also be regarded from another point of view. Assume that it was merely an offer to sell on the terms embodied in the document. The respondent on the face of it undertakes for valuable consideration to keep it open to the plaintiff for a week. During that week he could not lawfully withdraw it. That proposition seems to me obvious on the established principles of the law of contracts, and it appears to have been assumed to be so in many cases. In Bruner v Moore [1904] 1 Ch 305, for instance, Farwell J takes it to be settled law that an option for value is not revocable during the period for which it is given. The respondent therefore having withdrawn the offer during the week is liable at law to an action for depriving the appellants of their right of acceptance. The position in equity assuming the agreement proper under all the circumstances for specific performance, is I think correctly stated in the passage from Page on Contracts, vol 1, pp 63–4, quoted during the argument. A court of equity will disregard the withdrawal, and treat the offer as if it had been duly accepted while still open for acceptance. In my view it is of little moment whether the document is regarded as an agreement by the vendor to sell subject to a condition subsequent which the purchaser has performed, or as an option given for valuable consideration which could not be withdrawn, and the withdrawal of which before acceptance a court of equity will disregard in adjusting the rights of the parties. Looked at in either aspect there is nothing in the form or effect of the document to disentitle the appellants from obtaining a decree for specific performance of the whole agreement to as full an extent as if the option was still subsisting at the date of acceptance …

[690] It follows that the appeal must be allowed and the judgment appealed against set aside.

[3.70] ISAACS J: The first question is as to the effect of the contract of 8 February 1909. That contract is what is ordinarily known as an option; it consists of a promise founded on valuable consideration to sell land on stated terms within a given time. Unsupported by valuable consideration such a promise would be nudum pactum, and until the creation of a contract by acceptance in strict accordance with the stated conditions, could be withdrawn. So much is clearly established by a century of decisions …

If accepted in accordance with the stipulated conditions, no attempted withdrawal having meanwhile taken place, the relation of vendor and purchaser is created by the contract thus formed, and such a contract may be ordered to be specifically carried out. Again, that is the subject of express decision as in Bruner v Moore.

The respondent argues that in the circumstances of this case there was no contract of sale. He contends that, although the offer is supported by valuable consideration, yet if the promisor does in fact, before due acceptance, declare his intention not to carry out his promise, that is a withdrawal of his offer, and no subsequent acceptance can convert the relation of the parties into that of vendor and purchaser. The result, it is argued, is that although damages for breach of the original contract to let the offer stand may be recovered, yet in law there is no contract of [691] sale and purchase of land to specifically perform, or for the breach of which even damages can be awarded.

No decision actually determining this precise point has been cited to us; but the reasoning and unvarying dicta of judges of eminence demonstrate that the principle on which actual decisions have proceeded places the matter beyond doubt …

In Bruner v Moore where £400 was given for the option Farwell J says: "The option, which is given for value and is, therefore, not revocable," &c. In South Wales Miners' Federation v Glamorgan Coal Co [1905] AC 239 at 253 Lord Lindley points out that to break a contract is an unlawful act, and that in point of law a party to a contract is not entitled to break it even on offering to pay damages. This is only another way of saying the promise is irrevocable. In my opinion the whole question turns on that point, the irrevocability of the option.

The feature which distinguishes an option from a mere offer is the consideration. That, however, does not alter the nature of the offer, it merely ensures its continuance, by creating a relation in which the law forbids the offeror retracting it. He may attempt to do so – ignoring the circumstance that for consideration he has parted with the right to withdraw – but his attempt is in the sight of the law ineffectual.

He has parted with the right to alter his mind for the period limited, and he cannot in breach of his contract be heard to say the contrary. His offer must therefore be deemed to stand.

[692] To hold otherwise would be equivalent to saying he had not sold to the promisee on option, but only the promise to give an option, which would be absurd. It is the option which he has sold, that is, the right of electing whether to purchase or not …

It was rightly urged by learned counsel for the appellants that such an option gives the optionee an interest in the land … Of course the interest which the optionee possesses is not the same as that of a purchaser, but it is something real and substantial, and beyond the power of the grantor of the option to withdraw. Nevertheless I do not for this branch of the case rely on that equitable interest, because I would hold the respondent bound on general principles of contract whatever were the subject matter of the agreement, and would regard the offer as irrevocably fixed for the period agreed on.

The inevitable consequence is that in contemplation of law the offer was not withdrawn, and when linked with the acceptance, the necessary mutual contractual obligation to sell and purchase the land on the stipulated terms was created …

[696] In the view I take … I necessarily regard the parties as having entered into two separate contracts. The first was a unilateral contract that a certain offer should last for a week, and in this contract the con-[697]sideration was 5s. The appellants had no obligation beyond the consideration, the respondent none but to continue the offer for the stipulated time. Had there been any attempt by the respondent to dispose of the land to another during that period he might have been enjoined, because the affirmative promise to the appellants necessarily implied an undertaking not to sell to another. But in the absence of such an attempt the remedy was in the appellants' own hands. They could at any moment before the expiration of the period agreed on, by simple acceptance, convert their position of optionees into that of absolute vendees, with mutual obligations … That change of position has been effected by the act of the party entitled, and therefore the remedy of specific performance of the primary agreement is not only unnecessary and inappropriate but impossible. There is nothing in that agreement to perform. Its terms must be looked at, but only to ascertain the offer, which with acceptance constituted the later and distinct contract.

Unilateral contracts

Mobil Oil Australia v Wellcome International

[3.75] Mobil Oil Australia Ltd v Wellcome International Pty Ltd (1998) 81 FCR 475 (Federal Court of Australia) – Appeal from Wilcox J.

[FACTS: Mobil operated an incentive scheme for its franchisees known as the Circle of Excellence. Franchisees who achieved high scores in the Circle of Excellence judging were given certain rewards, such as overseas holidays. At a convention for franchisees held in 1991, Mobil's general manager for retail marketing, Mr Ken Stumbles, told franchisees that Mobil was seeking to implement a "tenure for performance" scheme. He told them that Mobil wanted to implement a scheme whereby a franchisee who achieved a score of 90 per cent or better in any year would be granted an extra year's tenure (the "one for one" proposal), but that this was very difficult to achieve under the Petroleum Retail Marketing Franchise Act 1980 (Cth) (the PRMF Act). He said it may be that the only way to give the extended tenure is to say that any franchisee who achieves a score of 90 per cent or better in the Circle of Excellence judging in each of the six years following 1991 would be granted a nine-year renewal of their franchise without cost (the "nine-for-six" proposal).

A videotape including the relevant part of Mr Stumbles' address was sent to all franchisees. The undertaking was repeated in literature distributed to franchisees. At subsequent regional meetings, franchisees were given a brochure including a tear-off slip which franchisees could sign to indicate that they did "accept the challenge to exceed 90% in Circle of Excellence judging and qualify for extra tenure." Many franchisees signed and returned the tear-off slip and took steps to improve their performance in the Circle of Excellence judging. Several franchisees achieved a score of 90 per cent or better in the four years following the announcement.

Following management and policy changes, Mobil announced in 1994 that it would not grant renewals free of charge on the basis proposed by Mr Stumbles, but would discount the renewal fees of any franchisees who had succeeded in obtaining 90 per cent or better in 1992 and 1993. One-hundred and fifty-four franchisees commenced proceedings against Mobil, claiming relief on the basis of breach of contract, equitable estoppel or misleading or deceptive conduct in breach of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth). They sought orders requiring Mobil to grant the additional tenure or compensate them for its loss. Mobil then abandoned the Circle of Excellence judging.

The parties selected five test cases, which were heard together by Wilcox J. Wilcox J held that Mobil had made no offer of a one-for-one extension, since Mr Stumbles clearly indicated that this could not be done under the PRMF Act. Wilcox J upheld the contract claim based on the nine-for-six proposal made by three franchisees who had achieved 90 per cent or better in the Circle of Excellence judging in the four years following the announcement. He ordered Mobil to grant a nine-year extension of each of those franchises without charge. He found that Mobil had not engaged in misleading or deceptive conduct because Mr Stumbles had reasonable grounds for making the representation at the time he made it. In any event, a claim in respect of misleading conduct would not provide the franchisees with damages in respect of their disappointed expectations. Wilcox J also found that the franchisees were not entitled to a renewal of their franchises on the basis of promissory estoppel. The detriment the franchisees had suffered in reliance on Mobil's promise did not justify holding Mobil to its promise. The relief claimed was disproportionate to the detriment suffered.

Mobil appealed to the Full Court. The successful franchisees filed notices of contention in respect of dismissal of the estoppel claims.]

THE COURT (LOCKHART, LINDGREN AND TAMBERLIN JJ): [494]

2. Contractual issues

[498] The trial judge found an offer of a nine-for-six promise in the following passage:

> So we have more work to do and where we're at at the moment is that maybe the only way to do this is to say that if you achieve 90 each year for the next 6 years then well [sic] guarantee you another 9 years as of right, no fees just a renewal. Now we've got a lot more work to do on this but the commitment that we're making to you here today is that we will find a way to extend your tenure automatically no costs if you consistently achieve 90 or better in Circle of Excellence judgings. (Emphasis added)

This passage follows immediately that in which Mr Stumbles said that the one-for-one proposal was made "very very difficult" by the PRMF Act and that Mobil had more work to do on the tenure for performance reward. In the first sentence set out above he says that the stage reached as at the time of the Convention was that "maybe" the only scheme consistent with the PRMF Act is a nine-for-six one.

The terms of the first sentence ("we have more work to do", "where we're at [499] the moment", "maybe") are not those of a present offer. That the first sentence is not to be understood as representing a commitment by Mobil is also made clear by the second and emphasised sentence: that sentence marks a passing from a statement of what Mobil is not prepared to commit itself to, to the language of commitment. The passage set out above is in fact as consistent with a rejection of a nine-for-six scheme as it is with a countenancing of it.

The import of the second and emphasised sentence, read in the context of the problems previously outlined by Mr Stumbles, is that while Mobil could not promise an extension of tenure for any particular period, and, concomitantly, could not define the degree of "consistency" of attainment of 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings to be achieved, it could and did assure franchisees that it would find some way to grant some extension automatically and without cost if a dealer achieved some degree of consistency of 90 per cent or better scores in those judgings. No doubt, the reference to "commitment" was taken seriously and was intended to be taken seriously. The sentence quoted came at the end of Mr Stumbles' references to the problems which had prevented Mobil from implementing a simple one-for-one plan. He must also have known of the unsatisfactorily discriminatory nature of the nine-for-six alternative. Yet he wished to finish on a positive, reassuring note. The best that he could fairly manage was the sentence in question. But in our respectful opinion, an offer of a promise to "find a way" to "extend [for an unspecified period]" a dealer's tenure if the dealer "consistently [over some undefined period]" achieved 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings, is simply too vague and uncertain to be capable of giving rise to contractual obligation. Nor do we think that the sentence can be construed with that which immediately preceded it, to indicate that Mobil would grant a nine-for-six extension if it should conclude that this was the only lawful way to provide a reward of tenure for performance.

We have reached this conclusion as a matter of construction of Mr Stumbles' address and have taken into account the accompanying captions, including that reading:

> 90 or better for 6 years
> Automatic 9 year renewal.

We need not repeat what we said earlier about the role of the screened captions. [The address was punctuated by captions flashed onto a screen at the front of the room in which dealers were having breakfast.]

Certain circumstances extrinsic to Mr Stumbles' speech may be noted. First, the second and emphasised sentence set out above was the only passage from Mr Stumbles' speech which was communicated by means of the "Convention highlights" video and the September 1991 issue of the "Mobil Marketer". Accordingly, in respect of persons who did not attend the Convention (with the exception of Mr Morris of Lyndel who saw a screening of the entire address), it is quite impossible to construe what they heard and saw as an offer of a nine-for-six promise ….

The learned trial judge emphasised that Mr Stumbles intended his speech to be taken seriously and acted upon, and that he was, for the purpose, the "mind" of Mobil. His Honour said of Mr Stumbles: "He intended, and so Mobil intended, that his offer of tenure for performance would motivate franchisees to improve their businesses; and he believed this "would in turn improve Mobil's business"."

[500] Referring to the tear-off slip, his Honour said: "Franchisees were asked to commit themselves in writing to "accept the challenge to exceed 90 in Circle of Excellence judging and qualify for extra tenure." This is the language of mutual commitment."

Notwithstanding Mr Stumbles' intention and the "commitment" sought by means of the completion and return of the tear-off slip, in our respectful view, the problem remains for the franchisees' case in contract, that neither the terms of the speech nor those of the tear-off slip were sufficiently certain to give rise to a contract.

What we have said above addresses the question whether there was an offer of a one-for-one or nine-for-six promise to be accepted by performance of an act to be found in Mr Stumbles' speech. We will deal later with the separate question whether Mr Stumbles' address laid sufficient foundation to activate an estoppel or to support the claim under s 52 of the [Trade Practices] Act.

It will next be necessary to consider other contractual issues which would arise if, contrary to our conclusions expressed above, Mobil did, through Mr Stumbles' speech, offer the nine-for-six promise.

Revocation of offer

Mobil submits that even if Mr Stumbles' speech could be characterised as containing an offer of a nine-for six-promise:

(a) Mobil revoked the offer before the earliest time when acceptance could have occurred (1997);

(b) the offer was not accepted because none of the five franchisees in question attained 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings in all six years 1992, 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996 and 1997; and

(c) specific performance was not an available remedy in all the circumstances.

These submissions raise several issues relating to unilateral contracts.

A unilateral contract is one in which the act of acceptance of the offer is also an executed consideration for the promise offered. The act of acceptance called for by the offer, once completed by the offeree, leaves the contract executory only on the part of the offeror. A familiar illustration is the offer of a reward for the return of lost goods or for the provision of information. The supposed nine-for-six promise was the offer of a reward (nine years free tenure) in return for an act (the attaining of 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judging over the six years 1992–1997).

A distinction must be recognised. In the case of some unilateral contracts, it may remain within the offeree's power unilaterally to complete the act of acceptance, and thereby to furnish the executed consideration sought, that is to say, without the necessity of cooperation by the offeror and even notwithstanding a purported revocation of the offer. An example is the furnishing of sought information by posting it in an envelope addressed in a particular way. There may also be a case (it is, perhaps, difficult to imagine one) in which the offeror may prevent the offeree from completing the act of acceptance, and thereby furnishing the executed consideration sought, yet the offer will be held not to have been revoked. In the present case, Mobil made it clear to its dealers that its supposed nine-for-six-offer was revoked. But, in addition, by terminating the system of Circle of Excellence judgings, it made it impossible for its dealers to complete the act of acceptance called for by that supposed offer. In the present section of these reasons, we address only the question whether Mobil effectively revoked its supposed offer.

[501] … It will be recalled that it was in January 1996 that Mobil announced, without giving reasons, the abandonment of the Circle of Excellence awards. The sequence of events, then, is that there was a purported revocation after which Mobil made it impossible for franchisees to complete the act of acceptance by attaining 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings in the last two of the six years (1996 and 1997).

His Honour referred to discussions of the question whether an offeror of a promise for an act can effectively revoke the offer where performance of the act of acceptance has been embarked upon but not completed. He referred to Cheshire & Fifoot, The Law of Contract (2nd ed), pp 137–9; Carter & Harland, Contract Law in Australia (3rd ed), pp 67–9; Abbott v Lance (1860) 2 Legge 1283; Daulia Ltd v Four Millbank Nominees Ltd [1978] Ch 231; and Veivers v Cordingley [1989] 2 Qd R 278. He considered that the weight of authority was in favour of the proposition that: "… a person who makes an offer susceptible of acceptance by performance of an act, may not revoke that offer after the offeree has embarked upon performance of the act."

While his Honour thought that there was some difference in the authorities as to the proper juristic basis of this proposition and that "in a technical sense" he was not bound to follow the decisions to which he referred, he considered that he should follow them unless positively satisfied that they were wrong. He recorded that he was not so satisfied.

We would make several observations at the outset. It has been suggested to be unjust that an offeror should be at liberty to revoke the offer once performance of the act, which is at once the act of acceptance and the executed consideration, has commenced. This proposition is usually stated as if its truth were self evident and universal. We do not think that it is either.

(a) The respective positions of offeror and offeree vary greatly from the case of one unilateral contract to another. The following factors illustrate:

  (i) the offeror may or may not know that the offeree has commenced performance;

  (ii) the offeree may or may not have an understanding that the offeror is at liberty to revoke and that any incomplete performance of the act of acceptance by the offeree will be at his or her risk;

  (iii) the notion of "commencement of performance of the act of acceptance" or "embarking upon the act of acceptance" is problematical and can lead to a result which is unjust to the offeror. [502] By reference to the facts of the present case, could it be suggested that attainment of 90 per cent in the first year or even perfect operation of a service station for a day, a week or a month, albeit by reference to the offer, represents a commencement of attainment of 90 per cent in all six years so as immediately to bind Mobil not to revoke?

(iv) the act called for by the offer may be detrimental to the offeree, or of some benefit to the offeree as well as to the offeror, as in the present case;

(v) although the offeree is not obliged to perform, or to continue performing, the act of acceptance and is at liberty to cease performing at any time, ex hypothesi, the offeror remains bound, perhaps over a lengthy period as in the present case, to keep its offer open for completion of the act of acceptance, without knowing whether the offeree will choose to complete or not to complete that act;

(vi) the circumstances of the particular case may or may not, by reference to conventional criteria, suggest that the parties intended that the offeror should not be at liberty to revoke once the offeree had performed the act of acceptance to some extent. We do not accept that it is universally unjust that an offeror be at liberty to revoke once the offeree has "commenced" or "embarked upon" performance of an act which is both the sought act of acceptance of the offer and the sought executed consideration for the promise.

(b) A juristic basis which has been suggested to support the general proposition is that of an implied ancillary unilateral contract by which the offeror promises not to revoke once the offeree commences the act of acceptance of the principal offer. But even if such an ancillary contract should be implied in all cases, it is one thing to say that there is a contractually binding promise not to revoke and another thing to say that a purported revocation will be ineffective. The normal remedy for a revocation in breach of the ancillary contract would be an award of damages, the amount of which would be assessed, no doubt, by reference to the prospect that the act of acceptance would have been completed, and, by the same act, the offered promise duly "paid for". No doubt it might be possible for the offeree to seek specific relief in the form of an injunction restraining the offeror from revoking the offer and from preventing the offeree from providing the executed consideration. In the present case, the franchisees did not seek orders that Mobil maintain its Circle of Excellence judgings and that it not act upon or implement its purported revocation. Perhaps no one thought of doing so. Perhaps the view was taken that an application for such relief would probably fail. We make no comment as to the prospects of success which any such application would have enjoyed.

(c) It seems that the general undifferentiated proposition could produce unintended and unjust results. Assume that X made a public offer of payment for the collection and supply of information of a kind described in the offer; that A, B and C embark upon collecting the information; and that A supplies it to X. According to the general proposition, X is bound not to revoke the offer made to B and C, notwithstanding the inutility of their subsequently supplying to X the information that A has already provided. It may be replied that the terms of the offer would include an [503] implied qualification. But this very response bespeaks the inadequacy of a universal rule.

… [505] In Veivers v Cordingley, McPherson J [said]:

> There can be no doubt that, ordinarily an offer can be withdrawn before acceptance. It may well be a different matter if, in the case of what is commonly called a "unilateral contract", the promisee has already entered upon the act which, when completed, will constitute acceptance of the promise. The question has been much debated by text writers. The authorities in point are usefully collected in an article by Mr CD Gilbert in 46 ALJ 522, particularly at 525–6. The only decision directly in point is that of the Supreme Court of New South Wales in Abbott v Lance (1860) 2 Legge 1283, which was a decision of the court in Banc comprising Dickinson ACJ and Wise J …

> It seems to me that the decision in Abbott v Lance is authority for propositions that, although as a general rule an offer may be retracted before acceptance, yet, if it takes the form of an offer in exchange for the doing of an act or acts, then: (1) acceptance takes place when the offeree "elects" to do the relevant act or acts; and (2) the offer becomes irrevocable once the act or acts, which will constitute consideration for the offer, have been partly performed. Applied to the present circumstances, the decision in Abbott v Lance would carry judgment for the plaintiffs Veivers in this case …. On the authority of Abbott v Lance, I consider that it was then no longer open to Cordingley to retract his promise …, and that he was bound to perform it by paying the sum of $200 000 if and when Veivers succeeded in obtaining approval from the Council.

[506] … For the reasons indicated earlier, we do not accept that there is a universal proposition that an offeror is not at liberty to revoke the offer once the offeree "commences" or "embarks upon" performance of the sought act of acceptance (being also the sought executed consideration for the offered promise). If and to the extent that any of the authorities to which we have referred say otherwise, we would respectfully disagree. In any event, even if it be assumed that an offeror has impliedly promised not to revoke in consideration of a commencement of performance of the act of acceptance, it would not follow that a purported revocation would be ineffective. On the contrary, in the absence of specific relief in respect of that promise, the offeror's revocation would be effective, although leaving the offeror liable in damages.

It should not be thought that the absence of a universal rule is unjust. In the circumstances of a particular case, it may be appropriate to find that the offeror has entered into an implied ancillary contract not to revoke, or that the offeror is estopped from falsifying an assumption, engendered by it, that the offeree will not be deprived of the chance of completing the act of acceptance.

We see no basis in the particular facts of the present case for concluding that Mobil should be taken to have offered to all those franchisees who would but commence or embark upon performing the prescribed act of acceptance of its principal offer (of a promise of nine-for-six), an ancillary promise not to revoke that offer. Several considerations support this view.

First, there is the problem of the meaning of "commencing" to attain not less than 90 per cent in Circle of Excellence judgings for all of the six calendar years 1992 to 1997. We referred, in a general context, to the nature of the problem earlier. In addition, there is a particular question arising from the nature of the specified act of acceptance in the present case: whether there can be a "commencement" only if at least one attainment of 90 per cent occurs. Perhaps, by reason of the nature of the act of acceptance (attaining 90 per cent or better in each of six successive years) mere "working towards" attaining that judging result counts for nothing in the present context. Mobil should not lightly be taken to have intended to be bound not to revoke its principal offer in favour of any franchisee who performed such an ill-defined act as "embarking upon" or "commencing" attainment of 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings in the six years 1992–1997.

Secondly, while it is true that even part performance of the act of acceptance would be of some benefit to Mobil, it would not be only to the benefit of Mobil and to the detriment of the franchisee. Mobil was inviting franchisees to embark upon a course which would benefit both parties. In these circumstances, the case for holding Mobil bound by an implied promise not to revoke is the less strong.

Thirdly, it is unlikely that Mobil meant to promise not, throughout the period 1992 to 1997, to revoke an offer of nine years free tenure, to a franchisee which had already made the following promise to Mobil:

> (3) Adherence to Mobil Team Pak Standards
> Dealer acknowledges that its adherence and the adherence of other [507] Mobil dealers at all times to the Team Pak Standards, and to the policies and other requirements of the Team Pak Program is essential for the success, goodwill and reputation of the Mobil Dealer > network and Mobil System and the Team Pak Program. Dealer therefore agrees to comply at all times during the life of this Agreement with the Team Pak Standards, as amended and updated from time to time. Likewise, Mobil agrees to comply with its part of those Team Pak Standards.

This standard provision of the Mobil Team Pak Agreement is in fact copied from subcl 4(3) of the Mobil Team Pak Agreements dated 18 May 1990 and 12 November 1993 between Mobil and Lyndel. Whatever its technical effect for the presence or absence of consideration, the existence of this contractual obligation suggests, on the assumption that franchisees attempted to comply with it, that "to commence to attain 90 per cent or better" would involve little or no actual detriment to franchisees – his Honour found that little or no detriment had been established (see later under "Promissory estoppel issues").

In our respectful opinion, the trial judge erred in holding that Mobil was not at liberty to revoke its supposed offer of a nine-for-six promise, as made to those franchisees which had embarked upon the stipulated act of acceptance of that offer …. [508]

The stipulated executed consideration (and acceptance of the offer) was not furnished

Three issues arise in connection with the furnishing of consideration.

(1) The first is that Mobil submitted to the trial judge, and submits on the appeal, that the franchisees were already legally obliged to attain 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings, because they were obliged, under the Team-Pak scheme, to do all the things which would have earned scores of 100 per cent. His Honour dealt with this submission shortly: "But none of the franchisees was under an extant obligation to achieve any particular level of performance in the Circle of Excellence awards." We deal below with the similar submission that in view of their existing contractual obligations, the attainment of 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings could not constitute "detriment" for the purpose of the doctrine of promissory estoppel. Substantially for the reasons there set out, we are of the opinion that the franchisees' performance did not attract the rule that performance of an existing contractual obligation owed to the promisor cannot qualify as valuable consideration ….

(3) Mobil submits that the franchisees were not entitled to nine years additional tenure because they did not furnish the only consideration stipulated as the price of obtaining such tenure, namely, the attainment of 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings over all six years, 1992–1997. We accept this submission and deal with it under the next side heading. [509]

The award of specific performance in the absence of the stipulated executed consideration (and acceptance of the offer)

With respect, it was erroneous to treat Lyndel, Thorpe and Wellcome as having attained 90 per cent or better in all six years: they did not do so or even promise to do so. They had therefore not done or even promised to do the one and only act for the doing of which Mobil had offered its promise. Unlike, for example, payment of money, the attainment of 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings over six years was something which they were not able unilaterally to tender. An order for specific performance of Mobil's supposed nine-for-six promise was, in the circumstances, not available in the absence of the actual furnishing of the agreed consideration for that promise: the attainment of 90 per cent or better in Circle of Excellence judgings in all of the years 1992 to 1997: see Colly v Overseas Exporters [1921] 3 KB 302 at 310–11; Heyman v Darwins Ltd [1942] AC 356 at 371 (Lord MacMillan); Plaimar Ltd v Waters Trading Company Ltd (1945) 72 CLR 304 at 318; Automatic Fire Sprinklers Pty Ltd v Watson (1946) 72 CLR 435 esp at 465–7 (Dixon J), 476–7 (Williams J); City Motors (1933) Pty Ltd v Southern Aerial Super Service Pty Ltd (1961) 106 CLR 477 and Bolwell Fibreglass Pty Ltd v Foley [1984] VR 97 at 112 (FC) (Brooking J).

The foregoing propositions hold good, even if it be correct that Mobil had impliedly promised not to revoke its offer. With respect, we think that, given the other conclusions of the trial judge in favour of Lyndel, Thorpe and Wellcome, the appropriate course was for his Honour to make an award of damages for any loss and damage which Mobil's repudiation of the ancillary contract caused each of them to suffer. The amount of damages would have been based on the value of the lost opportunity of obtaining the additional nine years tenure. The assessment would have had to allow for the possibility that the franchisee would not have continued to score 90 per cent or better in 1996 or 1997 or both, and so failed to "win" any additional tenure.

The franchisees did not seek an order compelling Mobil to continue with Circle of Excellence judgings promptly after the abandonment of those judgings was announced early in 1996, and they have not done so since. We make no comment as to whether Mobil's supposed implied promise to provide those judgings from 1992 to 1997 was a promise which, of its nature, would have been susceptible to an order for specific performance. The franchisees sought specific performance only of the principal promise, relevantly, to grant nine years tenure. They were not entitled to that remedy in circumstances in which they had not furnished, and were not in a position to furnish, the consideration for it. Therefore, they were not entitled to the order which the learned trial judge made that Mobil grant them a renewal for nine years …. [510]

3. Promissory estoppel issues

General principles

[3.80] The principles on which remedies based on equitable estoppel, including promissory estoppel, are available are by no means clear or precise. This is reflected in the substantial developments in the case law, particularly over the past two decades, and in the extensive range of discussions and articles on this topic over that period. The relief is broadly grounded in the notion of unconscionability, but the ways in which the principles are applied to specific circumstances have been the subject of differing formulations. This area of equity is still in the process of development and extension ….

In Austotel, a decision discussed by the trial judge in some detail in his preliminary reasons in this case, Priestley JA considered the line of authority in relation to estoppel, which had developed from the Privy Council decision in Plimmer v City of Wellington (1884) 9 App Cas 699. Although, in the final result, Priestley JA dissented, his distillation of the relevant principles was accepted as "cogent" by a Full Court of this Court in S & E Promotions Pty Ltd at 653. He considered that Plimmer was (at 604):

> … a clear example, where a plaintiff, despite being unable to point to some agreement which, although unenforceable, contains precise terms describing what he expected from the defendant, has nevertheless been held to be entitled to equitable relief which may be of a proprietary kind.

He then formulated the relevant proposition as to equitable estoppel in the following terms (at 610):

> For equitable estoppel to operate there must be the creation or encouragement by the defendant in the plaintiff of an assumption that a contract will come into existence or a promise be performed or an interest granted to the plaintiff by the defendant, and reliance on that by the plaintiff, in circumstances where departure from the assumption by the defendant would be unconscionable. (Emphasis added)

The representations

In our view, for the purpose of determining the estoppel submission, it does not matter whether the formulation of Brennan J in Waltons or that of Priestley JA in Austotel is applied. While the difference may, in particular cases, lead to different results, in the present case it does not. On either approach, it is a necessary element of the principle that the defendant has created or encouraged an assumption that "a particular legal relationship" or "an interest" would arise or be granted by the respondent if certain things are done or not done by the applicant in reliance thereon and that it is contrary to good conscience for the defendant to depart from the assumption.

In order to determine the appeal on the estoppel issue, it is necessary to consider whether the statements as to the one-for-one and nine-for-six proposals were sufficiently unqualified, firm and specific so as to induce an assumption that "a particular legal relationship" would be established or an "interest" would be granted …. [515]

Nine-for-six

[3.85] The nine-for-six proposal was raised by Mr Stumbles as a "may be" alternative to the one-for-one proposal, which the PRMF Act was said to have made "very very difficult" to operate.

There was a reference to a "lot more work" in relation to the nine-for-six proposal. This is not simply a case of "fine tuning" as the franchisees suggest. The difficulty for the applicants is not that the promise is not fully spelt out but rather that there was no promise made at all as to the nine-for-six proposal. The immediately ensuing commitment mentioned after reference to the nine-for-six statement was to the implementation of a process directed towards finding a way of somehow extending tenure for an indefinite period automatically and without costs if there was a consistent achievement of 90 per cent over an unspecified period.

In our view, such a generalised commitment to find a way to implement an appropriate tenure for achievement scheme cannot, in the present context, give rise to an expectation of either a "particular legal relationship" coming into existence or the grant of an identifiable "interest", to use the language of Waltons and of Plimmer. The essential elements and details of the legal relationship are lacking as are any specific details relating to the duration or terms of any extension or renewal or of the period over which the franchisees would qualify. Nor can such an indeterminate possibility be regarded as an expression of an intent that any particular incentive scheme will be formulated or implemented. No provision is made as to any objective or subjective criteria or to any person or entity by reference to which, or by whom, the nature, extent, duration or terms of any grant can be rendered reasonably certain. The substantial disparity in terms and in effect between the one-for-one proposal and the nine-for-six proposal mentioned by Mr Stumbles, itself highlights the range of widely varying alternatives which might result from subsequent elaboration of the scheme.

The "less precise" approach identified in Plimmer by Priestley JA does not, in our view, support a submission that there is "sufficient" certainty in the "promise" or "encouragement" with respect to the "finding a way" commitment, to attract the operation of the doctrine of equitable estoppel. The lack of information as to the contents of the proposal is too pronounced. In particular, there is a lack of information as to the period of qualifying performance and the duration, and extent of the interest to be granted.

The decisions which apply the Plimmer approach are cases which involve expenditures made on the property of another person, or alternatively, involve an injustice arising from the taking advantage of such expenditure by the defendant. Where there has been such expenditure it will often be possible to identify, with reasonable certainty, the amount or value of the expenditure or the value of work done on the property in question, so that some reasonably precise determination can be made as to what relief is called for in order to redress or remove the detriment. Plimmer itself provides a clear example. In that case the plaintiff had been encouraged to expend money to provide a jetty at the request of the defendant.

For the above reasons, we consider that his Honour erred in law in concluding that the statements or conduct of Mobil were sufficiently specific and unqualified to attract the application of equitable estoppel in relation to the nine-for-six proposal ….

Detriment

His Honour found that there was some additional cost to Lyndel, Thorpe and Wellcome in their setting out to achieve the 90 per cent standard, but concluded that this was comparatively small and was not sufficient, when considered in the light of the "rewards" offered by Mobil, to justify a finding that it exceeded the reward offered. Nor could it justify the relief sought, namely a nine-for-six extension, because such relief is disproportionate to the detriment.

The principles of equitable estoppel are directed to redress the detriment which a party might otherwise sustain as a result of the departure from an assumption on which the plaintiffs acted with encouragement from the defendant. It is intended to relieve against the detriment suffered and not to make good an expectation.

This "minimum equity" aspect of equitable estoppel was discussed in considerable detail by the High Court in Verwayen at 413, 429, 442–3, 461, 487 and 501. In discussing the purpose and extent of estoppel, Mason CJ said (at 413):

> A central element of that doctrine is that there must be a proportionality between the remedy and the detriment which is its purpose to avoid. It [517] would be wholly inequitable and unjust to insist upon a disproportionate making good of the relevant assumption.

… A similar approach is favoured by Meagher, Gummow & Lehane, Equity Doctrines & Remedies (3rd ed, 1992), pars 1723–6 inclusive …. McHugh J in Verwayen also referred to the principle that in moulding its decree the court, as a court of conscience, goes no further than is necessary to prevent unconscionable conduct and that a court of equity will only require the promise or expectation to be fulfilled if that is the only way in which the equity can be satisfied. This approach was recently applied by the English Court of Appeal in Sledmore v Dalby (1996) 72 P & CR 196 at 208–9; see also Andrew Robertson, "Satisfying the Minimum Equity: Equitable Estoppel Remedies after Verwayen" (1996) 20 MULR 805.

The present case

In his judgment in the present case, although he considered there was some evidence of additional cost, the trial judge concluded that the nine-for-six relief claimed was not an available remedy to make good the detriment which the applicants suffered when considered against the "rewards" offered by Mobil.

Mobil submits that the franchisees were already committed to comply 100 per cent with the Team-Pak requirements and that therefore, any attempt to achieve 90 per cent could not constitute detriment. Indeed, acquiescence by Mobil in attainment of only 90 per cent represented, according to the submission, a relaxation of an existing obligation, rather than an imposition. We do not accept the submission. It is apparent, from a practical, commercial point of view, that the incentive scheme was based on Mobil's acceptance that 90 per cent compliance would represent an achievement over and above what was presently being obtained and accepted as adequate. Uncontradicted evidence given by dealers was that special efforts were made to achieve more than what would otherwise have been accepted by Mobil as a sufficient performance.

We now turn to the detriment case advanced by the five individual franchisees.

Lyndel

[3.90] The detriment claimed to have been suffered by Lyndel as a result of the implementation of the nine-for-six proposal included additional work, expense and loss of income.

Lyndel's case was that it increased the levels of staff after the August 1991 speech in order to attract the extension of tenure. In addition, it claimed to have paid additional wages, to the extent of $14 000 per annum, to meet and maintain the standards required by the Circle of Excellence proposal. Mr Morris retained the services of his retired father to assist him to achieve the 90 per cent score. There were also said to be expenses incurred and time spent [519] on staff training and the provision of staff uniforms. There were extra attendants at the premises necessary to meet random inspections by "mystery buyers" calling at the behest of Mobil. There were also said to be extra additional costs incurred in advertising, marketing and other promotion efforts. Losses were said to arise from discounting. There were further costs and losses in respect of Lyndel's preferring Mobil products over those of competitors, of dealing with additional constraints due to a requirement to buy through a central ordering body and in complying with Mobil's requirements as to a credit card system. A further matter was the losses from theft which were said to have arisen from Mobil's requirement that oils be displayed outside in prominent view.

Mobil's response to these claims is that they are, in their totality, relatively minor and not proportionate to the remedy of an automatic nine-for-six extension at no cost. Many of the matters raised were simply sound and desirable business practices. They were inherently likely to, and did in fact, lead to increased turnover, sales and profitability. For instance, cleanliness, uniforms, random inspections, staff training, performance reports, advertising and promotion, are all processes calculated to enhance the viability of the operator's business and profitability. Although there was no detailed or specific evidence as to amounts, Lyndel referred to increases in staff levels. However, there was evidence that there was no overall increase after the August 1991 speech, nor was there evidence of any material impact on profitability. As his Honour pointed out, Mr Morris spoke of Mobil approved products costing a "few more dollars".

In our view there is force in the submissions that much of the expenditure and efforts were of a nature which might reasonably be expected to lead to increased profitability and efficiency in day-to-day operations. The additional efforts and expenditures on the part of Lyndel were not directed to capital improvements to the premises which would enure to the benefit of Mobil in a proprietary sense. In that respect they are different from the benefits which, but for the relief sought, would accrue in a Plimmer sense, where expenditure was incurred on the land of another which would increase its value.

Against the detriment outlined above, his Honour took into account the offer by Mobil to pay the sum of $32 209 compensation by way of reward in respect of the 1992 and 1993 years in which the 90 per cent Circle of Excellence level had been achieved by Lyndel. The question of the degree of detriment, is of course, one of fact which cannot be precisely spelt out.

Having considered the evidence concerning Lyndel and the submissions made in relation to that evidence, we consider that it was open to his Honour to conclude that the detriment was not proportionate to the grant of the nine year extension …

Conclusion

[3.95] On the estoppel claim we conclude:

1. There was no one-for-one assurance or promise which activated the principles of estoppel.
2. There was no nine-for-six assurance or promise which activated the principles of estoppel.
3. The general commitment to "find a way" was not certain enough to ground an estoppel.
4. The trial judge did not err in concluding that there was no detriment which could attract the
5. application of estoppel.
6. The applicants have not made out any estoppel case against Mobil.

Appeal allowed.

ACCEPTANCE

Relationship between the offer and acceptance

[3.100] To form a contract, the acceptance must be made in response to the offer. In the case of a bilateral contract, the very nature of the acts of offer and acceptance will usually ensure that there will be little debate as to whether what the offeree undertakes is undertaken in response to the offer proffered by the offeror. (For example, Offeror: "I will sell you this car for $5 000. You can pay and take delivery on Friday." Offeree: "It's a deal.")

In the case of a unilateral contract, however, it may not always be clear whether the acts presented as acceptance of the offer were done in response to the offer or for some independent reason.

The Crown v Clarke

[3.105] The Crown v Clarke (1927) 40 CLR 227 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Western Australia.

[FACTS: The respondent, Clarke, had claimed £1,000 from the Crown in the following circumstances. In May 1926, the Commissioner of Police gave notice by proclamation that he was authorised by the government of Western Australia "to offer a reward of £1 000 for such information as shall lead to the arrest and conviction of the persons who committed the murders" of an inspector of police and a sergeant of police, and that the Governor would be advised to extend a free pardon to any accomplice not being the person who actually committed the murders who should first give the information. In June, Treffene and Clarke were arrested and charged with one of the murders. Four days later Clarke, who had seen the proclamation, made a statement which led to the arrest of one Coulter. Coulter and Treffene were convicted of the murder, Clarke giving evidence in accordance with his statement. Clarke was released and claimed the reward. The Crown alleged by way of defence that his statement was not made with a view to obtaining the reward. His petition was dismissed at first instance, the judge finding that he had not acted on the faith of or in reliance upon the offer made in the proclamation or with any intention of entering into any contract, but rather that he acted to save himself from the unfounded charge of murder. The Full Court of the Supreme Court of Western Australia upheld an appeal against this decision. The Crown appealed.]

ISAACS ACJ: [231] The facts of this case, including inferences, are not, as I understand, in dispute. They amount to this: The information for which Clarke claims the reward was given by him when he was under arrest with Treffene on a charge of murder, and was given by him in circumstances which show that in giving the information he was not acting on or in pursuance of or in reliance upon or in return for the consideration contained in the proclamation, but exclusively in order to clear himself from a false charge of murder. In other words, he was acting with reference to a specific criminal charge against himself, and not with reference to a general request by the community for information against other persons. It is true that without his information and evidence no conviction was probable, but it is also abundantly clear that he was not acting for the sake of justice or from any impulse of conscience or because he was asked to do so, but simply and solely on his own initiative, to secure his own safety from the hand of the law and altogether irrespective of the proclamation. He has, in my opinion, neither a legal nor a moral claim to the reward. The learned Chief Justice held that [232] Clarke never accepted or intended to accept the offer in the proclamation, and, unless the mere giving of the information without such intention amounted in law to an acceptance of the offer or to performance of the condition, there was neither "acceptance" nor "performance", and therefore there was no contract. I do not understand either of the learned judges who formed the majority to controvert this. But they held that Williams v Carwardine (1833) 4 B & Ad 621; 110 ER 590, has stood so long that it should be regarded as accurate, and that, so regarded, it entitled the respondent to judgment. As reported in the five places where it is found it is a difficult case to follow. I cannot help thinking that it is somewhat curtly reported. When the various reports in banc are compared, there are some discrepancies. But two circumstances are important. One is the pregnant question of Denman CJ as to the plaintiff's knowledge of the handbill … The other circumstance is the stress placed on motive. The Lord Chief Justice clearly attached importance to the answer given to his question. He, doubtless, finally drew the inference that, having knowledge of the request in the handbill, the plaintiff at last determined to accede, and did accede, to that request, and so acted in response to it, although moved thereto by the incentive supplied by her stings of conscience. Making allowance for what is in all probability an abridged report of what was actually said, I cannot help thinking, on the whole, that not only Denman CJ but also some at least of the other members of the court considered that the motive of the informant was not inconsistent with, and did not in that case displace, the prima facie inference arising from the fact of knowledge of the request and the giving of the information it sought. Motive, though not to be confused with intention, is very often strong evidence of that state of mind, both in civil and criminal matters. The evidentiary force of motive in the circumstances of Williams v Carwardine is no criterion of its force in the circumstances of any other case, and it can never usurp the legal place of intention. [233] If the decision in Williams v Carwardine went no further than I have said, it is in line with the acknowledged and settled theories of contract. If it goes so far as is contended for by the respondent, I am of opinion that it is opposed to unimpeachable authority … It is unquestionable – putting aside what are called formal contracts or quasi-contracts – that to create a contractual obligation there must be both offer and acceptance. It is the union of these which constitutes the binding tie, the obligatio. The present type of case is no exception. It is not true to say that since such an offer calls for information of a certain description, then, provided only information of that description is in fact given, the informant is entitled to the reward. That is not true unless the word "given" is interpreted as "given in exchange for the offer" – in other words, given in performance of the bargain which is contemplated by the offer and of which the offer is intended to form part. Performance in that case is the implied method of acceptance, and it simultaneously effects the double purpose of acceptance and performance. But acceptance is essential to contractual obligation, because without it there is no agreement, and in the absence of agreement, actual or imputed, there can be no contract …

That acceptance is necessary in a case of this kind is recognised in General Accident Fire and Life Assurance Corp v Robertson [1909] AC 404 at 411, a case sufficiently analogous to be illustrative here, though of course the mode of acceptance was very different. That difference constantly arises because the offeror may always prescribe the method of acceptance. In Attorney-General (Trinidad) v Bourne [1895] AC 83 at 88, the method was to tender payment of a balance of a price. In other cases it may be the posting of a letter, or the dispatch of goods, or anything stipulated expressly or by implication, even by hanging out a flag, as suggested by Bramwell LJ in Household Fire Insurance Co v Grant (1879) 4 Ex D 216 at 233. The method indicated by the offeror may [234] be one which either does or does not involve communication to him of the acceptance in order to form the contract and create the obligation, however necessary information of the fact may be required before default in payment, that is, in performance by the offeror, can arise.

[His Honour then referred to several authorities and continued:] The controlling principle, then, is that to establish the consensus without which no true contract can exist, acceptance is as essential as offer, even in a case of the present case where the same act is at once sufficient for both acceptance and performance. But acceptance and performance of condition, as shown by the judicial [235] reasoning quoted, involve that the person accepting and performing must act on the offer …

Instances easily suggest themselves where precisely the same act done with reference to an offer would be performance of the condition, but done with reference to a totally distinct object would not be such a performance. An offer of £100 to any person who should swim 100 yards in the harbour on the first day of the year, would be met by voluntarily performing the feat with reference to the offer, but would not in my opinion be satisfied by a person who was accidentally or maliciously thrown overboard on that date and swam the distance simply to save his life, without any thought of the offer. The offeror might or might not feel morally impelled to give the sum in such a case, but would be under no contractual obligation to do so …

[3.110] HIGGINS J: [241] I have been struck by the resemblance of the position to that of an action based on misrepresentation. The statement of claim must allege and show that the plaintiff acted in reliance on the misrepresentation. If the defendant can establish that the plaintiff did not rely on the misrepresentation, the plaintiff fails. In Smith v Chadwick (1882) 20 Ch D 27 at 44, Jessel MR said: "if the court sees on the face of" the statement "that it is of such a nature as would induce a person to enter into the contract, or would tend to induce him to do so, … the inference is, if he entered into the contract, that he acted on the inducement so held out, … but even then you may show that in fact he did not so act, … by showing that he avowedly did not rely upon" the misstatement [sic] "whether he knew the facts or not." …

I need not dilate at length on the now classic case of Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. It is quite consistent with the view [242] which I have stated. The facts were not in dispute and one of the facts was that the plaintiff had bought the smoke balls on the faith of the advertisement. This important fact is stated again in the report on appeal; and it is just the fact which is not, and could not be, found under the circumstances of this case. My view is that Clarke did not act on the faith of, in reliance upon, the proclamation; and that although the exact fulfilment of the conditions stated in the proclamation would raise a presumption, that Clarke was acting on the faith of, in reliance upon, the proclamation, the presumption is rebutted by his own express admission …

[3.115] STARKE J: [244] In my opinion the true principle applicable to this type of case is that unless a person performs the conditions of the offer, acting upon its faith or in reliance upon it, he does not accept the offer and the offeror is not bound to him. As a matter of proof any person knowing of the offer who performs its conditions establishes prima facie an acceptance of that offer. And probably … the performance of some of the conditions required by the offer also establishes prima facie an acceptance of that offer, but does not of course establish the right of the person so performing some of the conditions of the offer to the reward until he has completely performed them all according to the proper construction of the offer. From such facts an acceptance is probable but it is not, as was urged, "an absolute proposition of law" that one, who, having the offer before him, acts as one would naturally be induced to act, is deemed to have acted on the faith of or in reliance upon that offer. It is an inference of fact and may be excluded by evidence. The statements or conduct of the party himself uncommunicated to the other party, or the circumstances of the case, may supply that evidence. Ordinarily, it is true, the law judges of the intention of a person in making a contract by outward expression only by words or acts communicated between them. But when the offeror, as in the anomalous case under consideration, has dispensed with any previous communications to himself of the acceptance of the offer the law is deprived of one of the means by which it judges of the intention of the parties, and the performance of the conditions of the offer is not in all cases conclusive for they may have been performed by one who never hears of the offer or who never intended to accept it. Hence the statements or conduct of the party himself uncommunicated to the other party are admissible to show the circumstances under which an act, seemingly within the terms of the offer, was done and the inducement which [245] led to the act. In the present case the statements of the petitioner himself satisfied the Chief Justice that he did not act on the faith of or in reliance upon the offer and we are unable to disturb that finding.

Felthouse v Bindley

[3.120] Felthouse v Bindley (1862) 11 CB (NS) 869; 142 ER 1037 (Court of Common Pleas) – Rule nisi for nonsuit.

[FACTS: After some discussion the plaintiff wrote to his nephew, John, offering to buy the latter's horse for £30 15s 0d, adding: "If I hear no more about him I shall consider the horse mine at £30 15s 0d." The nephew did not answer this letter but six weeks later an auctioneer employed by John to sell his farming stock sold the horse. John had directed the auctioneer not to sell the horse, saying that it had already been sold, but the auctioneer sold it by mistake. The plaintiff sued the auctioneer in conversion and obtained the verdict. The defendant obtained a rule nisi to enter a nonsuit.]

WILLES J: [875] I am of opinion that the rule to enter a nonsuit should be made absolute. The horse in question had belonged to the plaintiff's nephew, John Felthouse. In December 1860, a conversation took place between the plaintiff and his nephew relative to the purchase of the horse by the former. The uncle seems to have thought that he had on that occasion bought the horse for £30, the nephew that he sold it for 30 guineas; but there was clearly no complete bargain at that time. On 1 January 1861, the nephew writes:

> I saw my father on Saturday. He told me that you considered you had bought the horse for £30. If so, you are labouring under a mistake, for 30 guineas was the price I put upon him, and you never heard me say less. When you said you would have him, I considered you were aware of the price.

To this his uncle replies on the following day: "Your price, I admit, was 30 guineas. I offered £30; never offered more: and you said the horse was mine. However, as there may be a mistake about him, I will split the difference. If I hear no more about him, I consider the horse mine at £30 15s."

It is clear that there was no complete bargain on 2 January; and it is also clear that the uncle had no right to impose upon the nephew a sale of his horse for £30 15s unless he chose to comply with the condition of writing to repudiate the offer. The nephew might, no doubt, have [876] bound his uncle to the bargain by writing to him: the uncle might also have retracted his offer at any time before acceptance. It stood an open offer: and so things remained until 25 February, when the nephew was about to sell his farming stock by auction. The horse in question being catalogued with the rest of the stock, the auctioneer (the defendant) was told that it was already sold. It is clear, therefore, that the nephew in his own mind intended his uncle to have the horse at the price which he (the uncle) had named – £30 15s – but he had not communicated such his intention to his uncle, or done anything to bind himself. Nothing, therefore, had been done to vest the property in the horse in the plaintiff down to 25 February, when the horse was sold by the defendant. It appears to me that, independently of the subsequent letters, there had been no bargain to pass the property in the horse to the plaintiff, and therefore that he had no right to complain of the sale. Then, what is the effect of the subsequent correspondence? The letter of the auctioneer amounts to nothing. The more important letter is that of the nephew, of 27 February, which is relied on as shewing that he intended to accept and did accept the terms offered by his uncle's letter of 2 January. That letter, however, may be treated either as an acceptance then for the first time made by him, or as a memorandum of a bargain complete before 25 February, sufficient within the Statute of Frauds. It seems to me that the former is the more likely construction: and, if so, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot recover. But, assuming that there had been a complete parol bargain before 25 February, and that the letter of the 27th was a mere expression of the terms of that prior bargain, and not a bargain then for the first time concluded, it would be directly [877] contrary to the decision of the Court of Exchequer in Stockdale v Dunlop (1840) 6 M & W 224; 151 ER 391, to hold that that acceptance had relation back to the previous offer so as to bind third persons in respect of a dealing with the property by them in the interim.

Rule absolute.

Empirnall Holdings v Machon Paull Partners

[3.125] Empirnall Holdings Pty Ltd v Machon Paull Partners Pty Ltd (1988) 14 NSWLR 523 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Appeal from Smart J.

[FACTS: Empirnall, a property developer, retained architects Machon Paull (Machon) to draw plans, obtain approvals, and do other work in connection with a property redevelopment. Empirnall then asked Machon Paull if they would be interested in acting as project manager for the development. Machon Paull replied in the affirmative. Further work was done and the architects requested a progress payment and the execution by Empirnall of a contract for the works. They were told to submit the progress claim but were informed that "Mr Jury" (a director and the major shareholder of Empirnall) "does not sign contracts".

On 3 October 1983, the architects sent a letter to Empirnall which stated: "As discussed we enclose two copies of the building cost plus contract … and we ask that you arrange for them to be signed and return one copy as soon as possible."

Work continued and on 15 October 1983, Machon Paull submitted a second claim for payment which was duly paid. On 19 October 1983, they wrote to Empirnall's agent in the following terms:

> We are in receipt of the building approval and a copy of the conditions are enclosed for your information … With reference to our letter dated 3 October 1983, concerning the return of the signed contracts, we are proceeding on the understanding that the conditions of the contract are accepted by you and works are being conducted in accordance with those terms and conditions.

By the time the matter reached the Court of Appeal, the only question was whether there was a contract in the terms of the draft agreement sent by Machon Paull. This draft contained a provision charging the architects' fees and costs on the land the subject of the development. Empirnall had admitted that the sum claimed was owing under an oral contract.]

McHUGH JA: [534] Under the common law theory of contract, the silent acceptance of an offer is generally insufficient to create any contract … The objective theory of contract requires an external manifestation of assent to an offer. Convenience, and especially commercial convenience, has given rise to the rule that the acceptance of the offer should be communicated to the offeror. After a reasonable period has elapsed, silence is seen as a rejection and not an acceptance of the offer. Nevertheless, communication of acceptance is not always necessary. The offeror will be bound if he dispenses with the need to communicate the acceptance of his offer. However, an offeror cannot erect a contract between himself and the offeree by the device of stating that unless he hears from the offeree he will consider the offeree bound. He cannot assert that he will regard silence as acceptance: Felthouse v Bindley (1862) 11 CB (NS) 869 at 875; 142 ER 1037 at 1040. The common law's concern with the protection of freedom is opposed to the notion that a person must take action to reject an uninvited offer or be bound by contractual obligations.

Nevertheless, the silence of an offeree in conjunction with the other circumstances of the case may indicate that he has accepted the offer. The offeree may be under a duty to communicate his rejection of an offer. If he fails to do so, his silence will generally be regarded as an acceptance of the offer sufficient to form a contract. Many cases decided in United States jurisdictions have held that the custom of the trade, the course of dealing, or the previous relationship between the parties imposed a duty on the offeree to reject the offer or be bound. [535] But more often than not the offeree will be bound because, knowing of the terms of the offer and the offeror's intention to enter into a contract, he has exercised a choice and taken the benefit of the offer. In Laurel Race Course Inc v Regal Construction Co Inc 333 A 2d 319 (1975) a contractor proposed that it would do additional work upon the basis that, if the work was the result of its defective workmanship under the original contract, there would be no charge. Otherwise the work would be charged on a "cost-plus" basis. The building owner made no reply to this offer. The contractor commenced work on the job to the knowledge of the building owner who was held bound by the terms of the offer. Speaking for the Court of Appeals for Maryland, Judge Levine said (at 329):

> Where the offeree with reasonable opportunity to reject offered services takes the benefit of them under circumstances which would indicate to a reasonable person that they were offered with the expectation of compensation, he assents to the terms proposed and thus accepts the offer.

This formulation states acceptance in terms of a rule of law. However, the question is one of fact. A more accurate statement is that where an offeree with a reasonable opportunity to reject the offer of goods or services takes the benefit of them under circumstances which indicate that they were to be paid for in accordance with the offer, it is open to the tribunal of fact to hold that the offer was accepted according to its terms. A useful analogy is to be found in the "ticket cases" where an offeree, who has or ought to have knowledge of the terms of a contract of carriage or bailment, is generally bound unless he raises objection: compare Thornton v Shoe Lane Parking Ltd [1971] 2 QB 163 at 169 and MacRobertson Miller Airline Services v Commissioner of State Taxation (WA) (1975) 133 CLR 125 at 136–40.

The ultimate issue is whether a reasonable bystander would regard the conduct of the offeree, including his silence, as signalling to the offeror that his offer has been accepted …

In [the] circumstances Empirnall's acceptance of the work, when [536] considered objectively, should be taken as an acceptance of the work on the terms and conditions offered by Machon. The case is not so much one of acceptance by silence as one of taking the benefit of an offer with knowledge of its terms and knowledge of the offeror's reliance on payment being made in return for his work. Since the work for which payment is outstanding was carried out after 19 October 1983, there is no need to distinguish between the positions before and after that date.

Empirnall relied on Mr Abrahams' statement that "Eric does not sign contracts". However, this statement supports, rather than weakens, Machon's case. The objection was not to the terms and conditions but to the manner of acknowledging them. But, however this may be, the letter of 19 October sent one month later made clear what was the basis on which Machon was offering to perform the work. Since Empirnall has taken the benefit of the work with knowledge of the terms on which it was offered, an objective bystander would conclude that Empirnall had accepted the offer on those terms and conditions.

[KIRBY P delivered a judgment to substantially the same effect. SAMUELS JA agreed with McHUGH JA.]

Appeal dismissed.

Brambles Holdings v Bathurst City Council

[3.130] Brambles Holdings Ltd v Bathurst City Council [2001] NSWCA 61; (2001) 53 NSWLR 153 (Supreme Court of New South Wales, Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Hodgson CJ in Equity.

[FACTS: In 1982, Brambles, the defendant/appellant, and the Council, the plaintiff/respondent, entered into a contract for the defendant to manage the plaintiff's Solid Waste Disposal Depot. In about 1985, the defendant started to receive liquid waste at the Depot, and to charge for its acceptance. The defendant retained this money.

Before the first contract between the parties expired, the defendant tendered for a new contract and the plaintiff accepted the tender. However, after the expiration of the first contract on 1 November 1989, the parties continued to undertake negotiations in relation to the terms of the second contract. On 20 February 1990, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant stating that it was "appropriate" for the defendant to increase liquid waste fees to a certain level (1.1 cents/litre) upon completion of a liquid waste disposal area.

The parties entered into the second contract on 12 July 1990. Clauses 21 and 22 of the second contract specified the fee to be charged for "general commercial waste" and required a portion of that fee to be remitted to the plaintiff. On 19 September 1991, the plaintiff wrote to the defendant stating that it had resolved to increase liquid waste fees and that "additional income" should be placed in a fund for the establishment of a Liquid Waste Treatment Plant. The defendant responded in a letter dated 3 October 1991, by denying that the contract between the parties covered liquid waste. The defendant proceeded to charge liquid waste fees at the rate set out in the plaintiff's mid-September 1991 letter, but continued to retain the moneys. In 1996, the plaintiff sued the defendant in relation to the retained liquid waste fees. The trial judge entered judgment in favour of the plaintiff, and ordered the defendant to pay damages to the plaintiff.]

MASON P: [155] I agree with Ipp AJA's reasons as to the disposition of the contractual claim. As Heydon JA demonstrates, this case shows the difficulties of pressing too far classical theory of contract formation based upon offer and acceptance (see also Pobjie Agencies Pty Ltd v Vinidex Tubemakers Pty Ltd [2000] NSWCA 105).

HEYDON JA:

The trial judge's reasoning

[3.135] [161] [The trial judge] held that the 12 July 1990 agreement, in establishing fees for general commercial waste under cl 21, established fees for liquid waste, and prohibited the defendant from charging any other fees. That meant that the defendant was in breach of contract from 1 October 1991 on, but the Council could not point to any loss stemming solely from breach of the 12 July 1990 contract. The trial judge found that the loss could be recovered by reason of the second stage in his reasoning.

The second stage turned on a conclusion that the letter of 19 September 1991 was an offer which, though it was not accepted by the defendant's letter of 3 October 1991, was accepted by the defendant's conduct in charging the rates specified. This entitled the defendant to charge 6 cents, but only retain 1.1 cents. He held it was entitled to retain 1.1 cents because that was the figure permitted by the Council's letter of 20 February 1990 once the condition stipulated – "completion of an appropriate liquid waste disposal area" – was satisfied, which he held was the case ….

The 12 July 1990 contract

[3.140] [162] The defendant's first line of attack on the trial judge's reasoning related to his findings about the 12 July 1990 contract ….

[163] The defendant submitted that the trial judge "failed to apply conventional and accepted principles of the law of contract". He was said to have done so in three respects: failure to apply the principles as to the implication of terms; straining the contractual language; and failing to have proper regard to the factual matrix. An evaluation of these criticisms depends in part on bearing in mind what are the conventional and accepted principles of the law of contract relating to the problems in this case. These will be noted before the three criticisms are discussed.

To some extent the defendant's arguments turned on appeals to the conduct of the parties before the contract was made on 12 July 1990, to their conduct after the contract was made on that date, to their subjective beliefs and to submissions about the implication of terms. The first relevant principle of law is that pre-contractual conduct is only admissible on questions of construction if the contract is ambiguous and if the pre-contractual conduct casts light on the genesis of the contract, its objective aim, or the meaning of any descriptive term: Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337 at 347–52.

[164] The second relevant principle is that post-contractual conduct is admissible on the question of whether a contract was formed: Howard Smith & Co Ltd v Varawa (1907) 5 CLR 68 at 77; Barrier Wharfs Ltd v W Scott Fell & Co Ltd (1908) 5 CLR 647 at 668, 669 and 672; B Seppelt & Sons Ltd v Commissioner for Main Roads (1975) 1 BPR 9,147at 9,149 and 9,154–6; Film Bars Pty Ltd v Pacific Film Laboratories Pty Ltd (1979) 1 BPR 9,251 at 9,255. The third relevant principle is that post-contractual conduct is not admissible on the question of what a contract means as distinct from the question of whether it was formed. As explained by Priestley JA (Meagher JA agreeing) in Hide & Skin Trading Pty Ltd v Oceanic Meat Traders Ltd (1990) 20 NSWLR 310 at 326–30, the status of the relevant High Court authorities is unclear: hence unless it is demonstrated that the later decisions of the Victorian Full Court and Court of Appeal against admissibility, Ryan v Textile Clothing & Footwear Union of Australia [1996] 2 VR 235 and FAI Traders Insurance Co Ltd v Savoy Plaza Pty Ltd [1993] 2 VR 343, are clearly wrong or they are overruled, they should be followed in New South Wales. No attempt was made to demonstrate that they are clearly wrong.

The fourth relevant principle is that the construction of a contract is an objective question for the court, and the subjective beliefs of the parties are generally irrelevant in the absence of any argument that a decree of rectification should be ordered or an estoppel by convention found. No argument of these kinds was advanced in this case.

The fifth relevant principle is that terms may be implied in one of four ways. The trial judge set out this orthodox classification in his unreported interlocutory judgment in Carlton & United Breweries Ltd v Tooth & Co Ltd, which was quoted by Young J, the trial judge in that case (1986) 7 IPR 581 at 605–6:

> A more precise classification of the different types of implied terms was given by Hodgson J in his first interlocutory judgment in the current proceedings. His Honour set out four classes of implied terms, the first two of which are in the class of terms implied in law, the second two the implied terms in fact. His Honour said:
> There is a spectrum of different types of implied terms covering, inter alia, the following:
> (i) Implications contained in the express words of the contract: see Marcus Clarke (Vic) Ltd v Brown (1928) 40 CLR 540 at 553–4.
>
> (ii) Implications from the "nature of the contract itself" as expressed in the words of the contract: see Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239.
>
> (iii) Implications from usage (for example, mercantile contracts).
> (iv) Implications from considerations of business efficacy: see BP Refinery (Westernport) Pty Ltd v Hastings Shire Council (1977) 52 ALJR 20 at 26; Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337.

The reasoning of the trial judge conformed to these principles. The submissions of the defendant did not. [165]

(a) Implication of terms to give business efficacy

The criticism based on failure to apply the principles as to the implication of terms fastened on the fact that the trial judge described what he did as a "drawing out of what is implied by the language of the contract itself". The defendant cited the leading cases about implying terms to give business efficacy and developed arguments designed to show that the terms found by the trial judge were not reasonable, equitable, necessary or obvious. This criticism is entirely baseless. The trial judge made it plain that he was not implying a term to give business efficacy. He said: "This is not an implication of a term by operation of law or on the basis of business efficacy; but rather the drawing out of what is implied by the language of the contract itself."

The trial judge was indicating that, of the four implications he had referred to in Carlton & United Breweries Ltd v Tooth & Co Ltd, he was not making implication (ii) or (iv), but (i). Despite the number of occasions on which the defendant said that what the trial judge "was really doing was implying a term and on a basis that didn't comply with the usual rules", the processes he employed were processes of construction.

(b) Straining the contractual language?

The second criticism was that the trial judge's construction strains the language of the contract. The first substantive argument advanced by the defendant in support of this criticism was put thus (written submissions para 30):

> To suggest, as his Honour does, that liquid waste is "general commercial waste" within the meaning of cl 21 is to strain the language of the Contract. The term "general commercial waste" is not defined by the Contract. It is a descriptive term and seemingly is a sub-species > of "trade refuse" a term which is defined to include liquid waste. This suggests that the term "general commercial waste" was not intended to include liquid waste.

The following matters support the trial judge's view that "general commercial waste" includes "liquid waste". Cl 21 deals with "refuse", and contemplates "refuse" as falling into two categories – "commercial and industrial waste" and "domestic garbage and other refuse". Cl 2(b) defines "trade refuse" as including liquid refuse, and hence liquid waste, from any industrial, chemical, trade or business process or operation. Cl 2(d) defines "other wastes" as including liquids. If "trade refuse" includes liquid waste, it would seem that the word "refuse" in cl 21 also includes liquid waste. And if the expression "other wastes" includes liquid waste, it would seem that "general commercial waste" includes liquid waste. Cl 6 obliged the defendant to accept "rubbish, refuse … and trade refuse": it was common ground that that expression included liquid waste. It would be strange if cl 21 would contemplate the Council levying fees and charges for some categories of "refuse" delivered pursuant to cl 6, but not others (ie liquid waste). Further, the defendant was obliged by cl 21 to collect fees and charges levied for "refuse", but not refuse which was "garbage, trade refuse or other wastes deposited at the depot for or on behalf of the Council". Since "trade refuse" and "other wastes" are expressions which include "liquid waste", and since those types of refuse when delivered for or on behalf of the Council are excluded from the general category of "refuse", the drafting seems to [166] contemplate that "refuse" delivered otherwise than for or on behalf of the Council includes "trade refuse" and "other wastes", and hence liquid waste. Finally, the words "general commercial waste" in their ordinary meaning can include liquid waste, and nothing in the context in which they are used points against the application of that meaning. The next argument which the defendant put was that the charge for "general commercial waste" was a rate per cubic metre, "and the adoption of that unit of measurement highlights that the parties did not intend liquid waste to be included within the concept of 'general commercial waste'. When rates were set in relation to liquid waste by the parties, units of liquid measurement were used (see, eg 2/334; 3/528 and 3/604)." One cubic metre is a measure of volume. So is one gallon or one litre. Only elementary calculations are needed to convert one into another. Of the three evidentiary references given, the second does not state any unit of measurement. The first, which is a reference to the letter of 20 February 1990, uses gallons or litres as an alternative, which scarcely points decisively against cubic metres being regarded as a measurement for liquids; in any event the admissibility of that letter on the issue of construing the 12 July 1990 contract, even if it can be regarded as part of the "surrounding circumstances", appears to be forbidden by the principles stated in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337 at 347–52. The letter does not evidence the genesis or objective aim of the 12 July 1990 contract. Nor does it point clearly towards any identification of "the meaning of a descriptive term", as discussed at 349 and 351. On the defendant's case, the 20 February 1990 letter has nothing to do with the 12 July 1990 contract. Further, surrounding circumstances are not to be examined unless the contractual words to be construed are ambiguous. Counsel for the defendant denied any material ambiguity in the 12 July 1990 contract: he said orally that it was "very clearly drafted" and "clear in its terms to the extent that it is primarily concerned at least in relation to the charging and retention of fees [for] dry waste". Counsel for the defendant also said in writing: "There was no ambiguity resting either in the construction or interpretation of the contract or the words used."

The third evidence reference given by the defendant is to the letter of 19 September 1991 from the Council to Mr Landers, which spoke of rates per litre. A better reference would have been to the corresponding part of the letter sent on the same day to the defendant. The problem is that post-contractual events are not admissible on questions of construction.

The defendant then argued (para 31):

> It is also significant that a particular rate is specified in relation to "general commercial waste", namely, $3.00/m3 which does not appear to bear any relationship to the amount charged by Brambles from time to time in relation to liquid waste.

So far as the higher charges postdate 12 July 1990, they are inadmissible on the question of construing the 12 July 1990 contract. So far as they predate it, they are inadmissible because they do not appear to be part of the background circumstances of which account can be taken on the question of construing the contract, which is in any event not ambiguous. The terms of the 12 July 1990 contract were subject to negotiation from 8 June 1989 until 12 July 1990.

The defendant then submitted (para 31):

> His Honour's construction of the Contract is also inconsistent with what the parties subjectively believed the Contract covered: Air Great Lakes Pty Ltd v KS Easter (Holdings) Pty Ltd (1985) 2 NSWLR 309, 330. [167] A memorandum of 20 December 1989 (2/317) demonstrates that Council was of the view that the Contract did not cover fees for liquid waste. The letter of 3 October 1991 (3/614) suggests that Brambles was of the view that the Contract did not concern liquid waste disposal at all.

First, the passage referred to in the case cited is not authority for using the parties' subjective beliefs about the construction of the contract as a guide to its construction. The passage rather deals with the different topic of the parties' intention to effect legal relations, and the very limited role which a subjective intention not to contract has. Secondly, the memorandum of 20 December 1989 at most shows what the Council thought the predecessor to the 12 July 1990 contract, namely the 1982 deed, covered; it says nothing at all about what the 12 July 1990 contract would cover. Thirdly, the letter of 3 October 1991 is post-contractual conduct, and not admissible on question of construction ….

Failure to attend to the factual matrix?

[3.145] … In any event, whatever might flow from the factual matrix, it cannot be resorted to unless the 12 July 1990 contract is ambiguous: it is not.

[168] For the above reasons the trial judge's conclusions about the 12 July 1990 contract are correct. It should be noted that there is some evidence that in 1990 and 1991 both the Council and the defendant did not share his conclusions, but in the absence of any argument for a decree of rectification or for an estoppel by convention the actual opinions of the parties are irrelevant …

Acceptance of the 19 September 1991 offer by conduct

[3.150] [170] … [The submissions of the appellant] boil down to three propositions. First, the 19 September 1991 letter was not an offer. Secondly, if it was, it was rejected on 3 October 1991 and was not thereafter available for acceptance by conduct; and, even if it was available for acceptance, the conduct did not result in a completed agreement. Thirdly, even if there was a completed agreement, there was no consideration.

(a) Was the 19 September 1991 letter an offer?

… [171] There is much to be said for the view that the 19 September 1991 letter was not an offer, or cannot have been intended to affect legal relations by contract. That is because to some extent the letter does not take the form of proposing a particular course for examination by the defendant with a view to the defendant choosing between acceptance or rejection in the light of that examination. Rather it sets out a resolution permitting fees to rise, and then peremptorily requests the defendant to charge those fees. To that extent the letter uses the language of command.

Not only does the present point not appear to have been argued below, it was not pleaded: para 4 of the Amended Defence is a bare denial of the relevant paragraphs of the Council's Summary of Contentions. The point is one which, even though the former Commercial Division may not have been a court of strict pleading, might have taken the Council by surprise, and hence ought to have been pleaded either under Pt 15 r 13(2)(b) of the Supreme Court Rules or by reason of conventional practice in that Division. It is a point on which evidence might have been called. In the circumstances it should not be entertained in this Court.

(b) Was the 19 September 1991 offer rejected by the 3 October 1991 letter so as to render it incapable of acceptance and, if it was, does that prevent it from forming the basis of a contract as a result of the sending of the 19 September 1991 offer and the defendant's conduct in charging higher fees?

… The 19 September 1991 letter concluded with a proposal that the new liquid waste fees (presumably the increased part, ie net of what the defendant [174] was able to retain) be paid in accordance with the cl 22 regime which had hitherto only applied to waste deposited by the defendant.

What on an objective construction was the reaction of the 3 October 1991 letter to the 19 September 1991 offer?

[3.155] The 3 October 1991 letter did not purport to terminate all negotiations with the Council and it invited further communications. But, in two respects, it rejected the assumptions or proposals contained in the 19 September 1991 letter.

First, the 3 October 1991 letter, the author of which was probably operating on the subjective assumption that the defendant could retain only the rate stipulated in the 25 June 1991 letter, which was the rate which the defendant was receiving at that time, made the point that the defendant could not continue to provide the service at that rate, because that rate did not make the service "viable". When the 3 October 1991 letter said that the defendant was seeking "Adequate tip fees for the work involved in providing for liquid disposal", it was rejecting what it was probably taking the Council to be offering – 0.3 cents per litre. But, even when the letter is read through the eyes of a reasonable bystander, who must be taken to have knowledge of the fact that, as the trial judge found, on the true construction of the 9 January–20 February 1990 and 25 June 1991 letters, the Council was willing to let the defendant charge 1.1 cents per litre, the 3 October 1991 letter is a rejection of the Council's offer to let it retain only 1.1 cents per litre.

Secondly, the 3 October 1991 letter also made it plain that it did not accept that there was any contractual regime in place so far as liquid waste was concerned … [175] According to the defendant, the effect of the rejection of the 19 September 1991 offer was that it ceased to have operative effect unless it was later revived in some way, and it was not. Hence it was not capable of being accepted by conduct ….

[176] The defendant's contention that the rejection of the Council's offer meant that it was no longer capable of acceptance by conduct, and its related contention that its conduct did not constitute acceptance, depend heavily on the view that offer and acceptance analysis must invariably be employed in reaching decisions about the formation of contracts. While the process by which many contracts are arrived at is reducible to an analysis turning on the making of an offer, the rejection of the offer by a counter-offer and so on until the last counter-offer is accepted, that analysis is neither sufficient to explain all cases nor necessary to explain all cases. Offer and acceptance analysis does not work well in various circumstances. One example is a contract for the transportation of passengers on mass public transport (MacRobertson Miller Airline Services v Commissioner of State Taxation (Western Australia) (1975) 133 CLR 125 at 136–40). Another is the contract between competitors in a regatta: though they did not communicate with each other but only with the organiser of the regatta, they are bound by their conduct in "entering for the race, and undertaking to be bound by [the] rules to the knowledge of each other" (Clarke v Earl of Dunraven (The "Satanita") [1897] AC 59 at 63). That case was applied in Raguz v Sullivan [2000] NSWCA 240 at [65]–[67]. Another example concerns the exchanges of contracts to sell land, which are hard to analyse in offer and acceptance terms; despite that Lord Greene MR observed of the practice: "Parties become bound by contract when, and in the manner in which, they intend and contemplate becoming bound. It is a question of the facts of each case …" (Eccles v Bryant [1948] 1 Ch 93 at 104).

Another example concerns simultaneous manifestations of consent (Horst K Lücke "Striking A Bargain" (1962) 1 Adel LR 293 at 295–9). Another example concerns contracts between numerous parties, or even two parties, negotiated at meetings but not assented to until each party executes counterparts. Another is where the contract is made through a single broker acting for both parties. Another is where the parties are deadlocked and they agree to submit to a solution reached by a third party.

In New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v AM Satterthwaite & Co Ltd [1975] AC 154 at 167, Lord Wilberforce, in delivering the majority advice of the Privy Council about a bargain evidenced by a bill of lading between a shipper and a stevedore made through a carrier as agent, said:

> It is only the precise analysis of this complex of relations into the classical offer and acceptance, with identifiable consideration, that seems to present difficulty, but this same difficulty exists in many situations of daily life, eg sales at auction; supermarket purchases; boarding an omnibus; purchasing a train ticket; tenders for the supply of goods; offers of rewards; acceptance by post; warranties of authority by agents; manufacturers' guarantees; gratuitous bailments; bankers' commercial credits. These are all examples which show that English law, having committed itself to a rather technical and schematic doctrine of contract, in application takes a practical approach, often at the cost of forcing the facts [177] to fit uneasily into the marked slots of offer, acceptance and consideration.

Anson's Law of Contract (27th ed, 1998) concludes:

> It would be a mistake to think that all contracts can thus be analysed into the form of offer and acceptance or that, in determining whether an exchange does give rise to a contract, the sole issue is whether the communications match and are identical. The analysis is, however, a working method which, more often than not, enables us, in a doubtful case, to ascertain whether a contract has in truth been concluded, and as such may usefully be retained.

Thus offer and acceptance analysis is a useful tool in most circumstances, and indeed is "normal" and "conventional" (Gibson v Manchester City Council [1979] 1 All ER 972 at 974 per Lord Diplock). But limited recognition has been given to the possibility of finding that contracts exist even though it is not easy to locate an offer or acceptance. In Integrated Computer Services Pty Ltd v Digital Equipment Corp (Aust) Pty Ltd (1988) 5 BPR 11,110 at 11,117–18 McHugh JA (Hope and Mahoney JJA concurring) said:

> It is often difficult to fit a commercial arrangement into the common lawyers' analysis of a contractual arrangement. Commercial discussions are often too unrefined to fit easily into the slots of "offer", "acceptance", "consideration" and "intention to create a legal relationship" which are the benchmarks of the contract of classical theory. In classical theory, the typical contract is a bilateral one and consists of an exchange of promises by means of an offer and its acceptance together with an intention to create a binding legal relationship …
> Moreover, in an ongoing relationship, it is not always easy to point to the precise moment when the legal criteria of a contract have been fulfilled. Agreements concerning terms and conditions which might be too uncertain or too illusory to enforce at a particular time in the relationship may by reason of the parties' subsequent conduct become sufficiently specific to give rise to legal rights and duties. In a dynamic commercial relationship new terms will be added or will supersede older terms. It is necessary therefore to look at the whole relationship and not only at what was said and done when the relationship was first formed.

Those passages were cited with approval by Ormiston J in Vroon BV v Foster's Brewing Group [1994] 2 VR 32 at 82–3. He also approved the following statement of Cooke J in Meates v Attorney-General [1983] NZLR 308 at 377:

> I would not treat difficulties in analysing the dealings into a strict classification of offer and acceptance as necessarily decisive in this field, although any difficulty on that head is a factor telling against a contract. The acid test in the case like the present is whether, viewed as a whole and objectively from the point of view of reasonable persons on both sides, the dealings show a concluded bargain.

Ormiston J said at 81:

> … I am prepared to accept … that agreement and thus a contract can be extracted from circumstances where no acceptance of an offer can be established or inferred and where > the most that can be said is that a manifestation of mutual assent must be implied from the circumstances. [178] In the language of para 22(2) of the Second Restatement on Contracts: "A manifestation of mutual assent may be made even though neither offer or acceptance could be identified and even though the moment of formation cannot be determined".

He concluded at 83: "there is now sufficient authority to justify the court inquiring as to the existence of an agreement evidenced otherwise than by offer and acceptance." In Empirnall Holdings Pty Ltd v Machon Paull Partners Pty Ltd (1988) 14 NSWLR 523 at 555 McHugh JA (with whom Samuels JA concurred) said:

> where an offeree with a reasonable opportunity to reject the offer of goods or services takes the benefit of them under circumstances which indicate that they were to be paid for in accordance with the offer, it is open to the tribunal of fact to hold that the offer was accepted according to its terms.

One further observation of McHugh JA in Integrated Computer Services Pty Ltd v Digital Equipment Corp (Aust) Pty Ltd (at 11,117) is relevant:

> it is an error "to suppose that merely because something has been done then there is therefore some contract in existence which has thereby been executed". Nevertheless, a contract may be inferred from the acts and conduct of parties as well as or in the absence of their words. The question in this class of case is whether the conduct of the parties, viewed in the light of the surrounding circumstances, shows a tacit understanding or agreement. The conduct of the parties, however, must be capable of proving all the essential elements of an express contract.

See also, to the same effect, Pagnan SpA v Feed Products Ltd [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep 601 at 611 (affirmed on appeal at 615).

A similar principle was enunciated in Brogden v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 666 at 682, where Lord Hatherley adopted the language of a concession by Mr Herschell QC as sound:

> he says that he will not contend that this agreement is not to be held to be a binding and firm agreement between the parties, if it should be found that, although there has been no formal recognition of the agreement in terms by the one side, yet the course of dealing and conduct of the party to whom the agreement was propounded has been such as legitimately to lead to the inference that those with whom they were dealing were made aware by that course of dealing, that the contract which they had propounded had been in fact accepted by the persons who so dealt with them.

Thus if a vendor of property, having been informed of its real estate agent's scale of fees, permits the real estate agent to continue endeavouring to sell the property, the vendor will be taken to have agreed to that sale by conduct (Way & Waller Ltd v Ryde [1944] 1 All ER 9 at 10).

While in Toyota Motor Corporation Australia Ltd v Ken Morgan Motors Pty Ltd [1994] 2 VR 106 at 178 Tadgell J exhibited some caution about the finding of a contract merely on the basis of a manifestation of mutual assent, he did quote Williston on Contracts, Vol I, para 4:3, p 258, to the following effect:

> It is not necessary to insist that assent must always be manifested by means of offer and acceptance, but cases where offer and acceptance are lacking are so rare that for purposes of general discussion they may be [179] disregarded. When they arise, they can be easily reduced to fundamental principles, particularly in the light of the modern view, adopted by both the Uniform Commercial Code and Restatement (Second), that so long as a manifestation of mutual assent is present, a contract can be found to exist though no offer or acceptance can be identified and though the precise moment that the contract thereby comes into being cannot be determined.

> If a contract is to be discerned in the absence of offer and acceptance I venture the suggestion that … it is to be discovered by inferring from the relevant facts the conclusion that the parties have agreed to incur reciprocal promissory obligations … As Williston suggests, the necessity or opportunity so to infer in the absence of offer and acceptance is likely to be rare ….

If offer and acceptance analysis is not always necessary or sufficient, principles such as the general principle that a rejection of an offer brings it to an end cannot be universal. A rejected offer could remain operative if it were repeated, or otherwise revived, or if in the circumstances it should for some other reason be treated, despite its rejection, as remaining on foot, available for acceptance, or for adoption as the basis of mutual assent manifested by conduct.

In the light of the above cases, it is relevant to ask: in all the circumstances can an agreement be inferred? Has mutual assent been manifested? What would a reasonable person in the position of the Council and a reasonable person in the position of the defendant think as to whether there was a concluded bargain?

Applying the test stated by McHugh JA in Empirnall Holdings Pty Ltd v Machon Paull Partners Pty Ltd, the 19 September 1991 letter offered "services" in the sense of a commercial benefit. The commercial benefit was a contractual right, which had not existed before, to charge up to 6 cents per litre and retain 1.1 of that 6 cents. (While the defendant and the Council may at the time have regarded the figure to be retained as only 0.3 cents, as Hodgson J construed the letter of 25 June 1991, they were in error, and it is the reaction of reasonable parties, not the actual parties, which must be analysed.) The parties had treated the 9 January and 20 February 1990 letters as having conferred that benefit in a practical sense, but the conferral of the benefit lacked contractual backing. The defendant, as offeree, had a reasonable opportunity to reject the offer: indeed, initially it did reject the offer. However, it soon took advantage of the benefit offered. It knew that the only basis on which the Council was prepared to permit the higher prices to be charged and the 1.1 cents retained as a matter of contractual right was the basis stated in the 19 September 1991 letter. The charging of the higher prices by the defendant could convey one of two possibilities, that it was acting in breach of the condition on which the benefit was being conferred, or that the defendant was accepting that condition. A reasonable bystander, and in particular a reasonable bystander in the position of the Council, would prefer the latter possibility. Once the Council came to learn that the defendant was charging the higher fees from October it would reasonably have thought that a contract existed between the parties on the terms of the 19 September 1991 letter. Breach of the condition on which the benefit was being conferred did not take place when the higher fees were charged; it only took place when that part of the higher fees [180] which had to be passed over to the Council was not passed over pursuant to the 18 September 1991 letter and cl 22 of the 12 July 1990 agreement, namely within "one calendar month of the end of each quarter". The first breach of that condition took place on 31 January 1992, well after the fees increased. The first breach of the duty to keep records and issue dockets to Council also took place after the increased fees began to be charged.

There is some evidence that Mr Pitkin of the Council and Mr Grundy of the defendant believed that there was no contractual regime for liquid waste fees but that the Council had some other power to fix them. That does not matter. Reasonable persons in the position of the Council and the defendant would construe the 19 September 1991 letter and the defendant's later conduct as henceforth putting the regime for liquid waste fees on a contractual basis, whatever the position had been before ….

[181] One way of putting the applicable test is the way that Scrutton LJ put it in Sullivan v Constable (1932) 48 TLR 369 at 370: "If the [defendant] had so acted that the plaintiff was reasonably entitled to believe that [the defendant] was assenting to the position which had been asserted by the plaintiff, the [defendant] was bound."

A similar test was stated by Chitty on Contracts (28th ed, 1999) Vol 1, para 2-027: "conduct will only amount to acceptance if it is clear that the offeree did the act with the intention (actual or apparent) of accepting the offer" (emphasis added). A reasonable person in the Council's shoes would, in the light of the defendant's decision to charge the higher fees of which the Council speedily learned, have been reasonably entitled to believe that the defendant was assenting to the position asserted in the 19 September 1991 letter despite its initial rejection. That was the apparent intention underlying its conduct. The fact that the defendant did not communicate its move to the new fee levels directly to the Council does not matter. Speaking of the general rule that an acceptance must be communicated to the offeror, Chitty on Contracts (28th ed, 1999), Vol 1, para 2-041 states:

> The main reason for the rule is that it could cause hardship to the offeror to be bound without knowing that his offer had been accepted. It follows that, so long as the offeror knows of the acceptance, there can be a contract even though the acceptance was not brought to his notice by the offeree.

Had the defendant wished to reserve to itself the right to retain the whole of the higher fees despite the position which Council had communicated in the letter of 19 September 1991, it was incumbent on it to inform the Council that it considered it had a right to charge the higher fees and retain the whole of them and proposed to act on that view. It did not communicate that view in its letter of 3 October 1991. And it did not communicate that view at any other time. Its failure to do so meant that the Council was reasonably entitled to believe that the defendant was acting in conformity with the letter of 19 September 1991 and entering a contract on its terms.

If, a few months after 19 September 1991, the Council had demanded that all fees received above those stipulated for in cl 21 and cl 22 be paid to it, and the defendant alleged that it was contractually entitled to retain the fees up to 1.1 cents, what would have prevented that contention from succeeding? On the trial judge's findings, that contention could not have been met by appeal to the 9 January–20 February 1990 letters. But why could it not have been met by reference to the 19 September 1991 letter and the defendant's actions in conformity with it? The defendant's submissions to this Court offered no satisfactory answer to that question.

It was submitted that the defendant's conduct amounted to taking advantage of the beneficial parts of the 19 September 1991 proposal but not submitting to its disadvantageous aspects, and hence that the conduct did not establish consent to them. In all the circumstances it was for the defendant to make plain that its conduct amounted only to taking advantage of the proposal but not to submitting to the disadvantages if that was its position. It did not express that position until some years had passed. [182]

(c) Even if the 19 September 1991 letter was accepted by conduct or otherwise stated contractual terms, was there consideration?

The trial judge found consideration in the fact that while the letters of 9 January–20 February 1990 authorised the defendant to retain 1.1 cents per litre, he did not find that this created any contractual entitlement. The effect of accepting the 19 September 1991 offer was to give a contractual entitlement. That is a benefit capable of amounting to consideration and moving from the Council as promisee. It is crucial to this reasoning that the 9 January–20 February 1990 letters did not create a contract. The trial judge's failure to find that the 9 January and 20 February 1990 letters created a contract, and his implicit finding that they did not (in his use of the words "The pre-existing authorisation of 1.1c was put on a firmer footing"), is supported by the fact that when the Council purported to amend the rate by its letter of 25 June 1991, the defendant did not protest, as it could have if its rights were contractual. This subsequent conduct of the parties is admissible on the issue of whether there was a contract at all, and points strongly against it. The fact that there was no response to the 20 February 1990 letter, in which the Council put a proposal to the defendant different from that which the defendant had put to the Council on 9 January 1990, also indicates that there was no contract formed by the letters.

A further benefit to the defendant was, as the trial judge said, that the problem of excessive depositing of liquid waste was burdensome to the defendant, and the higher charges, in operating as a deterrent to the excessive depositing of liquid waste, benefited the defendant intending to reduce those burdens. There was also a benefit to the Council as promisor, namely the creation of a fund which by creating a reserve to establish a liquid waste treatment plant, would enable liquid waste to be disposed of more efficiently and in a more environmentally friendly manner. That in turn would have advantages for the defendant in increasing the capacity of the site to carry waste ….

IPP JA:

The dispute about fees for collecting and depositing liquid waste

[3.160] [184] For the reasons set out by Heydon JA, I agree that the July 1990 contract governed the charging of liquid waste and regulated the fees that the appellant was entitled to charge and the parties' obligations to each other in respect of [185] the liquid waste fees collected. It is, accordingly, unnecessary for me to say anything more in this respect. I also agree with Heydon JA for the reasons set out by him that the letter of 19 September 1991 has to be treated as a contractual offer, this being how the case was conducted at trial. It is now too late for the appellant to argue that, in writing that letter, the Council had no contractual intent. This was not an issue raised or investigated at the trial. I, too, have come to the conclusion that the offer contained in the letter of 19 September 1991 was accepted and the October 1991 contract was concluded. I have, however, done so by a route different to that followed by Heydon JA and the learned trial judge. In order to explain how I have arrived at this conclusion it is necessary for me to set out the background facts.

The construction of the 19 September 1991 letter: the ambiguities

[3.165] [191] While the finding that the July 1990 contract governed the charging of fees for liquid waste inevitably results in the further finding that the appellant committed a breach of that contract by charging more for liquid waste than that contract allowed, it does not follow that the Council, in consequence, suffered any loss. For the Council, without more, to succeed in its claim for damages, it would have to establish a right to restitutionary damages, a proposition open to serious doubt. Whether the offer contained in the 19 September 1991 letter was accepted (and the October 1991 contract was thereby concluded), is therefore an issue of significant importance.

In considering whether the 19 September 1991 offer was accepted, it is necessary to determine, precisely, the terms of that offer: Quadling v Robinson & Anor (1976) 137 CLR 192 at 201.

It is nowadays a trite proposition that, if the language of a contract is ambiguous, evidence of surrounding circumstances is admissible for the purposes of construing the contract:

> Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337 at 352. Where ambiguities exist, mutually known facts establishing the commercial purpose of the contract, the genesis of the transaction, the background and the context in which the parties are operating will be admissible: Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen (1976) 1 WLR 989 (at 995 to 996 per Lord Wilberforce). On this basis, the shared beliefs of the parties as to their respective rights as they existed immediately before the contract was entered into are admissible, such beliefs constituting common assumptions: Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales at 353–4.

[192] In B & B Constructions (Aust) Pty Ltd v Brian A Cheeseman & Associates Pty Ltd (1994) 35 NSWLR 227, 245 Mahoney J drew attention to the recent tendency to apply the parol evidence rule in a less restrictive way (see, for example, the statement of McHugh JA in Manufacturers Mutual Insurance Ltd v Withers (1988) 5 ANZ Insurance Cases para 60-853 at 75,343). Mahoney J went on to say:

> The Court is not confined to the examination of the text of the document. It is entitled to know, by extrinsic evidence or otherwise, what was the context in which the document was executed and the problem or problems which were to be solved by it.

As I understand his Honour's observations, he was referring to an unambiguous contract. With respect to his Honour, if the aim of construction is, by objective means, to arrive at the real intention of the parties, there is much to be said for this approach. Any exercise in objective construction that does not have regard to the context in which the contract was entered into must carry serious risks that the results will be distorted. It is, however, unnecessary to rely on any extension of the established rule as, in my opinion, the letter of 19 September 1991 is ambiguous and does allow regard to be had to the context and the parties' common assumptions.

The first ambiguity stems from the phrase "the additional income" in resolution (a). This phrase cannot be understood without reference to the letters of 9 January 1990, 20 February 1990 and 25 June 1991 as it does not have a fixed meaning. Those letters, in turn, cannot properly be understood without reference to the parties' common beliefs as to their contractual effect. The issue is similar to that in Bank of New Zealand v Simpson [1900] AC 182 where the Privy Council considered that extrinsic evidence was admissible to determine the meaning of the phrase "the total cost of the works".

Secondly, it is not clear whether in the last paragraph of the letter of 19 September 1991 the Council was invoking cl 22 on the basis that the July 1990 contract, since its inception, governed the payment of fees for liquid waste, or whether the Council was seeking merely to incorporate that clause by reference in its offer (so that, upon acceptance, its provisions would, for the first time, apply to liquid waste). This ambiguity is exacerbated by the reference, in the letter of 19 September 1991, to the appellant being required to keep records and issue dockets "in a similar manner to the Disposal Fees being paid to Council for Solid Waste disposal". The July 1990 contract did not oblige the appellant to keep records and issue dockets save that cl 21 required it to issue receipts on behalf of the Council for fees and charges collected and to deliver to the Council all used receipt books "not later than one calendar month after the end of the quarter in which the book was completed". The reference to a "similar manner" is therefore erroneous, but the sentence in which this phrase appears suggests that the Council was proposing a term similar to one contained in the July 1990 contract and was seeking to incorporate that term by reference.

Accordingly, in my view, the offer being ambiguous in the respects indicated, the context and common assumptions are admissible, according to accepted principle, in the exercise of construction. I shall now detail the material that I consider to be relevant to construe the offer.

The construction of the 19 September 1991 letter: the extrinsic material

[3.170] [193] … [At] the time the letter of 11 September 1991 was sent, the appellant and the Council, in common, assumed the following:

(a) The July 1990 contract governed the receipt of liquid waste but not the fees to be charged by the appellant for liquid waste.

(b) The charging of fees for liquid waste was governed by the January and February 1990 letters as corrected or varied by the letter of 25 June 1991.

(c) The appellant was not entitled to charge fees for collecting liquid waste otherwise than in accordance with the Council's agreement as to the fees charged.

By September 1991 the volume of liquid waste deposited had increased significantly and serious problems with its disposal had emerged. There was a mutual need to deal with those problems. The appellant was incurring additional handling costs by reason of the difficulties in disposal. The vast quantities of liquid waste were impinging on the capacity of the depot to receive solid waste. The difficulties in disposal were causing bad odours and other problems. There was a need for a different method of treating the disposal of liquid waste at the depot. [194]

The meaning of the letter of 19 September 1991

[3.175] When the offer of 19 September 1991 is construed by reference to the context and the parties' common beliefs, it is apparent that it was written on the assumption that, upon acceptance, it would give rise to a contract that dealt separately and independently with the determination of fees for liquid waste and the payment of part of them by the appellant to the Council. The parties did not believe that the July 1990 contract applied to liquid waste and they did not intend to invoke any clause of that contract on the basis that it governed the determination of fees for liquid waste.

Accordingly, the last sentence of the letter of 19 September 1991 must be construed as seeking to incorporate cl 22 of the July 1990 contract by reference in the way I have explained. That being so, the Council was not thereby asserting that the July 1990 contract was, generally, of application to the charging of fees for liquid waste. Moreover, the "additional income" referred to in the letter of 19 September 1991, objectively construed by reference to the relevant background facts, means income additional to 1.1 cents per litre, that being the fee the appellant was entitled to retain pursuant to the 20 February 1990 letter, read with the letter of 25 June 1991.

Was the offer of 19 September 1991 rejected by the letter of 3 October 1991?

[3.180] The question whether the letter of 3 October 1991 amounted to a rejection of the offer of 11 September 1991 involves a matter of construction: Quadling v Robinson at 201. The effect of the appellant's letter of 3 October 1991 has to be considered in the light of the construction of the letter of 19 September 1991. On that basis, the appellant's statement in the letter of 3 October 1991 that it "has no contract with Council for liquid disposal" was not a rejection of the offer contained in the earlier letter. The Council had not asserted that such a contract existed.

Similarly, when the letter of 3 October 1991 is read in context and as a whole, the statement that "the present rates do not make it viable to continue providing a liquid disposal service" was not a rejection of the offer. This statement was in the same tenor as the request by the appellant for "adequate tip fees for the work involved in providing for liquid disposal". These remarks were merely part of the posturing that often accompanies negotiation.

The attitude displayed in the letter of 3 October 1991 is similar to that of the plaintiffs in Stevenson, Jacques & Company v McLean (1880) 5 QBD 346. In that case the defendant contemplated selling a quantity of iron to the plaintiffs. He wrote to the plaintiffs to the effect that he would sell for forty shillings nett cash per ton, the offer to remain open until Monday. On the Monday, the plaintiffs' telegraphed the defendant, "Please wire whether you would accept forty for delivery over two months or, if not, longest limit you would give." The plaintiffs sent a further telegraph message to the defendant informing him that, acting as his agents, they had secured a sale at the price he was asking. The question arose whether, by their first telegram, the plaintiffs had rejected the defendant's offer, thereby rendering it incapable of acceptance at a later date. Lush J held (at 350) that the plaintiffs' telegram was in the form of an inquiry, there was "nothing specific by way of offer or rejection". I regard the letter of 3 October 1991 in the same light.

[195] In my view, the letter of 3 October 1991 expressed dissatisfaction with the offer of 11 September 1991 and set out the appellant's argument for higher fees, but did not amount to a rejection. The appellant was attempting thereby to create a platform for further negotiation while leaving the offer of 11 September 1991 open for acceptance.

Did the appellant accept the offer of 19 September 1991: the appellant's argument

[3.185] The Council pleaded that a contract was constituted by the letters of 19 September 1991, 3 October 1991 and 15 October 1991 together with "the consent of the [appellant] in accepting liquid waste and levying fees therefor". Of these, it is only the pleaded conduct of the appellant in charging the fees stipulated in the letter of 19 September 1991 that is capable of constituting an acceptance of the offer contained in that letter.

The conditions proposed by the letter of 11 September 1991 (properly construed) were as follows:

(a) Liquid waste disposal costs were to be increased to 1.3 cents per litre from 1 October 1991 and then quarterly by 1 cent per litre up to a figure of 6 cents per litre.

(b) The appellant was to charge those fees to Cleanaway, Mr Landers and all other depositors of liquid wastes at the depot.

(c) The respondent was to keep records and issue dockets to the Council each week.

(d) The appellant was to retain 1.1 cents per litre of the fees collected by it and pay the additional income to the Council "each quarter in accordance with cl 22 of the contract".

As mentioned, the appellant charged fees as contemplated by the letter of 11 September 1991 to itself, Mr Landers and all other depositors. It retained all the monies it so collected itself and did not comply with the other conditions. Accordingly, the appellant submitted, its conduct did not amount to an absolute and unqualified acceptance of the offer.

Did the appellant accept the offer of 19 September 1991: the relevant surrounding circumstances

[3.190] In Brogden v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 666 Lord Hatherley said (at 686) that, for conduct to amount to implied acceptance of an offer, it must be "of such a character as necessarily to lead to the inference on the part of the defendants that the agreement had been accepted on the part of the plaintiffs and was to be acted upon by them". The question is one of fact (Empirnall Holdings Pty Ltd v Machon Paull Partners Pty Ltd (1988) 14 NSWLR 523 at 535 per McHugh JA) and its determination depends on an examination of the facts said to give rise to an acceptance, seen in their context.

A significant feature of the relevant context is the purpose of the offer, as mutually understood. One important purpose is manifest from the letter of 19 September 1991 itself, namely, the creation of a monetary reserve for the establishment of a liquid waste treatment plant.

I have referred to the problems that were being experienced because of the vast increase of liquid waste being deposited at the depot. This had caused difficult physical conditions on site, making handling expensive and hindering the disposal of solid waste. These difficulties tended, practically, to limit the [196] quantity of liquid waste that could be deposited and limit the income that the appellant could earn from both liquid and solid waste. The Council, too, was being prejudiced as the services it wished to make available to the community at the depot were deteriorating.

The establishment of a liquid waste treatment plant would ameliorate these difficulties. It is true that the July 1990 contract was due to expire in 1996 and there was no evidence as to when such a plant would be constructed, but the relationship between the appellant and the Council in regard to the management of the depot had endured since 1982 and there was no evidence to suggest that it was likely to terminate on the expiry of the current contract. The construction of a treatment plant was likely to be to the mutual advantage of both …. Additionally, the increase in prices would act as a disincentive to the public to use the depot for the depositing of liquid waste.

Hence, the purpose of the offer of 19 September 1991 was to arrive at an agreement whereby funds for a liquid waste treatment plant could be obtained over a period when the quantities of liquid waste deposited at the depot would be reduced. This purpose was known to the appellant.

A further factor to be born in mind is that the offer involved the continued use by the appellant of the Council's land for the depositing of liquid waste. In other words, the Council was proposing to the appellant that it might continue to use the Council's land for that purpose and charge higher fees for the liquid waste deposited, on the basis suggested.

In reality, this proposal was a concession by the Council. True it is that cl 6 of the July 1990 contract required the appellant to keep the depot open for the receipt of trade refuse (which included liquid waste) from 8.30 am to 5.30 pm seven days a week, and it was implicit in this clause that the Council would allow its property to be used for the receipt of liquid waste during the periods stipulated. But the Council's obligations in this respect were impliedly conditioned by considerations of reasonableness. The appellant was not entitled to collect or accept liquid waste in excessive quantities that would damage the Council's land or otherwise prejudice the operation of the purpose of the depot (which was primarily to receive solid waste).

By September 1991, the site problems to which I have adverted were reaching the stage where the Council would have had to consider, on the grounds of reasonableness, limiting the depositing of liquid waste. Were the offer of 19 September to be accepted, the Council was unlikely to impose any such limit.

Did the appellant accept the offer of 19 September 1991: conclusion

[3.195] Both parties believed that fees for liquid waste could not be increased without the Council's assent. By the offer, the Council was proposing an increase in fees, but only on condition that the moneys received from that increase were to be retained by the appellant and paid to the Council to be used as a reserve for the establishment [of] a liquid waste treatment plant. The establishment of such a plant was a matter of fundamental significance to the Council.

The letter of 19 September 1991 when read in context, reflects a scheme whereby the Council intended to finance the construction of a liquid waste treatment plant by the additional income to be derived from the increase in liquid waste disposal fees. This was the sole reason for the Council proposing [172] the increase in fees. The two matters were dependent on each other and inextricably linked. They were not capable of being separated.

In these circumstances, in my view, the fact that the appellant charged the higher fees is conclusive evidence that it agreed to all the conditions contained in the offer of 19 September 1991. When regard is had to the indivisible nature of the offer, the appellant's conduct, objectively viewed, was an unequivocal acceptance of the offer. The appellant accepted the benefits proposed, namely, the charging of the higher fees while using the Council's land. Those benefits could not be severed from the obligations proposed. Accordingly, by accepting those benefits the appellant accepted the Council's offer in accordance with its terms (cf Empirnall Holdings Pty Ltd v Machon Paull Partners Pty Ltd at 535).

Consideration

[3.200] By the October 1991 contract the appellant was not allowed to retain any moneys additional to the 1.1 cents per litre to which it was entitled under the arrangement that, as at that date, was already in place. The appellant submitted that this meant that it received no consideration and, therefore, the contract was not binding.

The October 1991 contract laid the basis for the establishment of a liquid waste treatment plant that would enable more liquid waste to be deposited at the depot and alleviate problems with the handling of solid waste. This would enable the appellant, in consequence, to earn more. Moreover, the practical effect of the October 1991 contract was to enable the appellant to continue using the Council's land for the depositing of liquid waste without the real prospect of the Council imposing any limit on such depositing.

The benefits which I have outlined were adequate consideration for the October 1991 contract.

Conclusion

[3.205] Having found that the offer was accepted and that there was consideration, it follows that I consider that Hodgson CJ in Eq correctly found that the parties entered into the October 1991 contract and that contract was binding and enforceable.

It is therefore unnecessary for me to deal with the issues that arise out of the Council's alternative claims.

Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal. I agree with the orders proposed by Heydon JA.

Appeal dismissed.

Method of communication

Postal acceptance rule

[3.210] From the time of the decision in Adams v Lindsell (1818) 1 B & A 681; 106 ER 250, the "postal rule" (called the "mailbox rule" in the United States) has governed acceptances sent by post. In Henthorn v Fraser [1892] 2 Ch 27, 33, Lord Herschell stated the principle as follows:

> Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that, according to the ordinary usages of mankind, the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance of an offer, the acceptance is complete as soon as it is posted.

In Tallerman & Co Pty Ltd v Nathan's Merchandise (1957) 98 CLR 93, 111–112, Dixon CJ and Fullagar J appeared to take a more restrictive view of the circumstances in which the postal rule is to be applied:

> The general rule is that a contract is not completed until acceptance of an offer is actually communicated to the offeror, and a finding that a contract is completed by the posting of a letter of acceptance cannot be justified unless it is to be inferred that the offeror contemplated and intended that his offer might be accepted by the doing of that act: see Henthorn v Fraser [1892] 2 Ch 27, at 35, per Kay LJ. In that case as in Household Fire & Carriage Accident Insurance Co (Ltd) v Grant (1879) 4 Ex D 216, it was easy to draw such an inference, but in such a case as the present, where solicitors are conducting a highly contentious correspondence, one would have thought that actual communication would be regarded as essential to the conclusion of agreement on anything.

In Bressan v Squires [1974] 2 NSWLR 460, 461–2, Bowen CJ in Eq said:

> According to [the formulation of Lord Hershell in Henthorn v Fraser], all that needs to be in contemplation of the parties is the post as a mode, indeed as a possible or permitted mode, for the law to impose the consequence that the contract is concluded by the action of posting. It is not required that it should be within the contemplation of the parties that the action of posting should have the consequence of concluding the contract; this, of course, would apply in relatively fewer cases, and would narrow the application of the exception.
> At first reading, it might be thought that the formulation by Dixon CJ and Fullagar J in Tallerman & Co Pty Ltd v Nathan's Merchandise (Victoria) Pty Ltd … constituted an adoption of this narrower basis … The reference made by their Honours to the judgment of Kay LJ in Henthorn v Fraser, however, suggests to my mind they were not intending to narrow the exception.

Brinkibon v Stahag Stahl Und Stahlwarenhandelsgesellschaft

[3.215] Brinkibon Ltd v Stahag Stahl Und Stahlwarenhandelsgesellschaft mbH [1983] 2 AC 34 (House of Lords) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: After prolonged negotiations for the sale of a quantity of steel bars, the buyers, an English company, sent a telex to Vienna accepting the terms of sale offered by the sellers, an Austrian company. The contract was not performed and the buyers wished to sue the sellers, but the sellers objected on the grounds that the English courts had no jurisdiction over an Austrian company. Order II, r 1(1)(f) of the Rules of the Supreme Court 1965 (England and Wales) allowed a party to serve a writ on someone outside the jurisdiction, "if the contract was made within the jurisdiction" and, accordingly, the House of Lords had to decide when and where the contract was made.]

LORD WILBERFORCE: [40] In the present case it seems that if there was a contract (a question which can only be decided at the trial), it was preceded by and possibly formed by a number of telephone conversations and telexes between London and Vienna, and there are a number of possible combinations [41] on which reliance can be placed. At this stage we must take the alternatives which provide reasonable evidence of a contract in order to see if the test is satisfied. There are two:

(1) A telex dated 3 May 1979 from the sellers in Vienna, said to amount to a counter-offer, followed by a telex from the buyers in London to the sellers in Vienna dated 4 May 1979, said to amount to an acceptance.

> The first of these alternatives neatly raises the question whether an acceptance by telex sent from London but received in Vienna causes a contract to be made in London or in Vienna. If the acceptance had been sent by post, or by telegram, then, on existing authorities, it would have been complete when put into the hands of the Post Office, in London. If on the other hand it had been telephoned, it would have been complete when heard by the offeror, in Vienna. So in which category is a telex communication to be placed? Existing authority of the Court of Appeal decides in favour of the latter category, that is, a telex is to be assimilated to other methods of instantaneous communication: see Entores Ltd v Miles Far East Corp [1955] 2 All ER 493; [1955] 2 QB 327. The buyers ask that this case, which has stood for 30 years, should now be reviewed.

Now such review as is necessary must be made against the background of the law as to the making of contracts. The general rule, it is hardly necessary to state, is that a contract is formed when acceptance of an offer is communicated by the offeree to the offeror. And if it is necessary to determine where a contract is formed … it appears logical that this should be at the place where acceptance is communicated to the offeror. In the common case of contracts, whether oral or in writing inter praesentes, there is no difficulty; and again logic demands that even where there is no mutual presence at the same place and at the same time, if communication is instantaneous, for example by telephone or radio communication, the same result should follow.

Then there is the case (very common) of communication at a distance, to meet which the so called "postal rule" has developed … In these cases too it seems logical to say that the place, as well as the time, of acceptance should be where (as when) the acceptance is put into the charge of the post office.

In this situation, with a general rule covering instantaneous communication inter praesentes, or at a distance, with an exception applying to [42] non-instantaneous communication at a distance, how should communications by telex be categorised? In Entores Ltd v Miles Far East Corp the Court of Appeal classified them with instantaneous communications. Their ruling, which has passed into the textbooks, including Williston on Contracts, appears not to have caused either adverse comment, or any difficulty to businessmen. I would accept it as a general rule. Where the condition of simultaneity is met, and where it appears to be within the mutual intention of the parties that contractual exchanges should take place in this way, I think it a sound rule, but not necessarily a universal rule.

Since 1955 the use of telex communication has been greatly expanded, and there are many variants on it. The senders and recipients may not be the principals to the contemplated contract. They may be servants or agents with limited authority. The message may not reach, or be intended to reach, the designated recipient immediately: messages may be sent out of office hours, or at night, with the intention, or on the assumption, that they will be read at a later time. There may be some error or default at the recipient's end which prevents receipt at the time contemplated and believed in by the sender. The message may have been sent and/or received through machines operated by third persons. And many other variations may occur. No universal rule can cover all such cases; they must be resolved by reference to the intentions of the parties, by sound business practice and in some cases by a judgment where the risks should lie …

The present case is, as Entores Ltd v Miles Far East Corp itself, the simple case of instantaneous communication between principals, and, in accordance with the general rule, involves that the contract (if any) was made when and where the acceptance was received. This was on May 4 1979 in Vienna …

I find myself in agreement with the Court of Appeal, and the appeal must be dismissed.

[LORD FRASER OF TULLYBELTON and LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK delivered concurring judgments; LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN and LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICK concurred in the judgments of LORD WILBERFORCE and LORD BRANDON.]

Appeal dismissed.

[3.220] Note

In Reese Bros Plastics Ltd v Hamon-Sobelco Australia Pty Ltd (1988) 5 BPR 11,106, the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales accepted that the instantaneous communication principle should be applied to facsimile messages.

Electronic communications

[3.225] The time of receipt of electronic communications is now governed by legislation in all Australian States and Territories. The Electronic Transactions Acts were based on the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL) Model Law on Electronic Commerce (1996), which has since been supplemented by the United Nations Convention on the Use of Electronic Communications in International Contracts 2005.

The New South Wales legislation is set out below. Equivalent or identical provisions are to be found in: Electronic Transactions Act 1999 (Cth), ss 5, 14A and 15A–15F; Electronic Transactions Act 2000 (Tas), ss 3, 11A and 12A–12E; Electronic Transactions (Northern Territory) Act (NT), ss 5, 13A and 14A–14E; Electronic Communications Act 2000 (SA), ss 5, 13A and 14A–14E; Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000 (Vic), ss 3 and 13A–14E; Electronic Transactions Act 2011 (WA), ss 5, 14(1) and 17–21.

5 Interpretation

(1) In this Act:

addressee of an electronic communication means a person who is intended by the originator to receive the electronic communication, but does not include a person acting as an intermediary with respect to the electronic communication.

automated message system means a computer program or an electronic or other automated means used to initiate an action or respond to data messages in whole or in part, without review or intervention by a natural person each time an action is initiated or a response is generated by the system.

electronic communication means:

(a) a communication of information in the form of data, text or images by means of guided or unguided electromagnetic energy, or both, or information system means a system for generating, sending, receiving, storing or otherwise processing electronic communications.

(b) a communication of information in the form of sound by means of guided or unguided electromagnetic energy, or both, where the sound is processed at its destination by an automated voice recognition system.

transaction includes:

(a) any transaction in the nature of a contract, agreement or other arrangement, and

(b) any statement, declaration, demand, notice or request, including an offer and the acceptance of an offer, that the parties are required to make or choose to make in connection with the formation or performance of a contract, agreement or other arrangement, and

(c) any transaction of a non-commercial nature.

Part 2 Application of legal requirements to electronic communications

13A Time of Receipt

(1) For the purposes of a law of this jurisdiction, unless otherwise agreed between the originator and the addressee of an electronic communication:

(a) the time of receipt of the electronic communication is the time when the electronic communication becomes capable of being retrieved by the addressee at an electronic address designated by the addressee, or

(b) the time of receipt of the electronic communication at another electronic address of the addressee is the time when both:

(i) the electronic communication has become capable of being retrieved by the addressee at that address, and

(ii) the addressee has become aware that the electronic communication has been sent to that address.

(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), unless otherwise agreed between the originator and the addressee of the electronic communication, it is to be assumed that the electronic communication is capable of being retrieved by the addressee when it reaches the addressee's electronic address.

(3) Subsection (1) applies even though the place where the information system supporting an electronic address is located may be different from the place where the electronic communication is taken to have been received under section 13B.

Part 2A Additional provisions applying to contracts involving electronic communications

14A Application and operation of this Part

This Part applies to the use of electronic communications in connection with the formation or performance of a contract between parties where the proper law of the contract is (or would on its formation be) the law of this jurisdiction, and so applies:

(a) whether some or all of the parties are located within Australia or elsewhere, and

(b) whether the contract is for business purposes, for personal, family or household purposes, or for other purposes.

14B Invitation to treat regarding contracts

(1) A proposal to form a contract made through one or more electronic communications that:

(a) is not addressed to one or more specific parties, and

(b) is generally accessible to parties making use of information systems, is to be considered as an invitation to make offers, unless it clearly indicates the intention of the party making the proposal to be bound in case of acceptance.

(2) Subsection (1) extends to proposals that make use of interactive applications for the placement of orders through information systems.

14C Use of automated message systems for contract formation – non-intervention of natural person

A contract formed by:

(a) the interaction of an automated message system and a natural person, or

(b) the interaction of automated message systems, is not invalid, void or unenforceable on the sole ground that no natural person reviewed or intervened in each of the individual actions carried out by the automated message systems or the resulting contract.

14D Error in electronic communications regarding contracts

(1) This section applies in relation to a statement, declaration, demand, notice or request, including an offer and the acceptance of an offer, that the parties are required to make or choose to make in connection with the formation or performance of a contract.

(2) If:

(a) a natural person makes an input error in an electronic communication exchanged with the automated message system of another party, and

(b) the automated message system does not provide the person with an opportunity to correct the error, the person, or the party on whose behalf the person was acting, has the right to withdraw the portion of the electronic communication in which the input error was made if:

(c) the person, or the party on whose behalf the person was acting, notifies the other party of the error as soon as possible after having learned of the error and indicates that he or she made an error in the electronic communication, and

(d) the person, or the party on whose behalf the person was acting, has not used or received any material benefit or value from the goods or services, if any, received from the other party.

(3) The right of withdrawal of a portion of an electronic communication under this section is not of itself a right to rescind or otherwise terminate a contract.

(4) The consequences (if any) of the exercise of the right of withdrawal of a portion of an electronic communication under this section are to be determined in accordance with any applicable rule of law.

In some circumstances the withdrawal of a portion of an electronic communication may invalidate the entire communication or render it ineffective for the purposes of contract formation (see paragraph 241 of the UNCITRAL explanatory note for the United Nations Convention on the Use of Electronic Communications in International Contracts).

14E Application of Act in relation to contracts

(1) Subject to subsection (2), the provisions of sections 7 and 13-13B apply to:

(a) a transaction constituted by or relating to a contract, or

(b) an electronic communication relating to the formation or performance of a contract, in the same way as they apply to a transaction or electronic communication referred to in those sections, and so apply as if the words "For the purposes of a law of this jurisdiction" were omitted.

(2) However, this Part (including subsection (1)) does not apply to or in relation to a contract to the extent that:

(a) Part 2 would of its own force have the same effect as this Part if this Part applied, or

(b) a law of another State or Territory (that is in substantially the same terms as Part 2) would of its own force have the same effect as this Part if this Part applied.

Note: This section applies provisions of Part 2 to contracts or proposed contracts to the extent (if any) that those provisions do not apply merely because they are expressed to apply in relation to a law of this jurisdiction. This section also disapplies the provisions of Part 2A to the extent that Part 2 would apply of its own force. An example where Part 2 may not apply of its own force is where a contract is being negotiated in a State or Territory from a supplier located overseas.

Guide to Enactment of the UNCITRAL Model Law on Electronic Commerce

[3.240] United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL), Guide to Enactment of the UNCITRAL Model Law on Electronic Commerce (1996).

I. Introduction To The Model Law

A. Objectives

2. The use of modern means of communication such as electronic mail and electronic data interchange (EDI) for the conduct of international trade transactions has been increasing rapidly and is expected to develop further as technical supports such as information highways and the INTERNET become more widely accessible. However, the communication of legally significant information in the form of paperless messages may be hindered by legal obstacles to the use of such messages, or by uncertainty as to their legal effect or validity. The purpose of the Model Law is to offer national legislators a set of internationally acceptable rules as to how a number of such legal obstacles may be removed, and how a more secure legal environment may be created for what has become known as "electronic commerce". The principles expressed in the Model Law are also intended to be of use to individual users of electronic commerce in the drafting of some of the contractual solutions that might be needed to overcome the legal obstacles to the increased use of electronic commerce ….

B. Scope

1. The title of the Model Law refers to "electronic commerce". While a definition of "electronic data interchange (EDI)" is provided in article 2, the Model Law does not specify the meaning of "electronic commerce". In preparing the Model Law, the Commission decided that, in addressing the subject matter before it, it would have in mind a broad notion of EDI, covering a variety of trade-related uses of EDI that might be referred to broadly under the rubric of "electronic commerce" …, although other descriptive terms could also be used. Among the means of communication encompassed in the notion of "electronic commerce" are the following modes of transmission based on the use of electronic techniques: communication by means of EDI defined narrowly as the computer-to-computer transmission of data in a standardized format; transmission of electronic messages involving the use of either publicly available standards or proprietary standards; transmission of free-formatted text by electronic means, for example through the INTERNET. It was also noted that, in certain circumstances, the notion of "electronic commerce" might cover the use of techniques such as telex and telecopy [ie, facsimile] ….

2. Article 15. Time and place of dispatch and receipt of data messages

102. Paragraph (2), the purpose of which is to define the time of receipt of a data message, addresses the situation where the addressee unilaterally designates a specific information system for the receipt of a message (in which case the designated system may or may not be an information system of the addressee), and the data message reaches an information system of the addressee that is not the designated system. In such a situation, receipt is deemed to occur when the data message is retrieved by the addressee. By "designated information system", the Model Law is intended to cover a system that has been specifically designated by a party, for instance in the case where an offer expressly specifies the address to which acceptance should be sent. The mere indication of an electronic mail or telecopy address on a letterhead or other document should not be regarded as express designation of one or more information systems.

Correspondence between offer and acceptance

Butler Machine Tool Co v Ex-Cell-O Corp (England)

[3.245] Butler Machine Tool Co Ltd v Ex-Cell-O Corp (England) Ltd [1979] 1 WLR 401 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Thesiger J.

[FACTS: The facts are set out by Lord Denning MR.]

LORD DENNING MR: [402] This case is a "battle of forms". The plaintiffs, the Butler Machine Tool Co Ltd, suppliers of a machine, on 23 May 1969, quoted a price for a machine tool of £75 535. Delivery was to be given in ten months. On the back of the quotation there were terms and conditions. One of them was a price variation clause. It provided for an increase in the price if there was an increase in the costs and so forth. The machine tool was not delivered until November 1970. By that time costs had increased so much that the sellers claimed an additional sum of £2 892 as due to them under the price variation clause.

The defendant buyers, Ex-Cell-O Corp (England) Ltd, rejected the excess charge. They relied on their own terms and conditions. They said:

We did not accept the sellers' quotation as it was. We gave an order for the self-same machine at the self-same price, but on the back of our order we had our own terms and conditions. Our terms and conditions did not contain any price variation clause.

The judge held that the price variation clause in the sellers' form continued through the whole dealing and so the sellers were entitled to rely upon it … The judge said that the sellers did all that was necessary and reasonable to bring the price variation clause to the notice of the buyers. He thought that the buyers would not "browse over the conditions" of the sellers; and then, by printed words in their (the buyers') document, trap the sellers into a fixed price contract.

[403] I am afraid that I cannot agree with the suggestion that the buyers "trapped" the sellers in any way. Neither party called any oral evidence before the judge. The case was decided on the documents alone. I propose therefore to go through them.

On 23 May 1969, the sellers offered to deliver one "Butler" double column plane-miller for the total price of £75 535. Delivery ten months (subject to confirmation at time of ordering) other terms and conditions are on the reverse of this quotation. On the back there were 16 conditions in small print starting with this general condition: "All orders are accepted only upon and subject to the terms set out in our quotation and the following conditions. These terms and conditions shall prevail over any terms and conditions in the buyer's order."

Clause 3 was the price variation clause. It said:

> Prices are based on present day costs of manufacture and design and having regard to the delivery quoted and uncertainty as to the cost of labour, materials etc during the period of manufacture, we regret that we have no alternative but to make it a condition of acceptance of order that goods will be charged at prices ruling upon date of delivery.

The buyers replied on 27 May 1969, giving an order in these words: "Please supply on terms and conditions as below and overleaf."

Below there was a list of the goods ordered, but there were differences from the quotation of the sellers in these respects:

(1) there was an additional item for the cost of installation, £3 100; and

(2) there was a different delivery date (instead of ten months, it was 10-11 months).

Overleaf there were different terms as to the cost of carriage: in that it was to be paid to the delivery address of the buyers: whereas the sellers' terms were ex warehouse. There were different terms as to the right to cancel for late delivery. The buyers in their conditions reserved the right to cancel if delivery was not made by the agreed date: whereas the sellers in their conditions said that cancellation of order due to late delivery would not be accepted.

On the foot of the buyers' order there was a tear-off slip headed: "Acknowledgment: Please sign and return to Ex-Cell-O. We accept your order on the terms and conditions stated thereon – and undertake to deliver by – Date – signed." In that slip the delivery date and signature were left blank ready to be filled in by the sellers.

On 5 June 1969, the sellers wrote this letter to the buyers:

> We have pleasure in acknowledging receipt of your official order dated 27 May covering the supply of one Butler Double Column Plane-Miller. This being delivered in accordance with our revised quotation of 23 May for delivery in 10/11 months, that is, March/April 1970. We return herewith duly completed your acknowledgment of order form.

They enclosed the acknowledgment form duly filled in with the delivery date March/April 1970 and signed by the Butler Machine Tool Co.

No doubt a contract was then concluded. But on what terms? The sellers rely on their general conditions and on their last letter which said: [404] "in accordance with our revised quotation of 23 May" (which had on the back the price variation clause). The buyers rely on the acknowledgment signed by the sellers which accepted the buyer's order "on the terms and conditions stated thereon" (which did not include a price variation clause).

If those documents are analysed in our traditional method, the result would seem to me to be this: the quotation of 23 May, 1969, was an offer by the sellers to the buyers containing the terms and conditions on the back. The order of 27 May, 1969, purported to be an acceptance of that offer in that it was for the same machine at the same price, but it contained such additions as to cost of installation, date of delivery and so forth that it was in law a rejection of the offer and constituted a counter-offer. That is clear from Hyde v Wrench (1840) 3 Beav 334; 49 ER 132. As Megaw J said in Trollope & Colls Ltd v Atomic Power Constructions Ltd [1963] 1 WLR 333 at 337: "the counter-offer kills the original offer." The letter of the sellers of 5 June, 1969, was an acceptance of that counter-offer, as is shown by the acknowledgment which the sellers signed and returned to the buyers. The reference to the quotation of 23 May referred only to the price and identity of the machine.

To go on with the facts of the case. The important thing is that the sellers did not keep the contractual date of delivery which was March/April 1970. The machine was ready about September 1970 but by that time the buyers' production schedule had to be rearranged as they could not accept delivery until November 1970. Meanwhile the sellers had invoked the price increase clause. They sought to charge the buyers an increase due to the rise in costs between 27 May 1969 (when the order was given), and 1 April 1970 (when the machine ought to have been delivered). It came to £2 892. The buyers rejected the claim. The judge held that the sellers were entitled to the sum of £2 892 under the price variation clause. He did not apply the traditional method of analysis by way of offer and counter-offer. He said that in the quotation of 23 May 1969: "one finds the price variation clause appearing under a most emphatic heading stating that it is a term or condition that is to prevail." So he held that it did prevail.

I have much sympathy with the judge's approach to this case. In many of these cases our traditional analysis of offer, counter-offer, rejection, acceptance and so forth is out of date. This was observed by Lord Wilberforce in New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v AM Satterthwaite & Co Ltd [1975] AC 154 at 167. The better way is to look at all the documents passing between the parties – and glean from them, or from the conduct of the parties, whether they have reached agreement on all material points – even though there may be differences between the forms and conditions printed on the back of them. As Lord Cairns said in Brogden v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 666 at 672: "there may be a consensus between the parties far short of a complete mode of expressing it, and that consensus may be discovered from letters or from other documents of an imperfect and incomplete description."

Applying this guide, it will be found that in most cases when there is a "battle of forms", there is a contract as soon as the last of the forms is sent and received without objection being taken to it. That is well observed in Benjamin's Sale of Goods (9th ed, 1974), p 84. The difficulty is to decide which form, or which part of which form, is a term or condition of the contract. In some cases the battle is won by the man who fires the last shot. [405] He is the man who puts forward the latest terms and conditions: and, if they are not objected to by the other party, he may be taken to have agreed to them. Such was British Road Services Ltd v Arthur V Crutchley & Co Ltd [1968] 1 Lloyd's Rep 271 at 281-2 per Lord Pearson; and the illustration given by Prof Guest in Anson's Law of Contract (24th ed), pp 37, 38 when he says: "the terms of the contract consist of the terms of the offer subject to the modifications contained in the acceptance." In some cases the battle is won by the man who gets the blow in first. If he offers to sell at a named price on the terms and conditions stated on the back: and the buyer orders the goods purporting to accept the offer – on an order form with his own different terms and conditions on the back – then if the difference is so material that it would affect the price, the buyer ought not to be allowed to take advantage of the difference unless he draws it specifically to the attention of the seller. There are yet other cases where the battle depends on the shots fired on both sides. There is a concluded contract but the forms vary. The terms and conditions of both parties are to be construed together. If they can be reconciled so as to give a harmonious result, all well and good. If differences are irreconcilable – so that they are mutually contradictory – then the conflicting terms may have to be scrapped and replaced by a reasonable implication.

In the present case the judge thought that the sellers in their original quotation got their blow in first: especially by the provision that: "these terms and conditions shall prevail over any terms and conditions in the buyer's order."

It was so emphatic that the price variation clause continued through all the subsequent dealings and that the buyers must be taken to have agreed to it. I can understand that point of view. But I think that the documents have to be considered as a whole. And, as a matter of construction, I think the acknowledgment of 5 June, 1969, is the decisive document. It makes it clear that the contract was on the buyers' terms and not on the sellers' terms: and the buyers' terms did not include a price variation clause.

I would therefore allow the appeal and enter judgment for the defendants.

[3.250] LAWTON LJ: The modern commercial practice of making quotations and placing orders with conditions attached, usually in small print, is indeed likely, as in this case to produce a battle of forms. The problem is how should that battle be conducted? The view taken by Thesiger J was that the battle should extend over a wide area and the court should do its best to look into the minds of the parties and make certain assumptions. In my judgment, the battle has to be conducted in accordance with set rules. It is a battle more on classical 18th century lines when convention decided who had the right to open fire first rather than in accordance with the modern concept of attrition.

The rules relating to a battle of this kind have been known for the past 130 odd years. They were set out by Lord Langdale MR in Hyde v Wrench to which Lord Denning MR has already referred; and, if anyone should have thought they were obsolescent, Megaw J in Trollope & Colls Ltd v Atomic Power Constructions Ltd called attention to the fact that those rules are still in force.

When those rules are applied to this case, in my judgment, the answer [406] is obvious. The sellers started by making an offer. That was in their quotation. The small print was headed by the following words: "General. All orders are accepted only upon and subject to the terms set out in our quotation and the following conditions. These terms and conditions shall prevail over any terms and conditions in the buyer's order."

That offer was not accepted. The buyers were only prepared to have one of these very expensive machines on their own terms. Their terms had very material differences in them from the terms put forward by the sellers. They could not be reconciled in any way. In the language of Art 7 of the Uniform Law on the Formation of Contracts for the International Sale of Goods (see Uniform Laws on International Sales 1967, Sched 2) they did "materially alter the terms" set out in the offer made by the plaintiffs.

As I understand Hyde v Wrench, and the cases which have followed, the consequence of placing the order in that way, if I may adopt Megaw J's words [1963] 1 WLR 333 at 337, was "to kill the original offer". It follows that the court has to look at what happened after the buyers made their counter-offer. By letter dated 4 June, 1969, the plaintiffs acknowledged receipt of the counter-offer, and they went on in this way: "Details of this order have been passed to our Halifax works for attention and a formal acknowledgment of order will follow in due course."

That is clearly a reference to the printed tear-off slip which was at the bottom of the buyers' counter-offer. By letter dated 5 June 1969, the sales office manager at the plaintiffs' Halifax factory completed that tear-off slip and sent it back to the buyers.

It is true, as Mr Scott has reminded us, that the return of that printed slip was accompanied by a letter which had this sentence in it: "This is being entered in accordance with our revised quotation of 23 May for delivery in 10/11 months."

I agree with Lord Denning MR that, in business sense, that refers to the quotation as to the price and the identity of the machine, and it does not bring into the contract the small print conditions on the back of the quotation. Those small print conditions had disappeared from the story. That was when the contract was made. At that date it was a fixed price contract without a price escalation clause.

As I pointed out in the course of argument to Mr Scott, if the letter of 5 June which accompanied the form acknowledging the terms which the buyers had specified had amounted to a counter-offer, then in my judgment the parties never were ad idem. It cannot be said that the buyers accepted the counter-offer by reason of the fact that ultimately they took physical delivery of the machine. By the time they took physical delivery of the machine, they had made it clear by correspondence that they were not accepting that there was any price escalation clause in any contract which they had made with the plaintiffs.

I agree with Lord Denning MR that this appeal should be allowed.

[In a separate judgment, BRIDGE LJ said that the case was plainly governed by the classical doctrine that a counter-offer amounts to a rejection of an offer and puts an end to the effect of the offer. He agreed that the appeal be allowed.]

Appeal allowed.

[4.05] The second element necessary for contract formation is consideration. A promise will be enforceable at common law only if it is supported by consideration or made under seal (ie, in the form of a deed). A promise that is not supported by consideration may be enforceable in equity on the basis of equitable estoppel if it has been relied upon to the detriment of the promisee (see Chapter 9).

History of the Doctrine of Consideration

[4.10] E Jenks, The History of the Doctrine of Consideration in English Law (Cambridge University Press, London, 1892).

[81] Every true contract contains a promise. A consideration is a detriment or liability voluntarily incurred by the promisee … or a benefit conferred on the promisor at the instance of the promisee … in exchange for the promise. Such consideration may be either the performance, or the promise, of an act or forebearance. If it be the performance, the consideration is said to be executed, if the promise, to be executory …. In accordance with the general rule of law, the onus of proving the existence of a consideration usually rests upon the party setting up the contract, whether the consideration appears in writing or not …. In ordinary cases it is immaterial whether or [not] the consideration be economically adequate to the promise, but gross inadequacy of consideration, though in [82] itself no objection to the validity of a contract, either at law or in equity, may be evidence of fraud. On the other hand, the consideration must be genuine, and, if executed, it must not consist of an illegal or immoral act, nor, if executory, must it contemplate an illegal or immoral object; and the existence of an illegal or immoral consideration may be proved by external evidence, though the contract be embodied in writing, or even in a deed. Finally, in the case of executory considerations which fail or become impossible, the promisor will be wholly or partially released from his obligation, and may even recover back money paid under the contract.

[4.15] Notes

Jenks describes consideration in terms of benefit and detriment given "in exchange for the promise". Consideration has also been defined as "the price for which the promise of the other is bought": Pollock on Contracts (8th ed, 1911), p 175. Both definitions connote an element of bargain, which lies at the heart of the modern doctrine of consideration.

THE ESSENTIAL ELEMENTS

Australian Woollen Mills v Commonwealth

[4.20] Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424 (Privy Council); (1955) 93 CLR 546 (High Court of Australia) – Action.

[FACTS: The plaintiff (Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd) claimed that a unilateral contract had arisen out of the Commonwealth government's wool subsidy scheme. The scheme was introduced after World War II, at a time when wool was scarce. The Commonwealth subsidised purchases of wool by manufacturers of woollen products to enable those manufacturers to supply the products at low prices. In 1946, the Commonwealth announced in a series of letters to manufacturers, including the plaintiff, that it would pay a subsidy on all wool purchased for domestic use by Australian manufacturers. AWM purchased large quantities of wool over the next two years, including purchases in April, May and June 1948 in respect of which the subsidy had not been paid. In June 1948, the Commonwealth announced that it was discontinuing the scheme but would ensure that each manufacturer would have a certain amount of subsidised wool in stock on 30 June 1948. The stockpile of wool held by AWM exceeded this amount, and so the Commonwealth required AWM to repay the subsidy paid on that excess. AWM repaid that amount but later sued to recover it, along with the unpaid subsidy on the April, May and June purchases.]

THE COURT (DIXON CJ, WILLIAMS, WEBB, FULLAGAR and KITTO JJ): [456] The contracts alleged by the plaintiff are pleaded in paras 3 and 4a of the statement of claim.

Paragraph 3 alleges:

> At or prior to the commencement of the wool season 1946–1947 the defendant promised the plaintiff that in consideration that the plaintiff would during that season purchase wool at auction and otherwise than at auction for domestic consumption in Australia the defendant would pay to the plaintiff a subsidy.

The alleged mode of determining the amount of the subsidy is then set out, but this may be put on one side for the moment. Paragraph 4a contains an identical allegation in respect of the wool season 1947–1948. In each case there follows an allegation that the plaintiff made purchases of wool from time to time "in pursuance of the said agreement". The contract put forward by the plaintiff is thus seen to be of that type which is commonly said to be constituted by an offer of a promise for an act, the offer being accepted by the doing of the act. Such contracts are sometimes described as "unilateral" contracts, but the term is open to criticism on the ground that it is unscientific and misleading. There must of necessity be two parties to a contractual obligation. The position in such cases is simply that the consideration on the part of the offeree is completely executed by the doing of the very thing which constitutes acceptance of the offer. A well-known example in which a contract was held to have been made is to be found in Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Co [1893] 1 QB 256 … Other well-known examples are the cases in which a reward is offered for the giving of information or for the finding and return of lost property and the cases in which there is forbearance by a creditor in return for the debtor's promise to give security.

In cases of this class it is necessary, in order that a contract may be established, that it should be made to appear that the statement or announcement which is relied on as a promise was really offered as consideration for the doing of the act, and that the act was really done in consideration of a potential promise inherent in the statement or announcement. Between the statement or announcement, which is put forward as an offer capable of acceptance by the doing of an act, and the act which is put forward as the executed consideration for the alleged promise, there must subsist, so to speak, [457] the relation of a quid pro quo. One simple example will suffice to illustrate this. A, in Sydney, says to B in Melbourne: "I will pay you £1 000 on your arrival in Sydney." The next day B goes to Sydney. If these facts alone are proved, it is perfectly clear that no contract binding A to pay £1 000 to B is established. For all that appears there may be no relation whatever between A's statements and B's act. It is quite consistent with the facts proved that B intended to go to Sydney anyhow, and that A is merely announcing that, if and when B arrives in Sydney, he will make a gift to him. The necessary relation is not shown to exist between the announcement and the act. Proof of further facts, however, might suffice to establish a contract. For example, it might be proved that A, on the day before the £1 000 was mentioned, had told B that it was a matter of vital importance to him (A) that B should come to Sydney forthwith, and that B objected that to go to Sydney at the moment might involve him in financial loss. These further facts throw a different light on the statement on which B relies as an offer accepted by his going to Sydney. They are not necessarily conclusive but it is now possible to infer:

(1) that the statement that £1 000 would be paid to B on arrival in Sydney was intended as an offer of a promise;

(2) that the promise was offered as the consideration for the doing of an act by B; and

(3) that the doing of the act was at once the acceptance of an offer and the providing of an executed consideration for a promise.

The necessary connection or relation between the announcement and the act is provided if the inference is drawn that A has requested B to go to Sydney.

The position has been stated above in terms of the technical doctrine of consideration, and this is, in our opinion, the correct way of stating it. But it may be referred to a principle which is fundamental to any conception of contract. It is of the essence of contract, regarded as a class of obligation, that there is a voluntary assumption of a legally enforceable duty. In such cases as the present, therefore, in order that a contract may be created by offer and acceptance, it is necessary that what is alleged to be an offer should have been intended to give rise, on the doing of the act, to an obligation. The intention must, of course, be judged in the light of the principle laid down in Freeman v Cooke (1848) 2 Ex 654; 154 ER 652 at 656, but, in the absence of such an intention, actual or imputed, the alleged "offer" cannot lead to a contract; there is, indeed, in such a case no true "offer".

[458] A test which has not seldom been applied in such cases in order to determine whether a contract has been made or not is to ask whether there has been a request by the alleged promisor that the promisee shall do the act on which the latter relies. Such a request may, of course, be expressed or implied. In an interesting article in the Law Quarterly Review (1953) 69 LQR 99, to which Mr Windeyer referred us and which has already been incidentally mentioned, Mr JC Smith maintains that the presence of a request, express or implied, is an essential element in every true offer. Sir A Goodhart ((1951) 67 LQR 456 and (1953) 69 LQR 106), contests this general proposition, maintaining in effect that the essential thing, in a case such as the present, is that the "offeror" should state a price which the "offeree" must pay if he wishes to purchase a promise. This way of putting the position does not seem to differ materially from the way in which we have put it above. At the same time, it can hardly be denied that the presence or absence of an implied request to do the act may often provide a useful test for determining whether there has been a true offer and a true acceptance such as to bring a contract into existence. We are really applying the same test if we ask whether the "offer" was made in order to induce the doing of the act …

The presence or absence of an implied request that the act be done has been regarded as material in a number of cases. In Carlill's case itself it is regarded as material by both Bowen LJ and AL Smith LJ. Bowen LJ says: "A further argument for [459] the defendants was that this was a nudum pactum …

that there was no consideration at all; in fact, that there was no request, express or implied, to use the smoke ball": [1893] 1 QB 256 at 270, 271. His Lordship then refers to [two cases] and proceeds: "The short answer, to abstain from academical discussion is, it seems to me, that there is here a request to use involved in the offer": at 271 …

Several other illustrative cases are cited in Mr Smith's article. It will suffice here to mention two cases, the one nearly a hundred years old and the other very recent. The correctness of the actual decision in Shadwell v Shadwell (1860) 9 CB (NS) 159; 142 ER 62, is likely to be forever debated. Erle CJ and Keating J took, in the light of all the circumstances, one view of the letter on which the plaintiff relied: Byles J took another view. But the approach of all the learned judges to the problem of fact was exactly the same. Erle CJ and Keating J said:

> First, do these facts shew a loss sustained by the plaintiff at his uncle's request? … If the promise was made in order to induce the parties to marry, the promise so made would be in legal effect a request to marry. Secondly, do these facts shew a benefit derived from the plaintiff to the uncle, at his request? … If the promise of the annuity was intended as an inducement to the marriage … this is the consideration averred in the declaration: (1860) 142 ER 62 at 68.

Bales J said: "The inquiry therefore narrows itself to this question — Does the letter itself disclose any consideration for the promise? The consideration relied on by the plaintiff's counsel being the subsequent marriage of the plaintiff": (1860) 142 ER 62 at 69. Then after discussing the contents of the letter he says: "The question, therefore, is still further narrowed to this point — Was the marriage at the testator's request? Express request there was none. Can any request be implied?" (1860) 142 ER 62 at 69.

His Lordship concludes that no such request can be implied, and that the marriage could not be said: "to have taken place at the testator's request or, in other words, in consequence of that request": (1860) 142 ER 62 at 69. The very recent case is Combe v Combe [1951] 2 KB 215. [460] This is one of the "forbearance" cases. Denning LJ said:

> Unilateral promises of this kind have long been enforced, so long as the act or forbearance is done on the faith of the promise and at the request of the promisor, express or implied. The act done is then in itself sufficient consideration for the promise, even though it arises ex post facto: at 221.

And Asquith LJ (as he then was) said: "I do not think an actual forbearance, as opposed to an agreement to forbear to approach the court, is a good consideration unless it proceeds from a request, express or implied, on the part of the promisor. If not moved by such a request, the forbearance is not in respect of the promise": at 226, 227.

Coming to the present case, it is impossible, in our opinion, to hold that any contract was constituted at any stage binding the Commonwealth to pay a subsidy to the plaintiff, or to any manufacturer, in consideration of a purchase of wool for local manufacture …

Judgment for defendant.

[Australian Woollen Mills Ltd appealed to the Privy Council. In the course of their judgment dismissing the appeal (1955) 93 CLR 546, their Lordships said:]

[4.25] [548] The first answer of the respondent to this claim is that there were no contracts; that the basis of the scheme was not contractual but administrative, and that the letters contained statements of policy and not contractual offers …

[554] Their Lordships are of the opinion that these letters cannot be read as an offer or offers to contract. They contain a statement of [555] policy. The "scheme" is to be administered by the Commission which is itself to determine the amount of the subsidy. No single phrase or provision may be decisive. The letters must be read as a whole. If the intention had been to provide for a series of contracts one would as between these parties have expected a form containing the provisions which, if disputes arose, would be construed and applied by the courts. The number of uncertain factors make it natural that the basis should be administrative. Nor is there anything remarkable in the fact that the manufacturers should be content to act on the respondent's statement of policy. A further letter of 20 August elaborating the procedure emphasises the control which the respondent thought the Commission was keeping on the scheme …

[550] The appellant further submitted that the respondent wanted the manufacturers to purchase so that there could be woollen goods on the home market. There was therefore an implied request to do so. Let this be admitted. It does not appear to their Lordships to advance the argument. There may be cases where the absence of a request negatives the existence of a contract. The presence of a request does not, however, in itself establish a contract. Manufacturers may be requested to come into and work a non-contractual scheme. On this aspect of the argument their Lordships think, with all respect, there was force in the criticism of that passage in the judgment of the High Court in which it is said that there was nothing in the nature of a request or invitation …

Appeal dismissed.

Beaton v McDivitt

[4.30] Beaton v McDivitt (1987) 13 NSWLR 162 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Appeal from Young J.

[FACTS: The McDivitts (the respondents) owned 25 acres of land but farmed only a portion of it. Mr McDivitt believed that the local council was likely to rezone the land within two years and that the council rates would then be increased substantially. McDivitt feared that he would be unable to pay the new rates and he decided to divide the land into four blocks, three to be retained by himself and his family, the fourth to be made available to "someone interested in the form of cultivation known as permaculture to work the block". He said that he would transfer the title to the block to the person selected when the rezoning took place.

Mr Beaton (the appellant) was told of this plan by a mutual friend, and the Beatons then had discussions with the McDivitts. As a result of those discussions, the Beatons moved on to the fourth block, farmed the land using permaculture methods and, in accordance with oral undertakings given to McDivitt, assisted in the creation and maintenance of a road which gave access to the block. After seven years, a dispute arose and McDivitt ordered the Beatons off the land. Young J said:

> Doing the best I can, in my view what happened was this, Mr McDivitt feared that the zoning would be changed which would affect his rates, knew that he was not using the whole of his 25 acres, thought it would be nice to have someone who was interested in permaculture work on part of the land, and was quite willing to give part of the land to that person if and when the land was rezoned …
> Accordingly, the essential facts as I have found them, are that the defendants made a proposal to Mr Beaton that he would come on to lot B and work it rent free, and that when subdivision took place, which was thought to be only a short time, that is, a matter of two to three years away from being a legal possibility, the Beatons, or at least Mr Beaton, would be given the title to lot B in fee simple. Mr Beaton accepted this proposal and he suffered some detriment in acting upon it in that he spent approximately $1,000 on planting trees and shrubs on the land. He has, of course, also spent seven years living on the land and working on it, though there must also be taken into account the fact that he has occupied that land without payment.

Young J held that the Beatons had not given consideration sufficient to satisfy the bargain requirement of something given in exchange for the promise. He found, however, that there was a line of cases starting with Dillwyn v Llewelyn which represented "an exception to the modern requirement that a contract should be a bargain supported by consideration in the nature of a quid pro quo". The Beatons' acts of reliance were sufficient to give rise to a "Dillwyn v Llewelyn type contract". Young J held, however, that this contract had been frustrated. Accordingly, the Beatons were not entitled to remain on the land. Mr Beaton appealed.]

KIRBY P: [168] By our law, consideration is an essential requirement for an enforceable contract. Without consideration, a promise is unenforceable at law. The modern theory of consideration has arisen from the notion that a contract is a bargain struck between the parties by an exchange. By that modern theory, consideration must be satisfied in the form of a price in return for the promisor's promise or a quid pro quo. The price can be in the form of an act, forbearance or promise. In Pollock on Contracts, 13th ed (1950) at 133 Sir Frederick Pollock, in words adopted by Lord Dunedin in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge and Co Ltd [1915] AC 847 at 855, expressed the idea of consideration as the "price in return" in the following way: "An act or forbearance of one party, or the promise thereof, is the price for which the promise of the other is bought, and the promise thus given for value is enforceable."

The triumph of the bargain theory of consideration necessary for a contract amounts to a rejection of the theory of contractual obligation based upon reliance. This shift may have come about as a result of the mercantile attitudes and the requirements of England in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. It may reflect the consequent final subordination of Roman Law doctrines, founded ultimately in notions of relationships and morality: see P S Atiyah, The Rise and Fall of Freedom of Contract (1979) at 499 f but cf J H Baker (1980) 43 Mod L Rev 467 f and sources there cited. Whatever the origins and explanations for this shift (to the extent that they can now be known given that such disputes were typically resolved by jury verdicts) it was necessary, thereafter, to have resort to courts of equity for the enforcement of claims based on relationships. For in the courts of law, duties arising from bargains entered between free parties were to be enforced, not duties deriving from suggested moral obligations such as those deriving from relationships.

The High Court of Australia has accepted this "modern" or bargain doctrine of consideration.

In Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v The Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424 at 456–7, the Court (Dixon CJ, Williams, Webb, Fullagar and Kitto JJ) said, relevant to the present arrangement:

> In cases of this class it is necessary, in order that a contract may be established, that it should be made to appear that the statement or announcement which is relied on as a promise was really offered as consideration for the doing of the act, and that the act was really done in [169] consideration of a potential promise inherent in the statement or announcement. Between the statement or announcement, which is put forward as an offer capable of acceptance by the doing of an act, and the act which is put forward as the executed consideration for the alleged promise, there must subsist, so to speak, the relation of a quid pro quo.

Young J (rightly in my opinion) was unable to find consideration in this sense in the facts of the present case. It is just not possible, however indulgently one approaches those facts with sympathy to the appellant, to classify the promises he made as a quid pro quo for the suggested promise of the respondent, in certain circumstances, to transfer title in the land to him. At the time, the appellant was having difficulties with his landlord. Therefore, a right to occupy and use the respondents' land rent free was of considerable benefit to him. What other possible benefit did the respondents derive of the kind which the High Court said in the Australian Woollen Mills case was necessary for an enforceable contract? True it is they would have somebody living on the land. True also they might hope that such person would be a congenial neighbour, sharing with them their peculiar ideas about horticulture. But these scarcely amount to a quid pro quo for such a substantial promise as the passing of title and the taking of steps to that end. I do not in this conclusion overlook the fact that the law is not concerned with the sufficiency of the suggested consideration. I examine the facts simply to see whether those suggested benefits which passed to the respondent can properly be classified as consideration. In my opinion the expenditures and actions of the appellant are more properly to be categorised as entirely for his own benefit and that of his family. The element of congeniality and of having on the land a neighbour of like horticultural practices is not valuable consideration. It is more akin to domestic and social arrangements and the natural love and affection which have long been held not to amount to consideration sufficient to establish a binding contract …

There is a policy behind the law's insistence upon consideration of the kind explained. People make foolish and ill considered promises to confer gifts and other benefits on others. Especially do they do so, one might say, in the festive atmosphere of the Christmas and New Year season. In the cold light of the dawns that follow, disputes require courts to decide whether these promises will be enforced. Leaving aside equitable relief occasioned by the dealings between the parties, why should the law hold a party to such a promise of a gift unless it can be demonstrated that, in return for such a promise, the promisor received some bargain from the promisee by way of quid pro quo? In a sense, this shows our law (which has generally declined to adopt the formalism of the civil law approach to contract) insisting upon a bargain before it will attach legal consequences to the unformalised dealings of the parties. The law is not concerned (in this respect) with the equality of [170] the bargain. But in some cases the "bargain" will be so illusory or one-sided that a quid pro quo will not be found. Formality apart, the suggested "contract" will then not be enforced at law.

But was the promise made on New Year's Eve 1977, that the appellant would maintain the private road to the property, a sufficient quid pro quo to amount to consideration to sustain an enforceable contract? In my view it was not. Any "agreement" between the parties was made on 26 December 1977. Talk about the road did not arise until nearly a week later. Even then it arose only in response to the appellant's offer to pay the rates. That very offer indicates the appellant's acknowledgment of the great benefit which he was receiving. Any promise made to maintain the road (which after all was necessary to secure access to the appellant's home) cannot be classified as one demanded or offered in exchange for the alleged promise of the respondents to transfer title. In the manner in which the additional term as to the road arose, it was not contemplated by the respondents' promise, earlier accepted by the appellant. Accordingly it cannot represent consideration. I therefore agree with Young J's conclusion that no contract was made between the parties which would be enforced according to the conventional or "modern" view about the requirement of valuable consideration for a contract enforceable at law.

Gift and ex post facto consideration

[4.35] But was Young J right in holding that a contract of the kind found in Dillwyn v Llewelyn existed here and would be enforced by the law of contract? His Honour analysed the line of cases which have followed Dillwyn v Llewelyn. He concluded that its conceptual classification was not estoppel but the survival of an old contract principle of detriment, as an exception to the modern requirement that a contract should be a bargain supported by consideration in the nature of a quid pro quo.

Whatever may be the position elsewhere, I consider that to hold as Young J did would be to subvert the principle accepted unanimously by the High Court of Australia in Australian Woollen Mills. Moreover, it would be to undermine the simplicity of the requirements of contract law and the uniform approach to the definition therein of the requirements of consideration. Given the clear way in which contract law has moved from a "detriment" to a "bargain" theory, I regard the belated attempt to suggest an exception founded on Dillwyn v Llewelyn as unconceptual and unhistorical. However that may be, it is impermissible to the courts in Australia until the High Court of Australia reviews and modifies its decision in the Australian Woollen Mills case.

In any case, close analysis of the judgment of Lord Westbury LC in Dillwyn v Llewelyn suggests that the basis for equitable intervention in that case was proprietary estoppel. The inter-relationship of common law and equity is notoriously troublesome. But it is both obligatory and desirable in this Court to preserve the unity of contract law by avoiding suggested exceptions to the rule that consideration for an alleged promise must involve "the relation of a quid pro quo". The "exception" to the general rule thought by Young J to be necessary is better classified not as an exception to the requirement of a quid pro quo for consideration but as an illustration of the [171] relief which equity will sometimes give, based upon estoppel, whatever may be the rights of the parties in law.

It is suggested that the quid pro quo for the transfer of the block of land assigned to the appellant was his act in coming upon and working the block by means of the particular form of horticulture specified by the respondents. Once he did so, it is argued that it was not open to the respondents to withdraw their offer. I do not consider that this is the correct analysis of the arrangement between them. I have mentioned the difficulties which the appellant was having with his landlord because of which the offer of rent-free accommodation must have seemed remarkably well timed. The lack of specificity as to the work and expenditure to be carried out by the appellant on the land (reinforced by the evidence of the lack of substantial work in actuality) combined with the fact that the appellant contemplated and performed some work as part of his own business to his own advantage suggests (as do numerous other indications) that, both before and after the Yuletide conversations in 1977, the true classification of the appellant's occupation of the land was that of a bare licensee.

If it be relevant to look to whether the appellant acted to his detriment, I do not believe that he did. On the contrary, the arrangement made was entirely to his advantage. If, as I have held, it is necessary to decide whether the appellant gave a quid pro quo for the suggested promise to transfer the land, I do not believe he did. Properly considered, the true interpretation of events appears to be that the respondent for reasons of congeniality and commitment to a shared idea of horticulture invited the appellant onto part of his land. No rent or other relevant consideration passed from the appellant to the respondents for this permission. No relevant detriment was suffered by the appellant. He received rent-free accommodation for seven years. To enforce the Boxing Day promise (apart from the many other difficulties it faced) would in my view amount to the enforcement of a contract made without consideration. This conclusion relieves me of the obligation to consider whether any such contract, if made, would have been frustrated by the events which later occurred ….

Relief in equity

[4.40] This conclusion brings me to the alternative way in which the appellant sought relief, so far as still pressed in this Court. This was that, whatever the position in law, it would be unconscionable for the legal owners of the land (the respondents) to insist upon their legal rights and that equity would provide relief to the appellant. One such circumstance where relief will be provided is where there is unconscionable behaviour on the part of the legal owner in circumstances in which another party is incurring expenditure, to the knowledge of the owner. Even where the owner may not request or excite that behaviour, where the expenditure is induced by an expectation of obtaining protection, equity will intervene to ensure that an injustice may not be perpetrated …

[172] [S]o far as any expenditure which the appellant made on that part of the respondents' property which he occupied, this is entirely explained by the appellant's own domestic and business needs and interests. The appellant and his family enjoyed the property, rent free, for seven years before the judgment of Young J. Despite all that has occurred and not occurred, including the absence of rezoning, the absence of consent by the council, the absence of the Minister's consent and the delay of years far beyond that originally contemplated, to now suggest that equity can only be satisfied by the transfer of an interest in the land to the appellant is so disproportionate to the identified detriments to which the appellant can point, that I cannot accept that equity would in the circumstances lend its aid.

[173] There being no enforceable contract between the parties and no equity which the courts would enforce in favour of the appellant, I have concluded that the orders of Young J should be sustained ….

[4.45] McHUGH JA: [180] The learned judge found that the plaintiff gave no consideration in the conventional sense for the defendant's promise to make the land over to him. However, his Honour said that, where a person has made a promise of a conditional gift and the promisee has relied on that promise to his detriment, the promisee gives ex post facto consideration for the promise and that makes it contractually enforceable. Young J referred to many cases where promises to make a gift of land have been enforced against the promisor when the promisee had acted to his detriment in reliance on the promise: see for example, Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De G F & J 517; 45 ER 1285; Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129. Professor Atiyah regards this line of decisions as based on the law of contract and as an exception to the bargain theory of contract: see Consideration in Contracts: A Fundamental Restatement (1971), pp 30–3. Young J accepted this analysis. The principle upon which his Honour relied is succinctly stated by Jordan CJ in New South Wales Trotting Club Ltd v Glebe Municipal Council (1937) 37 SR (NSW) 288 where his Honour said:

> if a person lays out money in improving land which he knows to belong to another, and does so, to the knowledge of the other, on the faith of an express or implied promise from that other that he is to have some interest in the land, a court of equity, so far as it can, will compel the other to give effect to the promise. It is pointed out in Canadian Pacific Railway Co v The King [1931] AC 414 at 428 that this type of case depends on contract express or implied.

However, in my opinion it is not open to this court to regard this line of cases of which Dillwyn v Llewelyn and Ramsden v Dyson are well known examples as contract based. It is true that statements can be found in many of them which suggest that the promise is enforceable because the parties have made a contract. As late as 1961 Nagle J, sitting in the Full Court in Commonwealth v A E Goodwin Ltd [1962] SR (NSW) 315, 325; [1961] NSWR 1080, 1090, declared that contract was the basis of these decisions. But this is not the explanation which more recent authorities have placed on them. Nor in the light of the decision of the High Court in Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424 is it possible for this court to hold that the Dillwyn v Llewelyn line of cases is contract based. The statement by Jordan CJ to which I have referred and which Young J quoted in his judgment cannot now be considered an accurate statement of the law.

The jurisprudential basis of the plaintiff's claim

[4.50] [181] Historically, the doctrine of consideration was nearly identical with the motive for making a promise. Before it could be decided whether the promise was binding, a court had to know why the promise was made: Simpson, A History of the Common Law of Contract (1975), p 321. Historically, there was little difference between the common law conception of consideration and the Roman idea of "causa". But in the 19th century, the basis of consideration moved from motive and reliance to bargain. By 1842 Patteson J could say in Thomas v Thomas (1842) 2 QB 851, 859; 114 ER 330, 333–4:

> It would be giving to causa too large a construction if we were to adopt the view urged by the defendant: it would be confounding consideration with motive … Motive is not the same thing with consideration. Consideration means something which is of some value in the eye of the law, moving from the plaintiff: it may be of some benefit to the plaintiff or some detriment to the defendant; but at all events it must be moving from the plaintiff.

In Currie v Misa (1875) LR 10 Exch 153 at 162, Lush J, in the course of giving the judgment of Keating, Quain and Archibald JJ and himself, gave the now classic definition: "A valuable consideration, in the sense of the law, may consist either in some right, interest, profit, or benefit accruing to one party, or some forbearance, detriment, loss, or responsibility, given, suffered, or undertaken by the other."

The element of bargain is inherent in this definition.

In the United States, O W Holmes Jnr was a strong proponent of the bargain theory. In The Common Law (De Wolfe Howe ed), he said (at 230): "The root of the whole matter is the relation of reciprocal conventional inducement, each for the other, between consideration and promise."

This sentence was quoted with evident approval by Isaacs ACJ in The Crown v Clarke (1927) 40 CLR 227 at 236.

By the beginning of the 20th century, Pollock was able to say that an "act or forbearance of one party, or the promise thereof, is the price for which the promise of the other is bought, and the promise thus given for value is enforceable": Pollock on Contracts (8th ed, 1911), p 175. Pollock's definition was adopted by Lord Dunedin in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] AC 847 at 855.

In the United States the bargain theory has been extended to the point where nothing is regarded as consideration "which is not regarded as such by both parties": Restatement, Contracts, 2d, s 75(1). English law has not gone so far: see Treitel, "Consideration: A Critical Analysis of Professor Atiyah's Fundamental Restatement" (1976) 50 ALJ 439 at 440. However, the essential elements of the bargain theory were adopted in The Crown v Clarke and in Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth.

The ratio decidendi of Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth is that the expenditure of money in reliance on an announcement by the government that it would pay a subsidy to a manufacturer on wool purchased and used for local manufacture is not itself sufficient to create a contract to pay the subsidy …

The reasoning of the High Court … accepts the basic element of the bargain theory of consideration and amounts to a rejection of a reliance based theory of consideration.

Modern writers on contract law have criticised the use of the bargain theory as the exclusive test of consideration: see Atiyah at 27–8; Gilmore, The Death of Contract (1974), pp 19–21, 60–5; Sutton, Consideration Reconsidered (1974), p 33; Greig and Davis, The Law of Contract (1987), pp 75–8. The criticisms of these writers would extend to the theory of consideration applied in Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth. However, the current theory of consideration has its modern supporters (see Treitel, Law of Contract (6th ed, 1983), pp 51–4) and the paper given by Sir Anthony Mason and Gageler at the Australian National University, "The Contract". However, so far as this court is concerned, the discussion is academic. In the case of a unilateral contract such as the present, the law relating to consideration is laid down in Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth. None of the cases to which Young J referred, therefore, can be treated as contract based unless there was a quid pro quo for the defendant's promise.

The jurisprudential basis of cases such as Dillwyn v Llewelyn, in my opinion, is that equity will not allow a person to insist upon his strict rights when it is unconscionable to do so …

Although I disagree with the jurisprudential basis on which Young J found a contract in this case, I am of the opinion that his Honour was correct in finding a contract. However, as will be seen, I do not fully agree with all that his Honour said as to the terms of that contract.

The contract

[4.55] When a person promises or offers to transfer property to another person, care must be taken to distinguish between three situations. The first concerns a promise to transfer property subject to the occurrence of an event or condition. The promise will not be enforceable even if the event or condition [183] occurs. An example is a bare promise to pay X $100 if a certain team wins a football match. The second situation concerns a promise to transfer property after which the promisor allows the promisee to act to his detriment in reliance on the promise. In this situation, depending on the circumstances, equity may prevent the promisor insisting on his strict rights and may enforce the promise. The third situation is where the promise contains an express or implied request by the promisor to do an act or fulfil a condition. In that situation the doing of the act or the fulfilling of the condition by the promisee in reliance on the promise will usually constitute consideration and create a binding contract: see Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth and Combe v Combe [1951] 2 KB 215 [and Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Co. [1893] 1 QB 256] ….

In the present case, I think that the promise made by Mr McDivitt was an offer which was intended to give rise to an obligation on the part of himself and his wife upon the plaintiff coming and working on the land. Mr McDivitt was concerned that the land would be rezoned, that the rates would go up, and that he would not be able to pay them when he went on the pension. Accordingly, he decided to subdivide the land. Upon the transfer of three of the blocks after subdivision, he would obtain a benefit because his rates would be reduced. This motivated him to offer the block in return for a person coming and working the block by means of organic farming. Thus the consideration for the transfer of the block was the act of the plaintiff in coming and working the block by means of organic farming at the request of the McDivitts.

Once the plaintiff went on to the land and commenced to work the block, it was not open to the McDivitts to withdraw their offer ….

By entering onto lot B and performing work, the plaintiff had suffered sufficient detriment to constitute consideration even though he was obliged to work the land until the time of subdivision before he was entitled to the transfer of lot B …

Frustration

[4.60] … With great respect to the learned trial judge, I am unable to conclude that the contract was frustrated by December 1982 or at all. His Honour found, and it was common ground on this appeal, that the present zoning did not prevent the subdivision of the land of the McDivitts. Nor with respect was there any evidence from which a conclusion could be drawn that an application for subdivision would certainly fail.

His Honour's finding concerning the terms of the contract did not include any term that the plaintiff's right to the transfer of the land depended upon the rezoning of the land. The plaintiff's right arose upon the subdivision of the land. Moreover, the evidence does not establish that the fulfilment of the [185] offer was dependent upon the land being rezoned. I have already set out the plaintiff's evidence. On that evidence the question of rezoning, while a motivating factor, was not a condition of the transfer of the land …

It may well be that, without the rezoning of the land, no approval will be given to the subdivision. However, subdivision is not a legal impossibility; it is possible that in all the circumstances the council might permit the land to be subdivided to enable the title to lot B to pass to the plaintiff.

The duty to co-operate

[4.65] The McDivitts have a contractual duty to do everything necessary on their part to enable the plaintiff to have the benefit of the contract: Secured Income Real Estate (Aust) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596 at 607 per Mason J. Accordingly, it is and was their duty to do everything in their power necessary to have the land subdivided so as to transfer "lot B" to the plaintiff. No doubt it was not a breach of that duty for the McDivitts to wait and see whether the land would be rezoned. But if the land is not to be rezoned, then the fulfilment of the McDivitts' duty requires that they make an application under the present zoning. If that application fails and if it appears that there is no prospect in the foreseeable future of a [186] subdivision being carried through, then it may be proper to conclude that the contract between the parties has been frustrated. But in my opinion that moment has not yet been reached. Moreover, it necessarily follows from what I have said that the plaintiff is entitled to work lot B and remove the fruits of his labour.

[McHugh JA concluded that the plaintiff was entitled to have the block transferred to him conditional upon the appropriate consent of the council and the minister being obtained.]

[4.70] MAHONEY JA: [175] In my opinion, the transaction between the parties constituted a contract. To adopt the Ansonian approach, the defendants offered the plaintiff a promise for an act: they promised to transfer the land if Mr Beaton came on the land and worked it as they discussed. The appeal has proceeded on the basis that Mr Beaton did, or did substantially, the act in question. Therefore there was a binding contract ….

[176] I think the conclusion should be drawn that Mr Beaton also did what he did upon the basis that the transfer of the land to him was to be made as and when the land was rezoned and therefore could be subdivided …

It is therefore necessary to determine the significance of the contemplated rezoning in the contractual obligations of the parties.

On the facts as the learned judge found them, I would be inclined to think — at least it might be argued — that the rezoning was a condition subsequent to the contractual arrangements made. On this basis, the defendants would be contractually bound to transfer the land to Mr Beaton but they would not be bound to effect the transfer unless and until the rezoning took place.

If the rezoning was a condition, then it was not fulfilled. No time was specified within which the rezoning was to take place. In the absence of specification of time, the implication would be, I think, that it should take place within a reasonable time. And, on the evidence, I would conclude that that time has now elapsed. That being so, it would be open to the defendants to terminate and what they have done constitutes such a determination.

However, before this Court the parties did not argue the significance of rezoning as a condition of the contract. I do not think that the learned judge made a definitive finding in this regard. There may be reasons why, had such an argument been raised and pursued, it would have been rejected: it may be that evidence could have been called upon the matter. I therefore do not think it is proper for this Court to hold that rezoning was a condition of the contract or that, if it was, the contract has been terminated by failure of it.

What, then, should this Court see as the significance of the rezoning?

For the reasons I have given, it is proper to approach this question upon the basis that, though the parties regarded rezoning as they did, it was not a contractual term in their contract. On this basis, I agree with his Honour's conclusion that the fact that there was not a contemplated rezoning by the time of the hearing effects a termination of the contract. The fact that the rezoning was specifically contemplated by the parties does not, I think, prevent the doctrine of frustration operating. Ordinarily an event operating by way of frustration will not be expressly contemplated or the subject of an [177] express provision in an agreement. But there is, in my opinion, nothing in the doctrine of frustration which will prevent it operating where the parties have contracted on an expressed assumption which in the event proves false: see generally Brisbane City Council v Group Projects Pty Ltd (1979) 145 CLR 143 and Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337.

In so far as the applicability of the doctrine of frustration is to be tested by the circumstances, I think that, had a bystander said to the parties in 1977: But what if the rezoning does not take place?, they would both have said that (subject to one matter): Of course, the land cannot be transferred. And that, in principle, provides the basis for the operation of frustration.

The matter that I have mentioned is the provision for an accounting of what should come from or go to Mr Beaton if his contractual rights in the land were to come to an end. It would be expected that the parties would have said not merely "Of course …" but "Of course … but …".

I do not think that, if conditions subsequent be put aside, the fact that there would be a qualified "Of course" prevents the operation of the doctrine of frustration, at least in the present case. I do not think that, in principle, it prevents that doctrine operating. The fact of the qualification would go, not to frustration, but to what would follow from it. To that I shall return subsequently.

There remains the possibility that a rezoning may take place. But, as far as the evidence shows, there is no present prospect of a rezoning. The contemplation was, as his Honour said, that there would be a rezoning within some two years. Ten years and more have passed. I think that, in these circumstances, the theoretical possibility of a rezoning in the future does not prevent the contract coming to an end.

… it was not suggested — at least the matter was not pursued before the learned judge — that efforts by the defendants could or would have procured a rezoning. I do not think that the contemplation of the contract was that the defendants should produce a rezoning: the contract was upon the basis of a rezoning resulting, not from the efforts of the defendants but otherwise. The defendants were, in my opinion, under no obligation to procure it and the imposition of a term upon them that they should seek so to do would be wrong.

Appeal dismissed.

ADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION

[4.75] The courts and writers draw a distinction between adequate consideration and sufficient or good consideration. Although the terms are not always used with perfect consistency, the adequacy of consideration refers to its intrinsic value. The determination of the sufficiency of consideration involves the question whether, for what are ultimately public policy reasons, certain consideration should be denied legal efficacy.

Subject to the doctrine of illusory consideration, the general principle is that the courts do not inquire into the adequacy of consideration, that is, the comparative value of the consideration and the promise or act in return for which it is given. Thus, a nominal consideration – such as a peppercorn, a canary or a piece of coal – will be adequate consideration.

Woolworths v Kelly

[4.80] Woolworths Ltd v Kelly (1991) 22 NSWLR 189 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales).

KIRBY P: [193] There are a number of reasons why the common law has declined to weigh the adequacy of consideration in judging whether a particular bargain amounts to a legally enforceable contract:

1. In the marketplace, in the myriad of situations which lead to contracts, different participants will put different values upon the bargain they are getting. The subject of a bargain may be specially important to a party. It may be valued for idiosyncratic, sentimental, ethical and other reasons as well as economic reasons. That is why it has been said so often that it is impossible for the law to indulge in an evaluation of the equivalence of the promises exchanged by parties to a contract: see, eg, American University v Todd 1 A 2d 595 (1938) at 598;
2. Judges deciding disputed contract cases are lawyers. Parties whose disputes come to law are advised by lawyers. Lawyers enjoy a special training. But that training may not prepare them to evaluate the multitude of economic and other decisions daily made by people of different, and even like, backgrounds in entering into bargains. The disinclination of the courts to become involved in economic evaluation derives, in part, from a realisation of the limited expertise of lawyers. That expertise does not necessarily qualify the lawyer to substitute his or her opinion about the wisdom of the bargain achieved for that of the parties, so long as some consideration for the bargain can be demonstrated;
3. If courts were to entertain disputes concerning the adequacy, or inadequacy, of consideration for a bargain, and if such issues were justiciable, they would lead to litigation prone to open up a vast territory of evidence. Courts would have to try the adequacy of consideration upon testimony. Different decision-makers would reach different conclusions upon the same evidence;
4. The prospect of such disputes would produce a great deal of uncertainty in an area of the law where certainty has great economic importance to society. In contract law it is highly desirable that uncertainty about whether a bargain is legally enforceable be minimised. In so far as any suggestion is made to enlarge the area of the exceptions to the disinclination of the common law to evaluate the sufficiency of consideration, I would be disinclined to go beyond those which are well founded on clear authority: cf Beaton v McDivitt (1987) 13 NSWLR 162 at 169;
5. The law provides means, in particular cases, to challenge the adequacy of a bargain where some wrong or moral fault can be shown to justify the challenge. Thus, if there was no intention to enter into contractual relations at all, the bargain will not be enforced. Equitable relief will also sometimes be available to prevent enforcement of a contract contrary to conscience. [194] Statutory and other relief has been provided by law to meet cases of unconscionable or unjust contracts. Federal and State statutes have been enacted to provide expressly for such relief: see, eg, Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth), s 87; Contracts Review Act 1980, s 7; Industrial Arbitration Act 1940, s 88F. Relief may be granted for mistake. Contracts may be rectified. Restitution may be ordered. But at law, the rule against inquiring into the adequacy or inadequacy of considerations stands firm. It should not, in my view, be changed: cf State Rail Authority of New South Wales v Heath Outdoor Pty Ltd (1986) 7 NSWLR 170 at 177; Geftakis v Maritime Services Board of New South Wales, (Court of Appeal, unreported, 20 November 1987); Biotechnology Australia Pty Ltd v Pace (1988) 15 NSWLR 130 at 133 and Austotel Pty Limited v Franklins Selfserve Stores Pty Ltd (1989) 16 NSWLR 582 at 585F;

6. The restraint of the common law in this regard is also an attribute of economic liberty. That liberty extracts a price in social terms. However, respecting the right of parties at law to reach their own bargains, untroubled by the paternalistic superintendence of the courts as to the adequacy of their bargains is the approach which the common law has adopted. It is an approach protective of economic freedom.

SUFFICIENCY OF CONSIDERATION

Past consideration

[4.85] Past consideration is not considered sufficient consideration. Thus, if P performs an apparently gratuitous service for D and D later promises to pay P for that service, D's promise will not be enforceable. The service performed by P is past and cannot provide consideration supporting D's later promise. The courts have recognised an exception to this principle in the case of a promise to pay for past services which were rendered on the basis that they were to be paid for (see Pao On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] AC 614 at [4.150]).

Roscorla v Thomas

[4.90] Roscorla v Thomas (1842) 3 QB 234; 114 ER 496 (Court of Queen's Bench) – Rule Nisi for Arrest of Judgment.

[FACTS: The plaintiff bought a horse from the defendant. After the sale was made, the defendant promised the plaintiff that the horse was sound and free from vice. The plaintiff sought damages for breach of warranty, claiming the horse was not free from vice but was "very vicious, restive, ungovernable and ferocious".]

LORD DENMAN CJ delivered the judgment of the Court. [236] This was an action of assumpsit for breach of warranty of the soundness of a horse. The first count of the declaration, upon which alone the question arises, stated that, in consideration that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, had bought of the defendant a horse for the sum of £30, the defendant promised that it was sound and free from vice. And it was objected, in arrest of judgment, that the precedent executed consideration was insufficient to support the subsequent promise. And we are of opinion that the objection must prevail.

It may be taken as a general rule, subject to excep-[237]tions not applicable to this case, that the promise must be coextensive with the consideration. In the present case, the only promise that would result from the consideration, as stated, and be coextensive with it, would be to deliver the horse upon request. The precedent sale, without a warranty, though at the request of the defendant, imposes no other duty or obligation upon him. It is clear, therefore, that the consideration stated would not raise an implied promise by the defendant that the horse was sound or free from vice.

But the promise in the present case must be taken to be, as in fact it was, express: and the question is, whether that fact will warrant the extension of the promise beyond that which would be implied by law; and whether the consideration, though insufficient to raise an implied promise, will nevertheless support an express one. And we think that it will not.

The cases in which it has been held that, under certain circumstances, a consideration insufficient to raise an implied promise will nevertheless support an express one, will be found collected and reviewed in the note (a) to Wennall v Adeney (1802) 3 Bos & Pul 247; 127 ER 137, and in the case of Eastwood v Kenyon (1840) 11 A & E 438; 113 ER 482. They are cases of voidable contracts subsequently ratified, of debts barred by operation of law, subsequently revived, and of equitable and moral obligations, which, but for some rule of law, would of themselves have been sufficient to raise an implied promise. All these cases are distinguishable from, and indeed inapplicable to, the present, which appears to us to fall within the general rule, that a consideration past and executed will support no other promise than such as would be implied by law.

[238] The rule for arresting the judgment upon the first count must therefore be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

The existing legal duty rule

The general rule

[4.95] A promise to perform an existing contractual duty is not regarded as sufficient consideration. The issue often arises in the context of a one-sided modification of an existing contract.

In TA Sundell & Sons Pty Ltd v Emm Yannoulatos (Overseas) Pty Ltd (1955) 56 SR (NSW) 323 (see [10.90]), the defendants agreed to supply certain galvanised iron to the plaintiffs at £109 15s per ton. Subsequently the defendants refused to deliver the goods unless the price was increased by £27 per ton, citing a great increase in the price of zinc as the reason. Under protest, the plaintiffs made the additional funds available and in due course received the iron. The plaintiffs then successfully sued to recover the additional amount paid. The court, in holding that the defendants had given no consideration for any promise, the plaintiffs might have made to pay the additional price, said (at 327):

> the only consideration which was suggested in argument as being given in exchange for the alleged promise was that the [defendant] would do what was necessary to ensure that the goods were delivered. But we are satisfied that the [defendant] was bound to do so under the original contract. In our view every promise allegedly given to the plaintiff by the defendant under the so called second agreement was identical with a promise given under the original agreement.

See also Stilk v Myrick (1809) 2 Camp 317; 170 ER 1168, discussed in Williams v Roffey Bros & Nichols (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 QB 1 at [4.115] and Wigan v Edwards (1973) 1 ALR 497 at [4.170]. The rationale of the "existing contractual duty" rule is discussed in Williams v Roffey Bros & Nichols (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 QB 1 at [4.115] and Musumeci v Winadell Pty Ltd (1994) 34 NSWLR 723 at [4.125]. You will see that these cases also involve the application of the potentially expansive "practical benefit" exception to the existing legal duty rule.

Part payment of a debt

[4.100] A corollary of the rule that a promise to perform an existing contractual duty is no consideration is the rule in Pinnel's Case. The rule in Pinnel's Case is that a promise to pay part of a debt will not constitute consideration for a promise to accept the payment in satisfaction of the debt. For example, if D owes C $10, C's promise to accept $8 in full settlement of the debt will not, on its own, be contractually binding on C. D will not have provided good consideration for the promise.

The rule in Pinnel's Case will not apply where part payment of a debt is accompanied by some additional consideration from the debtor, even if that consideration is nominal.

Foakes v Beer

[4.105] Foakes v Beer (1884) 9 App Cas 605 (House of Lords) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: On 11 August 1875, Beer recovered judgment against Foakes for £2 077 17s 2d for debt and £13 1s 10d for costs. On 21 December 1876, a memorandum of agreement was made and signed by Foakes and Beer in the following terms:

> Whereas the said John Weston Foakes is indebted to the said Julia Beer, and she has obtained a judgment in Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, Exchequer Division, for the sum of £2 090 19s. And whereas the said John Weston Foakes has requested the said Julia Beer to give him time in which to pay such judgment, which she has agreed to do on the following conditions. Now this agreement witnesseth that in consideration of the said John Weston Foakes paying to the said Julia Beer on the signing of this agreement the sum of £500, the receipt whereof she doth thereby acknowledge in part satisfaction of the said judgment debt of £2 090 19s, and on condition of his paying to her or her executors, administrators, assigns or nominee the sum of £150 on 1 July and January or within one calendar month after each of the said days respectively in every year until the whole of the said sum of £2 090 19s shall have been fully paid and satisfied, the first of such payments to be made on 1 July next, then she the said Julia Beer hereby undertakes and agrees that she, her executors, administrators or assigns, will not take any proceedings whatever on the said judgment.

Beer, having in June 1882 taken out a summons for leave to proceed on the judgment, an issue was directed to be tried between Beer as plaintiff and Foakes as defendant whether any and what amount was on 1 July 1882 due upon the judgment.

At the trial of the issue before Cave J, it was proved that the whole sum of £2,090 19s had been paid by instalments, but Beer claimed interest. The jury under his Lordship's direction found that Foakes had paid all the sums which by the agreement of 21 December 1876, he undertook to pay and within the times therein specified. Cave J was of opinion that whether the judgment was satisfied or not, Beer was, by reason of the agreement, not entitled to issue execution for any sum on the judgment.

The Queen's Bench Division (Watkin, Williams and Mathew JJ) discharged an order for a new trial on the ground of misdirection.]

[The Court of Appeal (Brett MR, Lindley and Fry LJJ) reversed that decision and entered judgment for the respondent for the interest due, with costs: 11 QBD 221.]

EARL OF SELBOURNE LC: [610] Although, therefore, I may (as indeed I do) very much doubt whether the effect of the agreement, as a conditional waiver of the interest to which she was by law entitled under the judgment, was really present to the mind of the judgment creditor, still I cannot deny that it might have that effect, if capable of being legally enforced.

[611] But the question remains, whether the agreement is capable of being legally forced. Not being under seal, it cannot be legally enforced against the respondent, unless she received consideration for it from the appellant, or unless, though without consideration, it operates by way of accord and satisfaction, so as to extinguish the claim for interest. What is the consideration? On the face of the agreement none is expressed, except a present payment of £500, on account and in part of the larger debt then due and payable by law under the judgment. The appellant did not contract to pay the future instalments of £150 each, at the times therein mentioned; much less did he give any new security, in the shape of negotiable paper, or in any other form. The promise de futuro was only that of the respondent, that if the half-yearly payments of £150 each were regularly paid, she would "take no proceedings whatever on the judgment". No doubt if the appellant had been under no antecedent obligation to pay the whole debt, his fulfilment of the condition might have imported some consideration on his part for that promise. But he was under that antecedent obligation, and payment at those deferred dates, by the forbearance and indulgence of the creditor, of the residue of the principal debt and costs, could not (in my opinion) be a consideration for the relinquishment of interest and discharge of the judgment, unless the payment of the £500, at the time of signing the agreement, was such a consideration …

The question, therefore, is nakedly raised by this appeal, whether your Lordships are now prepared, not only to overrule, as contrary to law, the doctrine stated by Sir Edward Coke to [612] have been laid down by all the judges of the Common Pleas in Pinnel's case, 5 Co Rep 117a; 77 ER 237 in 1602, and repeated in his note to Littleton, s 344 (Co Litt 212b), but to treat a prospective agreement, not under seal, for satisfaction of a debt, by a series of payments on account to a total amount less than the whole debt, as binding in law, provided those payments are regularly made; the case not being one of a composition with a common debtor, agreed to, inter se, by several creditors … The doctrine itself, as laid down by Sir Edward Coke, may have been criticised, as questionable in principle, by some persons whose opinions are entitled to respect, but it has never been judicially overruled; on the contrary, I think it has always, since the 16th century, been accepted as law. If so, I cannot think that your Lordships would do right, if you were now to reverse, as erroneous, a judgment of the Court of Appeal, proceeding upon a doctrine which has been accepted as part of the law of England for 280 years.

The doctrine, as stated in Pinnel's case is:

> that payment of a lesser sum on the day [it would of course be the same after the day] in satisfaction of a greater, cannot be any satisfaction for the whole, because it appears to the judges, that by no possibility a lesser sum can be a satisfaction to the plaintiff for a greater sum.

As stated in Coke Littleton, 212b, it is: "where the condition is for payment of £20, the obligor or offeror cannot at the time appointed pay a lesser sum in satisfaction of the whole, because it is apparent that a lesser sum of money cannot be a satisfaction of a greater", adding (what is beyond controversy), that an acquittance under seal, in full [613] satisfaction of the whole, would (under like circumstances) be valid and binding.

The distinction between the effect of a deed under seal, and that of an agreement by parol, or by writing not under seal, may seem arbitrary, but it is established in our law; nor is it really unreasonable or practically inconvenient that the law should require particular solemnities to give to a gratuitous contract the force of a binding obligation. If the question be (as, in the actual state of the law, I think it is), whether consideration is, or is not, given in a case of this kind, by the debtor who pays down part of the debt presently due from him, for a promise by the creditor to relinquish, after certain further payments on account, the residue of the debt, I cannot say that I think consideration is given, in the sense in which I have always understood that word as used in our law. It might be (and indeed I think it would be) an improvement in our law, if a release or acquittance of the whole debt, on payment of any sum which the creditor might be content to receive by way of accord and satisfaction (though less than the whole), were held to be, generally, binding, though not under seal; nor should I be unwilling to see equal force given to a prospective agreement, like the present, in writing though not under seal; but I think it impossible, without refinements which practically alter the sense of the word to treat such a release or acquittance as supported by any new consideration proceeding from the debtor. All the authorities subsequent to Cumber v Wane (1 Sm LC, 8th ed, 366), which were relied upon by the appellant at your Lordship's Bar (such as Sibree v Tripp (1846) 15 M & W 23; 153 ER 745; Curlewis v Clark (1877) 3 Ex 375; and Goddard v O'Brien (1882) 9 QBD 37), have proceeded upon the distinction, that, by giving negotiable paper or otherwise, there had been some new consideration for a new agreement, distinct from mere money payments in or towards discharge of the original liability. I think it unnecessary to go through those cases, or to examine the particular grounds on which each of them was decided. There are no such facts in the case now before your Lordships. What is called "any benefit, or even any legal possibility of benefit", in Mr Smith's notes to Cumber v Wane, is not [614] (as I conceive) that sort of benefit which a creditor may derive from getting payment of part of the money due to him from a debtor, who might otherwise keep him at arm's length, or possibly become insolvent, but is some independent benefit, actual or contingent, of a kind which might in law be a good and valuable consideration for any other sort of agreement not under seal.

My conclusion is, that the order appealed from should be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, with costs, and I so move your Lordships.

[LORD WATSON and LORD FITZGERALD delivered speeches in which they reached the same result.]

[4.110] LORD BLACKBURN: [622] What principally weighs with me in thinking that Lord Coke made a mistake of fact is my conviction that all men of business, whether merchants or tradesmen, do every day recognise and act on the ground that prompt payment of a part of their demand may be more beneficial to them than it would be to insist on their rights and enforce payment of the whole. Even where the debtor is perfectly solvent, and sure to pay at last, this often is so. Where the credit of the debtor is doubtful it must be more so. I had persuaded myself that there was no such long-continued action on this dictum as to render it improper in this House to reconsider the question. I had written my reasons for [623] so thinking; but as they were not satisfactory to the other noble and learned Lords who heard the case, I do not now repeat them nor persist in them.

I assent to the judgment proposed, though it is not that which I had originally thought proper.

Appeal dismissed.

Exceptions to the existing legal duty rule

Practical benefit

Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors)

[4.115] Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 QB 1 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from County Court.

[FACTS: Roffey Bros (the defendants) held a contract (the main contract) to refurbish a block of 27 flats. They entered into a subcontract with Williams (the plaintiff) under which Williams was to carry out the carpentry in the flats. Williams commenced work, but because his agreed price of £20 000 was too low, got into financial difficulties. Roffey Bros were concerned that he might not be able to complete his contract. The main contract imposed a penalty for late completion.

The parties made an oral agreement whereby Roffey Bros were to pay Williams an additional £10 300 at the rate of £575 for each flat on which the carpentry had been completed. Williams continued work and substantially completed the carpentry on eight more flats, but after approximately seven weeks, the defendants having made only one payment of £1 500, ceased work on the flats. The defendants declined to pay the balance of the additional amount promised as well as an amount outstanding under the original contract. They subcontracted other carpenters and finished the refurbishment one week later. Williams sued for these amounts and Roffey Bros counterclaimed for damages for breach of contract.

The trial judge found that Williams was entitled to be paid for eight flats substantially completed since the oral agreement less "some small sum for defective and incomplete items", together with £2 200 owing under the original contract. He further found that as Williams had received only £1 500, he was entitled to stop work.]

GLIDEWELL LJ:

The issues

[7] Before us Mr Evans for the defendants advances two arguments. His principal submission is that the defendants' promise to pay an additional £10 300, at the rate of £575 per completed flat, is unenforceable since there was no consideration for it.

[8] Mr Evans' secondary argument is that the additional payment was only payable as each flat was completed. On the judge's findings, eight further flats had been "substantially" completed. Substantial completion was something less than completion. Thus none of the eight flats had been completed, and no further payment was yet due from the defendants …

[The doctrine of substantial performance is dealt with at [29.50]–[29.75].]

Was there consideration for the defendants' promise made on 9 April 1986 to pay an additional price at the rate of £575 per completed flat

[10] The judge made the following findings of fact which are relevant on this issue.

(i) The subcontract price agreed was too low to enable the plaintiff to operate satisfactorily and at a profit. Mr Cottrell, the defendants' surveyor, agreed that this was so.

(ii) Mr Roffey (managing director of the defendants) was persuaded by Mr Cottrell that the defendants should pay a bonus to the plaintiff. The figure agreed at the meeting on 9 April 1986 was £10 300.

The judge quoted and accepted the evidence of Mr Cottrell to the effect that a main contractor who agrees too low a price with a subcontractor is acting contrary to his own interests. He will never get the job finished without paying more money. The judge therefore concluded:

> In my view where the original subcontract price is too low, and the parties subsequently agree that additional moneys shall be paid to the subcontractor, this agreement is in the interests of both parties. This is what happened in the present case, and in my opinion the agreement of 9 April 1986 does not fail for lack of consideration.

In his address to us, Mr Evans outlined the benefits to his clients, the defendants, which arose from their agreement to pay the additional [11] £10 300 as:

(i) seeking to ensure that the plaintiff continued work and did not stop in breach of the subcontract;

(ii) avoiding the penalty for delay; and

(iii) avoiding the trouble and expense of engaging other people to complete the carpentry work.

However, Mr Evans submits that, though his clients may have derived, or hoped to derive, practical benefits from their agreement to pay the "bonus", they derived no benefit in law, since the plaintiff was promising to do no more than he was already bound to do by his subcontract, that is, continue with the carpentry work and complete it on time. Thus there was no consideration for the agreement.

Mr Evans relies on the principle of law which, traditionally, is based on the decision in Stilk v Myrick (1809) 2 Camp 317; 170 ER 1168. That was a decision at first instance of Lord Ellenborough CJ. On a voyage to the Baltic, two seamen deserted. The captain agreed with the rest of the crew that if they worked the ship to London without the two seamen being replaced, he would divide between them the pay which would have been due to the two deserters. On arrival at London this extra pay was refused, and the plaintiff's action to recover his extra pay was dismissed. Counsel for the defendant argued that such an agreement was contrary to public policy, but Lord Ellenborough CJ's judgment was based on lack of consideration. It reads (at 318–19):

> I think Harris v Watson (1791) Peake 102; 170 ER 94 was rightly decided; but I doubt whether the ground of public policy, upon which Lord Kenyon is stated to have proceeded, be the true principle on which the decision is to be supported. Here, I say the agreement is void for want of consideration. There was no consideration for the ulterior pay promised to the mariners who remained with the ship. Before they sailed from London they had undertaken to do all they could under all the emergencies of the voyage. They had sold all their services till the voyage should be completed. If they had been at liberty to quit the vessel at Cronstadt, the case would have been quite different; or if the captain had capriciously discharged the two men who were wanting, the others might not have been compellable to take the whole duty upon themselves, and their agreeing to do so might have been a sufficient consideration for the promise of an advance of wages. But the desertion of a part of the crew is to be considered an emergency of the voyage as much as their death; and those who remain are bound by the terms of their original contract to exert themselves to the utmost to bring the ship in safety to her destined port. Therefore, without looking to the policy of this agreement, I think it is void for want of consideration, and that the plaintiff can only recover at the rate of £5 a month.

In North Ocean Shipping Co Ltd v Hyundai Construction Co Ltd [1979] QB 705, Mocatta J regarded the general principle of the decision in Stilk v Myrick as still being good law …

[13] It was suggested to us in argument that, since the development of the doctrine of promissory estoppel, it may well be possible for a person to whom a promise has been made, on which he has relied, to make an additional payment for services which he is in any event bound to render under an existing contract or by operation of law, to show that the promisor is estopped from claiming that there was no consideration for his promise. However, the application of the doctrine of promissory estoppel to facts such as those of the present case has not yet been fully developed …

There is, however, another legal concept of relatively recent development which is relevant, namely, that of economic duress. Clearly if a subcontractor has agreed to undertake work at a fixed price, and before he has completed the work declines to continue with it unless the contractor agrees to pay an increased price, the subcontractor may be held guilty of securing the contractor's promise by taking unfair advantage of the difficulties he will cause if he does not complete the work. In such a case an agreement to pay an increased price may well be voidable because it was entered into under duress. Thus this concept may provide another answer in law to the question of policy which has [14] troubled the courts since before Stilk v Myrick and no doubt led at the date of that decision to a rigid adherence to the doctrine of consideration.

This possible application of the concept of economic duress was referred to by Lord Scarman, delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Pao On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] AC 614 …

[15] It is true that Pao On is a case of a tripartite relationship that is, a promise by A to perform a pre-existing contractual obligation owed to B, in return for a promise of payment by C. But Lord Scarman's words, at 634–5, seem to me to be of general application, equally applicable to a promise made by one of the original two parties to a contract.

Accordingly, following the view of the majority in Ward v Byham [1956] 1 WLR 496 and of the whole court in Williams v Williams [1957] 1 WLR 148 and that of the Privy Council in Pao On the present state of the law on this subject can be expressed in the following proposition:

(i) if A has entered into a contract with B to do work for, or to supply goods or services to, B in return for payment by B; and

(ii) at some stage before A has completely performed his obligations under the contract B has reason to doubt whether A will, or will be able to, complete his side of the bargain; and

(iii) B thereupon promises A an additional payment in return for A's promise to perform [16] his contractual obligations on time; and

(iv) as a result of giving his promise, B obtains in practice a benefit, or obviates a disbenefit; and

(v) B's promise is not given as a result of economic duress or fraud on the part of A; then

(vi) the benefit to B is capable of being consideration for B's promise, so that the promise will be legally binding.

As I have said, Mr Evans accepts that in the present case by promising to pay the extra £10 300 his client secured benefits. There is no finding, and no suggestion, that in this case the promise was given as a result of fraud or duress. If it be objected that the propositions above contravene the principle in Stilk v Myrick I answer that in my view they do not; they refine, and limit the application of that principle, but they leave the principle unscathed for example, where B secures no benefit by his promise. It is not in my view surprising that a principle enunciated in relation to the rigours of seafaring life during the Napoleonic wars should be subjected during the succeeding 180 years to a process of refinement and limitation in its application in the present day. It is therefore my opinion that on his findings of fact in the present case, the judge was entitled to hold, as he did, that the defendants' promise to pay the extra £10 300 was supported by valuable consideration, and thus constituted an enforceable agreement …

For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

[4.120] RUSSELL LJ: [19] For my part I wish to make it plain that I do not base my judgment upon any reservation as to the correctness of the law long ago enunciated in Stilk v Myrick. A gratuitous promise, pure and simple, remains unenforceable unless given under seal. But where, as in this case, a party undertakes to make a payment because by so doing it will gain an advantage arising out of the continuing relationship with the promisee, the new bargain will not fail for want of consideration …. I too would dismiss this appeal.

[PURCHAS LJ delivered a judgment to a similar effect.]

Appeal dismissed.

Musumeci v Winadell

[4.125] Musumeci v Winadell Pty Ltd (1994) 34 NSWLR 723 (Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Action.

[FACTS: The plaintiffs were tenants of a fruit and vegetable shop in a shopping centre owned by the defendant. The introduction of a larger competing fruit and vegetable shop in the shopping centre threatened the ability of the tenants (the plaintiffs) to pay the full rent. The defendant landlord promised to accept a reduced rent but later sought to resile from that arrangement. The plaintiffs sought, inter alia, a declaration that the landlord had made a binding promise to reduce the rent. The principal issue was whether the tenants had given consideration for the landlord's promise.]

SANTOW J: [741]

Williams v Roffey — should it be followed in Australia?

There are three reasons which might be put as to why a contract to perform an existing obligation should not be enforced.

First, to protect the promisor from extortion, such as may result from threatening to breach a contract in order to exact a concession. Thus, for example, the two dollar unguaranteed corporate tenant in a falling market, whose directors threaten to walk away from a lease, unless rent concessions are conceded.

G H Treitel, The Law of Contract (8th ed, 1991) suggests (at 90 and 364) that this argument is much reduced in importance, now that such a refusal may constitute duress: B and S Contracts and Designs Ltd v Victor Green Publications Ltd [1984] ICR 419 was such a case. However it has been held by the Privy Council that a threat to breach a contract may not amount to duress, where there has been no "coercion of the will", having regard to alternative courses open: Pao On v Lau Yiu Long. The Australian cases, discussed below, make clear that coercion of the will is not essential for duress. One may choose to submit, without one's will being overborne, but by reason of illegitimate pressure consisting of unlawful threats or unconscionable conduct: Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corp (1988) 19 NSWLR 40 at 45–6. Furthermore economic duress has not received unqualified acceptance as a basis for setting aside contracts in Australia.

Thus, in Equiticorp Finance Ltd (in liq) v Bank of New Zealand (1993) 32 NSWLR 50, [742] Kirby P (at 106) cast doubt on the utility of economic duress as a satisfactory remedy. He described it as an unsatisfactory and uncertain doctrine, lending itself to open ended formulae, little clarified by the cases over the last hundred years. He criticised its encouragement to the courts to substitute their own subjective opinion about agreements for those reached by the parties, particularly when substantial corporations. He preferred to see the concepts of economic duress invoked under sensibly limited and structured legislation like the Contracts Review Act 1980 or more broadly, subsumed by the doctrine of undue influence and unconscionability.

Clark JA and Cripps JA did not reject the doctrine, but were satisfied it did not apply in the circumstances. This reflects the Court of Appeal's acceptance of economic duress in earlier cases such as Crescendo Management Pty Ltd v Westpac Banking Corp.

But does it follow that, because there is not as yet a fully developed doctrine for the avoidance of contracts on the grounds of economic duress (pace Hobhouse J in The "Alev", Vantage Navigation Corp v Suhail and Saud Bahwan Building Materials LLC [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep 138 at 147, who thought otherwise), that therefore strict consideration should remain the discrimen for enforceability of contractual modifications? There are a number of reasons why not. If it is assumed that the underlying concern is to prevent coercive modifications, the traditional notion of consideration does not perform that role very well. Its very certainty is bought at the price of inflexibility. This produces a real disincentive to re-negotiate a contract which changed circumstances have made unduly onerous. This is especially if the outcome is likely to be unenforceable by reason of lack of consideration.

Even the presence of consideration does not preclude there having been economic duress inducing the contract. Consideration expressed in formalistic terms of one dollar can indeed actually cloak duress rather than expose it.

Posner J sets out incisively the policy issues as he saw them in United States v Stump Home Specialties Manufacturing Inc 905 F 2d 1117 (1990) at 1121–2:

> The requirement of consideration has, however, a distinct function in the modification setting — although one it does not perform well — and that is to prevent coercive modifications. Since one of the main purposes of contracts and of contract law is to facilitate long-term commitments, there is often an interval in the life of a contract during which one party is at the mercy of the other. A may have ordered a machine from B that A wants to place in operation on a given date, specified in their contract; > and in expectation of B's complying with the contract, A may have made commitments to his customers that it would be costly to renege on. As the date of scheduled delivery approaches, B may be tempted to demand that A agree to renegotiate the contract price, knowing that A will incur heavy expenses if B fails to deliver on time. A can always refuse to renegotiate, relying instead on his right to sue B for breach of contract if B fails to make delivery by the agreed date. But legal remedies are costly and uncertain, thereby opening the way to duress. Considerations of commercial reputation will deter taking advantage of an opportunity to exert duress on a contract partner in many cases, but not in all. [743] …

> [7] The rule that modifications are unenforceable unless supported by consideration strengthens A's position by reducing B's incentive to seek a modification. But it strengthens it feebly … The law does not require that consideration be adequate — that it be commensurate with what the party accepting it is giving up. Slight consideration, therefore, will suffice to make a contract or a contract modification enforceable. And slight consideration is consistent with coercion. To surrender one's contractual rights in exchange for a peppercorn is not functionally different from surrendering them for nothing.
> The sensible course would be to enforce contract modifications (at least if written) regardless of consideration and rely on the defence of duress to prevent abuse … All coercive modifications would then be unenforceable, and there would be no need to worry about consideration, an inadequate safeguard against duress ….

I conclude that even if duress is not a fully developed doctrine, it is nonetheless a useful weapon. It, with fraud, is already introduced by element (v) of Glidewell LJ's formulation [see at [4.115], p 107], precluding enforcement of a promise so induced. Logically though, one should expand that element also to exclude promises induced by undue influence or unconscionable conduct, at the least.

But should our courts go further, as American courts have done, by drawing a line between legitimate inducement and extortion, doing so according to a doctrine of good faith, as suggested by Richard Hooley, Consideration and the Existing Duty [1991] JBL 19 at 27–8, 33–4? …

[744] … I consider that the notion of "good faith" is better replaced by the more precise and apposite one of "unfair pressure" on A's part inducing B's promise in element (v). Economic duress, as the cases demonstrate, cover[s] many examples of unfair pressure, but by no means all. Furthermore, where the circumstances giving rise to the re-negotiation were unforeseen by A at the time of the original contract, possibly reflecting unanticipated hardship in future performance by A, these still do not justify a demand for re-negotiation backed by unfair pressure. But such circumstances giving rise to that demand, may nonetheless have some influence on the court in judging fairness, by reference to proportionality of any pressure brought to bear.

Thus such a reformulation of element (v) might read as follows:

(v) B's promise is not given as a result of economic duress or fraud, or undue influence or unconscionable conduct on the part of A nor is it induced otherwise by unfair pressure on the part of A, having regard to the circumstances.

The second reason cited by Treitel (at 89) why the new promise should not be enforced, is that the promisee suffered no legal detriment in performing what was already due from him. Nor did the promisor receive any legal benefit in receiving what was already due to him. He answers that this way:

> But this reasoning takes no account of the fact that the promisee may in fact suffer a detriment: for example, the wages that a seaman could earn elsewhere may exceed those that he would earn under the original contract together with the damages that he would have to pay for breaking it.

> Conversely, the promisor may in fact benefit from the actual performance of what was legally due to him: in Stilk v Myrick the master got his ship home and this may well have been worth more to him than any damages that he could have recovered from the crew.

Indeed the very fact that a concession is extended by B, without extortion, supports an inference, though by no means conclusively, that consideration from A, in a real and practical sense, has moved that concession. The law is increasingly tending away from the artificial towards the substantive. Such a practical notion of consideration reflects that trend. It is a notorious fact that concessions are made to avoid the necessity for enforcing a contract whose performance is in jeopardy. It would indeed be far more artificial to treat such concessional modification to the contract as moved by a consideration consisting of cancellation of the old contract in return for the [745] new, an approach which the Court of Appeal in Williams v Roffey expressly and correctly disclaimed.

That leads to the third possible reason for why such a promise should not be enforced. It is expressed in the proposition that a benefit which is merely the hoped-for end result of performance cannot constitute consideration: Brian Coote. "If these matters are capable of being regarded as consideration the reality is that the existing duty rule no longer applies, for in every case these types of benefits will be present"; Carter and Harland, Contract Law in Australia (at 109). The authors of that text go further: "Indeed, it is because contracting parties regard such matters as benefits that the argument can be made that existing rule should be abolished." But that assumes the existing rule has not even residual utility and I do not accept that proposition.

Thus, Williams v Roffey and subsequent cases such as Anangel Atlas Compania Naviera SA v Ishikawajima-Harima Heavy Industries Co Ltd (No 2) [1990] 2 Lloyd's LR 526 per Hirst J, have been at pains to treat Stilk's case as still good law, though only "where there is a wholly gratuitous promise" (at 545).

But it should be apparent that Stilk's case involved no less a practical benefit than was upheld as sufficient for consideration in Williams v Roffey.

What then is a sufficient practical benefit to B, so as to take the situation beyond a wholly gratuitous promise by B? The answer lies in the proposition put by Treitel (at 90) quoted above. It is indeed inherent in the situation posed by Williams v Roffey itself (and indeed in Stilk's case itself, despite the decision). There the subcontractor A's performance was worth more to B (the principal contractor) than likely damages, even taking into account the cost of any concession to obtain greater assurance of that performance. This suggests there should be an addition to element (iv) of Glidewell LJ's formulation by adding this proviso at the end:

> provided that A's performance having regard to what has been so obtained is capable of being viewed by B as worth more to B than any remedy against A (allowing for any defences or cross-claims) taking into account the cost to B of any such payment or concession to obtain greater assurance of A's performance.

Nor should the alternative and indeed original basis of consideration be ignored, namely detriment to A, the promisee for this purpose. It is of course long settled that detriment to the promisee suffices as consideration — indeed it better reflects the origins of contract in the action of assumpsit. Thus element (iv), as I have expanded it, should be divided into parts, the second as follows:

> (iv)(a) …, or (b). As a result of giving his promise, A suffers in practice a detriment (or obviates a benefit), provided that A is thereby foregoing the opportunity of not performing the original contract in circumstances where such non performance, taking into account B's likely remedy against A (and allowing for any defences or cross-claims) is being capable of being viewed by A as worth more to A than performing that contract, in the absence of B's promised payment or concession to A.

To all this it might be said that such a relaxation of the doctrine of consideration, [746] if adopted, will discourage concessions, since they would then too readily become legally binding throughout the term of the contract. But the answer to that is simple enough. The courts should be alert to distinguish promises intended by their terms to be no more than temporary, or truly ex gratia, concessions, for example if expressly limited to a period of difficult circumstances for performance by the other party, which may not be permanent. And "care must also be taken not to infer anterior promises from conduct which represents no more than an adjustment of their relationship in the light of changing circumstances": per McHugh JA in Integrated Computer Services Pty Ltd v Digital Equipment Corp (Aust) Pty Ltd (1988) 5 BPR 11,110 at 11,117.

Accordingly, I'm satisfied to conclude that, subject to the earlier re-casting of the five elements of Glidewell LJ, Williams v Roffey should be [747] followed in allowing a practical benefit or detriment to suffice as consideration. For convenience, I set out below the re-cast elements, changes indicated by italics. I recognise that they will be further refined in light of experience. One particular issue is the extent to which a benefit or detriment, said to be "practical", as distinct from explicitly bargained for, must nonetheless be consistent with, and not extraneous to, the bargaining process, as at least its intended result if not necessarily its moving force:

The present state of the law on this subject can be expressed in the following proposition:

(i) If A has entered into a contract with B to do work for, or to supply goods or services to, B in return for the payment by B, and

(ii) At some stage before A has completely performed his obligations under the contract B has reason to doubt whether A will, or be able to, complete his side of the bargain, and

(iii) B thereupon promises A an additional payment or other concession (such as reducing A's original obligation) in return for A's promise to perform this contractual obligation at the time, and

(iv) (a) As a result of giving his promise B obtains in practice a benefit, or obviates a disbenefit provided that A's performance, having regard to what has been so obtained, is capable of being viewed by B as worth more to B than any likely remedy against A (allowing for any defences or cross-claims), taking into account the cost to B of any such payment or concession to obtain greater assurance of A's performance, or

(b) as a result of giving his promise, A suffers a detriment (or obviates a benefit) provided that A is thereby foregoing the opportunity of not performing the original contract, in circumstances where such non-performance, taking into account B's likely remedy against A (and allowing for any defences or cross-claims) is capable of being viewed by A as worth more to A than performing that contract, in the absence of B's promised payment or concession to A.

(v) B's promise is not given as a result of economic duress or fraud or undue influence or unconscionable conduct on the part of A nor is it induced as a result of unfair pressure on the part of A, having regard to the circumstances, then,

(vi) The benefit to B or the detriment to A is capable of being consideration for B's promise, so that the promise will be legally binding.

Application of Williams v Roffey to present circumstances

[4.130] … [748] Thus I find that the particular practical benefit here, was that the lessor had greater assurance of the lessees staying in occupation and maintaining viability and capacity to perform by reason of their reduction in their rent, notwithstanding the introduction of a major, much larger competing tenant. [749]

The practical detriment to the lessees lay in risking their capacity to survive against a much stronger competitor, by staying in occupancy under their lease, rather than walking away at the cost of damages, if the lessees' defences, including under the Contracts Review Act 1980, were unsuccessful ….

As to element (iv) which, in its proviso, is designed to eliminate "wholly" gratuitous promises, there is evidence before me that the plaintiffs' goodwill was at risk of destruction by the introduction of the much stronger competitor on a concessional basis, unless the rent reduction were forthcoming. That makes it a proper inference for me to draw that there was indeed a sufficient practical benefit, procured by maintaining the plaintiffs as viable tenants on the promise of reduced rental. This is compared to the evidently less attractive alternative of finding another tenant and suing for any rent shortfall, particularly where the lessees might plead a number of foreshadowed defences and cross-claims.

Re Selectmove

[4.135] Re Selectmove Ltd [1995] 1 WLR 474 (Court of Appeal).

GIBSON LJ: [481] [I]f the principle of Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 QB 1 is to be extended to an obligation to make payment, it would in effect leave the principle in Foakes v Beer, 9 App Cas 605 without any application. When a creditor and a debtor who are at arm's length reach agreement on the payment of the debt by instalments to accommodate the debtor, the creditor will no doubt always see a practical benefit to himself in so doing. In the absence of authority there would be much to be said for the enforceability of such a contract. But that was a matter expressly considered in Foakes v Beer yet held not to constitute good consideration in law. Foakes v Beer was not even referred to in Williams v Roffey Bros & Nicholls (Contractors) Ltd [1991] 1 QB 1, and it is in my judgment impossible, consistently with the doctrine of precedent, for this court to extend the principle of Williams's case to any circumstances governed by the principle of Foakes v Beer, 9 App Cas 605. If that extension is to be made, it must be by the House of Lords or, perhaps even more appropriately, by Parliament after consideration by the Law Commission.

1. In Collier v P & MJ Wright (Holdings) Ltd [2007] EWCA Civ 1329, the English Court of Appeal affirmed the position adopted in Re Selectmove Ltd [1995] 1 WLR 474 but accepted that its effect may be substantially undermined by the doctrine of promissory estoppel.
2. As the extracts at [4.115]–[4.135] indicate, the problems of contract modification and the acceptance of part payment of a debt in full satisfaction also raise the application of the doctrines of economic duress (see Pao On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] AC 614 at [4.150] and North Ocean Shipping Co Ltd v Hyundai Construction Co Ltd [1979] QB 705) and promissory estoppel (see Chapter 9, especially Je Maintiendrai Pty Ltd v Quaglia (1980) 26 SASR 101 at [9.10]).

Duty owed to a third party

[4.145] A promise to perform an act which the promisor is under an existing duty to a third party to perform may constitute good consideration. For example, consideration may be found in A's promise to B to perform a duty which A is already contractually obliged to perform for C.

Pao On v Lau Yiu Long

[4.150] Pao On v Lau Yiu Long [1980] AC 614 (Privy Council) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of Hong Kong.

[FACTS: On 27 February 1973, the plaintiffs agreed (the main agreement) to sell to Fu Chip Investment Co Ltd (Fu Chip) the whole of the issued capital in Tsuen Wan Shing On Estate Co Ltd (Shing On). The price payable was $HK10.5 million which was to be met by an allotment of 4.2 million ordinary shares of $HK1 each in Fu Chip of which the defendants were majority shareholders. For the purposes of the agreement, one Fu Chip share was deemed to be worth $HK2.50.

So that the market in Fu Chip shares might not be unduly depressed by a sale by the plaintiffs of their allotment, under cl 4(k) of the main agreement, the plaintiffs agreed not to sell 60 per cent of their allotment of shares in Fu Chip before the end of April 1974.

In view of this restriction, the plaintiffs required some protection should the price of Fu Chip shares fall during the period in which they were unable to sell. Accordingly, a second agreement (the subsidiary agreement) was entered into by which the plaintiffs agreed to sell to the defendants on or before 30 April 1974 at a price of $HK2.50 per share, 2.5 million shares in Fu Chip, this being 60 per cent of the plaintiffs' total allotment.

Although this arrangement protected the plaintiffs from loss, it also effectively prevented them from realising any profit on 60 per cent of their holding in Fu Chip should the price rise above $HK2.50 as, indeed, was generally expected. On realising what they had done, the plaintiffs refused to proceed with the main agreement unless the subsidiary agreement was cancelled and replaced by a guarantee by way of indemnity.

The defendants considered bringing action against the plaintiffs for specific performance of the main agreement, but in view of the fact that the takeover of Shing On had already been announced, and certain other business considerations, they agreed to cancel the subsidiary agreement and give the requested guarantee.

The guarantee did not require the plaintiffs to sell their shares to the defendants at $HK2.50 per share but guaranteed that each share in the 60 per cent portion of their holding would be worth $HK2.50 immediately after 30 April 1974 and further indemnified them against any loss which they might sustain should the market price fall below that figure. The guarantee further provided that if the defendants were in fact called upon to indemnify the plaintiffs, the defendants would have the option of buying the 60 per cent portion for $HK6.3 million, that is $HK2.50 per share. Under this arrangement, the plaintiffs were guaranteed a minimum of $HK2.50 per share but might receive more if the market value of Fu Chip shares rose above that figure after 30 April 1974.

By 30 April 1974, Fu Chip shares had fallen to 36 cents and the plaintiffs sought to rely on the indemnity. The defendants refused to indemnify them. The plaintiffs successfully brought an action on the indemnity, but this decision was reversed on appeal. The plaintiffs appealed to the Privy Council.]

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD SCARMAN:

The first question

[628] The first question is whether upon its true construction the written guarantee of 4 May 1973, states a consideration sufficient in law to support the defendants' promise of indemnity against a fall in value of the Fu Chip shares. The instrument is, so far as relevant, in these terms: Re: Tsuen Wan Shing On Estate Co Ltd.

> In consideration of your having at our request agreed to sell all of your shares of and in the abovementioned company … for the consideration of $10.5 million by the allotment of 4.2 million ordinary shares of $1 each in Fu Chip Investment Co Ltd … and that the market value for the said ordinary shares of the said Fu Chip Investment Co Ltd shall be deemed as $2.50 for each of $1 share under an agreement for sale and purchase made between the parties thereto and dated 27 February 1973, we Lau Yiu Long … and Benjamin Lau Kam Ching … [629] the directors of the said Fu Chip Investment Co Ltd hereby agree and guarantee the closing market value for 2 520 000 shares (being 60 per cent of the said 4.2 million ordinary shares) of the Fu Chip Investment Co Ltd shall be at $2.50 per share and that the total value of 2 520 000 shares shall be of the sum of $6.3 million on the following marketing date immediately after 30 April 1974, and we further agree to indemnify and keep you indemnified against any damages, losses and other expenses which you may incur or sustain in the event of the closing market price for the shares of Fu Chip Investment Co Ltd according to the Far East Exchange Ltd, shall fall short of the sum of $2.50 during the said following marketing date immediately after 30 April 1974, provided always that if we were called upon to indemnify you for the discrepancy between the market value and the said total value of $6.3 million we shall have the option of buying from you the said 2 520 000 shares of Fu Chip Investment Co Ltd at the price of $6.3 million.

Mr Neill, counsel for the plaintiffs … contends that the consideration stated in the agreement is not in reality a past one. It is to be noted that the consideration was not on 4 May 1973, a matter of history only. The instrument by its reference to the main agreement with Fu Chip incorporates as part of the stated consideration the plaintiffs' three promises to Fu Chip: to complete the sale of Shing On, to accept shares as the price for the sale, and not to sell 60 per cent of the shares so accepted before 30 April 1974. Thus, on 4 May 1973, the performance of the main agreement still lay in the future. Performance of these promises was of great importance to the defendants, and it is undeniable that, as the instrument declares, the promises were made to Fu Chip at the request of the defendants. It is equally clear that the instrument also includes a promise by the plaintiffs to the defendants to fulfil their earlier promises given to Fu Chip.

The Board agrees with Mr Neill's submission that the consideration expressly stated in the written guarantee is sufficient in law to support the defendants' promise of indemnity. An act done before the giving of a promise to make a payment or to confer some other benefit can sometimes be consideration for the promise. The act must have been done at the promisors' request: the parties must have understood that the act was to be remunerated either by a payment or the conferment of some other benefit: and payment, or the conferment of a benefit, must have been legally enforceable had it been promised in advance. All three features are present in this case. The promise given to Fu Chip under the main agreement not to sell the shares for a year was at the first defendant's request. The parties understood at the time of the main agreement that the restriction on selling must be compensated for by the benefit of a guarantee against a drop in price: and such a guarantee would be legally enforceable. The agreed cancellation of the subsidiary [630] agreement left, as the parties knew, the plaintiffs unprotected in a respect in which at the time of the main agreement all were agreed they should be protected.

Mr Neill's submission is based on Lampleigh v Brathwait (1615) Hobart 105; 80 ER 255. In that case the judges said (at 106):

> First … a meer voluntary courtesie will not have a consideration to uphold an assumpsit. But if that courtesie were moved by a suit or request of the party that gives the assumpsit, it will bind, for the promise, though it follows, yet it is not naked, but couples it self with the suit before, and the merits of the party procured by that suit, which is the difference.

The modern statement of the law is in the judgment of Bowen LJ in Re Casey's Patents [1892] 1 Ch 104 at 115–16; Bowen LJ said:

> Even if it were true, as some scientific students of law believe, that a past service cannot support a future promise, you must look at the document and see if the promise cannot receive a proper effect in some other way. Now, the fact of a past service raises an implication that at the time it was rendered it was to be paid for, and, if it was a service which was to be paid for, when you get in the subsequent document a promise to pay, that promise may be treated either as an admission which evidences or as a positive bargain which fixes the amount of that reasonable remuneration on the faith of which the service was originally rendered. So that here for past services there is ample justification for the promise to give the third share.

Conferring a benefit is, of course, an equivalent to payment.

Mr Leggatt, for the defendants, does not dispute the existence of the rule but challenges its application to the facts of this case. He submits that it is not a necessary inference or implication from the terms of the written guarantee that any benefit or protection was to be given to the plaintiffs for their acceptance of the restriction on selling their shares. Their Lordships agree that the mere existence or recital of a prior request is not sufficient in itself to convert what is prima facie past consideration into sufficient consideration in law to support a promise: as they have indicated, it is only the first of three necessary preconditions. As for the second of those preconditions, whether the act done at the request of the promisor raises an implication of promised remuneration or other return is simply one of the construction of the words of the contract in the circumstances of its making. Once it is recognised, as the Board considers it inevitably must be, that the expressed consideration includes a reference to the plaintiffs' promise not to sell the shares before 30 April 1974 — a promise to be performed in the future, though given in the past — it is not possible to treat the defendants' promise of indemnity as independent of the plaintiffs' antecedent prom-[631]ise, given at the first defendant's request, not to sell. The promise of indemnity was given because at the time of the main agreement the parties intended that the first defendant should confer upon the plaintiffs the benefit of his protection against a fall in price. When the subsidiary agreement was cancelled, all were well aware that the plaintiffs were still to have the benefit of his protection as consideration for the restriction on selling. It matters not whether the indemnity thus given be regarded as the best evidence of the benefit intended to be conferred in return for the promise not to sell, or as the positive bargain which fixes the benefit on the faith of which the promise was given — though where, as here, the subject is a written contract, the better analysis is probably that of the "positive bargain". Their Lordships, therefore, accept the submission that the contract itself states a valid consideration for the promise of indemnity.

This being their Lordships' conclusion, it is necessary [sic – it seems that this should be unnecessary] to consider Mr Neill's further submission … that the option given the defendants, if called upon to fulfil their indemnity, to buy back the shares at $2.50 a share was itself a sufficient consideration for the promise of indemnity. But their Lordships see great force in the contention. The defendants promised to indemnify the plaintiffs if the market price of Fu Chip shares fell below $2.50. However, in the event of the defendants being called on to implement this promise they were given an option to take up the shares themselves at $2.50. This on the face of it imposes on the plaintiffs in the circumstances envisaged an obligation to transfer the shares to the defendants at the price of $2.50 if called on to do so. The concomitant benefit to the defendants could be a real one — for example, if they thought that the market, after a temporary setback, would recover to a price above $2.50. The fact that the option is stated in the form of a proviso does not preclude it being a contractual term or one under which consideration moves.

The second question

[4.155] There is no doubt — and it was not challenged — that extrinsic evidence is admissible to prove the real consideration where:

(1) no consideration, or a nominal consideration, is expressed in the instrument; or

(2) the expressed consideration is in general terms or ambiguously stated; or

(3) substantial consideration is stated, but an additional consideration exists.

The additional consideration must not, however, be inconsistent with the terms of the written instrument. Extrinsic evidence is also admissible to prove the illegality of the consideration. In their Lordships' opinion the law is correctly stated in Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed, 1975), vol 12, para 1487. The extrinsic evidence in this case shows that the consideration for the promise of indemnity, while it included the cancellation of the subsidiary agreement, was primarily the promise given by the plaintiffs to the defendants, to perform their contract with Fu Chip, which included the undertaking not to sell 60 per cent of the shares allotted to them before 30 April 1974. Thus the real consideration for [632] the indemnity was the promise to perform, or the performance of, the plaintiffs pre-existing contractual obligations to Fu Chip. This promise was perfectly consistent with the consideration stated in the guarantee. Indeed, it reinforces it by imposing upon the plaintiffs an obligation now owed to the defendants to do what, at the first defendant's request, they had agreed with Fu Chip to do.

Their Lordships do not doubt that a promise to perform, or the performance of, a pre-existing contractual obligation to a third party can be valid consideration. In New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v AM Satterthwaite & Co Ltd (The Eurymedon) [1975] AC 154 at 168, the rule and the reason for the rule were stated:

> An agreement to do an act which the promisor is under an existing obligation to a third party to do, may quite well amount to valid consideration … the promisee obtains the benefit of a direct obligation …. This proposition is illustrated and supported by Scotson v Pegg (1861) 6 H & N 295; 158 ER 121, which their Lordships consider to be good law.

Unless, therefore the guarantee was void as having been made for an illegal consideration or voidable on the ground of economic duress, the extrinsic evidence establishes that it was supported by valid consideration. Mr Leggatt for the defendants submits that the consideration is illegal as being against public policy. He submits that to secure a party's promise by a threat of repudiation of a pre-existing contractual obligation owed to another can be, and in the circumstances of this case was, an abuse of a dominant bargaining position and so contrary to public policy. This, he submits, is so even though economic duress cannot be proved. This submission found favour with the majority in the Court of Appeal. Their Lordships, however, consider it misconceived. Reliance was placed on the old "seaman" cases of Harris v Watson (1791) Peake 102; 170 ER 94, NP, and Stilk v Meyrick (1809) 6 Esp 129; 170 ER 851; 2 Camp 317; 170 ER 1168. Counsel also referred to certain developments in American law, which are to be found described in two leading works, Corbin on Contracts (1950) and Williston on Contracts (3rd ed, 1975) … Their Lordships would make one general observation on what is revealed by these two distinguished American works. Where some judges speak of public policy, others speak of economic duress. No clear line of distinction between the two concepts emerges as settled in the American law.

In the seaman cases there were only two parties — the seaman and the captain (representing the owner). In Harris v Watson the captain during the voyage, for which the plaintiff had contracted to serve as a seaman, promised him 5 guineas over and above his common wages if he would perform some extra work. Lord Kenyon thought (at 103) that if the seaman's claim to be paid 5 guineas was supported "it would materially affect the navigation of this kingdom". He feared the prospect of seamen in times of danger insisting "on an extra charge on such a promise", and non-suited the plaintiff. In Stilk v [633] Meyrick, Lord Ellenborough CJ also non-suited the seaman. According to the report in 2 Camp 317, 319, he said:

> I think Harris v Watson was rightly decided; but I doubt whether the ground of public policy, upon which Lord Kenyon is stated to have proceeded, be the true principle on which the decision is to be supported. Here, I say the agreement is void for want of consideration.

Espinasse, who appeared as junior counsel for the unsuccessful plaintiff in the case, reports the case somewhat differently. He reports (6 Esp 129 at 130) Lord Ellenborough CJ as saying that: "he recognised the principle of the case of Harris v Watson as founded on just and proper policy".

But the report continues: "When the defendant [sic – but surely the plaintiff is meant?] entered on board the ship, he stipulated to do all the work his situation called upon him to do."

These cases, explicable as they are upon the basis of an absence of fresh consideration for the captain's promise, are an unsure foundation for a rule of public policy invalidating contracts where, save for the rule, there would be valid consideration.

When one turns to consider cases where a pre-existing duty imposed by law is alleged to be valid consideration for a promise, one finds cases in which public policy has been held to invalidate the consideration. A promise to pay a sheriff in consideration of his performing his legal duty, a promise to pay for discharge from illegal arrest, are to be found in the books as promises which the law will not enforce. Yet such cases are also explicable upon the ground that a person who promises to perform, or performs, a duty imposed by law provides no consideration. In cases where the discharge of a duty imposed by law has been treated as valid consideration, the courts have usually (but not invariably) found an act over and above, but consistent with, the duty imposed by law: see Williams v Williams [1957] 1 WLR 148. It must be conceded that different judges have adopted differing approaches to such cases: contrast, for example, Denning LJ at 149 et seq with the view of the majority in Williams' case. But, where the pre-existing obligation is a contractual duty owed to a third party, some other ground of public policy must be relied on to invalidate the consideration (if otherwise legal); the defendants submit that the ground can be extortion by the abuse of a dominant bargaining position to threaten the repudiation of a contractual obligation. It is this application of public policy which Mr Leggatt submits has been developed in the American cases. Beginning with the general rule that "neither the performance of duty nor the promise to render a performance already required by duty is a sufficient consideration" the courts have (according to Corbin on Contracts, vol 1, s 171) advanced to the view: "that the moral and economic elements in any case that involves the rule should be weighed by the court, and that the fact of pre-existing legal duty should not be in itself decisive".

[634] The American Law Institute in its Restatement of the Law, Contracts (ch 3, s 84(d)), has declared that performance (or promise of performance) of a contractual duty owed to a third person is sufficient consideration. This view (which accords with the statement of our law in New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v A M Satterthwaite & Co Ltd) appears to be generally accepted but only in cases where there is no suggestion of unfair economic pressure exerted to induce the making of what Corbin on Contracts calls "the return promise".

Their Lordships' knowledge of this developing branch of American law is necessarily limited. In their judgment it would be carrying audacity to the point of foolhardiness for them to attempt to extract from the American case law a principle to provide an answer to the question now under consideration. That question, their Lordships repeat is whether, in a case where duress is not established, public policy may nevertheless invalidate the consideration if there has been a threat to repudiate a pre-existing contractual obligation or an unfair use of a dominating bargaining position. Their Lordships' conclusion is that where businessmen are negotiating at arm's length it is unnecessary for the achievement of justice, and unhelpful in the development of the law, to invoke such a rule of public policy. It would also create unacceptable anomaly. It is unnecessary because justice requires that men, who have negotiated at arm's length, be held to their bargains unless it can be shown that their consent was vitiated by fraud, mistake or duress. If a promise is induced by coercion of a man's will, the doctrine of duress suffices to do justice. The party coerced, if he chooses and acts in time, can avoid the contract. If there is no coercion, there can be no reason for avoiding the contract where there is shown to be a real consideration which is otherwise legal.

Such a rule of public policy as is now being considered would be unhelpful because it would render the law uncertain. It would become a question of fact and degree to determine in each case whether there had been, short of duress, an unfair use of a strong bargaining position. It would create anomaly because, if public policy invalidates the consideration, the effect is to make the contract void. But unless the facts are such as to support a plea of "non est factum", which is not suggested in this case, duress does no more than confer upon the victim the opportunity, if taken in time, to avoid the contract. It would be strange if conduct less than duress could render a contract void, whereas duress does no more than render a contract voidable. Indeed, it is the defendants' case in this appeal that such an anomaly is the correct result. Their case is that the plaintiffs, having lost by cancellation the safeguard of the subsidiary agreement, are without the safeguard of the guarantee because its consideration is contrary to public policy, and that they are debarred from restoration to their position under the subsidiary agreement because the guarantee is void, not voidable. The logical consequence of Mr Leggatt's submission is that the safeguard which all were at all times agreed the plaintiffs should have — the safeguard against fall in value of the shares — has been lost by the application of [635] a rule of public policy. The law is not, in their Lordships' judgment, reduced to countenancing such stark injustice: nor is it necessary, when one bears in mind the protection offered otherwise by the law to one who contracts in ignorance of what he is doing or under duress. Accordingly, the submission that the additional consideration established by the extrinsic evidence is invalid on the ground of public policy is rejected.

The third question

[4.160] [635] Duress, whatever form it takes, is a coercion of the will so as to vitiate consent. Their Lordships agree with the observation of Kerr J in Occidental Worldwide Investment Corp v Skibs A/S Avanti [1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep 293 at 336 that in a contractual situation commercial pressure is not enough. There must be present some factor "which could in law be regarded as a coercion of his will so as to vitiate his consent". This conception is in line with what was said in this Board's decision in Barton v Armstrong [1976] AC 104 at 121 by Lord Wilberforce and Lord Simon of Glaisdale — observations with which the majority judgment appears to be in agreement. In determining whether there was a coercion of will such that there was no true consent, it is material to inquire whether the person alleged to have been coerced did or did not protest; whether, at the time he was allegedly coerced into making the contract, he did or did not have an alternative course open to him such as an adequate legal remedy; whether he was independently advised; and whether after entering the contract he took steps to avoid it. All these matters are, as was recognised in Maskell v Horner [1915] 3 KB 106, relevant in determining whether he acted voluntarily or not.

In the present case there is unanimity amongst the judges below that there was no coercion of the first defendant's will. In the Court of Appeal the trial judge's finding (already quoted) that the first defendant considered the matter thoroughly, chose to avoid litigation, and formed the opinion that the risk in giving the guarantee was more apparent than real was upheld. In short, there was commercial pressure, but no coercion. Even if this Board was disposed, which it is not, to take a different view, it would not substitute its opinion for that of the judges below on this question of fact.

It is, therefore, unnecessary for the Board to embark upon an inquiry into the question whether English law recognises a category of duress known as "economic duress". But, since the question has been fully argued in this appeal, their Lordships will indicate very briefly the view which they have formed. At common law money paid under economic compulsion could be recovered in an action for money had and received: Astley v Reynolds (1731) 2 Str 915; 93 ER 939. The compulsion had to be such that the party was deprived of "his freedom of exercising his will": see at 916. It is doubtful, however, whether at common law any duress other than duress to the person sufficed to render a contract voidable: see Blackstone's Commentaries (12th ed), Book 1, pp 130–1 and Skeate v Beale (1841) 11 Ad & E 983; 113 ER 688. American law (Williston on Contracts (3rd ed)) now recognises that a contract may be avoided on the [636] ground of economic duress. The commercial pressure alleged to constitute such duress must, however, be such that the victim must have entered the contract against his will, must have had no alternative course open to him, and must have been confronted with coercive acts by the party exerting the pressure: Williston on Contracts (3rd ed, 1970), vol 13 s 1603. American judges pay great attention to such evidential matters as the effectiveness of the alternative remedy available, the fact or absence of protest, the availability of independent advice, the benefit received, and the speed with which the victim has sought to avoid the contract. Recently two English judges have recognised that commercial pressure may constitute duress the pressure of which can render a contract voidable: Kerr J in Occidental Worldwide Investment Corp v Skibs A/S Avanti

[1976] 1 Lloyd's Rep 293 and Mocatta J in North Ocean Shipping Co Ltd v Hyundai Construction Co Ltd [1979] QB 705. Both stressed that the pressure must be such that the victim's consent to the contract was not a voluntary act on his part. In their Lordships' view, there is nothing contrary to principle in recognising economic duress as a factor which may render a contract voidable, provided always that the basis of such recognition is that it must amount to a coercion of will, which vitiates consent. It must be shown that the payment made or the contract entered into was not a voluntary act.

For these reasons their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the appeal be allowed …

Appeal allowed.

Bona fide compromise

Wigan v Edwards

[4.170] Wigan v Edwards (1973) 47 ALJR 586 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: Mr and Mrs Edwards (the respondents) agreed to purchase a house from Wigan (the builder, appellant, promisor) under the terms of a contract dated 15 April 1969. The contract contained no express term that the house had been constructed in a good and businesslike manner nor that it was free from structural defects, nor any other term relating to quality. Nonetheless, shortly after the contract was signed, the Edwards had discussions with Wigan in relation to certain features of the house and gave him a list of matters which they said required attention before they would complete the transaction. Wigan agreed to remedy certain defects, and on 22 April 1969, he signed a document in which he promised to remedy the minor defects listed therein and "any major faults in construction five years from purchase date I will repair". Subsequently the appellant failed to remedy the minor defects and also a major fault which was discovered in the concrete slab. The Edwards sued Wigan in the District Court of Queensland and obtained judgment for $6,000. An appeal to the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Queensland was dismissed. One of the points argued on behalf of Wigan on appeal to the High Court of Australia was that there was no consideration for the promises contained in the document dated 22 April.]

MASON J: [594] The first question which arises is whether there was valuable consideration for the appellant's promise of 22 April 1969. The general rule is that a promise to perform an existing duty is no consideration, at least when the promise is made by a party to a pre-existing contract, when it is made to the promisee under that contract, and it is to do no more than the promisor is bound to do under the contract. The rule expresses the concept that the new promise, indistinguishable from the old, is an illusory consideration. And it gives no comfort to a party who by merely threatening a breach of contract seeks to secure an additional contractual benefit from the other party on the footing that the first party's new promise of performance will provide sufficient consideration for that benefit.

An important qualification to the general principle is that a promise to do precisely what the promisor [595] is already bound to do is a sufficient consideration, when it is given by way of a bona fide compromise of a disputed claim, the promisor having asserted that he is not bound to perform the obligation under the pre-existing contract or that he has a cause of action under that contract. The qualification recognises that for the court itself to examine and determine the correctness of the promisor's claim would be a pointless exercise when the new bargain indicates that the promisee regarded the fresh promise as a benefit, presumably viewing the promise of performance as more advantageous than the remedies available to him for breach of contract. But the law, by insisting that the claim in dispute is one which was honestly or bona fide made, prevents the qualification from assisting the party who would seek to gain an unfair advantage by threatening unscrupulously to withhold performance under a contract.

It is no objection to the existence of a bona fide compromise of a dispute that the court considers that the claim made by the promisor that he was not bound under the former contract would not have succeeded had the issue been litigated: Callisher v Bischoffsheim (1870) LR 5 QB 449; Miles v New Zealand Alford Estate Co (1886) 32 Ch D 266. But it is perhaps open to question whether a bona fide compromise of a dispute is sufficiently established by showing that the promisor honestly believed that his claim was well founded. It has been said that it must also be shown that the claim was not vexatious or frivolous. In Miles v New Zealand Alford Estate Co Bowen LJ (at 291–2) expressed himself in favour of the second formulation, whereas in the same case Cotton LJ (at 283–4) and Fry LJ (at 297–8) expressed themselves more obliquely. However, as I understand their observations, they are not inconsistent with what Bowen LJ had to say. In many courts in the United States a similar test to that adopted by Bowen LJ has been adopted. Williston on Contracts (3rd ed), s 135B states: "In many jurisdictions the tendency is to make the test the honesty of the claimant, provided the invalidity of the claim in law or in fact is not entirely obvious." Even so, according to the author, the forbearance is insufficient consideration "if the claim forborne is so lacking in any foundation as to make its assertion incompatible with both honesty and a reasonable degree of intelligence".

The different expressions of the principle do not reflect an important conceptual difference. There will be few cases involving an honest or bona fide belief in a claim which is vexatious or frivolous. In this case it is unnecessary to choose between the competing formulations, for in my view the more stringent test, that favoured by Bowen LJ in Miles' case is satisfied.

The judge found that the respondents honestly believed that, having regard to the defective condition of the house, they were not bound to complete. In my opinion his Honour was correct in so finding. Although it is my view that the majority of the defects on which the respondents relied would not have justified a refusal to complete the contract, there were many defects. In addition, the water had not been connected and the fence had not been erected. In these circumstances the respondents' claim that they would not complete cannot be described as a frivolous or vexatious claim.

The respondents merely asserted that they would not complete until the matters of which they complained were set right. They did not threaten to bring an action or to defend a suit for specific performance. However, a threat to bring an action or enter a defence is not an essential element of a bona fide compromise; it is enough if there is a claim (of the kind already discussed) that the contracting party is not bound to perform the contract. Clearly the respondents' claim was of this kind. Accordingly, in my view there was valuable consideration to support the agreement of 22 April 1969.

In expressing this conclusion I am mindful that the appellant's promise to repair major defects in five years incorporated in the document of 22 April 1969 was volunteered by him and was given after he had acceded to the respondents' demand that the list of defects should be remedied. Though volunteered by the appellant after he had acceded to the initial request, the additional promise should be regarded as an element of the bargain reached by the parties …

[On this point, WALSH AND GIBBS JJ agreed with the reasoning of Mason J. MENZIES J and McTIERNAN ACJ reached the same conclusion.]

Proposals for reform

Sixth Interim Report

[4.175] United Kingdom Law Revision Committee, Sixth Interim Report (CMD 5449, 1937).

[50] It may be convenient to summarise our recommendations which are as follows:

(2) That an agreement shall be enforceable if the promise or offer has been made in writing by the promisor or his agent, or if it be supported by valuable consideration past or present.

(3) That an agreement to accept a lesser sum in discharge of an enforceable obligation to pay a larger sum shall be deemed to have been made for valuable consideration, but if the new agreement is not performed then the original obligation shall revive.

(4) That an agreement in which one party makes a promise in consideration of the other party doing or promising to do something which he is already bound to do by law, or by a contract made either with the other party or with a third party, shall be deemed to have been made for valuable consideration.

(5) That a promise shall be enforceable by the promisee though the consideration is given by or to a third party.

(6) That an agreement to keep an offer open for a definite period of time or until the occurrence of some specified event shall not be unenforceable by reason of the absence of consideration.

(7) That a promise made in consideration of the promisee performing an act shall constitute a contract as soon as the promisee has entered upon performance of the act, unless the promise includes expressly or by implication a term that it can be revoked before the act has been completed.

(8) That a promise which the promisor knows, or reasonably should know, will be relied on by the promisee shall be enforceable if the promisee has altered his position to his detriment in reliance on the promise.

(9) That where a contract by its express terms purports to confer a benefit directly on a third party, it shall be enforceable by the third party in his own name subject to any defences that would have been valid between the contracting parties. Unless the contract otherwise provides, it may be cancelled by the mutual consent of the contracting parties at any time before the third party has adopted it either expressly or by conduct.

[5.05] The third element of contract formation is that the parties must manifest an intention to create legal relations. There are several situations in which parties may reach a clear and certain agreement that satisfies the consideration requirement, but may not be intended to create legal relations:

1. Where an agreement is made in a commercial context, a question may arise whether the parties intend to make an honourable, rather than legal commitment.
2. The issue may arise in a social or domestic context. An agreement to help a friend to move some furniture in return for dinner involves an exchange of promises, but is clearly not intended to be legally binding. An agreement relating to more substantial matters, such as employment or the sale of valuable property, may be intended to attract legal consequences even when it is made with a close relative.
3. An issue of intention to contract may arise where an agreement is made between a government and an individual. The implementation of government policy may, for example, lead a government to reach an agreement with a particular individual to provide some assistance. The fact that the individual is providing something in return for that assistance does not necessarily mean that the parties intend to make a contract.
4. Where parties reach a preliminary agreement, the question may arise whether the parties intend to be bound immediately, or not until some time in the future when the parties have finalised some outstanding issues or recorded their agreement in a more formal manner.

The intention to create legal relations requirement has often been approached on the basis that certain types of agreements are presumed to be intended to be binding, while others are presumed not to be made with such an intention. It is said that parties to commercial agreements are presumed to intend legal consequences, while parties to social or domestic agreements are presumed not to intend legal consequences. Such presumptions determine who bears the onus of proof. A person denying the enforceability of a commercial agreement has been said to bear the onus of proving that the parties did not intend legal consequences. A person seeking to enforce a social or domestic agreement is said to bear the onus of proving that it was intended to be binding. The decision of the High Court in Ermogenous v Greek Orthodox Community of SA Inc [2002] HCA 8; (2002) 209 CLR 95 (extracted at [5.10]) suggests that considerable caution should be exercised in using presumptions to determine whether the intention to create legal relations requirement is satisfied. It has even been said that the court in Ermogenous "rejected the use of presumptions as a basis for ascertaining whether parties intended to enter into contractual relations": Evans v Secretary, Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs [2012] FCAFC 81, [12].

The objective nature of the inquiry as to intention and the circumstances that should be taken into account were clearly articulated in the joint judgment of Gaudron, McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ in Ermogenous v Greek Orthodox Community of SA Inc. The admissibility and relevance of evidence as to the actual intentions of the parties were considered by the New South Wales Court of Appeal in Air Great Lakes Pty Ltd v KS Easter (Holdings) Pty Ltd (1985) 2 NSWLR 309. A good illustration of the application of these principles is Shahid v Australasian College of Dermatologists [2008] FCAFC 72; (2008) 168 FCR 46.

PRESUMPTIONS

Ermogenous v Greek Orthodox Community of SA

[5.10] Ermogenous v Greek Orthodox Community of SA Inc [2002] HCA 8; (2002) 209 CLR 95 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia.

[FACTS: The appellant served as the Archbishop of the autocephalous Greek Orthodox Church in Australia for more than 23 years. He claimed that he had been employed by the respondent to serve in that position. After he resigned from the position, the Archbishop claimed that the respondent owed him certain sums of money in respect of accumulated annual leave and long service leave entitlements. He could only claim those payments if he was an employee of the respondent. The respondent was a community organisation founded to foster Greek culture as well as the Greek Orthodox faith. It organised cultural, sporting and social activity, built churches and recruited and paid consecrated clergy. The respondent recruited the appellant to the position of Archbishop, paid him a salary or stipend during his period of service and treated him as an employee, reserving the right to control the way in which he discharged his duties. An industrial magistrate found that he was an employee of the respondent and was therefore entitled to the payments. The Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia (by majority) allowed an appeal on the basis that the parties had not intended to create legal relations. The Archbishop appealed to the High Court.]

GAUDRON, McHUGH, HAYNE and CALLINAN JJ: [103] Both members of the majority in the Full Court of the Supreme Court (Doyle CJ and Bleby J) took, as their stated starting point, the proposition that an intention to enter a contractual relationship about the remuneration and maintenance and support of a minister of religion is not to be presumed ((2000) 77 SASR 523 at 524–5 [4] per Doyle CJ, 575–6 [207] per Bleby J). This proposition was said to find its origin, or at least its support, in several decisions in the United Kingdom … and one Australian decision (Knowles v Anglican Church Property Trust, Diocese of Bathurst (1999) 89 IR 47 a decision of the Industrial Relations Commission of New South Wales). Both Doyle CJ (2000) 77 SASR 523 at 529 [19]–[20] and Bleby J (2000) 77 SASR 523 at 577-578 [212] concluded that the Industrial Magistrate had not considered, as a distinct issue, whether the parties had intended to enter a legally binding relationship. Their Honours then proceeded to consider whether there had been such an intention and concluded that there had not …

Intention to create contractual relations

[5.15] [105] "It is of the essence of contract, regarded as a class of obligations, that there is a voluntary assumption of a legally enforceable duty" (Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424 at 457 per Dixon CJ, Williams, Webb, Fullagar and Kitto JJ). To be a legally enforceable duty there must, of course, be identifiable parties to the arrangement, the terms of the arrangement must be certain, and, unless recorded as a deed, there must generally be real consideration for the agreement. Yet "[t]he circumstances may show that [the parties] did not intend, or cannot be regarded as having intended, to subject their agreement to the adjudication of the courts" (South Australia v Commonwealth (1962) 108 CLR 130 at 154 per Windeyer J).

Because the inquiry about this last aspect may take account of the subject-matter of the agreement, the status of the parties to it, their relationship to one another, and other surrounding circumstances (South Australia v Commonwealth (1962) 108 CLR 130 at 154; Placer Development Ltd v Commonwealth (1969) 121 CLR 353 at 367 per Windeyer J), not only is there obvious difficulty in formulating rules intended to prescribe the kinds of cases in which an intention to create contractual relations should, or should not, be found to exist, it would be wrong to do so. Because the search for the "intention to create contractual relations" requires an objective assessment of the state of affairs between the parties (Masters v Cameron (1954) 91 CLR 353 at 362 per Dixon CJ, McTiernan and Kitto JJ; ABC v XIVth Commonwealth Games Ltd (1988) 18 NSWLR 540 at 548–9 per Gleeson CJ) (as distinct from the identification of any uncommunicated subjective reservation or intention that either may harbour) the circumstances which might properly be taken into account in deciding whether there was the relevant intention are so varied as to preclude the formation of any prescriptive rules. Although the word "intention" is used in this context, it is used in the same sense as it is used in other contractual contexts. It describes what it is that would objectively be conveyed by what was said or done, having regard to [106] the circumstances in which those statements and actions happened (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337 at 348-353 per Mason J; Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council [2002] HCA 5; (2002) 240 CLR 45). It is not a search for the uncommunicated subjective motives or intentions of the parties.

In this context of intention to create legal relations there is frequent reference to "presumptions". It is said that it may be presumed that there are some "family arrangements" which are not intended to give rise to legal obligations and it was said in this case that it should not be presumed that there was an intention to create legal relations because it was a matter concerning the engagement of a minister of religion. For our part, we doubt the utility of using the language of presumptions in this context. At best, the use of that language does no more than invite attention to identifying the party who bears the onus of proof. In this case, where issue was joined about the existence of a legally binding contract between the parties, there could be no doubt that it was for the appellant to demonstrate that there was such a contract. Reference to presumptions may serve only to distract attention from that more basic and important proposition.

More importantly, the use of the language of presumptions may lead, as it did in this case, to treating one proposition (that an intention to create legal relations is not to be presumed) as equivalent to another, different proposition (that generally, or usually, or it is to be presumed that, an arrangement about remuneration of a minister of religion will not give rise to legally enforceable obligations). References to "the usual non-contractual status of a priest or minister" and factors which "generally militate against" a finding of intention to create legal relations (cf (2000) 77 SASR 523 at 576 [207] per Bleby J) illustrate the point. The latter proposition may then be understood as suggesting, in some way, that proof to the contrary is to be seen as particularly difficult and yet offer no guidance at all about how it may be done. Especially is that so when the chief factor said to justify the proposition that an intention to create legal relations must be proved (the essentially spiritual role of a minister of religion) is then put forward as the principal reason not to find that intention in a particular case, and any other matters suggesting that there may be an intention to create legal relations are treated as dealing only with "collateral" or "peripheral" aspects of the relationship between the parties ((2000) 77 SASR 523 at 576 [207] per Bleby J). In practice, the latter proposition may rapidly ossify into a rule of law, that there cannot be a contract of employment of a minister of religion, distorting the proper application of basic principles of the law of contract.

It is equally important to notice that the second form of proposition that we have identified may hide the making of some unwarranted [107] assumptions that certain principles and practices of church governance are "usual" or "general", or that a particular kind of relationship between clergy and the church or community in which they work is the norm. No such assumptions can be made.

It is convenient to turn now to examine some of the cases said to support the proposition that an intention to create legal relations about remuneration of a minister of religion is not to be presumed. As Bleby J pointed out (2000) 77 SASR 523 at 563 [173], it was held in most of the cases to which he referred that the minister of religion concerned was not employed under a contract of employment. The cases did not all take the same path to reach that conclusion and, on analysis, it can be seen that there are several different and distinct questions that were seen as determinative.

In the Curates Case, Parker J noted [1912] 2 Ch 563 at 568–70 that a curate in the Church of England owed duties to the vicar of the parish and to the bishop of the diocese, but his Lordship concluded that the authority which each had over the curate came not from some contractual relationship, it came from the fact that the curate held an office subject to the laws of the Church in which that office was held….

In other cases to which reference was made, both in argument and in the reasons of Bleby J, there was a real question about who would be the employer if there was a contract of employment. In Parfitt [1984] QB 368, a minister sued the President of the Methodist Conference because that person was nominated by statute to represent the Methodist Church in all legal proceedings [1984] QB 368 at 371 but the contract which he sought to establish was one to which it was said that the Church (an unincorporated body) was party …

[108] As was pointed out in Cameron v Hogan (1934) 51 CLR 358 at 371, there are at least two difficulties that arise if action is brought to enforce a contract said to have been made with an unincorporated body. First, there is difficulty in properly constituting the action by sufficiently identifying all the proper parties to the suit (difficulties that may not always be met by constituting the action as a representative proceeding). Secondly, there is the further difficulty ((1934) 51 CLR 358 at 372) of identifying who it is who is said to be responsible for the breach which is alleged. Are all members of the body to be said to be in breach of the contract; are only some to be [109] said to be in breach? These are not mere formal difficulties. They invite close attention to identifying the contract that is alleged to have been made and, in particular, the identification of its parties.

Similar but not identical problems in identifying who it is who is said to be the employer can be seen to be reflected in the decision in Diocese of Southwark v Coker [1998] ICR 140. The "Diocese of Southwark", initially named by Dr Coker as the respondent to his claim for unfair dismissal, was a description of the district under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Southwark…. It was the Bishop who had legal responsibility for licensing the appointment of assistant curates, and for the termination or revocation of such an appointment. But as Mummery LJ pointed out [1998] ICR 140 at 148, the Bishop could not be regarded as the employer:

> [T]hat relationship [between bishop and curate], cemented by the oath of canonical obedience, is governed by the law of the established church, which is part of the public law of England, and not by a negotiated, contractual arrangement.

Finally, reference must also be made to the statements, found in several cases, that the relationship between a minister of religion and a church is pre-eminently or even entirely spiritual, not contractual (Rogers v Booth [1937] 2 All ER 751 at 754 per Sir Wilfrid Greene MR; Lewery v Salvation Army in Canada (1993) 104 DLR (4th) 449 at 453).

[110] That the relationship between a minister of religion and the relevant religious body or group in which, and to which, he or she ministers is, at its root, concerned with matters spiritual is self-evidently true. That the minister's conduct as minister will at least be informed, if not wholly governed, by consideration of matters spiritual is likewise self-evident. It by no means follows, however, that it is impossible that the relationship between the minister and the body or group which seeks or receives that ministry will be governed by a contract, and the respondent in this appeal did not seek to advance any such absolute proposition. Rather, the respondent advanced the more limited proposition, adopted by Doyle CJ and Bleby J, that an intention to enter contractual relations is not to be presumed where the arrangement concerns the engagement of a minister of religion but must affirmatively be proved ((2000) 77 SASR 523 at 524 [4] per Doyle CJ, 576 [207], 584 [236] per Bleby J). Nevertheless, it is as well to identify some aspects of the more absolute proposition earlier identified – that the relationship between minister and church is pre-eminently or even entirely spiritual because, in the end, the conclusion at which the majority of the Full Court arrived, was that the only arrangement or relationship which the appellant had was with a church not the respondent, and was a spiritual, not a contractual relationship.

First, although the proposition that the relationship between minister and church is pre-eminently or even entirely spiritual is couched in apparently absolute terms, it has been recognised that there are aspects of that relationship which may give rise to legally enforceable rights and duties. As was pointed out in Davies [1986] 1 WLR 323 at 329 per Lord Templeman; [1986] 1 All ER 705 at 710:

> Until the applicant [in that case] was deprived of his pastorate in accordance with the procedures laid down in the book of rules, he was entitled to be paid his stipend out of the income of the sustentation fund and to occupy his manse. (emphasis added)

Secondly, the "essentially spiritual" character of the relationship may take on a different character when one of the parties to the arrangement (the putative employer) is not itself a spiritual body but is, as Staughton LJ said in Coker [1998] ICR 140 at 150, "a school, or a duke, or an airport authority" or, we would add, an incorporated body having the characteristics of the present respondent. To say that a minister of religion serves God and those to whom he or she ministers (Diocese of Southwark v Coker [1998] ICR 140 at 150 per Staughton LJ) may be right, but that is a description of the minister's spiritual duties. It leaves open the possibility that the minister has been engaged to do this under a contract of employment.

Against the background of this examination of some of the cases [111] relied on by the respondent, it is convenient to turn again to the facts of the present case.

The present case

[5.20] The Industrial Magistrate's finding that the appellant was employed by the respondent under a contract of employment proceeded from the premise of his unchallenged finding that the respondent (and other similar Australian bodies in the same tradition) had previously recruited and employed clergy who were, as we noted earlier, generally subject to the directions of the Communities. Those clergy were, and were treated as, employees of the relevant Community. The respondent, and other Communities, had employed clergy because to do so was to provide for a fundamental element in the preservation of the Hellenic and Orthodox culture they had been formed to enhance and preserve …

[112] We do not accept that the Industrial Magistrate failed to consider the question of intention to create legal relations. The Industrial Magistrate described the issue as being "Can a minister of religion be in law an employee?" and he dealt at length with the principal cases upon which the respondent relied both in this Court and in the Full Court of the Supreme Court. It seems that, at trial, the respondent advanced an argument framed in absolute terms. The Industrial Magistrate recorded it as being that "a minister of religion — any religion — can not in law be considered an employee of any other person or legal entity". This proposition was rejected. But, read as a whole, the reasons of the Industrial Magistrate reveal that whether the arrangement which he had found to have been made between the appellant and the respondent was intended by them to be subject to the adjudication of the courts was a question at the centre of his consideration.

No less importantly, the Industrial Magistrate expressly recognised that, in each of the several cases to which the respondent had referred in support of its submissions, there had been (1997) 64 SAIR 622 at 734:

> a close consideration of the particular facts of the matter, including the charters, statutes and documents of fundamental belief of each creed considered, the documented position of the clergy in respect of each of the churches mentioned, and the special provisions of statute which govern the actual situation in the law of that particular church.

He undertook a similarly close examination of the evidence that had been called at the trial of this matter about those subjects. That is, he examined, with care, all of the objective circumstances which bore on whether the parties intended to make a contract, as distinct from an arrangement binding only in honour.

The Industrial Magistrate did not make the error which the majority in the Full Court of the Supreme Court attributed to him. Even if the Industrial Magistrate did make that error, the inference which the Full Court drew about the absence of an intention to create legal relations was an inference that was not open on the facts that had been found at trial. An inference that there was no intention to create legal relations depended upon making an assumption, contrary to the facts found below, that the "church" was distinct from the "Community", or it depended upon discerning from the decided cases a proposition more general or absolute than those decisions warrant.

In its appeal to the Full Court the respondent had put forward, as a separate ground of appeal, that "[i]f there was any enforceable contract it was not in law a contract of employment". The leave to appeal granted by the Full Court was not restricted and it follows that this ground was before it, but the conclusions reached by the majority on the question of intention to create legal relations made it [113] unnecessary for their Honours to decide it. Accordingly, as things now stand, there remains for further argument in the Full Court, the issue whether the contract found to have been made between the appellant and the respondent was a contract of employment. Given the resolution of the question which appears to have been the chief foundation for the Full Court granting leave to appeal to it, despite there having been two previous unsuccessful appeals in this matter, there may be an issue whether this remaining question should be agitated further or, instead, the leave previously granted by the Full Court should to that extent now be revoked. That is a matter for the Full Court.

The appeal to this Court should be allowed with costs. Paragraphs 3 to 6 inclusive of the order of the Full Court of the Supreme Court should be set aside and the matter remitted to that Court for further hearing and determination conformably with the reasons of this Court.

[5.25] KIRBY J: [119] I am unconvinced that the English cases cited by Bleby J warrant a conclusion that, in Australia, a contract partaking of the usual features of one of employment, necessarily loses that character because it relates to the vocation of a minister of religion. A minister of religion must be housed, must eat, be clothed and otherwise be provided for. The fact that his or her vocation is, at one level, spiritual in purpose and character does not, of itself, remove the possibility that arrangements for necessities may have been intended to be enforced when it is proved that such arrangements have been breached. If one starts with the proposition that a religious vocation is in law an "office" created by the public law and in its essential character is only a "spiritual" one, it is comparatively simple to arrive at a different result than if one accepts the postulates that have developed in Australian law because of the different history of churches and other religious organisations in this country. Courts here, as elsewhere, will be hesitant to enforce purely spiritual and theological rules (as in Wylde (1948) 78 CLR 224 and Scandrett v Dowling (1992) 27 NSWLR 483). But they will not hesitate to enforce, as arrangements intended to have contractual or other binding force, rules of a proprietorial character concerned with proprietoral rights.

Within this dichotomy, a proved agreement with a body such as the respondent to provide for the necessities of life of a minister of religion, or even of an archbishop, is an arrangement of the second kind. It is not one which, of its character, Australian law will refuse to enforce because the law presumes a lack of intention to enter legal relations or classifies the resulting dispute as non-justiciable. To the extent that English decisions, starting from a different history and legal foundation and taking a different approach, reach a different conclusion, they do not express the common law of Australia …

[121] There is therefore no presumption that contracts between religious or associated bodies and ministers of religion, of their nature, are not intended to be legally enforceable. At least where the contracts concern proprietary and economic entitlements, of the kind which in this case Archbishop Ermogenous sought to enforce (and certainly where they are not intertwined with questions of religious doctrine that a court would not feel competent to resolve according to legal norms) there is no inhibition either of a legal or discretionary character that would prevent enforcement of such claims when they are otherwise proved to give rise to legal rights and duties …

[123] Even if, contrary to my view, there were something in the spiritual calling of a minister of religion (including an archbishop) that put that person in relation to his or her church beyond the kind of contractual relations that might be enforced in a court of law, any such rule would not apply to arrangements for the provision of necessities made with a secular community organisation such as the respondent. Every day of his life, Archbishop Ermogenous, like everyone else in Australia, made contractual arrangements of an express or implied kind with secular organisations and individuals of great variety. Most of these were insubstantial but some would be substantial. It would be contrary to basic principle to suggest that his spiritual calling somehow placed him outside the rights and duties of the law of obligations.

Appeal allowed.

Banque Brussels Lambert v Australian National Industries

[5.30] Banque Brussels Lambert SA v Australian National Industries Ltd (1989) 21 NSWLR 502 (Supreme Court of New South Wales – Action).

[FACTS: The defendant (ANI), a public company listed on the stock exchange, provided a letter of comfort to the plaintiff (BBL) in relation to a loan facility provided by the plaintiff to Spedley Securities Ltd (Spedley). The defendant held a controlling interest in Spedley's parent company, Spedley Holdings Ltd (Holdings). The defendant provided a strongly worded letter of comfort at the plaintiff's insistence after some negotiation and the exchange of several drafts. In the letter, the defendant consented to the making of the loan, agreed to provide the bank with 90 days notice of any decision to dispose of its interest in Holdings and confirmed that it was the defendant's practice to ensure that Spedley will at all times be in a position to meet its financial obligations. The defendant disposed of its shareholding in Holdings without giving the required notice to the plaintiff. Spedley was unable to repay the debt to the plaintiff and later went into liquidation. The plaintiff sought relief on the basis of breach of contract, equitable estoppel or misleading or deceptive conduct in breach of s 52 of the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth). The defendant denied liability in contract on the basis, inter alia, that the parties did not manifest an intention to create legal relations.]

ROGERS CJ:

The proceedings

[504] In 1982, Spedley Securities Ltd (Spedley) wished to obtain a loan facility of US$5 million from the plaintiff, a Belgian bank. The plaintiff (BBL) wanted, to adopt a neutral term, additional reassurance that any draw down loan would be repaid. Spedley was a fully owned subsidiary of Spedley Holdings Ltd (Holdings). In turn, 45 per cent of the capital of Holdings was held by the defendant (ANI). The reassurance to the plaintiff took the form of a letter from the defendant in the following terms:

> We confirm that we are aware of the eurocurrency facility of US$5 million which your Bank has granted to Spedley Securities Limited, which is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Spedley Holdings Limited.
>
> We acknowledge that the terms and conditions of the arrangements have been accepted with our knowledge and consent and state that it would not be our intention to reduce our shareholding in Spedley Holdings Limited from the current level of 45% during the currency of this facility. We would, however, provide your Bank with ninety (90) days notice of any subsequent decisions taken by us to dispose of this shareholding, and furthermore we acknowledge that, should any such notice be served on your Bank, you reserve the right to call for the repayment of all outstanding loans within thirty (30) days.
> We take this opportunity to confirm that it is our practice to ensure that our affiliate Spedley Securities Limited, will at all times be in a position to meet its financial obligations as they fall due. These financial obligations include repayment of all loans made by your Bank under the arrangements mentioned in this letter.

[His Honour then set out a letter from Spedley to the bank which referred to the letter from ANI and which further stated that should ANI give the 90 days notice, Spedley would repay all outstanding loans within 30 days.]

In fact, in 1989, the defendant sold its shares in Holdings without first giving 90 days notice and the plaintiff lost the opportunity of calling for repayment of its outstanding loan to Spedley within that period. The defendant did not ensure that Spedley was in a position to meet its financial obligation to the plaintiff as it fell due.

[505] It is common ground between the plaintiff and the defendant that the defendant failed to act in accordance with the statements it made in its letter. It did not, at any time, notify the plaintiff that it did not intend to so act.

Put simply, the plaintiff, BBL, lent Spedley a large sum of money (approximately A$ 7 million) on the "security" of the letter from the defendant. The plaintiff seeks to recover damages from the defendant in respect of its losses, as Spedley is now in liquidation. It has been agreed that only liability should be argued and depending on the outcome, quantum shall be decided later.

The defendant maintains that it is not liable to compensate the plaintiff for any damage it may have suffered. At the forefront of the defendant's argument stands the judgment in Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Malaysia Mining Corp Berhad [1989] 1 WLR 379. Three of the Lord Justices in the English Court of Appeal held that the statement in the letter of comfort given by the defendant, concerning its policy with respect to the liabilities of subsidiaries, involved it in no enforceable legal obligation. Ralph Gibson LJ, delivering the judgment of the court, concluded (at 394):

> If my view of this case is correct, the plaintiffs have suffered grave financial loss as a result of the collapse of the tin market and the following decision by the defendants not to honour a moral responsibility which they assumed in order to gain for their subsidiary the finance necessary for the trading operations which the defendants wished that subsidiary to pursue. The defendants have demonstrated, in my judgment, that they made no relevant contractual promise to the plaintiffs which could support the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs. The consequences of the decision of the defendants to repudiate their moral responsibility are not matters for this court.

Before me, two Queen's Counsel, their juniors and a platoon of solicitors were engaged over five days in argument as to whether, as in Kleinwort Benson, the defendant in this case, assumed merely a moral responsibility, or whether it was liable at law …

The plaintiff puts its case in a number of ways. First, that the letter of comfort constitutes a binding contractual obligation, which the defendant breached. The plaintiff claims that the letter made two promises enforceable at law. One, that whilst the facility was on foot, the defendant was to provide the plaintiff with 90 days notice of any sale by the defendant of its 45 per cent shareholding in

Holdings. Two, that, during the life of the facility, the defendant would ensure that Spedley would at all times be in a position to meet its financial obligations as they fell due …

[His Honour then set out the evidence and continued:]

Letters of comfort

[5.35] [520] This is an appropriate point to examine in general terms the learning on letters of comfort, for their purpose and the various modes of their interpretation are indicative of their general standing. As was noted in Kleinwort Benson, there is no general rule concerning letters of comfort, although trends can be detected in the academic analysis. The letter of comfort developed as an alternative to a guarantee or surety where the writer, more often than not the parent company, either was unable, or unwilling, to issue one of these more traditional securities. According to Mr Osterreith, letters of comfort were first used in the 1960s in the United States. United States parents were reluctant to give guarantees because they had to be disclosed in the accounts as contingent liabilities. Letters of comfort were not required to be so shown. The same situation applied in Europe and so letters of comfort came into use there as well. In Mr Osterreith's experience, letters of comfort have been invariably sufficient to secure payment to the creditor. Letters of comfort were issued where the parent simply did not want to incur legal liability, where the parent was primarily concerned to protect its own credit rating, where the parent wanted to avoid showing a contingent liability on its balance sheet as this would contravene limits on commitments, and also where there were unfavourable tax and foreign exchange consequences: see generally, "Letters of Responsibility" (1978) 6 International Business Lawyer 288–332.

Letters of comfort have become so frequent in international commercial transactions that a German writer characterised them as "collateral sui generis" (Franken, "The Force of Comfort Letters Under German Law" (1985) 6(4) International Financial Law Review 14 at 15), although this same writer acknowledges that a great deal of uncertainty surrounds the practical legal obligations imposed by a letter of comfort. This view is reiterated throughout the literature. In each case, it ultimately turns on the terms of the [521] letter. Yet, in this context, the French approach to letters of comfort is refreshingly honest and sensible. Writing in the section on France in the compilation on Letters of Responsibility (at 302), Léon Proscour states that:

> A so called "letter of responsibility" will, under French law, be considered as a commitment to perform ("obligation de faire") because in the commercial world the creation of a meaningless instrument or document is unthinkable. It is not a full-sized guaranty [sic] — otherwise it would say it is so — but some performance is provided in order to help a creditor insure his rights. Refusal of such performance opens a case for damages; this is the legal rule of violation of an "obligation de faire".

In Société Viuda de Jose Tolra v Sodler (21 December 1987, La Revue Banque March 1988) the Cour de Cassation recognised as enforceable security a letter of comfort from a parent company to a creditor of its subsidiary.

The claim in contract

[5.40] This claim turns on the existence or otherwise, of an intention to create legal obligations and whether the terms of the letter are of a sufficiently promissory nature to be held to be contractual. The two questions arise independently, but are interrelated in that it is from the terms of the letter seen against the backdrop of surrounding circumstances that the parties' intentions in both respects fall to be determined.

Turning first to the question of intention to enter into a legal relationship in order to ascertain whether the letter of comfort was intended to give rise to legal obligations, it is necessary to examine the events surrounding its inception. BBL starts with the prima facie presumption that in commercial transactions there is an intention to create legal relations, and the onus of proving the absence of such intention rests with the party "who asserts that no legal effect is intended, and the onus is a heavy one": Edwards v Skyways Ltd [1964] 1 WLR 349 at 355 per Megaw J. The defendant submits that the Skyways onus is discharged by pointing to the course of negotiations leading to the final version of the letter, coupled with a close textual analysis of its terms.

Greig and Davis in The Law of Contract (1987) state that: "The overriding test is, of course, that the intentions of the parties, as deduced from the document as a whole seen against the background of the practices of the particular trade or industry": 229–30. Nothing turns on the nomenclature of "letter of comfort", as was observed by the Court of Appeal in Kleinwort Benson.

It is clear that at the time of negotiating the initial US$1 million facility, and its subsequent increase to US$5 million, it was made quite clear to both Spedley and ANI that the facility was subject to BBL obtaining a suitable letter of comfort or some other indication of commitment from ANI….

[523] In a very different field of discourse, Lord Justice Scrutton remarked "there will be no Alsatia in England". I believe it was that kind of sentiment that informed the judgment of Sir John Megaw in Edwards v Skyways Ltd. There should be no room in the proper flow of commerce for some purgatory where statements made by businessmen, after hard bargaining and made to induce another business person to enter into a business transaction would, without any express statement to that effect, reside in a twilight zone of merely honourable engagement. The whole thrust of the law today is to attempt to give proper effect to commercial transactions. It is for this reason that uncertainty, a concept so much loved by lawyers, has fallen into disfavour as a tool for striking down commercial bargains. If the statements are appropriately promissory in character, courts should enforce them when they are uttered in the course of business and there is no clear indication that they are not intended to be legally enforceable.

If I may say, the judgments of Hirst J, at first instance in Kleinwort Benson [1988] 1 WLR 799 and Staughton J, whose unreported judgment in Chemco Leasing SpA v Redifusion plc Staughton J, 19 July 1985 is extensively referred to by Hirst J, reflect the bias of experienced commercial judges to pay high regard to the fact that the comfort letters in issue before them came into existence as part and parcel of a commercial banking transaction and that the promises were an important feature of the letters.

In the Court of Appeal in Kleinwort Benson, Ralph Gibson LJ held the principle in Edwards v Skyways Ltd inapplicable, saying that the presumption of intention only became significant when the words of the agreement were clearly promissory. The Court of Appeal pointed [out] that, in a sense, the trial judge had been asked the incorrect question. The parties had conceded that one of the statements in the letter was a contractual promise and intended to have legal effect. The true question therefore was whether the statement sued upon was promissory in character. It was to this question that the Court of Appeal returned a negative answer.

The Court of Appeal subjected the letters to minute textual analysis. Courts will become irrelevant in the resolution of commercial disputes if they allow this approach to dominate their consideration of commercial documents.

Probably at the heart of the judgment delivered by Ralph Gibson LJ is the statement (at 792): "In my judgment, the defendants made a statement as to what their policy was, and did not in para 3 of the comfort letters expressly promise that such policy would be continued in future".

That construction of the letter renders the document a scrap of paper. If the Lord Justice is correct, the writer has not expressed itself on anything relevant as a matter of honour.

[524] The test prescribed by the law of Australia to determine whether a statement was promissory or only representational is different from that in England. This has been pointed out by McPherson J in Nemeth v Bayswater Road Pty Ltd [1988] 2 Qd R 406. His Honour said (at 416):

> The question to be determined therefore is whether the passages in the evidence set out above can be said to give rise to a warranty or promise having contractual effect. In Dick Bentley Productions Ltd v Harold Smith (Motors) Ltd [1965] 1 WLR 623 at 627, the matter was stated thus by Lord Denning MR:

> It was said by Holt CJ, and repeated in Heilbut, Symons & Co v Buckleton, that: "An affirmation at the time of the sale is a warranty, provided it appear on evidence to be so 'intended'. But that word 'intended' has given rise to difficulties. I endeavoured to explain in Oscar Chess Ltd v Williams that the question whether a warranty was intended depends on the conduct of the parties, on their words and behaviour, rather than on their thoughts. If an intelligent bystander would reasonably infer that a warranty was intended, that will suffice. What conduct, then? What words and behaviour lead to the inference of a warranty?"
> Adopting that approach, the problem nevertheless remains of determining what it is in the conduct or words of the parties that in an objective sense demonstrates that they intended a particular statement to be legally binding upon the party making it. After the passage from the case just cited, Lord Denning went on to say that there was prima facie ground for inferring that a warranty was intended if the statement or representation in question was made "for the very purpose of inducing the other party to act upon it, and actually inducing him to act upon it" by entering into the contract. But there is authority binding upon us to hold that such factors alone are not sufficient to convert the statement or representation into a promise or undertaking to be contractually bound to its factual accuracy or to its fulfilment: see JJ Savage & Sons Pty Ltd v Blakney (1970) 119 CLR 435 at 443; Ross v Allis-Chalmers Australia Pty Ltd (1980) 55 ALJR 8.

Greig and Davis discuss in helpful detail (p 480 et seq) the various matters to be taken into account in determining this objective intention. Obviously the actual words used are a very important indicator.

Nonetheless, it is inimical to the effective administration of justice in commercial disputes that a court should use a finely tuned linguistic fork. A good illustration of where this leads is the well meant effort by counsel for the defendant in the present case in providing me with a schedule showing the similarities and differences between the letter in Kleinwort Benson and the present case.

Turning to the terms of this particular letter of comfort, it is clear that the first paragraph contains no contractual representation, but merely an indication of awareness. The second paragraph may be split into two sections; for ease of reference, let the statement in relation to ANI's intention as to reduction of its shareholdings in Holdings be called 2(a), and that pertaining to giving 90 days notice be called 2(b).

Looking at para 2 as a whole, the plaintiff argued that it was expressed in the language of promise, and that the amendments made in the course of [525] negotiations did not detract from this. The defendant, on the other hand, maintained that the inclusion of the word "would" softened the statement to such an extent that it could not be regarded as anything more than a statement of present intention. In addition, the inclusion of "however" indicates that the second part (2(b)) is also only intended to be a statement of intention.

In my opinion, 2(b) contains an undertaking of a contractual nature, which is in no way diminished by the presence of "however". The reason for the use of the word is easily explained. The first limb, 2(a), caters for the contemplated intention. Then 2(b) deals with the situation where, for whatever reason, that intention is to be departed from. In that context, to say "however" should my intentions change is perfectly appropriate use of language in preceding the promise of the action to be taken in that circumstance. That action, that is, the 90 days notice, is intended to confer a clear benefit on the plaintiff. The nature of the benefit appears most clearly from an earlier draft. It enables the plaintiff to obtain immediate reimbursement. The 90 days notice, together with the 30 days period of demand, is a carefully crafted trigger to allow for recovery. The two letters need to be read together as a scheme. That deprives the employment of the word "would" of any significance. The Spedley letter in the second paragraph, in speaking of the 90 days notice for ANI, speaks of "they (that is ANI) will provide you" with the requisite notice. I can see no reason why 2(b) should not be regarded as a promissory statement.

As to 2(a), the now famous letter in Kleinwort Benson contained a similar, albeit somewhat stronger, provision: "We confirm that we will not reduce our current financial interest in MMC Metals Ltd until the above facilities have been repaid …" The parties there agreed that it was a promise intended to give rise to legal relationships: compare Commonwealth Bank of Australia v TLI Management Pty Ltd [1990] VR 510. In the present case, the statement "it would not be our intention to reduce" carries the same import. The only reason for splitting the analysis of para 2 into (a) and (b) would be if the foregoing was held to be incorrect, in that 2(a) was determined not to be contractual. There can, in any case, be no doubt as to the status of 2(b) …

The question whether the third paragraph of the letter of comfort is promissory is far more thorny. However, in my view, if the paragraph is read as follows: "it is our practice to ensure that Spedley is at all times in a position to repay all loans made to it by your Bank", its promissory nature is much clearer. I see no relevant difference between that and saying that "we promise to ensure that" Spedley will at all times be in a position to repay the [526] plaintiff. The letter needs to be read in the light of the statement of policy ascribed to Mr Maher (at 508G): "it is our corporate policy to support our subsidiaries". …

In my view, the plaintiff has made out its claim that the defendant was in breach of two enforceable contractual promises. This enables me to deal with the other issues in a summary fashion.

Judgment for the plaintiff on liability.

DOMESTIC AND SOCIAL AGREEMENTS

[5.45] Domestic and social agreements have in the past been approached on the basis that parties to such agreements are presumed not to intend legal obligations (see, eg, Jones v Padavatton [1969] 1 WLR 328, 332–3). In some cases, including the well-known decision of the English Court of Appeal in Balfour v Balfour [1919] 2 KB 571, 579, it has almost appeared that there is a rule of law that financial agreements between spouses will not attract legal consequences. In Ermogenous v Greek Orthodox Community of SA Inc [2002] HCA 8; (2002) 209 CLR 95 (extracted at [5.10]) Gaudron, McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ rejected the idea that any rules can or should be formulated to prescribe the types of cases in which an intention to create legal relations should or should not be found. It is now accepted that, since Ermogenous, no presumption should be made about the enforceability of agreements made in a social or domestic context: Ashton v Pratt [2015] NSWCA 12; (2015) 88 NSWLR 281, [73]; Evans v Secretary, Department of Families, Housing, Community Services and Indigenous Affairs [2012] FCAFC 81, [12]–[16]. Each case will be considered on its own facts, although the nature of the relationship between the parties and the context in which the agreement was made remain important considerations.

Todd v Nicol

[5.50] Todd v Nicol [1957] SASR 72 (Supreme Court of South Australia – Action).

[FACTS: The defendant, a woman living in Australia, invited the plaintiffs, the sister (Margaret Todd) and niece (Grace Todd) of the defendant's deceased husband, to move from Scotland to Australia to share her house and provide her with company. The defendant proposed the arrangement in a letter to the plaintiffs. The defendant promised to alter her will (by making a codicil) so that the house would be theirs until they died (or, in the case of Grace, married). The plaintiffs accepted the offer. They sold their belongings, and the niece resigned her employment. The plaintiffs moved from

Scotland to South Australia and resided with the defendant for several years. The relationship between the plaintiffs and the defendant deteriorated, and the defendant asked the plaintiffs to leave the house. The plaintiffs claimed they were entitled by contract to remain in the house. The defendant counterclaimed for possession of the house, either on the basis that there was no contract between the parties, or that any contract had been validly terminated.]

MAYO J: [74] In this action the plaintiffs (sister and niece of the defendant's husband, now deceased) claim a declaration that pursuant to a certain contract they are entitled to reside rent free in the premises, 254 Greenhill Road, Hazelwood Park until their respective deaths, or, in the case of the second plaintiff, until marriage. Ancillary relief is also sought in respect of the contract described in the statement of claim. The defendant denies the contract alleged, but, if there be any such contract, she seeks its rescission by counterclaim. There is a reply on behalf of the plaintiffs….

The contract, on which the plaintiffs rely, is said to be contained in letters which passed between the parties. I will quote so much of the correspondence as in my opinion has bearing on the preliminary question that counsel have asked to be determined before other matters are investigated, viz whether there is an agreement legally binding between plaintiffs and defendant whereby the former became entitled to live in the premises mentioned.

Important parts of the defendant's letter to the plaintiffs of date April 6th, 1947, may be cited:

> I have wondered if you would like to come and live with me. That is what I want to know first of all. I must have company at my age and it is not good for anyone to live alone … This is a funny old house … there is quite room enough for you both to come to me (and May Holt, later, when she wants to and has opportunity – which will not be yet as far as we both can see). You would share my home … and no rent at all … All in it we could share for I have enough I think, for all. If … you do sell your belongings – keep your china, and house linen and cutlery for I may not have enough of those things to go round … It is a big thing for you to do … but I think we would be happy together … once you are here or on the way, I would alter my will that the home was to be yours and Gracie's (unless you marry …) until you passed on … and if May Holt is with me, may be she to share it too … I have not mentioned this to Willie but will you consult him? I may tell him in my next letter … of my proposition … think well before accepting my suggestions … if this does not eventuate I will have to work out some other plan for myself.

To that "proposition" the plaintiffs sent a cable and a letter to the defendant. These were not produced, having been destroyed. In substance both these communications were to the effect that they accepted the invitation. It is alleged by the plaintiffs that these documents were productive of the contract. Steps were promptly taken by them to engage passages by steamer for the voyage to Adelaide.

It is an accepted principle that regard may be had to the subsequent conduct of, and communications between, parties for the purpose of discovering whether the intention to be attributed to them was to make a binding arrangement or otherwise, and if the former what the parties understood the terms to be, that is to say, in so far as the words used were not productive of certainty. The acts of parties, where meaning is in doubt, may be used to remove uncertainty, or to explain, but not to contradict, the language used (Van Diemen's Land Co v Table Cape Marine Board [1906] AC 92; Watcham v Attorney-General of the East Africa Protectorate [1919] AC 533). The manner in which parties act, with the apparent approval of all concerned, may indicate their view of what has been agreed between them.

Upon receipt of the plaintiffs' cable the defendant wrote again, the communication being dated April 16th, 1947. The introductory words are:

> How perfectly thrilling it was to me to get your cable this morn … The little place … we will try and make it home for us all … Today I went in to the solicitor and added a codicil to my will, for I want to protect you both in case anything happens to me before your arrival here … When I sign it the house is yours for life Margaret without expense, also you Gracie (unless > you marry) … and if Miss Holt wishes to share the home too she is also protected … I am longing now to get your letter … so that I can know a little more of your immediate plans and how far you have gone and when you can really come … When I know I will try and get the place as I think you would enjoy it best. Anyway we can change round to suit each other when the time comes … I want you to have the beautiful sunshine and freedom of life that one enjoys in Australia…. If you sail before you get another letter … bring your china and linen … hoping we can soon meet.

A letter from the defendant of April 24th refers to a codicil:

> to the effect … you both were to be allowed to live on in this home until you either died too – or were married … and also if I were to die before you came out you were to receive a sum of money to help to carry you on….
> I am doing my darndest to think things out for your protection just in case … I went to the Immigration Office … and secured two forms of nomination … although we sound alright on paper you might not like me … when you have to live with me. Still I think you will … Margaret … if I can make life … brighter and easier for you and Gracie I would be so happy in doing it.

The plaintiffs left Scotland in June, 1947. They gave up the tenancy of their house, sold furniture and belongings. Grace gave up her employment a fortnight before sailing. Passages were obtained on RMS Stratheden costing about £79 each (tourist class). They arrived in Adelaide about the end of July, and have lived under the same roof as the defendant ever since. A copy of clauses 7 and 8 of the defendant's will was handed to them by her, or on her behalf, after their arrival. The clauses contain certain additions that were not foreshadowed in the [77] correspondence, but it can be said that in substance the provisions secure the home, rent free, to the plaintiffs (with two others) during life if they do not marry, and desire to continue in residence at 254 Greenhill Road.

Unhappily, cordial relationship has not been sustained. As a result the questions involved in the present proceedings have come up for determination by a court of law. The request at present made by counsel for both sides is for a decision whether, as between the parties, there is a contract of a kind that is enforceable, or which, on breach, will sound in damages. If there be such a contract, it may be necessary to ascertain the precise terms (express or implied), also whether a breach was threatened, or has occurred on either side, and what consequences follow. The alternative findings are said to be: (1) The arrangement was purely social. The parties had no actual intention to create legal obligations, and no such intention will be attributed to them. (2) A contract legally enforceable between the parties was entered into. (3) There is no contract other than a licence to reside in the defendant's home, which may be revocable, or irrevocable.

Mr Cleland, for the defendant, claimed that the understanding to which acceptance of the proposal in the letter of April 6th gave rise was in the nature of a family or domestic expedient for mutual convenience, or alternatively a social project based on courtesy. He contended the plaintiffs must show that there was a deliberate promise by the defendant seriously made and supported by consideration. As between relatives or persons on intimate terms of good will, the prima-facie presumption will always be, he claimed (where visits and friendly intercourse are involved) that the basis is not legal obligation but affection and trust. Dr Bray submitted that there was a complete mutuality of wills which gave rise to a contract cognizable and enforceable at law.

I do not suppose that it came into the conscious thoughts of any of the parties (ie either plaintiffs or the defendant) that legal sanctions would be called in aid of the plan that was proposed and followed. But even so, that does not solve the problem. There is no explicit reference to, nor indeed any latent indication concerning, methods of enforcement, in the correspondence. Where mutual trust is present, it is unlikely that such an aspect will enter the mind of any party to negotiations. Still less is it likely to be expressed in speech or writing. Nevertheless there is an allusion in the letter of April 24th, to which reference has been made. There was of course a consensus, and that was responsible for the voyage by the plaintiffs to Australia. The purpose of the voyage was for them to take up residence with the defendant at her home. Certainly the plaintiffs were licensed to enter upon those premises and reside there. But that fact does not conclude the matter. Residence in the home of another may be on a licence determinable forthwith or by notice. Such a situation could be incidental to travel from Scotland here, or even to a purpose to remain here indefinitely.

Much argument was addressed to the elements that go to make up an enforceable bargain. A contract may be defined as an agreement between two or any number of persons that is intended to be enforceable at law. [78] It comes into being by virtue of an offer on one side which is accepted on the other. The offer and the acceptance may be explicit in precise terms, or implied from conduct, or language, which can be properly so construed. The contract may result from communications, by word of mouth, in writing, or by inference from conduct, or by a combination of all or any two of these media.

The subject matter usually involves the parties on either side doing, or abstaining from, conduct of some sort. A factor that is requisite is the presence of valuable consideration. Some right, interest, profit or benefit must be provided for, or some forbearance, detriment, loss or responsibility given, suffered or undertaken. Consideration must "move" from both sides. The adequacy of the benefit or burden, or the balance of equality, does not come up for investigation provided the law attributes some real value to it.

If an intention to enter into an enforceable undertaking does not appear by the express terms of the engagement, it must be capable of being properly read into the provisions. The language used, or the relative situation of the parties to the understanding, may be such as to indicate no such intention was present (Balfour v Balfour [1919] 2 KB 571). When the circumstances or conduct of the parties demonstrate that no such purpose was present it will not be imputed (Booker v Palmer [1942] 2 All ER 674, at 676–7; Cobb v Lane [1952] 1 All ER 1199). If the arrangement by its terms indicates that the plan is merely to take effect as an honourable pledge, or is not to be followed by any legal consequences, it will not have legal enforceability attributed (Jones v Vernon's Pools Ltd [1938] 2 All ER 626; Appleson v H Littlewood Ltd [1939] 1 All ER 464.) The status in this respect may be explicitly set out in a document (Rose and Frank Co v JR Crompton & Bros Ltd [1925] AC 445). Where business arrangements are involved the presumption of enforceability will be readily presumed. Where, however, the situation is not of that kind, such an implication is necessarily more doubtful.

The intention must, of course; be shown to be that of all parties. Where the parties are ad idem consensu, a common purpose will be attributed to them. Neither side will be permitted to prove an intention that is not in conformity with what has passed between them. If the existence of mutuality be in issue, one party or the other may demonstrate by reference to the negotiations (whether committed to paper or oral), that the alleged acceptance was not unqualified, or unconditional, in relation to the terms of the offer, or that the respective intentions of the negotiators differed in material aspects.

Another element concerns the certainty that is required. A contract will not be formulated for parties if they have left important conditions hidden in obscure language, or there are details subject to further negotiation. If provisions are too vague, or too indefinite, for reasonable certainty to be discovered concerning what is intended, the engagements will not be enforced unless the uncertain features are severable from that [79] part constituting the substantive arrangement. As to this aspect arrangements between parties will not necessarily be expected to cover every possible contingency that may arise, particularly where the duration of performance will be lengthy and the circumstances in detail unpredictable. Solvitur ambulando may be the principle for meeting some of such future day to day problems.

It is conceded the plaintiffs had a licence to enter upon the defendant's land and live in her home. The question whether that licence was irrevocable was referred to in argument. It was pointed out that such a licence will be revocable unless (i) there be a grant of an interest in the land, (ii) an agreement for such a licence that is specifically enforceable, or (iii) there is conduct raising an equity in favour of the licensees. "Putting it briefly, they must show grant, contract, or estoppel" (Moffat v Sheppard (1909) 9 CLR 265 at 286).

As already noticed, in the communications quoted in part, there is no explicit reference to intention, that is to say, to an intention to create obligations that are legally enforceable. In the absence of any statement concerning that purpose it is necessary to inquire whether there is any material from which an inference may be drawn. By a process of reasoning it may be possible to ascertain if any such an intention can be attributed to the parties having regard to the features with which they have enveloped the project.

The essentials of the scheme are somewhat submerged in rather dithyrambic passages of explanation. Counsel have drawn attention to extracts that they have deemed important, and I have essayed a selection. The references show to some extent what the parties contemplated on either side, and accordingly the underlying animus may perhaps be extracted by a process a posteriori. There can be no definite rule or formula for deducing the purpose or intention entertained, that is to say, whether enforcement of a plan is to depend on trust or legal sanction. The process of elucidation will be empirical.

Certain elements incidental to the suggested scheme or plan may be noticed. The expense of travel from Scotland to Australia by two persons who do not seem to be over-endowed with wealth, and the absence of any condition covering a return to Scotland, seem to negative the notion of a visit; a visit that was to provide opportunity for social intercourse. Although one letter from the defendant shows that the possible incompatibility of temperament or temper, the possibility of a "misfit", had occurred to her, no provision for separating or leaving the home before death, except on marriage (the reference to which is concluded in terms suggesting the jocular), was formulated. No provision is put forward to enable the discharge of joint residence, or a termination of the arrangement.

The expectation that certain belongings of the plaintiffs would have to be sold ex necessitate rei, and the suggestion that the sale should not comprise certain household articles probably required to render the premises a home for all, are significant. Thereby is demonstrated an [80] intended combination of resources of an apparently permanent nature. The provision of a testamentary adjunct to give security to the plaintiffs in the administration of the defendant's estate justifies the view that the defendant thought security for the plaintiffs during her lifetime was adequately provided by the plan laid down in the letter of April 6th. The provision by will might be construed, I suppose, as indicating that her goodwill was the safeguard, but I incline to the alternative that the arrangement inter vivos was expected to be binding in some way upon her during her lifetime.

It is undeniable that features in the letters are capable of being harmonised with an hypothesis that the plan was quite safe and secure for the plaintiffs because of the defendant's honourable assurances accompanying or implicit in her invitation, backed up (as it were) by her affection for her deceased husband. But in my view that theory cannot measure up when compared with the weight that must be given to an interpretation that does not place the future of the plaintiffs so largely subject to what would be no more than the whim of the defendant in so material an aspect.

My conclusion is that the intention to be attributed to the parties was to enter into a contract that was legally binding. The element of consideration gives no difficulty provided the other ingredients necessary to form a binding contract are present. Mr Cleland did not suggest that the disposal of property, the expense of travel, the change of location, and the abandonment of employment and of the security of their Scottish residence in exchange for the Australian domicile, had no features capable of being so regarded. I have not yet directed attention to the terms and conditions of that contract express or implicit. Counsel purposely refrained from addressing any arguments on that aspect….

[After further hearing, Majo J considered whether the terms of the contract had been breached by the plaintiffs and, if so, the consequences of such a breach.]

[75] The defendant sets up an implied term in the contract that the plaintiffs should, whilst residing in the premises mentioned, "behave in a reasonable and decent manner". …

[85] Provision is to be implied in a contract when the matter, to which the same relates, is not covered by express terms, nor annexed thereto by usage, statute or otherwise. But the implication will, even then, be treated as proper to be read into the text, only when it is clearly necessary [86] to introduce the term in order to make the contract operative according to the intention of the parties as indicated by the express terms: per Latham CJ in Scanlan's New Neon Ltd v Tooheys Ltd (1943) 67 CLR 169, at 194 et seq. The term must be directly related to the project entertained by the parties. If they did not direct their minds to the necessity for some condition to enable the purpose to be carried out, an interpretation of the transaction may be worked out where it is shown to be required, from its character, from the elements which are contained within it. The nature and circumstances of the transaction will supply the grounds from which the intention is to be deduced: eg per Dixon J (as he then was) in Bonython v The Commonwealth (1948) 75 CLR 589, at 626.

The most famous and oft repeated passage on this topic emanated from Bowen LJ in The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64, at 68. Another case that has been highlighted is Hamlyn & Co v Wood & Co [1891] 2 QB 488. But it has been commented that the "general remarks" of Bowen LJ do not accurately state the principle as it is now understood (McKinnon LJ in Shirlaw v Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd (1939) 2 KB 206, at 227). An implication may be manifestly necessary as an adjunct, so that, if such a term had been suggested to the parties at the time they were negotiating, they would have immediately agreed such a term was indispensable. Ordinarily it appears to be accepted that the provision to be implied must be necessary in the "business sense" to give efficacy to the contract: eg per Scrutton LJ in Reigate v Union Manufacturing Co [1918] 1 KB 592, at 605. The bestowal of such efficacy to a contract to join in a home suggests the importation of some sort of "business" activity into a domestic scene. But I suppose "business" in that sense does not limit the principle to contracts of a commercial or trading kind.

A home is a place where the residents ordinarily eat morning and night, and where they usually sleep. With adults it may have the characteristic of permanency. A home is, or used to be regarded as a place of refuge and rest. With modern conveniences, and under the present conditions of life, these aspects may perhaps be regarded as undergoing change. References to "sharing a home" can be taken to import an intention by the parties to live together under conditions of mutual indulgence and forbearance, of propriety, decorum and friendliness, and, if necessary, of resignation and toleration as might be reasonably expected in a home.

Will not a contract to share a home necessarily have implied in it conditions concerning behaviour? I have no difficulty in giving an affirmative answer to that question as a generalization. Acceptance of the licence to enter and remain upon premises for use of the same as a home results in the privilege taking effect as a licence. A limited privilege under licence must, I think carry with it an implicit engagement not to act in any manner that exceeds the scope of the permission….

[88] That plaintiff [Mrs Todd] has not behaved in a reasonable and decent manner in the home. Her conduct is, in my opinion, responsible for the cessation of reasonable home conditions. The contract to which all litigants were parties, the licence under which all three persons lived together at the Hazelwood Park address, came into being in an expectation that all would contribute to satisfactory home conditions. The plaintiffs' licence was to enable them to join in, establish and continue a home for all three persons. Mrs Todd has been responsible for breaches of conditions implied in the contract by virtue of the nature of the licence….

[89] If I am correct in my conclusion, did the breach by the elder plaintiff give the defendant the right to terminate contractual relations and withdraw the licence? I accept the proposition that the plaintiffs on their side, and the defendant on her side, were under duty to conduct themselves, or herself, in a sufficiently reasonable manner that the ordinary features of a home should be available to them all. Only under such conditions would life for elderly people under the same roof be possible. In the presence of persistent disruptive influences the locality ceases to be a home, it ceases to have the qualities of a home. As it is no longer a home the licence is ended. Such being the position the defendant was entitled to act, and bring the agreement to an end. Notice by the defendant's solicitors was effective. The arrangements no longer avail the plaintiffs.

There will be judgment for the defendant on the claim and on the counterclaim. Order that the plaintiffs do vacate the premises. The plaintiffs will pay the defendant's costs.

Judgment for defendant on claim and counterclaim.

GOVERNMENT AGREEMENTS

[5.60] Governments and governmental bodies routinely enter into contracts with suppliers of goods and services in the usual fashion. An intention to create legal relations is likely to be manifested when a government enters into a commercial transaction expressed in contractual language (see Placer Development v Commonwealth (1969) 121 CLR 353, 367–8 (per Windeyer J extracted at [6.200])). Where the administrative or political activities of government are concerned, however, the courts are likely to find that an intention to create legal relations does not exist (in addition to the following case, see Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth, extracted at [4.20]).

Administration of Papua and New Guinea v Leahy

[5.65] Administration of Papua and New Guinea v Leahy (1961) 105 CLR 6 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of the Territory of Papua and New Guinea.

[FACTS: For several years, the plaintiff had experienced difficulty controlling an infestation of cattle ticks on his property. He was provided with equipment and advice by the Commonwealth Department of Agriculture as part of its tick eradication program. He requested further assistance. In a meeting with representatives of the Department, an arrangement was made that officers of the Department would take over the spraying of the plaintiff's property. The plaintiff was to supply and pay for the other labour required, and to muster the cattle. The department's officers failed to carry out the spraying skilfully and efficiently, and the plaintiff's cattle became even more seriously infected with ticks. The plaintiff sued the Administration for damages for breach of contract. The plaintiff succeeded at first instance.]

DIXON CJ: [10] In my opinion this appeal must be allowed on the simple ground that the facts in no way support the conclusion that the defendant, the Administration of the Territory, entered into any such contractual relation with the plaintiff as his pleading alleges or as has been found in his favour. I am clearly of opinion that the Administration of the Territory, by its officers, did not contract with the plaintiff; there was no intention on their part to enter into any contract, to undertake contractual obligations or to do or undertake more than was considered naturally and properly incident to carrying out their governmental or departmental function in the conditions prevailing. They were merely pursuing the policy adopted for the eradication of tick. I do not wish to add anything to the reasons for this view of the case given by Kitto J whose judgment I have had the advantage of reading …

[5.70] McTIERNAN J: I think that this appeal should be allowed … [11] The arrangement consisted of agreed promises but that is not enough to make a contract, unless it was the common intention of the parties to enter into legal obligations, mutually communicated, expressly or impliedly. It was not an express or implied term of the arrangement that the respondent should make any payment for the treatment of the cattle. I cannot agree that the Administration through its officers intended to enter into legal relations when, at the request of the respondent, it undertook the organization of the tick eradication campaign with respect to his cattle. The conduct of the parties constituted an administrative arrangement by which the Administration in pursuance of its agricultural policy, gave assistance to an owner of stock to prevent that stock contracting a disease which was prevalent in the Territory. The work done by the Administration was analagous [sic] to a social service which generally does not have as its basis a legal relationship of a contractual nature and from which no right of action would arise in favour of the citizen who is receiving the services if the Government acts inefficiently in performing them …

KITTO J: [13] In the statement of claim one cause of action only against the Administration was alleged, and that was in contract. After setting out that the respondent was the lessee and the appellant, the Administration, was the lessor of a property at Zenag in the Territory, on which for a number of years the respondent had been grazing and rearing dairy and beef cattle and carrying on the business of a producer and vendor of dairy products, beef cattle and meat, the statement of claim alleged a contract between the Administration and the respondent by which the former agreed that it would carry on at Zenag a campaign for the eradication of cattle tick from the respondent's cattle, and that the campaign would be carried out thoroughly and skilfully. The consideration alleged was that the respondent would allow the Administration's servants to enter upon his property and spray the cattle thereon, would make available to the Administration the services of six native labourers, and would forbear from interfering with the work of the servants in carrying out the campaign. The breach assigned was that the Administration, although its servants sprayed the respondent's cattle between June 1954 and July 1955, failed to carry out the spraying thoroughly and skilfully. Particulars of resulting damage were given, comprising loss of cattle by death, loss of natural increase, loss of milk production, and deterioration of condition of the herd …

On the appeal the controversy has been as to whether the proved and admitted facts, when considered in their setting of time and circumstance, establish a contract, or only an arrangement having no legally binding force. The question is whether the parties to [14] the correspondence which passed and the conversations which took place evinced an intention to make a bargain mutually binding between the Administration and the respondent in the sphere of legal rights and obligations …

[18] In the judgment of the learned Chief Justice there occurs the following passage:

Considering the position of the plaintiff it is clear that he was assuming some liabilities and responsibilities and agreed to depart from his own proposals to the extent of co-operating with the Administration to carry out its campaign. I [19] think that it is clear that the plaintiff expected the Department to honour its promises and to see that the campaign was carried out properly. He was prepared to leave the entire conduct of the campaign to the Department and in fact he was insisting that they should take complete charge of it. I think that the proper conclusion is that Mr Leahy was entering into a transaction which as between individuals would amount to a contract and which was intended to impose obligations of a legal character on both parties. There remains of course the question whether in relation to this transaction the Administration should be considered as being upon a different footing from that of an ordinary individual.

It must be remembered, however, that there are not two questions, whether the interviews were such as would have produced a contract if they had taken place between private individuals, and if so whether it makes a difference that they took place between a private individual on the one hand and government officers acting in their official capacities on the other hand. There is only one inquiry: whether, taking into account all the circumstances, it is right to conclude that the respondent and the Administration were dealing with one another on a contractual basis, or were merely arranging the manner and extent of gratuitous assistance to the respondent which the Department was willing to render in execution of the Administration's policy concerning the eradication of cattle tick in the Territory …

[20] From first to last the Department showed itself to be doing no more than giving effect to a general policy of dispensing aid to individual cattle owners as a means of coping with a recognized menace to an important part of the Territory's economy. And the respondent's [21] attitude throughout was that of a private person appealing for government assistance on the ground that the Department, by doing for him what it insisted ought to be done on his property, would be performing a function of government in accordance with its settled policy. The whole atmosphere of the correspondence and discussions that took place was different from that which exists between contracting parties. True it is that the Department relied upon the continuing co-operation of the respondent in performing his part of what was arranged between them. The officers concerned were no doubt quite fully aware that if the respondent should make substantial failure at any time in affording the co-operation he was promising, all that had been put into the campaign up to that time would go for nought. But they knew too that he had every incentive to make the campaign a success. The loss, if it should be abandoned, would be far more serious for him than for the Administration, and he had already shown that he felt he was in a cleft stick: he could not afford to carry out a thorough spraying campaign himself, but unless it were carried out he could not get permission to move his cattle from his eaten-out pastures to new country. In the circumstances, the fact that in the absence of a contract he might draw out at any time has no real weight in considering whether a contract was entered into.

For the reasons given, the case falls into the class of which illustrations may be found in Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v The Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424; (1955) 93 CLR 546, and Milne v Attorney-General for the State of Tasmania (1956) 95 CLR 460, at 472, 473. The arrangements made on 7th June 1954 were not contractual and the judgment giving damages for the failure of the Administration, through the two defaulting officers, to give effect to them on its part cannot be sustained.

Appeal allowed.

PRELIMINARY AGREEMENTS

Masters v Cameron

[5.80] Masters v Cameron (1954) 91 CLR 353 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Western Australia.

[FACTS: Cameron (the respondent) and Mr and Mrs Masters (the appellants) signed a document whereby Cameron agreed to sell and the Masters agreed to buy for £17,500 a certain property owned by Cameron. A deposit of £1,750 was paid by the purchasers to a farm agent. The document contained the following clause: "This agreement is made subject to the preparation of a formal contract of sale which shall be acceptable to my [Cameron's] solicitors on the above terms and conditions". The purchasers encountered financial difficulties, denied that they were legally bound to purchase the property, and sought to recover the deposit.]

THE COURT (DIXON CJ, McTIERNAN and KITTO JJ): [360] The first question in the appeal is whether, as Wolff J considered, this document on its true construction constitutes a binding contract between the respondent and the appellants, or only a record of terms upon which the signatories were agreed as a basis for the negotiation of a contract. Plainly enough they were agreed that there should be a sale and purchase, and the parties, the property, the price, and the date for possession were all clearly settled between them. All the essentials of a contract are there; but whether there is a contract depends entirely upon the meaning and effect of the final sentence in that portion of the document which the [male] appellant signed.

Where parties who have been in negotiation reach agreement upon terms of a contractual nature and also agree that the matter of their negotiation shall be dealt with by a formal contract, the case may belong to any of three classes. It may be one in which the parties have reached finality in arranging all the terms of their bargain and intended to be immediately bound to the performance of those terms, but at the same time propose to have the terms restated in a form which will be fuller or more precise but not different in effect. Or, secondly, it may be a case in which the parties have completely agreed upon all the terms of their bargain and intend no departure from or addition to that which their agreed terms express or imply, but nevertheless have made performance of one or more of the terms conditional upon the execution of a formal document. Or, thirdly, the case may be one in which the intention of the parties is not to make a concluded bargain at all, unless and until they execute a formal contract.

[5.85] In each of the first two cases there is a binding contract: in the first case a contract binding the parties at once to perform the agreed terms whether the contemplated formal document comes into existence or not, and to join (if they have so agreed) in settling and executing the formal document; and in the second case a contract binding the parties to join in bringing the formal contract into existence and then to carry it into execution. Of these two cases the first is the more common. Throughout the decisions on this branch of the law the proposition is insisted upon which Lord [361] Blackburn expressed in Rossiter v Miller (1878) 3 App Cas 1124, where he said that the mere fact that the parties have expressly stipulated that there shall afterwards be a formal agreement prepared, embodying the terms, which shall be signed by the parties does not, by itself, show that they continue merely in negotiation. His Lordship proceeded: "as soon as the fact is established of the final mutual assent of the parties so that those who draw up the formal agreement have not the power to vary the terms already settled, I think the contract is completed": (1878) 3 App Cas 1124 at 1151.

[5.90] A case of the second class came before this court in Niesmann v Collingridge (1921) 29 CLR 177, where all the essential terms of a contract had been agreed upon, and the only reference to the execution of a further document was in the term as to price, which stipulated that payment should be made "on the signing of the contract". Rich and Starke JJ observed that this did not make the signing of a contract a condition of agreement, but made it a condition of the obligation to pay, and carried a necessary implication that each party would sign a contract in accordance with the terms of agreement. Their Honours, agreeing with Knox CJ, held that there was no difficulty in decreeing specific performance of the agreement, "and so compelling the performance of a stipulation of the agreement necessary to its carrying out and due completion": (1921) 29 CLR 177 at 185.

[5.95] Cases of the third class are fundamentally different. They are cases in which the terms of agreement are not intended to have, and therefore do not have, any binding effect of their own. The parties may have so provided either because they have dealt only with major matters and contemplate that others will or may be regulated by provisions to be introduced into the formal document, as in Summergreene v Parker (1950) 80 CLR 304 or simply because they wish to reserve to themselves a right to withdraw at any time until the formal document is signed. These possibilities were both referred to in Rossiter v Miller (1878) 3 App Cas 1124. Lord O'Hagan said (1878) 3 App Cas 1124 at 1149:

> Undoubtedly, if any prospective contract, involving the possibility of new terms, or the modification of those already discussed, remains to be adopted, matters must be taken to be still in a train of negotiation, and a dissatisfied party may refuse to proceed. But when an agreement [362] embracing all the particulars essential for finality and completeness, even though it may be desired to reduce it to shape by a solicitor, is such that those particulars > must remain unchanged, it is not, in my mind, less coercive because of the technical formality which remains to be made.

And Lord Blackburn said (1878) 3 App Cas 1124 at 1152:

> Parties often do enter into a negotiation meaning that, when they have (or think they have) come to one mind, the result shall be put into formal shape, and then (if on seeing the result in that shape they find they are agreed) signed and made binding; but that each party is to reserve to himself the right to retire from the contract, if, on looking at the formal contract, he finds that though it may represent what he said, it does not represent what he meant to say. Whenever, on the true construction of the evidence, this appears to be the intention, I think that the parties ought not to be held bound till they have executed the formal agreement.

So, as Parker J said in Von Hatzfeldt-Wildenburg v Alexander [1912] 1 Ch 284 at 289, in such a case there is no enforceable contract, either because the condition is unfulfilled or because the law does not recognise a contract to enter into a contract.

The question depends upon the intention disclosed by the language the parties have employed, and no special form of words is essential to be used in order that there shall be no contract binding upon the parties before the execution of their agreement in its ultimate shape. Nor is any formula, such as "subject to contract", so intractable as always and necessarily to produce that result. But the natural sense of such words was shown by the language of Lord Westbury when he said in Chinnock v Marchioness of Ely (1865) 46 ER 1066 at 1069: "if to a proposal or offer an assent be given subject to a provision as to a contract, then the stipulation as to the contract is a term of the assent, and there is no agreement independent of that stipulation". …

This being the natural meaning of "subject to contract", "subject to the preparation of a formal contract", and expressions [363] of similar import, it has been recognised throughout the cases on the topic that such words prima facie create an overriding condition, so that what has been agreed upon must be regarded as the intended basis for a future contract and not as constituting a contract. Indeed, Lord Greene MR remarked during the argument in Eccles v Bryant and Pollock [1948] Ch 93 at 94, that when the expression "subject to contract" was used he had never known a case in which it had been suggested, much less held, that this did not import that there was nothing binding till the exchange of parts of the formal contract was made. The effect of the early cases on the subject was stated by Sir George Jessel MR in Winn v Bull (1877) 7 Ch D 29, when he said in a passage which has become well-known (1877) 7 Ch D 29 at 32:

> It comes, therefore, to this, that where you have a proposal or agreement made in writing expressed to be subject to a formal contract being prepared, it means what it says; it is subject to and is dependent upon a formal contract being prepared. When it is not expressly stated to be subject to a formal contract it becomes a question of construction, whether the parties intended that the terms agreed on should be put into form, or whether they should be subject to a new agreement the terms of which are not expressed in detail …

[5.100] [364] In the present case the context provides no reason for holding that the case is outside the application of these authorities. The formal contract, it is true, is to be "on the above terms and conditions", but it is to be acceptable to the vendor's solicitors, and the meaning is sufficiently evident that the contract shall contain, not only the stated terms and conditions expressed in a form satisfactory to the solicitors, but also whatever else the solicitors may fairly consider appropriate to the case. Accordingly the first of the four questions which went to trial should have been answered by saying that no binding contract for the sale and purchase of the property mentioned in the document dated 6 December 1951, was made between [Cameron] and [Masters] …

Appeal allowed.

[5.105] Note

In Baulkham Hills Private Hospital Pty Ltd v GR Securities Pty Ltd (1986) 40 NSWLR 622, 628, McLelland J suggested that:

> There is in reality a fourth class of case additional to the three mentioned in Masters v Cameron, as recognised by Knox CJ, Rich J and Dixon J, in Sinclair, Scott & Co v Naughton (1929) 43 CLR 310 at 317, namely, "… one in which the parties were content to be bound immediately and exclusively by the terms which they had agreed upon whilst expecting to make a further contract in substitution for the first contract, containing, by consent, additional terms".

The existence of a "fourth category" has been accepted in many subsequent cases. In Anaconda Nickel Ltd v Tarmoola Australia Pty Ltd [2000] WASCA 27; (2000) 22 WAR 101, for example, the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Western Australia (by majority) held that a heads of agreement relating to a mineral exploration venture fell within this category and was therefore binding. As to whether there is a need for the fourth category, see Peden, Carter and Tolhurst, "When Three Just Isn't Enough: The Fourth Category of the 'Subject to Contract' Cases" (2004) 20 Journal of Contract Law 156 and McLauchlan, "In Defence of the Fourth Category of Preliminary Agreements: Or Are There Only Two?" (2005) 21 Journal of Contract Law 286. In Tasman Capital Pty Ltd v Sinclair [2008] NSWCA 248; (2008) 75 NSWLR 1, [26] Giles JA (with whom McColl JA and Young CJ agreed) referred to this debate and observed that:

> The Masters v Cameron (1954) 91 CLR 353 categories, and a possible fourth category, are intellectual aids, but whether parties have come to a binding agreement is a matter of their objectively ascertained intention. Categorisation does not greatly contribute to the decision in the particular case, which is concerned with finding what agreement, if any, the parties came to.

[6.05] The fourth requirement of contract formation is that the agreement must be sufficiently certain and sufficiently complete that the parties' rights and obligations can be identified and enforced. The topic of certainty encompasses three related problems, which often overlap:

1. The agreement may be incomplete because the parties have failed to reach agreement on all of the essential elements or have decided that an essential matter should be determined by future agreement.
2. The agreement may be uncertain because the terms are too vague or ambiguous for a meaning to be attributed by a court.
3. A particular promise may be illusory because the contract effectively gives the promisor an unfettered discretion as to whether to perform the promise.

The categories of uncertainty, incompleteness and illusory promises are not always clearly distinguished in the cases. A particular set of facts may be capable of being analysed in terms of more than one category. As the cases on this topic also illustrate, it is difficult to define in the abstract what is required for a contract to be sufficiently certain and complete. The issue will necessarily depend on the circumstances of the particular case in question. As Lord Tomlin said in Hillas & Co Ltd v Arcos Ltd (1932) 38 Com Cas 23, 29:

> The principles are not in dispute. It is in the application of them to the facts of a particular case that the difficulty arises; and the difficulty is of such a kind as often affords room for much legitimate difference of opinion and to present a problem the solution of which is not as a rule to be found by examining authorities.

The cases reflect the tension between, on the one hand, the desire to hold parties to their bargains in accordance with the principle of pacta sunt servanda (agreements must be kept) and, on the other hand, the courts' reluctance to make a bargain for the parties. The difference in judicial opinion as to the role of the court in giving effect to a contract is illustrated by the judgments in Biotechnology Australia Pty Ltd v Pace (1988) 15 NSWLR 130, extracted at [6.25] and Hall v Busst (1960) 104 CLR 206, extracted at [6.65].

COMPLETENESS

[6.10] In Milne v Attorney-General (Tas) (1956) 95 CLR 460, 473 the High Court (Dixon CJ, McTiernan, Williams, Fullagar and Taylor JJ) after referring to certain documents which the plaintiff alleged contained the terms of a contract said:

> Furthermore, apart from the fact that the general purport of the communications in question evinces anything but an intention to affect legal relations, those documents deal with only some of the terms which must of necessity be settled before a binding contract can exist. This is not really a case at all where parties are negotiating with a view to contract, but, even if it be treated as such a case, no contract is concluded until the parties negotiating are agreed on all the terms of their bargain — unless indeed the terms left outstanding are "such as the law will supply" …. Here the transaction ultimately contemplated was of a very complex character, and it is clear that the law cannot supply its terms.

CERTAINTY

[6.15] A contract must be expressed in sufficiently clear and precise terms for it to be given meaning by a court. Uncertainty may exist because deficiencies in expression, semantic or conceptual difficulties prevent the court from understanding what the parties are trying to say. It may exist because, although what the parties have said seems to be clear enough, the application of the language to persons or things is not intelligible, either because no facts exist which fit the contractual description or because more than one set of facts exists, all of which fit the description (see Raffles v Wichelhaus (1864) 2 H & C 906; 159 ER 375). The courts have indicated that too high a degree of precision should not be demanded from contracting parties.

Council of the Upper Hunter County District v Australian Chilling and Freezing

[6.20] Council of the Upper Hunter County District v Australian Chilling and Freezing Co Ltd (1968) 118 CLR 429 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The council, which purchased electricity in bulk from a generating authority, agreed to supply the company with electricity at certain rates. The agreement provided for automatic changes in the rates according to changes in the basic wage and the cost of coal delivered to the generating authority. These changes affected the price at which the council purchased electricity. Clause 5 of the agreement provided:

> It is agreed that during the term of this agreement if the supplier's [the council's] costs shall vary in other respects than has been hereinbefore provided the supplier shall have the right to vary the maximum demand charge and the energy charge by notice in writing to the purchaser.

The agreement also provided for arbitration in the event of a dispute between the parties. The council sought to increase the charge pursuant to cl 5. The company claimed that clause uncertain and that, accordingly, the council had no entitlement to increase the charge. The Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales held that cl 5 of the agreement was void for uncertainty. The High Court allowed an appeal.]

BARWICK CJ: [436] Clause 5 speaks of the supplier's costs varying "in other respects" … It is sufficient for present purposes that at least the council's costs of supplying electricity to the company other than variations in the price it pays to one of the named suppliers for the bulk supply to it are included in the operation of cl 5.

It is surely indisputable that the council would incur other costs than the price of the bulk electricity in order to supply the company as agreed, for example, as a minimal item, the cost of bringing the supply from the point at which the council received the current to the point of its delivery to the company, such as maintenance of poles, switchgear, etc. But no doubt the identification of all its other items of cost were and the quantification of them must be uncertain in the sense that no single answer to the questions of what and how much they were must necessarily be given no matter whose opinion or judgment is sought …

But a contract of which there can be more than one possible meaning or which when construed can produce in its application more than one result is not therefore void for uncertainty. As long as it is capable of a meaning, it will ultimately bear that meaning which the courts, or in an appropriate case, an arbitrator, decides is its proper construction: and the court or arbitrator [437] will decide its application. The question becomes one of construction, of ascertaining the intention of the parties, and of applying it. Lord Tomlin's words in this connection in Hillas & Co Ltd v Arcos Ltd (1932) 147 LT 503, 512, ought to be kept in mind. So long as the language employed by the parties, to use Lord Wright's words in G Scammell & Nephew Ltd v Ouston [1941] AC 251, is not "so obscure and so incapable of any definite or precise meaning that the court is unable to attribute to the parties any particular contractual intention", the contract cannot be held to be void or uncertain or meaningless. In the search for that intention, no narrow or pedantic approach is warranted, particularly in the case of commercial arrangements. Thus will uncertainty of meaning, as distinct from absence of meaning or of intention, be resolved.

I do not think there is any uncertainty or for that matter ambiguity in the expression "supplier's costs" in cl 5, however wide may be the area of possible disagreement as to its denotation in a particular case. A contract to build a bridge at cost could not, in my opinion, be held void for uncertainty: it could not properly, in my opinion, be said to be meaningless: nor is it, in my opinion, ambiguous. Endless might be the arguments pro and con as to whether or not in marginal cases some item of expenditure is as claimed a cost, or as to how much of an expenditure is a cost, of the particular activity. But to my mind, generally speaking, the concept of a cost of doing something is certain in the sense that it provides a criterion by reference to which the rights of the parties may ultimately and logically be worked out, if not by the parties then by the courts. There are no elements in the circumstances of this contract to deprive the concept of that certainty. The obiter dictum in York Air Conditioning and Refrigeration (A/asia) Pty Ltd v Commonwealth (1949) 80 CLR 11, 60, may provide an instance where an attempt to limit the concept of a cost may have robbed the concept of its certainty and have introduced uncertainty incapable of resolution by construction.

In this case the contract itself provided the means of the resolution of any question as to what items constituted supplier's costs, namely, by the decision of an arbitrator whose judgment as to whether or not there had been a variation in items of expenditure which were embraced in what he found to be the supplier's costs was agreed to be final and binding, subject of course to the terms of the Arbitration Act 1902 (NSW), and thus to the possibility of a case stated for the opinion of the court. Of course, if the words "supplier's [438] costs" were meaningless, the presence of the arbitration clause would not save the clause. But, as I have said, cl 5 provides a certain criterion by reference to which the differences of the parties as to the propriety of an increase in charges could be resolved ….

Appeal allowed.

Implying objective standards

Biotechnology Australia v Pace

[6.25] Biotechnology Australia Pty Ltd v Pace (1988) 15 NSWLR 130 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Appeal from Allen J.

[FACTS: Dr Pace (the respondent), a senior scientist, entered into a contract of employment with Biotechnology (the appellant). The relevant term of the contract was to be found in a letter of offer of employment from a director of Biotechnology which stated: "I confirm a salary package of $A36 000 per annum, a fully maintained company car and the option to participate in the Company's senior staff equity sharing scheme."

At the time of the offer, as Dr Pace was aware, no such scheme existed. None was subsequently brought into effect.

On termination of the employment, Dr Pace claimed damages in respect of Biotechnology's failure to provide him with an option to join a company senior staff equity sharing scheme. The trial judge held Biotechnology liable for damages for breach of its contractual promise to provide Dr Pace with an opportunity to acquire shares in the company. Biotechnology appealed.]

KIRBY P: [132] In Stocks & Holdings (Constructors) Pty Ltd v Arrowsmith (1964) 64 SR (NSW) 211, 217; 81 WN (Pt 2) (NSW) 184, 186, Herron CJ commented that the problem of uncertainty was one "as to which there is much room for a difference of opinion, for it raises one of the most contentious aspects of the law of contract".

This appeal, and numerous other cases raising analogous problems, bear out that comment. The appeal illustrates a tension which exists in the law. On the one hand there is the natural desire of courts to uphold, and not to frustrate, a contract between the parties. On the other hand is the unwillingness of courts to uphold contractual terms which are unacceptably ambiguous or uncertain. Courts will not enforce contracts with such provisions that suggest that agreement between the parties as to essential terms, even though apparent, was illusory.

Upholding the contract – but what contract?

[6.30] The first tendency was given voice in the words of Lord Tomlin in Hillas & Co Ltd v Arcos Ltd [1932] All ER Rep 494, 499; 147 LT 503, 512; 38 Com Cas 23, 29, when his Lordship said:

> the problem for a court of construction must always be so to balance matters that, without violation of essential principle, the dealings of men may as far as possible be treated as effective, and that the law may not incur the reproach of being the destroyer of bargains.

In Australia Mason J expressed the same idea in Meehan v Jones (1982) 149 CLR 571, 589:

> To say that clauses of this kind ["subject to finance"] are void for uncertainty is to ignore the traditional doctrine that courts should be astute to adopt a construction which will preserve the validity of the contract. Moreover, it is a draconian solution — one which is best calculated to frustrate the expectations of the parties, because in an increasing number of cases purchasers depend on the provision of finance in order to complete.

But there are limits. Contracts are the agreements between parties. Generally, their terms must be those which reflect the will of the parties, objectively determined. Judges, by reason of their experience and knowledge, may not have the relevant expertise by which to clarify the ambiguous, elucidate the uncertain or give content to the illusory terms of a contract or suggested contract between the parties. To do so by reference to an imported standard of reasonableness may satisfy the lawyer's desire for fairness. But the law of contract which underpins the economy, does not, even today, operate uniformly upon a principle of fairness. It is the essence [133] of entrepreneurship that parties will sometimes act with selfishness. That motivation may or may not produce fairness to the other party. The law may legitimately insist upon honesty of dealings. However, I doubt that, statute or special cases apart, it does or should enforce a regime of fairness upon the multitude of economic transactions governed by the law of contract.

The recognition of the limited capacity of the courts to substitute their views of what is "fair" for the parties who have failed or neglected to do so, is expressed in many cases …

It is an attribute of a free society, as we know it, that it is generally left to parties themselves to make bargains. It is therefore left to them sometimes to fail to make bargains or to fail to agree on particular terms. Well meaning, paternalistic interference by courts in the market place, unless authorised by statute or clear authority, transfers to the courts the economic decisions which our law, properly in my view, normally reserves to parties themselves …

The legal principles applicable

[6.35] [134] The case law on ambiguous, uncertain and illusory contracts is enormous. Some of it is difficult to reconcile because of the different ways in which judges have classified disputed terms, for example, as so illusory as to deny a contract at all or so ambiguous or uncertain as to deny enforcement of the contract, although clearly one was intended. Some commentators urge that it is essential to maintain a "sharp distinction" between terms which are vague, uncertain or ambiguous and those which are illusory: see, for example, Lücke, "Illusory, Vague and Uncertain Contractual Terms" (1977) 6 Adel L Rev 1 at 2. Others suggest that the concepts are interchangeable or at least merge into each other along a spectrum which begins with the vague, passes through the ambiguous, reaches the uncertain and finally disappears into the illusory.

[135] In the High Court of Australia, Taylor and Owen JJ sought to explain the distinction between terms which are illusory and those which are real but uncertain. They do so in their joint judgment in Placer Development Ltd v Commonwealth (1969) 121 CLR 353, 359-60:

> a promise to pay an unspecified amount of money is not enforceable where it expressly appears that the amount to be paid is to rest in the discretion of the promisor and the deficiency is not remedied by a subsequent provision that the promisor will, in this discretion, fix the amount of the payment. Promises of this character are treated by Pollock (Principles of Contract (12th ed, 1946), pp 38, 39) not as vague and uncertain promises — for their meaning is only too clear — but as illusory promises.

Accepting, therefore, the distinction (but acknowledging that, at the margins, there will be legitimate differences of view about the legal classification to be applied in the particular case), the following general observations may be made about the task of classification required in cases of this sort:

(1) The determination of every case depends upon its own facts. The meaning of the agreement between the parties must be discovered objectively. Where there is suggested ambiguity or vagueness or where it is urged that a term is illusory, it may sometimes be both necessary and appropriate to have regard to extrinsic evidence in order to give meaning to that to which the parties have agreed: see, for example, Kell v Harris (1915) 15 SR (NSW) 473,479; 32 WN (NSW) 133, 136 and Raffles v Wichelhaus (1864) 2 H & C 906; 159 ER 375.

(2) The court will endeavour to uphold the validity of the agreement between the parties: see Hillas & Co Ltd v Arcos Ltd. The court will attempt to avoid frustrating the wishes of the contracting parties so far as those wishes may be ascertained from the agreement between them: see Meehan (at 589); see also Barwick CJ in Upper Hunter County District Council v Australian Chilling & Freezing Co Ltd (1968) 118 CLR 429, 437 where his Honour said that: "In the search for that intention, no narrow or pedantic approach is warranted, particularly in the case of commercial arrangements."

(3) But the court will not do so, where, in effect, it is asked to spell out, to an unacceptable extent, that to which the parties have themselves failed to agree. Nor will the court clarify that which is irremediably obscure. Most particularly, the court will not accept for itself a discretion which the parties have, by their agreement, reserved to one or other of them. To do so would not be to effect the contract but to change it.

(4) Views will differ about the classification of the challenged provision and whether the court can or cannot give effect to it. Usually, there is no objectively right decision in these cases. That fact is illustrated by the frequency with which there are strongly expressed differences of judicial opinion concerning whether the case falls on one side of the line or the other. So it was in Placer Development where Kitto, Taylor and Owen JJ found that a clause in an agreement with the Commonwealth relating to a conditional entitlement to a subsidy was unenforceable.

Menzies and Windeyer JJ dissented. Likewise in this case, Hope JA and Allen J have [136] reached their respective views that the clause fell on one side of the line. Respectfully, I differ and agree with McHugh JA.

(5) Nevertheless, the differences of result are not simply the result of differing judicial opinion based on nothing more than personal predilection. True, it is possible that behind the willingness of courts to fashion with precision a term which the parties have failed or neglected to clarify could be analysed in terms of differing fundamental attitudes concerning the role of courts in disturbing the economic relations of contracting parties. I say no more of that. Alternatively, it has been suggested that the willingness of courts to give content to the expression "subject to finance" in land title conveyancing transactions derives from the special nature of such transactions. In them, judges, familiar with the incidents of such contracts, feel confident that they can fill the gaps which the parties have left. In other cases, less familiar, they do not: see, for example, the comment by Prof Sutton, "Certainty of Contract" (1977) 7 Q Law Soc J 5 at 11. However that may be, the court will pay regard to features of the agreement, of the relationship between the parties and of relevant external reference points in order to determine whether the term which is challenged can or cannot be sustained.

(6) Matters which have been considered relevant in the determination of these cases include the following:

(a) The provision in question, although an essential term, may be left in adequately clear terms to be settled by an identified third party who is given power to settle ambiguities and uncertainties.

(b) But even then, if the term is so vital that leaving it to one only of the parties unacceptably removes certainty in the arrangement, the court may or may not refuse to enforce it as illusory or unacceptably uncertain: contrast, for example, May and Butcher Ltd v The King [1934] 2 KB 17(n) and the comment of Gibbs J in Godecke v Kirwan (1973) 129 CLR 629, 646–7.

(c) Where there is a readily ascertainable external standard which is proved, the court will have regard to it in order to add flesh to the provision which, on its own, is unacceptably vague and uncertain or apparently illusory. This is what happened in Sweet & Maxwell Ltd v Universal News Services Ltd [1964] 2 QB 699: see also Meehan v Jones at 589.

(d) Where a contract provides a term containing a specified range of possibilities, a court, rather than avoiding the contract will hold the party to providing at least the minimum provision in the range, that is to say the one which is the most favourable to it. This is what occurred in Lewandowski v Mead Carney-BCA Pty Ltd [1973] 2 NSWLR 640, 643. The contract had provided for the payment of a salary in the range of $7000 to $9000 per annum. This court (Jacobs P, Hardie and Bowen JJA concurring) held that the effect of the agreement between the parties was to prescribe the minimum of $7000 so that the contract was not void for uncertainty.

With these principles in mind, I now turn back to the facts of the present case. There is no contest but that the promise of an equity sharing arrangement of some kind was one of the four elements in the contract of service "package" which the appellant offered and the respondent accepted. But was it so devoid of meaning and so dependent upon the initiatives and decisions of one party only to the transaction (the appellant) as to be [137] illusory? Alternatively, was it so uncertain of content that it cannot now be enforced in its terms, even as elaborated by admissible extrinsic evidence?

The contract is illusory or its terms unenforceable

[6.40] Unfortunately, it is my opinion that the answers to both of these questions must be in the affirmative. I say unfortunately because there is little doubt that this unfulfilled term of the letter of offer handed to the respondent was important to him and was common in contracts of employment for persons with talents similar to those of the respondent. Had it been absent from the "salary package", it is at least doubtful that the respondent would have accepted the offer. What he would have done is, however, not certain. The respondent had an apparent desire, for personal reasons, to return to Australia where he had been born. But at least it was a term which he had been promised, which was important and apparently valuable and which he had accepted.

The problem for the court is that the term is just too uncertain of content. It depends for fulfilment upon the decision of one party to the agreement only, namely the appellant. There is no external standard which can be appealed to in order to fix an "appropriate" or "reasonable" equity participation scheme, even assuming that to be what was intended or what the law would impute to the appellant. The appellant is not, and never was, a publicly listed company. Accordingly, there was no external standard by which shares in the enterprise could be determined authoritatively. It was not shown in the evidence that there was any standard or market reference point for a participation scheme in the equity of a company such as the appellant. The existence of other schemes in other companies with other products and other scientists provides no such reference point such as the High Court was able to find in Godecke and Meehan.

If, however, contrary to my view, the promise was not illusory for these reasons, it was nonetheless void for uncertainty because the challenged term contained within it too many elements which are uncertain. How many shares in Biotech were to be devoted to the participation scheme? What class of shares were to be held by the senior scientists such as the respondent? What were to be the terms of the options upon [which] the shares would issue? In any differentiation between employees, where would the respondent stand? What rights would attach to the shares? Upon what terms were they to be acquired and subject to what terms disposed of by employees? Indeed, the whole complex provisions of an equity participation scheme in company shares provide the definition of the problem which the promise, in the terms in which it was made, presents for the respondent. As he knew, he accepted the offer of the appellant when no such scheme existed. At the time of the hearing before Allen J, no such scheme existed. It may never exist. It seems that the company has not proved at this stage to be as profitable as was at first expected. However that may be, the bare bones of the promise to establish such a scheme leave too many decisions to be made for a court to attempt to give content to the promise by substituting its opinion of a fair scheme in view of the failure of the appellant to establish such a scheme as the appellant promised to do. In the evidence proved in this case, I see no warrant for the court's filling in the gaps by reference to an international market in such equity participation schemes for scientists. There are too many features of apparent peculiarity in such schemes, offered by different [138] biotechnology companies, to make it safe to conclude that an objectively ascertainable external standard exists for such "equity participation schemes".

In the end, in my opinion, the court must draw back from filling the gaps which the parties did not themselves fill …

I am of the opinion that the promise of the appellant did not, in the words of Kitto J in Placer (at 357), create any contractual obligation to the respondent which he may enforce in a court of law. It was rather, in his Honour's words in Thorby v Goldberg (1964) 112 CLR 597, 603, a provision for "future arrangements" not a contract concluded before the parties. Alternatively, if it was a term of the contract, it was irredeemably vague and uncertain and so unenforceable. I am therefore led to the conclusion that the course which Allen J took, although an understandable attempt to give effect to the presumed intention of the parties, cannot be sustained by reference to legal authority …

McHUGH JA:

Was the consideration illusory?

[6.45] [150] A contract made for a consideration which is illusory is unenforceable: Placer Development Ltd v Commonwealth at 356, [151] 360–1 and Meehan v Jones (1982) 149 CLR 571, 581. A consideration is illusory if its payment or fulfilment depends upon an unfettered discretion vested in the promisor. Thus a promise by the Commonwealth that it will pay a subsidy "of an amount or at a rate determined by the Commonwealth from time to time" is an illusory consideration: Placer Development Ltd v Commonwealth. So is a promise that any services rendered by a person would "be taken into consideration, and such remuneration be made as should be deemed right": Taylor v Brewer (1813) 1 M & S 290; 105 ER 108. Likewise the consideration is illusory where an employer promises to pay "such sum of money as I may deem right as compensation for labour done": Roberts v Smith (1859) 4 H & N 315; 157 ER 861. The decision of the Privy Council in Kofi-Sunkersette Obu v A Strauss & Co Ltd [1951] AC 243 is also an illustration of an illusory consideration. The agreement between the parties provided that a "commission is also to be paid to me by the company which I have agreed to leave to the discretion of the company". The Judicial Committee said (at 250) that the court could not determine the basis and rate of the commission. "To do so would involve not only making a new agreement for the parties but varying the existing agreement by transferring to the court the exercise of the discretion vested" in the company.

In all these cases, there was an express or implied statement that the consideration was payable only if the promisor elected to do so. However, in the case of a commercial or employment agreement under which the promisee provides services, the proper conclusion ordinarily to be drawn is that the services or consideration were not intended to be performed gratuitously: compare Way v Latilla [1937] 3 All ER 759, 763. In the absence of express words or necessary implication, it will be proper to conclude that the services were to be paid for by reference to some standard of measurement. The usual standard is that of reasonable remuneration based on market or industry criteria. Where there is a firm promise to pay or remunerate the promisee in return for his services, a conclusion that the consideration was illusory will only be drawn where no standard exists by which the promise can be valued. But even when no objective criterion of measurement is available, it may still be possible to infer a promise to act honestly and/or reasonably. Moreover, notwithstanding that the promisor retains a discretion, the consideration will not be illusory if the discretion must be exercised within specified parameters. In Lewandowski v Mead Carney-BCA Pty Ltd [1973] 2 NSWLR 640, this court held that a promise to pay "a salary within a range of $7 000–$9 000 per annum" was not illusory. The promise imported an obligation to pay a minimum salary of $7 000 per annum. In Thorby v Goldberg the High Court held that a contract was made although one party was given "considerable discretion" as to how it carried out its obligations. Kitto J said (at 605) that "an agreement is not void for uncertainty because it leaves one party or group of parties a latitude of choice as to the manner in which agreed stipulations shall be carried into effect, nor does it for that reason fall short of being a concluded contract."

In the present case, Allen J thought that the promise of Biotech was not illusory because "there was a pertinent market measure". His Honour said that there was a market for the "salary packages" of scientists in the position of Dr Pace and the existence of that market "made it appropriate to apply [152] the concept of reasonableness". The order, which his Honour made remitting the assessment of damages to the master, indicates that the learned judge thought that the value of the shareholding to be acquired by Dr Pace could be ascertained by deducting his salary and car entitlement from a sum determined by reference to the overall monetary value of the remuneration of comparable scientists.

There was no evidence before his Honour as to the exact remuneration paid to "world class biotechnologists employed in commercial work of comparable standard and responsibility". However, there was evidence concerning the three offers which Dr Pace was considering at the time when he first contacted Biotech. In addition, as his Honour noted, Dr MacLennan had said that it was a common feature of an employment package offered by overseas research companies that it contained "the opportunity to acquire shares in the company". But whether the values of the salary packages paid by overseas companies were sufficiently uniform to enable a judgment to be made as to what was a "reasonably competitive" package for Dr Pace was not proved. One may be pardoned for thinking that the values of packages containing rights to participate in the issue of shares in companies in a new and speculative field would vary enormously. Some companies would succeed. Some would fail. Moreover, there would seem to be difficulties in comparing a "salary package" of a fixed sum and no equity participation, which were two of the offers Dr Pace received, with a "salary package" containing a fixed sum and shares in a research company which is commencing trading …

In the absence of evidence on the point, I would doubt that the "salary packages" of comparable scientists in the biotechnological fields could be compared in a way which would produce a criterion of reasonableness. Counsel for Dr Pace contended that difficulties in formulating a standard could only affect the measure of damages and not whether Biotech was liable. However, since the onus was on Dr Pace to prove that the promise of Biotech was part of the consideration for his services, the approach of Allen J requires that Dr Pace prove that the promise could be valued [153] independently of what Biotech might ultimately offer by way of equity participation. It is, however, unnecessary to determine whether, as his Honour thought, there was "a pertinent market measure". For there is another ground which leads me not to accept the approach of the learned judge.

His Honour's approach necessarily involved the conclusion that not only was Biotech obliged to offer shares to Dr Pace but also that a court could say, by reference to the "pertinent market measure", whether any actual offer accorded with the promise of Biotech. However, even if one accepts that there was a benchmark by which the reasonableness of the offer could be measured, I think that the parties did not intend that the offer should be judged against that benchmark. I think that the conclusion to be drawn from the parties' conversations is that, although there was to be a participating share scheme, both sides recognised that its formulation was dependent on factors special to Biotech and its relationship with CRA and that ultimately it was Biotech which would decide both the nature of the scheme and the rights of the individuals participating in it.

From the beginning, Dr Pace was aware that no definite scheme had been formulated …

[154] Mr Bathurst [counsel for Dr Pace] argued that the terms of such an agreement would not be void for uncertainty. He relied on Thorby v Goldberg at 613–14 and Meehan v Jones at 580–2, 589–91 and 597. These decisions show that a contract is not void for uncertainty because the carrying out of obligations of one party is left to his discretion. The ratio of Thorby is that an agreement is not void because it gives one party "a latitude of choice as to the manner in which agreed stipulations shall be carried into effect". In the [155] present case nothing was agreed except that Dr Pace would be entitled to participate in the equity staff scheme. Thorby might arguably be in point if the parties had agreed on the number and class of shares which Dr Pace was to receive but left other details to be formulated by Biotech. In Meehan v Jones the High Court held that a contract was enforceable although it was subject to a condition of "the purchaser or his nominee receiving approval for finance on satisfactory terms and conditions". The court held that it was for the purchaser to determine whether the condition was satisfied and that he must act honestly … The ratio of the decision, however, throws no light on the question whether the offer of participation in the equity share scheme was binding on Biotech.

If the letter of 24 December 1980 had stood alone, the promise of participation in the share scheme would have contained an undertaking that the scheme existed. In McRae v Commonwealth Disposals Commission (1951) 84 CLR 377, the High Court held that there was a contract between the parties where the Commission had sold an oil tanker which did not exist. Dixon and Fullagar JJ said (at 410) that there "was a contract, and the Commission contracted that a tanker existed in the position specified". But here the parties knew that the share scheme did not exist.

The question then arises as to whether the promise of Biotech that Dr Pace could participate in the scheme imported a further promise that it would bring the scheme into existence. That is, was there a promise that Dr Pace could participate only if and when a scheme was formulated? Or was there a promise that a scheme would be formulated? Clearly both parties assumed that the scheme would come into existence. But it does not follow that the assumption of Biotech and its promise of participation imported a promise that it would implement the scheme …

Accordingly, I do not think that there was any express promise, as opposed to a representation, that Biotech would institute the scheme. Nor do I think that such a promise should be implied. Both parties assumed that there would be a share scheme. Biotech clearly intended to bring such a [156] scheme into effect. But I do not think that it made a promise to Dr Pace that it would do so. The action brought by Dr Pace must fail.

Even if Biotech had made an express or implied promise to implement a scheme, I do not think the submission on behalf of Dr Pace could be upheld or at all events that its breach would require more than nominal damages. The promise is too illusory or too vague and uncertain to be enforceable or, if it is not, its breach would only give rise to nominal damages. There is no standard by which a court could determine in any meaningful sense whether such a promise was broken …

[6.50] HOPE JA [dissenting; after reviewing the more recent decisions on the topic, including those of the High Court, his Honour continued]:

[143] All these decisions show how far courts are prepared to go in order to find that there is an enforceable contractual promise where that is what the parties have intended. There are of course limitations. I have already referred to the case where the promisor has a discretion, not only as to what he shall do, but also as to whether he shall do anything. Such a promise is illusory. Furthermore it appears that the promise will not be enforceable if the manner of performance, including the amount of money to be paid or, if relevant, the number of shares to be offered, is a matter entirely in the discretion of the promisor and no criteria by which the performance required of the promisor can be measured, or the minimum of that performance can be measured, is expressed or can be found to be implied …

As it seems to me this was also the basis of the decision of the High Court in Placer Development Ltd v Commonwealth …

[145] Allen J concluded that what was to be offered to Dr Pace should be measured by reference to an international standard … With respect to the learned judge, I am unable to accept this approach. Biotech's promise related to the remuneration of the inducement to Dr Pace to work for a particular company in Sydney. It is in that context that the problem has to be considered and not in the context of what benefits top scientists might receive from other companies in countries in other parts of the world. I think that Biotech would undoubtedly look at international experience in deciding what to do, and that any expert giving evidence could have regard to it, but it would not determine the matter.

If this criteria is not available, what is left? As it seems to me, Biotech was bound at least to make an offer which was an honest one, which gave Dr Pace an option of real and not nominal value and which, in the light of all the circumstances, including the matters in contemplation of the parties at the time when the agreement was made, including the potential of the company, could be found to be reasonable.

The law has filled innumerable lacunae in the contractual arrangements of parties by applying a doctrine of reasonableness. Reasonableness is partly but not wholly coincidental with honesty. Dishonesty could not be reasonable, but no doubt a lack of reasonableness covers both honest and dishonest acts. Can the concepts of honesty and reasonableness be imported as criteria by which to determine the minimum obligation of Biotech?

I have already referred to the dicta of Lord Wright in Hillas on the importation of reasonableness into contracts. Those dicta did not formulate some new concept; they were based on long-standing principle. A more recent decision importing reasonableness in respect of performance is to be found in the decision of the English Court of Appeal in Powell v Braun [1954] 1 WLR 401. There Powell had been employed [146] by Braun as his secretary in his business for two years. He wrote to her expressing satisfaction at her services in the past and the wish that she would undertake additional responsibility in the future. He offered to pay her, in recognition of those past services and the additional responsibility, a bonus on the net trading profits of the business instead of an increase in salary. Powell accepted this offer. The Court of Appeal held that the contract was enforceable, that the parties had not intended that the payment of the bonus was to be purely in the discretion of Braun and that Powell was entitled to a reasonable sum. Evershed MR (at 405; 486) said:

> Assisted as I have been by the cases cited, which illustrate the approach which the court makes in cases of this kind, I conclude here, as a matter of construction, that the parties did not mean and intend the payment of a bonus to be purely discretionary.
> That, however, leaves the further question whether the whole document is in its terms and character too vague and general to be capable of supporting a claim of this kind. Again I reject that view. Once it is concluded that this was not to be a reward in the discretion of the defendant, then inevitably it must mean, according to its terms, that the sum to be paid — unless the parties chose from time to time to agree some other figure — would be a reasonable sum; that is, a sum arrived at so as to bear a reasonable relationship to the trading profit. Of course, if there were no trading profit, no doubt there would be no so called bonus; but, in any other event, then I think that the principle of a quantum meruit or of reasonable remuneration (which comes to the same thing) is no less applicable where the remuneration in question is additional remuneration — that is over and above the fixed salary — than it is to a case where it is the only remuneration.

In a rather different context a similar approach was adopted in Meehan v Jones …

[147] Trying, as in my opinion the court is bound to do, to give effect to the intention of the parties, I find it difficult not to conclude that as well as being required to establish a scheme, Biotech was required to give Dr Pace an option on terms which it had honestly arrived at, that is to say, on terms arrived at in honestly trying to perform its promise and not merely going through the motions of doing so. Next I see no reason why the concept of reasonableness should not also be imported. The role of staff equity sharing schemes in employment contracts is sufficiently well established to enable courts to apply the concept of reasonableness to them, in the same way as they are able to apply it to bonuses. The schemes are more complex than bonuses, but that merely makes the resolution of the problem more difficult; it does not deny the possibility of resolution.

Neither honesty nor reasonableness would identify the precise amount of the offer which Biotech would decide to make, but they would in my opinion provide criteria to fix the amount of the minimum offer Biotech was required to make. The circumstances which would have to be taken into account in determining reasonableness in such a context are many and varied, and having regard to the way in which the case has been divided, I doubt that evidence concerning them, or at least all of them, has been tendered. This is the result of severing the issue of liability from the issue of damages. However part of those circumstances would be that Biotech's promise was intended to induce Dr Pace to join and to remain with it, and that the parties intended that the value of the option granted should not be less than what ought reasonably [to] have induced Dr Pace to join and to remain with Biotech. No doubt there was also to be considered the nature, size and like circumstances of the company, and its profit potential. However I do not think that the law is so removed from commercial and employment practice and exercise that expert evidence should not be admissible to establish what the minimum reasonable amount should be. [148] Hobhouse J referred to some of the considerations that would be relevant in determining what was equitable in the decision in Didymi Corp v Atlantic Lines & Navigation Co Inc (The "Didymi") [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep 108. In cases involving the assessment of compensation for or valuation of land, valuers regularly give evidence of the value of the most obscure and unlikely, and indeed artificial, interests. If in the event that the evidence is not available, Dr Pace would be entitled only to nominal damages. However in my opinion the proper conclusion at this stage of the hearing is that as there was a valid and enforceable contractual promise on the part of Biotech to establish a senior staff equity sharing scheme and that the promise was not unenforceable for uncertainty or as being illusory …

Whitlock v Brew

[6.55] Whitlock v Brew (1968) 118 CLR 445 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: Whitlock (the vendor/appellant) agreed to sell, and Brew (the purchaser/respondent) agreed to buy an area of land for the price of £165,000. A contract of sale was drawn up and signed by both parties.

Clause 5, one of the "special conditions" of the contract, provided:

> Portion of the land sold is used for the sale of petroleum, oils and greases and petroleum products of the Shell Co of Australia Limited. The purchaser covenants that he will immediately upon taking possession hereunder grant a lease of that portion of the land sold as is now used for the sale of the abovementioned products to the Shell Co of Australia Limited upon terms that the said land leased as aforesaid be used by Shell or their sub-tenant or licensee for the sale of such products and upon such reasonable terms as commonly govern such a lease. In the event of any dispute between the parties as to the interpretation or operation of this clause such dispute shall be referred to an arbitrator to be appointed failing agreement as to an arbitrator by the President for the time being of the Law Institute of Victoria and such arbitrator shall arbitrate thereon in accordance with the provisions of the Arbitration Act 1958.

The purchaser paid a deposit of £15,600 but thereafter declined to complete the purchase. The vendor, in pursuance of his rights under the contract rescinded it and kept the deposit. The purchaser brought action in the Supreme Court to recover the deposit on the ground that the contract was void for uncertainty.

The trial judge held that cl 5 was void but as it was severable from the rest of the contract, the whole contract was not void and entered judgment for the vendor. An appeal to the Full Court of the Supreme Court by the purchaser was successful. The vendor appealed to the High Court.]

KITTO J: [456] The main problem in this case arises not from any uncertainty of language in the document headed "contract of sale" but from the omission of the parties to reach a concluded agreement upon the matter to which Special Condition 5 is addressed. The clause contains a so called covenant by the purchaser that immediately upon taking possession of the subject land he will grant a lease of a portion of the land to the Shell Co of Australia Ltd. The portion is defined as that which "is used" (that is, at the date of the document) for the sale of petroleum, oils and greases and petroleum products of the Shell Co. I am prepared to assume that the vendor is right in saying, as he does, that this description is sufficient to enable the portion to be identified. As regards the term of the lease, it sufficiently appears, I think, that the commencing date is to be the date when the purchaser obtains possession. But upon no other topic does the document indicate what the provisions of the lease are to be. It does say that the lease is to be granted "upon such reasonable terms as commonly govern such a lease", and that would have been enough if evidence had established that for such a lease an ascertainable set of reasonable terms are in common use. But this has not been established, and the result is that the document does not record a consensus ad idem as to the duration of the term, the rent, or anything else except the commencing date and the premises intended to be let. Provision is indeed made for arbitration in the event of any dispute between the parties "as to the interpretation or operation of this clause", and I should have understood this as extending to any dispute as to what terms are reasonable and commonly govern such a lease, if in fact any such terms had existed. But it clearly would not authorise an arbitrator to force upon the purchaser such terms as he (the arbitrator) might think are reasonable and ought [457] commonly to govern such a lease, for to do so would be to alter the contract.

The problem to which I have referred as the main problem is whether the fact that Special Condition 5 is, for this reason, of no contractual effect carries the consequence that the whole document is in like case, or whether, on the other hand, the provisions of the document apart from Special Condition 5 constitute by themselves a concluded contract from which that condition is properly to be considered a separate and severable provision … It is therefore clear on the face of the document that the parties had no intention of agreeing upon a sale which would entitle the purchaser to receive vacant possession without having to grant any lease to the Shell Co; and it follows that to treat the "contract" as binding although shorn of Special Condition 5 would be to turn the sale into a different sort of sale from that which the parties contemplated. Courts are of course anxious to hold parties to what they have agreed upon, but there can be no justification for holding them to something they have not agreed upon. In my opinion the decision of the Full Court of the Supreme Court that no concluded contract of sale was made between the parties is correct; and as it is agreed that if that be so the purchaser is entitled to recover the moneys he paid to the vendor under the supposed contract the Full Court's order that judgment be entered for the purchaser on his claim should be affirmed …

[6.60] TAYLOR, MENZIES AND OWEN JJ: [460] The first question to be considered is whether the contention that Special Condition 5 is uncertain should be upheld. The appellant asserts that it should not and that, in effect, that clause simply provides that in the event of there being no agreement as to the terms of the contemplated lease, including both the period during which it is to subsist and the rent to be paid, the parties shall enter into a lease in the form settled by an arbitrator. Of course, if this were so the basis for the contention that the clause is uncertain would disappear. But the language of the clause does not permit of this view. The lease is to be "upon such reasonable terms as commonly govern such a lease" and in the event of a dispute "as to the interpretation or operation" of the clause the dispute is to be referred to arbitration. We are firmly of opinion that the expression "upon such reasonable terms as govern such a lease" is not, in the context in which it appears, apt to refer to either the period for which the contemplated lease is to subsist or to the rent to be payable thereunder. Nor do we think that the further expression "as to the interpretation or operation" of this clause covers a dispute as to either of those matters. We, therefore, are of opinion that the clause is uncertain in that it neither specifies [461] nor provides a means for the determination as between the parties of the period for which the contemplated lease shall be granted or the rent which shall be payable thereunder.

It, therefore, becomes necessary to determine whether the condition is severable from the rest of the provisions of the contract or whether the whole contract falls. On this point the learned judge of first instance after referring to the observations of Knox CJ in Life Insurance Co of Australia Ltd v Phillips (1925) 36 CLR 60, and to Fitzgerald v Masters (1956) 95 CLR 420, held that the condition was of such a quality that it could be ignored. But those cases and Nicolene Ltd v Simmonds [1953] 1 QB 543, to which also he made a reference, are simply particular examples of conclusions reached by the application of a general principle. That general principle is stated by Knox CJ in the first-mentioned case (at 472):

> When a contract contains a number of stipulations one of which is void for uncertainty, the question whether the whole contract is void depends on the intention of the parties to be gathered from the instrument as a whole. If the contract be divisible, the part which is void may be separated from the rest and does not affect its validity.

Observations in the same case make it clear that in seeking to ascertain the intention of the parties to a written contract extrinsic evidence may not be resorted to except where such evidence may be called in aid in the interpretation of the written instrument. Clearly enough, it seems to us, it is not to the point to make an independent examination of extrinsic facts, even if they were within the knowledge of both parties, and upon such evidence to conclude that a particular provision was or was not of importance to them or to either of them; the question for determination is the intention of the parties as disclosed by the contract into which they have entered … Of course, cases may arise where a vague, uncertain or meaningless clause in a contract may simply be ignored … But Special Condition 5 does not fall into any such category; nor can it be said to be a clause inserted solely for the benefit of one of the parties and capable of being waived by him. It is, in a sense, [462] definitive of the ultimate rights which it is contemplated the purchaser is to get under his contract. The clause provides that the respondent will immediately upon taking possession grant a lease the effect of which will be to deprive him of possession of part of the land in return for a promise to pay rent. Of course, the Shell Co is in no way obliged to take a lease but it is clear enough from the terms of the contract that it was contemplated that it would. The case is, perhaps, not as clear as the case where a contract for the sale of land is entered into with a reservation to the vendor of an unspecified part … The case more closely resembles Duggan v Barnes [1923] VLR 27, where A agreed to sell land to B for a stated price and B undertook to grant a lease to any person who should purchase A's business. There the court had no difficulty in holding that B's undertaking was a material and inseverable part of the considerations for A's promises. In our view the same conclusion must be reached in this case and the fact that here it is the purchaser, and not the vendor, who is asserting the invalidity of the contract is of no consequence. In our opinion the appellant's appeal should be dismissed …

[McTIERNAN J dissented.]

Appeal dismissed.

Hall v Busst

[6.65] Hall v Busst (1960) 104 CLR 206 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: In 1949, Hall purchased from Busst land comprising Bedarra Island, a small island off the coast of Queensland, along with all chattels on the island. The purchase price was £3,157 4s 0d. Under the terms of the contract, Hall agreed not to resell the land without obtaining Busst's consent first. The contract provided that, on the giving of notice of a proposed sale, Busst would have an option to repurchase the land. Clause 5 provided that:

> The purchase price relating to such option shall be the sum of £3 157 4s 0d to which shall be added the value of all additions and improvements to the said property since date of purchase by the grantor … and from which shall be subtracted the value of all deficiencies in chattel property and a reasonable sum to cover depreciation of all buildings and other property on the land.

In 1957, Hall sold the land and chattels to a third party for £8,500 without giving notice to Busst. Busst sought damages for breach of contract. The Supreme Court of Queensland held that Busst was entitled to damages. The High Court (Dixon CJ, Fullagar and Menzies JJ; Kitto and Windeyer JJ dissenting) held that the option was not enforceable because the price was uncertain.]

DIXON CJ: [216] Of course there is no difficulty about the money sum stated. But that is merely the return of the original price paid by the defendant as purchaser. The point lies in what is added. It is in effect the payment or recompense to the defendant in respect of her work and expenditure in the meantime. The addition is to consist of the value of all additions and improvements to the property since her purchase of the island less the value of all deficiencies of chattel property and a reasonable sum to cover depreciation of all buildings and other property …. "[T]he value of all additions and improvements" is not, in my opinion, sufficiently certain to give rise to an enforceable contract. There could be no external standard of value of additions and improvements to the island: no standard yielding a figure reasonably fixed or ascertainable. Still less would it be possible to find an external standard for the reasonable sum to cover depreciation even if one knew what "other property" is referred to. And indeed the value of deficiencies is another uncertain element in the ascertainment of the price. It is said that "value" or "fair value" is to be found objectively by a jury. But here we are dealing with substantive rights, not the procedure by which they are enforced. Can it be supposed that men contract to pay a price if and when fixed by a jury in a law suit? I am aware that it is said … that it is enough if a contract for the sale of land stipulates expressly or impliedly that the price shall be the fair value … But that could only be when a recognized value or standard of value measuring the price existed. It would be, so it seems to me, as absurd to [217] apply this to an island off the coast of Queensland as it would be to apply it to a great modern city building. In any case it is not a price consisting of the fair value of land that we are dealing with.

In my opinion the price described in cl 5 is unascertained and is too uncertain to be the basis of an enforceable contract. The option is therefore unenforceable.

[6.70] FULLAGAR J: [222] So far as contracts for the sale of goods are concerned, there may or may not be a general rule, applicable in respect of executory, as distinct from executed, contracts, that, where the price is not otherwise determined, a promise to pay a reasonable price is to be implied … But such a rule, if it exists, is anomalous. The contract contemplated here is not a contract for the sale of goods: it is a contract for the sale of "land and improvements". In such a case there cannot, I think, be held to be a binding contract unless the three essential elements are the subject of concluded agreement. The three essential elements are the parties, the subject matter and the price. If, but only if, these are fixed with certainty, the law will supply the rest. When it is said that the price must be fixed with certainty, it is not, of course, meant that it must be fixed at a specified figure. It will be sufficient if the sale is expressed to be for a price or value to be fixed by a named or described person. In such a case, if the named or described person dies or cannot or will not fix the price or value, the contract cannot, as a general rule, be enforced, but, if and when he does fix the price or value, there is a concluded contract. If, however, the parties are silent as to the price, there can be no implication of a term that a reasonable price is to be paid. And it is not, in my opinion sufficient, if the sale is expressed to be "for the value of the land" or "for the fair value of the land" or "for a reasonable price".

[6.75] WINDEYER J (dissenting): [240] The concepts of a reasonable price for goods sold, and of reasonable remuneration for services rendered, and indeed of contractual stipulations, express or implied, for reasonable time and reasonable notice, and also the right to a reasonable compensation for the use and occupation of land are all the products of similar developments. And all originally met with the same objections. In the argument before us an attempt was made to found something upon one distinction between sales of goods and sales of land. In a contract for the sale of goods, if there be no price fixed, the law provides that the buyer must pay a reasonable price. It is said that it is to be inferred that this was the intention of the parties. There is no similar rule in the case of a sale of land. If nothing be expressly stipulated as to the price there can be no concluded contract for the sale of land …. But once admit, as English law does but the Civil law does not, that there is such a thing as a reasonable price then it seems to me that in our law the distinction between sales of lands and of chattels is not that an effective agreement can be made to sell a chattel for a reasonable price but an effective agreement to sell land cannot. It is, rather, that if persons would contract to sell land for a reasonable price they must do so expressly; whereas on a sale of chattels an obligation to pay a reasonable price is imposed by law when the parties are silent as to price. But surely the parties to a transaction concerning land can make an express agreement in the terms that in a sale of goods the law can infer that they made? And it is by such an inference or implication of what the parties intended should be the terms of their arrangement that the common law arrived at its [241] rule in the case of chattels. The conclusion that seems to be warranted by logic is, I think, confirmed by history ….

[245] When parties agree to sell for a reasonable price or at a fair valuation they do not leave an essential term of their bargain for further agreement, so that their agreement is incomplete. It is complete. They have fixed the price by a measure that the law knows. If they disagree as to what sum of money fills that measure, a court will determine it, at common law by a jury … To sum up my opinion: The parties executed the deed intending it to be legally binding. They changed their positions in the belief that it was. They expressed their intention in language that was sufficiently certain to create legal obligations. For these reasons … the provisions of cl 5 of the deed for ascertaining the price payable if the option were exercised are valid.

Appeal allowed.

Agreements to negotiate

United Group Rail Services Ltd v Rail Corporation NSW

[6.80] United Group Rail Services Limited v Rail Corporation New South Wales [2009] NSWCA 177; (2009) 74 NSWLR 618 (Supreme Court of New South Wales Court of Appeal) – Appeal from the decision of Rein J.

[FACTS: United entered into two contracts with Railcorp under which United agreed to design and build new rolling stock. The contract contained a long and detailed clause setting out the process to be followed in the event of a dispute arising between the parties. The process was to be initiated by service of a notice of dispute and then involved expert adjudication, negotiation, mediation and arbitration. United sought to avoid the dispute resolution procedure and proceed straight to litigation but could only do so if the dispute resolution clause was void for uncertainty. The primary judge held that it was not. The critical provision was cl 35.11, which was as follows:

35.11 Negotiation

If:

(a) a notice of appeal is given in accordance with Clause 35.9; or

(b) the dispute or difference for which the notice under Clause 35.1 has been given does not relate to a Direction of the Principal's Representative under one of the Clauses referred to in Attachment "A", the dispute or difference is to be referred to a senior representative of each of the Principal and Contractor who must:

(c) meet and undertake genuine and good faith negotiations with a view to resolving the dispute or difference; and

(d) if they cannot resolve the dispute or difference within 14 days after the giving of the notice under Clause 35.1 or 35.9 (whichever is later), the matter at issue will be referred to the Australian Dispute Centre for mediation.]

ALLSOP P:

The issues

[6.85] [21] United … asserted (and Railcorp denied) that subcl 35.11(c) was … uncertain and therefore void and unenforceable.

[22] Most importantly, United asserted (and Railcorp denied) that cl 35.12 (providing for the reference to arbitration) was not severable from cl 35.11, such that in circumstances where subcl 35.11(d) or subcl 35.11(c) and (d) was or were void and unenforceable, cl 35.12 was likewise void and unenforceable. The result of this argument, if it were accepted, would be that any dispute will be justiciable in Court, where the power to send any dispute to a referee would be available. The consequences and commercial relevance of success of United's arguments were not explored.

Subclause 35.11(c) and good faith negotiations

[6.100] [28] The obligation on the parties in subcl 35.11(c) is to refer the dispute or difference to a senior representative of each party (a category of employee, agent or officer which no one said was uncertain). Those persons must meet and undertake negotiations. The qualification is that negotiations must be "genuine and good faith negotiations". …

[29] The status of a clause purporting in terms to create a legal obligation to negotiate or to negotiate in a particular way, such as here – genuinely and in good faith and, in particular, whether such a clause is intended to be legally binding, and, if so whether it has a sufficiently certain content to be enforceable has been the subject of some debate in the common law world for some time.

History of the authorities

[6.105] [30] At a time when the common law of England, to a significant degree, determined the common law in Australia (see for example: Public Transport Commission of NSW v J Murray-More (NSW) Pty Limited (1975) 132 CLR 336, 341 and 349 and the Judiciary Act 1903 (Cth), s 80 (before its amendment in 1988 by the Law and Justice Legislation Amendment Act 1988 (Cth), s 41)) the views of the English Court of Appeal and the House of Lords were often decisive. This is not now the case, and has not been at least since 1986: Cook v Cook (1986) 162 CLR 376, 389-390 and the Australia Acts 1986 (Cth) and (UK). Foreign (including English) precedents are useful to the degree of persuasiveness of their reasoning.

[31] In 1932, in Hillas & Co Limited v Arcos Limited [1932] All ER Rep 494 at 505-507, Lord Wright expressed the view that a contract to negotiate was enforceable, saying (at 505 and 39-40):

> There is then no bargain except to negotiate, and negotiations may be fruitless and end without any contract ensuing; yet even then in strict theory, there is a contract (if there is good consideration) to negotiate, though in the event of repudiation by one party the damages may be nominal, unless a jury think that the opportunity to negotiate was of some appreciable value to the injured party.

[33] In 1975, Lord Denning MR and Lord Diplock in Courtney & Fairbairn Ltd v Tolaini Brothers (Hotels) Ltd [1975] 1 WLR 297, in extempore judgments, expressed their blunt and forceful views that Lord Wright was wrong in Hillas v Arcos.

[38] In July 1991, the New South Wales Court of Appeal delivered judgment in Coal Cliff Colieries Pty Ltd v Sijehama Pty Ltd (1991) 24 NSWLR 1. The case concerned a heads of agreement about a proposed joint venture for a new coal mine on the south coast of New South Wales. The heads of agreement outlined the basis of the proposal for the development of the joint venture and the coal mine. The heads of agreement commenced with the following statement:

> This document will serve to record the terms and conditions subject to and upon which Coal Cliff Collieries Pty Ltd, Sijehama and Bulli Main agree to associate themselves in an unincorporated joint venture … The parties will forthwith proceed in good faith to consult together upon the formulation of a more comprehensive and detailed Joint Venture Agreement (and any associated agreements) which when approved and executed will take the place of these Heads of Agreement, but the action of the parties in so consulting and in negotiating on fresh or additional terms shall not in the meantime in any way prejudice the full and binding effect of what is now agreed. (emphasis added)

[39] Negotiations took place. Numerous drafts of the proposed joint venture were prepared, without agreement; further drafts of heads of agreement were prepared, again with no agreement. Negotiations of some intensity lasted 16 months. Thereafter, negotiations continued less intensively for some years until one party withdrew from the negotiations.

[40] Kirby P, in discussing the principles of contract formation and agreements to negotiate, referred (at 21-22) to the considerable American academic discussion dealing with negotiation in good faith. As Kirby P noted, that discussion revealed a divergence of opinion about the proper role of the law in the enforcement of contracts to negotiate. Kirby P recognised that the courts will not enforce an agreement to agree: Booker Industries Pty Ltd v Wilson Parking (Qld) Pty Ltd (1982) 149 CLR 600, 604. His Honour referred to the rejection by the English Court of Appeal in Courtney of the "flirtation" by Lord Wright in Hillas v Arcos; to the following of Courtney in Mallozzi v Carapelli and to the other considerations including those attending the development of American law. His Honour expressed the view that if parties have bound themselves expressly to negotiate in good faith they should be held to it, if circumstances otherwise did not reveal a lack of intention to contract or the circumstances revealed no lack of certainty of content. Kirby P said at 26:

> … I do not share the opinion of the English Court of Appeal that no promise to negotiate in good faith would ever be enforced by a court. I reject the notion that such a contract is unknown to the law, whatever its term [sic: terms]. I agree with Lord Wright's speech in Hillas that, provided there was consideration for the promise, in some circumstance a promise to negotiate in good faith will be enforceable, depending upon its precise terms. Likewise I agree with Pain J in Donwin that, so long as the promise is clear and part of an undoubted > agreement between the parties, the courts will not adopt a general principle that relief for the breach of such promise must be withheld.

[44] In the contract before the Court in Coal Cliff, Kirby P was of the view that the promise in the heads of agreement was too vague, illusory, and uncertain to be enforceable. The essential reasoning of his Honour was expressed succinctly at 27 as follows:

> The review of the considerations which lead me to this conclusion has already been stated. This was not a case where an external arbitrator was nominated to resolve outstanding differences. There were many such differences at the time of the heads of agreement and a number remain even three years later when negotiations were finally broken off. A court would be extremely ill-equipped to fill the remaining blank spaces and to resolve questions which three years of painful negotiation between the solicitors for the parties had failed to remove. A court could not, in this case, appeal to objective standards or to its own experience — as it might in filling a blank space in a lease of domestic premises or a contract less complex and more familiar than one for a major mining development. At stake are commercial decisions involving adjustments which would contemplate binding the parties for years and deciding issues that lie well beyond the expertise of a court. How mining executives, attending to the interests of their corporation and its shareholders might act in negotiating such a complex transaction is quite unknowable. Therefore, although I agree with Clarke J that some contracts to negotiate in good faith may be enforced by our law, this was not such a contract. I repeat the caution which I have expressed elsewhere (as I did in Biotechnology Australia Pty Ltd v Pace) that courts should hold back from giving effect to arrangements which the parties have not concluded, at least in circumstances such as the present. …

[45] Handley JA approached the matter quite differently to Kirby P. His Honour saw an agreement to negotiate in good faith as necessarily illusory, saying at 41-42:

>
> Parties negotiating for a contract are free to pursue their own interests as they see fit. Within broad limits each is under no legal duty to consider the interests of the other. …
>
> Negotiations are conducted at the discretion of the parties. They may withdraw or continue; accept, counter offer or reject; compromise or refuse, trade-off concessions on one matter for gains on another and be as unwilling, willing or anxious and as fast or as slow as they think fit.
>
> To my mind these considerations demonstrate that a promise to negotiate in good faith is illusory and therefore cannot be binding.

[47] Waddell AJA agreed "generally" with the reasons of Kirby P.

[48] Five months after Coal Cliff was handed down, argument took place in the House of Lords in Walford v Miles [1992] 2 AC 128. Judgment in Walford v Miles was delivered in January 1992. The case concerned a so-called "lock out" agreement in which one party agreed to terminate negotiations with a third party in return for a promise by the other to continue negotiations and that that comprised a completed collateral agreement to another agreement that was "subject to contract" Lord Ackner delivered the leading speech with which Lord Keith of Kinkel, Lord Goff of Chieveley, Lord Jauncey of Tullichettle and Lord Browne-Wilkinson agreed. Lord Ackner … said at 138:

> … The reason why an agreement to negotiate, like an agreement to agree, is unenforceable is simply because it lacks the necessary certainty. … This uncertainty is demonstrated in the instant case by the provision which it is said has to be implied in the agreement for the determination of the negotiations. How can a court be expected to decide whether, subjectively, a proper reason existed for the termination of negotiations? The answer suggested depends upon whether the negotiations have been determined "in good faith". However, the concept of a duty to carry on negotiations in good faith is inherently repugnant > to the adversarial position of the parties when involved in negotiations. Each party to the negotiations is entitled to pursue his (or her) own interest, so long as he avoids making misrepresentations. To advance that interest he must be entitled, if he thinks it appropriate, to threaten to withdraw from further negotiations or to withdraw in fact in the hope that the opposite party may seek to reopen the negotiations by offering him improved terms. Mr Naughton, of course, accepts that the agreement upon which he relies does not contain a duty to complete the negotiations. But that still leaves the vital question — how is a vendor ever to know that he is entitled to withdraw from further negotiations? How is the court to police such an "agreement"? A duty to negotiate in good faith is as unworkable in practice as it is inherently inconsistent with the position of a negotiating party. It is here that the uncertainty lies. In my judgment, while negotiations are in existence either party is entitled to withdraw from these negotiations, at any time and for any reason. There can be thus no obligation to continue to negotiate until there is a "proper reason" to withdraw. Accordingly, a bare agreement to negotiate has no legal content.

Coal Cliff was not referred to.

Consideration of the proper approach

[6.110] [56] Before turning to the terms of the clause in question, given the juristic debate that has taken place about agreements to negotiate in good faith, it is helpful to begin with some essential propositions founded on accepted authority and principle. First, an agreement to agree is incomplete, lacking essential terms: Booker at 604. (That is not a question of uncertainty or vagueness, but the absence of essential terms.)

[57] Secondly, the task of the Court is to give effect to business contracts where there is a meaning capable of being ascribed to a word or phrase or term or contract, ambiguity not being vagueness: Upper Hunter County District Council v Australian Chilling and Freezing Co Limited (1968) 118 CLR 429, 436-437; New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v AM Satterthwaite & Co Ltd [1975] AC 154, 167; Meehan v Jones (1982) 149 CLR 571, 589; and Trawl Industries at 332. (The commercial law should foster and support commercial practice, not fight it: see Devlin J writing extracurially "The Relation Between Commercial Law and Commercial Practice" (1951) 14 Modern Law Review 249.)

[58] Thirdly, good faith is not a concept foreign to the common law, the law merchant or businessmen and women. It has been an underlying concept in the law merchant for centuries … It is recognised as part of the law of performance of contracts in numerous sophisticated commercial jurisdictions: for example Uniform Commercial Code ss 1-201 and 1-203 (1977) … UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts (2004 Ed, Rome 2004) Art 1.7; R Zimmerman and S Whittaker Good Faith in European Contract Law (CUP 2000). It has been recognised by this Court to be part of the law of performance of contracts: Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works (1992) 26 NSWLR 234, 263-270; Hughes Bros Pty Ltd v Trustees of the Roman Catholic Church for the Archdiocese of Sydney (1993) 31 NSWLR 91; Burger King Corporation v Hungry Jack's Pty Ltd at 565-574 [141]-[187]; and Alcatel Australia Ltd v Scarcella at 363-369. In Alcatel Sheller JA (with the express and unqualified agreement of Powell JA and Beazley JA) said the following at 369:

> The decisions in Renard Constructions and Hughes Bros mean that in New South Wales a duty of good faith, both in performing obligations and exercising rights, may by implication be imposed upon parties as part of a contract. There is no reason why such a duty should not be implied as part of this lease.

[60] It is fair to say that caution (in some cases a lack of enthusiasm) has been expressed by some, for example: Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council [2002] HCA 5; (2002) 240 CLR 4 [88] and [155] … Service Station Association Ltd v Berg Bennett & Associates Pty Ltd (1993) 45 FCR 84 at 91-98 … Esso Australia Resources Pty Ltd v Southern Pacific Petroleum NL [2005] VSCA 228 …

[61] Whilst this necessarily incomplete review of authorities reveals that the law in Australia is not settled as to the place of good faith in the law of contracts, this Court should work from the position that it has said on at least three occasions (not including Renard) that good faith, in some degree or to some extent, is part of the law of performance of contracts. It is unnecessary to go beyond this proposition to gain assistance in the construction of this particular clause of this contract. …

[62] Whilst there is some doubt as to the extent of concurrence of Waddell AJA in Coal Cliff (see the use of the word "generally"), nevertheless the considered reasons of Kirby P with which Waddell AJA agreed (generally) conform to the general approach taken by the Court in Hughes, Alcatel and Burger King and by the Victorian Court of Appeal in Con Kallergis.

[63] Further, in my view, Kirby P's reasons are more persuasive than the competing authority. I say this with the utmost respect to those who have expressed a contrary view and recognising that the issue is one that has produced different expressions of view among great commercial judges on appeal: for example, Lord Wright, Lord Denning, Lord Diplock, Kirby P and Handley JA and among highly experienced commercial judges at first instance in this Court …

[6.115] [64] I turn to the major contrary appellate decisions. In relation to Courtney, the reasoning of Lord Denning MR equated an agreement to negotiate with an agreement to agree. The latter is, of course, not enforceable: Booker at 604 (Gibbs CJ, Murphy J and Wilson J), as Kirby P recognised in Coal Cliff. It does not follow, however, that an agreement to undertake negotiations in good faith fails for the same reason. An agreement to agree to another agreement may be incomplete if it lacks essential terms of the future bargain. An agreement to negotiate, if viewed as an agreement to behave in a particular way may be uncertain, but is not incomplete. The objection that no court could estimate the damages because no one could tell whether the negotiations "would be" successful ignores the availability of damages for the loss of a bargained for valuable commercial opportunity: Chaplin v Hicks [1911] 2 KB 786; Sellars v Adelaide Petroleum NL (1994) 179 CLR 332 at 349 ff. The relevant question is whether the clause has certain content.

[65] Nor, with respect, do I find the views of Lord Ackner in Walford v Miles persuasive. An obligation to undertake discussions about a subject in an honest and genuine attempt to reach an identified result is not incomplete. It may be referable to a standard concerned with conduct assessed by subjective standards, but that does not make the standard or compliance with the standard impossible of assessment. Honesty is such a standard: cf Royal Brunei Airlines Sdn Bhd v Tan [1995] 2 AC 378 and Twinsectra Ltd v Yardley [2002] 2 AC 164. Whether it is capable of assessment depends on whether there is a standard of behaviour that is capable of having legal content. Asserting its uncertainty does not answer the question. The assertion that each party has an unfettered right to have regard to any of its own interests on any basis begs the question as to what constraint the party may have imposed on itself by freely entering into a given contract. If what is required by the voluntarily assumed constraint is that a party negotiate honestly and genuinely with a view to resolution of a dispute with fidelity to the bargain, there is no inherent inconsistency with negotiation, so constrained. To say, as Lord Ackner did, that a party is entitled not to continue with, or withdraw from, negotiations at any time and for any reason assumes that there is no relevant constraint on the negotiation or the manner of its conduct by the bargain that has been freely entered into. Here, the restraint is a requirement to meet and engage in genuine and good faith negotiations. For the reasons expressed below that expression has, in the context of this contract, legal content.

[66] Of course, it must be that the certainty and content of any contract will depend on its specific terms and context. Sweeping generalised rules, however, are difficult to sustain and not of great assistance.

[67] In the way I have expressed my understanding of them, I respectfully agree with the statements of principle by Kirby P in Coal Cliff. …

[69] It is unnecessary to express any opinion on the facts and the application of principle to the facts in Coal Cliff. Suffice it to say that despite the views of such an experienced commercial judge as Clarke J (the trial judge in Coal Cliff) that the clause did not lack certainty, there is force in the conclusions of Kirby P, given the open-ended nature of the operation of the obligation in that case; although, given the sophistication of the parties and their clearly expressed views, one could view many of the matters referred to by Kirby P as affecting breach or proof of breach, rather than legal content of the contractual obligation. It is also unnecessary to consider, in the abstract, a clause providing for good faith negotiations in bringing about a commercial agreement in the first instance. The concern in the present case is the express mutual promises of the parties to undertake genuine and good faith negotiations to resolve disputes arising from performance of a fixed body of contractual rights and obligations. The difference is of great importance.

[70] What the phrase "good faith" signifies in any particular context and contract will depend on that context and that contract. A number of things, however, can be said as to the place of good faith in the operation of the common law in Australia. The phrase does not, by its terms, necessarily import, or presumptively introduce, notions of fiduciary obligation familiar in equity or the law of trusts. Nor does it necessarily import any notion or requirement to act in the interests of the other party to the contract. The content and context here is a clearly worded dispute resolution clause of an engineering contract. It is to be anticipated at the time of entry into the contract that disputes and differences that may arise will be anchored to a finite body of rights and obligations capable of ascertainment and resolution by the chosen arbitral process (or, indeed, if the parties chose, by the Court). The negotiations (being the course of treaty or discussion) with a view to resolving the dispute will be anticipated not to be open-ended about a myriad of commercial interests to be bargained for from a self-interested perspective (as in Coal Cliff). Rather, they will be anticipated to involve or comprise a discussion of rights, entitlements and obligations said by the parties to arise from a finite and fixed legal framework about acts or omissions that will be said to have happened or not happened. The aim of the negotiations will be anticipated to be to resolve a dispute about an existing bargain and its performance. Honest and genuine differences of opinion may attend the parties' views of their rights and obligations. Such things as difficulties of proof and uncertainty as to fact or law may perfectly legitimately strike the parties differently. That accepted, honest business people who approach a dispute about an existing contract will often be able to settle it. This requires an honest and genuine attempt to resolve differences by discussion and, if thought to be reasonable and appropriate, by compromise, in the context of showing a faithfulness and fidelity to the existing bargain.

[6.120] [71] The phrase "genuine and good faith" in cl 35.11 is, as I have said, a composite phrase. It is a phrase concerning an obligation to behave in a particular way in the conduct of an essentially self-interested commercial activity: the negotiation of a resolution of a commercial dispute. Given that context, the content of the phrase involves the notions of honesty and genuineness. Whilst the activity is of a self-interested character, the parties have not left its conduct unconstrained. They have promised to undertake negotiations in a genuine and good faith manner for a limited period (14 days). As a matter of language, the phrase "genuine and good faith" in this context needs little explication: it connotes an honest and genuine approach to the task. This task, rooted as it is in the existing bargain, carries with it an honest and genuine commitment to the bargain (fidelity to the bargain) and to the process of negotiation for the designated purpose.

[72] … The parties have mutually agreed to bring an approach of genuineness and good faith to that process of seeking resolution of any such disagreement. That agreement carried with it, in ordinary language, a requirement to bring an honestly held and genuine belief about their mutual rights and obligations and about the controversy to the negotiations, and to negotiate by reference to such beliefs.

[73] These are not empty obligations; nor do they represent empty rhetoric. An honest and genuine approach to settling a contractual dispute, giving fidelity to the existing bargain, does constrain a party. The constraint arises from the bargain the parties have willingly entered into. It requires the honest and genuine assessment of rights and obligations and it requires that a party negotiate by reference to such. A party, for instance, may well not be entitled to threaten a future breach of contract in order to bargain for a lower settlement sum than it genuinely recognises as due. That would not, in all likelihood, reflect a fidelity to the bargain. A party would not be entitled to pretend to negotiate, having decided not to settle what is recognised to be a good claim, in order to drive the other party into an expensive arbitration that it believes the other party cannot afford. If a party recognises, without qualification, that a claim or some material part of it is due, fidelity to the bargain may well require its payment. That, however, is only to say that a party should perform what it knows, without qualification, to be its obligations under a contract. Nothing in cl 35.11 prevents a party, not under such a clear appreciation of its position, from vindicating its position by self-interested discussion as long as it is proceeding by reference to an honest and genuine assessment of its rights and obligations. It is not appropriate to multiply examples. It is sufficient to say that the standard required by the notion of genuineness and good faith within a process of otherwise tactical and self-interested behaviour (negotiation) is rooted in the honest and genuine views of the parties about their existing bargain and the controversy that has arisen in connection with it within the limits of a clause such as cl 35.1.

[74] With respect to those who assert to the contrary, a promise to negotiate (that is to treat and discuss) genuinely and in good faith with a view to resolving claims to entitlement by reference to a known body of rights and obligations, in a manner that respects the respective contractual rights of the parties, giving due allowance for honest and genuinely held views about those pre-existing rights is not vague, illusory or uncertain. It may be comprised of wide notions difficult to falsify. However, a business person, an arbitrator or a judge may well be able to identify some conduct (if it exists) which departs from the contractual norm that the parties have agreed, even if doubt may attend other conduct. If business people are prepared in the exercise of their commercial judgement to constrain themselves by reference to express words that are broad and general, but which have sensible and ascribable meaning, the task of the Court is to give effect to, and not to impede, such solemn express contractual provisions. It may well be that it will be difficult, in any given case, to conclude that a party has not undertaken an honest and genuine attempt to settle a dispute exhibiting a fidelity to the existing bargain. In other cases, however, such a conclusion might be blindingly obvious. Uncertainty of proof, however, does not mean that this is not a real obligation with real content.

[6.125] [78] This is a dispute resolution clause. To require in such a clause this degree of constraint on the positions of the parties reflects developments in dispute resolution generally. The recognition of the important public policy in the interests of the efficient use of public and private resources and the promotion of the private interests of members of the public and the commercial community in the efficient conduct of dispute resolution in litigation, mediation and arbitration in a fair, speedy and cost efficient manner attends all aspects of dispute resolution: cf "just, quick and cheap resolution of the real issues": Civil Procedure Act 2005 (NSW), s 56. Parties are expected to co-operate with each other in the isolation of real issues for litigation and to deal with each other in litigation in court in a manner requiring co-operation, clarity and disclosure …

[80] The public policy in promoting efficient dispute resolution, especially commercial dispute resolution, requires that, where possible, real and enforceable content be given to clauses such as cll 35.11 and 35.12 to encourage approaches by, and attitudes of, parties conducive to the resolution of disputes without expensive litigation, arbitral or curial.

[81] … In my view, subcl 35.11(c) was not uncertain and had identifiable content.

[Ipp and Macfarlan JJA agreed with Allsop P.]

Appeal dismissed.

ILLUSORY PROMISES

Meehan v Jones

[6.145] Meehan v Jones (1982) 149 CLR 571 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: By a contract dated 14 March 1979, the first respondent/vendor agreed to sell to the appellant/purchaser land on which an oil refinery had been built. Special condition 1 provided that:

This contract is executed by the parties subject to the following:

(a) The Purchaser or his nominee entering into a satisfactory agreement or arrangement with Ampol Petroleum Limited for the supply of a satisfactory quantity of crude oil …;
(b) The Purchaser or his nominee receiving approval for finance on satisfactory terms and conditions in an amount sufficient to complete the purchase hereunder;

and should either of the above conditions not be satisfied on or before the 31st day of July 1979 (or such extended time as the parties may agree upon), then this Contract (other than for the provisions of this Clause) shall be null and void and at an end, all moneys paid hereunder by the Purchaser shall be refunded in full.

The vendors claimed the contract was void for uncertainty and entered into a contract on 23 July to sell the land to the second respondent. On 30 July, the purchaser gave notice to the vendors that the purchaser's nominee had made a satisfactory arrangement with Ampol and had arranged finance on satisfactory terms and conditions. The purchaser sought specific performance of the contract. The trial judge and Full Court of the Supreme Court (by majority) refused specific performance on the basis that contract was void for uncertainty. The purchaser appealed to the High Court.]

GIBBS CJ: [575] The most important question on this appeal, and that on which the learned judges of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Queensland were in disagreement, is whether a contract of sale of land was binding when it included a term which made the contract subject to certain conditions – particularly a condition making it subject to the purchaser or his nominee receiving approval for finance on satisfactory terms and conditions … [576]

The submission advanced on behalf of the vendors and the second respondent was that the inclusion of Special Condition 1 had the result that no binding contract was made between the parties. The submission rested on a number of alternative propositions which may be summarised as follows. First, the word "satisfactory" in both paras (a) and (b) refers to the satisfaction of the vendors as well as to that of the purchaser and the nominee, so that the clause leaves vital matters to be agreed between the parties; accordingly, there is no more than an agreement to agree. Secondly, the language of the [577] clause is so imprecise and indefinite that it is not possible for the court to say what events would satisfy the conditions which are described. Thirdly, the clause leaves it to the discretion of the purchaser whether he will perform the obligations which the contract purports to describe, so that what appears to be a contract is really illusory. It was further said that there was no concluded bargain because the contract left a vital matter to the determination of one of the parties, but in the circumstances of this case that was only another way of saying that the contract was illusory.

The first of these submissions may be dealt with quite shortly … Special Condition 1(a) was plainly inserted in the interest of the purchaser or his nominee, in an endeavour to ensure that if the contract was completed, and the purchaser or his nominee became the owner of the refinery, a sufficient supply of crude oil would be available to enable the refinery to be continued in operation … Special Condition 1(b) is clearly directed to the question whether the terms and conditions of finance supplied are satisfactory from the point of view of the purchaser. This first submission fails; Special Condition 1, on its proper construction, affords it no support.

The second submission raises a question that has given rise to considerable differences of opinion in the cases in which the courts have been called upon to give effect to contracts which are made conditional upon the obtaining of finance or suitable or satisfactory [578] finance. Of course it is obvious enough that every such case must depend on the particular words of the contract in question, and that it is not profitable to compare with each other cases decided on different contractual provisions. However, it may be possible to state principles which will provide some guidance through the thicket of decisions.

When the words of a condition state that a contract is subject to finance, the question immediately arises whether the test which is required to be applied is a subjective or an objective one. On the one hand, the contract may be conditional upon the purchaser obtaining finance which he finds sufficient or satisfactory – such finance as he honestly thinks he needs to complete the purchase. On the other hand, the condition may be fulfilled if finance is available which the purchaser ought to find sufficient, or which ought reasonably to satisfy him, even though he honestly, but unreasonably, regards it as insufficient or unsatisfactory. The fact that opinions may differ as to which of these two meanings is given to the words of the clause does not mean that the clause is uncertain. If the court, in construing the contract, can decide which of the two possible meanings is that which the parties intended, there will be no uncertainty …

It is only if the court is unable to put any definite meaning on the contract that it can be said to be uncertain.

If the words of the condition are understood to import a subjective test – if the condition is fulfilled if the purchaser honestly thinks that the finance is satisfactory – it is impossible in my opinion to regard the condition as uncertain. The question whether the purchaser does think the finance satisfactory is a simple question of fact. In most cases it will be a question easily answered; if the purchaser thinks the finance satisfactory, he will normally seek to complete the contract, whereas if he does not think it satisfactory, usually he will not attempt to complete. In any case, whether the purchaser is satisfied is simply a question of fact, because, to use the well known words of Bowen LJ, "the state of a man's mind is as [579] much a fact as the state of his digestion": Edgington v Fitzmaurice (1885) 29 Ch D 459, 483. However, if the test is purely subjective, the question will arise whether any binding agreement has been made at all. That is a question which I shall later discuss.

On the other hand, if the test is an objective one, and the question is whether the finance ought reasonably to be regarded as satisfactory, I should not have thought that the clause is too indefinite for the courts to be able to attribute any particular contractual intention to the parties. It is true that the condition may, as Holland J said in Grime v Bartholomew [1972] 2 NSWLR 827, 838, be "silent as to amount, term of the loan, rate of interest, conditions of repayment, class of lender, secured or unsecured or form of security". Nevertheless, a court which had evidence of the financial position of the purchaser, the amount required to complete the contract and the prevailing rates and conditions on which loans are made by various classes of lenders should not find it unduly difficult to decide what finance a reasonable man, in the position of the purchaser, would regard as satisfactory.

[His Honour then discussed a number of cases in which similar questions had been raised and continued:]

[580] Other cases have left open the question whether a clause which makes a contract subject to finance imposes an objective standard, so that the test is whether the finance is available on terms that would suit or satisfy a reasonable man, or a subjective standard, so that it is left to the purchaser himself to decide whether the finance is sufficient or satisfactory, and, if that standard is subjective, whether the decision must be made in good faith. However, in Australia and New Zealand the courts, except in New South Wales, have shown a disposition to hold that clauses which make a contract subject to finance are not void for uncertainty. In New South Wales the view has been taken that a subject to finance clause is void, whether it imports an objective or a subjective test: Moran v Umback [1966] 1 NSWR 437.

It seems to me that unless a clause of this kind makes a clear indication to the contrary, its natural effect is to leave it to the purchaser to determine whether or not the available finance is suitable to his needs. A clause such as Special Condition 1(b), which speaks of "satisfactory terms and conditions", in its natural meaning requires that the purchaser be satisfied … [581] Such a condition is generally entirely for the protection of the purchaser, and it is the satisfaction of the purchaser, not that of some hypothetical reasonable man, that will satisfy the condition. No doubt it may be implied that the purchaser will act honestly in deciding whether or not he is satisfied. However, it does not seem to me necessary, in order to give business efficacy to a contract, that a condition should be implied that the purchaser will make reasonable efforts to obtain finance. The parties may expect that he will, but he does not contract to so do.

Although there is nothing uncertain about a clause which speaks of terms and conditions which satisfy the purchaser, the question nevertheless arises, when a contract is made conditional on such a clause, whether the contract is illusory. There is a well settled general principle which was expressed as follows by Kitto J in Placer Development Ltd v Commonwealth (1969) 121 CLR 353, 356:

> wherever words which by themselves constitute a promise are accompanied by words showing that the promisor is to have a discretion or option as to whether he will carry out that which purports to be the promise, the result is that there is no contract on which an action can be brought at all.

… In my opinion that principle does not apply where the discretion or option of the contracting party relates, not to the performance of the contractual obligations themselves, but only to the fulfilment of a condition upon which the contract depends. That this is so is illustrated by the case of an option to purchase which is, in many cases at least, a contract to sell the land upon condition that the grantee gives the notice and does the other things stipulated in the option. Such an option gives the grantee a right, if he performs the stipulated conditions, to become the purchaser. However the fact that the grantee has a discretion as to whether or not he performs those conditions does not render the option illusory. The case of a conditional agreement is analogous. The fact that the condition is one whose performance [582] lies wholly or partly within the power of one of the parties to the contract does not mean that there is no binding contract once the condition is fulfilled. There is a concluded agreement as to the terms of the contract which, if the condition is satisfied, leaves no discretion in either party as to whether he shall carry them out. Once the condition is fulfilled, within the time allowed by the contract for its fulfilment, the contract becomes completely binding.

It is clear that the condition in Special Condition 1(b) is not a condition precedent to contract. Certain obligations under the contract attached immediately the contract was signed although the condition had not been fulfilled. For example, the provisions with regard to the deposit, and with regard to the giving and answering of requisitions on title, became immediately effective. Whether the condition is described as a condition precedent to completion, or as a condition subsequent, seems largely a matter of words. A similar question was discussed in Perri v Coolangatta Investments Pty Ltd (1982) 56 ALJR 445. The condition in that case made the sale subject to the purchasers completing a sale of their property. It was within the power of the purchasers to prevent the fulfilment of such a condition; in that respect they had a discretion as to whether they would completely perform the contract. Nevertheless, it was not doubted that a binding contract had been concluded.

For these reasons, Special Condition 1(b) effectively and certainly described a condition on whose fulfilment the obligation to complete the contract depended. The possibility that the satisfaction might be that of the nominee did not introduce an element of uncertainty, for on no view was the satisfaction of the vendors necessary. Once approval was given by any lender for the making of a loan on terms and conditions regarded as satisfactory by the purchaser or his nominee the condition was fulfilled. Thereafter both the vendors and the purchaser were bound to complete.

What I have said in relation to Special Condition 1(b) applies, in substance, to Special Condition 1(a) also. Once the purchaser or his nominee had made with Ampol an agreement or arrangement which the purchaser or his nominee regarded as satisfactory the condition was satisfied and both parties were bound. For these reasons I have concluded that the majority of the Full Court were in error in holding that Special Condition 1 was uncertain, or that it left it to the purchaser to decide whether he would proceed with the contract.

Certain other arguments were advanced on behalf of the respondents. These were not accepted in the Supreme Court, and they [583] have been dealt with by my brother Mason in his judgment in this case. In relation to those aspects of the matter I agree with my brother's reasons and need add nothing to them ….

I would allow the appeal.

[6.150] MASON J: [587] It is convenient to examine the validity of Special Condition 1(b) before turning to Special Condition 1(a). In the Full Court it became the critical question.

Special condition 1(b)

The respondents' case rests on three propositions:

(1) a contract which is expressed in language "so obscure and so incapable of any definite or precise meaning that the court is unable to attribute to the parties any particular contractual intention" is void for uncertainty (G Scammell and Nephew Ltd v Ouston [1941] AC 251 at 268);

(2) a contract which reserves to a party a discretion or option whether he will carry out what appears to be a promise on his part is also void for uncertainty (Thorby v Goldberg (1964) 112 CLR 597 at 605); and

(3) there can be no concluded bargain if a vital matter has been left to the determination of one of the parties: see Godecke v Kirwan (1973) 129 CLR 629 at 647 per Gibbs J.

It is argued that the concept of "finance on satisfactory terms and conditions" is altogether too uncertain and indefinite to admit of a precise meaning. The thrust of the argument is that the absence of agreement as to the amount to be borrowed, and perhaps the term of the loan and the rate of interest, make it impossible for a court to decide what finance is contemplated by the contract as being "satisfactory" … This point would have force if the contract left the court at large to assess what is "finance on satisfactory terms and conditions", yielding no indication as to what the parties meant by that expression. But in the context of a contract for the sale and [588] purchase of real estate which contains a condition that the purchaser or his nominee receives approval for such finance so that the deposit is to be refunded to the purchaser if the condition is not satisfied, there can be no doubt that "satisfactory" ordinarily means "satisfactory to the purchaser or his nominee".

Primarily the object of such a clause is to benefit or protect the purchaser by ensuring that he is not under a binding obligation to complete if he is unable to obtain finance. Here there is nothing in the contract or other materials to suggest that the object of the clause was not to protect the purchaser, although there is the question whether the condition is exclusively for his benefit, a matter to be discussed later. The primary object of the condition being the protection of the purchaser, it is sensible to treat it as stipulating for finance that is satisfactory to the purchaser or his nominee, subject to an implied obligation that he will act honestly, or honestly and reasonably, in endeavouring to obtain finance and in deciding whether to accept or reject proposals for finance …

To say that clauses of this kind are void for uncertainty is to ignore the traditional doctrine that courts should be astute to adopt a construction which will preserve the validity of the contract. Moreover, it is a draconian solution – one which is best calculated to frustrate the expectations of the parties, because in an increasing number of cases purchasers depend on the provisions of finance in order to complete. The problems of uncertainty can be avoided by drafting a clause which specifies the details of the finance to be sought, but such a clause, by reason of its greater precision, may be too inflexible in its operation.

It has sometimes been argued that there is a relevant distinction between "subject to satisfactory finance" or "subject to suitable finance" and making the contract "subject to finance". The suggestion is that in the first case it is easier to imply that the finance is to be satisfactory to the purchaser. Even if this be so, I would have no difficulty in reading a "subject to finance" clause as requiring finance in an amount and on terms satisfactory to the purchaser, in the absence of some indication that the clause had another meaning.

To say that a "subject to finance" or "subject to finance on satisfactory terms and conditions" clause denotes finance which is satisfactory to the purchaser is not to say that he has an absolute or unfettered right to decide what is satisfactory. To concede such a right would certainly serve the object of the clause in protecting him. But it would do so at the expense of the legitimate expectations of the vendor by enabling the purchaser to escape from the contract on a mere declaration that he could not obtain suitable finance. With some justification the vendor can claim that the agreement made by the parties is not an option but a binding contract which relieves the purchaser from performance only in the event that, acting honestly, or honestly and reasonably, he is unable to obtain suitable finance.

There is in this formulation no element of uncertainty – the courts are quite capable of deciding whether the purchaser is acting honestly and reasonably. The limitation that the purchaser must act honestly, or honestly and reasonably, takes the case out of the principle that:

> where words which by themselves constitute a promise are accompanied by words which show that the promisor is [590] to have a discretion or option as to whether he will carry out that which purports to be the promise, the result is that there is no contract on which an action can be brought.

See Thorby v Goldberg (at 605) citing Loftus v Roberts (1902) 18 TLR 532 at 534. The judgment of the purchaser as to what constitutes finance on satisfactory terms is not an unfettered discretion – it must be reached honestly, or honestly and reasonably.

It has often been held that, where under a contract the delivery of a ship or of goods is expressed to be subject to the buyer's approval, the buyer may disapprove so long as he acts honestly …

There are cases in which it has been said that a capricious withholding of approval will not do …

In this case it is not necessary to decide whether the purchaser, in [591] deciding whether finance is on satisfactory terms, is bound to act honestly or whether he is also bound to act reasonably. The cases already mentioned appear to support the first rather than the second alternative. And there is some ground for thinking that the parties contemplated that the question was to be left to the honest judgment of the purchaser rather than to the judgment of a court as to whether the purchaser acted reasonably in the circumstances.

On the other hand, it has been said that a condition of this type imports an obligation or promise on the part of the purchaser to act honestly and reasonably: Barber v Crickett [1958] NZLR 1057 at 1058; Scott v Rania [1966] NZLR 527 at 539 per Hardie Boys J. McCarthy J, who in Scott v Rania (at 534) preferred to base his reasoning on the principle that a party to a contract cannot be permitted to rely on his own wrong, later in Gardner v Gould [1974] 1 NZLR 426 at 428 adopted the implied promise theory. The reasoning which underlies the decisions of this court upholding the implication of an obligation on the part of a party to a contract to do all that was reasonable on his part to obtain a statutory consent applies with equal force here. In Butts v O'Dwyer (1952) 87 CLR 267 at 280, Dixon CJ, Williams, Webb and Kitto JJ said:

> It has been held in cases too numerous to mention both before and after the classic statement of Bowen LJ in the case of The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64 at 68 that the law raises an implication from the presumed intention of the parties where it is necessary to do so in order to give to the transaction such efficacy as both parties must have intended that it should have.

Here the expressed intention of the parties was that the purchaser would obtain finance; his obtaining of finance on satisfactory terms was necessary to give the transaction its intended efficacy. The consequence would be that he had an obligation to do all that was reasonable on his part to obtain that finance. It would make for greater consistency to say that, if the purchaser is bound to act reasonably in seeking to obtain finance, he is bound to act reasonably as well as honestly in deciding whether the finance was satisfactory. So understood the special condition would preserve an even balance between the vendors and the purchaser. However, I have no need to decide the question. Here it makes no difference whether the purchaser was under an obligation to act honestly or honestly and reasonably in deciding whether the terms of an offer of finance were satisfactory.

Although the binding words of the special condition suggest that [592] its effect is to make the existence of the contract conditional, it is more sensible to regard the provision as one which provides for the determination of a valid and binding contract in the event that the purchaser or his nominee is unable to obtain approval for satisfactory finance on or before the appointed date. In accordance with the principle established in New Zealand Shipping Co v Société des Ateliers et Chantiers de France [1919] AC 1, and extended in Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd (1950) 81 CLR 418 at 440–2, each party has the right to avoid the contract on the non-performance of the condition, notwithstanding that non-performance may occur without default on the part of the purchaser, that is, he may fail to procure finance despite every endeavour on his part. I say "each party" because it seems to me that, although the primary object of the condition is to protect the purchaser, it is perhaps difficult to assert that the clause is for his benefit exclusively when it states that the result of non-performance is that the contract shall be null and void, rather than null and void at the option of the purchaser. I see no justification for implying a right of avoidance on the part of the purchaser alone. In other circumstances to make this implication would be to reach a one-sided interpretation, allowing the purchaser to keep the contract on foot, despite non-performance of the condition, but denying the vendor the right to avoid. Here the vendors were protected by the fixing of the date for completion and the making of time of the essence. Even so, there is no adequate basis for concluding that the special condition authorised the purchaser alone to terminate.

Whether the condition is to be described as precedent or subsequent is an artificial and theoretical question. In one sense performance of the condition or non-avoidance for breach of it is precedent to the right of a party to call for the performance of a contract. In another sense there is a valid and binding contract which may be determined for non-performance of the condition, and in this sense the condition is subsequent, not precedent.

For the reasons I have given Special Condition 1(b) is valid.

Special condition 1(a)

The attack on the validity of this condition raises considerations similar to those already examined. "Satisfactory" here again means satisfactory to the purchaser or his nominee in relation to the agreement contemplated and as to quantity, provided of course that the purchaser or his nominee acts honestly and reasonably. I reject the argument that in Special Condition 1(a) satisfactory means "satisfactory to both parties" …

Clauses 1 and 2

[593] The second respondent argues that the deletion of cl 1 and the partial deletion of cl 2 also results in the contract becoming void for uncertainty because there is nothing in the contract to indicate how completion is to occur. The consequence of the deletion is that there is no specific provision in the contract providing for the manner in which the balance of the purchase price is to be paid. The answer to this submission is that the law implies that in the absence of a specific contractual provision the obligations of each of the parties under the contract are to be performed on or before the completion date, 31 August 1979. The general rule is that settlement and the giving of possession are to coincide …

[6.160] MURPHY J: [596] Clauses in contracts of sale which provide that the contract is subject to the purchaser obtaining satisfactory finance, or adaptations such as "subject to satisfactory finance" or "subject to finance", do not render the contracts illusory. The transactions are conditional contracts in the nature of options to purchase. On classical concepts of consideration, the purchaser's consideration is the obligation to pay a deposit or other obligations (even if they are conditional). (See generally Treitel, Law of Contract, 5th ed (1979), p 64 et seq.) Such clauses are for the benefit of, and may be

[597] waived by, the purchaser …. If a purchaser erroneously believes that the finance is available, and so informs the vendor, the principles of estoppel apply.

Such clauses leave satisfaction with the finance to the purchaser's discretion. Implication of the word "honest" as qualifying the satisfaction adds nothing. Also there is no justification for implying that the purchaser must act reasonably. If the parties wish to limit the discretion, they may do so, for example, by providing that certain terms of finance shall be deemed satisfactory. Unless this is done, the discretion is unlimited. Such clauses may also be subjected to special time limits as was done here, the effect of which is that unless the finance is obtained within a certain time, or the purchaser waives, the condition is not fulfilled and the vendor is relieved from the obligation to transfer. It follows that the contract was not void because of special condition 1(b).

The respondents, in this Court, also contended that special condition 1(a) of the contract was void for uncertainty (or, if valid, had not been fulfilled). I accept the Chief Justice's analysis and conclusions on the application of special condition 1(a).

[6.165] WILSON J: [597] I have had the advantage of reading the reasons prepared by Mason J. I agree with his Honour that each of the issues in the appeal should be resolved in favour of the appellant, with the result that there should be an order for specific performance of the contract. There is nothing of substance that I can usefully add to his Honour's reasons, but I wish to make some brief observations.

The first observation relates to the general question whether a purchaser, in deciding whether finance is on satisfactory terms, is bound to act both honestly and reasonably. It is not necessary to decide the question for the purposes of this case because the finance was obtained. It seems to me that the weight of the authorities discussed by his Honour favours the conclusion that, subject always to the construction of the contract in the particular case, the court will imply no greater obligation on the purchaser than that he is obliged to act honestly in determining whether the available finance is satisfactory. I am inclined to think there is force in this view. The clause is there for the protection of the purchaser. [598] Clearly he must make reasonable efforts to secure finance. But the question whether he is able and willing to assume the burden involved in accepting particular terms may well be answered by reference to subjective considerations which cannot readily be the subject of objective assessment as to their reasonableness. The requirement of an honest judgment may be thought to provide the vendor with the maximum protection which is available under the clause. However, it is sufficient for me, like Mason J, to refrain from expressing a concluded view.

[Aickin J died before the judgment was delivered.]

Appeal allowed.

[6.170] Note

In Smith v Pisani [2001] SASC 21; (2001) 78 SASR 548, a contract for the sale of land was made subject to the purchaser obtaining satisfactory finance. The purchaser applied for and was offered finance on terms that were not unusual or commercially unreasonable, but she refused to complete the contract on the basis that the terms of the finance were not satisfactory to her. Gray J held that the purchaser was obliged to act honestly and reasonably in obtaining finance and in considering proposals for finance. He upheld the magistrate's finding that she had simply changed her mind about buying the vendor's property. The purchaser's refusal to complete the purchase therefore constituted a breach of contract and she was liable for damages.

Godecke v Kirwan

[6.175] Godecke v Kirwan (1973) 129 CLR 629 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Western Australia.

[FACTS: The appellant (as purchaser) and respondent (as vendor) signed a document headed "offer and acceptance" which set out the terms of an agreement for the sale and purchase of land, including the following clauses:

3. Possession shall be given and taken on settlement upon signing and execution of a formal contract of sale within 28 days of acceptance of this offer ….
6. If required by the Vendor/s I/we shall execute a further agreement to be prepared at my costs by his appointed Solicitors containing the foregoing and such other covenants and conditions as they may reasonably require.

The respondent vendor refused to proceed. The appellant purchaser lodged a caveat. The vendor issued a summon seeking removal of the caveat. Virtue J at first instance ordered that the caveat be removed on the basis that the agreement was not binding. Since the agreement contemplated that the formal contract would contain additional terms, it fell within the third class of cases mentioned in Masters v Cameron (1954) 91 CLR 353, at [5.80]. The purchaser appealed.]

WALSH J: [642] In the present case the parties set out all the principal terms which were to govern the sale and purchase of the land and these included provisions which imposed by implication an obligation to execute a formal contract. There was also a promise by the purchaser to execute, if required to do so, a further agreement in accordance with cl 6. In my opinion, that clause should be construed as limited to permitting the insertion of covenants and conditions not inconsistent with those contained in the offer. It was limited also by the reference to the reasonableness of requiring the inclusion of the covenants and conditions. In my opinion, this does not mean that anything may be required which in the opinion of the solicitors is reasonable. It means that what is required must be reasonable in an objective sense, and in case of [643] dispute this is a matter which the court can decide. Clause 6 does not mean that the purchaser is making an agreement to agree later upon additional provisions to govern the bargain. It means that he is agreeing presently to accept as part of the bargain such additional provisions, if any, as are required, provided that they satisfy the requirements of consistency with the other terms and of reasonableness to which I have referred.

If, contrary to my view, cl 6 authorizes the vendor to require the execution of a further agreement after the contract contemplated by cl 3 and special condition 1 has been executed, then cl 6 would still operate subject to the limitations already discussed and, in my opinion, the vendor, if he wished to take advantage of it, would have to invoke it within a reasonable time, this again being a matter for decision if necessary by a court. The fact that more than one view may be open as to the time at which and the manner in which cl 6 was intended to operate does not itself require a conclusion that the agreement is void for uncertainty: see Upper Hunter County District Council v Australian Chilling and Freezing Co Ltd (1968) 118 CLR 429, 436–7.

For the foregoing reasons I am unable to agree with the view of the learned primary judge that this was a case in which all the terms of the contract had not been settled and which for that reason fell within the third class of the cases discussed in Masters v Cameron (1954) 91 CLR 353. I am of opinion that a binding agreement was made.

[6.180] GIBBS J: [645] Clause 6 does not require that the additional terms should be the subject of agreement between the parties. The inclusion of additional terms depends on the unilateral requirement of the solicitors for the vendor, subject to the qualification that the requirement must be reasonable. It is well established that the parties to a contract may leave terms – even essential terms – to be determined by a third person: Foster v Wheeler (1888) 38 Ch D 130; May and Butcher Ltd v The King [1934] 2 KB 17, at p 21. In such a case the contract is not bad for uncertainty because if the third person settles the terms the contract will thereby be rendered certain. It is no objection that the power to determine the terms and conditions to be incorporated in the contract is left to the solicitors for one of the parties: Axelsen v O'Brien (1949) 80 CLR 219 (see also Suttor v Gundowda Pty Ltd (1950) 81 CLR 418, 444–5, and Christison v Warren [1903] St R Qd 186). In Axelsen v O'Brien (1949) 80 CLR 219 an agreement for the sale of land provided (inter alia) that the vendor should execute a nomination of trustees over the land to trustees [646] appointed by the purchasers and should hand such nomination to the solicitors for the purchasers upon the purchasers paying £500 and upon the trustees executing a bill of mortgage securing payment of the balance of the purchase price. The agreement further provided: "The bill of mortgage shall contain such other terms and conditions as shall be required by Corser Sheldon & Gordon of Maryborough, solicitors, not inconsistent with the above terms." It appears that that firm of solicitors, which consisted of one member only, was acting for the purchasers. It was contended that there was no complete and concluded contract because the further terms of the bill of mortgage remained to be arranged or determined. The Court rejected this contention. Latham CJ pointed out ((1949) 80 CLR 219, 225) that the terms of the bill of mortgage did not depend upon agreement between the parties because it was for the solicitor to settle the terms. The Court further held that the terms of the bill of mortgage were not an essential part of the contract, but merely a subsidiary means of carrying it into effect, and that the failure of the solicitor to settle the terms would not be a bar to specific performance – the Court in granting specific performance would settle the terms if the solicitor did not (1949) 80 CLR 219, 225–6. The same considerations seem to me to be applicable in the present case. The fact that cl 6 left it to the solicitors for the vendor to decide what other covenants and conditions should be included in the "further agreement" did not mean that it was necessary that the parties should agree as to further terms. The clause does not introduce any uncertainty into the agreement, or render it in any way incomplete and would present no obstacle to its specific performance.

I should perhaps make it clear that it does not necessarily follow from what I have said that an agreement which left further terms to be settled by one of the parties, rather than by his solicitors, would be treated as a concluded contract. In May and Butcher Ltd v The King [1934] 2 KB 17, 21, Viscount Dunedin suggested that a sale of land which left the price to be settled by the buyer himself would be good. With great respect, it seems to me that there would be no binding contract in such a case, which would fall within the principle that "where words which by themselves constitute a promise are accompanied by words which show that the promisor is to have a discretion or option as to whether he will carry out that which purports to be the promise, the result is that there is [647] no contract on which an action can be brought": Thorby v Goldberg (1964) 112 CLR 597, 605, citing Loftus v Roberts (1902) 18 TLR 532, 534; Placer Development Ltd v The Commonwealth (1969) 121 CLR 353, 359–61. It might be suggested that the same principle would not apply if the determination of the price were left to the seller, for then it would be the promisee, not the promisor, who was left with the discretion as to performance. However, in Beattie v Fine [1925] VLR 363, Cussen J drew no such distinction and held that an option for renewal "at a rental to be agreed upon by the lessor" did not give rise to any contractual obligation. He based his decision on the principle of Loftus v Roberts (1902) 18 TLR 532, but the same conclusion might have been reached by holding that there can be no concluded bargain if a vital matter (such as price or rental) has been left to the determination of one of the parties (see also the dicta in Foster v Wheeler (1888) 38 Ch D 130, at pp 132–3). Perhaps it may be different where agreement has been reached on all essential terms but the determination of subsidiary matters has been left to one of the parties. In Sweet & Maxwell Ltd v Universal News Services Ltd [1964] 2 QB 699 it was held by the Court of Appeal that an agreement for a lease which was to contain "such other covenants and conditions as shall be reasonably required" by the lessor was sufficiently certain to be a concluded contract for a lease and was capable of specific performance. In Powell v Jones [1968] SASR 394, Bray CJ went further and upheld the validity of an agreement for a lease which was "to be in terms and to contain such special clauses as the landlord may require". His Honour said [1968] SASR 394, 400 that "there is nothing in the Sweet and Maxwell Case [1964] 2 QB 699 to indicate that the Court of Appeal would have held the agreement to make the lease unenforceable if the word 'reasonably' had been omitted". I am, with respect unable to agree with that observation, for it seems to me that the members of the Court of Appeal in Sweet & Maxwell Ltd v Universal News Services Ltd [1964] 2 QB 699 placed considerable reliance on the fact that the parties had imported the familiar and objective standard of reasonableness – see [1964] 2 QB 699, 726, 733,

735. However, it is unnecessary to express any concluded opinion on these matters because, as I have said, in the present case the settlement of the further terms is left to the determination of persons who are not parties to the contract. [648] … I hold, therefore, that the Offer and Acceptance constituted a valid and binding contract capable of being enforced by specific performance.

MASON J: I agree with the reasons for judgment prepared by my brother Walsh.

Placer Development v Commonwealth

[6.185] Placer Development Limited v Commonwealth (1969) 121 CLR 353 (High Court of Australia).

[FACTS: The Commonwealth entered into an agreement with the plaintiff for the formation of a company to produce timber products in Papua New Guinea for export to Australia. Clause 14 of the agreement provided:

> 14. If customs duty is paid upon the importation into Australia of the plywood, veneers, logs and other products of the Timber Company, and is not remitted, the Commonwealth will pay to the Timber Company a subsidy upon the exportation of these products from the Territory for entry into Australia of an amount or at a rate determined by the Commonwealth from time to time, but the amount of subsidy paid shall not exceed the amount of customs duty paid and not remitted.

The timber company was formed and for several years imported products into Australia and paid customs duty. For four years, the Commonwealth paid a subsidy equal to the amount of duty paid. Thereafter no subsidy was paid. The parties stated a case for the High Court, asking whether the Commonwealth was obliged by cl 14 to determine a rate of subsidy or to pay a subsidy. The Court, by majority of 3-2 (Kitto, Taylor and Owen JJ; Menzies and Windeyer JJ dissenting), held that it was not.]

KITTO J: Question 3 is whether by virtue of cl 14 the Commonwealth is obliged (again, to the plaintiff company) to pay to the timber company a subsidy which will recoup to the timber company all the customs duty paid by it on the importation of its plywood into Australia and not remitted. Again, the answer must be No. The Commonwealth has plainly retained a right to review and vary the amount or rate of subsidy, and such a reservation, as the Court observed in Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v The Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424, 464 "cannot be reconciled with the conception that the Crown has promised to pay a subsidy of definite amount"….

Cases in which a party's liability to make a payment is expressed as depending upon an exercise of discretion by that party have most often been cases of service agreements. The question there is usually whether the intention of the agreement is that the employer shall be entitled to decide whether any remuneration at all shall be paid and if so how much, or is that he shall be bound to pay at all events a reasonable remuneration. In other words, it is whether, on the one hand, the service is intended to be honorary unless the employer otherwise decides, or, on the other hand, a promise to pay a reasonable amount is to be implied. As may be seen from the case of Bryant v Flight (1839) 5 M & W 114; 151 ER 49, in which Parke B dissented from the decision of the Court, it is not always an easy question to decide; but the general principle is established which Vaughan Williams LJ in Loftus v Roberts (1902) 18 TLR 532, 534, expressed in words that were subsequently adopted by Lord Wrenbury, as Buckley J, in Broome v Speak [1903] 1 Ch 586, 599. It is that wherever words which by themselves constitute a promise are accompanied by words showing that the promisor is to have a discretion or option as to whether he will carry out that which purports to be the promise, the result is that there is no contract on which an action can be brought at all. The succinct statement of the principle in Leake on Contracts, 3rd ed, p 3: "Promissory expressions reserving an option as to the performance do not create a contract" was approved by the Lord Justice, as it was later by Lord Wright in Hillas and Co Ltd v Arcos Ltd (1932) 147 LT 503, 517 ….

A promise of a governmental subsidy is meaningless in the absence of a specification of some amount or some basis of calculation. It carries no implication that at least a reasonable subsidy shall be paid, for there is no general standard of reasonableness with respect to the quantum of a subsidy. The expression in cl 14 of the Agreement before us, "a subsidy … of an amount or at a rate determined by the Commonwealth from time to time", indeed reflects the fact that a governmental or legislative determination of quantum is of the essence of a subsidy. The Commonwealth's promise is, in substance, a promise to pay such subsidy if any as may be decided upon from time to time by or under the authority of the appropriate repository of Commonwealth power, namely the Parliament. It therefore does not create any contractual obligation.

[6.190] TAYLOR AND OWEN JJ: [361] Obviously there is a complete absence from the clause, and from the Agreement as a whole, of any identifiable criteria by which it can be said the parties intended the amounts or rates to be determined; this is left solely to the discretion of the Commonwealth. This being so the clause amounts to no more than a promise to pay what, in all the circumstances, the Commonwealth in its discretion thinks fit and, as such, is wholly unenforceable.

[6.195] MENZIES J: (dissenting) [363] The language is plainly that of legal obligation. The conditions giving rise to obligation upon the Commonwealth are precisely stated; it is provided that "the Commonwealth will pay … a subsidy … of an amount or at a rate determined by the Commonwealth from time to time"; and an upper limit to the subsidy is fixed.

It appears to me that two interpretations of the clause are open. First that it creates no legal obligation at all because what it provides is an illusory promise on the part of the Commonwealth. The second is that it does create an obligation when the conditions stated are fulfilled (1) to determine a subsidy within the limit and (2) to pay the subsidy determined.

According to the former interpretation, if the Commonwealth were to determine a subsidy upon imported products it would still be under no obligation to pay the subsidy so determined; according to the latter the Commonwealth's obligation is both to determine what the subsidy is to be and then to pay it.

The latter interpretation is the one which commends itself to me. It is true that the Commonwealth is at large in determining the subsidy from time to time but it seems to me that the character of the provision would have been no different had it gone on to require the Commonwealth to take specified considerations into account in determining the subsidy. In such a case the form and [364] amount of the subsidy would still be in the discretion of the Commonwealth. The essential question seems to me to be whether a promise to make a determination does, in the circumstances, give rise to an obligation to do so.

There are, of course, cases such as Taylor v Brewer (1813) 1 M & S 290; 105 ER 108 and Roberts v Smith (1859) 4 H & N 315; 157 ER 861, where promises have been regarded as too illusory to support proceedings. These cases are, however, distinguishable. In the former the plaintiff, who had no more than a resolution "that any service to be rendered by him should be taken into consideration, and such remuneration be made as should be deemed right", failed in assumpsit to recover compensation for work done because, it was held, that the resolution imported that the committee were to judge whether any remuneration was due. In the latter, in an action for work and labour done, the plaintiff failed because he had agreed that any work which he did in the circumstances which occurred should give him no right to salary and that in such an event it should be left entirely to the other party to give such sum as he may deem right as compensation for labour done. The decision of the court was no more than that the plaintiff had failed to make out that the defendant was indebted to him. Furthermore, to refuse to accord any legal consequence to cl 14 would seem to me to be flatly opposed to Bryant v Flight (1839) 5 M & W 114; 151 ER 49, where Abinger CB and Alderson B – true it is against the dissent of Parke B – decided that money was recoverable under the following promise: "I hereby agree to enter your service as a weekly manager, commencing next Monday, and the amount of payment I am to receive I leave entirely for you to determine."

In my opinion, however, the questions which we have to determine are not to be decided by reference to authorities such as those referred to above. What we are concerned with is the meaning of cl 14 in the context of the whole Agreement. To my mind the clause does require the Commonwealth to fix a subsidy and then to pay the subsidy fixed. Here we are not concerned with whether the Commonwealth is under any obligation to pay money in the absence of a determination fixing it and I would not, of course, decide that if the Commonwealth did not fix a subsidy that a reasonable subsidy, or indeed any subsidy, became payable. Where, however, the question is whether cl 14 does impose a contractual duty upon the Commonwealth to fix a subsidy in the [365] circumstances stated so that the obligation to pay would thus arise, the problem is substantially one of interpretation and, in my opinion, the answer should be "Yes". I cannot understand the parties, at the time of making the Agreement, attributing any different meaning to it. Nor, either on principle or authority, is it necessary to decide the clause as so understood is illusory. I do not regard a promise by the Commonwealth to determine a subsidy, not exceeding a specified amount, if and when certain events occur, as illusory. The whole point of the clause is to require the Commonwealth to determine what subsidy it will pay in the circumstances stated. When the language of legal obligation has been used, as is the case here, it is only stern necessity that would persuade me that it is worthless. Neither in principle nor in authority do I find that necessity. If the right to obtain a discretionary determination were illusory there would be a substantial reduction in the use of the writ of mandamus. To my mind the promise of the Commonwealth to determine what subsidy should be paid was both significant and valuable and was not a mockery.

[6.200] WINDEYER J: (dissenting) The New Guinea Timber Agreement was expressly made subject to the approval of Parliament …. This statutory approval of the Agreement … [366] disposes, I think, of any idea that the Agreement was not intended by the parties to create a relationship giving rise to obligations enforceable by law.

That such an intention is of the essence of a valid contract has been asserted in English cases for a long time past, certainly since Lord Atkin, then Atkin LJ, said so in Balfour v Balfour [1919] 2 KB 571, 578, and in Rose and Frank Co v JR Crompton and Bros Ltd [1923] 2 KB 261, 293. Recent examples of acceptance of the doctrine and the repetition of the phrases in which it has been expounded are to be found in Jones v Padavatton [1969] 1 WLR 328 and Ford Motor Co Ltd v Amalgamated Union of Engineering and Foundry Workers [1969] 1 WLR 339. I may mention here that in the former of these two cases Danckwerts LJ said that the principles involved are very well discussed in Cheshire and Fifoot on Contract, 6th ed (1964), at pp 94–6, and that leads me to mention that I have found helpful the corresponding passages in the second (1969) Australian edition of that work by Messrs JG Starke and PFP Higgins, pp 189–96. Professor Williston has criticized the idea that a common intention of the parties to create legal relations is a necessary element in the formation of a contract. I may add that another distinguished American writer, [367] Professor Corbin, in his work The Law of Contracts (revised ed 1963), vol 1, p 137, put the matter as follows: "In order to make an enforceable contract, it is not necessary that the parties should consciously advert to legal relations, but it is necessary that they should not express an intention to exclude legal relations."

In this Court in Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v The Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424, 457, Dixon CJ, Williams, Webb, Fullagar and Kitto JJ in a joint judgment spoke of "a principle which is fundamental to any conception of contract", saying, "It is of the essence of contract, regarded as a class of obligations, that there is a voluntary assumption of a legally enforceable duty". I venture to say, despite some statements in other cases, that whether there was a voluntary assumption of a legally enforceable duty in a particular case is not to be decided by asking whether or not the parties had expressed or exhibited an actual and positive intention that their agreement was to result in legal obligations. It depends rather on an inference to be drawn from the subject matter and nature of their agreement, and other circumstances to which I referred in what I wrote in South Australia v The Commonwealth (1962) 108 CLR 130, which I refrain from repeating. Social engagements and domestic arrangements are outside the realm of contract law, simply because the parties to them must be regarded as intending that their mutual promises, whether kept or broken, are not to land them in Court. The principle has been extended in England to arrangements not involving purely social engagements of an ordinary character, but which were nevertheless taken to have been intended by the parties not to create obligations enforceable by law: eg, Coward v Motor Insurers' Bureau [1963] 1 QB 259, 271. Agreements made between an individual and the Government are sometimes said to be in the same position. But I think that they are outside the class of legally enforceable contracts for a rather different reason. There is there a reflection of the rule that historically promises made by Government were not justiciable and enforceable against the Crown by the ordinary processes of an action at law. This is not because they are not obligations meant by the parties to be binding, or which are not "binding in moral equity and conscience", but historically they "want the 'vinculum juris'", to use the expressions which Tindal CJ used in the old case of Gibson v East India Co (1839) 5 Bing NC 262, 274; 132 ER 1105, 1110. But in Australia today these considerations have disappeared. The Commonwealth can sue and be sued in the courts [368] in ordinary actions in contract and in tort. In the present case it seems to me unnecessary to ask whether the Commonwealth and the plaintiff intended the Agreement to create legal rights and obligations. I think that obviously they did. But proof of a common intent seems to me to be not required. Parliament's approval of the Agreement and the appropriation by Parliament of funds to meet it, when added to its essentially commercial character and its language, are enough I consider to rescue it from the unenforceability which a purely political arrangement has, and to give it a contractual character. It is worth noticing that in the Australian Woollen Mills Case (1954) 92 CLR 424, where the opposite conclusion was reached as to the subsidy scheme there in question, the Court said at 461: "If there was an intention on the part of the Government to assume a legal obligation, one would certainly have expected statutory authority to be sought."

Here it was sought and given …

The question thus becomes simply one of the proper construction of cl 14 of the Agreement …

The discretion given to the Commonwealth to determine the quantum of subsidy is said to make the Commonwealth's promise "illusory", or, as it was also said, to make cl 14 an "illusory contract". Very distinguished writers on the law of contracts have adopted these terms as categorematic. Nevertheless I have the temerity to question the terminology in its application to this case. The expression an illusory promise is not, as I understand it, here used to mean an illusion that there was a promise: it means a real promise but one which is devoid of legal consequence. It is illusory, not because it is not a promise, but because it deceptively creates the illusion of a contract where there is none. By an illusory contract, on the other hand, what is meant is a bilateral transaction having some semblance to a contract, but not in truth a contract because not capable of creating legally enforceable rights and obligations. The proposition that the undertaking by the Commonwealth to pay a subsidy is "illusory", and the promise therefore ineffectual in law, has as its basis that the amount of the subsidy is to be whatever amount the Commonwealth determines.

In Loftus v Roberts (1902) 18 TLR 532, 534, Vaughan Williams LJ said:

> Wherever words which by themselves constituted a promise were accompanied by words which showed that the promisor [370] was to have a discretion or option as to whether he would carry out that which purported to be the promise, the result was that there was no contract on which an action could be brought at all. The doctrine was an old one. In Leake on Contracts, 3rd ed, p 3, it was expressed thus: — "Promissory expressions reserving an option as to the performance do not create a contract".

This statement is unquestionable. But it seems to me that it does not fit this case. Clause 14 does not reserve to the Commonwealth any option as to whether it will perform the promise it there made. It was for it to determine what should be the amount of the subsidy it would pay: but its promise was to determine an amount and to pay it: it had no discretion to do or not to do this: its discretion was only as to the amount to be paid. It is however said that the result of this discretion to determine the amount of a subsidy amounts to a discretion to pay nothing at all.

For this a long line of decisions in cases between master and servant is referred to by way of analogy … The latest of which I am aware is Powell v Braun [1954] 1 WLR 401, a decision of the Court of Appeal. The defendant there had written to his secretary stating that, instead of increasing her salary, he proposed to pay her each year a bonus calculated by reference to the net trading profit of the business. The letter included the following [1954] 1 WLR 401, 402: "I, therefore, [371] propose to … pay you an amount according to the trading results of the previous financial year …. I cannot say at this juncture what the amount will be, but I am sure you will not be disappointed with it from year to year."

The plaintiff replied to the letter saying that she appreciated the offer. Bonuses were paid to her for six years. Then the defendant refused to pay on the grounds that there was no firm promise to pay anything and that any promise was too vague and general to be enforced.

The Court of Appeal, reviewing the circumstances, held that the defendant had bound himself to pay something, provided there were profits. The amount to be paid would, Lord Evershed said, and with this Romer LJ agreed, be "a reasonable sum, that is, a sum arrived at so as to bear a reasonable relationship to the trading profit" [1954] 1 All ER 401, 486. Denning LJ expressed it as "an amount within his" (scilicet the defendant's) "reasonable discretion, that is, it would be the amount which a fair and just man would pay in the exercise of a reasonable discretion" [1954] 1 All ER 401, 486. The actual amount to be paid was treated by the court in that case as equivalent to a quantum meruit by way of additional remuneration above the plaintiff's fixed salary. An amount was agreed between the parties and judgment given accordingly. The approach resembled in some respects that taken by the House of Lords in Way v Latilla [1937] 3 All ER 759. The Tasmanian case of Ikin v Cox Bros (Aust) Ltd (1929) 25 Tas LR 1 can usefully be compared.

When an agreement produces a liability to pay some sum of money, and the amount is not determined by the agreement, there is ordinarily no obstacle to saying that a reasonable sum was intended: and, if what is a reasonable sum can be determined by a court, a judgment for that amount can be given. If what has to be determined is a reasonable price for a thing sold or a quantum meruit for services rendered a jury can determine it. It is not in such cases a precise sum, but any sum which lies within what a court considers the limits of reason. That is trite. But the principle necessarily depends upon there being some criteria by which reasonableness can be measured or tested. The market place and what was paid in other cases may provide a measure, and fix an amount which reason requires be thus ascertained … [372]

But when there is no trade or business, market or experience to which to refer, a difficulty arises: a jury cannot say what is a reasonable sum if there be no weight or measure they can apply, and which a court could use to test whether their verdict is or is not within the bounds of reason. A court could not say whether any sum which the Commonwealth determined to pay the timber company was or was not a reasonable subsidy. There are no objective criteria of the reasonableness of a subsidy. A court could not say on what basis or with what considerations in mind the Commonwealth should determine the subsidy it promised by cl 14. That would be to make a contract for the parties different from that which they made by which the decision was to rest with the Commonwealth. It would mean "transferring to the court the exercise of a discretion vested in the respondents" (here the Commonwealth), to use the words of the Privy Council in Kofi-Sunkersette Obu v A Strauss & Co Ltd [1951] AC 243, 250. But to my mind it does not follow that because the court cannot take over the discretion which the Commonwealth undertook to exercise, the Commonwealth is released from its undertaking.

For these reasons I am not prepared to say that the provisions of cl 14 do not amount to a contract. In my opinion they do. But it is not a contract which the timber company can enforce; for it was not a party to the contract. Indeed it was not even in existence when the contract was made. The contract was between the plaintiff, then known as Bulolo Gold Dredging Ltd, and the Commonwealth. The plaintiff could in my opinion enforce it by an action for damages if it be broken, or perhaps by proceedings for specific performance: cf Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58. It may be that neither remedy would produce any substantial advantage for the plaintiff, or indirectly for the timber company. Nevertheless, when the elements of offer and acceptance and resulting promise supported by consideration be present, I prefer to say there is a contract, albeit, in some cases, one for the breach of which damages cannot be quantified. The contractual obligation of the Commonwealth to the plaintiff was to decide what sum in its discretion it considered, having regard to all considerations which weighed with it, commercial and political, it would be [373] reasonable to pay the timber company by way of subsidy; and, having decided it, to pay it. I base this conclusion simply on the words of cl 14, not by any attempt to match them against words which were in question in any other cases ….

A basic assumption of our law is that bargains are to be kept. This applies today to the contracts which the Crown makes with a subject as forcefully as it does to contracts between subject and subject. That a court cannot determine the amount to be paid as subsidy is, in my view of the case, no reason for the Commonwealth not performing its promise to do so. If it does not exercise the discretion it contracted to exercise the plaintiff might recover no more than nominal damages. But I do not think that means that, using the language of question 4(b), the Commonwealth has under cl 14 an absolute discretion "to determine a subsidy of a nominal amount or rate". If that means a sum which is so small and insignificant that it does not answer the description of a subsidy, the answer to that question must I think be "No".

A subsidy, by its derivation from the Latin subsidium means an aid or help … A merely nominal sum, not of any value at all [374] to the timber company, would I think belie the word subsidy: it would be illusory in a true sense of that word. But, apart from that, the amount to be paid under cl 14 of the Agreement is an amount which the Commonwealth considers in all the circumstances to be reasonable. As to this its discretion is absolute, unfettered and not questionable in legal proceedings. The amount which the Commonwealth determines as a subsidy may be large or small. But I cannot agree that an undertaking to pay something is met by paying nothing or some trifling sum such as a dollar or a cent.

[In answer to the questions raised by the case stated, the Court held that the defendant was not obliged by the agreement to determine a rate of subsidy which would allow the timber company to recoup the duty paid and was not obliged by the agreement to pay a subsidy to the plaintiff.]

THE STATUTE OF FRAUDS

[7.05] The common law does not require the parties to a contract to record their agreement in writing. An agreement is enforceable at common law even though there is no written record of it. Formal requirements are imposed by legislation in respect of some types of contract, such as building contracts and contracts for the provision of consumer credit. This chapter focuses on the statutory provisions in force in all Australian jurisdictions that render a contract for the sale of land unenforceable unless it is made or evidenced in writing. These are the successor provisions to a 1677 English statute known as the Statute of Frauds (UK) (29 Car II c 3).

The Statute of Frauds provided, in effect, that certain contracts would be unenforceable unless in writing or evidenced by some memorandum in writing and signed by the party to be sued. The statute was later received as part of the law of the Australian colonies. The preamble to the statute stated its purpose to be "the prevention of many fraudulent practices which are commonly endeavoured to be upheld by perjury and subornation of perjury".

The most important provisions of the Act were those contained in ss 4 and 17. Section 4 provided as follows:

> no action shall be brought whereby to charge any executor or administrator upon any special promise, to answer damages out of his own estate; or whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriages of another person; or to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage; or upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them; or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised.

Section 17 provided as follows:

no contract for the sale of any goods, wares, or merchandise, for the price of ten pounds sterling or upwards, shall be allowed to be good, except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorised.

Sixth Interim Report

[7.10] United Kingdom Law Revision Committee, Sixth Interim Report (CMD 5449, 1937).

Contemporary opinion is almost unanimous in condemning the statute and favouring its amendment or repeal.

9. The main criticisms directed against s 4 may be summarised under the following heads:

(1) First and foremost, it is urged that the Act is a product of conditions which have long passed away. At the time when it was passed, essential kinds of evidence were excluded (for example, the parties themselves could not give evidence), and objectionable types of evidence were admitted (for example juries were still in theory entitled to act on their own knowledge of the facts in dispute). It was an improvement on this state of affairs to admit the evidence of the parties, even though only to the extent that such evidence was in signed writing. Today, when the parties can freely testify, the provisions of s 4 are an anachronism. A condition of things which was advanced in relation to 1677 is backward in relation to 1937.

(2) "The Act", in the words of Lord Campbell already cited "promotes more frauds than it prevents". True, it shuts out perjury; but it also and more frequently shuts out the truth. It strikes impartially at the perjurer and at the honest man who has omitted a precaution, sealing the lips of both. Mr Justice FitzJames Stephen (writing of s 17, but his observation applies equally to s 4 went so far as to assert: "in the vast majority of cases its operation is simply to enable a man to break a promise with impunity, because he did not write it down with sufficient formality": (1885) 1 LQR 1 at 1.

(3) The classes of contracts to which s 4 applies seem to be arbitrarily selected and to exhibit no relevant common quality. There is no apparent reason why the requirement of signed writing should apply to these contracts, and to all of them and to no others.

(4) The section is out of accord with the way in which business is normally done. Where actual practice and legal requirement diverge, there is always an opening for knaves to exploit the divergence.

(5) The operation of the section is often lopsided and partial. A and B contract: A has signed a sufficient note or memorandum, but B has not. In these circumstances B can enforce the contract against A, but A cannot enforce it against B.

(6) The section does not reduce contracts which do not comply with it to mere nullities, but merely makes them unenforceable by action. For other purposes they preserve their efficacy (for what other purposes precisely, is doubtful; see (1936) 51 LQR at 49). Anomalous results flow from this: for example, in Morris v Baron [1918] 1 AC 1, a contract which complied with the section was superseded by a second contract which did not so comply. It was held that neither contract could be enforced: the first, because it was validly rescinded by the second, the second because, owing to its purely oral character, no action could be brought on it. This was a result which the parties could not possibly have intended.

(7) Apart from its policy the statute is in point of language obscure and ill-drafted. "It is universally admitted," observed the original editor of Smith's Leading Cases, "that no enactment of the legislature has become the subject of so much litigation." This could hardly have been so if its terms had been reasonably lucid.

10. Most of the above criticisms apply, both to s 4 and s 17 of the Statute of Frauds, and therefore to s 4 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, so far as it reproduces that section.

A word or two should perhaps be said in amplification of the criticisms under heads (3) and (4) above.

Criticism (3). Assuming that there may be classes of contracts in respect of which special evidentiary requirements should be insisted on as a condition of their enforceability, can it be said that there is any ground for singling out the particular classes of contracts named in ss 4 (and ss 17). of the Statute of Frauds?

It cannot be supposed that the framers of this legislation selected them purely at random. They would seem to have had in mind more than one criterion:

(A) the value or importance of the subject matter. The more considerable the subject matter, the greater the inducement to commit perjury, and the desirability of evidence which shall be proof against perjury (this seems to have been the criterion applied by the legislature in including contracts affecting land: contracts for sale of goods of a value (or price) of £10 or upwards — more substantial amount then than now: and possibly agreements in consideration of marriage);

(B) the interposition of a long interval between the making of the contract and its complete performance. The longer this interval, the worse will be the recollection of witnesses, and the more difficult it will be to expose an invention ("contracts not to be performed within a year of the making thereof");

(C) the one-sided or disinterested character of the ostensible bargain. The law, perhaps cynically, regards such bargains with scepticism, and is inclined to require specially cogent evidence of their existence (promises by an executor or administrator to answer damages out of his own estate: contracts of guarantee).

THE AUSTRALIAN PROVISIONS

[7.15] In Australia, the legislative provisions dealing with the formalities introduced by the Statute of Frauds vary considerably from jurisdiction to jurisdiction. In most jurisdictions, the Statute of Frauds has been repealed, and only some of its provisions re-enacted. The provisions affecting contracts for the sale of land are listed in the following extract.

Civil Law (Property) Act 2006 (ACT)

[7.20] Civil Law (Property) Act 2006 (ACT), s 204.

Proceedings do not lie on certain unwritten agreements

(1) A proceeding does not lie against a person on a contract for the sale or other disposition of land unless the agreement on which the proceeding is brought, or a memorandum or note of the agreement, is in writing signed by the person or by the person's agent properly authorised in writing.

Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW)

[7.25] Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW), s 54A.

Contracts for sale etc of land to be in writing

(1) No action or proceedings may be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or any interest in land, unless the agreement upon which such action or proceedings is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by some other person thereunto lawfully authorised by the party to be charged.

Law of Property Act (NT)

[7.30] Law of Property Act (NT), s 62.

Contracts for sale etc of land to be in writing

No proceeding may be commenced on a contract (wherever made) for the sale or other disposition of land unless the contract on which the proceeding is commenced, or some memorandum or note of the contract, is in writing and signed by the party to be charged or by a person lawfully authorised by the party.

Property Law Act 1974 (Qld)

[7.35] Property Law Act 1974 (Qld), s 59.

Contracts for sale etc of land to be in writing

No action may be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or any interest in land unless the contract upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note of the contract, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged, or by some person by the party lawfully authorised.

Law of Property Act 1936 (SA)

[7.40] Law of Property Act 1936 (SA), s 26.

Contracts for sale of land to be in writing

(1) No action shall be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or of any interest in land, unless an agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by some person thereunto by him lawfully authorised.

Instruments Act 1958 (Vic)

[7.45] Instruments Act 1958 (Vic), s 126.

Certain agreements to be in writing

(1) An action must not be brought to charge a person upon a special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another person or upon a contract for the sale or other disposition of an interest in land unless the agreement on which the action is brought, or a memorandum or note of the agreement, is in writing signed by the person to be charged or by a person lawfully authorised in writing by that person to sign such an agreement, memorandum or note.

(2) It is declared that the requirements of sub-section (1) may be met in accordance with the Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000.

Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1884 (Tas)

[7.50] Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1884 (Tas), s 36.

Contracts for sale, &c, of land to be in writing

(1) No action may be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land, or any interest in land, unless the agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged or by some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized.

Mercantile Law Act 1935 (Tas)

[7.55] Mercantile Law Act 1935 (Tas), s 6.

Certain parol promises and agreements not actionable

No action shall be brought whereby to charge any executor or administrator upon any special promise to answer damages out of his own estate; or whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another person; or to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage; or upon any contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them; or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof; unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized.

Law Reform (Statute of Frauds) Act 1962 (WA)

[7.60] Law Reform (Statute of Frauds) Act 1962 (WA), s 2.

Statute of Frauds 1677, s 4 applies in amended form

The provisions of section 4 of the Statute of Frauds 1677, continue in force in this State in relation to any promise or agreement, whether made before or after the coming into operation of this Act, as if the following passages were deleted from that section, namely —

(a) "whereby to charge any executor or administrator upon any special promise to answer damages out of his own estate; or";

(b) "or to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage"; and

(c) "or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within the space of one year from the making thereof".

THE FORMALITIES REQUIRED

[7.70] There are five questions that might arise where a document is said to satisfy the statute:

1. whether the document sufficiently identifies the parties to the contract and the terms of the contract (see Pirie v Saunders (1961) 104 CLR 149 at [7.95]);
2. whether a document that comes into existence before the contract is made can satisfy the statute (see Pirie v Saunders (1961) 104 CLR 149 at [7.95]);
3. whether the statute can be satisfied by a number of documents, taken together (see, eg, Tonitto v Bassal (1992) 28 NSWLR 564);
4. whether the document has been signed (see Pirie v Saunders (1961) 104 CLR 149 at [7.95]); and
5. whether a document in electronic form can satisfy the statute.

Documents in electronic form

[7.75] Can a document in electronic form (such as a message sent by email or an electronic record of a sale made over the internet) satisfy the statute of frauds provisions? Two questions arise:

Is the document "in writing"?

[7.80] Each of the Electronic Transactions Acts (ETAs) provides that, for the purposes of a law of the relevant jurisdiction, "a transaction is not invalid" because it took place wholly or partly by means of one or more electronic communications: Electronic Transactions Act 1999 (Cth), s 8; Electronic Transactions Act 2001 (ACT), s 7; Electronic Transactions Act 2000 (NSW), s 7; Electronic Transactions (Northern Territory) Act, s 7; Electronic Transactions (Queensland) Act 2001 (Qld), s 8; Electronic Communications Act 2000 (SA), s 7; Electronic Transactions Act 2000 (Tas), s 5; Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000 (Vic), s 7; Electronic Transactions Act 2011 (WA), s 8. Regulations in South Australia provide that the relevant section does not apply to a law relating to the disposition of an interest in land: Electronic Transactions Regulations 2002 (SA), reg 4(1)(a). In Victoria, s 126 of the Instruments Act 1958 (at [7.45]) specifically provides that its requirements "may be met in accordance with the Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000 (Vic)". In other States and Territories, it seems that the relevant ETA provision is intended to allow electronic communications to satisfy the statute of frauds provisions. The choice of language is unfortunate, however, since it is well accepted that non-compliance with the statute of frauds provisions does not render a contract invalid, but simply unenforceable (see [7.105] and Greig and Davis, The Law of Contract (1987), pp 715–6). The provisions of the ETAs may, however, be interpreted broadly in accordance with the object of the legislation, which is "to provide a regulatory framework that", inter alia, "facilitates the use of electronic transactions": Electronic Transactions Act 1999 (Cth), s 3; Electronic Transactions Act 2001 (ACT), s 3; Electronic Transactions Act 2000 (NSW), s 3; Electronic Transactions (Northern Territory) Act, s 3; Electronic Transactions (Queensland) Act 2001, s 3; Electronic Communications Act 2000 (SA), s 3; Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000, s 4; Electronic Transactions Act 2011 (WA), s 3.

Has the document been signed?

[7.85] In order to satisfy the statute of frauds provisions, a document must not only be "in writing" but must also be "signed by the party to be charged". The ETAs provide that, where a law requires a person's signature, that requirement is taken to have been met if an appropriately reliable method has been used to indicate the person's approval and the person consents to the requirement being met by that method: Electronic Transactions Act 1999 (Cth), s 10; Electronic Transactions Act 2001 (ACT), s 9; Electronic Transactions Act 2000 (NSW), s 9; Electronic Transactions (Northern Territory) Act, s 9; Electronic Transactions (Queensland) Act 2001, s 14; Electronic Communications Act 2000 (SA), s 9; Electronic Transactions Act 2000 (Tas), s 7; Electronic Transactions (Victoria) Act 2000, s 9; Electronic Transactions Act 2011 (WA), s 10. Given the generous approach the courts have taken to meeting the "signature" requirement in the statute of frauds provisions, it may not be necessary to resort to the provisions of the ETAs relating to signature.

Signature

[7.90] Each of the statute of frauds provisions requires that the written contract or memorandum be signed by the party to be charged or by that person's authorised agent (who, in Victoria, must be authorised in writing: Instruments Act 1958 (Vic) s 126). The notion of signature in this context has been liberally interpreted by the courts. The printing or typing of a person's name may be taken as a signature, provided the document has been "authenticated" by the party in question. That is, provided the party to be charged has recognised the writing as the final record of the contract. This is known as the "authenticated signature fiction".

Pirie v Saunders

[7.95] Pirie v Saunders (1961) 104 CLR 149 (High Court of Australia) – On Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The respondent sought damages from the appellants for breach of an alleged agreement to grant a lease of certain shop premises to the respondent. The appellants argued that any contract that might have resulted from the discussions between the parties was unenforceable under s 54A of the Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW). The respondent argued that handwritten notes made by the appellants' solicitor of instructions to prepare a lease constituted a sufficient memorandum or note of the agreement for the purposes of s 54A. The Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (by majority) held that the solicitor's notes were capable of being regarded as a sufficient note or memorandum.]

THE COURT (DIXON CJ, FULLAGAR, KITTO, TAYLOR AND MENZIES JJ): [152] It is quite clear from the evidence in the case that both the appellants and the respondent contemplated the preparation of a formal memorandum of lease and it is, at the very least, doubtful whether the testimony of the latter is capable of supporting the conclusion that an oral contract was made. Particularly is this so when it is seen that a draft lease was prepared and that in subsequent discussions by correspondence various amendments were proposed and accepted. But at the trial and before the Full Court the appellants appear to have been content to rest the determination of this issue upon the question whether an agreement for a fixed term to commence "from the completion of the building" did or did not specify the commencing date of the term with sufficient certainty. This bare submission was rejected and, we think rightly rejected, by the Full Court. In these circumstances we do not think it would be proper for us at this stage to enter upon a full examination of the evidence for the purpose of considering whether in fact the oral discussions between the parties are capable of being regarded as sufficient to justify the conclusion that they entered into a binding contract for the granting of a lease.

The other question in the case, that is whether a sufficient note or memorandum had been proved, was answered by a majority of the Full Court in favour of the respondent. They were of the opinion that the fact that one of the appellants, acting both for himself and for the other appellant, gave certain instructions to their solicitor and "stood by" whilst the instructions were written [153] down by the solicitor "afforded evidence that he was impliedly recognizing the writing as an authentic record of the prior oral bargain with the plaintiff which the jury found to have been made, in which case the defendants' names in the document could be regarded as 'signatures' within the meaning of the statute".

It will be necessary to refer to the solicitor's notes with greater particularity but before doing so it should be mentioned that neither before the Full Court nor before us was reliance placed by the respondent upon any other document. Originally at the trial he had attempted to rely upon a form of lease sent to his solicitor under cover of a letter from the appellants' solicitor in July 1954. It became clear that, as constituting a note or memorandum of the contract sued upon, these documents were, for obvious reasons, defective and when, in the defendants' case, the solicitor's note of his instructions became, for no very apparent reason, evidence in the case it was readily seized upon to support the respondent on this issue. From that time onwards reliance has been placed on this document alone and in the circumstances it is necessary that we should examine it and see how it came into existence.

According to the evidence the appellant Cripps, acting for himself and for the first named appellant, called to see their solicitor, Mr Hargraves, in order to give him instructions to prepare a draft lease for submission to the respondent's solicitor. We are not given the details by oral evidence of what was then said but after having testified that he had received his first instructions from Cripps, Mr Hargraves was asked whether he had made certain notes. Upon answering in the affirmative his notes were produced and tendered and admitted in evidence. The exhibit is in the following form:

> William Thompson Pirie 489 King Georges Rd, Ross Anthony Cripps B Hills. Prop: part of Lot B Princes Highway, Sylvania Heights. Tenant: Wilfred Saunders 27 Crystal Street, Sylvania Heights. Solr: TGW Lees, 113 Pitt Street. Terms: 5 years. 2 years option. Rental: £5 10 0 > per week Commencement – on completion of property. Premium: £400 (wants cash). Use: Bakery shop – sells cakes and pastry. Fixtures: Right to remove provided no damage. No right to transfer without consent. Special Conditions – Check as to Board of Health and septic tank. [154]

Thereafter Mr Hargraves prepared a draft lease, there were discussions by correspondence between the solicitors concerning the introduction of additional terms and finally a formal memorandum of lease was engrossed. But since the premises were not then completed this instrument did not purport to fix the commencing date of the term. Presumably this was left to be inserted after the premises had been completed but the instrument was prepared so that everything would be in readiness when it became possible to specify a commencing date.

In these circumstances the Full Court, by majority, took the view that the solicitor's notes of his instructions were capable of being regarded as a sufficient note or memorandum of an earlier concluded agreement. This view was based upon the so-called "authenticated signature fiction" by which the majority meant "that if the name of the party to be charged (not being a signature in the ordinary sense of the word) is placed on the document said to constitute the written memorandum of the contract, it is to be treated as a signature for the purposes of the statute if such party expressly or impliedly indicates that he recognizes the writing as being an authenticated expression of the contract". But since they considered that the jury should have been asked to determine as a question of fact whether what took place when Cripps gave instructions to Hargraves "amounted to an authentication" of the appellants' "signatures" they directed that there should be a new trial. Possibly their Honours intended to limit the new trial to this issue but the formal order is in general terms.

With respect to those members of the Full Court who thought otherwise we are of the opinion that their Honours' decision pushes too far the principle applied in Leeman v Stocks [1951] Ch 941 and the earlier cases referred to in Neill v Hewens (1953) 89 CLR 1. The principle applied in those cases can, we think, have no application to any document which is not in some way or other recognizable as a note or memorandum of a concluded agreement. We do not mean by this that it is necessary that the written note must always appear to have been made after the making of the contract for it is clear that a written proposal or offer may by its subsequent acceptance become by the conduct of the parties recognizable as a sufficient note or memorandum of the resulting contract (Warner v Willington (1856) 3 Drewry 523; 61 ER 1002; Smith v Neale (1857) 2 CB (NS) 67; 140 ER 337 and Reuss v Picksley (1866) LR 1 Ex 342). But this is not such a case. [155]

[7.100] Here there is an allegation of a prior concluded contract and the solicitor's notes are said to constitute a note or memorandum of this contract. But they purport to be and are nothing more or less than a brief notation of his instructions for the preparation of a draft lease for submission to the respondent's solicitor. Neither the existence of the document nor its contents are indicative of the existence of any binding contract. Perhaps, in other words, it may be said that the enumerated particulars do not appear as a note or memorandum of a subsisting contract as distinct from bare instructions for the preparation of a formal lease. Both the document and its contents are quite consistent with the hypothesis that the parties had not made any prior binding contract and that their rights and obligations were not to be effected until the execution of a memorandum of lease in the form which, after discussion, it should finally take. That being so it in no way recognizes the existence of any binding contract and cannot therefore be regarded as a note or memorandum of any such contract (cf Thirkell v Cambi [1919] 2 KB 590).

In these circumstances it is not of much consequence to enter upon a discussion concerning the view expressed by the majority of the Full Court that the appellant Cripps "stood by" whilst Hargraves noted his instructions and that these circumstances "afforded evidence that he was impliedly recognizing the writing as an authentic record of the prior oral bargain with the plaintiff". But since there is nothing in the evidence to suggest that Cripps had any knowledge of what was written down, it seems clear that no inference adverse to the appellants can be based on the so-called "standing by". Moreover even if Cripps can be said to have "stood by" there is no room for the inference that he impliedly recognized the writing as an authentic record of any prior oral bargain. Indeed, both the character and contents of the document and the circumstances in which it was composed tell conclusively against any such inference. We should add also that the nature of the document was such as to render any inquiry concerning the solicitor's authority to make it quite inappropriate.

Finally, even if these objections are not properly founded, it will be seen upon examination that there are several reasons why the document could not be regarded as a sufficient note or memorandum. In the first place it does not specify the property which is to be leased beyond describing it as "part of Lot B, Princes Highway, Sylvania Heights". This alone is, we should think, a fatal objection. Secondly, it is clear that the document does not [156] contain all the terms of the proposed lease for it contemplates the formulation of special conditions after ascertainment of the requirements of the Board of Health. Again, the agreement for breach of which the respondent sought damages was an agreement in the terms alleged in the declaration and the lease the subject of the alleged agreement was to contain, in addition to the matters specified in the declaration, "all the usual and proper covenants". But it is reasonably clear from the immediately following allegation in the declaration that "the said lease was prepared by the defendants" solicitor and all covenants were agreed to by the plaintiff and the defendants', and from succeeding allegations, that the substance of the respondent's case was that there had been a breach of an agreement to grant a lease in the form which the final engrossment took. That being so it is clear that, even if the solicitor's notes can be regarded as a note or memorandum of an agreement between the parties, it is quite insufficient to support the agreement sued upon.

For these reasons the appeal should be allowed and the order of the Full Court set aside.

Appeal allowed.

THE CONSEQUENCES OF NON-COMPLIANCE

Unenforceability

[7.105] A failure to comply with the provisions of the Statute of Frauds makes a contract unenforceable, rather than void. In Leroux v Brown (1852) 12 CB 801; 138 ER 1119, Jervis CJ said: "The statute … does not say, that, unless those requisites are complied with, the contract shall be void, but merely that no action shall be brought upon it."

This means that it may in some circumstances be possible to rely on an unenforceable verbal contract as a defence (see, eg, Thomas v Brown (1876) 1 QBD 714), although this remains a matter of controversy (see Perpetual Executors & Trustees Association of Australia Ltd v Russell (1931) 45 CLR 146 and Head v Kelk (1963) 63 SR (NSW) 340 and Take Harvest Ltd v Liu [1993] AC 552).

Part performance

[7.110] Soon after the Statute of Frauds was passed, it became apparent that it had the potential to enable the perpetration of more fraudulent acts than it avoided. Equity intervened and developed what has come to be known as the doctrine of part performance. According to this doctrine, a person who has partly performed a contract should be able to obtain equitable relief even though the contract itself failed to comply with the statute. Because part performance is an equitable doctrine, only equitable relief can be granted to give effect to it. Part performance will not provide a basis for an action for damages at common law (JC Williamson Ltd v Lukey (1931) 45 CLR 282 at [30.70]). This means that the doctrine of part performance can only be utilised in circumstances where specific performance is available (see Chapter 30). In circumstances where specific performance is available, a court may award damages in lieu of specific performance under legislation in force in all jurisdictions re-enacting the provisions of Lord Cairns' Act (see [30.60]). On the question whether injunctive relief may be available to a person seeking to enforce a contract on the basis of part performance, see JC Williamson v Lukey and Mulholland at [30.70]. One of the most difficult problems in the application of the doctrine of part performance has been in determining whether there is a sufficient nexus between the acts of part performance and the alleged contract. A strict test (requiring that the acts be unequivocally referable to a contract of the kind alleged) was laid down in Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467, but a more liberal test (requiring only that the acts point to the existence of a contract of some kind between the parties and are consistent with the contract alleged) was approved by the House of Lords in Steadman v Steadman [1974] 3 WLR 56.

Pipikos v Trayans

[7.112] Pipikos v Trayans [2018] HCA 39 (High Court of Australia) – On Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia.

[FACTS: Leon Pipikos (the appellant) and his wife Sophie made certain real estate investments together with Leon's brother George and George's then wife Velinka Trayans (the respondent). The two couples purchased an investment property together at Penfield Road in July 2004. The Penfield Road purchase was made by all four (as tenants in common) and was funded by a loan made to all four, together with approximately $75,000 paid by Leon and Sophie. Leon claimed that, in July 2004, in order to fund George and Velinka's participation in the Penfield Road purchase, George and Velinka orally agreed to sell Leon a half-interest in a property George and Velinka owned at Clark Road. The purchase price was $45,000, to be paid partly by way of funding Velinka and George's contribution to the Penfield Road purchase (ie, their share of the $75,000) and partly by way of a cash payment of approximately $8,000 Leon claimed to have made to them. Velinka later became the sole proprietor of the Clark Road property after she and George divorced. Leon sought a declaration that he was entitled to a half-interest in the Clark Road property. The trial judge found that no valid contract had been made, but even if it had, the payments made by Leon were insufficient to invoke the doctrine of part performance. The payments made by Leon were not unequivocally referable to a contract of the kind asserted but were equally consistent with a loan or an unequal contribution to the real estate investment partnership. On appeal, the Full Court found that a contract had been established but agreed that the requirements of part performance had not been satisfied.]

KIEFEL CJ, BELL, GAGELER AND KEANE JJ: [1] South Australia, in common with the other States and the Territories, requires that contracts for the sale of land meet certain formal requirements if they are to be enforceable (Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW), s 54A; Property Law Act 1974 (Q), s 59; Conveyancing and Law of Property Act 1884 (Tas), s 36; Instruments Act 1958 (Vic), s 126; Law Reform (Statute of Frauds) Act 1962 (WA), s 2; Civil Law (Property) Act 2006 (ACT), s 204; Law of Property Act (NT), s 62). Section 26(1) of the Law of Property Act 1936 (SA) ("the Act"), the modern iteration of s 4 of the Statute of Frauds 1677 (29 Car II c 3), relevantly provides that:

> No action shall be brought upon any contract for the sale or other disposition of land or of any interest in land, unless an agreement upon which such action is brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing, and signed by the party to be charged.

[2] Section 26(2) of the Act provides relevantly that the section does not "affect the law relating to part performance".

[3] In Cooney v Burns (1922) 30 CLR 216 at 233 (emphasis in original, see also at 226 per Knox CJ), Isaacs J summarised the law relating to part performance as being that a "bargain in fact made, though devoid of an enforceability either at law or in equity, has been so acted upon by partly performing it that for the defendant to recede from it at that stage would be a fraud on the plaintiff."

[4] In Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 479 (see also at 491 per Lord FitzGerald), the Earl of Selborne LC said that "the acts relied upon as part performance must be unequivocally, and in their own nature, referable to some such agreement as that alleged". The appellant submitted that it is unduly demanding of a party seeking specific performance of a parol contract for the sale of land to require that the acts of part performance be "unequivocally, and in their own nature, referable" to a contract of the kind asserted by the party seeking specific performance; and that in this case the courts below erred in adhering to this requirement.

[5] The appellant urged the adoption of a more relaxed approach, akin to the approach taken in the context of equitable estoppel, said to have been adumbrated by Lord Cranworth LC in Caton v Caton (1866) LR 1 Ch App 137 at 148. On the appellant's argument, the question a court must ask is whether a contracting party has knowingly been induced or allowed by the counterparty to alter his or her position on the faith of the contract. The resolution of this argument is the principal issue in this Court.

[6] The appellant's argument that the requirement of unequivocal referability stated by Lord Selborne in Maddison v Alderson should be relaxed must be rejected for the reasons which follow. Accordingly, the appeal must be dismissed.

The Australian authorities

[37] At the forefront of the appellant's argument in this Court was the contention that in Regent v Millett (1976) 133 CLR 679 Gibbs J, with whom Stephen, Mason, Jacobs and Murphy JJ agreed, expressed a preference for a more liberal approach to the availability of part performance as a basis for the enforcement of a parol contract for the sale of land than that stated by Lord Selborne in Maddison v Alderson. This contention was based on the circumstance that Gibbs J said (at 682) that "[t]he principle upon which the doctrine of part performance rests was stated by Lord Cranworth, Lord Chancellor in Caton v Caton (1866) LR 1 Ch App 137 in words which appear to have a direct application to the present case". The passage then cited by Gibbs J was in the following terms ((1866) LR 1 Ch App 137 at 148):

> [W]hen one of two contracting parties has been induced, or allowed by the other, to alter his position on the faith of the contract, as for instance by taking possession of land, and expending money in building or other like acts, there it would be a fraud in the other party to set up the legal invalidity of the contract on the faith of which he induced, or allowed, the person contracting with him to act, and expend his money.

[38] It is apparent that Gibbs J (at 682) regarded this statement as having a direct application to the case before him because it supported the proposition that:

> the entry into possession alone, or the taking of possession coupled with the expenditure of money by one party on the improvement of property, with the cognizance of the other party to the contract, may amount to part performance.

[39] On this basis, Gibbs J held (at 683) that, in the case before him, "the giving and taking of possession by itself was sufficient part performance of the contract".

[40] Nothing in the use made of Caton v Caton by Gibbs J in Regent v Millett gives any support for the relaxation of the approach of Lord Selborne in Maddison v Alderson. On the contrary, Gibbs J went on to say (at 683):

> the test suggested by the Earl of Selborne LC in [Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 479], that the acts relied upon as part performance 'must be unequivocally, and in their own nature, referable to some such agreement as that alleged', has been consistently accepted as a correct statement of the law. It is enough that the acts are unequivocally and in their own nature referable to some contract of the general nature of that alleged (see McBride v Sandland (1918) 25 CLR 69 at 78).

[41] It is simply not possible to understand these observations as expressing reservation or doubt about the correctness of Lord Selborne's statement.

[42] It is also noteworthy that Gibbs J went on to say (at 683-684) that the taking of possession was unequivocally referable to the contract even though the contract permitted, but did not require, the plaintiffs to take possession of the land. In other words, his Honour's judgment rejected the suggestion that only an act to the detriment of a plaintiff on the faith of the contract would suffice as an act of part performance. As will be seen, the decision in Regent v Millett differs, in this respect, from the approach of Lord Reid in Steadman v Steadman [1976] AC 536 at 540.

[43] Earlier decisions of the High Court also support the view that Lord Selborne's requirement of unequivocal referability is to be taken as a correct statement of the law. In McBride v Sandland (1918) 25 CLR 69 at 77-79, 98-99, Isaacs, Rich and Powers JJ accepted Lord Selborne's statement of the law; and in Cooney v Burns (1922) 30 CLR 216 at 223, 229-231, 239, 243, 243-244, Knox CJ, Isaacs, Higgins, Gavan Duffy and Starke JJ did likewise.

[44] It is true that, in McBride v Sandland (1918) 25 CLR 69 at 79, Isaacs and Rich JJ accepted that an act of part performance must be done "by the party relying on it on the faith of the agreement, and … the other party must have permitted it to be done on that footing" if the moral turpitude that is the "ground of jurisdiction" is to be established. That view may not accord with what Lord Selborne actually said or with the decision in Regent v Millett. But otherwise there can be no doubt that in Australia Lord Selborne's statement of the law in Maddison v Alderson is unshaken by the course of authority in this Court.

[45] As to the appellant's contention that Lord Selborne's unequivocal referability requirement has not been the reason for the decision of any case in this Court, it would be difficult, to say the least, to reconcile a decision in the appellant's favour in this case with this Court's decision in Cooney v Burns. In that case, the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff the lease of a hotel of which the defendant was the lessee. After the contract was made, the lease of the hotel was handed to the plaintiff's solicitors for the purpose of having an assignment of the lease prepared together with notices of an application for the transfer of the associated liquor licence. The plaintiff's solicitors proceeded to prepare an assignment of the lease and the notices of application. An inventory of the furniture included in the sale was also taken. The plaintiff incurred expense in relation to these steps. These acts on the part of the plaintiff were held to be insufficient as acts of part performance in that they did not alter the relative positions of the parties in relation to the land the subject of the contract in terms of the title to, or possession of, or use of that land: (1922) 30 CLR 216 at 235, 241-242, 243, 244-245). The same may be said of the acts of part performance relied upon in this case by the appellant.

A rule of evidence or a principle of substance?

[46] It was common ground between the parties in the present case that the rationale of the doctrine of part performance is not concerned with the proof of the contract but with the enforcement of equities arising from the partial performance of the contract. On the appellant's behalf, it was argued that the requirement of unequivocal referability is a vestige of the tenacious heresy that the doctrine of part performance is concerned with the proof of the parol contract by a process of inference from the acts of part performance. It was said that Lord Selborne had erred by applying rules of Chancery procedure that had, by the time of Maddison v Alderson, been repealed, and that this had led to courts treating the requirement of unequivocal referability as a substantive rule when, in truth, it was an erroneously invoked rule of evidence.

[47] It is true that some statements in the cases are far from clear as to the rationale of the doctrine of part performance. In some of the cases, the basal principle is stated in terms of a concern to enforce the equities that have arisen by reason of the performance of obligations under the parol contract in order to prevent the equitable fraud that would occur if the defendant were allowed to resile from a partly completed transaction (Caton v Caton (1866) LR 1 Ch App 137 at 148; Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 475-476, 489; Steadman v Steadman [1976] AC 536 at 540, 542-543, 558, 568; Regent v Millett (1976) 133 CLR 679 at 682). On this view, as Pomeroy says, the ground of equitable intervention is "a fraud inhering in the consequence of setting up the statute as a defense" (Symons, Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, 5th ed (1941), vol 4, §1409. See also Story, Commentaries on Equity Jurisprudence, as Administered in England and America, 13th ed (1886), vol 2, §§754 and 758).

[48] In other cases, the principle has been stated in terms of a concern that evidence is necessary to satisfy a peculiarly high standard of proof to establish the fact of the making of a parol contract for the sale of land (Morphett v Jones (1818) 1 Swans 172 at 181; 36 ER 344 at 348; Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 479, 485; Thomas v The Crown (1904) 2 CLR 127 at 138; Maiden v Maiden (1909) 7 CLR 727 at 737-738; Chaproniere v Lambert [1917] 2 Ch 356 esp at 361; Kingswood Estate Co Ltd v Anderson [1963] 2 QB 169 at 189. See also Actionstrength Ltd v International Glass Engineering IN.GL.EN SpA [2003] 2 AC 541 at 549-550 [22]-[23]). In Corbin on Contracts, in relation to the requirement that the acts of part performance be unequivocally referable to some such contract as that alleged by the plaintiff, it is said that the "principal idea that is struggling for expression is that the part performance must be clearly evidential of the existence of a contract" (Brown, Corbin on Contracts, rev ed (1997), vol 4 at 521).

[49] The view that the court enforces the equities arising from partial performance, rather than the rights conferred by the parol contract itself, while attended with a degree of subtlety, has the powerful merit of being consistent with the Statute of Frauds. The view that part performance is concerned with matters of proof of the parol contract cannot stand with the Statute of Frauds, the evident purpose of which is to prevent the enforcement of a parol contract, however clear may be the proof of its making.

[50] It is not correct to say that Lord Selborne's statement of principle evinces the view that part performance operates as acceptable evidence of the parol contract in question in place of the writing required by the statute. When Lord Selborne spoke of acts "unequivocally … referable" to "some such agreement" (Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 479), his Lordship was not speaking of the particular contract in question. The very circumstance that Lord Selborne spoke of referability to "some such agreement" itself suggests that the requirement is not concerned with proof of the particular contract in question, but with dealings between the parties which in their nature establish that the parties are in the midst of an uncompleted contract for the sale or other disposition of land. Given that part performance is relevant only in relation to contracts for the sale or other disposition of land (cf Heydon, Leeming and Turner, Meagher, Gummow and Lehane's Equity: Doctrines and Remedies, 5th ed (2015) at 684), it is not difficult to appreciate that the acts described by Lord Selborne are acts unequivocally and inherently referable to a transaction for the sale or other disposition of the land. Lord Selborne was clear that unequivocal referability is concerned with the proof of acts partially executing a transaction that remains uncompleted, and that proof of the agreement that had been made was not required to show the equity to have the transaction completed.

[51] It is significant in this respect that Lord Selborne expressly adopted the statement of Sir James Wigram V-C in Dale v Hamilton (1846) 5 Hare 369 at 381; 67 ER 955 at 960 that it is in general of the essence of an act of part performance:

> that the Court shall, by reason of the act itself, without knowing whether there was an agreement or not, find the parties unequivocally in a position different from that which, according to their legal rights, they would be in if there were no contract. (emphasis added)

[52] In a case where the parties are found, as a matter of fact, to be in that position, equity requires that the transaction be completed notwithstanding the objection of the defendant that the contract itself cannot be enforced by reason of non-compliance with the Statute of Frauds. The requirement for unequivocal referability is essential to Lord Selborne's thesis that the court is not enforcing the contract – that would be contrary to the Statute of Frauds – but the equities generated by its partial performance. It is only where the acts of part performance are inherently and unequivocally referable to such a contract that it cannot be objected that, in truth, and contrary to the legislation, it is the parol contract that is being enforced.

[54] The equity to have the transaction completed arises where the acts that are proved are consistent only with partial performance of a transaction of the same nature as that which the plaintiff seeks to have completed by specific performance. At that point, regard may be had to the terms of the oral contract in order to ascertain the appropriate orders by way of specific performance. So, in Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 475-476, Lord Selborne stated that the terms of the parol contract may be taken into account only when the equity to have the transaction carried to completion has been established and it becomes necessary to establish the terms of the order to be made. At that point (at 476):

> "The matter has advanced beyond the stage of contract; and the equities which arise out of the stage which it has reached cannot be administered unless the contract is regarded."

[55] In McBride v Sandland (1918) 25 CLR 69 at 77-78, Isaacs and Rich JJ explained that the logical order in which the issues in a case such as the present should be addressed is first to determine whether the acts performed establish the equity and then, and only then, to refer to the terms of the parol agreement in order to ascertain the terms in which the equity is to be enforced.

[56] Applying that reasoning to the present case, because the acts of part performance relied upon by the appellant are consistent with some transaction other than a sale of the Clark Road property, he was not able to show a partially completed sale of the Clark Road property that he was entitled in equity to have fully executed by means of a decree of specific performance.

[57] It also follows from the above that the appellant's contention that Lord Selborne erroneously applied repealed rules of Chancery procedure is incorrect, and must be rejected. On the contrary, his Lordship was expounding a rule of substance calculated to avoid Chancery acting in a manner repugnant to the Statute of Frauds.

Part performance and equitable estoppel

[58] It has been suggested (Heydon, Gummow and Austin, Cases and Materials on Equity and Trusts, 3rd ed (1989) at 1042) that "the modern and divergent rules of proprietary and equitable estoppel … secret trusts … and part performance sprang from [the] common root" that a person may not rely on his or her strict legal rights where to do so is against the conscience of equity. But the appellant's invitation to subsume part performance within the development of equitable estoppel fails to appreciate that, while in some cases the doctrines may have an overlapping operation, they do not cover the same ground. While it may well be that equity's concern to prevent unconscientious conduct is the common root of equitable estoppel and part performance, there are discernible differences in the scope and operation of these doctrines as each has developed in Australia.

[59] The first such difference is that part performance may be invoked by a vendor of land to enforce a parol contract (Turner v Bladin (1951) 82 CLR 463 at 473), whereas equitable estoppel is available only against a vendor of land to vindicate the interests of a prospective purchaser (cf Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De G F & J 517; 45 ER 1285; Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129).

[60] Next, equitable intervention by way of equitable estoppel to prevent a defendant resiling from a promise that is not enforceable at law is justified, not by the existence of an unperformed or partially performed promise, but by a concern that the plaintiff should not be left to suffer a detriment

by the defendant's so resiling (Giumelli v Giumelli (1999) 196 CLR 101 at 121-122 [35]; Sidhu v Van Dyke (2014) 251 CLR 505 at 522-523 [58]). So, in Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387 at 406 Mason CJ and Wilson J noted that, as a general rule, a "failure to fulfil a promise does not of itself amount to unconscionable conduct" and so "mere reliance on an executory promise to do something, resulting in the promisee changing his position or suffering detriment, does not bring promissory estoppel into play." In the same case (at 418-419), Brennan J explained:

> The protection which equity extends is analogous to the protection given by estoppel in pais to which Dixon J referred in Grundt v Great Boulder (1937) 59 CLR 641, ie, protection against the detriment which would flow from a party's change of position if the assumption (or expectation) that led to it were deserted.

[61] Thirdly, the nature of the equity enforced by part performance differs from that enforced by equitable estoppel. In some cases of equitable estoppel, the relief granted may require the taking of active steps by the defendant to meet the expectations generated by the transaction (Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De G F & J 517; 45 ER 1285; Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129; Sidhu v Van Dyke (2014) 251 CLR 505 at 529 [82]), but in other cases the requirements of good conscience may mean that such an order would not reflect the measure of relief required to protect the plaintiff against the apprehended detriment (The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 441; Sidhu v Van Dyke (2014) 251 CLR 505 at 529 [83]). If the doctrine of part performance covered the same ground as equitable or promissory estoppel, one might have expected that there would need to be, in each case where part performance is invoked, an analysis of the extent to which a defendant's attempt to resile from completion of the transaction would result in detriment to the plaintiff, and that the relief granted would be moulded accordingly to prevent that detriment (ff Crabb v Arun District Council [1976] Ch 179 at 198). But that has not been the case. Indeed, in the case of part performance, as is apparent from this Court's decision in Regent v Millett, there is not even an insistence that there be detrimental reliance on the part of the plaintiff to establish an equity to relief. A defendant's act in putting a plaintiff into possession might not of itself be a detriment to the plaintiff, but there can be no doubt that it is a sufficient act of part performance (Regent v Millett (1976) 133 CLR 679 at 682). Where part performance is established the plaintiff will be entitled to a decree of specific performance without needing to establish that a lesser form of relief would be inadequate. In this respect, the operation of part performance may be contrasted with equitable estoppel, where, as Mason CJ and Wilson J noted in Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387 at 405, the plaintiff's equity may be enforced by the grant of relief falling short of an order for the satisfaction of the plaintiff's expectation interest (see also Sidhu v Van Dyke (2014) 251 CLR 505 at 528-530 [79]-[86]).

[62] In Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 475, Lord Selborne illustrated his thesis that the defendant "is really 'charged' upon the equities resulting from the acts done in execution of the contract" by the example of:

> a parol contract to sell land, completely performed on both sides, as to everything except conveyance; the whole purchase-money paid; the purchaser put into possession; expenditure by him (say in costly buildings) upon the property; leases granted by him to tenants. The contract is not a nullity … All the acts done must be referred to the actual contract, which is the measure and test of their legal and equitable character and consequences.

[63] His Lordship went on to say (at 476):

> The choice is between undoing what has been done (which is not always possible, or, if possible, just) and completing what has been left undone. The line may not always be capable of being so clearly drawn as in the case which I have supposed; but it is not arbitrary or unreasonable to hold that when the statute says that no action is to be brought to charge any person upon a contract concerning land, it has in view the simple case in which he is > charged upon the contract only, and not that in which there are equities resulting from res gestae subsequent to and arising out of the contract.

[64] In the example offered by Lord Selborne it is readily apparent, having regard to the acts performed on the strength of the contract, that a court of equity would regard specific performance of the contract – which, ex hypothesi, would involve only an order for the transfer of the legal title – as the only remedy sufficient to do justice. A contract or other arrangement which remains largely unperformed on both sides may not always have the same claim on the conscience of equity in terms of the remedies provided by the court as a contract which has been performed to the extent of that hypothesised by Lord Selborne (cf In re Cuming (1869) LR 5 Ch App 72; Chang v Registrar of Titles (1976) 137 CLR 177 at 184-185, 189-190). And so it can be seen that it is something peculiar to part performance that the equity of the plaintiff that arises in reliance upon the partial performance of the contract has been regarded as sufficiently strong, without more, save a readiness, willingness and ability to do equity (Mehmet v Benson (1965) 113 CLR 295 at 307-308, 314-315; cf Langman v Handover (1929) 43 CLR 334 at 345, 356; Mayfair Trading Co Pty Ltd v Dreyer (1958) 101 CLR 428 at 452-453), to support an order for specific performance in order to vindicate the equity of the plaintiff that arises from the part performance of the contract. In J C Williamson Ltd v Lukey and Mulholland (1931) 45 CLR 282 at 300, Dixon J, with whom Gavan Duffy CJ agreed, explained why this is so:

> The acts of part performance must be such as to be consistent only with the existence of a contract between the parties, and to have been done in actual performance of that which in fact existed. But in such a case the equity which so arises is to have the entire contract carried into execution by both sides. Because the acts done upon the faith of the contract could not have taken place if it had not been made, and the contract is of a kind which it is considered equitable to enforce in specie, a party who has so acted in partial execution of the contract obtains an equity to its complete performance.

[65] Lord Selborne's requirement that the acts of part performance relied upon be unequivocally referable to a contract of the kind asserted by the plaintiff is best understood as being necessary to give rise to this peculiarly strong equity. His Lordship said (Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 478):

> the rule … requires some evidentia rei to connect the alleged part performance with the alleged agreement. There is not otherwise enough in the situation in which the parties are found to raise questions which may not be solved without recourse to equity. It is not enough that an act done should be a condition of, or good consideration for, a contract, unless it is, as between the parties, such a part execution as to change their relative positions as to the subject-matter of the contract.

The result in the present case

[77] It was argued in the written submissions made on the appellant's behalf that even if the unequivocal referability requirement were applied he should succeed on the appeal; but in the course of oral argument, it was conceded that, if Lord Selborne's approach were applied to the circumstances of this case, the acts on which the appellant relied at trial and before the Full Court would not suffice as acts of part performance. That concession was rightly made.

[78] In Cooney v Burns (1922) 30 CLR 216 at 244, Starke J fixed upon the statement of Lord Selborne (Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467 at 478) that an act is not a sufficient act of part performance "unless it is, as between the parties, such a part execution as to change their relative positions as to the subject-matter of the contract." Starke J went on to conclude ((1922) 30 CLR 216 at 244; see also at 236-238 per Isaacs J, 240-241 per Higgins J) that the act relied on in the case before him by way of part performance was not sufficient to support an order for specific performance because it did not "change the relative positions of the parties as to the subject matter of the contract, namely, the land"; in particular, the acts in question did not "alter the title in the land … affect the possession or the right to possession of the land, [or] … affect the use of the land or touch or concern the land in any way whatever."

[79] Similar observations may be made in the present case. Here, neither party performed any act that was unequivocally referable to the Clark Road property. There was no giving or taking of possession of that land. There were no other acts indicative of a change in the respective positions of the parties in relation to the land. The Full Court was therefore correct to conclude that the acts on which the appellant relied were not sufficient to engage the doctrine of part performance.

Conclusion and orders

[80] Considerations of authority and principle combine to require that the appellant's contention be rejected.

[NETTLE and GORDON JJ and EDELMAN J delivered separate judgments exploring the history and nature of the part performance doctrine. Their Honours agreed that the unequivocal referability requirement should be maintained and that the appeal should be dismissed.]

Appeal dismissed.

[7.115] Note

The doctrine of part performance has been abolished in the United Kingdom by the Law of Property (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1989 (c 34), s 2(8). Section 2(1) of that Act provides that: "A contract for the sale or other disposition of an interest in land can only be made in writing and only by incorporating all the terms which the parties have expressly agreed in one document or, where contracts are exchanged, in each." See Yaxley v Gotts [2000] Ch 162, 171–2.

Constructive trust, estoppel, misleading conduct and restitution

[7.125] One result of the difficulties facing a plaintiff forced to rely on the doctrine of part performance has been an increased focus on alternative causes of action, such as constructive trust, estoppel, misleading or deceptive conduct and restitution.

1. Constructive trust was successfully relied upon as an alternative to part performance in Ogilvie v Ryan [1976] 2 NSWLR 504.
2. Reliance on the doctrine of estoppel is illustrated by the decision of the High Court in Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387 at [9.35]. See further Riches v Hogben (1986) 1 Qd R 315; Colin v Holden [1989] VR 510; Powercell Pty Ltd v Cuzeno [2004] NSWCA 51.
3. On the possibility of relying on misleading or deceptive conduct, see Futuretronics International Pty Ltd v Gadzhis [1992] 2 VR 217 at [33.155].

4. If a plaintiff pays money or provides goods or services under a verbal contract which is rendered unenforceable by legislation, an action in restitution may be available; see Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 at [10.20]. As indicated in Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul, the wording of a statutory provision may be sufficiently wide to exclude any claim by a contracting party who fails to comply with the relevant statutory formalities. Compare Stevastopoulos v Spanos [1991] 2 VR 194; Mostia Constructions Pty Ltd v Cox [1994] 2 Qd R 55; Sutton v Zullo Enterprises Pty Ltd [1998] QCA 417; [2000] 2 Qd R 196.

Capacity

[8.05] The classes of persons lacking contractual capacity are minors, some people with cognitive disabilities and the intoxicated. The law denies such persons contractual capacity in order to protect them from assuming contractual obligations in circumstances where they may not have been able to assess whether those contracts were in their own best interests.

In all jurisdictions in Australia, 18 is the age of majority. Persons below that age are described either as infants or minors. Legislation in all Australian jurisdictions regulates the status of contracts made with persons lacking contractual capacity. See further:

[9.190] W v G 251

INTRODUCTION AND HISTORY OF ESTOPPEL

[9.05] Estoppels by conduct create rights where promises and representations have been relied upon. The original form of estoppel by conduct was estoppel by representation, which is sometimes referred to as estoppel in pais, or common law estoppel. An estoppel by representation arises where one person (the inducing party) leads another (the relying party) to adopt an assumption of fact, and the relying party acts on that assumption in such a way that the relying party will suffer detriment if the representor subsequently denies that it is true. (See eg, Thompson v Palmer (1933) 49 CLR 507; Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641.) Assume, for example, that a builder has negotiated the terms of a building contract with a customer, with the parties intending to be bound only when a written contract has been signed. The builder prepares a written contract, signs it, and sends it to the customer. The customer telephones the builder and tells the builder that the customer has signed the contract. On the faith of that assurance, the builder purchases materials for the job and rejects other offers of work during the relevant period. The customer has induced the builder to adopt an assumption of fact (that the customer has signed the contract). That assumption has been relied upon by the builder (by purchasing materials and refusing other work) such that the builder will suffer detriment if the purchaser now denies having signed the contract. The customer is therefore "estopped" from denying that she has signed the contract. The effect of the estoppel is that the rights of the parties are determined on the basis of the assumed state of affairs; that is, on the basis that the contract has been signed, even though it has not.

A relying party will commonly rely on a promise or representation relating to the representor's future conduct, rather than a representation of existing fact. A relying party might, for example, be induced to act on an assumption that the representor will behave in a particular way in the future, such as:

- an assumption that the representor will enter into a contract with the relying party at some time in the future;
- an assumption that the representor will transfer land, pay money or provide another benefit to the relying party; or

- an assumption that the representor will not enforce certain contractual rights against the relying party. The representor might, for example, be a landlord who agrees with a tenant that in future she will accept a reduced rental.

Up until the middle of the 19th century, courts of equity exercised a jurisdiction to "make representations good", and this jurisdiction was exercised in relation to representations relating to the future conduct of the representor (see eg, Hammersley v De Biel (1845) 12 Cl & F 45; 8 ER 1312). In Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185; 10 ER 882, 886, however, the House of Lords held that the doctrine applies only to representations of fact and does not apply to a statement of what a party intends to do. This decision has been strictly applied at common law. In equity, however, two forms of estoppel developed, effectively as exceptions to the rule in Jorden v Money, although they were not acknowledged as such. The first was a set of principles that became known as proprietary estoppel. These principles operated where a party had been induced by a landowner to believe that he or she had or would be granted an interest in land. Where the relying party acted to his or her detriment on the faith of that belief (typically by building on the land), these acts raised an "equity" (or entitlement to equitable relief) against the landowner (see eg, Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517; 45 ER 1285; Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129).

The second was the principle of promissory estoppel, which emerged from Hughes v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 439 and Birmingham and District Land Company v London and North Western Railway Co (1889) 40 Ch D 268 and was revived by Denning J in Central London Property Trust v High Trees House [1947] 1 KB 130. This principle operated where a party to a contract promised that certain contractual rights would not be enforced. Where the promise was intended to be binding or intended to be acted on and was acted on by the promisee, a court of equity would refuse to allow the promisor to enforce the rights in question, at least without giving the promisee a chance to resume her or his original position.

This chapter will trace the development of equitable estoppel in Australian law by setting out some of the more important and interesting cases, mostly in chronological order. One of the first Australian cases in which the principle of promissory estoppel was applied was Je Maintiendrai Pty Ltd v Quaglia (1980) 26 SASR 101. Since this case involved a promise by a landlord to accept a reduced rental, it could clearly be accommodated within the principle of promissory estoppel in its narrowest formulation. The estoppel arose from a promise not to enforce contractual rights, and was relied upon as a defence to the landlord's attempt to enforce those rights. The crucial questions for the court were: first, whether the principle of promissory estoppel formed part of Australian law, secondly, whether detriment was required and, thirdly, whether the tenant had suffered detriment.

THE DEVELOPMENT AND ELEMENTS OF EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL

Je Maintiendrai v Quaglia

[9.10] Je Maintiendrai Pty Ltd v Quaglia (1980) 26 SASR 101 (Supreme Court of South Australia in Banco) – Appeal from Local Court.

[FACTS: The respondent tenant operated a hairdressing business in a shopping centre owned by the appellant landlord. There was little demand for shops in the shopping centre and the landlord had experienced some difficulty in finding and keeping tenants. The landlord and tenant signed a three-year lease fixing the rent for the shop at $278 per month, to be increased annually in accordance with rises in the consumer price index. Some months after the lease was signed the landlord agreed to a reduced rent of $240 per month for an indefinite period. The landlord accepted the reduced rent until the tenant sought to vacate the premises. The landlord then claimed the accumulated arrears of rent (ie, the difference between the total amount paid by the tenant and the total amount payable under the terms of the written lease). The trial judge held that the landlord was estopped from claiming this amount. The landlord appealed to the Supreme Court.]

KING CJ: [102] The issue on this appeal is whether the appellant, having told the respondents that their rent was reduced, is estopped from recovering from the respondents as arrears of rent the additional amount which would have been due under the lease but for the reduction. The facts are set out in the judgment of White J.

The appellant's promise to reduce the rent has no contractual force because it was made without consideration. The acceptance of a sum which is less than that legally due is not binding and does not extinguish liability for the balance unless there is fresh consideration: Foakes v Beer (1884) 9 App Cas 605. The evidence does not disclose fresh consideration. The respondents' case therefore rests upon an estoppel to which the facts are alleged to give rise.

Few areas of law have given rise to more controversy in the last few decades than the area of promissory estoppel. There is a question as to whether the very notion of estoppel based upon promise or statement of future intention has any place in our law. It appears to run directly counter to the decision of the House of Lords in Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185;10 ER 868. That case appeared to decide that to found an estoppel a representation of existing fact was required as contrasted with a mere expression of future intention; see Craine v Colonial Mutual Fire Insurance Co Ltd (1920) 28 CLR 305, per Isaacs J at 324; Franklin v Manufacturers Mutual Insurance Ltd (1935) 36 SR (NSW) 76, per Jordan [103] CJ at 82. Yet twenty-three years after Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185;10 ER 868, Lord Cairns LC in Hughes v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 439, 448 was able to say:

> … it is the first principle upon which all Courts of Equity proceed, that if parties who have entered into definite and distinct terms involving certain legal results — certain penalties or legal forfeiture — afterwards by their own act or with their own consent enter upon a course of negotiation which has the effect of leading one of the parties to suppose that the strict rights arising under the contract will not be enforced, or will be kept in suspense, or held in abeyance, the person who otherwise might have enforced those rights will not be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable having regard to the dealings which have thus taken place between the parties.

The principle of equity expressed by Lord Cairns in that passage was applied by the Court of Appeal in Birmingham and District Land Company v London and North Western Railway Co (1889) 40 ChD 268. Bowen LJ, referring to the principle enunciated by Lord Cairns, said:

> It seems to me to amount to this, that if persons who have contractual rights against others induce by their conduct those against whom they have such rights to believe that such rights will either not be enforced or will be kept in suspense or abeyance for some particular time, those persons will not be allowed by a Court of Equity to enforce the rights until such time has elapsed, without at all events placing the parties in the same position as they were before ((1889) 40 ChD, at p 286).

The notion of promissory estoppel was given a modern formulation and a new impetus by the decision of Denning J (as he then was) in Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Limited [1947] KB 130, where it was said at p 134 to be the "natural result of the fusion of law and equity". The doctrine has been expounded by Lord Denning in a number of subsequent cases. It has been recognized and confirmed by the House of Lords: Tool Metal Manufacturing Co Ltd v Tungsten Electric Co Ltd [1955] 1 WLR 761. In Woodhouse Ltd v Nigerian Produce Ltd [1972] AC 741, 758. Lord Hailsham recognized the doctrine as "an expanding doctrine" which raised "problems of coherent expression which have never been systematically explored". The doctrine has received recognition in New Zealand: Commissioner of Inland Revenue v Morris [1958] NZLR 1126; McCathie v McCathie [1971] NZLR 58, especially at p 71.

The learned authors of the third Australian edition of Cheshire and Fifoot on the Law of Contract (1974) maintain that the High Court has rejected the doctrine and that promissory estoppel forms no part of the law of Australia. The learned authors rely, in support of that contention on Albert House Ltd (In Voluntary Liquidation) v Brisbane City Council (1968) 42 ALJR 158. … [104] On the view taken of the case in the High Court, the question of promissory estoppel did not arise. I do not think that the case can be regarded as a rejection of the doctrine of promissory estoppel. The learned authors of Cheshire and Fifoot also rely upon the Privy Council case Chadwick v Manning [1896] AC 231. This was an appeal from a decree made by the Chief Judge in Equity in the Supreme Court of New South Wales in a suit to restrain a guarantor from proceeding at law to enforce an indemnity against his co-guarantor on the ground that the co-guarantor had altered his position on the faith of a representation that the indemnity would not be enforced. The Privy Council held that there had been no such representation, but also held, endorsing Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185;10 ER 868, that a representation as to intention as distinct from existing fact could not found an estoppel. The latter holding inconsistent, however, with the subsequent Privy Council case of Ajayi v RT Briscoe (Nigeria) Ltd [1964] 1 WLR 1326.

In Ajayi v RT Briscoe (Nigeria) Ltd [1964] 1 WLR 1326 the Privy Council clearly and unequivocally recognized estoppel arising from promise or statement of intention, as part of the law, although it did not find the necessary conditions to be present in that case. I think that until the question is dealt with by the High Court, this Court should treat the formulation of the principle in Ajayi's case [1964] 1 WLR 1326 as authoritative. In that case the Privy Council formulated the principle as follows:

> Their lordships are of opinion that the principle of law as defined by Bowen LJ has been confirmed by the House of Lords in the case of the Tool Metal Manufacturing Co Ltd v Tungsten Electric Co Ltd [1955] 1 WLR 761, where the authorities were reviewed, and no encouragement was given to the view that the principle was capable of extension so as to create rights in the promises for which he had given no consideration. The principle, which has been described as quasi estoppel and perhaps more aptly as promissory estoppel, is that when one party to a contract in the absence of fresh consideration agrees not to enforce his rights an equity will be raised in favour of the other party. This equity is, however, subject to the qualification (1) that the other party has altered his position, (2) that the promisor can resile from his promise on giving reasonable notice, which need not be a formal notice, giving the promisee a reasonable opportunity of resuming his position, (3) the promise only becomes final and irrevocable if the promisee cannot resume his position. [1964] 1 WLR 1326, 1330

[9.15] It is clear from the above formulation that there can be no estoppel unless the promisee has altered his position on the faith of the promise. Lord Denning maintains that it is sufficient that the promisee has acted upon the promise and that in the case of promissory estoppel, unlike estoppel by representation, detriment to the promisee is unnecessary: WJ Alan Ltd v El Nasr Export and Import Co [1972] 2 QB 189. The rule in the case of estoppel by representation of an existing fact is clear. The representor is estopped only if the representee would suffer a detriment in the event of the representor being permitted to set up rights against the representee inconsistent with the representation. The principle upon which estoppel in pais is founded, as expressed by Dixon J in Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641, 674, "is that the law should not permit an unjust departure by a party from an assumption of fact which he has caused another party to adopt or accept for the purpose of their legal relations". The principle upon which estoppel arising from a promise or statement of intention is founded, as expressed by Lord Cairns LC in Hughes v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 439, is that "the person who otherwise might have enforced those rights will not be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable having regard to the dealings which have thus taken place between the parties". The basic principle underlying both types of estoppel is, I apprehend, the same. It rests upon the injustice to the representee or promisee of allowing the representor or promisor, in the circumstances which exist, to depart from the representation or promise. If the representee or promisee will suffer no detriment as a consequence of the other party resiling from his position and asserting his strict legal rights, it is difficult to see where the injustice of permitting him to do so would lie. I can see no valid reason for making a distinction between these two types of estoppel in this respect. In my opinion, a person who promises or states his intention to another not to enforce or insist upon his legal rights is not estopped from resiling from that position and reverting to the strict legal position, unless his doing so would result in some detriment and therefore some injustice to that other.

In the present case there was an intimation that the rent legally due under the lease was reduced. This clearly amounts to a promise not to enforce the legal right to the difference between the reduced amount and the amount legally due. It is not disputed that the appellant was entitled to revert to the strict legal position as to future payment upon giving due notice. The claim in the action relates to the difference between the reduced amount and that legally due from the time the intimation was given and the time when it was clear that the appellant required payment in full. Whether on the facts the appellant might have been permanently estopped does not therefore fall for decision. What must be decided is whether, if the appellant were allowed to recover the arrears, the respondents would suffer a detriment which renders it unjust that the appellant should be permitted to do so.

The learned trial Judge found that the respondents would suffer a detriment as a result of being faced with a lump sum liability. I quote his reasons:

> That it is often easier for people to make small periodical payments than to find a lump sum is obvious, and there is no need to point to the use by many people of installment credit facilities, on which extra costs incurred in respect of the credit charge, to pay for houses, goods or services. Where, as in the present case the plaintiff has agreed to forego, and not merely to defer, the receipt of part of the future payments contractually due he cannot, without prejudicing the defendant, subsequently demand as a lump sum all the money which would have been paid by past installments had the plaintiff not agreed to accept less. In the present case, instead of having to find a comparatively small sum of money every month, which the defendants were, though not without difficulty, able to do, they were in fact, after almost eighteen months being lulled to sleep, suddenly faced with demand to pay a large sum of accumulated "arrears" …

The evidence as to detriment is sparse. The respondents' case would be stronger if there were evidence of financial hardship or embarrassment as a result of the debt accumulating or, as in Holt v Markham [1923] 1 KB 504, that the money had been spent in other ways and that the respondent were unable to pay, at any rate without difficulty or inconvenience. It would be stronger if there were evidence that they had conducted their affairs differently as a result of the reduction, for example that they had refrained from exploring the possibility of selling the business and assigning the lease. The sparsity of evidence of detriment has caused me to consider anxiously whether the learned Judge's conclusion can be supported. In the end I have reached the conclusion that we should not disturb it. The respondents conducted a small business. There was some evidence of their financial position and the learned trial Judge heard it given. He was in a better position that is this Court to judge whether the accumulation of arrears of this magnitude would be a detriment to the respondents' failure to say so expressly. I think that we should accept the conclusion which he reached.

In my opinion, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed.

[9.20] WHITE J [White J stated the facts, cited a range of views as to whether detriment is a necessary element of promissory estoppel and continued]: [113] In [Thompson v Palmer (1933) 49 CLR 507, 547] Dixon J, said:

> The principle upon which estoppel in pais is founded is that the law should not permit an unjust departure by a party from an assumption, of fact which he has caused another party > to adopt or accept for the purpose of their legal relations. This is, of course, a very general statement. But it is the basis of the rules governing estoppel. Those rules work out the more precise grounds upon which the law holds a party disentitled to depart from an assumption in the assertion of rights against another. One condition appears always to be indispensable. That other must have so acted or abstained from acting upon the footing of the state of affairs assumed that he would suffer a detriment if the opposite party were afterwards allowed to set up rights against him inconsistent with the assumption. In stating this essential condition, particularly where the estoppel flows from representation it is often said simply that the party asserting the estoppel must have been induced to act to his detriment. Although substantially such a statement is correct and leads to no misunderstanding, it does not bring out clearly the basal purpose of the doctrine. That purpose is to avoid or prevent a detriment to the party asserting the estoppel by compelling the opposite party to adhere to the assumption upon which the former acted or abstained from acting, This means that the real detriment or harm from which the law seeks to give protection is that which would flow from the change of position if the assumption were deserted that led to it. So long as the assumption is adhered to, the party who altered his situation upon the faith of it cannot complain. His complaint is that when afterwards the other party makes a different state of affairs the basis of an assertion of right against him then, if it is allowed, his own original change of position will operate as a detriment. His action or inaction must be such that, if the assumption upon which he proceeded were shown to be wrong, and an inconsistent state of affairs were accepted as the foundation of the rights and duties of himself and the opposite party, the consequence would be to make his original act of failure to act a source of prejudice. Thus, when, in Holt v Markham [1923] 1 KB 504 the fact that the defendant had spent the money sued for, believing it to be his [114] own to spend, was treated as a sufficient alteration of his position to estop the plaintiff from departing from the assumption which he had induced, the harm or detriment giving rise to the estoppel was that which would be done by requiring the defendant to repay money which he no longer had.

Dr Turner [in Spencer Bower and Turner, Estoppel by Representation, 3rd ed, 1977] insists upon some detriment but makes the important point that it is only to be judged as at the moment when the promisor proposes to resile from his representation. He said (par 114):

> Whether the representee has "altered his position" by way of positive change, or merely by refraining from some action which otherwise he would have been at liberty to take, he must be able to show "detriment", which as we have seen is some prejudicial effect upon his temporal interests. But it is of the utmost importance to notice that the "detriment" which the representee must be shown to have suffered is judged only at the moment when the representor proposes to resile from his representation. It has been pointed out by Dixon J in the course of his enunciation of the principles governing this part of the subject contained in his judgment in Grundt v The Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1938) 59 CLR 641 that in measuring the detriment, or demonstrating its existence, one does not compare the position of the representee, before and after acting upon the representation, upon the assumption that the representation is to be regarded as true. So long as the assumption continues to be regarded by the parties as true, the question of estoppel does not arise. It is only when the representor wishes to disavow the assumption contained in his representation that an estoppel arises, and the question of detriment is considered, accordingly, in the light of the position which the representee would be in if the representor were allowed to disavow the truth of the representation.

After quoting the above passage from Dixon J in Grundt's case, Dr Turner goes on: "The test of detriment, in a word, is whether it appears unjust or inequitable that the representor should now be allowed to resile from his representation, having regard to what the representee has done, or refrained from doing, in reliance on the representation." And at par 353, Dr Turner deals with the argument that it is not necessary for an alteration of position to amount to detriment. He refers to

Lord Denning's article in the Modern Law Review vol 15, and to his rejection of detriment in WJ Alan & Co Ltd v El Nasr Export and Import Co [1972] 2 QB 189.

Dr Turner then goes on (pages 392-3) with the reconciliation of the cases which appeals to me. He said:

> … When the alteration of position in [Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd [1947] KB 130] is looked at, it is clear enough that it consisted of much more than "having an extension of time and paying less"; the tenant elected to continue liable as tenant, and to pay rent, albeit at a lesser rate than he must have paid without the assurance. It is submitted that by choosing to continue paying rent, albeit a less rent, in the particular circumstances in which the war had affected the tenancy, and in electing to continue liable as tenant in reliance on the lessor's assurance that a less rent would be accepted in satisfaction, the tenant had altered his position so that, judging the matter at the date when the lessor proposed to resile from the arrangement, it would have been inequitable — and inequitable in the highest degree — for the Court to condone such a course of action. This is exactly as Dixon J explained the nature of "detriment" in estoppel cases.

With respect, I accept and adopt Dr Turner's analysis, which is in line with Dixon J's analysis in Grundt's case (1938) 59 CLR 641. In particular, Dr Turner points out that by choosing to continue paying rent, albeit a less rent, in the particular circumstances and in electing to continue liable, as tenant in reliance on the lessor's assurance that a less rent would be accepted in satisfaction, the tenant had altered his position so that, judging the matter at the date when the lessor proposed to resile from the arrangement, it would have been inequitable for the court to condone such an action. That is precisely the position here. Although the tenant was bound in contract by the terms of the lease to continue to pay the rent and observe the covenants in any event, it cannot be denied that the tenant would have had other choices open to him if the landlord had refused to reduce the rent on request. The tenant might have chosen to abandon the shop altogether like many other tenants of other shops and to have taken his chances about being sued for breach of contract; or he might have looked around for another tenant to whom he could assign the balance of his lease and the landlord could not have unreasonably or capriciously refused the assignment. By acting upon the landlord's promise of reduced rental, he continued in possession and lost his chances to adopt these alternatives. In other words, the tenant ordered his affairs on the basis that the promise would not be resiled from. Looking at the matter as from the moment of demand of a large lump sum, it would in my view be unjust in the extreme to allow the landlord to resile from that promise and demand money which he had said would not be demanded. The tenant had no doubt spent the money on other things and did not have it readily available to meet the lump sum. For these reasons I agree with Judge Rogerson that the landlord is, in the circumstances, estopped from claiming the alleged arrears of rent, and I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

[9.25] COX J (dissenting) [referred to the requirement of detriment, reviewed the relevant evidence and continued]: [120] I have set out all the evidence that might be thought to have any bearing upon the defense of promissory estoppel. It seems to me impossible to wring any positive detriment to the respondent out of this evidence. It is not as though the matter came up unexpectedly, so that some allowance should be made for a possible difficulty on the part of a witness in finding the right words on the spur of the moment. The chief defense pleaded by the respondent was this matter of estoppel. So far as the respondent was concerned, that was what the case was about. In view of the attention given to the topic in cross-examination, it should perhaps be emphasized that it is not in any hardship in meeting the higher rent month by month in accordance with the lease, that any detriment to the respondent is to be sought. That is simply the background against which later events unfolded. What is relevant to the present question is the contrast between the respondent paying the additional rent each month in the normal way and (if the appellant has his way) the respondent having to find all the arrears in a single payment now. Would that belated, unexpected demand by the appellant give rise to a detriment to the respondent? Had the respondent so changed his position in the meantime that it would be inequitable to require him now to pay the arrears? As I have said, the burden of establishing his defense rested upon the respondent. The bare monetary obligation could not constitute a detriment in the relevant sense. Something additional to that was needed. However, what the respondent said in evidence hardly amounted to any more than the assertions that the new rent was too high and that he found it harder to pay a higher rent than a lower one. That is readily understandable, but it has little to do with the equitable defense. Evidence, direct or indirect, about the respondent's position at the time the appellant made its demand for the arrears, compared with his position when the oral agreement was made, is practically non-existent. The only way in which it could possibly be said to disclose a detriment to the respondent, in my opinion, is by so attenuating the word as to deprive it of any real meaning.

The way in which the learned trial Judge resolved the problem is set out in the passage from his judgment that is quoted in the reasons of the Chief Justice. In short, his Honour recognized that many people in the respondent's position would have been misled into spending the money, represented by the monthly saving of rent, on something else that they would not otherwise have bought, and so would have had difficulty in repaying the arrears when they were demanded. He then silently assumed that this was, in fact, the respondent's situation. But that, as it seems to me, cannot, in view of the evidence, be any more than conjecture on his Honour's part. It is no doubt possible that the respondent would suffer considerable hardship if he were required to pay the arrears of rent upon demand. It is also possible that he would suffer no hardship at all. He may, for all that appears in the evidence, have conducted his affairs after the rent reduction in exactly the same way as he would have conducted them [121] had no reduction ever been made. It seems wrong to me that the Court should find that the respondent has made out his defense simply by devising possible alternative courses of action, and speculating about possible detrimental consequences, and then gratuitously attributing them all to someone who declined – or, it may well be, was unable – to give evidence of them for himself. The doctrine of promissory estoppel is a salutary corrective to an otherwise undesirable rigidity in the law of contract, but I do not think that it should be applied as liberally as that.

The principles upon which an appellate court proceeds require us to act upon our own judgment in such a case as this. For the reasons I have given, I am of the opinion that the respondent did not prove that he would suffer any detriment were he required to pay the arrears of rent, or (to use the language of Bowen LJ) that the parties cannot be placed in the same position as they were in before. He therefore failed to make out this ground of defense. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal and vary the trial Judge's award.

Appeal dismissed.

[9.30] In Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406, the High Court of Australia recognised that promissory estoppel was part of Australian law. Promissory estoppel could prevent a representor exercising contractual rights (such as the right to terminate a contract) which a relying party had been led to believe would not be enforced. In Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387, the High Court was asked to take promissory estoppel one step further. The question was whether promissory estoppel could be used where there was no pre-existing legal relationship between the parties, but the representor had implicitly promised to enter into a contract with the relying party. This case illustrates the boundary between estoppel by representation (or common law estoppel) and equitable estoppel, since there was some question whether the relying party had been led to believe that the contract had been signed (raising the application of estoppel by representation) or would be signed (raising the application of promissory or equitable estoppel). The unity of principle between the two forms of equitable estoppel (promissory estoppel and proprietary estoppel) was also recognised in this case.

Waltons Stores (Interstate) v Maher

[9.35] Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Negotiations were held between the Mahers (the respondents) and Waltons Stores (the appellant) for the lease by Waltons of premises to be built by 15 January 1984 by Maher to plans which would suit Waltons' purposes. On 21 October 1983, Waltons' solicitors sent to Maher's solicitor (a Mr Elvy) a form of deed of agreement with a draft lease annexed, but reserved the right to make amendments. Various negotiations followed and Maher indicated that he was beginning to demolish an old building on the site. On 7 November, Maher's solicitor pointed out that the agreement had to be completed quickly if Maher was to complete the building by 15 January. He also said that Maher did not wish to begin demolition of a newly constructed brick portion of the old building until there was agreement. On the same day, Waltons' solicitors sent to Maher's solicitor new documents with a covering letter which stated: "You should note that we have not yet obtained our client's specific instructions to each amendment requested, but we believe that approval will be forthcoming. We shall let you know tomorrow if any amendments are not agreed to." No such indication was forthcoming.

On 11 November, Maher's solicitor returned "by way of exchange" the deed of agreement duly executed by Maher. Maher commenced demolition of the brick section of the old building which fact was known to Waltons by 10 December.

Waltons meanwhile, having changed their commercial plans, instructed their solicitors to "go slow". The solicitors therefore retained the deed of agreement executed by Maher and did not correspond further with Maher's solicitor. In early January 1984, Maher commenced building. On 19 January 1984, Waltons informed Maher that they did not intend to proceed with the lease. Maher sought a declaration that a binding agreement existed, specific performance and, alternatively, damages. At first instance, Kearney J awarded Maher damages on the basis that Waltons were estopped from denying the existence of a binding contract and this judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal. Waltons appealed to the High Court.]

MASON CJ AND WILSON J: [397] The estoppel set up by the respondents and found by the primary judge was a common law estoppel in the form of a representation by the appellant constituted by its silence in circumstances where it should have spoken. Likewise, the Court of Appeal based the estoppel on common law principles as explained by Dixon J in [398] Thompson v Palmer (1933) 49 CLR 507, 547 and Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641, 674-6 …

Our conclusion that the respondents assumed that exchange of contracts would take place as a matter of course, not that exchange had in fact taken place, undermines the factual foundation for the common law estoppel by representation found by Kearney J and the common law estoppel based on omission to correct a mistake favoured by the Court of Appeal. There is, as Mason and Deane JJ pointed out in Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406, 432, a long line of authority to support the proposition that, to make out a case of common law estoppel by representation, the representation must be as to an existing fact, a promise or representation as to future conduct being insufficient …

[399] If there is any basis at all for holding that common law estoppel arises where there is a mistaken assumption as to future events, that basis must lie in reversing Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185 and in accepting the powerful dissent of Lord St Leonards in that case. The repeated acceptance of Jorden v Money over the years by courts of the highest authority makes this a formidable exercise. We put it to one side as the respondents did not present any argument to us along these lines.

This brings us to the doctrine of promissory estoppel on which the respondents relied in this court to sustain the judgment in their favour. Promissory estoppel certainly extends to representations (or promises) as to future conduct: Legione at 432. So far the doctrine has been mainly confined to precluding departure from a representation by a person in a pre-existing contractual relationship that he will not enforce his contractual rights, whether they be pre-existing or rights to be acquired as a result of the representation … But Denning J in Central London Property Trust Ltd v High Trees House Ltd [1947] KB 130, 134-5, treated it as a wide-ranging doctrine operating outside the pre-existing contractual relationship. In principle there is certainly no reason why the doctrine should not apply so as to preclude departure by a person from a representation that he will not enforce a non-contractual right.

[400] There has been for many years a reluctance to allow promissory estoppel to become the vehicle for the positive enforcement of a representation by a party that he would do something in the future. Promissory estoppel, it has been said, is a defensive equity … and the traditional notion has been that estoppel could only be relied upon defensively as a shield and not as a sword … High Trees itself was an instance of the defensive use of promissory estoppel. But this does not mean that a plaintiff cannot rely on an estoppel. Even according to traditional orthodoxy, a plaintiff may rely on an estoppel if he has an independent cause of action, where in the words of Denning LJ in Combe v Combe [1951] 2 KB 215, 220, the estoppel "may be part of a cause of action, but not a cause of action in itself".

But the respondents ask us to drive promissory estoppel one step further by enforcing directly in the absence of a pre-existing relationship of any kind a non-contractual promise on which the representee has relied to his detriment. For the purposes of discussion, we shall assume that there was such a promise in the present case. The principal objection to the enforcement of such a promise is that it would outflank the principles of the law of contract. Holmes J expressed his objection to the operation of promissory estoppel in this situation when he said: "It would cut up the doctrine of consideration by the roots, if a promisee could make a gratuitous promise binding by subsequently acting in reliance on it": Commonwealth v Scituate Savings Bank (1884) 137 Mass 301, 302 …

[402] Some recent English decisions are relevant to this general [403] discussion. Amalgamated Property Co v Texas Bank [1982] QB 84 in the Court of Appeal and Pacol Ltd v Trade Lines Ltd [1982] 1 Lloyd's Rep 456, are instances of common law or conventional estoppel. However, the comment of Goff J in Texas Bank at first instance (at 107) is significant. His Honour observed:

> Such cases are very different from, for example, a mere promise by a party to make a gift or to increase his obligations under an existing contract; such promise will not generally give rise to an estoppel, even if acted on by the promisee, for the promisee may reasonably be expected to appreciate that, to render it binding, it must be incorporated in a binding contract or contractual variation, and that he cannot therefore safely rely upon it as a legally binding promise without first taking the necessary contractual steps.

The point is that, generally speaking, a plaintiff cannot enforce a voluntary promise because the promisee may reasonably be expected to appreciate that, to render it binding, it must form part of a binding contract.

Crabb v Arun District Council [1976] Ch 179 was an instance of promissory estoppel. It lends assistance to the view that promissory estoppel may in some circumstances extend to the enforcement of a right not previously in existence where the defendant has encouraged in the plaintiff the belief that it will be granted and has acquiesced in action taken by the plaintiff in that belief. There the defendants, knowing of the plaintiff's intention to sell his land in separate portions, encouraged the plaintiff to believe that he would be granted a right of access over their land and, by erecting gates and failing to disabuse him of his belief, encouraged the plaintiff to act to his detriment in selling part of the land without reservation of a right of way. This raised an equity in favour of the plaintiff which was satisfied by granting him a right of access and a right of way over the defendants' land. The Court of Appeal deduced from the circumstances an equity in the plaintiff to have these rights without having to pay for them. As Oliver J pointed out in Taylors Fashions Ltd v Liverpool Victoria Trustees Co Ltd [1982] QB 133 at 153, the Court of Appeal treated promissory estoppel and proprietary estoppel or estoppel by acquiescence as mere facets of the same general principle … In Taylors Fashions Oliver J also remarked (at 153) that what gave rise to the need for the court to intervene was the [404] defendants' unconscionable attempt to go back on the assumptions which were the foundation of their dealings. Indeed, Scarman LJ in Crabb saw the question in terms of whether an equity had arisen from the conduct and relationship of the parties (at 193-4), concluding that the court should determine what was "the minimum equity to do justice to the plaintiff": at 198.

[9.40] The decision in Crabb is consistent with the principle of proprietary estoppel applied in Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129. Under that principle a person whose conduct creates or lends force to an assumption by another that he will obtain an interest in the first person's land and on the basis of that expectation the other person alters his position or acts to his detriment, may bring into existence an equity in favour of that other person, the nature and extent of the equity depending on the circumstances. And it should be noted that in Crabb, as in Ramsden v Dyson, although equity acted by way of recognising a proprietary interest in the plaintiff, that proprietary interest came into existence as the only appropriate means by which the defendants could be effectively estopped from exercising their existing legal rights.

One may therefore discern in the cases a common thread which links them together, namely, the principle that equity will come to the relief of a plaintiff who has acted to his detriment on the basis of a basic assumption in relation to which the other party to the transaction has "played such a part in the adoption of the assumption that it would be unfair or unjust if he were left free to ignore it": Grundt at 675, per Dixon J; see also Thompson at 547. Equity comes to the relief of such a plaintiff on the footing that it would be unconscionable conduct on the part of the other party to ignore the assumption.

Before we turn to the very recent decision of the Privy Council in Attorney-General (Hong Kong) v Humphreys Estate [1987] 1 AC 114, which was not a case of proprietary estoppel, but one, like the present, arising in the course of negotiations antecedent to the making of a contract, we should say something of equity's attitude to the enforcement of voluntary promises. So far equity has set its face against the enforcement of such promises and future representations as such. The support for the exercise of a general equitable jurisdiction to make good expectations created or encouraged by a defendant given by Lord Cottenham LC in Hammersley v De Biel (1845) 12 Cl & Fin 45; 8 ER 1312, affirmed by the House of Lords in that [405] case, was undermined by the insistence in Jorden v Money on a representation of existing fact and destroyed by Maddison v Alderson (1883) 8 App Cas 467.

Because equitable estoppel has its basis in unconscionable conduct, rather than the making good of representations, the objection, grounded in Maddison v Alderson, that promissory estoppel outflanks the doctrine of part performance loses much of its sting. Equitable estoppel is not a doctrine associated with part performance whose principal purpose is to overcome non-compliance with the formal requirements for the making of contracts. Equitable estoppel, though it may lead to the plaintiff acquiring an estate or interest in land, depends on considerations of a different kind from those on which part performance depends. Holding the representor to his representation is merely one way of doing justice between the parties.

In Humphreys Estate the defendants representing the Hong Kong government negotiated with a group of companies (HKL), which included the respondent Humphreys Estate, for an exchange whereby the government would acquire 83 flats, being part of property belonging to HKL, and in exchange HKL would take from the government a Crown lease of property known as Queen's Gardens and be granted the right to develop that property and certain adjoining property held by HKL. The negotiations did not result in a contract, though the exchange of properties was agreed in principle but subject to contract. The government took possession of HKL's property and expended a substantial sum on it. HKL took possession of Queen's Gardens and demolished existing buildings and paid to the government $103 865 608, the agreed difference between the value of the two properties. HKL withdrew from the negotiations and sued to recover the amount paid and possession of the first property. The defendants claimed that HKL was estopped from withdrawing from the agreement in principle. The Privy Council rejected this claim on the ground that the government failed to show (a) that HKL created or encouraged a belief or expectation on the part of the government that HKL would not withdraw from the agreement in principle and (b) that the government relied on that belief or expectation: at 124. Their Lordships observed (at 127-8):

> It is possible but unlikely that in circumstances at present [406] unforeseeable a party to negotiations set out in a document expressed to be "subject to contract" would be able to satisfy the court that the parties had subsequently agreed to convert the document into a contract or that some form of estoppel had arisen to prevent both parties from refusing to proceed with the transactions envisaged by the document.

The foregoing review of the doctrine of promissory estoppel indicates that the doctrine extends to the enforcement of voluntary promises on the footing that a departure from the basic assumptions underlying the transaction between the parties must be unconscionable. As failure to fulfil a promise does not of itself amount to unconscionable conduct, mere reliance on an executory promise to do something, resulting in the promisee changing his position or suffering detriment, does not bring promissory estoppel into play. Something more would be required. Humphreys Estate suggests that this may be found, if at all, in the creation or encouragement by the party estopped in the other party of an assumption that a contract will come into existence or a promise will be performed and that the other party relied on that assumption to his detriment to the knowledge of the first party. Humphreys Estate referred in terms to an assumption that the plaintiff would not exercise an existing legal right or liberty, the right or liberty to withdraw from the negotiations, but as a matter of substance such an assumption is indistinguishable from an assumption that a binding contract would eventuate. On the other hand the United States experience, distilled in the Restatement (2d, §90), suggests that the principle is to be expressed in terms of a reasonable expectation on the part of the promisor that his promise will induce action or forbearance by the promisee, the promise inducing such action or forbearance in circumstances where injustice arising from unconscionable conduct can only be avoided by holding the promisor to his promise.

The application of these principles to the facts of the present case is not without difficulty. The parties were negotiating through their solicitors for an agreement for lease to be concluded by way of customary exchange. Humphreys Estate illustrates the difficulty of establishing an estoppel preventing parties from refusing to proceed with a transaction expressed to be "subject to contract". And there is the problem identified in Texas Bank (at 107) that a voluntary promise will not generally give rise to an estoppel because the promisee may reasonably be expected to appreciate that he cannot safely rely upon it. This problem is magnified in the present case where the parties were represented by their solicitors.

All this may be conceded. But the crucial question remains: was [407] the appellant entitled to stand by in silence when it must have known that the respondents were proceeding on the assumption that they had an agreement and that completion of the exchange was a formality? The mere exercise of its legal right not to exchange contracts could not be said to amount to unconscionable conduct on the part of the appellant. But there were two other factors present in the situation which require to be taken into consideration. The first was the element of urgency that pervaded the negotiation of the terms of the proposed lease …

The second factor of importance is that the respondents executed the counterpart deed and it was forwarded to the appellant's solicitor on 11 November. The assumption on which the respondents acted thereafter was that completion of the necessary exchange was a formality …

It seems to us, in the light of these considerations, that the appellant was under an obligation to communicate with the respondents within a reasonable time after receiving the executed counterpart deed and certainly when it learnt on 10 December that demolition was proceeding. It had to choose whether to complete the contract or to warn the respondents that it had not yet decided upon the course it would take. It was not entitled simply to retain the counterpart deed executed by the respondents and do nothing … The appellant's inaction, in all the circumstances, constituted clear encouragement or inducement to the respondents to continue to act on the basis of the assumption which they had made. It was unconscionable for it, knowing that the respondents were exposing themselves to detriment by acting on the basis of a false assumption, to adopt a course [408] of inaction which encouraged them in the course they had adopted. To express the point in the language of promissory estoppel the appellant is estopped in all the circumstances from retreating from its implied promise to complete the contract. Also, as the other judgments demonstrate, there is no substance in the argument based on s 54A of the Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW).

We therefore think that the Court of Appeal was correct in its conclusion. We would dismiss the appeal.

[9.45] BRENNAN J: [413] [T]here are three distinct bases advanced for holding Waltons estopped from denying the existence of the contract sued upon. The first basis is an expectation by Mr Maher that Waltons would duly complete the exchange; the second basis is an assumption by Mr Maher that Waltons had duly completed the exchange; the third basis is an assumption by Mr Maher that there was a binding contract in existence whether or not an exchange had been completed. An expectation that Waltons would exchange contracts – the first basis – is radically different from an assumption that contracts had been exchanged – the second basis. The relevant assumption of fact which Mr Maher must have made if he expected that Waltons would exchange contracts is that contracts had not been exchanged. The first basis rests on an expectation as to what Waltons would do; it could be supported, if at all, only upon the principles of equitable estoppel. The second and third bases rest on assumptions as to an existing state of affairs; they could be supported, if at all, upon the principles of estoppel in pais. Estoppel in pais and equitable estoppel address different problems, though there are elements common to both.

The nature of an estoppel in pais is well established in this country. A party who induces another to make an assumption that a state of affairs exists, knowing or intending the other to act on that assumption, is estopped from asserting the existence of a different state of affairs as the foundation of their respective rights and liabilities if the other has acted in reliance on the assumption and would suffer detriment if the assumption were not adhered to …

[414] The effect of an estoppel in pais is not to create a right in one party against the other; it is to establish the state of affairs by reference to which the legal relationship between them is ascertained. A classical statement of the doctrine as it is understood at least in this country is to be found in the judgment of Dixon J in Grundt v Great Boulder at 674-5 …

[415] The scope of estoppel in pais does not extend to compel adherence to representations of intention. The limitation which Jorden v Money placed on the doctrine of estoppel in pais was that it "does not apply to a case where the representation is not a representation of a fact, but a statement of something which the party intends or does not intend to do" …

It has been said that estoppel in pais is merely a rule of evidence and not a cause of action … but that proposition needs some explanation. If the estoppel relates to the existence of a contract between the parties, the legal relationship between the parties is ascertained by reference to the terms of the contract which has been assumed to exist. If, in the assumed state of affairs, the contract confers a cause of action on the party raising the estoppel, the cause of action may be enforced. The source of legal obligation in that event is the assumed contract; the estoppel is not a source of legal obligation except in the sense that the estoppel compels the party bound to adhere to the assumption that the contract exists … The assumed state of affairs to which a party may be bound to adhere may be more than a state of mere facts; it may include the legal complexion of a fact as well as the fact itself, that is, a matter of mixed fact and law …

[416] Equitable estoppel, on the other hand, does not operate by establishing an assumed state of affairs. Unlike an estoppel in pais, an equitable estoppel is a source of legal obligation. It is not enforceable against the party estopped because a cause of action or ground of defence would arise on an assumed state of affairs; it is the source of a legal obligation arising on an actual state of affairs. An equitable estoppel is binding in conscience on the party estopped, and it is to be satisfied by that party doing or abstaining from doing something in order to prevent detriment to the party raising the estoppel which that party would otherwise suffer by having acted or abstained from acting in reliance on the assumption or expectation which he has been induced to adopt. Perhaps equitable estoppel is more accurately described as an equity created by estoppel. The origin of equitable estoppel in the general principles of equity is illustrated by Chalmers v Pardoe [1963] 1 WLR 677 … Sir Terence Donovan, speaking for the Privy Council, said:

> There can be no doubt upon the authorities that where an owner of land has invited or expressly encouraged another to expend money upon part of his land upon the faith of an assurance or promise that that part of the land will be made over to the person so expending his money, a court of equity will prima facie require the owner by appropriate conveyance to fulfil his obligation; and when, for example, for reasons of title, no such conveyance can effectively be made, a court of equity may declare that the person who has expended the money is entitled [417] to an equitable charge or lien for the amount so expended … the court must look at the circumstances in each case to decide in what way the equity can be satisfied.

And in Crabb v Arun District Council at 187-8, Lord Denning MR said:

> The basis of this proprietary estoppel — as indeed of promissory estoppel — is the interposition of equity … The early cases did not speak of it as "estoppel". They spoke of it as "raising an equity". If I may expand what Lord Cairns LC said in Hughes v Metropolitan Railway Co: "it is the first principle upon which all courts of equity proceed", that it will prevent a person from insisting on his strict legal rights — whether arising under a contract, or on his title deeds, or by statute — when it would be inequitable for him to do so having regard to the dealings which have taken place between the parties.

Estoppel based on Mr Maher's expectation that Waltons would complete an exchange of contracts – the first basis of estoppel – is therefore governed by principles distinct from the principles governing estoppel based on an assumption that contracts had been exchanged or that a binding contract was in existence whether or not an exchange had been completed – the second and third bases. However, as will appear, equitable estoppel and an estoppel in pais which relates to an assumption of an existing contract may lead to the grant of similar remedies.

The first basis: Waltons would exchange

[9.50] [Brennan J reviewed the evidence and continued] [418] Is this sufficient to create any equity in the Mahers of the kind to which Danckwerts LJ referred in Inwards v Baker [1965] 2 QB 29, 38, that is: "an equity created by estoppel, or equitable estoppel, as it is sometimes called, by which the person who has made the expenditure is induced by the expectation of obtaining protection, and equity protects him so that an injustice may not be perpetrated"?

The protection which equity extends is analogous to the protection given [419] by estoppel in pais to which Dixon J referred in Grundt v Great Boulder, that is, protection against the detriment which would flow from a party's change of position if the assumption (or expectation) that led to it were deserted …

The element which both attracts the jurisdiction of a court of equity and shapes the remedy to be given is unconscionable conduct on the part of the person bound by the equity, and the remedy required to satisfy an equity varies according to the circumstances of the case … Sometimes it is necessary to decree that a party's expectation be specifically fulfilled by the party bound by the equity; sometimes it is necessary to grant an injunction to restrain the exercise of legal rights either absolutely or on condition; sometimes it is necessary to give an equitable lien on property for the expenditure which a party has made on it … However, in moulding its decree, the court, as a court of conscience, goes no further than is necessary to prevent unconscionable conduct. What, then, is unconscionable conduct? …

[420] Some indication of what constitutes unconscionable conduct can be gleaned from the instances in which an equity created by estoppel has been held to arise. If cases of equitable estoppel are in truth but particular instances of the operation of the general principles of equity, there is little purpose in dividing those cases into the categories of promissory and proprietary estoppel which are not necessarily exhaustive of the cases in which equity will intervene. Like Scarman LJ in Crabb v Arun District Council, I do not find it generally helpful to divide into classes the cases in which an equity created by estoppel has been held to exist. However, the familiar categories serve to identify the characteristics of the circumstances which have been held to give rise to an equity in the party raising the estoppel. In cases of promissory estoppel, the equity binds the holder of a legal right who induces another to expect that that right will not be exercised against him. In cases of proprietary estoppel, the equity binds the owner of property who induces another to expect that an interest in the property will be conferred on him. In cases where there has been an imperfect gift of property the equity binds the donor of the property when, after the making of the imperfect gift, he does something to induce the donee to act on the assumption that the imperfect gift is effective or on the expectation that it will be made effective.

In all cases where an equity created by estoppel is raised, the party raising the equity has acted or abstained from acting on an assumption or expectation as to the legal relationship between himself and the party who induced him to adopt the assumption or expectation. The assumption or expectation does not relate to mere facts, whether existing or future. (An assumption as to a legal relationship may be an assumption that there is no legal relationship, as in the cases where A builds on B's land assuming it to be his own.)

[421] Though the party raising the estoppel may be under no mistake as to the facts, he assumes that a particular legal relationship exists or expects that a particular legal relationship will exist between himself and the party who induced the assumption or expectation. The assumption or expectation may involve an error of law. Thus a promissory or a proprietary estoppel may arise when a party, not mistaking any facts, erroneously attributes a binding legal effect to a promise made without consideration. But, if the party raising the estoppel is induced by the other party's promise to adopt an assumption or expectation, the promise must be intended by the promisor and understood by the promisee to affect their legal relations. In Combe v Combe Denning LJ, the chief modern proponent of equitable estoppel, emphasised this element …

However, his Lordship's enunciation of the principle does not bring out the basic object of the doctrine which, like the object of estoppel in pais, is to avoid the detriment which the promisee would suffer if the promisor fails to fulfil the promise. It will be necessary to return to consider the basic object of the doctrine, but for the moment it is important to observe that the doctrine has no application to an assumption or expectation induced by a promise which is not intended by the promisor and understood by the promisee to affect their legal relations. The point is illustrated by the judgment of the Privy Council in Attorney-General (Hong Kong) v Humphreys Estate … [422] It follows that an assumption or expectation by one party which does not relate to what the other party is bound to do or not to do gives no foundation for an equitable estoppel, though the assumption or expectation relates to the prospect of the other party conducting himself in a particular way. The risk that the other party who, being free to conduct himself in whatever way he chooses, may choose to conduct himself in a way different from that assumed or [423] expected rests with the party who adopts the assumption or expectation.

Parties who are negotiating a contract may proceed in the expectation that the terms will be agreed and a contract made but, so long as both parties recognise that either party is at liberty to withdraw from the negotiations at any time before the contract is made, it cannot be unconscionable for one party to do so. Of course, the freedom to withdraw may be fettered or extinguished by agreement but, in the absence of agreement, either party ordinarily retains his freedom to withdraw. It is only if a party induces the other party to believe that he, the former party, is already bound and his freedom to withdraw has gone that it could be unconscionable for him subsequently to assert that he is legally free to withdraw.

It is essential to the existence of an equity created by estoppel that the party who induces the adoption of the assumption or expectation knows or intends that the party who adopts it will act or abstain from acting in reliance on the assumption or expectation. When the adoption of an assumption or expectation is induced by the making of a promise, the knowledge or intention that the assumption or expectation will be acted upon may be easily inferred. But if a party encourages another to adhere to an assumption or expectation already formed or acquiesces in the making of an assumption or the entertainment of an expectation when he ought to object to the assumption or expectation – steps which are tantamount to inducing the other to adopt the assumption or expectation – the inference of knowledge or intention that the assumption or expectation will be acted on may be more difficult to draw.

The unconscionable conduct which it is the object of equity to prevent is the failure of a party, who has induced the adoption of the assumption or expectation and who knew or intended that it would be relied on, to fulfil the assumption or expectation or otherwise to avoid the detriment which that failure would occasion. The object of the equity is not to compel the party bound to fulfil the assumption or expectation; it is to avoid the detriment which, if the assumption or expectation goes unfulfilled, will be suffered by the party who has been induced to act or to abstain from acting thereon.

If this object is kept steadily in mind, the concern that a general application of the principle of equitable estoppel would make non-contractual promises enforceable as contractual promises can be [424] allayed. A non-contractual promise can give rise to an equitable estoppel only when the promisor induces the promisee to assume or expect that the promise is intended to affect their legal relations and he knows or intends that the promisee will act or abstain from acting in reliance on the promise, and when the promisee does so act or abstain from acting and the promisee would suffer detriment by his action or inaction if the promisor were not to fulfil the promise. When these elements are present, equitable estoppel almost wears the appearance of contract, for the action or inaction of the promisee looks like consideration for the promise on which, as the promisor knew or intended, the promisee would act or abstain from acting …

[9.55] [425] But there are differences between a contract and an equity created by estoppel. A contractual obligation is created by the agreement of the parties; an equity created by estoppel may be imposed irrespective of any agreement by the party bound. A contractual obligation must be supported by consideration; an equity created by estoppel need not be supported by what is, strictly speaking, consideration. The measure of a contractual obligation depends on the terms of the contract and the circumstances to which it applies; the measure of an equity created by estoppel varies according to what is necessary to prevent detriment resulting from unconscionable conduct …

In Combe v Combe [1951] 2 KB 215, Denning LJ limited the application of promissory estoppel, as he expounded the doctrine, to ensure that it did not displace the doctrine of consideration. His Lordship's solution of the problem was to hold that the promise should not itself be a cause of action, but merely the foundation of a defensive equity …

The remedy offered by promissory estoppel has been limited to preventing the enforcement of existing legal rights … If the object of the principle were to make a promise binding in equity, the need to preserve the doctrine of consideration would require a limitation to be placed on the remedy. But there is a logical difficulty in limiting the principle so that it applies only to promises to suspend or extinguish existing rights. If a promise by A not to enforce an existing right against B is to confer an equitable right on B to compel fulfilment of the promise, why should B be denied the same protection in similar circumstances if the promise is intended to create in B a new legal right against A? There is no logical distinction to be drawn between a change in legal relationships [426] effected by a promise which extinguishes a right and a change in legal relationships effected by a promise which creates one. Why should an equity of the kind to which Combe v Combe refers be regarded as a shield but not a sword? The want of logic in the limitation on the remedy is well exposed in Jackson's essay "Estoppel as a Sword" in (1965) 81 Law Quarterly Review 223, 241-3.

Moreover, unless the cases of proprietary estoppel are attributed to a different equity from that which explains the cases of promissory estoppel, the enforcement of promises to create new proprietary rights cannot be reconciled with a limitation on the enforcement of other promises. If it be unconscionable for an owner of property in certain circumstances to fail to fulfil a non-contractual promise that he will convey an interest in the property to another, is there any reason in principle why it is not unconscionable in similar circumstances for a person to fail to fulfil a non-contractual promise that he will confer a non-proprietary legal right on another? It does not accord with principle to hold that equity, in seeking to avoid detriment occasioned by unconscionable conduct, can give relief in some cases but not in others.

If the object of the principle of equitable estoppel in its application to promises were regarded as their enforcement rather than the prevention of detriment flowing from reliance on promises, the courts would be constrained to limit the application of the principles of equitable estoppel in order to avoid the investing of a non-contractual promise with the legal effect of a contractual promise …

[427] But the … solution of the problem is reached by identifying the unconscionable conduct which gives rise to the equity as the leaving of another to suffer detriment occasioned by the conduct of the party against whom the equity is raised. Then the object of the principle can be seen to be the avoidance of that detriment and the satisfaction of the equity calls for the enforcement of a promise only as a means of avoiding the detriment and only to the extent necessary to achieve that object. So regarded, equitable estoppel does not elevate non-contractual promises to the level of contractual promises and the doctrine of consideration is not blown away by a side-wind. Equitable estoppel complements the tortious remedies of damages for negligent misstatement or fraud and enhances the remedies available to a party who acts or abstains from acting in reliance on what another induces him to believe.

As an element in unconscionable conduct is the inducing of the other party to adopt an assumption or expectation as to the parties' legal relations, the question arises whether silence is capable of inducing the adoption of the assumption or expectation. In Thompson v Palmer (1933) 49 CLR 507, 547 Dixon J, in reference to estoppel in pais, said:

> Whether a departure by a party from the assumption should be considered unjust and inadmissible depends on the part taken by him in occasioning its adoption by the other party. He may be required to abide by the assumption because it formed the conventional basis upon which the parties entered into contractual or other mutual relations, such as bailment; or because he has exercised against the other party rights which would exist only if the assumption were correct … or because knowing the mistake the other laboured under, he refrained from correcting him when it was his duty to do so; or because his imprudence, where care was required of him, was a proximate cause of the other party's adopting and acting upon the faith of the assumption; or because he directly made representations upon which the other party founded the assumption.

The same observations hold good, mutandis mutandis, with respect to the adoption of an assumption or expectation which founds an equitable estoppel. Clearly an assumption or expectation may be adopted not only as the result of a promise but also in certain circumstances as the result of encouragement to adhere to an assumption or expectation already formed or as the result of a party's failure to object to the assumption or expectation on which the other party is known to be conducting his affairs. In the present [428] case the question is whether Waltons, knowing that Mr Maher was labouring under the belief that Waltons was bound to the contract, was under a duty to correct that belief. The evidence was capable of supporting an inference that Waltons knew the belief under which Mr Maher was labouring when Waltons became aware that Mr Maher was doing the work specified in the deed. Waltons deliberately refrained from correcting what Waltons must have regarded as an erroneous belief. Was it Waltons' duty to do so? …

Silence will support an equitable estoppel only if it would be inequitable thereafter to assert a legal relationship different from the one which, to the knowledge of the silent party, the other party assumed or expected. What would make it inequitable to depart from such an assumption or expectation? Knowledge that the assumption or expectation could be fulfilled only by a transfer of the property of the person who stays silent, or by a diminution of his rights or an increase in his obligations. A person who knows or intends that the other should conduct his affairs on such an assumption or expectation has two options: to warn the other that he denies the correctness of the assumption or expectation when he knows that the other may suffer detriment by so conducting his affairs should the assumption or expectation go unfulfilled, or to act so as to avoid any detriment which the other may suffer in reliance on the assumption or expectation. It is unconscionable to refrain from making the denial and then to leave the other to bear whatever detriment is occasioned by non-fulfilment of the assumption or expectation.

[9.60] In my opinion, to establish an equitable estoppel, it is necessary for a plaintiff to prove that (1) the plaintiff assumed or expected that a particular legal relationship exists between the plaintiff and the defendant or that a particular legal relationship will exist between them and, in the latter case, that the defendant is not free to withdraw from the expected legal relationship; (2) the [429] defendant has induced the plaintiff to adopt that assumption or expectation; (3) the plaintiff acts or abstains from acting in reliance on the assumption or expectation; (4) the defendant knew or intended him to do so; (5) the plaintiff's action or inaction will occasion detriment if the assumption or expectation is not fulfilled; and (6) the defendant has failed to act to avoid that detriment whether by fulfilling the assumption or expectation or otherwise. For the purposes of the second element, a defendant who has not actively induced the plaintiff to adopt an assumption or expectation will nevertheless be held to have done so if the assumption or expectation can be fulfilled only by a transfer of the defendant's property, a diminution of his rights or an increase in his obligations and he, knowing that the plaintiff's reliance on the assumption or expectation may cause detriment to the plaintiff if it is not fulfilled, fails to deny to the plaintiff the correctness of the assumption or expectation on which the plaintiff is conducting his affairs.

This is such a case, as a brief recapitulation of the facts will show …

[430] Waltons' silence induced Mr Maher to continue either on the assumption that Waltons was already bound or in the expectation that Waltons would execute and deliver the original deed as a matter of obligation. It was unconscionable for Waltons subsequently to seek to withdraw after a substantial part of the work was complete, leaving the Mahers to bear the detriment which non-fulfilment of the expectation entailed. Having elected to allow Mr Maher to continue to build, it was too late for Waltons to reclaim the initial freedom to withdraw which Waltons had in the days immediately following 11 November. As the Mahers would suffer loss if Waltons failed to execute and deliver the original deed, an equity is raised against Waltons. That equity is to be satisfied by treating Waltons as though it had done what it induced Mr Maher to expect that it would do, namely, by treating Waltons as though it had executed and delivered the original deed. It would not be appropriate to order specific performance if only for the reason that the detriment can be avoided by compensation. The equity is fully satisfied by ordering damages in lieu of specific performance. The judgment of Kearney J is supported by the first basis of estoppel. The second and third bases may be disposed of briefly …

[9.65] DEANE J [took the view that Maher believed that there was a binding contract between the parties and found an estoppel by conduct based on a representation or induced assumption of existing fact. His Honour also considered whether the law should now recognise one unified doctrine of estoppel, a matter which he took up again in Commonwealth v Verwayen below.

Dealing with s 54A of the Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW) his Honour said]:

[445] It was submitted on behalf of Waltons that any agreement between the Mahers and Waltons resulting from the estoppel was unenforceable by reason of the provisions of s 54A of the Conveyancing Act 1919 (NSW) … I would … dispose of the … submission on the fundamental ground that s 54A has nothing to say to the circumstances of the present case …

[446] [T]he estoppel in the present case precludes denial of a binding agreement in circumstances where there was in fact none. In such a case, there is no scope for the operation of s 54A to render the assumed agreement unenforceable. That conclusion can arguably be justified on the broad basis that, as a matter of construction, s 54A applies only to real contracts and agreements and does not apply to an assumed agreement to require that it be evidenced by trappings appropriate to an actual one. It is, however, unnecessary to go quite so far for the purposes of the present case. It suffices for present purposes to say that, in the circumstances of the present case, the estoppel precluding the denial of a binding agreement extends to preclude the assertion of unenforceability of the assumed agreement in that the word "binding" is used in the sense of valid and enforceable. That being so, the estoppel outflanks the provisions of s 54A in that there is no room for their intrusion into the assumed facts to controvert the assumed existence of a binding agreement which Waltons is estopped from denying.

[GAUDRON J considered that Maher had acted on the assumption that an exchange of contracts had in fact taken place and that in the circumstances Waltons were estopped from denying that.]

Appeal dismissed.

The words in parentheses in point 5 were added by Priestley JA in Austotel Pty Limited v Franklin Selfserve Pty Limited (1989) 16 NSWLR 582, 615–6 as a refinement of that element.

[9.75] In Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, the High Court was asked to determine whether the Commonwealth should be prevented from raising certain defences (including a defence that the action was barred by the statute of limitations), which it had promised not to raise in litigation with Mr Verwayen. Mr Verwayen had continued the litigation for some time on the faith of the Commonwealth's assurances that it would not plead the defences. Gaudron and Toohey JJ held that the Commonwealth had irrevocably waived its right to take advantage of the relevant defences. The other members of the majority, Deane and Dawson JJ, held that an equitable estoppel arose against the Commonwealth which was to be satisfied by fulfilling Verwayen's assumption and preventing the Commonwealth from pleading the defences. Mason CJ, Brennan and McHugh JJ found that there was insufficient evidence of detriment to support an equitable estoppel. All of the judgments emphasised the flexibility of the remedy granted for equitable estoppel. Mason CJ, Brennan J and McHugh J placed particular weight on the principle that the remedy should go no further than is necessary to prevent detriment: (1990) 170 CLR 394, 413, 441–3, 501 and 504.

[9.155] The remedial effect of equitable estoppel was considered again by the High Court in Giumelli v Giumelli [1999] HCA 10; (1999) 196 CLR 101. This was a proprietary estoppel case involving a man who relied on a promise by his parents to give him certain land. The High Court considered the question of when a relying party would be given the very thing promised to them (in this case, the land in question), when he or she would given the monetary equivalent of that thing (the value of the land) and when he or she would be given some other remedy (such as compensation) designed to prevent or reverse detriment suffered as result of reliance on the promise. The High Court in Giumelli also made some useful observations on the relationship between estoppel and contract. These observations were made in response to the appellant's argument that the routine fulfilment of expectations through estoppel would undermine the doctrine of consideration.

THE EFFECT OF AN ESTOPPEL

Giumelli v Giumelli

[9.160] Giumelli v Giumelli [1999] HCA 10; (1999) 196 CLR 101 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Western Australia.

[FACTS: Robert Giumelli was a partner in a family orchard business operated on two properties owned by his parents, one of which was the Dwellingup property. With other members of his family, Robert worked to improve and develop the Dwellingup property. The partnership paid the cost of materials and contractors involved in this improvement. Robert worked for the partnership without receiving wages, but did receive pocket money and keep and was credited with earnings in the partnership accounts. During his adult life, Robert's parents made three promises to him in relation to the Dwellingup property. The first, in 1974, was that he would be given part of the Dwellingup property to compensate him for working without wages and for developing the Dwellingup property (the trial judge labelled this "the general promise"). Secondly, in 1980 when he planned to marry, Robert's parents told him that he could build a house on the Dwellingup property and "the house" would be his (the second promise). Robert bore the $47,000 cost of building the house, but received a $25,000 advance from the partnership to assist him. In 1981, after he married, Robert's parents promised that if he stayed on the property and rejected an offer of work from his father-in-law, he would be given a subdivided part of the Dwellingup property (the promised lot) which would include the house and the orchard (the third promise). Robert and his wife soon separated and later divorced. Robert continued to work and improve the Dwellingup property. He later sought to marry a woman of whom his parents disapproved. In 1985 his parents told him to choose between his new fiancé and the property. Robert married and left the property. Robert's brother Stephen then moved onto the property with his family and made substantial improvements to the promised lot. In 1986 Robert instituted proceedings to wind up the partnership. In 1990 he instituted the present proceedings, claiming that his parents held the Dwellingup property on trust to convey the promised lot to him. The trial judge found that Robert acted to his detriment on the second promise by expending money and labour in building the house. He found that Robert had not established that the action he took in reliance on the third promise was detrimental since his work improved the profitability of the partnership and he continued to earn income from the partnership. He ordered the parents to pay to Robert the greater of the sum expended on the house and the present value of the house and the land on which it stood. On appeal, the Full Court found that Robert had suffered detriment in reliance on the third promise.]

GLEESON CJ, McHUGH, GUMMOW AND CALLINAN JJ: [111] This is an appeal from the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Western Australia (Giumelli v Giumelli (1996) 17 WAR 159). The Full Court (Rowland, Franklyn and Ipp JJ) allowed an appeal by the present respondent from a judgment entered by a judge of that Court (Nicholson J) and dismissed a cross-appeal by the present appellants. The Full Court granted a declaration that the appellants hold the whole of the land comprised in Certificate of Title Vol 1400 Folio 628 (the Dwellingup property) upon trust and that, since May 1986, they have held the Dwellingup property upon trust to convey to the respondent what is presently an unsubdivided portion thereof, identified as "the promised lot". The appellants were ordered to do all things reasonably necessary to subdivide the Dwellingup property so as to create the promised lot, including the obtaining of State Planning Commission approval … [112]

[T]he order made by the Full Court is akin to orders for conveyance made by Lord Westbury LC in Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517, 523; 45 ER 1285, 1287 and, more recently, by McPherson J in Riches v Hogben [1985] 2 Qd R 292, 302.

In these cases, the equity which founded the relief obtained was found in an assumption as to the future acquisition of ownership of property which had been induced by representations upon which there had been detrimental reliance by the plaintiff. This is a well recognised variety of estoppel as understood in equity and may found relief which requires the taking of active steps by the defendant.

There is no occasion in this appeal to consider whether the various doctrines and remedies in the field of estoppel are to be brought under what Mason CJ called "a single overarching doctrine" (The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 411) or what Deane J identified as a "general doctrine of estoppel by conduct" (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 440). These theses were advanced by their Honours in The Commonwealth v Verwayen but not accepted by Dawson J (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 454) or McHugh J (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 499–501). Brennan J approached the subject on the footing that "equitable [113] estoppel yields a remedy in order to prevent unconscionable conduct on the part of the party who, having made a promise to another who acts on it to his detriment, seeks to resile from the promise" (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 428–9). Subsequently, in the joint judgment of Mason CJ, Brennan, Dawson, Toohey and Gaudron JJ in Australian Securities Commission v Marlborough Gold Mines Ltd (1993) 177 CLR 485, 506, reference was made to "an equitable estoppel of the kind upheld in Verwayen" …

The relief granted by the Full Court indicates that the equity of the respondent was more than a "defensive equity". This phrase was used by Deane J in The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 435 to denote laches, acquiescence or delay or a mere set-off. Further, by obliging the appellants to execute a conveyance, the equity established by the respondent did more than prevent the appellants from insisting upon their strict legal rights as present owners. On the other hand, the respondent did not establish an immediate right to positive equitable relief as understood in the same sense that a right to recover damages may be seen as consequent upon a breach of contract.

The present case fell within the category identified by the Privy Council in Plimmer v Mayor, &c, of Wellington (1884) 9 App Cas 699, 714 where "the Court must look at the circumstances in each case to decide in what way the equity can be satisfied". Before a constructive trust is imposed, the court should first decide whether, having regard to the issues in the litigation, there is an appropriate equitable remedy which falls short of the imposition of a trust (Bathurst City Council v PWC Properties Pty Ltd (1998) 195 CLR 566, 584–5; Napier v Hunter [1993] AC 713, 738, 744–5, 752). At the heart of this appeal is the question whether the relief granted by the Full Court was appropriate and whether sufficient weight was given by the Full Court to the various factors to be taken into account, including the impact upon relevant [114] third parties, in determining the nature and quantum of the equitable relief to be granted. (See the remarks of McLachlin J in Soulos v Korkontzilas [1997] 2 SCR 217, 236, 241, 243. See also Oakley, "The Precise Effect of the Imposition of a Constructive Trust", in Goldstein (ed), Equity and Contemporary Legal Developments (1992), 427, 451–6.)

In their notice of appeal, the appellants seek the dismissal of the respondent's claim. However, in their written and oral submissions, they accept that, at least in respect of what was identified as the second promise, the respondent had an equity to some relief. They submit that this fell short of an order for a subdivision and the conveyance of the promised lot.

[Their Honours stated the facts and reviewed the finding of the trial judge that Robert had suffered no detriment as a result of reliance on the third promise.]

[117] [With respect to detriment suffered in reliance on the third promise], we prefer the conclusions reached by Rowland J and Ipp J in the Full Court. Rowland J approached the matter on the [118] footing that, even if it be conceded that Robert had not suffered an appreciable loss of income by remaining in the partnership, the detriment suffered by him was the loss of the property which he worked to improve, not to obtain immediate income from that exercise but to gain the proprietary interest (Giumelli (1996) 17 WAR 159, 166). For that, Robert gave up the opportunity of a different career path. Ipp J pointed out that the reasoning of the primary judge placed no weight upon the circumstance that the partnership had no security of tenure and did not own the real estate (Giumelli (1996) 17 WAR 159, 174). His Honour continued (Giumelli (1996) 17 WAR 159, 174–5):

Accordingly, had [Mr and Mrs Giumelli] not undertaken to transfer the [p]romised [l]ot to [Robert], he would not have remained in the partnership and worked on improving the new orchard. The work done on the Dwellingup property by [Robert], at the expense of the partnership (including [Robert's] share), while benefiting [Mr and Mrs Giumelli] (by adding to the capital value of their property) only stood to benefit [Robert] if the partnership continued for a sufficiently long period, and if [Mr and Mrs Giumelli] honoured their promises to him. As the partnership terminated (through no fault on the part of [Robert]) before the new orchard became productive, [Robert] in fact received little, if any, benefit from developing the new orchard. It was because [Robert] had foreseen this very possibility, and was therefore reluctant to continue as a partner, that [Mr and Mrs Giumelli] had made their promises on which he relied.

Nicholson J determined the appropriate measure of relief by reference to his findings as to the second promise. His Honour's findings with respect to the third promise led to the dismissal of that aspect of the case from consideration … [119]

In his supplementary reasons, the primary judge said that the compensation to which Robert was entitled in respect of the second promise was that sum which would place him in the position he would be in if he owned the house on the land on which it was situated and was able now to realise that asset …

[120] The Full Court differed from the primary judge with respect to the third promise. This extended to the promised lot. That being so, the consideration by the Full Court of the appropriate relief was not confined to the house and the land to which it was a fixture. The appellants challenge the width of the specific relief granted by the Full Court. In particular, they emphasise that an order for the creation and conveyance of the promised lot went beyond any "reversal" of the detriment occasioned by the respondent in reliance upon the third promise. They submit that it was not open to the Full Court, in a case such as the present, to grant relief which went beyond the reversal of such detriment. In that regard, the appellants claim decisive support from the decision in Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394. However, in our view and consistently with the course of Australian authority since Verwayen, that decision is not authority for any such curtailment of the relief available in this case. (The cases, which include Blazely v Whiley (1995) 5 Tas R 254; Forbes v Australian Yachting Federation Inc (1996) 131 FLR 241; and Woodson (Sales) Pty Ltd v Woodson (Aust) Pty Ltd (1996) 7 BPR 97,590, 14,685, are said to show that "it is only in comparatively rare cases that relief can be granted which neatly reverses the claimant's reliance loss": Robertson, "Reliance and expectation in estoppel remedies" Legal Studies, vol 18 (1998) 360, 366–7; cf Mobil Oil Australia Ltd v Wellcome International Pty Ltd (1998) 81 FCR 475, 516–8.) Rather, there is much support in the judgments for a broader view of the present matter.

Detriment

[9.165] In their submissions, the appellants stress the need to limit the measure of equitable relief lest the requirement for consideration to support a contractual promise be outflanked and direct enforcement be given to promises which did not give rise to legal rights. However, in Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 454, Dawson J, after pointing out that at common law the role of estoppel was largely as a rule of evidence, stated that in equity its role has been vastly expanded to raise questions of substance. His Honour continued (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 454): "At the same time, the discretionary nature of the relief in equity [121] marks a further reason why the fear of the common law that promissory estoppel would undermine the doctrine of consideration is unwarranted."

The matter was taken further by McPherson J in Riches v Hogben [1985] 2 Qd R 292. (See also Halliwell, "Estoppel: unconscionability as a cause of action" Legal Studies, vol 14 (1994) 15, 17, 20–2; Smith, "How Proprietary Is Proprietary Estoppel?", in Rose (ed), Consensus Ad Idem (1996) 235, 239–43.) His Honour noted that the critical element is the conduct of the defendant after the representation in encouraging the plaintiff to act upon it (Riches [1985] 2 Qd R 292, 300) and continued (Riches [1985] 2 Qd R 292, 300–1):

> A consequence of applying the principle may be to complete an otherwise imperfect gift, as in Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517; 45 ER 1285, or to give effect to an agreement that, for want of certainty or consideration or of some other essential element, falls short of constituting an enforceable contract. Many of the reported cases are concerned with imperfect gifts; but there is of course a sense in which all agreements made or promises given without consideration are imperfect gifts of the benefits they purport to confer. What distinguishes the equitable principle from the enforcement of contractual obligations is, in the first place, that there is no legally binding promise. If there is such a promise, then the plaintiff must resort to the law of contract in order to enforce it, it being the function of equity to supplement the law not to replace it. The second distinguishing feature is that what attracts the principle is not the promise itself but the expectation which it creates. In that respect it represents the precise converse of what was said by Jessel MR in Ungley v Ungley (1877) 5 Ch D 887, 891 to be the basis for enforcing the contract in that case. [The Master of the Rolls there described acts of part performance of the plaintiff which prevented the setting up of the Statute of Frauds as a bar to the specific enforcement of a parol contract respecting an interest in land as indicative of "not a mere expectation, but an actual promise". See also, as to this distinction between promise and expectation as foundations of obligations, McBride, "The Classification of Obligations and Legal Education" in Birks (ed), The Classification of Obligations (1997) 71, 75–7.] Finally, the equitable principle has no application where the transaction remains wholly executory on the plaintiff's part. It is not the existence of an unperformed promise that invites the intervention of equity but the conduct of the plaintiff in acting upon the expectation to which it gives rise. That is why in Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517, 522–3; 45 ER 1285, 1287, where the son built on > land promised but not effectively conveyed to him by a memorandum signed by his father, Lord Westbury LC said that the only inquiry was "whether [122] the son's expenditure, on the faith of the memorandum, supplied a valuable consideration, and created a binding obligation".

In Olsson v Dyson (1969) 120 CLR 365, 378, Kitto J observed that the judgment of the Lord Chancellor in Dillwyn v Llewelyn seemed to contain two concurrent lines of reasoning. One was that, assuming there was no contract, nevertheless the conduct of the father was such as to bind him in conscience to make the legal situation correspond with the implication and the encouragement given the son to lay out the money. The other was that the father's conduct in encouraging the son to build the house on the footing that the land would be his, when acted upon by the son, created an equity which bound the father to make good the son's expectation.

It is necessary now to say something as to the circumstances which gave rise to the litigation in Verwayen, upon which decision the appellants place much reliance. By its defence to an action in tort brought against it by a former naval serviceman, the Commonwealth admitted liability and did not plead that the action was statute-barred or that it had owed no duty of care to the plaintiff because he was injured whilst acting as a serviceman in the course of combat exercises. The failure to plead such defences was in accordance with the then stated policy of the Commonwealth. The question of damages remained in issue. Following a change in that policy, the Commonwealth applied to a Master for leave to amend its defence so as to raise both defences. Leave was opposed (see Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 464, 478) but was granted. There does not appear to have been any appeal brought from the Master's decision. The reports of the litigation in this Court do not disclose any reasons given by the Master.

It would seem that in the exercise of the discretion upon opposition to the grant of such leave, a question arose as to whether, in the light of the past conduct by the Commonwealth of the litigation, leave should be refused. That presented to the Court the task not of adjudicating legal or equitable rights but of assessing the relevant factors. In a comparable situation in England, the House of Lords in Roebuck v Mungovin [1994] 2 AC 224, 236 spoke of the decision upon such an application as "a classic exercise of a discretion [by] simply taking the defendants' conduct into account".

However that may be, leave was granted to amend so as to raise both defences. By his reply the plaintiff pleaded that the Commonwealth had waived the two defences and that it was estopped from relying on either. After an interlocutory excursion to the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Victoria (Verwayen v The Commonwealth [1988] VR 203), arguments raised by the pleadings were dealt with by the trial judge before a jury was empanelled and as [123] matters of law on agreed facts. The trial judge entered judgment for the Commonwealth (Verwayen v The Commonwealth [No 2] [1989] VR 712, 713–7).

In this Court, the majority (Deane, Dawson, Toohey and Gaudron JJ, Mason CJ, Brennan and McHugh JJ dissenting) upheld the reply to the amended defence and decided that the Commonwealth was not free to dispute its liability to the plaintiff. Deane J and Dawson J decided the appeal on the footing of estoppel, the equity being raised by the Commonwealth's conduct being such as could only be accounted for by holding it to the assumed state of affairs before the amended defence. Toohey J and Gaudron J decided that the Commonwealth had waived its right to rely on either defence.

In this Court, the Commonwealth had submitted that the only reliance by the plaintiff had been his apparent decision to continue with the action where, had there been no representation, the action may have been discontinued (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 397–8). It further submitted that the only detriment flowing from the reliance was legal costs so that to uphold the reply would be to confer a remedy disproportionate to that detriment (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 398).

Deane J emphasised (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 443):

> Prima facie, the operation of an estoppel by conduct is to preclude departure from the assumed state of affairs. It is only where relief framed on the basis of that assumed state of affairs would be inequitably harsh, that some lesser form of relief should be awarded.

His Honour added that ultimately (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 445):

> the question whether departure from the assumption would be unconscionable must be resolved not by reference to some preconceived formula framed to serve as a universal yardstick but by reference to all the circumstances of the case, including the reasonableness of the conduct of the other party in acting upon the assumption and the nature and extent of the detriment which he would sustain by acting upon the assumption if departure from the assumed state of affairs were permitted.

The prima facie entitlement to which his Honour had referred would be qualified if that relief would "exceed what could be justified by the requirements of conscientious conduct and would be unjust to the [124] estopped party"; an appropriate qualification might be a requirement that the party relying upon the estoppel do equity (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 442. See, as to the imposition of terms in such a case, S & E Promotions Pty Ltd v Tobin Brothers Pty Ltd (1994) 122 ALR 637, 653, 656–7.).

Dawson J (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 454) referred to such authorities as the speech of Lord Kingsdown in Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129, 170 and the judgment of McPherson J in Riches v Hogben [1985] 2 Qd R 292, 302 as authority for the proposition that avoidance of the detriment involved may require that the party estopped make good the assumption, although his Honour noted that, depending upon the circumstances of the case, the relief required may be considerably less.

Although Gaudron J decided the case on other grounds, her Honour observed (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 487) that "the substantive doctrine of estoppel permits a court to do what is required to avoid detriment and does not, in every case, require the making good of the assumption". It is apparent from the tenor of these remarks that the detriment was seen as a prejudice which the plaintiff was still suffering at the relevant time, not merely prejudice which had already been sustained before the initiation of action.

Of those judges in the minority, Mason CJ took the position that (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 412):

> equitable estoppel will permit a court to do what is required in order to avoid detriment to the party who has relied on the assumption induced by the party estopped, but no more. In appropriate cases, that will require that the party estopped be held to the assumption created, even if that means the effective enforcement of a voluntary promise.

His Honour added that if a single overarching doctrine of estoppel be adopted, there would be "no longer any justification for insisting on the making good of assumptions in every case" (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 412).

Brennan J held that the case before the Court was not one where "the minimum equity needed to avoid the relevant detriment" was the holding of the Commonwealth to its promises by the entry of an interlocutory judgment for the plaintiff and an order for the assessment of his damages (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 429).

McHugh J concluded that what will be required to satisfy the equity which arises against the party estopped depends on the circumstances and that, whilst often the only way to prevent the promisee suffering detriment will be to enforce the promise, in the present case there was [125] no equitable estoppel established because there had been no representation by the Commonwealth as to present or past facts (Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 501).

The upshot is that the respondent is correct in his submissions that the reasoning in the judgments in Verwayen does not foreclose, as a matter of doctrine, the making in the present case of an order of the nature made by the Full Court.

The circumstances of the case

[9.170] However, the appellants correctly challenge the Full Court order on other grounds. Before making an order designed to bring about a conveyance of the promised lot to the respondent, the Full Court was obliged to consider all the circumstances of the case. These circumstances included the still pending partnership action, the improvements to the promised lot by family members other than Robert, both before and after his residency there, the breakdown in family relationships and the continued residence on the promised lot of Steven and his family. It will be recalled that Steven is a party to the partnership action but not to the present action.

When these matters are taken into account, it is apparent that the order made by the Full Court reflected what in Verwayen was described as the prima facie entitlement of Robert. However, qualification was necessary both to avoid injustice to others, particularly Steven and his family, and to avoid relief which went beyond what was required for conscientious conduct by Mr and Mrs Giumelli. The result points inexorably to relief expressed not in terms of acquisition of title to land but in a money sum. This would reflect, with respect to the third promise, the approach taken by Nicholson J when giving relief in respect of the second promise.

Conclusion

[9.175] Whilst the holding of the Full Court with respect to the third promise should be upheld, the Full Court erred in the measure of relief which it granted in respect of the promised lot. This is a case for the fixing of a money sum to represent the value of the equitable claim of the respondent to the promised lot. It will be necessary for the matter to be remitted to a judge of the Supreme Court to take that step. The amount so ascertained, with interest, should be charged upon the whole of the Dwellingup property. There will be no requirement of a subdivision of the promised lot as part of the remedy.

Fixing of the amount will require the making of valuations and allowances for a range of matters, some of which have been indicated above. It is neither possible nor appropriate now to fix any closed list of matters properly to be taken into account when the matter is [126] remitted (cf Stratulatos v Stratulatos [1988] 2 NZLR 424, 440–1). Further submissions and, if that court so chooses, additional evidence will be needed ….

On one view, as to which we express no decision, for what is now some twelve years, the respondent has been deprived of a share of profits earned by the partnership from the promised lot and of rent from the house. Further, in fixing the sum to represent an appropriate monetary order there may be a case for an allowance in his favour representing a share of anticipated profits from the partnership in relation to the promised lot for a specified period of future years, perhaps contingent upon the joint lives of Mr and Mrs Giumelli.

On the other hand, an allowance would have to be made for the improvement to the value of the land since 1986 brought about, in particular, by Steven's work. In addition to the planting of fruit trees and the construction of sheds and coolrooms, the appellants contend there has been significant expenditure on water supply and storage systems.

[9.180] KIRBY J: [127] In relation to what was called the "third promise" (Giumelli v Giumelli (1996) 17 WAR 159, 162, per Rowland J), I prefer the conclusions of Ipp J (Giumelli v Giumelli (1996) 17 WAR 159, 174–5 (Franklyn J concurring)) in the Full Court to those reached by the primary judge (Nicholson J. His reasons are set out by the other members of this Court.). My reasons are generally the same as those of the other members of this Court. I also agree with their conclusion that the principles established by this Court in The Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 did not preclude the making of an order of the kind made by the Full Court. I cannot add to their Honours' analysis of the applicable rule.

However, I also agree that, in framing its orders, and fashioning the equitable relief which should be granted to Mr Robert Giumelli, the Full Court was obliged to consider, amongst the circumstances of the case, the matters which stood in the way of a simple order to convey to him the land envisaged by the "promised lot". Unless allowance [128] were made, in that regard, for the outstanding partnership suit, for the improvements effected upon the land by other members of the Giumelli family (and for the actual residence on the land by Mr Steven Giumelli, his wife and their children), the order made would exceed the requirements of conscientious conduct on the part of the late Mr Giumelli senior and his wife.

Once that conclusion is reached it is inevitable that the equitable relief proper to all of the circumstances of the case was the provision to Mr Robert Giumelli of a money sum rather than the conveyance to him of the "promised lot".

Appeal allowed.

Sidhu v Van Dyke

[9.182] Sidhu v Van Dyke [2014] HCA 19; (2014) 251 CLR 505 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: A married couple (the Sidhus) owned a rural property (Burra Station) and lived in the main homestead. They let a cottage on the property (Oaks Cottage) to Mrs Sidhu's brother (Svenson) and his wife (Van Dyke, the respondent), where Svenson and Van Dyke lived with their newborn son. Mr Sidhu (the appellant) and Van Dyke later embarked on a sexual relationship, in the course of which the appellant promised the respondent that he would subdivide the property and transfer the cottage to her so that she would have somewhere to raise her son. When Van Dyke and Svenson separated, Sidhu told Van Dyke that she did not need a property settlement from Svenson because she had the cottage, and accordingly she did not seek a property settlement. Van Dyke spent time and effort maintaining and improving the cottage and the Sidhus' land, and refrained from seeking full-time employment for several years. Although approval for a subdivision was granted by the local council, the land was not subdivided and the cottage was later destroyed in a fire. The relationship between Van Dyke and Sidhu broke down and Mr and Mrs Sidhu refused to convey any land to the respondent. Van Dyke sought relief on the basis of equitable or proprietary estoppel. The primary judge held that it was not reasonable for Van Dyke to rely on the promises because they were conditional on the subdivision of the land, which required the consent of Mrs Sidhu. Moreover, her Honour held that Van Dyke had not established that she did in fact rely on the promises, other than in giving up the opportunity to seek a property settlement when she divorced. Maintaining and improving the property and giving up the opportunity for full-time employment were things Van Dyke may have done in any event. The Court of Appeal held that the primary judge should have applied a presumption of reliance which shifts the burden of proof to the representor to establish that the relying party did not rely on the promises in acting to her detriment. Since the evidence was insufficient to displace such a presumption the appeal was allowed and Sidhu was ordered to pay compensation to Van Dyke representing the value of the land that was promised.]

FRENCH CJ, KEIFEL, BELL AND KEANE JJ: [2] In Giumelli v Giumelli (1999) 196 CLR 101, 112 [6], it was said that the category of equitable estoppel that is usually traced back to the decisions in Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517; 45 ER 1285 and Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129 is now a "well recognised variety of estoppel as understood in equity", which affords relief "found in an assumption as to the future acquisition of ownership of property … induced by representations upon which there had been detrimental reliance by the plaintiff". The questions which arise in this appeal concern the sufficiency of proof of detrimental reliance required to give rise to a sound claim for relief based on that category of estoppel; and the appropriate measure of equitable compensation where an order for the transfer of the property in question to the plaintiff is not made for reasons of hardship to a third party.

Appellant's submissions

[45] The appellant made two broad submissions. The first was that the Court of Appeal reversed the onus of proof in relation to whether the respondent relied on the appellant's promises. The adoption and application of the "presumption of reliance" by the Court of Appeal was said to be contrary to the decision of this Court in Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215.

[46] The appellant's second broad submission was that the Court of Appeal erred in ordering the payment of equitable compensation measured by reference to the value of the appellant's promises. The appellant argued that his assurances were conditional upon the subdivision of the property and the consent of his wife, and contended that the Court of Appeal should have limited the relief granted to the respondent to what was necessary to compensate the respondent for the loss she suffered by relying on his promises.

Respondent's submissions

[47] The respondent submitted that the "presumption of reliance" applied by the Court of Appeal is consistent with the approach in Gould v Vaggelas, applied by the Victorian Court of Appeal in Flinn v Flinn [1999] 3 VR 712, 749 [117], in that both approaches have the same effect, namely, to give rise to an evidentiary onus to rebut an inference that arises where a promise is made and the natural tendency of the promise is to induce relevant conduct in the promisee.

[48] The respondent sought and was given leave to file a notice of contention whereby she sought to sustain the decision of the Court of Appeal on the footing that the appellant did not discharge the evidentiary onus which was upon him to rebut the inference of reliance which naturally arose from the respondent's conduct following the appellant's promises.

[49] The respondent submitted that the measure of relief granted by the Court of Appeal was correct in that a party setting up an equitable estoppel relating to an unperformed promise is prima facie entitled to enforcement of the promise unless there are special circumstances warranting different relief, and there were no such circumstances present here.

Reliance: onus of proof and inference

[50] The respondent sought to neutralise the appellant's first submission by arguing that, in this case, the Court of Appeal did no more than apply what Brooking JA described in Flinn v Flinn [1999] 3 VR 712, 749 [117] as a "commonsense and rebuttable presumption of fact that may arise from the natural tendency of a promise". This argument must be rejected. The observations by Brooking JA in Flinn v Flinn do not support the proposition accepted by Barrett JA that "[w]here inducement by the promise may be inferred from the claimant's conduct … the onus or burden of proof shifts to the defendant to establish that the claimant did not rely on the promise."

[51] In Newbon v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd (1935) 52 CLR 723 at 735, Rich, Dixon and Evatt JJ, speaking of a case where the party setting up the estoppel asserted a failure to take action in reliance upon an assumption allegedly induced by the conduct of the defendant, said:

> Where inaction is the natural consequence of the assumption, the prima facie inference may be drawn in favour of the causal connection … Any general presumptive connection between inaction and a belief in a state of facts must depend upon probabilities which arise from the common course of affairs, and accordingly must be governed by circumstances.

[52] In Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215, 250, Wilson J, with whom Gibbs and Dawson JJ agreed, speaking of an action in deceit, said:

> If a material representation is made which is calculated to induce the representee to enter into a contract and that person in fact enters into the contract there arises a fair inference of fact that he was induced to do so by the representation.

[53] It is apparent that in the passage cited from the plurality judgment in Newbon v City Mutual Life Assurance Society Ltd, their Honours were speaking of a "presumptive connection" as the equivalent of the "fair inference" of which Wilson J spoke.

[54] In Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 21, 250, Brennan J said:

> An inference of inducement may be drawn when a party enters into a contract after a material representation has been made to him, but it is no more than an inference of fact and it is settled law that such an inference may be rebutted by the facts of the case.

[55] Nothing in the judgments in Gould v Vaggelas suggests that the onus of proof in relation to detrimental reliance shifts to the defendant in any circumstances. (See also Redgrave v Hurd (1881) 20 Ch D 1, 21; Smith v Chadwick (1882) 20 Ch D 27, 44; affd (1884) 9 App Cas 187, 196; Arnison v Smith (1889) 41 Ch D 348, 369; Holmes v Jones (1907) 4 CLR 1692, 1707, 1711.)

[56] The line of English authority on which Barrett JA relied was founded on the statement by Lord Denning MR in Greasley v Cooke [1980] 1 WLR 1306, 1311-1312 that "[t]here [was] no need for [the promisee] to prove that she acted to her detriment or to her prejudice." In the present case, this statement was treated as involving a shift in the burden of proof on the issue of detrimental reliance.

[57] Lord Denning's view is contrary to observations of high authority in Smith v Chadwick (1884) 9 App Cas 187, 196 by Lord Blackburn, with whom the Earl of Selborne LC and Lord Watson agreed. Lord Blackburn spoke of the circumstances in which a fair inference of fact might be drawn in terms substantially repeated by Wilson J in the passage from Gould v Vaggelas set out above; but his Lordship expressly rejected the suggestion that a defendant might be obliged to disprove inducement once the making of a material representation had been proved.

[58] In point of principle, to speak of deploying a presumption of reliance in the context of equitable estoppel is to fail to recognise that it is the conduct of the representee induced by the representor which is the very foundation for equitable intervention. Reliance is a fact to be found; it is not to be imputed on the basis of evidence which falls short of proof of the fact. It is actual reliance by the promisee, and the state of affairs so created, which answers the concern that equitable estoppel not be allowed to outflank Jorden v Money (1854) 5 HLC 185, 210, 212-213; 10 ER 868, 880-881 by dispensing with the need for consideration if a promise is to be enforceable as a contract (Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 410, 416). It is not the breach of promise, but the promisor's responsibility for the detrimental reliance by the promisee, which makes it unconscionable for the promisor to resile from his or her promise. In Giumelli v Giumelli (1999) 196 CLR 101, 121 [35], Gleeson CJ, McHugh, Gummow and Callinan JJ approved the statement of McPherson J in Riches v Hogben [1985] 2 Qd R 292, 301 that:

> It is not the existence of an unperformed promise that invites the intervention of equity but the conduct of the plaintiff in acting upon the expectation to which it gives rise.

[59] It may be that Lord Denning's view will no longer be understood in England in the way it seems to have been understood by the Court of Appeal in this case …

[60] It may also be that the application of Lord Denning's view would not lead to an outcome in the present case different from that which follows from the application of the orthodox approach.

[61] Be that as it may, this aspect of the appellant's submission must be accepted. The approach suggested by Lord Denning should not be applied in Australia. The legal burden of proof borne by a plaintiff did not shift (Holmes v Jones (1907) 4 CLR 1692, 1706, 1710; Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215, 238-239). To speak of a shifting onus of proof is both wrong in principle and contrary to authority. The respondent at all times bore the legal burden of proving that she had been induced to rely upon the appellant's promises.

The respondent's notice of contention

[62] The respondent's notice of contention raised the argument that the appellant did not discharge the evidentiary onus to displace the inference of reliance which fairly arose from the respondent's conduct in response to the appellant's promises.

[63] It may be said immediately that to speak of an evidentiary onus upon the appellant is to create a risk of distraction from the required analysis. To speak of the evidentiary onus in its strict legal connotation is to speak of the burden of adducing or pointing to sufficient evidence to raise an issue for determination by the court (Purkess v Crittenden (1965) 114 CLR 164, 167-168; Cross on Evidence, 9th Aust ed (2013), 290 [7200]-[7205]). In the present case, there can be no doubt that the issue as to the respondent's reliance upon the appellant's promises was a live issue.

[64] The real question was as to the appropriate inference to be drawn from the whole of the evidence, including the answers elicited from the respondent in the course of cross examination. In that regard, as was said by Gummow, Hayne, Heydon and Kiefel JJ in Campbell v Backoffice Investments Pty Ltd [2009] HCA 25; (2009) 238 CLR 304, 351 [143], consideration of the application of the process of reasoning adumbrated by Wilson J in Gould v Vaggelas "must always attend closely to all of the evidence that is adduced that bears upon the question being examined."

[65] One should not be deflected by considerations of terminology from dealing with the substance of the argument raised by the respondent's notice of contention. It is sufficiently clear that the notion of evidentiary onus is not being used in its strict legal sense …

[66] It may, therefore, be accepted that the respondent's notice of contention sufficiently raises the question, to adapt the words of Wilson J in Gould v Vaggelas (1985) 157 CLR 215, 238-239, whether, when all the facts are in, the court is satisfied on the balance of probabilities that the promises in question contributed to the respondent's conduct in deciding to commit to her relationship with the appellant and adhering to that relationship (with all that that entailed) for eight and a half years. We now turn to a consideration of that question.

[67] Counsel for the appellant argued that the respondent's answers in the course of cross examination as to what she would have done had the appellant's promises not been made to her were so equivocal that the primary judge was right to conclude that the respondent had not discharged the onus of proving that she would not have "remained on the property and … done what she had done in any event." That argument should be rejected. To reject that argument, it is not necessary to rely upon any shifting of the onus of proof. A review of the whole of the evidence shows that the respondent had made out a compelling case of detrimental reliance.

[68] First, there is the evidence-in-chief of the respondent. It may be noted that the primary judge considered the respondent to be a truthful witness. In the respondent's evidence in chief she had said that:

> As a result of the [appellant's] repeated promise of the Oaks Property to me … I did not seek or engage in any full time paid work in the 8.5 years between January 1998 and July 2006 … [I]n the belief that I had a home in the Oaks Property, I chose instead to improve the Oaks and to repay the [appellant] in every way that I could using all the time and energy that I had for what I believed was his generous gift to me … I also lost the opportunity to obtain a property settlement from my divorce … [and] the opportunity to purchase a property for my son and me from money from my divorce settlement and salary from a full time job.

[69] That evidence was likely, as a matter of the probabilities of human behaviour, to be true. Indeed, it would be remarkable if the appellant's promises did not have some influence upon the respondent's decision to stay on and work at Burra Station. Upon the breakdown of the respondent's marriage, she was confronted with difficult decisions relating to the course of her life and the care and maintenance of her child. The appellant's promises were objectively likely to have had a significant effect upon the decision making of a person in the respondent's position. The appellant's assurances were integral to his proposal to the respondent to put their relationship on a firm long term footing. It is unlikely that she would have thrown in her lot with the appellant and exerted herself as she did over a period of eight and a half years if he had not made the promises which he in fact made. To the contrary, it is likely that she would have sought to maximise her own income for the benefit of herself and her infant son by seeking the most gainful form of employment.

[70] Secondly, the primary judge said:

> I have no doubt that [the respondent] placed faith in [the appellant] and in the promises he made her and that this played a part in her willingness to spend time and effort in the maintenance and improvement of The Oaks Cottage and assisted [sic] on the Burra Station property.

[71] Her Honour's finding that the appellant's promises "played a part in her willingness to spend time and effort in the maintenance and improvement of The Oaks Cottage and assisted on the Burra Station property" warranted the conclusion that the respondent had discharged the onus she bore on the basis that to establish estoppel by encouragement it is not necessary that the conduct of the party estopped should be the sole inducement operating on the mind of the party setting up the estoppel (Handley, Estoppel by Conduct and Election (2006) at 170 [11-011]). Counsel for the appellant disputed this proposition but did not cite any authority in support of their position. The respondent's position is amply supported by authority.

[78] In summary, on all the evidence, it should be found that the respondent was induced to remain at the property and to continue to work for the appellant and his wife by the assurances which he made. It is unconscionable for the appellant now to resile from his assurances.

The measure of relief

[79] In Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387, 418-419, Brennan J said:

> The protection which equity extends is analogous to the protection given by estoppel in pais to which Dixon J referred in Grundt v Great Boulder, ie, protection against the detriment which would flow from a party's change of position if the assumption (or expectation) that led to it were deserted. (footnote omitted)

[80] In Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641, 674-675, Dixon J, speaking of estoppel in pais, said:

> [I]t is often said simply that the party asserting the estoppel must have been induced to act to his detriment. Although substantially such a statement is correct and leads to no misunderstanding, it does not bring out clearly the basal purpose of the doctrine. That purpose is to avoid or prevent a detriment to the party asserting the estoppel by compelling the opposite party to adhere to the assumption upon which the former acted or abstained from acting. This means that the real detriment or harm from which the law seeks to give protection is that which would flow from the change of position if the assumption were deserted that led to it. So long as the assumption is adhered to, the party who altered his situation upon the faith of it cannot complain. His complaint is that when afterwards the other party makes a different state of affairs the basis of an assertion of right against him then, if it is allowed, his own original change of position will operate as a detriment. His action or inaction must be such that, if the assumption upon which he proceeded were shown to be wrong and an inconsistent state of affairs were accepted as the foundation of the rights and duties of himself and the opposite party, the consequence would be to make his original act or failure to act a source of prejudice.

[81] This statement of principle has been applied in the context of this category of equitable estoppel in Australia: Donis v Donis (2007) 19 VR 577, 593-594 [54]; Delaforce v Simpson Cook (2010) 78 NSWLR 483, 491 [42]. See also Cameron v Murdoch [1983] WAR 321, 351-352; Sullivan v Sullivan (2006) 13 BPR 24,755. In England, in Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210, 232-233, Robert Walker LJ also applied the statement by Dixon J to the resolution of the issue of detrimental reliance in a case of equitable estoppel.

[82] In Giumelli v Giumelli (1999) 196 CLR 101, 112 [6], 123-125 [40]-[48], Gleeson CJ, McHugh, Gummow and Callinan JJ held that, because the fundamental purpose of equitable estoppel is to protect the plaintiff from the detriment which would flow from the defendant's change of position if the defendant were to be permitted to resile from his or her promise, the relief granted may require the taking of active steps by the defendant including the performance of the promise and the performance of the expectation generated by the promise. That holding is supported by the leading decisions to which this category of equitable estoppel is usually traced: Dillwyn v Llewelyn (1862) 4 De GF & J 517; 45 ER 1285; Ramsden v Dyson (1866) LR 1 HL 129; Riches v Hogben [1985] 2 Qd R 292; Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394.

[83] The requirements of good conscience may mean that in some cases the value of the promise may not be the just measure of relief. In Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 441, Deane J noted that:

> There could be circumstances in which the potential damage to an allegedly estopped party was disproportionately greater than any detriment which would be sustained by the other party to an extent that good conscience could not reasonably be seen as precluding a departure from the assumed state of affairs if adequate compensation were made or offered by the allegedly estopped party for any detriment sustained by the other party.

[84] If the respondent had been induced to make a relatively small, readily quantifiable monetary outlay on the faith of the appellant's assurances, then it might not be unconscionable for the appellant to resile from his promises to the respondent on condition that he reimburse her for her outlay. But this case is one to which the observations of Nettle JA in Donis v Donis (2007) 19 VR 577, 588-589 [34] are apposite:

> [H]ere, the detriment suffered is of a kind and extent that involves life changing decisions with irreversible consequences of a profoundly personal nature … beyond the measure of money and such that the equity raised by the promisor's conduct can only be accounted for by substantial fulfilment of the assumption upon which the respondent's actions were based.

[85] The appellant's argument, rightly, sought no support from the discussion in cases decided before Giumelli v Giumelli of the need to mould the remedy to reflect the "minimum relief necessary to 'do justice' between the parties" (Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 416, see also 429; Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387, 404-405, 419). There may be cases where "[i]t would be wholly inequitable and unjust to insist upon a disproportionate making good of the relevant assumption" (Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 413); but in the circumstances of the present case, as in Giumelli v Giumelli, justice between the parties will not be done by a remedy the value of which falls short of holding the appellant to his promises. While it is true to say that "the court, as a court of conscience, goes no further than is necessary to prevent unconscionable conduct" (Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387, 419), where the unconscionable conduct consists of resiling from a promise or assurance which has induced conduct to the other party's detriment, the relief which is necessary in this sense is usually that which reflects the value of the promise.

[86] In the circumstances of the present case, no reason has been identified by the appellant to conclude that good conscience does not require that the appellant be held to his promises. In particular, it is no answer for the appellant to say that the performance of his promises was conditional on the completion of the subdivision and the consent of his wife to the transfer to the respondent. His assurances to the respondent were expressed categorically so as to leave no room for doubt that he would ensure that the subdivision would proceed and that the consent of the appellant's wife would be forthcoming.

[GAGELER J agreed with the joint reasons and added some brief observations.]

Appeal dismissed.

[9.183] In Pipikos v Tryans [2018] HCA 39, [60]–[61] (extracted at [7.95]) Kiefel CJ, Bell, Gageler and Keane JJ distinguished part performance from equitable estoppel on the basis that equitable estoppel is concerned to protect against detriment, and so the measure of relief is limited by what is required to protect against detriment.

[9.185] Three questions about the scope of equitable estoppel remain unresolved. The first is whether a unified a doctrine of "equitable estoppel" now operates in Australian law, or whether a distinction between promissory and proprietary estoppel is still maintained. On this question, see Saleh v Romanous [2010] NSWCA 274; (2010) 79 NSWLR 453, extracted at [12.170], and Robertson, "Three Models of Promissory Estoppel" (2013) 7 Journal of Equity 226. Assuming there is a unified doctrine of equitable estoppel, the second question is whether it can operate only in relation to an assumption that a particular legal relationship will exist between the parties, or whether it can apply to an assumption that the representor will act in a particular way in the future, outside a legal relationship. For example, if A promises to make a gift of $5,000 to B, and this is detrimentally relied upon by B, can an equitable estoppel arise? The third question is whether equitable estoppel operates independently as a source of rights. In other words, does it provide a cause of action in itself, or can it be used only in support of another cause of action? In Waltons Stores v Maher, for example, was the plaintiff suing on the basis of contract or on the basis of estoppel? W v G (1996) 20 Fam LR 49 provides an example of the application of equitable estoppel in its widest possible formulation, which is not limited to an existing or expected legal relationship between the parties, and which can operate independently to provide a cause of action. The formulation of equitable estoppel adopted in W v G can be contrasted with that adopted by Brennan J in Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387, 428–9 [9.60], and with the doctrine of promissory estoppel described in Saleh v Romanous [2010] NSWCA 274; (2010) 79 NSWLR 453 (extracted at [12.170]).

EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL AS A CAUSE OF ACTION

W v G

[9.190] W v G (1996) 20 Fam LR 49 (Supreme Court of New South Wales – Action).

[FACTS: The plaintiff and the defendant lived together in a lesbian relationship for several years. During the course of the relationship, the plaintiff conceived and gave birth to two children through a process of artificial insemination, in which the defendant assisted. The semen was provided by an acquaintance on the basis that he would have no involvement with or responsibility for the children. The plaintiff and the defendant later separated. The plaintiff instituted the present proceedings seeking, inter alia, child support.]

HODGSON J: [56] The plaintiff's claim for child support was put on the following basis. By virtue of her [the defendant's] statements and her conduct by way of support for the plaintiff and her participation in the actions leading to the impregnation of the plaintiff and by her silence as to any contrary view, the defendant created or encouraged in the plaintiff a belief or assumption, or otherwise could be said to have promised to [57] the plaintiff, that she, the defendant, would accept the role of parent to each of the children, and would in so doing accept responsibility for the material and general welfare of both children, and would support the plaintiff in providing for the needs of both children and of the plaintiff as their mother. In reliance on that promise or assumption, the plaintiff acted to her detriment by going about the actions which led to her conceiving each child and carrying each child to term. The defendant knew or intended that the plaintiff would act in reliance on the assumption; and the plaintiff's action in so relying will occasion detriment if the assumption or expectation is not fulfilled, in that the plaintiff will be left to bear the costs of providing for the material welfare of both children until they reach adulthood, and otherwise the plaintiff will suffer detriment in the form of income and opportunities foregone by virtue of her pregnancies, and also by virtue of the obligation she bears towards both children in terms of parenting and the provision of care. The defendant had failed to act to avoid that detriment, her action was unconscionable, and it was appropriate for the Court to give effect to the resulting estoppel by ordering payment of an appropriate lump sum by the defendant to the plaintiff in respect of child support … [65]

(b) Public policy and clean hands

[9.195] Mr Blackburn-Hart submitted that the plaintiff had participated in an agreement which attempted to exclude the known biological father from supporting and assisting to rear his own children; see Nancy S v Michael G 279 Cal Rptr 212, 219. The plaintiff in effect was seeking specific performance of an agreement which has this consequence. He submitted that the paramount consideration in the practice of artificial insemination is the protection of public health and the welfare of the child. He submitted that the formation of stable families is a socially desirable necessary aim; and to visit legal obligations upon non-parents to support a child in a homosexual or lesbian relationship is contrary to public policy in that: it will encourage the conception of children by artificial insemination in the absence of a father; will present as "normal" a relationship which is not recognised by the child maintenance legislation; it will encourage the evasion of provisions of the Human Tissue Act; and will encourage the bringing into the world of children without a father. See Re Marriage of AJN and JMN 144 WIS 2d 99, 414 NW 2d 68 (1987). Furthermore, he submitted, the plaintiff has unclean hands and cannot rely on the defendant's alleged unconscionable conduct to obtain financial support for the children, because of her own part in making the agreement and forming it.

I note that the defence in this case does not contain any pleading of a defence of public policy or unclean hands, and it is questionable whether such defences could be relied on without an amendment. In any event, I do not believe it is contrary to public policy for a court to find that a person who is living in a lesbian relationship with the mother of a child, conceived by artificial insemination, and who also participates in the act of conception and acts as a parent to the child or children thereby conceived, is liable to provide material support for that child. If it is thought desirable to discourage the use of artificial conception procedures in circumstances where there are not two people who undertake to be the parents of the child, then that would need to be addressed by the legislature.

(c) Elements of estoppel

[9.200] Mr Evans relied on the principles of equitable estoppel laid down by the High Court in Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387 as applied, for instance, in S and E Promotions Pty Limited v Tobin Bros (1994) 122 ALR 637. See also the statement of principle of Priestley, JA in Austotel Pty Limited v Franklin Self-Serve Pty Limited (1989) 16 NSWLR 582, 615–6, and Austral Standard Cables [66] Pty Limited v Walker Nominees (1992) 26 NSWLR 524, 540. I summarised how Mr Evans sought to apply these principles to the present case under the heading "Issues" above.

Mr Blackburn-Hart submitted that I should not accept that the plaintiff had relied on any assumption created by the defendant, and that, if there was any reliance, such reliance was unreasonable. He noted that neither the donor of the semen nor the plaintiff's acquaintance who introduced him were called as witnesses. He submitted that any reliance would have been unreasonable, because it was highly unlikely that the relationship would endure (in that the plaintiff was bisexual, there were constant fights and arguments, there were separations of a total of seven months during the relationship, the relationship was "just crazy all the time"). Furthermore, he submitted, in the context of this relationship having children was not a detriment: it was contrary to public policy to hold that a woman has acted to her detriment in allowing a normal pregnancy to continue: cf Cook v Cook (1986) DFC 95-039, 75,433, and the authorities cited by Kirby, P in CES v Superclinics, Court of Appeal, 22nd September 1995, unreported. Mr Blackburn-Hart also relied on obiter comments by Deane, J in Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394, 444–5, to the effect that estoppel may be used as a sword only where the claim is based on an independent cause of action arising under ordinary principles of law. Further, there had to be proportionality between the remedy and the detriment, and there could be no proportionality where no claim was made against the biological father.

In my opinion, there was in this case the creation or encouragement by the defendant in the plaintiff of an assumption that a promise by the defendant would be performed, namely a promise that the defendant would act with the plaintiff as parents of the two children, and would assist and contribute to the raising of these children, for so long as this was necessary. In my opinion, the plaintiff did rely on this assumption in deciding to have each of the children, and the defendant knew or intended that she would do so. I do not understand it to be an independent part of the plaintiff's cause of action that she establish that her reliance was reasonable, and I do not consider it necessary for me to make a positive finding that the plaintiff's conduct was reasonable. However, I do not consider that there was any such element of unreasonableness as to prejudice the finding that there was reliance, and that this was intended by the defendant.

On the question of detriment, I do not believe that it is necessary in this case to find that the plaintiff is worse off having had the children than she would have been if she had not had them, all things considered; thereby raising both difficult public policy issues as well as difficult issues of balancing benefits and detriments. In my opinion, it is sufficient that the plaintiff is now faced with the expensive and onerous task of bringing up two children on her own, as a result of her reliance on an assumption encouraged by the defendant; whereas if the defendant had acted in accordance with that assumption, the plaintiff would have had the defendant's assistance in this task. In my opinion, that is a sufficient detriment. In my opinion also, it is unconscionable for the defendant now to seek to make no contribution whatsoever to the upbringing of the children. Accordingly, in my opinion, the plaintiff is entitled to relief on the basis of equitable estoppel.

8. Quantification

[9.205] The plaintiff relied on a report by Professor Peter McDonald as to the cost of raising children from the end of May 1994 to each child's 18th birthday. Based [67] on what he calls the Expenditure Survey approach, Professor McDonald produced a table showing this cost, relative to various levels of parental gross income …

> [On the basis of that report, Hodgson J held that the defendant should provide the sum of $151,125, which represented half of the cost of raising the children. Hodgson J held that the indirect cost of the children to the plaintiff (lost wages) should not be included "both because it was primarily the plaintiff's wish to have children (so that fairness does not require that the defendant share indirect costs), and also because this would raise the almost impossible question of balancing the benefits and burdens to the plaintiff of having children." (at 67)]

9. Conclusion

[9.210] For the reasons I have given, I propose to order that the defendant provide just over $150 000.00 towards the costs of raising the children. I would not propose that this be made by way of outright payment to the plaintiff. The payment is not to the plaintiff for her benefit, but must strictly be used for the benefit of the children. Furthermore, it is necessary to protect the interests of the community, which has already paid substantial child support to the plaintiff and no doubt will continue to do so, by ensuring that this award is used appropriately and that continuing child support is provided at an appropriate level and on an appropriate basis. In my opinion, the most appropriate application of this money would be to buy annuities for each child, providing for monthly payments to the plaintiff for the benefit of the children, in equal amounts, to run out when each child attains

18 years. Until that happens, the money should be placed in an interest bearing account in the names of both solicitors, with interest being credited monthly, if that can be arranged, and immediately paid out to the plaintiff for the benefit of the children.

[9.215] Note

For another clear example of equitable estoppel being used as an independent cause of action, see Gray v National Crime Authority [2003] NSWSC 111. The plaintiffs in that case entered the witness protection program operated by the National Crime Authority (NCA) on the faith of assurances that the NCA would make good any financial disadvantage they suffered from doing so. The NCA later terminated the witness protection arrangements without compensating the plaintiffs for all of the financial losses they had suffered as a result of entering the program. Austin J said:

> [157] In my opinion Australian law provides a cause of action to a person in the position of the plaintiffs, enabling that person to obtain equitable relief when the ingredients of equitable estoppel summarised in Priestley JA's two judgments [see [9.70]] are satisfied. Those ingredients are, in summary:
> (a) some representation or promise or conduct by the defendant,
>
> (b) which creates or encourages in the plaintiff an assumption,
>
> (c) the assumption being that a contract will come into existence or a promise be performed or an interest granted to the plaintiff by the defendant,
>
> (d) reliance on that assumption by the plaintiff, and
> (e) circumstances where departure from the assumption by the defendant would be unconscionable.

Austin J awarded the plaintiffs equitable compensation to make good their financial losses. The amount of compensation awarded to the plaintiffs was reduced by the New South Wales Court of Appeal (Australian Crime Commission v Gray [2003] NSWCA 318), where Mason P noted (at [40]) that in this case the principles of equitable estoppel were "generously applied in favour of Mr and Mrs Gray and unchallenged as to their capacity to ground a monetary award, whatever the law of contract might possibly entail."

INTRODUCTION

[10.05] This chapter is concerned with restitution for unjust enrichment. It is necessary to begin by distinguishing between restitution (which describes the type of remedy we are concerned with) and unjust enrichment (which describes the source of the obligations we are concerned with). The law of restitution is concerned with the recovery of gains made at the expense of others. In the cases in this chapter, restitutionary remedies are granted as a response to unjust enrichment. In these cases, preventing unjust enrichment is the reason for liability.

The two restitutionary claims that most commonly arise in connection with contracts are the claim to recover money paid to another party (sometimes called an action for money had and received) and the claim to recover reasonable remuneration for services performed (sometimes called an action for a quantum meruit – the amount earned). These two actions, along with the claim to recover a reasonable price for goods delivered (quantum valebant – the amount they are worth), were previously known as "quasi-contractual" actions because they were based on an implied or fictitious contract. They developed at a time when a legal claim needed to be brought within one of the recognised writs or "forms of action", and no writ was available to make a restitutionary claim. The courts therefore adopted the fiction of an "implied contract" in order to allow a plaintiff seeking to recover money or the reasonable value of services or goods to issue a recognised writ. The forms of action were abolished in the 19th century, and more recently the courts have recognised that the basis of these claims is not an implied contract, but an obligation imposed by law in order to prevent unjust enrichment (see Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221, extracted at [10.20]). These claims are now known as restitutionary claims, or claims based on unjust enrichment, rather than "quasi-contractual" claims.

In Chapter 9, we saw that the principles of estoppel operate in a range of situations to supplement the law of contract by preventing harm arising from detrimental reliance by one party on inconsistent conduct of another. The law of estoppel prevents or compensates certain harm which is not compensable under ordinary contract principles. Similarly, the law of restitution operates in a range of situations to allow the recovery of certain unjust gains which are not recoverable under ordinary contractual principles. There are several contractual contexts in which benefits (in the form of money, services or goods) may be conferred by one party on another but are not recoverable or compensable under the law of contract:

1. Benefits may be conferred in anticipation of a contract that does not materialise (see, eg, Leading Edge Events Australia Pty Ltd v Te Kanawa [2007] NSWSC 228 and Yeoman's Row Management Ltd v Cobbe [2008] UKHL 55).
2. Benefits may be conferred under a contract that is unenforceable or void (see David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia Ltd (1991) 175 CLR 353, extracted at [10.30]). In particular, benefits may be conferred under a contract that is:
   (a) unenforceable because of a failure to comply with a statutory requirement of writing (see Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221, extracted at [10.20]);
   (b) void because one of the parties lacks contractual capacity (see Mitchell, Mitchell and Watterson, Goff and Jones' Law of Unjust Enrichment (9th ed, 2016), Ch 24);
   (c) void for uncertainty or incompleteness in the contract terms (see Brenner v First Artists' Management Pty Ltd [1993] 2 VR 221, extracted at [10.25]); or
   (d) unenforceable or void for illegality (see Kiriri Cotton Co Ltd v Dewani [1960] AC 192).
3. Benefits may be conferred under a contract that has been or is subsequently terminated for breach (see Mann v Paterson Constructions Pty Ltd [2019] HCA 32, extracted at [10.87]).
4. Benefits may be conferred under a contract that has been or is subsequently terminated by frustration (see Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32, extracted at [10.50] and Codelfa Constructions Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, extracted at [15.35]).
5. Benefits may be conferred for a contractual purpose that totally fails, even though the contract itself remains valid (see Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd [2001] HCA 68; (2001) 208 CLR 516, extracted at [10.55]).

In some cases, a restitutionary claim will be available as an alternative to an action for damages for breach of contract (see Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344, extracted at [27.180] and Mann v Paterson Constructions Pty Ltd [2019] HCA 32, extracted at [10.87]). More commonly, the law of restitution will provide a remedy where no remedy in contract or claim in debt is available.

Unjust factors

[10.10] Where benefits have been conferred by one party on another, the next question is: when are they recoverable under the law of restitution? In other words, when does the law regard an enrichment as unjust? The answer depends on whether the benefit consists of money, goods or services. We will focus in this chapter on money and services. Where one party has paid a sum of money to another, the amount paid may be recovered in the following circumstances:

1. Money can be recovered where it has been paid under a mistake of fact or law, in circumstances where the mistake can be regarded as the cause of the payment (see David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia Ltd, extracted at [10.30]).
2. Money can be recovered where it has been paid in return for a consideration that has totally failed (see Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd, extracted at [10.55], Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344, extracted at [27.180]; Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32, extracted at [10.50]).
3. Money can be recovered where it was paid under compulsion or duress (see TA Sundell & Sons Pty Ltd v Emm Yannoulatos (Overseas) Pty Ltd (1956) 56 SR (NSW) 323, extracted at [10.90]).

When one party has performed services for another, reasonable remuneration can be recovered where there is no enforceable contract for the performance of the services and the work was requested (Lumbers v W Cook Builders Pty Ltd (in liq) [2008] HCA 27; (2008) 232 CLR 635, extracted at [10.27]), and perhaps also where it the work was freely accepted (Brenner v First Artists Management Pty Ltd [1993] 2 VR 221, extracted at [10.25]). The status of the free acceptance principle applied in the Brenner case has been put in doubt by the judgment of Gummow, Hayne, Crennan and Kiefel JJ in the Lumbers case. It is now accepted that, at least in some circumstances, restitution is available with respect to services which have been provided for a consideration that has totally failed: Mann v Paterson Constructions Pty Ltd [2019] HCA 32, extracted at [10.87].

Defences

[10.15] Four defences to restitutionary claims are dealt with in the cases extracted in this book:

1. The court may refuse to grant relief if the claim arises out of an illegal transaction (see Equuscorp Pty Ltd v Haxton [2012] HCA 7; (2012) 246 CLR 498, extracted at [42.60]).
2. Where a plaintiff seeks to recover money paid under a mistake, the claim may be resisted on the basis that the plaintiff received good consideration for the payment (see David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia Ltd, extracted at [10.40] and Australian Financial Services and Leasing Pty Ltd v Hills Industries Ltd [2014] HCA 14; (2014) 253 CLR 560, extracted at [10.47]).
3. Where a plaintiff seeks to recover money paid under a mistake, the claim may be resisted on the basis that the defendant changed his or her position on the faith of receipt of the payment (see David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia Ltd, extracted at [10.40]). This defence was successfully relied upon in Ovidio Carrideo Nominees Pty Ltd v The Dog Depot Pty Ltd [2006] VSCA 6, where the plaintiff paid rent under a mistake of law but received good consideration for the payment in the form of exclusive possession and use of the demised premises.
4. Where a plaintiff seeks to recover money paid under a mistake, it is a defence that the payment was made in voluntary settlement of an honest claim (see David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia Ltd, extracted at [10.40]). The defence is limited to situations in which the payer has made a conscious decision to pay irrespective of whether he or she is liable to pay or not (see Hookway v Racing Victoria Ltd [2005] VSCA 310; (2005) 13 VR 444).

REQUEST OR FREE ACCEPTANCE

Pavey & Matthews v Paul

[10.20] Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the New South Wales Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: In the course of a series of conversations, the appellant agreed to do certain building work for the respondent on the basis that the respondent would pay the appellant "a reasonable remuneration for that work, calculated by reference to prevailing rates of payment in the building industry". Section 45 of the Builders Licensing Act 1971 (NSW) provided that such a contract was unenforceable by the builder. The appellant completed the work. The respondent paid approximately half of the amount claimed. The appellant successfully claimed the balance in an action for a quantum meruit ("the amount earned") on the basis of indebitatus assumpsit, a form of action founded on an implied promise to pay a "debt". Such a promise was traditionally "implied" by law as a means of providing a basis for suing where work had been performed and accepted. The Court of Appeal overturned the trial judge's decision on the basis that an action in indebitatus assumpsit was an action to enforce the contract and was therefore precluded by s 45.]

MASON and WILSON JJ: The important issue in this appeal is whether a builder may bring an action in indebitatus assumpsit for the value of work done and materials supplied under an oral building contract, notwithstanding the provisions of s 45 of the Builders Licensing Act 1971 (NSW) (the Act). That section provides:

> A contract (in this section referred to as a "building contract") under which the holder of a licence undertakes to carry out, by himself or by others, any building work or to vary any building work or the manner of carrying out any building work, specified in a building contract is not enforceable against the other party to the contract unless the contract is in writing signed by each of the parties or his agent in that behalf and sufficiently describes the building work the subject of the contract.

The appellant, which holds a builders' licence under the Act, sued the respondent in the Supreme Court of New South Wales for $26 945.50 being an amount claimed to be due and payable under a [225] quantum meruit. The appellant calculated this amount as the sum payable, after alleging that the amount of $62 945.50 "represents a reasonable sum for the work done and materials provided" and giving credit for a payment of $36 000. The respondent, after putting in issue some allegations of fact in the appellant's statement of claim and denying the reasonableness of the charges, pleaded that the contract was a building contract and as such was unenforceable by reason of s 45.

[Their Honours referred to the proceedings in the courts below, in which Clarke J found in favour of the builder, and the Court of Appeal allowed an appeal, and continued:]

[226] As a matter of ordinary legal usage the words "enforceable" and "unenforceable" may refer either to the judicial and curial remedies available for the enforcement of a contract or to all the remedies available for the enforcement of a contract, including such remedies as the contract itself may provide. Section 4 of the Statute of Frauds 1677 (UK) (Statute of Frauds) and its successor s 128 of the Instruments Act 1928 (Vic), which was considered in Turner v Bladin (1951) 82 CLR 463, provided for unenforceability of the first kind, whereas s 9 of the Money Lenders Act 1912 (WA), which was considered in Mayfair Trading Co Pty Ltd v Dreyer (1958) 101 CLR 428, esp at 448–9, provided for unenforceability of the second kind.

The language of s 4 of the Statute of Frauds and of its successors, which specifically provided that no action should be brought on a contract or agreement unless it complied with the prescribed requirements, naturally attracted an interpretation that excluded enforcement by judicial and curial remedies. The words "enforceable" and "unenforceable" did not appear in the relevant statutory provisions. Nevertheless, as a matter of history and tradition the effect of the provisions has always been said to make a non-conforming contract or agreement unenforceable in the sense already discussed. On the other hand, where a statutory provision provides that a security or a contract shall be unenforceable, it is natural, in the absence of some restraining context, to interpret the provision as giving rise to unenforceability in the wider sense mentioned above. So, in Mayfair Trading the court concluded that the injunction in s 9, which provided that if prescribed formalities were not observed no security should be "enforceable", rendered the mortgagee's power of sale unenforceable.

The provisions of s 45 of the Act are apt to provide for unenforceability in the wider sense; they are different from the traditional Statute of Frauds formula. They should therefore be read [227] as entailing unenforceability of the contract, not only by means of legal proceedings, but also by means of any other remedy.

To say this is not to exclude the possibility that, in the context of the Act, the statutory concept of unenforceability extends to indirect, as well as direct, enforcement of the contract. The question then is whether the appellant's action on a quantum meruit amounts to a direct or an indirect enforcement of the oral contract.

Deane J, whose reasons for judgment we have had the advantage of reading, has concluded that an action on a quantum meruit, such as that brought by the appellant, rests, not on implied contract, but on a claim to restitution or one based on unjust enrichment, arising from the respondent's acceptance of the benefits accruing to the respondent from the appellant's performance of the unenforceable oral contract. This conclusion does not accord with the acceptance by Williams, Fullagar and Kitto JJ in Turner v Bladin (at 474) of the views expressed by Lord Denning in his articles in (1925) 41 Law Quarterly Review 79, and (1939) 55 Law Quarterly Review 54, basing such a claim in implied contract. These views were a natural reflection of prevailing legal thinking as it had developed to that time. The members of this court were then unaware that his Lordship had, in his judgment in James v Thomas H Kent & Co Ltd [1951] 1 KB 551, as reported in the authorised reports, discarded his earlier views in favour of the restitution or unjust enrichment theory. Since then the shortcomings of the implied contract theory have been rigorously exposed (see Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution (2nd ed, (1978), pp 5–11)) and the virtues of an approach based on restitution and unjust enrichment, initially advocated by Lord Mansfield and later by Fuller and Perdue (see "The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages" (1936–37) 46 Yale Law Journal 52 at 373, esp at 387), widely appreciated: Goff and Jones, op cit, p 15 et seq; and see Deglman v Guaranty Trust [1954] 3 DLR 785 at 794–5. We are therefore now justified in recognising, as Deane J has done, that the true foundation of the right to recover on a quantum meruit does not depend on the existence of an implied contract.

[10.21] Once the true basis of the action on a quantum meruit is established, namely execution of work for which the unenforceable contract provided, and its acceptance by the defendant, it is difficult to regard the action as one by which the plaintiff seeks to enforce the oral contract. True it is that proof of the oral contract may be an indispensable element in the plaintiff's success but that is in order to show that (a) the benefits were not intended as a gift, and (b) that the [228] defendant has not rendered the promised exchange value: Fuller and Perdue, op cit, p 387, n 125. The purpose of proving the contract is not to enforce it but to make out another cause of action having a different foundation in law.

If the effect of bringing an action on a quantum meruit was simply to enforce the oral contract in some circumstances only, though not in all the circumstances in which an action on the contract would succeed, it might be persuasively contended that the action on a quantum meruit was an indirect means of enforcing the oral contract. So, if all the plaintiff had to prove was that he had fully executed the contract on his part and that he had not been paid the contract price, there would be some force in the suggestion that the proceeding amounted to an indirect enforcement of the contractual cause of action. However, when success in a quantum meruit depends, not only on the plaintiff proving that he did the work, but also on the defendant's acceptance of the work without paying the agreed remuneration it is evident that the court is enforcing against the defendant an obligation that differs in character from the contractual obligation had it been enforceable.

In the present case the New South Wales Court of Appeal attributed a broader operation to s 45 by invoking the usual meaning of the expression "to enforce", which is "to compel observance of": see R v Bates [1982] 2 NSWLR 894 at 895. The force of this approach to the problem is not to be underestimated because, as we have seen, the effect of the action on a quantum meruit is to enforce the plaintiff's claim in some circumstances in which an action on the contract would succeed, proof of the contract being an element in the quasi-contractual claim. However, it seems to us that in the context of a provision such as s 45 with its injunction that the contract shall not be "enforceable", it is more appropriate to look to the more precise legal meanings that have been assigned to the term in comparable situations where a contract or a security is expressed to be unenforceable.

This is not a case in which other provisions of the Act throw textual light on what is meant by the word. It is therefore a matter of determining whether any assistance is to be gained from an examination of the policy and purpose of the statute. On one view the purpose of s 45 is to protect the building owner against spurious claims by a builder by preventing the enforcement by him of non-conforming contracts. This in substance was the view taken by the Court of Appeal in this case and in Schwarstein v Watson. [229] That purpose includes the protection of the building owner against a claim by a builder on a written contract that fails to describe the building work sufficiently, even in a case where the builder has fully executed the contract on his part. But it would be going a very long way indeed to assert that the statutory protection extends to a case where the building owner requests and accepts the building work and declines to pay for it on the ground that the contract fails to comply with the statutory requirements. True it is that the informal contract, though not enforceable by the builder, is enforceable against him. But it is not to be supposed that it is enforceable against him on the footing that the building owner is under no liability to pay for building work upon which he insists and the performance of which he accepts. The consequences of the respondent's interpretation are so draconian that it is difficult to suppose that they were intended. An interpretation that serves the statutory purpose yet avoids a harsh and unjust operation is to be preferred.

And there is another view which may be taken of the statutory purpose which is more favourable to this interpretation. In Gino D'Alessandro Constructions Pty Ltd v Powis (unreported, Supreme Court of Queensland (Full Court), 26 September 1986), McPherson J pointed out that the function of s 75 of the Builders' Registration and Home-Owners' Protection Act 1979 (Qld), a provision substantially similar to s 45 of the Act, was "to ensure, so far as possible, that a degree of precision is introduced into house building contracts, so that it can be readily determined what is the work to be done and whether loss or damage has been suffered … so as to attract the benefit of the insurance afforded by s 69" of the Queensland Act. Although there are differences between the Queensland and New South Wales statutes, and their respective schemes of compulsory insurance for the benefit of home owners, s 45 may nevertheless be seen as performing a function similar to that undertaken by s 75 in the Queensland Act. On this view of the purpose and function of s 45, a view which in our opinion has much to commend it, we would not be justified in ascribing to the section the far-reaching consequences urged by the respondent.

Unlike the Court of Appeal we do not see any compelling analogy between s 45 of the Act and the money-lending legislation considered by this court in Mayfair Trading and s 22 of the Money-lenders and Infants Loans Act 1941 (NSW) considered by Walsh J in Deposit & Investment Co v Kaye (1962) 63 SR (NSW) 453. The relevant provisions in those cases explicitly rendered unenforceable contracts [230] executed by the money lender. The statutes were directed at making unenforceable an obligation to repay money already lent and a security already given in respect of such an obligation. It was not possible to interpret these provisions so that they left on foot any quasi-contractual causes of action on the part of the lender. Request and receipt by the borrower of the money lent were integral elements in a situation in which the contract and all securities were expressed to be unenforceable. An additional feature of the money-lending cases is that the legislation was designed to protect borrowers by imposing onerous obligations on money lenders to comply with the statutory requirements. The need to protect borrowers in this way was the outcome of oppressive conduct on the part of money lenders. Section 45, seen in its setting and in conjunction with the insurance scheme established by the Act, stands on a different footing.

In the result we would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Court of Appeal and restore the order of Clarke J.

[10.22] DEANE J [After referring to various English and Australian authorities, his Honour said]: [250] The basic propositions to be drawn from the above and other authorities were identified by Jordan CJ in Horton v Jones (No 1) (1934) 34 SR (NSW) 359 at 367-8 in a passage which was subsequently quoted with approval by Williams J in this court: see Phillips v Ellinson Bros Pty Ltd (1941) 65 CLR 221 at 246. I take the liberty of stating those propositions, with which I respectfully agree, in a different order and in varied words. Omitting all but one of the references cited by Jordan CJ, they are:

1. The "mere fact that the consideration is executed is not sufficient" to make the Statute of Frauds inapplicable.
2. "If, however, a person does act for the benefit of another in the performance of a contract [upon which an action cannot be brought by reason of the Statute of Frauds], and the other so accepts the benefits of those acts, or otherwise behaves in relation to them, that, in the absence of the … contract, the former could maintain an action … upon the common money counts, he may sue in indebtitatus to obtain reasonable remuneration for the executed consideration: … (1925) 41 Law Quarterly Review 79."
3. "The existence of the unenforceable contract prevents a new contract, in respect of which special assumpsit could be maintained, from being implied from the acts performed …; and the unenforceable contract may be referred to as evidence, but as evidence only, on the question of amount …"
4. The appropriate action to obtain such reasonable remuneration is "an action of debt" … "In such a case the action is in indebitatus only."

It is clear from the above propositions that the obligation to pay "reasonable remuneration for the executed consideration" was seen by Jordan CJ as arising independently of any genuine agreement or promise upon which a special count could be framed. The "existence of the unenforceable contract" prevented any such genuine agreement from being implied. The reference to the "unenforceable contract" being relevant "as evidence, but as evidence only, on the question of amount" emphasised the perception that the obligation to pay reasonable remuneration was quite different from liability to make the payments under the "unenforceable contract". Plainly enough, his Honour saw that obligation as a liability in debt arising by operation of law upon the circumstances: the "obligation is imposed by law, and does not depend on an inference of an implied [251] promise": Horton v Jones (No 2) (1939) 39 SR (NSW) 305 at 320 per Jordan CJ, Halse Rogers and Owen JJ …

[255] (T)he basis of the obligation to make payment for an executed consideration given and received under an unenforceable contract should now be accepted as lying in restitution or unjust enrichment. Indeed, so much was recognised by Prof Ames himself: see Ames, Lectures on Legal History (1913), pp 162–6 and Sinclair v Brougham [1914] AC 398 at 417 per Viscount Haldane LC In such a case, the underlying obligation of debt for the work done, goods supplied, or services rendered does not arise from a genuine agreement at all. It is an obligation or debt imposed by operation of law which "arises from the defendant having taken the benefit of the work done, goods supplied, or services rendered …" (Phillips v Ellinson Bros Pty Ltd at 235 per Starke J) and which can be enforced "as if it had a contractual origin" (italics added), In Re Rhodes (1890) 44 Ch D 94 at 107 per Lindley LJ and see, among many other relevant works and cases, Lord Wright, "Sinclair v Brougham" (1938) 6

Cambridge Law Journal 305 at pp 317ff; Jackson, The History of Quasi-Contract in English Law (1936); Pulbrook v Lawes at 290 per Blackburn J and 290–1 per Lush J; Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32 at 61–2; Deglman v Guaranty Trust [1954] 3 DLR 785 at 788, 794–5; the judgment of Lord Denning himself (then Denning LJ) in James v Thomas H Kent & Co Ltd [1951] 1 KB 551 at 556; and the judgment of the Privy Council, delivered by Lord Denning, in Kiriri Cotton Co Ltd v Dewani [1960] AC 192 at 204–5.

It is not necessary to pursue here the question whether, now that the common law is released from the controls of the old forms of action, there is a continuing need for or utility in the traditional approach that any claim which would in previous times have been asserted by a common indebitatus count must be seen as lying either in contract or quasi-contract: see, for example, the discussion of the subject by Lord Wright, op cit, and by Holdsworth, "Unjustifiable Enrichment" (1939) 55 Law Quarterly Review 37. It suffices to say that, even accepting that traditional approach, it is clear that the old common indebitatus count could be utilised to accommodate what should be seen as two distinct categories of claim: one to recover a debt arising under a genuine contract, whether express or implied; the other to recover a debt owing in circumstances where the law itself imposed or imputed an obligation or promise to make compensation for a benefit accepted. In the first [256] category of case, the action was brought upon the genuine agreement regardless of whether it took the form of a special or a common count. It follows from what has been said above that the cases in which a claimant has been held entitled to recover in respect of an executed consideration under an agreement upon which the Statute of Frauds precluded the bringing of an action should be seen as falling within the second and not the first category. In that second category of case, the tendency of common lawyers to speak in terms of implied contract rather than in terms of an obligation imposed by law (see, for example, Scott v Pattison [1923] 2 KB 723 at 727-8 per Salter J) should be recognised as but a reflection of the influence of discarded fictions, buried forms of action and the conventional conviction that, if a common law claim could not property be framed in tort, it must necessarily be dressed in the language of contract. That tendency should not be allowed to conceal the fact that, in that category of case, the action was not based upon a genuine agreement at all. Indeed, if there was a valid and enforceable agreement governing the claimant's right to compensation, there would be neither occasion nor legal justification for the law to superimpose or impute an obligation or promise to pay a reasonable remuneration. The quasi-contractual obligation to pay fair and just compensation for a benefit which has been accepted will only arise in a case where there is no applicable genuine agreement or where such an agreement is frustrated, avoided or unenforceable. In such a case, it is the very fact that there is no genuine agreement or that the genuine agreement is frustrated, avoided or unenforceable that provides the occasion for (and part of the circumstances giving rise to) the imposition by the law of the obligation to make restitution.

To identify the basis of such actions as restitution and not genuine agreement is not to assert a judicial discretion to do whatever idiosyncratic notions of what is fair and just might dictate. The circumstances in which the common law imposes an enforceable obligation to pay compensation for a benefit accepted under an unenforceable agreement have been explored in the reported cases and in learned writings and are unlikely to be greatly affected by the perception that the basis of such an obligation, when the common law imposes it, is preferably seen as lying in restitution rather than in the implication of a genuine agreement where in fact the unenforceable agreement left no room for one. That is not to deny the importance of the concept of unjust enrichment in the law of this country. It constitutes a unifying legal concept which explains [257] why the law recognises, in a variety of distinct categories of case, an obligation on the part of a defendant to make fair and just restitution for a benefit derived at the expense of a plaintiff and which assists in the determination, by the ordinary processes of legal reasoning, of the question whether the law should, in justice, recognise such an obligation in a new or developing category of case: see Muschinski v Dodds (1985) 60 ALJR 52 at 67; Goff & Jones, op cit, pp 11ff. In a category of case where the law recognises an obligation to pay a reasonable remuneration or compensation for a benefit actually or constructively accepted, the general concept of restitution or unjust enrichment is, as is pointed out subsequently in this judgment, also relevant, in a more direct sense, to the identification of the proper basis upon which the quantum of remuneration or compensation should be ascertained in that particular category of case.

The fact that the action which can be brought on a common indebitatus count consistently with the Statute of Frauds is founded on an obligation arising independently of the unenforceable contract does not mean that the existence or terms of that contract are necessarily irrelevant. In such an action, it will ordinarily be permissible for the plaintiff to refer to the unenforceable contract as evidence, but as evidence only, on the question whether what was done was done gratuitously. In many cases, such as where the claim is for money lent or paid, the obligation to make restitution will plainly involve the obligation to pay the precise amount advanced or paid. In those cases where a claim for a reasonable remuneration or price is involved, the unenforceable agreement may, as Jordan CJ pointed out in Horton v Jones (No 1) (see above), be referred to as evidence, but again as evidence only, on the question of the appropriate amount of compensation. If the unenforceable contract has not been rescinded by the plaintiff or otherwise terminated, the defendant will be free to rely on it as a defence to the claim for compensation in a case where he is ready and willing to perform his obligations under it: see Thomas v Brown (1876) 1 QBD 714. The defendant will also be entitled to rely on the unenforceable contract, if it has been executed but not rescinded, to limit the amount recoverable by the plaintiff to the contractual amount in a case where that amount is less than what would constitute fair and reasonable remuneration …

[10.23] [261] Finally, it was submitted on behalf of Mrs Paul that to allow recovery by the builder of what is fair and reasonable compensation for work done under a contract which is rendered unenforceable against her by s 45 of the Act would be contrary to the legislative intent to be discerned in the words of the section when read in the context of the Act. In support of that submission, reliance was placed on various decisions on the effect of provisions in money-lending legislation. I do not agree with this submission.

The decisions on the money-lending legislation do not seem to me to be really in point. In the legislation involved in those cases, it was possible to argue, both by reference to the different words used and the quite different history of money-lending legislation, that it was the plain legislative intent that the moneylender should be precluded from recovering any compensation for the loan which had been made and received by the borrower. The relevant provisions went well beyond a mere statement that the agreement was to be unenforceable by the lender and were plainly directed towards imposing unenforceability in the ordinary case at a stage after the consideration had been fully executed by the lender, that is to say, after the money had been lent without an adequate memorandum in writing of the terms of the loan. Thus the subsection of the Nigerian Moneylenders Ordinance (s 19(4)) which was before the [262] Privy Council in Kasumu v Baba-Egbe [1956] AC 539 expressly provided that a moneylender should not be entitled to enforce "any" claim "in respect of" any transaction in relation to which he had made default in complying with the requirement that he should enter certain particulars in a book. Section 9(1) of the Money Lenders Act 1912 (WA), which was before this Court in Mayfair Trading Co Pty Ltd v Dreyer (1958) 101 CLR 428, provided that no contract for the "repayment by a borrower of money lent to him … or for the payment by him of interest on money so lent, and no security given by the borrower … in respect of any such contract" should be enforceable in the absence of the prescribed note or memorandum. In Deposit & Investment Co Ltd v Kaye (1962) 63 SR (NSW) 453 at 460, Walsh J expressly drew attention to the fact that the form of the relevant provision did not simply say that "the contract of a loan is not to be enforceable" but provided that "the borrower's obligations and the security for the performance of them shall not be enforceable."

There is no apparent reason in justice why a builder who is precluded from enforcing an agreement should also be deprived of the ordinary common law right to bring proceedings on a common indebitatus count to recover fair and reasonable remuneration for work which he has actually done and which has been accepted by the building owner: compare Johnsons Tyne Foundry Pty Ltd v Maffra Corp (1948) 77 CLR 544 at 565. Nor, upon a consideration of the words of s 45 in their context in the Act, am I able to identify any legislative intent to deprive the builder of that ordinary common law right. The section does not make an agreement to which it applies illegal or void. Nor do its words disclose any legislative intent to penalise the builder beyond making the agreement itself unenforceable by him against the other party. It may be that the bringing of an action as on a common indebitatus count would conflict with the apparent legislative policy underlying s 45 if the claimant in such an action were entitled as of right to recover the amount which the building owner had agreed to pay under the unenforceable agreement. I am, however, unpersuaded that the bringing by a builder of an action on the common indebitatus count in which he can recover no more than what is fair and reasonable in the circumstances as compensation for the benefit of the work which he has actually done and which has been accepted by the building owner conflicts with any discernible legislative policy. Plainly enough, the survival of the ordinary common law right of the builder to recover, in an action [263] founded on restitution or unjust enrichment, reasonable remuneration for work done and accepted under a contract which is unenforceable by him does not frustrate the purpose of the section to provide protection for a building owner. The building owner remains entitled to enforce the contract. He cannot, however, be forced either to comply with its terms or to permit the builder to carry it to completion. All that he can be required to do is to pay reasonable compensation for work done of which he has received the benefit and for which in justice he is obliged to make such a payment by way of restitution. In relation to such work, he can rely on the contract, if it has not been rescinded, as to the amount of remuneration and the terms of payment. If the agreed remuneration exceeds what is reasonable in the circumstances, he can rely on the unenforceability of the contract with the result that he is liable to pay no more than what is fair and reasonable.

The tendency in some past cases to see the rationale of the right to recover remuneration for a benefit provided and accepted under an unenforceable contract as contract or promise rather than restitution has tended to distract attention from the importance of identifying the basis upon which the quantum of the amount recoverable should be ascertained. What the concept of monetary restitution involves is the payment of an amount which constitutes, in all the relevant circumstances, fair and just compensation for the benefit or "enrichment" actually or constructively accepted. Ordinarily, that will correspond to the fair value of the benefit provided (for example, remuneration calculated at a reasonable rate for work actually done or the fair market value of materials supplied). In some categories of case, however, it would be to affront rather than satisfy the requirements of good conscience and justice which inspire the concept or principle of restitution or unjust enrichment to determine what constitutes fair and just [264] compensation for a benefit accepted by reference only to what would represent a fair remuneration for the work involved or a fair market value of materials supplied. One such category of case is that in which unsolicited but subsequently accepted work is done in improving property in circumstances where remuneration for the unsolicited work calculated at what was a reasonable rate would far exceed the enhanced value of the property. More relevant for present purposes is the special category of case where restitution is sought by one party for work which he has executed under a contract which has become unenforceable by reason of his failure to comply with the requirements of a statutory provision which was enacted to protect the other party. In that category of case, it would be contrary to the general notions of restitution or unjust enrichment if what constituted fair and just compensation for the benefit accepted by the other party were to be ascertained without regard to any identifiable real detriment sustained by that other party by reason of the failure of the first party to ensure that the requirements of the statutory provision were satisfied. Thus, if it is established on the hearing of the present case that Mrs Paul has sustained an identifiable real detriment by reason of the failure of the builder to ensure that there was a written memorandum of the oral contract which satisfied the requirements of s 45 of the Act, that would be an important factor in determining what constituted fair and just restitution in the circumstances of the case for the work done and materials supplied of which she has accepted the benefit. The mere fact that the reasonable remuneration for the building work done at Mrs Paul's request exceeded Mrs Paul's expectations would not, however, of itself constitute any such identifiable real detriment since it is not necessary for the purposes of s 45 of the Act that a written contract contain either an agreed price for the building work or an estimate of what the cost of it to the building owner will ultimately be.

[10.24] BRENNAN J (dissenting): [238] Where work is done by a plaintiff under a contract which expressly or impliedly provides for the plaintiff's remuneration, there is no ground in restitution or unjust enrichment for imposing an obligation to pay remuneration different from the agreed remuneration. If it were possible to impose a quasi-contractual obligation to pay reasonable remuneration when there is a subsisting unwritten contract which falls within the Statute of Frauds, the imposed obligation would be either inconsistent with the contract or it would duplicate the contractual obligation. An inability to sue on a contract provides no ground for imposing a quasi-contractual obligation inconsistent with the contractual obligation to pay remuneration, and the effect of the Statute on the contractual obligation cannot be circumvented by substituting a corresponding quasi-contractual obligation. A subsisting contract is the source and charter of the rights and obligations of the parties, and the law cannot impose other rights and obligations either to vary the contractual provisions or to negative the effect which the Statute of Frauds has upon them …

[241] There is a difference in language and in purpose between s 4 of the Statute of Frauds and s 45 of the Builders Licensing Act. Section 4 of the Statute of Frauds prescribes that "no action shall be brought whereby to charge any [person] upon" an agreement not in writing being an agreement of a kind therein specified. Section 45 of the Builders Licensing Act provides that a "building contract" as therein prescribed which is not in writing "is not enforceable" by the holder of a licence "against the other party to the contract". A general denial of enforceability against one party is a more extensive sterilisation of a contract than a denial of a right to enforce it by an action on the contract brought against that party. To make a contract unenforceable against a party is to give him a wider immunity than is given by preventing an action against him on the contract. A contract which is unenforceable cannot give rise to any legal remedy, whether curial or extra-curial: Mayfair Trading Co Pty Ltd v Dreyer (1958) 101 CLR 428, pp 448–9 …

[242] Section 45 was passed to protect the building owner. I respectfully agree with the view of Samuels JA in Schwarstein v Watson (1985) 3 NSWLR 134, pp 140–1 (which his Honour adopted in the present case), that s 45 is designed "to ensure that a written record was made of the work to be done and the rate to be charged; it being notorious that disputes about both matters not infrequently arose requiring determination at tedious length". Or, as McHugh JA said in this case (1985) 3 NSWLR 114, at 132:

> Disputes between builders and home owners as to what work was agreed upon and what was to be its cost have plagued the building industry for many years. Section 45 represents a legislative attempt to overcome this problem by forcing licensed builders to obtain written contracts for building work before they are enforceable by builders. We must give effect to the legislative policy embodied in s 45, however harsh it may seem in an individual case.

… [243] Apart from legal theory, the submission that a licence holder can sue for remuneration due under his contract with the building owner when s 45 declares that the contract is not enforceable against the building owner seems contrary to the plain words of the Statute. If s 45 were held not to bar such an action to recover a debt due under the contract the section would have had little, if any, practical effect on the litigation of building contracts where the holder of the licence had discharged his obligations to completion (or perhaps to substantial completion). If it were necessary to prove the discharge [244] of the licence holder's obligations under the unwritten contract in order to establish an enforceable debt recoverable by the plaintiff, litigation arising out of unwritten building contracts would focus on the work which had been agreed upon and the remuneration promised. The effect of s 45 would be to exacerbate the very problem, identified by Samuels and McHugh JJA, which s 45 was intended to overcome. In my opinion, s 45 precludes the arising of an enforceable debt.

… [244] The contractual promise to pay is clearly unenforceable and there is no room, while the unenforceable contract is subsisting, for a quasi-contractual claim.

DAWSON J: [267] Because it is possible to identify the cause of action in this case by reference to a common count based upon a promise implied in fact and not upon a constructive obligation or quasi-contract, it is unnecessary to examine the scope of unjust enrichment as a cause of action and the part played by indebitatus assumpsit in assisting or arresting its development in the common law: see Goff and Jones, Law of Restitution, 2nd ed (1978), pp 8-9.

[269] … I cannot, with respect, agree that an action upon a quantum meruit is an action upon an implied contract or, at all events, an implied contract which covers the same ground as an existing contract. Whether or not restitution, released from its abode in indebitatus assumpsit, would also support a claim in those circumstances is something which it was unnecessary to consider in order to decide that case as it is unnecessary in this case….

It is for these reasons also that I have reached the conclusion that, were the plaintiff to succeed in its action in this case, the result would be, not the enforcement, directly or indirectly, of the contract, but the enforcement of an obligation which, whilst it arose from the performance of the contract, was separate and distinct from it. In reaching this conclusion I feel no need to regard the action in this case as one in quasi-contract nor do I think it should be so regarded. Otherwise, I am in agreement with the view of Mason and Wilson JJ that s 45 of the Builders Licensing Act ought not to be construed as having any application and with the reasons which they give for that view.

Appeal allowed.

Brenner v First Artists' Management

[10.25] Brenner v First Artists' Management Pty Ltd [1993] 2 VR 221 (Supreme Court of Victoria).

[FACTS: The plaintiffs (Fenner and Brenner) were engaged to provide management services to Daryl Braithwaite, a former pop star who was seeking to revive his career. The arrangements as to the plaintiffs' responsibilities and their entitlement to commission were too uncertain to give rise to any enforceable contracts. For some months, the plaintiffs provided services, which contributed to the production of a recording and the making of arrangements for Braithwaite's comeback. The relationship deteriorated and the management arrangements were terminated by the defendant, but the album ("Edge") was subsequently released and Braithwaite's comeback was successful. Fenner and Brenner sought remuneration from Braithwaite on the basis of quantum meruit.]

BYRNE J: [257] The primary case before me is put by the plaintiffs on the basis that there was no contract between Fenner or Brenner on the one hand and Braithwaite on the other.

In such a case, the gist of the claim is that the defendant has actually or constructively accepted the benefit of the plaintiffs' services in circumstances where it would be unjust for that party to do so without making restitution to the plaintiffs: Pavey's Case, at 227, (per Mason and Wilson JJ), and at 256 to 257, (per Deane J). The circumstances in which the law considers it unjust to accept the benefit without payment are to be discerned from the principles to be extracted from the decided cases. For present purposes these indicate that an obligation will not arise where there is a subsisting enforceable contract between the parties for the performance of the services in question. The obligation will not arise where the services were provided "officiously" (Goff and Jones, Law of Restitution, 3rd ed, (1986), at 42ff) or where they were volunteered (Birks, An Introduction to the Law of Restitution, (1985), at 100 ff). This means that the plaintiffs in the present case must show that they performed the services in circumstances where the law requires that payment be made.

Counsel for the defendant fastened attention on the essential requirement of benefit. He submitted in respect of many of the services for which payment was sought that they did not confer a benefit upon the defendant. Where a manager attends a meeting with a view to obtaining work for an artist and no work results, he said, the plaintiffs do not demonstrate a benefit. I should state at the outset that I do not accept the two unstated premises in this submission. First, that the failure of the manager to prove that any particular service produced an engagement or other profit or, indeed, some other economic benefit for the artist, means that no benefit was conferred for the purposes of a claim in restitution. It may be that the benefit is something other than a direct consequence of any particular service, as for example the promotion of the artist or advice given to him. Second, that "benefit" for the purpose of the rule of restitution for services must be an economic benefit: the statements of principle in Pavey's Case are not so limited.

The defendant's submission, however, exposes a difficulty which arises in different ways in this area of law. Where a person pays money to another it is not difficult to see that a benefit has thereby accrued to the recipient. Services present greater difficulty. If the law of restitution is available to oblige the recipient of the benefit of services to make restitution, it must acknowledge that such benefit may take many forms. It seems to me unlikely that the law would introduce into this area the difficult and somewhat arbitrary distinction which has been drawn in the law of negligence between pure economic loss and physical loss. To take an extreme case, it may be of benefit to an artist simply that it be known that a particular person has accepted the role of his or her manager or that the manager by accepting the artist as a client is then precluded from acting for a competitor of the artist. I have referred to non-economic benefits which may be requested, conferred and accepted. I would need clear authority to deny a claimant the right to restitution for such services when all the other requirements of the cause of action are established. If a landowner requests an architect to [258] prepare a design for a building in circumstances where there is no enforceable contract and the architect undertakes the preparatory work but does not produce any design before the defendant abandons the project, it may be said that no benefit exists which is capable of acceptance. Planche v Colburn (1831) 8 Bing 14; 131 ER 305 is authority against such a conclusion. In my opinion, "benefit" in this context must be seen from the perspective of the recipient who is, after all, the person to be charged. It may be that for some idiosyncratic reason a defendant seeks the performance of work which another would see as without benefit or, indeed, as a positive disbenefit. Examples of this are given by Goff J in BP Exploration Co (Libya) Ltd v Hunt (No 2) [1979] 1 WLR 783, at 803. But where a person requests another to do something, it is not unreasonable for the law to conclude that the former sees some benefit in its performance, however wrong this view may be on an objective basis and for the law to act upon the perception of the recipient. His Lordship in BP Exploration Co (Libya) Ltd v Hunt (No 2) [1979] 1 WLR 783 also explored an ambiguity in the concept of "benefit" which may be of importance. Is the benefit to be seen in the performance of the service, or in the end product which the service may or may not produce? His Lordship was concerned in that case with the construction of the Law Reform (Frustrated Contracts) Act 1943, s 1(2), and not with a claim in restitution, but he acknowledged that the principle underlying that Act was the principle of unjust enrichment. In that case, his Lordship concluded, as a matter of construction of the statute, that "benefits" referred to the end product of the services, not the services themselves. It does not follow that "benefit" in the law of restitution must be given the same meaning. Indeed, the difficulties exposed by his Lordship from this conclusion, at 802 to 803, and the emphasis in Pavey's Case on the services themselves, suggest to me that the principle of restitution requires me to look there for the necessary benefit. The BP Case concerned a claim under a frustrated contract for remuneration for prospecting services. These services, like those of a selling broker or an artist's manager, were such that they might bear no proportion to the end product. A mineral prospector might with very little effort discover a rich resource or it may be that the result of considerable effort is no benefit at all. Can it be said in the latter case that no benefit accrues to the person requesting the services? The cases of work done in anticipation of contract are of assistance in this area. In William Lacey (Hounslow) Ltd v Davis [1957] 2 All ER 712, the plaintiff was led to believe that it would receive the contract to rebuild certain war damaged premises. The plaintiff carried out estimating work before the defendant sold the premises and the project was abandoned. The plaintiff succeeded on the now discredited basis that a promise to pay was implied from the request to do the work.

Barry J was, however, prepared to infer that the defendant had derived some actual benefit from the work inasmuch as it may have produced a greater price on the sale of the premises. Be this as it may, his Lordship's decision in the William Lacey Case, was in my view, predicated on a wider principle: the expectation of the parties that the work would be paid for. See Sabemo Pty Ltd v North Sydney Municipal Council [1977] 2 NSWLR 880, at 902. Compare J Beatson, "Unjust Enrichment in the High Court of Australia" (1988) 104 LQR 13, at 16. I conclude that in a case where the services were requested and accepted, the law will not stop to enquire whether they were, on any other basis, of benefit to the party requesting and accepting them. See Goff and Jones, at 18. Indeed, where the services have been requested by the party to be charged, the main area of interest is likely to be whether the circumstances of the request are such as to give rise to a right of payment. This will involve proof that the services were not provided as a gift: Pavey's Case, at 227 to 228. Furthermore, it will be necessary for the plaintiff to establish, where a certain event has not occurred, that the services were not provided on the basis that they were not to be paid for unless that event came to pass. In this category will fall cases where a tenderer carries out estimating or other work in response to an invitation to tender for a contract. It is understood in such cases that, in general, the tenderer takes the risk that the tender will be unsuccessful and that, as a consequence, the work will be unrewarded. It may be, however, that, even in such a case, an obligation to pay the tenderer will arise where the contract is not entered into by reason of a change of heart on the part of the proprietor: Sabemo's Case; or where the work done falls outside that normally expected of tenderers: William Lacey's Case; or where the work performed is of particular benefit to the proprietor: British Steel Corp v Cleveland Bridge and Engineering Co Ltd [1984] 1 All ER 504.

[259] It was submitted on behalf of the defendant that the test was whether each of the parties thought at the relevant time that the work would be recompensed. I think that the court is not concerned with the actual state [260] of mind of the parties or of either of them: Sabemo's Case, at 900. Moreover, the enquiry must in my view be principally directed to the position of the party to be charged, for the thread running through this area of law is the injustice of the enrichment of that party. In my opinion the appropriate enquiry is whether the recipient of the services, as a reasonable person, should have realised that a person in the position of the provider of the services would expect to be paid for them and did not take a reasonable opportunity to reject those services: Jones, Restitution in Public and Private Law, (1991), at 108. Where the services are provided under a contract which turns out to be void or otherwise ineffective or pursuant to a request made in a normal commercial relationship with a person whose business it is to provide those services for reward, this requirement will be satisfied.

Furthermore, I find that the mere fact that Braithwaite had a manager was of benefit to him and that it was of benefit to him that that manager was Fenner and later Nathan Brenner as well. Moreover, he was thereby relieved of the worry of finding another manager. I find too, as will appear, that Fenner and Brenner provided Daryl Braithwaite and Taylor with support and advice which contributed to the production of the album "Edge" and to the ultimate success of the Braithwaite project.

In the present case where the management services provided by the plaintiffs as professional artists' managers were so provided pursuant to a request accompanied by a discussion as to the mode of payment, the imposition by the law of an obligation to make restitution for the benefit thereby accepted is consonant with the decided authorities and with the notion of justice and fairness which underlies the law relating to restitution. …

Legal principles as to quantum

[262] I turn now to the aspect of the case which I have found most difficult, the assessment of the fair and reasonable remuneration for the work of Fenner and Brenner.

It is convenient at the outset to set out the legal principles which I apply in making the assessment. First, my task is not to assess damages for breach of contract. The claims of the plaintiffs presuppose that no contract existed. Accordingly, I am not concerned to assess the sum which would compensate Fenner and Brenner for the benefits they might have received had they remained as managers of Braithwaite for the full term of the management engagement of June 1987 or that made in January 1988, even if it were possible to determine this, given the infirmities of this engagement.

Second, the fundamental yardstick is what is a fair and reasonable remuneration or compensation for the benefit accepted actually or constructively by Braithwaite. It will be recalled that in the context of liability I drew a distinction between the benefit which is presumed where a person requests another to perform services, and the end product of those services. Take the case of a selling agent who after one hour's work achieves [263] a sale which earns an enormous profit to the principal. What is in these circumstances the benefit to the principal? In my view the answer to this difficulty is suggested by Deane J in Pavey's Case, at 263. Where the services have been performed at the request of a defendant or under an ineffective contract, the fair value of the work of the party will ordinarily be the remuneration calculated at a reasonable rate for the work actually done, for the defendant having obtained the benefit of a plaintiff's work ought not be permitted to enjoy this work without having paid for it. The assessment, then, must have regard to what the defendant would have had to pay had the benefits been conferred under a normal commercial arrangement. The enquiry is not primarily directed to the cost to the plaintiff of performing the work since the law is not compensating that party for loss suffered.

Third, where the parties have agreed upon a price for certain services to be performed and those services have in fact been performed, but for some reason their agreement is ineffective or is no longer on foot, the agreed price is evidence of the value that the parties themselves put on the services performed and may be received as evidence of the appropriate remuneration, but is not determinative of it: Pavey's Case, at 257; Horton v Jones [No 1] (1934) 34 SR (NSW) 359, at 368. These cases are concerned with contracts which have been performed by the plaintiff, but there seems no reason in principle why the court should not equally have regard to the agreed price in assessing the benefit of services where they are not totally performed. …

Fourth, in many cases the appropriate method of assessing the benefit of the work is by applying an hourly rate to the time involved in performing those services. If this procedure is adopted, the court may have regard to the rate of remuneration which is commonly accepted in the industry. But in so doing it should have regard to the standing of the person performing the services, the difficulty of the task, the fact that the services required imagination and creativity which may be difficult to discern in the end product. See also Graham and Baldwin v Taylor, Son and Davis (1965) 109 SJ 793; Hudson's Building and Engineering Contracts, 10th ed, at 183 to 185.

Fifth, in the case where the services are of such kind that it is difficult or impossible to assess the number of hours involved or to itemise the precise services, the court is entitled to make a global assessment or to reduce or increase the remuneration which can be proved with some certainty in order to reflect the fair and reasonable value. See The Commonwealth of Australia [264] v Amman Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64, at 83. In such a case the court is simply performing the task of the jury, which would be directed to have regard to all the circumstances and to return a verdict in the proper sum.

Sixth, where it is customary in the industry for the services to be recompensed on a commission basis, the court may have regard to what is a reasonable commission and to apply it where appropriate: Way v Latilla [1937] 3 All ER 759, at 764, per Lord Atkin. This manner of valuing the services, however, provides difficulties in the case where the event giving rise to the payment of commission has not occurred, as for example where an estate agent is deprived of the right to earn commission because the property is withdrawn from sale. In such a case it cannot be appropriate to treat the benefits to the employer as being the procuring of a sale which has not occurred, nor is it appropriate to value the lost chance of the agent to make this sale, for this is to apply a rule more appropriate for the assessment of damages. But what is the sense of attempting to value the agent's fruitless services performed at the request of the defendant, for the market or current price of those services cannot be realistically assessed in that industry otherwise than by reference to the commission which they might have earned? The researches of counsel and of myself have not disclosed an authority on this point which is central to the assessment in the present case. Accordingly, it is necessary to turn to first principles.

The function of the task of the court is to undertake an assessment of the benefit or the enrichment which has been unjustly accepted by the defendant. The benefit may be looked at first as the benefit of certain services which the estate agent or, as here, the managers were to undertake with the intent and expectation of profit for the employer. It is necessary to bear in mind that these services were not the making of a certain telephone call or the attending at a particular meeting, though they certainly included such things. The services which were requested and which I infer were of value to the artist were the assumption of the role of manager and the performance of the various tasks which this role involved. In this context the benefit to the artist includes the expectation that these services will be performed with the prospect of profit to him and on the basis that in such event he must make payment. Indeed, it is on this assumption that the manner of assessing payment on a commission basis was agreed.

The consequence of this, it seems to me, is that it would be to affront rather than to satisfy the requirements of good justice for the law to ignore, in the case of a commission agent or manager whose services have been provided at the request of an employer in circumstances entitling the former to restitution, the commission which might have accrued had the relationship not been terminated. This is not to say that the benefit conferred by the agent or manager should be valued as equivalent to that commission, for to do this would be to ignore the fact that the employment has been prematurely terminated, and that the agent/manager has been relieved of the burden of completing the task for which he or she was engaged, and the possibility that the success which was achieved after the termination was the product of the efforts of persons other than the agent/manager. The recognition of the role of these factors, together with a predisposition in such a case to fulfil the expectation of the parties at the time of request, may require the adjustment of the commission which might otherwise have been payable in order to cater for the contribution made by the manager to the success of the artist.

[265] These approaches, which may be to a greater or less extent of assistance in a given case, are all subordinate to the basic function of the court – to assess the sum which represents a fair and reasonable value of the benefit of the services performed.

[BYRNE J assessed the value of the services on an hourly rate (which produced a total of about $35,000) and tested the reasonableness of these amounts by comparing them with the amounts that might have been earned on a commission basis (ie, as a percentage of earnings from royalties and live performances). The commission calculation produced a total for Fenner and Brenner of approximately $31,000. The plaintiffs were therefore held to be entitled to recover a sum of approximately $35,000 plus interest and costs.]

Lumbers v W Cook Builders (in liq)

[10.27] Lumbers v W Cook Builders Pty Ltd (in liquidation) [2008] HCA 27; (2008) 232 CLR 635 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia.

[FACTS: W Cook & Sons Pty Ltd (Sons) orally agreed to build a house for the Lumbers. The work of the builder mostly involved employing and supervising subcontractors. It was agreed that the Lumbers would pay the costs incurred by Sons plus a supervision fee, although the amount of the fee was never determined. Following a corporate reorganisation, and without the knowledge of the Lumbers, all of the building work being done by Sons was taken over by a related company,

W Cook Builders Pty Ltd (Builders). From then on, the work on the Lumbers' house was undertaken or paid for by Builders. The Lumbers were asked to make certain payments for the building work, which they did by way of cheques payable to Sons. These amounts were passed on to Builders. Three years after the house was completed, Builders went into liquidation. A director of Sons, Malcolm Cook, wrote to the Lumbers advising that there were no outstanding amounts owed by the Lumbers to Sons. The liquidator of Builders claimed, however, that Builders had been underpaid for the work on the Lumbers' house. The liquidator of Builders sought to recover from the Lumbers the difference between the amounts paid by the Lumbers and the total amount that they should have been paid (ie, the cost of the building works plus a reasonable fee for supervision). The trial judge found that the difference was more than $260,000. There was no adequate explanation as to why this amount was not claimed by Sons. The liquidator failed at first instance. Since the contract between the Lumbers and Sons remained in force, and was not assigned to Builders, Builders was held to have undertaken the work on the Lumbers' house as a subcontractor for Sons. The trial judge in the District Court therefore held that Builders had no rights against the Lumbers. On appeal, the Full Court of the South Australian Supreme Court held (2-1) that Builders could recover in restitution against the Lumbers. The Lumbers had incontrovertibly benefited from the work done by Builders and freely accepted that benefit, even though they did not know it was being provided by Builders. The Lumbers appealed to the High Court of Australia.]

GLEESON CJ:

The restitutionary claim

[45] In considering Builders' restitutionary claim, the contractual relations between the Lumbers and Sons, and between Sons and Builders, cannot be put to one side as an inconvenient distraction. The original structure of the litigation has been described above. The circumstances that, by reason of a failure on the part of Builders to comply with an order for security for costs, Sons has taken no active part in the litigation, and that, by reason of the absence of any evidence from Mr McAdam, what went on between Sons and Builders is obscure, do not displace the necessity of identifying the contractual position. The case was conducted and decided in the South Australian courts on the basis that, as Builders alleged, there was a contract between the Lumbers and Sons. Builders claimed that there was an assignment to it by Sons of the benefit of that contract. That claim failed. The primary judge held that the work performed by Builders was performed pursuant to a further contract which was made between Sons and Builders; a contract that was entered into without the knowledge of the Lumbers. That finding was not reversed in the Full Court, although it is not clear how the majority accommodated it to their reasoning. It was adopted by Vanstone J. The finding should be accepted. No reason has been shown to doubt that it was correct. As the trial judge pointed out, once the possibility of assignment is rejected, and in the absence of any suggestion of novation, the characterisation of the "arrangements" between Sons and Builders as a contract is appropriate. Even if the conduct of Sons in making such a contract and thereby delegating the performance of its obligations amounted to a breach of its contract with the Lumbers, the contract between the Lumbers and Sons remained in force. There was, therefore, a head contract between the Lumbers and Sons, and a subcontract between Sons and Builders.

[46] So far as appears from the evidence, Builders had, and may still have, a viable claim against Sons. The claim was not defeated on the merits or otherwise in any relevant respect rendered worthless. Builders and Sons have their own separate creditors and members. The contractual arrangements that were made effected a certain allocation of risk; and there is no occasion to disturb or interfere with that allocation. On the contrary, there is every reason to respect it. There was no mistake or misunderstanding on the part of Builders. It was accepted on both sides in argument that in the ordinary case a building subcontractor does not have a restitutionary claim against a property owner, but must look for payment to the head contractor (Hampton v Glamorgan County Council [1917] AC 13). That was said to be subject to exceptions (see Restatement of the Law: Restitution and Unjust Enrichment, 3d, Tentative Draft No 3 (2004) at §29), but the difficulty for Builders was to show that the case fell within any recognised exception or within general principles justifying a new exception.

[47] In Pan Ocean Shipping Co Ltd v Creditcorp Ltd [1994] 1 WLR 161 at 166, Lord Goff of Chieveley said:

> I am of course well aware that writers on the law of restitution have been exploring the possibility that, in exceptional circumstances, a plaintiff may have a claim in restitution when he has conferred a benefit on the defendant in the course of performing an obligation to a third party (see, eg, Goff and Jones on the Law of Restitution, 4th ed (1993), pp 55 et seq, and (for a particular example) Burrows on the Law of Restitution, (1993) pp 271-272). But, quite apart from the fact that the existence of a remedy in restitution in such circumstances must still be regarded as a matter of debate, it is always recognised that serious difficulties arise if the law seeks to expand the law of restitution to redistribute risks for which provision has been made under an applicable contract.

In some Australian jurisdictions, there has been legislation enacted to protect the interests of building subcontractors, but such protection is confined within a certain statutory framework (eg Worker's Liens Act 1893 (SA); Subcontractors' Charges Act 1974 (Qld)). The fact that such legislation exists should discourage, rather than encourage, attempts to extend the scope of restitutionary claims beyond the bounds set by legal principle, especially where to do so would be to cut across or disturb contractual relationships and established allocation of risk (cf Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] AC 827 at 843; Esso Australia Resources Ltd v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1999) 201 CLR 49 at 62 [24]).

[49] To repeat, Builders' services were not performed at the request of the Lumbers, but pursuant to a contract between Sons and Builders. There was no acquiescence by the Lumbers in the provision of services by Builders. The Lumbers were unaware of the existence or role of Builders. As far as they were concerned, the services were being provided by Sons under the building contract. That was not provision of services for the protection of the Lumbers' property.

[50] The majority in the Full Court decided the case on the basis that Builders performed services that conferred an incontrovertible benefit on the Lumbers, and that it would be unconscionable for the Lumbers to keep the benefit of those services without paying a reasonable sum for them. In their application to the facts of the present case, each of the two elements in that proposition should be rejected.

[51] As to the concept of conferring of benefit, what was involved was the performance of building work on property owned by the Lumbers in circumstances where there was a building contract between the Lumbers and Sons obliging Sons to perform that work and the Lumbers to pay Sons for it, and a subcontract between Sons and Builders obliging Builders to perform the work and Sons to pay Builders. As it happens, there was no material difference between the total price to be paid under the contracts. However, the case for Builders can be tested by supposing that there had been such a difference. Furthermore, the unusual agreement as to progress payments made between the Lumbers and Sons, an agreement that was closely connected with the personal relationship between Mr Warwick Lumbers and Mr McAdam, highlights the significance of the 1993 contract as, from the point of view of the Lumbers, the source of their legal rights and obligations. In Steele v Tardiani (1946) 72 CLR 386 at 402-403, which in one sense was a simpler case than the present because there was only one contract involved, Dixon J explained the problems of identifying, for the purpose of a quantum meruit claim not based on the contract, a "benefit" conferred on a building owner by the performance of work otherwise than in accordance with the contract. He accepted that, where building work is done outside the contract, and the benefit of the work is taken, there may arise an obligation to pay for the work. He went on to refer, however, to "the dilemma in which a building owner is placed". He quoted Collins LJ who said, in Sumpter v Hedges [1898] 1 QB 673 at 676:

> Where, as in the case of work done on land, the circumstances are such as to give the defendant no option whether he will take the benefit of the work or not, then one must look to other facts than the mere taking the benefit of the work in order to ground the inference of a new contract … The mere fact that a defendant is in possession of what he cannot help keeping, or even has done work upon it, affords no ground for such an inference.

[52] The reference to an "inference of a new contract" may reflect an approach since overtaken by Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul, but the problem involved in identifying a conferring or accepting of a benefit remains.

[53] The concept of "free acceptance" invoked by the majority in the Full Court, whatever its exact scope, is commonly related to a defendant who "did not take a reasonable opportunity open to him to reject the proffered services" (cf Goff and Jones, The Law of Restitution, 7th ed (2007) at [1-019]). That was not the situation of the Lumbers in the present case. Similarly, what was sought to be characterised as an "incontrovertible benefit" was that which Sons had undertaken to provide for the Lumbers and for which the Lumbers had agreed to pay Sons. If the principle relied upon by Builders extends to the claim by Builders against the Lumbers, it is difficult to see why it would not extend also to the work performed by the numerous subcontractors engaged by Sons and later by Builders. Much, perhaps most, of the physical construction work on the site was performed, and many of the physical materials brought to the site were supplied, by such subcontractors. Why Builders was in a different position from them vis-à-vis the Lumbers was not explained. In a broad colloquial sense, they were conferring benefits on the Lumbers, and the Lumbers were accepting those benefits, but that was not so in any legal sense.

[54] It was argued that the Lumbers had received a "windfall" and that it would be unconscionable of them to refuse to pay Builders for the work in question. This characterisation proceeds upon assumptions as to the respective rights and obligations of the Lumbers, Sons and Builders which, for reasons already stated, have not been justified. Insofar as the Lumbers have been relieved from liability to pay the full agreed price for the work done on their property it appears principally to be the consequence of Builders' failure to make or pursue a prompt claim against Sons, and Builders' failure to pursue its claim against Sons in the present proceedings. If that claim had been pursued, it may well have resulted in a claim by Sons against the Lumbers. Alternatively, it may be the consequence of the unexplained attitude of Sons in the letter written by Mr Malcolm Cook in early 1999. The procedural and evidentiary deficiencies in the case make it impossible to conclude that the conduct of the Lumbers in refusing to pay Builders is unconscionable. If they have been enriched, it is at the expense of Sons. If any party has been enriched at the expense of Builders, it is Sons.

[55] The restitutionary claim of Builders has not been made out.

GUMMOW, HAYNE, CRENNAN and KIEFEL JJ:

The framework for analysis

[75] The analysis undertaken by the majority in the Full Court proceeded from principles stated at a high level of abstraction. There were four elements in the framework of the analysis made by the Full Court: "benefit" (or "incontrovertible benefit"), "acceptance" (or "free acceptance"), "expense", and unconscionability. Obviously, much turns on what is meant by those terms and upon what are the features said to make retention of the "benefit" unconscionable. Adding words like "incontrovertible" and "free" to some of the terms emphasises the evident difficulties of definition. As is especially relevant here, much also turns on the particular facts and circumstances to which the terms are to be applied. None of the terms, "benefit", "acceptance" or "expense", can usefully be defined or applied without deciding whether attention is to be confined to the party who is identified as conferring the benefit and the recipient of that benefit, or account must be taken of the legal relationships that exist between one or other of those two parties and some third party or parties in relation to the events and transactions said to constitute conferring a "benefit", its "acceptance", or the incurrence of "expense".

[76] In the present case, the majority in the Full Court directed principal attention to the relationship which it was held should be found to exist between Builders and the Lumbers. The legal relationship between the Lumbers and Sons was put to one side. Two bases for taking that step were identified. First, it was said that Sons "did not perform its obligations" under its contract with the Lumbers. It was said to be "not to the point for the Lumbers to claim that they are not liable to Builders because they have a contract with Sons, if Sons did not perform their part of the contract". Secondly, emphasis was given to the fact that Sons had acknowledged that it has no claim against the Lumbers. The majority in the Full Court concluded that in these circumstances "to uphold a claim in restitution by Builders in no way interferes with the contractual relationship between Sons and the Lumbers".

[77] These reasons will demonstrate that the legal relationship between Sons and the Lumbers cannot be dismissed from consideration, whether on the bases assigned by the majority in the Full Court or otherwise. When proper account is taken of the rights and obligations that existed between Sons and the Lumbers under their contract, the analysis made by the majority in the Full Court is shown to be flawed. The Lumbers are not shown to have received a "benefit" at Builders' "expense" which they "accepted", and which it would be unconscionable for them to retain without payment. No less importantly, proper analysis of the legal relationships revealed by the evidence will illustrate the dangers inherent in "top-down reasoning" (Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 544 [73] per Gummow J; McGinty v Western Australia (1996) 186 CLR 140 at 232 per McHugh J).

[78] The application of a framework for analysis expressed only at the level of abstraction adopted in this case, by reference to "benefit", "expense" and "acceptance" coupled with considerations of unconscionability, creates a serious risk of producing a result that is discordant with accepted principle, thus creating a lack of coherence with other branches of the law (See Sullivan v Moody (2001) 207 CLR 562 at 580-581 [53]-[55] per Gleeson CJ, Gaudron, McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ). There are two reasons of particular relevance to this case why that is so. They may be identified by reference to two questions which, although expressed separately, will later be seen to intersect in several ways. First, does applying the posited framework for analysis to the facts of the present case extend the availability of recovery beyond the circumstances in which a claim for work and labour done (or money paid) for and at the request of the defendant would be available? Secondly, and no less importantly, how is the result of applying this framework for analysis consistent with the obligations relevant parties undertook by their contractual arrangements?

[79] The doing of work, or payment of money, for and at the request of another, are archetypal cases in which it may be said that a person receives a "benefit" at the "expense" of another which the recipient "accepts" and which it would be unconscionable for the recipient to retain without payment. And as is well apparent from this Court's decision in Steele v Tardiani (1946) 72 CLR 386, an essential step in considering a claim in quantum meruit (or money paid) is to ask whether and how that claim fits with any particular contract the parties have made. It is essential to consider how the claim fits with contracts the parties have made because, as Lord Goff of Chieveley rightly warned in Pan Ocean Shipping Co Ltd v Creditcorp Ltd [1994] 1 WLR 161 at 166, 'serious difficulties arise if the law seeks to expand the law of restitution to redistribute risks for which provision has been made under an applicable contract'. In a similar vein, in the Comments upon §29 of the proposed Restatement, (3d), Tentative Draft No 3, 22 March 2004, "Restitution and Unjust Enrichment", the Reporter says:

> Even if restitution is the claimant's only recourse, a claim under this Section will be denied where the imposition of a liability in restitution would overturn an existing allocation of risk or limitation of liability previously established by contract.

[80] Likewise, it is essential to consider whether the facts of the present case yield to analysis as a claim for work and labour done, or money paid, because where one party (in this case, Builders) seeks recompense from another (here the Lumbers) for some service done or benefit conferred by the first party for or on the other, the bare fact of conferral of the benefit or provision of the service does not suffice to establish an entitlement to recovery. As Bowen LJ said in Falcke v Scottish Imperial Insurance Company (1886) 34 Ch D 234 at 248:

> The general principle is, beyond all question, that work and labour done or money expended by one man to preserve or benefit the property of another do not according to English law create any lien upon the property saved or benefited, nor, even if standing alone, create any obligation to repay the expenditure. Liabilities are not to be forced upon people behind their backs any more than you can confer a benefit upon a man against his will. (emphasis added)

The principle is not unqualified. Bowen LJ identified salvage in maritime law as one qualification. Other cases, including other cases of necessitous intervention, may now be seen as further qualifications to the principle but it is not necessary to examine in this case how extensive are those further qualifications or what is their content. For the purposes of this case the critical observations to make are first that Builders' restitutionary claim does not yield to analysis as a claim for work and labour done or money paid and secondly, that Builders' restitutionary claim, if allowed, would redistribute not only the risks but also the rights and obligations for which provision was made by the contract the Lumbers made with Sons.

A claim for work and labour done or money paid?

[10.28] [81] At trial, Builders did not frame its claim against the Lumbers as a claim for work and labour done or money paid at the Lumbers' request. Builders, therefore, did not seek to prove that the Lumbers had ever asked Builders to do whatever Builders did in connection with building the Lumbers' house. And the evidence that was led at trial showed that the Lumbers had never asked Builders to do anything in connection with the Lumbers' house.

[82] On the hearing of the appeal to this Court, however, Builders submitted that acceptance of a benefit, without a request, would be sufficient, at least in this case, to found an action by Builders for work and labour done or money paid. Builders submitted that this conclusion was supported, if not required, by this Court's decision in Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221. That is not so.

[83] In Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 227 per Mason and Wilson JJ, 256-257 per Deane J, a majority of this Court held that the right to recover on a quantum meruit does not depend on the existence of an implied contract but on a claim to restitution or one based on unjust enrichment. The concept of unjust enrichment was described by Deane J in Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 256-257 as constituting:

> a unifying legal concept which explains why the law recognises, in a variety of distinct categories of case, an obligation on the part of a defendant to make fair and just restitution for a benefit derived at the expense of a plaintiff and which assists in the determination, by the ordinary processes of legal reasoning, of the question whether the law should, in justice, recognise such an obligation in a new or developing category of case.

[84] It is important to recognise two points about Pavey & Matthews. First, there was no issue in that case about whether the plaintiff, a builder, had a claim for work and labour done and materials supplied. The issue in the case was whether that claim was defeated by a statutory provision analogous to s 4 of the Statute of Frauds (UK) ("no action shall be brought upon any agreement … unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized"). In particular, the issue was whether the builder's action on a quantum meruit was a direct or indirect enforcement of the oral contract the parties had made. The majority in Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 227 per Mason and Wilson JJ; see also at 256 per Deane J held that because "the true foundation of the right to recover on a quantum meruit does not depend on the existence of an implied contract" the action was not "one by which the plaintiff seeks to enforce the oral contract".

[85] The second point to be noted is that unjust enrichment was identified as a legal concept unifying "a variety of distinct categories of case": (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 257 per Deane J. It was not identified as a principle which can be taken as a sufficient premise for direct application in particular cases. …

[86] Builders' submission that acceptance of a benefit, without a request, suffices to found an action for work and labour done or money paid thus finds no direct support in Pavey & Matthews. That issue did not arise and was not decided in that case. Rather, the question to which Pavey & Matthews directs attention is whether the long-established and well-recognised category of cases constituted by claims for work and labour done or money paid at the request of another should be extended or developed in the manner for which Builders contended. And in that regard Builders emphasised what had been said by Doyle CJ, for the Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia, in Angelopoulos v Sabatino (1995) 65 SASR 1.

[87] It is convenient to consider the decision in Angelopoulos by reference to Builders' submission that, subject to one immaterial qualification, all the nine factors identified by Doyle CJ in Angelopoulos (1995) 65 SASR 1 at 12-13 as relevant to "acceptance" of a benefit, were present in this case. It is important, however, to preface that consideration by observing that although Builders' argument was directed immediately to demonstrating that "acceptance" of a benefit suffices to found an action for work and labour done or money paid, its arguments about the availability of an action for work and labour done or money paid were directed ultimately to the proposition that adopting the framework for analysis used by the majority in the Full Court in this case was not inconsistent with long-established principles governing actions for work and labour done or money paid.

[88] Adapting what was said by Doyle CJ in Angelopoulos to the facts of this case, the nine factors identified by Builders as supporting its claim were:

(a) the plaintiff (here, Builders) did not do the work gratuitously;

(b) Builders did not act "entirely at [its] own initiative" but at the implied request of the Lumbers;

(c) payment for doing the work was not subject to fulfilment of a subsequent condition;

(d) the work was not done "on a basis from which [Builders] chose to depart";

(e) the Lumbers benefited from what Builders did;

(f) the benefit was conferred at the expense of Builders;

(g) the Lumbers "approved of or agreed to" Builders carrying out the work it did;

(h) the circumstances were such that the Lumbers "must have known as … reasonable [persons] that [Builders] expected to be remunerated for [its] services"; and

(i) there is no particular circumstance (such as change of position) by virtue of which it would be unjust to require the Lumbers to remunerate Builders.

[89] It will be noted that the second of the matters identified was the making of an "implied request" by the Lumbers to Builders to do the work and to pay money. At once it should be pointed out that, if Builders did whatever work it did and paid whatever money it paid at the Lumbers' request, Builders' claim for a reasonable price for the work and for the money it paid would fall neatly within long-established principles. It would matter not at all whether the request was made expressly, or its making was to be implied from the actions of the parties in the circumstances of the case (Birmingham and District Land Company v London and North Western Railway Company (1886) 34 Ch D 261 at 274 per Bowen LJ; Way v Latilla [1937] 3 All ER 759 at 765 per Lord Wright). Builders would have an action for work and labour done or money paid for and at the request of the Lumbers.

[90] And if Builders did work or paid money at the Lumbers' request, it would also follow that it would be neither necessary nor appropriate to consider any of the other eight factors identified in Angelopoulos in deciding whether Builders could recover a fair price for the work it had done and the amount it had paid for and at the request of the Lumbers. To the extent that Angelopoulos is understood as requiring separate or additional consideration of those other factors, where a plaintiff seeks to recover a fair price for work done at the defendant's request, or the amount the plaintiff has paid for the defendant at the defendant's request, Angelopoulos is wrong and should not be followed.

[91] But in the end Builders did not submit that it could be found that the Lumbers had made any request directed to Builders. Rather, Builders' arguments proceeded from the premise that, in the present case, the Lumbers' request (or requests) for work to be done and money paid was (or were) directed to Sons and not to Builders. Although Builders thus accepted that, unlike Angelopoulos, it could not be said that the Lumbers made any request directed to Builders, this difference from Angelopoulos was said to be immaterial. The identity of the party to whom the request was directed was said to be of no moment because confusion about which company in a group of companies is party to a contract is a common occurrence in modern corporate life (cf Qintex Australia Finance Ltd v Schroders Australia Ltd (1990) 3 ACSR 267 at 268). And although no case of mistake was run at trial, or on appeal to the Full Court, the possibility of confusion of identity between Sons and Builders was said by Builders to be reason enough to treat the fact of a request, regardless of the identity of the party to whom the request was directed, as the relevant consideration.

[92] The propositions just described take several steps that would require the closest consideration before they could be accepted. First, it may greatly be doubted that any sufficient foundation was laid in the evidence adduced or arguments advanced in the courts below for either an argument based in mistake about the identity of the party with whom the Lumbers dealt, or an argument based in some confusion of identity between Sons and Builders. Secondly, even if it were to be accepted that confusion about the identity of the relevant contracting parties can and sometimes does occur when a contract is made with one of a group of companies, the legal consequences of any such confusion have hitherto been determined by application of the law of contract and doctrines of mistake (Qintex (1990) 3 ACSR 267 at 276-277).

[93] It is not necessary, however, to pursue these aspects of the matter further. Rather, it is important to recognise that, although expressed in different terms, Builders' argument that the identity of the party to whom the Lumbers directed their request to do work and pay money should be dismissed as irrelevant, was an argument that sought to treat the contract made between the Lumbers and Sons as irrelevant.

[94] And it will be recalled that it was a necessary element of the reasoning of the majority in the Full Court to put aside further consideration of the contract between Sons and Lumbers. It will further be recalled that the majority in the Full Court took that step on the bases, first, that Builders "did the work" and Sons "did not perform its obligations" under its contract with the Lumbers, and secondly, that Sons acknowledged it had no claim against the Lumbers.

The relevance of the contract between the Lumbers and Sons

[124] When account is taken of the contractual relationship between the Lumbers and Sons several observations may then be made.

[125] First, the Lumbers accepted no benefit at the expense of Builders which it would be unconscionable to retain. The Lumbers made a contract with Sons which either has been fully performed by both parties or has not. Sons made an arrangement or agreement with Builders which again has either been fully performed or it has not. If either the agreement between Sons and the Lumbers or the agreement or arrangement between Sons and Builders has not been fully performed (because all that is owed by one party to the other has not been paid) that is a matter between the parties to the relevant agreement. A failure of performance of either agreement is no reason to conclude that Builders should then have some claim against the Lumbers, parties with whom Builders has no contract.

[126] Because Builders had no dealings with the Lumbers, Builders has no claim against the Lumbers for the price of any work and labour Builders performed or for any money that Builders may have paid in relation to the construction. Builders has no such claim because it can point to no request by the Lumbers directed to Builders that Builders do any work it did or pay any money it did. Reference to whether the Lumbers "accepted" any work that Builders did or "accepted" the benefit of any money it paid is irrelevant. It is irrelevant because it distracts attention from the legal relationships between the three parties: the Lumbers, Sons and Builders. To now impose on the Lumbers an obligation to pay Builders would constitute a radical alteration of the bargains the parties struck and of the rights and obligations which each party thus assumed. There is no warrant for doing that.

[127] The second observation to be made is more general. It is that identification of the rights and obligations of the parties, in this as in any matter, requires close attention to the particular facts and circumstances of the case. Necessarily that requires close attention to what contractual or other obligations each owes to the other.

[128] Builders claim in restitution against the Lumbers fails.

Appeal allowed.

David Securities v Commonwealth Bank of Australia

[10.30] David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia Ltd (1991) 175 CLR 353 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: David Securities (one of the appellants) borrowed money from the Commonwealth Bank (the respondent), through its Singapore branch. The Income Tax Assessment Act 1936 (Cth) levied a tax (known as withholding tax) on interest payments made to non-residents. The Act required a resident Australian borrower paying interest to a non-resident lender to deduct the withholding tax and pay it to the Commissioner of Taxation. Clause 8(b) of the loan agreement made between David Securities and the Bank was a "grossing up" provision, which required David Securities to pay to the Bank any additional amounts necessary to meet any tax obligations and ensure that the Bank would receive the full amount of interest payable under the loan agreement. David Securities paid additional sums to the Bank in accordance with cl 8(b), without knowing that s 261 of the Income Tax Assessment Act rendered void any provision in a mortgage or collateral agreement requiring the mortgagor to pay income tax on the interest paid under the mortgage. David Securities sought to recover the amounts paid to the Bank under the cl 8(b). The Federal Court of Australia held that cl 8(b) was rendered void by s 261 of the Act, but no action was available to recover money paid under a mistake of law. On appeal, the High Court of Australia held unanimously that s 261 rendered cl 8(b) void. The extracts below deal with the question whether David Securities was entitled to recover the payments made pursuant to the void clause.]

MASON CJ, DEANE, TOOHEY, GAUDRON and McHUGH JJ: [362] Are the appellants entitled to restitution of moneys paid under a mistake of law?

[369] The Restatement of the Law of Restitution (American Law Institute (1937), p 179) states:

> Until the nineteenth century no distinction was made between mistake of fact and mistake of law and restitution was freely granted both in law and in equity to persons who had paid money to another because of a mistake of law.

In Farmer v Arundel (1772) 2 W Bl 824, 825; 96 ER 485, 486 De Grey CJ stated:

> When money is paid by one man to another on a mistake either of fact or of law, or by deceit, this action [ie assumpsit] will certainly lie.

However, in Bilbie v Lumley (1802) 2 East 469; 102 ER 448, Lord Ellenborough CJ refused recovery of moneys paid under a mistake of law. An underwriter sought recovery of moneys from a successful insurance claimant whom he had paid, unaware that non-disclosure by the insured of essential facts at the time of entering the insurance contract relieved the insurer from liability. The underwriter was in possession of all the facts which would have allowed him to deny liability. After counsel was unable to name a case in which recovery had been allowed to a plaintiff who was aware of all relevant facts, Lord Ellenborough CJ denied recovery on the basis of a maxim wholly inapplicable to the case, namely, ignorantia juris non excusat. [371] This approach appears to have been based on an obiter dictum in the judgment of Buller J in Lowry v Bourdieu (1780) 2 Doug 468, 471; 99 ER 299, 300 … On its facts, the decision in Bilbie v Lumley was probably correct because the payment appears to have been made voluntarily and not under any mistake at all.

Bilbie v Lumley was distinguished in Kelly v Solari (1841) 9 M & W 54; 152 ER 24, a case allowing recovery of moneys paid under a mistake of fact. It thereby became entrenched as a decision denying recovery because the mistake of the plaintiff was one of law. Despite its dubious foundation, the principle gained such acceptance that Croom-Johnson J said of it that it was "beyond argument at this period in our legal history" (Sawyer & Vincent v Window Brace Ltd [1943] KB 32, 34).

The respondent claims that the principle has also been accepted in this Court; however, an examination of the relevant cases, apart from the statement of Williams J in York Air Conditioning and Refrigeration (A/Sia) Pty Ltd v The Commonwealth (1949) 80 CLR 11 at 30, suggests that they may also be reconciled with the narrower principle of voluntary submission. In Werrin v The Commonwealth, in which the plaintiff sought recovery of sales tax that he had paid upon secondhand goods sold by him, Latham CJ stated ((1938) 59 CLR 150 at 159 …):

> The principle appears to me to be quite clear that if a person, instead of contesting a claim, elects to pay money in order to discharge it, he cannot thereafter, because he finds out that he might have successfully contested the claim, recover the money which he so paid merely on the ground that he made a mistake of law.

In South Australian Cold Stores Ltd v Electricity Trust of South Australia (1957) 98 CLR 65, the plaintiff made monthly payments to the defendant of electricity charges assessed at an increased rate, then successfully challenged the validity of the Minister's order increasing the charges and sought recovery of the excessive charges paid over. Prior to making the monthly payments, the plaintiff had objected to the increased charge and had even declined to pay the extra amount pursuant to the first monthly account. In a unanimous judgment, the Court denied recovery …

[373] An important feature of the relevant judgments in these … cases is the emphasis placed on voluntariness or election by the plaintiff. The payment is voluntary or there is an election if the plaintiff chooses to make the payment even though he or she believes a particular law or contractual provision requiring the payment is, or may be, invalid, or is not concerned to query whether payment is legally required; he or she is prepared to assume the validity of the obligation, or is prepared to make the payment [374] irrespective of the validity or invalidity of the obligation, rather than contest the claim for payment. We use the term "voluntary" therefore to refer to a payment made in satisfaction of an honest claim, rather than a payment not made under any form of compulsion or undue influence. If such qualifying, factual circumstances are considered relevant, the sweeping principle that money paid under a mistake of law is irrecoverable or even the Federal Court's modification of that principle to the effect that mistake of law does not on its own found an action for the recovery of money paid is broader and more preclusive than is necessary. As the authorities cited earlier in explanation of the term "mistake of law" make clear, the concept includes cases of sheer ignorance as well as cases of positive but incorrect belief. To define "mistake" as the supposition that a specific fact is true, as Parke B did in Kelly v Solari (1841) 9 M & W at 58; 152 ER at 26, which was a mistake of fact case, leaves out of account many fact situations. A narrower principle, founded firmly on the policy that the law wishes to uphold bargains and enforce compromises freely entered into, would be more accurate and equitable.

The identification and acceptance of such a narrow principle is strongly supported by the difficulty and illogicality of seeking to draw a rigid distinction between cases of mistake of law and mistake of fact. The artificiality of this distinction and the numerous exceptions to it (Goff & Jones, The Law of Restitution, 3rd ed, 1986, pp 124-125) lie behind many of the calls for abolition of the traditional rule. Judge Learned Hand called it "that most unfortunate doctrine" (St Paul Fire & Marine Ins Co v Pure Oil Co (1933), 63 F (2d) 771, at 773). The Supreme Court of Canada indicated its willingness to abolish the rule in its recent decision of Air Canada v British Columbia (1989) 59 DLR (4th) 161, at 191 … Western Australia and New Zealand have abolished the rule by legislation (Property Law Act 1969 (WA), ss 124 and 125 … Judicature Act 1908 (NZ), ss 94A and 94B). The Law Reform Committee of South Australia … and the Law Reform [375] Commissions of New South Wales … and British Columbia … have recommended abolition of the rule, as has most recently the English Law Commission … Also very recently, the House of Lords has had occasion to refer to the strong criticism to which the traditional rule has been subjected (Woolwich Building Society v Inland Revenue Commissioners [1993] AC 142 …).

Commentators have been highly critical of both the fact versus law distinction and the traditional rule precluding recovery. Goff and Jones (op cit, p 119) reject the rule and seek to reconcile the cases with a narrower principle. Palmer, Law of Restitution (1978), vol 3, §14.27 is unable to find any reason to support treating restitution in cases of mistake of law any differently from cases of mistake of fact. Birks, An Introduction to the Law of Restitution (1989), pp 166-167 considers that the old rule cannot be justified and that recovery should be permitted in certain cases where there is a mistake of law. In Canada, the authors of a recent text on the law of restitution condemn the traditional rule and conclude that it is unnecessary to distinguish between mistakes of law and of fact in order to fulfil the policy in favour of the finality of dispute resolution (Maddaugh and McCamus, The Law of Restitution (1990), p 255). As the same authors say, it "would be difficult to identify another private law doctrine which has been so universally condemned" (ibid, p 256).

The criticism gains added impetus in Australia by virtue of the recognition by this Court in Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221, 256-257 of the "unifying legal concept" of unjust enrichment. As Dickson J stated in Hydro Electric Commission of Nepean v Ontario Hydro [1982] 1 SCR 347, at 367; (1982) 132 DLR (3d) 193, at 209:

Once a doctrine of restitution or unjust enrichment is recognized, the distinction as to mistake of law and mistake of fact becomes simply meaningless.

If the ground for ordering recovery is that the defendant has been unjustly enriched, there is no justification for drawing distinctions on the basis of how the enrichment was gained, except in so far as the manner of gaining the enrichment bears upon the justice of the case.

[376] In the light of our view that the decision in South Australian Cold Stores Ltd v Electricity Trust of South Australia (1957) 98 CLR 65 can in this Court be justified on a narrower basis and that the traditional rule was not necessary to the decision, there is no other decision of this Court which constrains us to adopt the traditional rule. For the reasons stated above, the rule precluding recovery of moneys paid under a mistake of law should be held not to form part of the law in Australia. In referring to moneys paid under a mistake of law, we intend to refer to circumstances where the plaintiff pays moneys to a recipient who is not legally entitled to receive them. It would not, for example, extend to a case where the moneys were paid under a mistaken belief that they were legally due and owing under a particular clause of a particular contract when in fact they were legally due and owing to the recipient under another clause or contract (Barclays Bank Ltd v W J Simms Son &

Cooke (Southern) Ltd [1980] QB 677 at 695, per Robert Goff J: "Of course, if the money was due under a contract between the payer and the payee, there can be no recovery on this ground.").

Having rejected the so-called traditional rule denying recovery in cases of payments made under a mistake of law, it is necessary to consider what principle should be put in its place. It would be logical to treat mistakes of law in the same way as mistakes of fact, so that there would be a prima facie entitlement to recover moneys paid when a mistake of law or fact has caused the payment. Jurisdictions which have abolished the traditional rule by legislation have done so by stating that recovery should be allowed in cases of mistake of law in the same circumstances as it would be were the mistake one of fact (Western Australia and New Zealand).

[Their Honours considered and rejected alternative formulations of the rule and continued, at 378]. So, the payer will be entitled prima facie to recover moneys paid under a mistake if it appears that the moneys were paid by the payer in the mistaken belief that he or she was under a legal obligation to pay the moneys or that the payee was legally entitled to payment of the moneys. Such a mistake would be causative of the payment.

Is retention of the moneys "unjust"?

[10.35] However, the respondent argues that a plaintiff should be required to prove that retention of the moneys by the recipient would be unjust in all the circumstances before recovery should be granted; if the circumstances of the case showed that it would not be unjust for the recipient to retain the money, the fact that the plaintiff could point to a causative mistake, whether of fact or law, would not assist the plaintiff. According to the respondent's submissions, moneys paid under a mistake of law could only be recoverable in so far as the recipient has been unjustly enriched at the expense of the payer, such that it would be unconscionable for the recipient not to give restitution to the payer. In support of this approach, the respondent relies, inter alia, on the recent decisions of this Court in [Australia & New Zealand Banking Group Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 164 CLR 662] and Pavey & Matthews.

Although this alternative approach is not greatly different from that stated above, it does have important consequences in relation to the elements of the action which the plaintiff must plead and prove. It also appears to proceed from the view that in Australian law unjust enrichment is a definitive legal principle according to its own terms and not just a concept.

The two decisions of this Court just mentioned reject that approach. In Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR, at 256-257, Deane J stated:

> To identify the basis of such actions as restitution and not genuine agreement is not to assert a judicial discretion to do whatever idiosyncratic notions of what is fair and just might dictate…. That is not to deny the importance of the concept of unjust enrichment in the law of this country. It constitutes a [379] unifying legal concept which explains why the law recognizes, in a variety of distinct categories of case, an obligation on the part of a defendant to make fair and just restitution for a benefit derived at the expense of a plaintiff and which assists in the determination, by the ordinary processes of legal reasoning, of the question whether the law should, in justice, recognize such an obligation in a new or developing category of case.

Accordingly, it is not legitimate to determine whether an enrichment is unjust by reference to some subjective evaluation of what is fair or unconscionable. Instead, recovery depends upon the existence of a qualifying or vitiating factor such as mistake, duress or illegality. As this Court stated in Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 164 CLR, at 673:

> In other words, receipt of a payment which has been made under a fundamental mistake is one of the categories of case in which the facts give rise to a prima facie obligation to make restitution, in the sense of compensation for the benefit of unjust enrichment, to the person who has sustained the countervailing detriment.

As La Forest J stated in Air Canada v British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR, at p 1201, the two species of mistake (ie, fact and law) should be "considered as factors which can make an enrichment at the plaintiff's expense 'unjust' or 'unjustified' ".

The respondent's submission that the appellants must independently prove "unjustness" over and above the mistake cannot therefore be sustained. The fact that the payment has been caused by a mistake is sufficient to give rise to a prima facie obligation on the part of the respondent to make restitution. Before that prima facie liability is displaced, the respondent must point to circumstances which the law recognizes would make an order for restitution unjust (Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 164 CLR, at 673). There can be no restitution in such circumstances because the law will not provide for recovery except when the enrichment is unjust. It follows that the recipient of a payment, which is sought to be recovered on the ground of unjust enrichment, is entitled to raise by way of answer any matter or circumstance which shows that his or her receipt (or retention) of the payment is not unjust.

Defences

[10.40] The two "defences" upon which the respondent relies in this Court are, first, that the payments by the appellants were made for good consideration and, secondly, that in reliance upon receipt of the payments the respondent, in good faith, changed its position to its detriment. In the context of a mistake case, these "defences" [380] were included in the well known formulation of Goff J in Barclays Bank [1980] QB, at 695. His Lordship stated:

> (1) If a person pays money to another under a mistake of fact which causes him to make the payment, he is prima facie entitled to recover it as money paid under a mistake of fact. (2) His claim may however fail if (a) the payer intends that the payee shall have the money at all events, whether the fact be true or false, or is deemed in law so to intend; or (b) the payment is made for good consideration, in particular if the money is paid to discharge, and does discharge, a debt owed to the payee (or a principal on whose behalf he is authorised to receive the payment) by the payer or by a third party by whom he is authorised to discharge the debt; or (c) the payee has changed his position in good faith, or is deemed in law to have done so.

Payments made for good consideration

The respondent argues that this is a case where the appellants, having accepted the benefit of performance by the respondent, now seek to recover part of the consideration promised for that performance, namely, the payments made referable to withholding tax. This argument and the respondent's attempt to analyze the facts on the broader basis of unjust enrichment rather than mistake specifically, already discussed, echo the view expressed by some writers that "the true basal principle which enables recovery of money paid under a mistake, whether of fact or law, is 'failure of consideration' " [Butler, "Mistaken Payments, Change of Position and Restitution", in Finn (ed), Essays on Restitution (1990) p 88. See also Matthews, "Money Paid Under Mistake of Fact" [1980] New Law Journal 587; National Mutual Life Association v Walsh (1987) 8 NSWLR 585 at 595-596]. It is unnecessary in the present context to assess the merits of this argument because, as we have stated, the more traditional approach, exemplified by the judgment of Goff J in Barclays Bank and the decision of this Court in Westpac Banking Corporation, specifically provides for the "defence" of valuable consideration.

The respondent submits that it agreed to lend money to the appellants at the rate named in the loan agreements because of the appellants' agreement to pay the additional amounts pursuant to cl 8(b). If it had known that these additional amounts were not payable, the respondent argues, it would have negotiated a different interest rate to ensure that its net return reached the required level. By not being charged this higher interest, the appellants have received consideration for the bargain. In the circumstances, they should not be allowed to take advantage of the chance to recover some of the money they had agreed to pay.

The difficulty in evaluating this argument lies in the fact that it [381] depends primarily upon an assessment of the intention and purpose of the appellants at the time of entering the loan agreements and paying the additional amounts pursuant to cl 8(b). By stating that the appellants contracted to pay the additional amounts without adverting to the question of whether they could legally be forced to pay, the respondent effectively submits that the appellants voluntarily submitted to payment. This entails the conclusion that the appellants either cannot truly be said to have made a mistake, as they knew what they were agreeing to – a proposition discussed above – or waived inquiry into the issue and paid the additional amounts with the intention to effect an absolute transfer.

It is necessary to examine closely the terms of the loan agreement and the course of events preceding its signing in order to discover what the payer gave and expected to receive by way of consideration. It is only by doing this that it can be ascertained whether the payment of the additional amounts was absolute or conditional. If the payment was conditional, it was subject to the original or continued existence of a particular subject matter, such as an existing or future indebtedness or other obligation owed to the payee (Porter v Latec Finance (Qld) Pty Ltd (1964) 111 CLR, at 205). In this case, the evidence suggests that the appellants agreed to pay and actually paid the amounts representing withholding tax because the respondent represented that the withholding tax on interest payments must be met by the appellants. Such representations may have caused the appellants to believe that cl 8(b) took its form because of a general obligation on borrowers to pay the particular tax. When the matter is looked at in this light, it can be argued that the appellants agreed to pay the nominated interest rate as the price of the loan and further agreed to pay the additional amounts with which the Dee Why branch, as agent of the appellants, discharged what the appellants considered to be their own tax liability. However, the true situation was, of course, that the liability for payment of withholding tax fell upon the lender and that s 261 avoided any attempt to pass this burden on to a borrower in circumstances such as the present. The appellants thus had no indebtedness in respect of withholding tax, the discharge of which could form consideration for the payments under cl 8(b). Those payments were therefore not made for good consideration within the terms of the defence outlined in Barclays Bank and Westpac Banking Corporation.

The respondent, taking a different view of the contractual arrangements, asserts that all its pre-contractual statements concerning payment of withholding tax simply took the form of a [382] contractual offer, which the appellants were at liberty to accept or to reject. Viewed from the angle of contract formation between equal and experienced parties, this is undoubtedly true. But we are not concerned in this case with what a hypothetical, experienced commercial person believed he or she was contracting for; in order to decide whether the appellants in this case have received consideration for payment of the additional moneys, we must ask what these particular appellants, in all the circumstances, thought they were receiving as consideration. In this context, consideration means the matter considered in forming the decision to do the act, "the state of affairs contemplated as the basis or reason for the payment" (Birks, op cit, p 223). And, as we have stated, the "state of affairs" existing in the appellants' minds was that the withholding tax was their liability.

So, in the context of failure of consideration, the failure is judged from the perspective of the payer. In Rover International Ltd v Cannon Film Ltd, Kerr LJ stated ([1989] 1 WLR 912, 923; see also Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32, 48, per Viscount Simon LC):

> The question whether there has been a total failure of consideration is not answered by considering whether there was any consideration sufficient to support a contract or purported contract. The test is whether or not the party claiming total failure of consideration has in fact received any part of the benefit bargained for under the contract or purported contract.

On the other hand, there has been an insistence that the failure of consideration be total. The law has traditionally not allowed recovery of money if the person who made the payment has received any part of the "benefit" provided for in the contract (Hunt v Silk (1804) 5 East 449; 102 ER 1142; Whincup v Hughes (1871), LR 6 CP 78). However, as the passage already quoted from Rover International Ltd demonstrates, the notion of total failure of consideration now looks to the benefit bargained for by the plaintiff rather than any benefit which might have been received in fact. Thus, in Rowland v Divall [1923] 2 KB 500, the plaintiff succeeded in an action for repayment of the purchase price of a car he had bought from the defendant, unaware that the car had been stolen before it came into the defendant's possession. The defendant resisted the claim with the argument that the plaintiff could not prove total failure of consideration because he had used the car for several months. The Court of Appeal, however, [383] dismissed this argument on the ground that the plaintiff had not received "any part of that which he contracted to receive – namely, the property and right to possession" ([1923] 2 KB at 507).

Similarly, in Rover International Ltd itself, the plaintiff succeeded in its claim for restitution of payments made to the defendant even though the defendant had performed some of its obligations under the contract. The plaintiff was to dub and distribute films provided to it by the defendant and receive a share of the box office receipts as its payment. The plaintiff was also required to make substantial payments to the defendant in advance of recovering its share of the receipts. The defendant supplied the films to the plaintiff and the plaintiff made the pre-payments before breaching the contract. The plaintiff was then able to recover the pre-payments on the basis that the delivery and possession of the films were not what the plaintiff had bargained for; the "relevant bargain" was the opportunity to earn a substantial share of the gross receipts.

In cases where consideration can be apportioned or where counter-restitution is relatively simple, insistence on total failure of consideration can be misleading or confusing. In the present case, for instance, it is relatively simple to relate the additional amounts paid by the appellants to the supposed obligation under cl 8(b) of the loan agreements. The appellants were told that they were required to pay withholding tax and the payments that they made were predicated on the fact that, by so doing, they were discharging their obligation. Such an approach is no different in effect from the cases under the old statutes of usury whereby a borrower could recover from the lender the excess interest which the lender was prohibited from stipulating or receiving (eg, Bosanquett v Dashwood (1734) Cases T Talbot 38; 25 ER 648).

In this case, the Bank must prove that the appellants are not entitled to restitution because they have received consideration for the payments which they seek to recover. It does not avail the Bank to argue that the appellants were provided with the loan moneys agreed. Indeed, the severability of the loan agreement into its relevant parts would seem to be accepted by the Bank for it submitted that the appellants' consideration for agreeing to pay the additional amounts under cl 8(b) was the Bank's agreement not to charge a higher interest rate. In circumstances where both parties have impliedly acknowledged that the consideration can be "broken up" or apportioned in this way, any rationale for adhering to the traditional rule requiring total failure of consideration disappears.

It might be said that to order restitution in the present case [384] would, in the absence of any other defences, confer something in the nature of a windfall upon the appellants at the expense of the respondent. This possible result flows from the fact that, having proved mistake, the appellants are prima facie entitled to recovery and the respondent bears the onus of proving why an order for restitution would be unjust. Given the conclusion we have reached upon the issue of mistake and consideration, we need not examine the appellants' argument, based upon Lord Denning's judgment in Kiriri Cotton Co Ltd v Dewani [1960] AC, at p 204, that the Bank was primarily responsible for the mistaken payment or the argument that the payment should be recoverable because it was made pursuant to a contractual obligation rendered void by statute. However, factors of the kind outlined in Kiriri reinforce our conclusion as to the purposes of the parties when entering the loan agreement. The respondent knew of the existence of s 261 and understood its potential reach even if it was not aware that it invalidated cl 8(b). It acknowledged drafting cl 8(b) with s 261 in mind. In circumstances where the party in the best position to order its affairs in the light of specialist advice has deliberately chosen to charge a particular interest rate and seek additional amounts by virtue of separate provision in the loan agreement, there is no injustice to that party in ordering recovery. Otherwise the policy of s 261 would be defeated.

Change of position

The respondent next submits that an order for restitution would be unjust because it has changed its position. The defence of change of position has not been expressly accepted in this country. In Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 164 CLR, at 673, the Court referred to the displacement of prima facie liability by "some adverse change of position by the recipient in good faith and in reliance on the payment". The issue did not, however, arise for decision in that case. In this country, conflicting views have been expressed …. In England, there is strong authority in favour of acceptance of the defence, … most importantly the recent decision of the House of Lords in [385] Lipkin Gorman v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 AC 548, at 58, 568, 578-580. In the last case, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Ackner and Lord Goff of Chieveley held that English law should recognize the defence, although they declined to define its scope. Text writers, such as Goff and Jones and Birks, also support the existence of the defence, particularly in view of the inflexibility of the related doctrine of estoppel, as evidenced by Avon CC v Howlett [1983] 1 WLR 605 where the Court of Appeal held that estoppel could not operate pro tanto. And, in Canada (Rural Municipality of Storthoaks v Mobil Oil Canada Ltd (1975) 55 DLR (3d) 1) and the United States (Restatement of the Law of Restitution, §69(1)), the defence of change of position has been recognized. Section 125(1) of the Property Law Act 1969 (WA) and s 94B of the Judicature Act 1908 (NZ) also provide for this defence.

If we accept the principle that payments made under a mistake of law should be prima facie recoverable, in the same way as payments made under a mistake of fact, a defence of change of position is necessary to ensure that enrichment of the recipient of the payment is prevented only in circumstances where it would be unjust. This does not mean that the concept of unjust enrichment needs to shift the primary focus of its attention from the moment of enrichment. From the point of view of the person making the payment, what happens after he or she has mistakenly paid over the money is irrelevant, for it is at that moment that the defendant is unjustly enriched. However, the defence of change of position is relevant to the enrichment of the defendant precisely because its central element is that the defendant has acted to his or her detriment on the faith of the receipt (Birks, op cit, p 410). In the jurisdictions in which it has been accepted (Canada and the United States), the defence operates in different ways but the common element in all cases is the requirement that the defendant point to expenditure or financial commitment which can be ascribed to the mistaken payment (Rural Municipality of Storthoaks v Mobil Oil Canada Ltd (1975) 55 DLR (3d), at 13; Grand Lodge, AOUW of Minnesota v Towne (1917) 161 NW 403, at 407). In Canada and in some United States decisions, the defendant has been required to point to specific expenditure being incurred because of the payment. Other cases in the United States (eg, Moritz v Horsman (1943) 9 NW 2d 868) allow a wider scope to the defence, such that a defendant can rely upon it even though he or she cannot precisely identify the expenditure [386] caused by the mistaken payments. In no jurisdiction, however, can a defendant resort to the defence of change of position where he or she has simply spent the money received on ordinary living expenses.

The difficulty lying in the path of acceptance or detailed explication of the defence in this case is that the facts which might give rise to a plea of the defence and thus require a decision by this Court were not adduced in the courts below. As mistake of law was only briefly raised by the appellants in the Federal Court, the respondent addressed no argument in support of the defence of change of position … The respondent should not be penalized for failing to provide evidence in support of the defence before the lower courts; it had no reason to fight the case on that basis. The case should be remitted to the trial judge for consideration of this issue.

In the result we would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Full Court of the Federal Court in so far as it relates to the appellants' appeal on the cross-claim and in lieu thereof allow that appeal to the Full Court and set aside the order of the trial judge made 14 June 1989. We would remit the case to the trial judge for determination, in accordance with the judgment of this Court, of the following issues: (a) whether the appellants should be permitted to call evidence on the issue of mistake; (b) whether the appellants paid the additional amounts because of their mistaken belief that their contractual arrangements with the Bank required the payments; (c) whether the Bank changed its position on the faith of receipt of the payments by the appellants.

[10.45] BRENNAN J: [393] … I respectfully agree with the reasons of their Honours in the majority in the present case for rejecting the distinction between a mistake of fact and a mistake of law as critical to the question whether the defendant has been unjustly enriched. But that is not to say that the distinction is immaterial to the question whether there has been a mistake of the kind which entitles the plaintiff to restitution. The distinction between mistakes of fact and mistakes of law is material to the question whether a payment is "voluntary" and, on that account, is irrecoverable …

[396] Regretfully, I am unable to accept the proposal in the majority judgment that payments made in satisfaction of an honest claim should be classified as "voluntary" and, on that account, be held to be irrecoverable … That is not to say that payments made under a mistake of law in satisfaction of an honest claim should not be protected. To the contrary, they should be protected but, in my respectful opinion, not by characterizing such payments as voluntary …

[398] If it be desirable to introduce a principle to protect the finality of payments made under a mistake of law in satisfaction of what, to the mind of the payee, is an honest claim of right, it is not satisfactory to press into service the concept of voluntary payments … [399] I would therefore state the principle thus:

It is a defence to a claim for restitution of money paid or property transferred under a mistake of law that the defendant honestly believed, when he learnt of the payment or transfer, that he was entitled to receive and retain the money or property.

[400] No question of counter-restitution arises in this case. By operation of s 261 of the Income Tax Assessment Act, the Bank was contractually bound without payment of the tax equivalent to renew the advances during successive interest periods throughout the availability period. If the respective borrowers are now entitled to restitution in the amount of the tax equivalent, the Bank has not been prejudiced: it simply performed its contractual obligation. What the Bank might have done had it not received payment of the tax equivalent in accordance with cl 8(b) is irrelevant to any issue.

[401] I would join in making the orders proposed by their Honours in the majority judgment, but I would limit the questions to be remitted to those identified in the proposed order as (a) and (b).

[DAWSON J delivered a separate judgment in which he agreed with the orders proposed by MASON CJ, DEANE, TOOHEY, GAUDRON and MCHUGH JJ.]

Appeal allowed.

Australian Financial Services and Leasing v Hills Industries

[10.47] Australian Financial Services and Leasing v Hills Industries [2014] HCA 14; (2014) 253 CLR 560 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from New South Wales Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: TCP was in financial difficulties and owed money to Hills and Bosch (the respondents). AFSL (the appellant) was induced by fraud on the part of TCP to make payments to Hills and Bosch to purchase equipment which AFSL intended to lease to TCP. In fact the equipment did not exist and the documentation was forged. Hills and Bosch received the payments in good faith, treated TCP's indebtedness to them as extinguished, discontinued litigation to recover the debts and recommenced trade with TCP. TCP later became insolvent and went into liquidation. After discovering the fraud, AFSL sought to recover the money paid to Hills and Bosch on the basis that it had been paid under a mistake of fact. Hills and Bosch claimed to have changed their positions on the faith of the payments. The primary judge held that AFSL was prima facie entitled to recover the amounts, since they were paid under a mistake of fact. Since Bosch had obtained judgments and garnishee orders which it relinquished on receipt of the payments, Bosch did make out the change of position defence. Hills, however, did not. The primary judge held that, given TCP's precarious financial position, Hills was unlikely to have been able to recover from TCP the amounts owed, so Hills failed to show any detriment arising from its change of position. The Court of Appeal held that both Hills and Bosch had made out the defence since each had lost a valuable opportunity to pursue its claims against TCP. AFSL appealed to the High Court of Australia.]

HAYNE, CRENNAN, KIEFEL, BELL and KEANE JJ:

AFSL's argument in this Court

[61] AFSL submitted that the position of each of Hills and Bosch was a case of bare receipt, not a receipt associated with or related to a valid legal transaction. The inquiry should be into the net enrichment of each recipient as a result of the receipt. On that basis, a court presented with a change of position defence based on the discharge of a debt, or loss of an opportunity to recover payment of a debt, must place a value on the debt which is repaid, or upon the lost opportunity to recover the debt, because the defence operates only pro tanto to the extent of that proven value. Otherwise, the recipient will remain unjustly enriched by the mistaken payment.

[62] AFSL submitted that, in this case, the debts owed by TCP to Hills and Bosch were worthless because TCP was unable to pay. The opportunities to recover payment by enforcing or securing repayment were therefore of minimal value. Accordingly, it was submitted that it would be unjust to permit Hills and Bosch to retain the whole of the mistaken payments and that the Court of Appeal erred in dispensing with the need for a recipient to prove, on the balance of probabilities, that its change of position caused any detriment and the extent of that detriment. Since Hills and Bosch did not part with any money in treating TCP's debts as discharged, they ought to be seen as having given away nothing of value.

The relevant inquiry: whether retention of moneys unconscionable

[65] The entitlement to recover money mistakenly paid to another in an action for money had and received has its roots in the decision of the Court of King's Bench led by Lord Mansfield in Moses v Macferlan (1760) 2 Burr 1005; 97 ER 676. Lord Mansfield expressly founded the action to recover money had and received to the use of the payer on the notion that retention of the money by the payee would be "against conscience" (at 1011, 680).

[66] Lord Mansfield explained that, in the case of mistaken payment, a plaintiff need not show special circumstances and may simply declare that the money was received by another to his use (at 1010, 679). His Lordship went on to say that, equally beneficially, a defendant "may go into every equitable defence, upon the general issue; he may claim every equitable allowance; … in short, he may defend himself by every thing which shews that the plaintiff, ex aequo et bono, is not intitled to the whole of his demand, or to any part of it". In Sadler v Evans (1766) 4 Burr 1984, 1986; 98 ER 34, 35 it was said that "[t]he defence is any equity that will rebut the action".

[67] Thus, in David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 379, it was said that payment caused by mistake is sufficient to give rise to a prima facie obligation on the part of the recipient to make restitution. Before that prima facie liability is displaced, the recipient must point to circumstances which would make an order for restitution unjust. In words which echo those of Lord Mansfield in Moses v Macferlan, it was said that, in order to show that retention of the payment is not unjust, the recipient is entitled to raise "by way of answer any matter or circumstance".

[68] There can be no denying the equitable roots of the principle by which a claim for restitution of money had and received to the use of the payer is to be determined. In Dale v Sollet (1767) 4 Burr 2133, 2134; 98 ER 112, 113 Lord Mansfield said of the action: "This is an action for money had and received to the plaintiff's use. The plaintiff can recover no more than he is in conscience and equity entitled to". In Clarke v Shee (1774) 1 Cowp 197, 199-200; 98 ER 1041, 1042, his Lordship referred to the action as "a liberal action in the nature of a bill in equity; and if, under the circumstances of the case, it appears that the defendant cannot in conscience retain what is the subject matter of it, the plaintiff may well support this action".

[69] In Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 516 at [100], Gummow J explained that the "equitable notions" of which Lord Mansfield wrote have been absorbed into the "fabric of the common law" right of action for money had and received. In this regard, it is to be noted that any reference to equitable notions does not invite a balancing of competing equities as between the parties, based on considerations such as fault. The question here is whether it would be inequitable in all the circumstances to require Hills and Bosch to make restitution. The answer to that question is not at large, but neither is it simply a measure of the monetary extent to which the recipient remains enriched by the receipt at the time of demand for repayment.

[70] In the United States, in Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co v Florida 295 US 301 at 309 (1935), Cardozo J said:

> The claimant to prevail must show that the money was received in such circumstances that the possessor will give offense to equity and good conscience if permitted to retain it.

[71] The continuing influence of Lord Mansfield's view that the cause of action for money had and received depends on legal rules framed by reference to considerations of good conscience is also apparent in the judgment of Lord Wright in Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32 at 63 and in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Great-West Life & Annuity Insurance Co v Knudson 534 US 204 at 213-214 (2002).

[72] In Lipkin Gorman (a firm) v Karpnale Ltd [1991] 2 AC 548 at 580, Lord Goff of Chieveley stated that a defendant may rely upon a defence of change of position whenever "it would be inequitable in all the circumstances to require him to make restitution". Lord Templeman referred, with evident approval, to the observations of Lord Wright in Fibrosa in a way which suggests that Lord Templeman identified an unjust enrichment as a benefit that it would be against "conscience" to retain: [1991] 2 AC 548 at 559.

[73] Lipkin Gorman also proceeded upon the basis that English law had accepted unjust enrichment as a legal principle to be applied as a ground for liability. By reference to what was said by Lord Goff in that case respecting the defence of change of position ([1991] 2 AC 548 at 578), it would appear that the principle of unjust enrichment may have been intended to operate more widely than the action for money had and received, which requires the presence of vitiating factors such as mistake. In David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 378, the submission that unjust enrichment was a definitive legal principle was rejected. That position has since been maintained consistently by this Court: Farah Constructions Pty Ltd v Say-Dee Pty Ltd (2007) 230 CLR 89 at [151]; Lumbers v W Cook Builders Pty Ltd (In liq) (2008) 232 CLR 635 at [85]; Friend v Brooker (2009) 239 CLR 129 at [7]; Bofinger v Kingsway Group Ltd (2009) 239 CLR 269 at [86]. In Friend v Brooker (2009) 239 CLR 129 at [7], it was said that the concept of unjust enrichment was not a principle supplying a sufficient premise for direct application in a particular case. In Farah Constructions Pty Ltd v Say-Dee Pty Ltd (2007) 230 CLR 89 at [151], it was commented that there was potential for unjust enrichment as a principle to distort equitable doctrine and to generate new fictions. In Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at [74], Gummow J pointed out that:

> [S]ubstance and dynamism may be restricted by dogma. In turn, the dogma will tend to generate new fictions in order to retain support for its thesis. It also may distort well settled > principles in other fields, including those respecting equitable doctrines and remedies, so that they answer the newly mandated order of things. Then various theories will compete, each to deny the others.

[74] More recently, Equuscorp Pty Ltd v Haxton (2012) 246 CLR 498 at [30] confirmed that unjust enrichment does not found or reflect any "all-embracing theory of restitutionary rights and remedies" (Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 516 at [72] per Gummow J). That case identified unconscionability as relevant and as derived from general equitable notions which find expression in the action for money had and received: (2012) 246 CLR 498 at [32]. As this Court acknowledged in Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd v Westpac Banking Corporation (1988) 164 CLR 662 at 673, "contemporary legal principles of restitution or unjust enrichment can be equated with seminal equitable notions of good conscience".

[75] In Australia, the equitable roots of the action for money had and received were early recognised in Campbell v Kitchen & Sons Ltd (1910) 12 CLR 515. There, Barton J observed (at 531) that recovery "depends largely on the question whether it is equitable for the plaintiff to demand or for the defendant to retain the money". In National Commercial Banking Corporation of Australia Ltd v Batty (1986) 160 CLR 251 at 268, Gibbs CJ said:

> Whether the action is based on an implied promise to pay, or on a principle designed to prevent unjust enrichment, the emphasis on justice and equity in both old and modern authority on this subject supports the view that the action will not lie unless the defendant in justice and equity ought to pay the money to the plaintiff.

[76] This is not to suggest that a subjective evaluation of the justice of the case is either necessary or appropriate. The issues of conscience which fall to be resolved assume a conscience "properly formed and instructed" by established equitable principles and doctrines: Australian Broadcasting Corporation v Lenah Game Meats Pty Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 199 at [45]. As was said in Kakavas v Crown Melbourne Ltd [2013] HCA 25 at [16], "[t]he conscience spoken of here is a construct of values and standards against which the conduct of 'suitors' – not only defendants – is to be judged" (Gummow, Change and Continuity: Statute, Equity, and Federalism (1999) at 44-51).

Change of position and detrimental reliance

[77] As Gummow J, writing extrajudicially, has said ("Moses v Macferlan: 250 years on" (2010) 84 Australian Law Journal 756 at 760) "[I]t is important to appreciate that 'change of position' is a species of the genus 'inequitable', not a synonym for it." One category of case in which it would be inequitable to require a recipient to repay is where the recipient has so far altered its position in relation to the receipt that it would be a detriment to it if it were now required to repay.

[78] The approach argued by AFSL does not involve an inquiry as to whether it would be inequitable to require the recipient to repay. Instead, AFSL's approach focuses upon the extent to which Hills and Bosch have been "disenriched" subsequent to the receipt (Birks, Unjust Enrichment, 2nd ed (2005), pp 208-212. See also Burrows, The Law of Restitution, 3rd ed (2011), pp 526-527). This approach seeks to give effect to an understanding of unjust enrichment as a principle of direct application, which operates by measuring the extent of enrichment or, where a defence of change of position is invoked, the extent of disenrichment subsequent to that receipt. Such a "principle" does not govern the resolution of this case because the concept of unjust enrichment is not the basis of restitutionary relief in Australian law. The principle of disenrichment, like that of unjust enrichment, is inconsistent with the law of restitution as it has developed in Australia. Disenrichment operates as a mathematical rule whereas the inquiry undertaken in relation to restitutionary relief in Australia is directed to who should properly bear the loss and why. That inquiry is conducted by reference to equitable principles.

[79] In §65 of the Restatement of the Law Third, Restitution and Unjust Enrichment, under the rubric "Change of Position", the American Law Institute states:

> If receipt of a benefit has led a recipient without notice to change position in such manner that an obligation to make restitution of the original benefit would be inequitable to the recipient, the recipient's liability in restitution is to that extent reduced.

[80] In Lipkin Gorman [1991] 2 AC 548 at 579, Lord Goff used similar language in explaining the basis of the change of position defence:

> [W]here an innocent defendant's position is so changed that he will suffer an injustice if called upon to repay or to repay in full, the injustice of requiring him so to repay outweighs the injustice of denying the plaintiff restitution.

[81] In David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 385, reference was made to what was said in Lipkin Gorman concerning the defence. It was observed that in Lipkin Gorman, Lord Bridge of Harwich, Lord Ackner and Lord Goff said that the defence should be recognised by English law but declined to define its scope. However, in David Securities the "central element" of the defence was identified as being "that the defendant has acted to his or her detriment on the faith of the receipt": Birks, An Introduction to the Law of Restitution (1989), p 410 (emphasis in original). Whether English cases subsequent to Lipkin Gorman have taken a wider view of the defence, one which eschews a requirement of detrimental reliance in favour of a mere causal link (Scottish Equitable Plc v Derby [2001] 3 All ER 818; Commerzbank AG v Price-Jones [2003] EWCA Civ 1663), cannot alter what was said in David Securities regarding the defence. Whether the conclusion reached in the English cases, including Lipkin Gorman, is different from that which would be reached by reference to equitable principles is a moot point. In any event, consistently with an inquiry as to whether it is unconscionable for the recipient to retain the moneys, it is necessary in cases such as the present to consider what was done by the recipient in reliance upon the receipt.

[82] In David Securities, in the passage in which reference is made to a recipient acting on the faith of the receipt, it was said that a common element in cases in Canada and the United States, where the defence has been accepted, is that it is necessary that the defendant point to "expenditure or financial commitment" which can be ascribed to the mistaken payment: Rural Municipality of Storthoaks v Mobil Oil Canada Ltd [1976] 2 SCR 147 at 164; Grand Lodge, AOUW of Minnesota v Towne 161 North Western Reporter 403 at 407 (1917). The passage does not provide precise direction as to the resolution of the issue in this case, but it is tolerably clear that their Honours did not suggest that the defence was available only to a recipient who was able to demonstrate monetary disenrichment on the faith of the mistaken payment.

[83] AFSL argued that it is necessary and appropriate to assess, forensically, the value of TCP's debts to Hills and Bosch, or their prospects of recovery, in order to measure the extent to which they remained enriched by AFSL's mistaken payments. AFSL's argument in this regard relied upon cases such as Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 174 CLR 64, especially at 83-84, 89-94, 100-104, 112-113, 118-126, 138, 145-147, 157-158 and Sellars v Adelaide Petroleum NL (1994) 179 CLR 332 at 349-350, 368. However, these cases concerned the assessment of damages by way of compensation for breach of contract or statutory or common law norms of conduct predicated upon proof of loss by reason of the breach. Here, Hills and Bosch had done AFSL no wrong that gave rise to an obligation to compensate AFSL for the loss suffered by it as a result. As Lord Goff observed in Lipkin Gorman [1991] 2 AC 548 at 578, restitutionary claims are not founded upon a wrong done to the payer.

[84] More importantly, under Australian law, a mathematical assessment of enduring economic benefit does not determine the availability of restitutionary remedies. The equitable doctrine which protects expectations, with which the notion of "detriment" is associated, is not concerned with loss caused by a wrong or a breach of promise (Crabb v Arun District Council [1976] Ch 179 at 198-199; Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 415, 429). As Deane J observed in Commonwealth v Verwayen (at 448), "[e]quity has never adopted the approach that relief should be framed on the basis that the only relevant detriment … is that which is compensable by an award of monetary damages". The equitable doctrine concerning detriment is concerned with the consequences that would enure to the disadvantage of a person who has been induced to change his or her position if the state of affairs so brought about were to be altered by the reversal of the assumption on which the change of position occurred (Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406 at 437; Riches v Hogben [1985] 2 Qd R 292 at 300-302; Giumelli v Giumelli (1999) 196 CLR 101 at [35]-[44]; Delaforce v Simpson-Cook (2010) 78 NSWLR 483 at [5], [41]-[42]). On this view, the injustice which precludes such a result lies in the disadvantage which would result to the recipient if the payer were to be permitted to recover payments as mistakenly made where they have been applied by the recipient.

[85] This view accords with the understanding of detrimental reliance sufficient to ground an estoppel, as explained in Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641 at 674-675 by Dixon J. The fundamental purpose of an estoppel is to provide protection against the detriment which would flow from a party's change of position if the assumption which led to it were deserted: Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641 at 674; Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 410.

[86] While it may be accepted that estoppel affords a level of protection to expectations different from that afforded by the change of position defence (Lipkin Gorman [1991] 2 AC 548 at 579), and estoppel is also concerned with the manner in which expectations are created, both estoppel and the defence are grounded in that body of equitable doctrine that prevents the unconscientious assertion of what are said to be legal rights (Norman v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1963) 109 CLR 9 at 33; Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 415, 429, 445; cf Crabb v Arun District Council [1976] Ch 179 at 195, 198-199; Riches v Hogben [1985] 2 Qd R 292 at 300-302). In Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 641 at 674-675, Dixon J explained the precise ground on which estoppel precludes an otherwise good claim. Although lengthy, it is worthwhile setting his Honour's explanation out in full:

> [I]t is often said simply that the party asserting the estoppel must have been induced to act to his detriment. Although substantially such a statement is correct and leads to no misunderstanding, it does not bring out clearly the basal purpose of the doctrine. That purpose is to avoid or prevent a detriment to the party asserting the estoppel by compelling the opposite party to adhere to the assumption upon which the former acted or abstained from acting. This means that the real detriment or harm from which the law seeks to give protection is that which would flow from the change of position if the assumption were deserted that led to it. So long as the assumption is adhered to, the party who altered his situation upon the faith of it cannot complain. His complaint is that when afterwards the other party makes a different state of affairs the basis of an assertion of right against him then, if it is allowed, his own original change of position will operate as a detriment. His action or inaction must be such that, if the assumption upon which he proceeded were shown to be wrong and an inconsistent state of affairs were accepted as the foundation of the rights and duties of himself and the opposite party, the consequence would be to make his original act or failure to act a source of prejudice.

[87] It will be observed that Dixon J saw that a party's position, which had changed on the basis of an assumed state of affairs that is now sought to be altered, provided the necessary detriment. The passage makes clear that the detriment must flow from reliance upon that assumption (Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 415), when that assumption is to be departed from.

[88] Detriment has not been considered to be a narrow or technical concept in connection with estoppel. So long as it is substantial, it need not consist of expenditure of money or other quantifiable financial detriment, as Robert Walker LJ observed in Gillett v Holt [2001] Ch 210 at 232-233. His Lordship went on to say that the requirement of detriment must be approached as "part of a broad inquiry as to whether repudiation of an assurance is or is not unconscionable in all the circumstances". In the context of mistaken payments, the question is whether it would be unconscionable for a recipient who has changed its position on the faith of the receipt to be required to repay.

[89] Campbell v Kitchen & Sons Ltd (1910) 12 CLR 515 is an example of a case where the continuance of an assumed state of affairs in business over a period of time and the disruption which would be caused if one or more payments were to be corrected were held to be determinative. Griffith CJ held (at 525) that it would be inequitable to require repayment from the defendant, which had, over a long time, received mistaken payments on a regular basis and took them into account in estimating and directing annual profits. His Honour dismissed the plaintiff's action for money had and received.

[90] In London and River Plate Bank Ltd v Bank of Liverpool Ltd [1896] 1 QB 7 at 11-12, Mathew J referred to the detrimental effect of the passage of time in the context of business:

> A holder of a bill cannot possibly fail to have his position affected if there be any interval of time during which he holds the money as his own, or spends it as his own, and if he is subsequently sought to be made responsible to hand it back. It may be that no legal right may be compromised by reason of the payment … but even in such a case it is manifest that the position of a man of business may be most seriously compromised, even by the delay of a day.

[91] In Lipkin Gorman [1991] 2 AC 548 at 578-579, Lord Goff referred to London and River Plate Bank as, on one possible view, an example of the change of position defence. These considerations have also, as Meagher JA observed below ([2012] NSWCA 380, [211]), influenced courts in the United States in decisions such as Stephens v Board of Education of Brooklyn 79 NY 183 at 186-188 (1879) and Banque Worms v BankAmerica International 570 NE (2d) 189 (1990).

[92] What was said in London and River Plate Bank may be understood to refer to the concern which has often been expressed in decisions of the courts about the finality of transactions and the security of receipts. In Kleinwort Benson Ltd v Lincoln City Council [1999] 2 AC 349 at 382, 384, Lord Goff suggested that defences such as change of position are concerned to protect the stability or finality of transactions. It may perhaps be more accurate to say that, where the defence of change of position is made out, finality is the result that is achieved. But the desirability of "certainty of receipts" cannot itself dictate the outcome of the inquiry respecting the actions taken by a recipient where a mistaken payment is made in a commercial context. It is necessary to recall that the action for money had and received is itself a qualification upon what the law otherwise regards as the overriding importance attached to the security of actual receipts (as observed by Gummow J in "Moses v Macfarlan: 250 years on" (2010) 84 Australian Law Journal 756 at 757).

[93] Here, Hills and Bosch not only continued to trade on the basis of the payments received, they discharged TCP's debts and no longer sought to recover them. In the Restatement of the Law Third, Restitution and Unjust Enrichment (2010), §65, Comment e, the American Law Institute acknowledges forbearance as relevant to the defence of change of position.

The disadvantage which Hills and Bosch would suffer

[94] AFSL sought to rely upon this Court's decision in Australia and New Zealand Banking Group (1988) 164 CLR 662, where a distinction was drawn between a case in which the change of position was constituted by a payment that had involved a true parting with money, and a case in which there was no physical payment but a credit entry had been made in the books of the recipient for or on behalf of another party. In that context, it was said (at 674) that:

> the courts will pay regard to the substance rather than to the form of what has occurred. Thus, the cases indicate that a mere book entry which has not been communicated to the third party or which can be reversed without affecting the substance of transactions or relationships will ordinarily not suffice.

[95] It is not accurate to characterise the payments to Hills and Bosch as "bare receipts" or "mere book entries", the amount of which affords a measure of unjust enrichment. It is an unattractive aspect of the approach urged by AFSL that a recipient who honestly appropriates a payment to discharge a debt owed to it is in the same position, so far as the change of position defence is concerned, as a recipient who receives a payment by way of advance against the supply of goods in the future. Even if it were accepted that AFSL neither entertained, nor expressed, an intention to discharge TCP's debts to Hills and Bosch, it is nevertheless the case that, as between each of Hills and Bosch on the one hand and TCP on the other, the payments were made and applied to discharge TCP's indebtedness to Hills and Bosch. Even if the discharges were legally reversible for some reason, such as TCP's fraud against AFSL, the consequence of such a reversal would be that Hills and Bosch would become unpaid creditors of TCP in its liquidation. In a practical sense, the receipts had consequences for Hills and Bosch beyond the simple fact of the receipt and these consequences were irreversible as a practical matter of business. Moreover, neither Hills nor Bosch was able to reverse the consequences of its decision to continue trading with TCP and the commercial risks that decision entailed.

[96] In the circumstances of this case, the disadvantages which would enure to Hills and Bosch if they were required to repay the moneys that each received from AFSL are such that it would be inequitable to require them to do so.

[97] It will be observed that these conclusions are not reached by first attempting to state comprehensively what is encompassed by the notion of a change of position, or the circumstances in which a defence described in that way is available to meet a claim for recovery of money paid under mistake. As has been explained, to apply reasoning of that kind (McGinty v Western Australia (1996) 186 CLR 140 at 232 per McHugh J. See also Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 516 at [73] per Gummow J) would be sharply at odds with the established doctrine and unchallenged decisions of this Court in this area (See, eg, Farah Constructions Pty Ltd v Say-Dee Pty Ltd (2007) 230 CLR 89 at [151] per Gleeson CJ, Gummow, Callinan, Heydon and Crennan JJ; Lumbers v W Cook Builders Pty Ltd (In liq) (2008) 232 CLR 635 at [75]-[78] per Gummow, Hayne, Crennan and Kiefel JJ; Friend v Brooker (2009) 239 CLR 129 at [47] per French CJ, Gummow, Hayne and Bell JJ; Bofinger v Kingsway Group Ltd (2009) 239 CLR 269 at [90]-[91] per Gummow, Hayne, Heydon, Kiefel and Bell JJ).

[98] Attempts to describe the defence comprehensively, or to chart its metes and bounds, are apt to mislead by distracting attention from the content of the principle to the manner of its expression. Not only that, as Deane J rightly observed in Commonwealth v Verwayen (1990) 170 CLR 394 at 443:

> It is undesirable to seek to define exhaustively and in the abstract the content or operation of any general legal doctrine. Inevitably, there will be unforeseen and exceptional cases. Ordinarily, there will be borderline areas in which the interaction of the doctrine with other doctrines will be uncertain. Most important, it is part of the genius of the common law that development on a case-by-case basis enables its adaptation to meet changing circumstances and demands.

[FRENCH CJ and GAGELER J in separate judgments agreed that the appeal should be dismissed. In the course of his judgment GAGELER J made the following statements:]

> [157] The defence of change of position is established where a defendant proves the existence of two conditions. The first condition is that the defendant has acted (that is, done something the defendant would not otherwise have done) or refrained from acting (that is, not done something the defendant would otherwise have done) in good faith on the assumption that the defendant was entitled to deal with the payment which the defendant received. The defendant need not for the purpose of meeting this condition have acted on knowledge derived from the payer (Port of Brisbane Corporation v ANZ Securities Ltd (No 2) [2003] 2 Qd R 661 at [15]; Citigroup Pty Ltd v National Australia Bank Ltd (2012) 82 NSWLR 391 at [4]-[6]). Whether the defendant needs also to have acted reasonably is a question which does not now arise for determination. The second condition is that, by reason of having so acted or refrained from acting, the defendant would be placed in a worse position if ordered to make restitution of the payment than if the defendant had not received the payment at all. The detriment constituted by that difference in position need not, in every case, be financial or pecuniary. If financial or pecuniary, it need not, in every case, be established with precision.

> It can be an opportunity forgone (eg, Palmer v Blue Circle Southern Cement Ltd (1999) 48 NSWLR 318). It must, in every case, be shown by the defendant to be substantial.
>
> [158] Where the defence is so established, the prima facie entitlement of the defendant is to maintain the assumption on which the defendant acted and, on that basis, to retain the whole of the payment. That entitlement is qualified to the extent that retention of the whole of the payment can be shown to be disproportionate to the degree of the detriment. Where the detriment is financial or pecuniary, can be quantified, and is less than the amount received, the entitlement of the defendant to retain the payment is reduced pro tanto.

Appeal dismissed.

Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour

[10.50] Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32 (House of Lords) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: An English company, the respondent, agreed to sell, and a Polish company, the appellant, agreed to buy, machinery for £4,800 of which one third was to be paid with the order. On 18 July 1939, the appellant paid to the respondent £1,000 on account of the initial payment of £1,600. On 1 September 1939, Germany invaded Poland and on 3 September, Britain declared war on Germany. On 7 September, the appellant's agents in England wrote to the respondent claiming the return of the £1,000, but the respondent refused to comply with this request, stating that considerable work had been done on the machinery. The appellant ultimately brought action for the return of the £1,000. The substantial defence was that the contract had been frustrated by the German occupation of Poland and that in these circumstances, the appellant had no right to the return of the £1,000.

Tucker J dismissed the action, and the Court of Appeal affirmed his decision. An appeal was brought to the House of Lords.]

VISCOUNT SIMON LC: [41] [T]he only other issue to be determined [is] whether, when this contract became frustrated, the appellants could … claim back from the respondents the £1,000 which they had paid when placing the order … MacKinnon LJ, in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, said ([1942] 1 KB 12 at 27):

> Tucker J held that having regard to the principle laid down in Chandler v Webster [1904] 1 KB 493, and other like cases, this claim must fail. We think he was right, and, further, that that principle must equally bind this court to reject the claim. Whether the principle can be overruled is a matter that can only concern the House of Lords.

This alleged principle is to the effect that where a contract has [42] been frustrated by such a supervening event as releases from further performance, "the loss lies where it falls", with the result that sums paid or rights accrued before that event are not to be surrendered, but all obligations falling due for performance after that event are discharged. This proposition, whether right or wrong, first appears, not in Chandler v Webster, but in Blakeley v Muller & Co [1903] 2 KB 760n …

If we are to approach this problem anew, it must be premised that the first matter to be considered is always the terms of the particular contract. If, for example, the contract is "divisible" in the sense that a sum is to be paid over in respect of completion of a defined portion of the work, it may well be that the sum is not returnable if completion of the whole work is frustrated. If the contract itself on its true construction stipulates for a particular result which is to follow in regard to money already paid, should frustration [43] afterwards occur, this governs the matter. The ancient and firmly established rule that freight paid in advance is not returned if the completion of the voyage is frustrated (Byrne v Schiller (1871) LR 6 Ex 319), should, I think be regarded as a stipulation introduced into such contracts by custom, and not as the result of applying some abstract principle. And so, a fortiori, if there is a stipulation that the prepayment is "out and out". To take an example, not from commerce, but from sport, the cricket spectator who pays for admission to see a match cannot recover the entrance money on the ground that rain has prevented play if, expressly or by proper implication, the bargain with him is that no money will be returned … The question now to be determined is whether, in the absence of a term in the contract dealing with the matter, the rule which is commonly called the rule in Chandler v Webster should be affirmed … [45] The locus classicus for the view which has hitherto prevailed is to be found in the judgment of Collins MR in Chandler v Webster … When his judgment is studied, however, one cannot but be impressed by the circumstance that he regarded the proposition that money in such cases could not be recovered back as flowing from the decision in Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B & S 826; 122 ER 309. Taylor v Caldwell, however, was not a case in which any question arose whether money could be recovered back, for there had been no payment in advance, and there is nothing in the judgment of Blackburn J, which, at any rate in terms, affirms the general proposition that "the loss lies where it falls". The application by Collins MR of Taylor v Caldwell to the actual problem with which he had to deal in Chandler v Webster, at 499, deserves closer examination …

[46] It appears to me that the reasoning in this crucial passage is open to two criticisms:

(a) The claim of a party, who has paid money under a contract, to get the money back, on the ground that the consideration for which he paid it has totally failed, is not based on any provision contained in the contract, but arises because, in the circumstances that have happened, the law gives a remedy in quasi-contract to the party who has not got that for which he bargained. It is a claim to recover money to which the defendant has no further right because in the circumstances that have happened the money must be regarded as received to the plaintiffs' use. It is true that the effect of frustration is that, while the contract can no further be performed, "it remains a perfectly good contract up to that point, and everything previously done in pursuance of it must be treated as rightly done", but it by no means follows that the situation existing at the moment of frustration is one which leaves the party that has paid money and has not received the stipulated consideration without any remedy. To claim the return of money paid on the ground of total [47] failure of consideration is not to vary the terms of the contract in any way. The claim arises not because the right to be repaid is one of the stipulated conditions of the contract, but because, in the circumstances that have happened, the law gives the remedy. It is the failure to distinguish between the action of assumpsit for money had and received in a case where the consideration has wholly failed, and an action on the contract itself, which explains the mistake which I think has been made in applying English law to this subject matter. Thus, in Blakeley v Muller & Co, Lord Alverstone CJ said: "I agree that Taylor v Caldwell applies, but the consequence of that decision is that neither party here could have sued on the contract in respect of anything which was to be done under it after the procession had been abandoned." That is true enough, but it does not follow that because the plaintiff cannot sue "on the contract" he cannot sue dehors the contract for the recovery of a payment in respect of which consideration has failed. In the same case, Wills J relied on Appleby v Myers (1867) LR 2 CP 651, where a contract was made for the erection by A of machinery on the premises of B, to be paid for on completion. There was no prepayment and in the course of the work the premises were destroyed by fire. It was held that both parties were excused from further performance, and that no liability accrued on either side, but the liability referred to was liability under the contract, and the learned judge seems to have thought that no action to recover money in such circumstances as the present could be conceived of unless there was a term of the contract, express or implied, which so provided. Once it is realised that the action to recover money for a consideration that has wholly failed rests, not on a contractual bargain between the parties, but, as Lord Sumner said in Sinclair v Brougham [1914] AC 398 at 452, "upon a notional or imputed promise to repay", or (if it is preferred to omit reference to a fictitious promise) upon an obligation to repay arising from the circumstances, the difficulty in the way of holding that a prepayment made under a contract which has been frustrated can be recovered back appears to me to disappear.

[T]here is, no doubt, a distinction between cases in which a contract is "wiped out altogether", for example, because it is void as being illegal from the start or as being due to fraud which the innocent party has [48] elected to treat as avoiding the contract, and cases in which intervening impossibility "only releases the parties from further performance of the contract". But does the distinction between these two classes of case justify the deduction of Collins MR that "the doctrine of failure of consideration does not apply" where the contract remains a perfectly good contract up to the date of frustration? This conclusion seems to be derived from the view that, if the contract remains good and valid up to the moment of frustration, money which has already been paid under it cannot be regarded as having been paid for a consideration which has wholly failed. The party that has paid the money has had the advantage, whatever it may be worth, of the promise of the other party. That is true, but it is necessary to draw a distinction. In English law, an enforceable contract may be formed by an exchange of a promise for a promise, or by the exchange of a promise for an act – I am excluding contracts under seal – and thus, in the law relating to the formation of contract, the promise to do a thing may often be the consideration, but when one is considering the law of failure of consideration and of the quasi-contractual right to recover money on that ground, it is, generally speaking, not the promise which is referred to as the consideration, but the performance of the promise. The money was paid to secure performance and, if performance fails the inducement which brought about the payment is not fulfilled.

If this were not so, there could never be any recovery of money, for failure of consideration, by the payer of the money in return for a promise of future performance, yet there are endless examples which show that money can be recovered, as for a complete failure of consideration, in cases where the promise was given but could not be fulfilled … The conclusion is that the rule in Chandler v Webster is wrong, and that the appellants can recover their £1,000.

While this result obviates the harshness with which the previous view in some instances treated the party who had made a prepayment, it cannot be regarded as dealing fairly between the parties in all cases, and must sometimes have the result of leaving the recipient who has to return the money at a grave disadvantage. He may have incurred expenses in connection with the partial carrying out of the contract which are equivalent, or more than equivalent, to the money which he prudently stipulated should be prepaid, but which he now has to return for reasons which are no fault of his. He may have to repay the money, though he has executed almost the whole of the contractual work, which will be left on his hands. These results follow from the fact that the English common law does not undertake to apportion a prepaid sum in such circumstances….

See further Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344, 355, extracted at [27.180], where Mason CJ notes that the decision in the Fibrosa case correctly reflects the law in Australia, and the High Court explores the requirement that failure of consideration must be total.

Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia

[10.55] Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd [2001] HCA 68; (2001) 208 CLR 516 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: The Business Franchise Licences (Tobacco) Act 1987 (NSW) required tobacco retailers and wholesalers to pay a "licence fee" calculated by reference to the value of tobacco sold. The appellants (tobacco retailers) purchased tobacco products from the respondent (a tobacco wholesaler) on terms that required the appellants to pay the wholesale price of the goods plus the "tobacco licence fee", which was separately identified in invoices issued by the respondent. The appellants passed this cost on to consumers by including it in their retail prices. In Ha v New South Wales (1997) 189 CLR 465, the High Court of Australia held that the tobacco licence fee was an excise duty, which was invalid under s 90 of the Commonwealth Constitution. The appellants sought to recover from the respondent the amounts they had paid to the respondent as "tobacco licence fees", but which the respondent was not required to pay to the revenue authorities as a result of the Ha decision. The appellants' claim failed at first instance and before the Full Federal Court.]

GLEESON CJ, GAUDRON and HAYNE JJ: [527] Although an attempt was made by the appellants to invoke an implied agreement under which they could claim repayment of any unpaid tax, it was artificial and unconvincing. The parties made no agreement, express or implied, about what was to happen if the tax was held to be invalid. If there is here a right to enforce repayment upon the basis of a failure of consideration, it is because, in the circumstances, the law imposes upon the respondent an obligation to make just restitution for a benefit derived at the expense of the appellants (Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 257, per Deane J). If there had been a total failure of consideration, because, for example, there had been a prepayment for goods which were never delivered, the respondent's duty to make restitution would have been clear. But there are two questions. The first is whether there has been a failure of a severable part of the consideration. The second is whether, in the absence of restitution, the respondent will retain money at the expense of the appellants. The second problem arises because the appellants have passed on the burden of the tax. According to the respondent, if the respondent has been enriched, then that has been at the expense, not of the appellants, but of the customers of the appellants, and justice does not require it to make restitution to the appellants.

It accords with the basis of dealing, and contractual arrangements, between the appellants and the respondent to regard that part of the net total amount of each invoice referable to the "tobacco licence fees" as a severable part of the consideration, which has failed. There is no conceptual objection to this. For the reasons already given, the tax component of the net total wholesale cost was treated as a distinct and [528] separate element by the parties. It was externally imposed. It was not agreed by negotiation. It was not like the discounts, which might differ between retailers, just as the wholesale list price would vary from time to time in accordance with market conditions. To permit recovery of the tax component would not result in confusion between rights of compensation and restitution, or between enforcing a contract and claiming a right by reason of events which have occurred in relation to a contract (cf Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32; Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344).

It then becomes necessary to consider the respondent's objection based upon the fact that, at least in a practical sense, the burden of the tax has been passed on by the appellants to their customers. The factual basis of this objection cannot be refuted. It is in the nature of an indirect tax that it enters into the cost of the goods the subject of the tax and is borne by the consumers of the goods. The conclusion that the character of the tax was that of a tax on tobacco rather than a personal tax on wholesalers and retailers was an important part of the reasoning leading to the decision that it was a duty of excise.

Although the factual basis of the objection is correct, it is necessary to be clear as to its legal frame of reference. It cannot be simply an assertion that the appellants lack merit. In that respect, their position is no worse than that of the respondent. It was put on the basis that any enrichment of the respondent is not at the expense of the appellants and that, in consequence, the equitable foundation for a claim for restitution does not exist. But this, in turn, assumes that, in the circumstances of a case such as the present, it would only be unconscionable of the respondent to withhold repayment of the amounts referable to the tax if the appellants, for their part, were ultimately left impoverished to that extent. It is clear that, in a direct and immediate sense, the payments were made by the appellants, out of their own funds, to the respondent. They did not pay the amounts as agents, on behalf of third parties. The consumers of cigarettes, in an economic sense, bore the burden of the tax, but they were never legally liable as taxpayers. The appellants themselves were taxpayers under the licensing scheme, although if the respondent paid, or became liable to pay, tax in respect of particular tobacco products, the value of those products was disregarded in calculating the appellants' licence fees. And the respondent passed the tax on to the appellants, not merely in an economic sense, but also by the express terms of the dealings between the parties. They dealt on the basis that the appellants would pay to the respondent an amount equal to that part of the respondent's "tobacco licence fees" referable to the products sold to the appellants.

There having been a failure of a distinct and severable part of the consideration for the net total payments made by the appellants to the [529] respondent, then, as between the parties to the payments, the respondent has no right to retain the amounts in question. If the tobacco products in question remained unsold by the appellants at the time the claims for repayment arose for determination, the respondent's obligation to make restitution would be clear. Why does it make a difference to the conscientiousness of the respondent's retention of the moneys that the products were sold by the appellants at prices that had the practical effect of recouping the expense they bore in paying the "tobacco licence fees"? The holders of licences were those upon whom the tax was imposed, but they were always intended to pass the tax on to the consumers. As between the licensees, it was the appellants who incurred the expense, in that they were charged, and paid, a severable amount for the purpose of the tax.

The appellants were entitled to succeed in their claim for money had and received by the respondent to the use of the appellants.

[10.60] GUMMOW J: [539] The appellants rely upon the principle encapsulated by Viscount Haldane LC in Royal Bank of Canada v The King [1913] AC 283, 296 …:

> It is a well-established principle of the English common law that when money has been received by one person which in justice and equity belongs to another, under circumstances which render the receipt of it a receipt by the defendant to the use of the plaintiff, the latter may recover as for money had and received to his use. The principle extends to cases where the money has been paid for a consideration that has failed.

[540] [T]he identification of a satisfactory doctrinal basis for the action is a more difficult matter. The common money counts, particularly after the decisions of Lord Mansfield, have occupied an uneasy position in the legal system between the three great sources of obligation in private law, tort, contract and trust.

Unjust enrichment theory

[10.65] Writing extrajudicially, Justice Paul Finn has said of the concept of "unjust enrichment" that "[a]t a quite visceral level it provides an important catalyst to further legal inquiry", particularly as "a unifying legal concept" which "explains why the law recognises an obligation to make restitution in particular contexts" (Finn, "Equitable Doctrine and Discretion in Remedies", in Cornish et al (eds), Restitution: Past, Present and Future (1998) 251, p 251). The conventional view is that it is the unjust enrichment which gives rise to the obligations of restitution. However, Justice Finn expresses concern that the concept of unjust enrichment may "contrive legal analysis" and continues (in a passage I would adopt) (ibid 252):

> [T]o the extent that it directs attention to outcomes and to the character to be attributed to them, it is capable of concealing rather than revealing why the law would want to attribute a responsibility to one party to provide satisfaction to the other. This is particularly so where, as is so often the case, it is conduct in a relationship or dealing – an expectation created and relied upon; a mistake not corrected; etc – which provides the focus of legal attention and which generates the issue of legal policy for which resolution is required. This, I suspect, provides the reason why "unconscionable conduct" and not "unjust enrichment" (a possible effect of that conduct) has achieved the currency it has in Australian law.

However, in Baltic Shipping (1993) 176 CLR 344 at 359, Mason CJ said that, in cases of money had and received, the retention of the money in question "is regarded, in the language of Lord Mansfield, as 'against conscience' or, in the modern terminology, as an unjust enrichment of the defendant because the condition upon which it was paid, namely, performance by the defendant may not have occurred"…. Nevertheless, reflection will demonstrate that the notion of unjust enrichment cannot be accepted as a modern synonym for a refusal "against conscience" to pay the money in question. This is because, as Rothmans emphasised in its submissions, the action for money had and received lies against defendants who fail to account but who, on any sensible understanding of the term, have not been enriched. A recent example … is the decision of the New Zealand [544] Court of Appeal in Martin v Pont [1993] 3 NZLR 25. A principal who entrusted money to an agent for the purpose of investing it with a nominated finance company was entitled to recover from the agent when, by reason of a defalcation by an employee of the agent which did not benefit the agent, the purpose was not carried out.

Considerations such as these, together with practical experience, suggest caution in judicial acceptance of any all-embracing theory of restitutionary rights and remedies founded upon a notion of "unjust enrichment". To the lawyer whose mind has been moulded by civilian influences, the theory may come first, and the source of the theory may be the writing of jurists not the decisions of judges. However, that is not the way in which a system based on case law develops; over time, general principle is derived from judicial decisions upon particular instances, not the other way around.

In McGinty v Western Australia (1996) 186 CLR 140 at 232, McHugh J referred to Judge Posner's description of "top-down reasoning" by which a theory about an area of law is invented or adopted and then applied to existing decisions to make them conform to the theory and to dictate the outcome in new cases. Judge Posner spoke of the use of the theory by its adherents ("Legal Reasoning From the Top Down and From the Bottom Up: The Question of Unenumerated Constitutional Rights" (1992) 59 University of Chicago Law Review 433, 433):

> to organise, criticise, accept or reject, explain or explain away, distinguish or amplify the existing decisions to make them conform to the theory and generate an outcome in each new case as it arises that will be consistent with the theory and with the canonical cases, that is, the cases accepted as authoritative within the theory.

As it happens, Lord Mansfield favoured the development of legal principle by a journey in the opposite direction. In Ringsted v Lady Lanesborough (1783) 3 Dougl 197, 203; 99 ER 610, 613, his Lordship said:

> General rules are, however, varied by change of circumstances. Cases arise within the letter, yet not within the reason, of the rule; and exceptions are introduced, which, grafted upon the rule, form a system of law.

Unless, as this Court indicated in David Securities Pty Ltd v [545] Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1992) 175 CLR 353, 378-379, unjust enrichment is seen as a concept rather than a definitive legal principle, substance and dynamism may be restricted by dogma. In turn, the dogma will tend to generate new fictions in order to retain support for its thesis. It also may distort well settled principles in other fields, including those respecting equitable doctrines and remedies, so that they answer the newly mandated order of things. Then various theories will compete, each to deny the others. There is support in Australasian legal scholarship for considerable scepticism respecting any all-embracing theory in this field, with the treatment of the disparate as no more than species of the one newly discovered genus [Gummow J referred to the work of Stoljar, Tilbury, Glover, Dietrich, Grantham and Rickett, Wright, Doyle, Kremer and Jaffey].

On the other hand, the action to recover the moneys sought by the appellants after the failure of the purpose of funding Rothmans to renew its licence may be illustrative of the gap-filling and auxiliary role of restitutionary remedies (Dietrich, Restitution: A New Perspective (1998), pp 29-35; Grantham and Rickett, "On the Subsidiarity of Unjust Enrichment" (2001) 117 Law Quarterly Review 273, 289-293). These remedies do not let matters lie where they would fall if the carriage of risk between the parties were left entirely within the limits of their contract. Hence there is some force in the statement by Laycock ("The Scope and Significance of Restitution" (1989) 67 Texas Law Review 1277, at p 1278):

> The rules of restitution developed much like the rules of equity. Restitution arose to avoid unjust results in specific cases – as a series of innovations to fill gaps in the rest of the law.

In the present case, there has been no failure in the performance by Rothmans of any promise it made. No question of repudiation by it of its contractual obligations arises. The question is that stated by Deane J in Muschinski set out earlier in these reasons. Is it unconscionable for Rothmans to enjoy the payments in respect of the tobacco licence fee, in circumstances in which it was not specifically intended or specially provided that Rothmans should so enjoy them? The answer should be in the affirmative. Here, "failure of consideration" identifies the failure to sustain itself of the state of affairs contemplated as a basis for the payments the appellants seek to recover (David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1992) 175 CLR 353, 382; Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344 at 389; Goss v Chilcott [1996] AC 788, 797).

At this stage attention is required to the notion that the failure relied upon be "total". The general rule, exemplified in Baltic Shipping, is that where there has been a partial failure in performance of a contractual promise there is no right to recover back a proportionate part of the money paid on an action for money had and received. One reason for this requirement that the failure be "total" appears to be that, in cases in which the question has arisen, the plaintiff already will have a remedy in damages which will be governed by principles of compensation under which the plaintiff may recover no more than the loss sustained; to allow the plaintiff to claim restitution in respect of any breach, particularly where the plaintiff had made a bad bargain by paying the defendant more than the defendant's performance was worth, would cut across the compensatory principle (Treitel, The Law of Contract, 10th ed (1999), p 978).

In the present case, the appellants have no contractual remedy in respect of the retention of the moneys in question after the removal of the need for licence renewals as necessary conditions for the continuation of their businesses and that of Rothmans.

The circumstance that it is necessary for the appellants to pay the total of the invoiced amounts in order to obtain delivery and passing of title to the tobacco products supplied by Rothmans does not inevitably point to the conclusion that the sum designated in respect of "tobacco licence fee" was referable solely to the delivery and transfer of property in the tobacco products sold by Rothmans. The parties contracted not only for the supply of the tobacco products but also, in the light of the provisions of s 41 of the Act, with respect to the renewal of the wholesaler's licence and the funding for that to take place. Whilst that is understood, the very form of the transactions indicates that the payments made by the appellants can be "broken up" (See David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 383; Goss v Chilcott [1996] AC 788 at 797; Wayne County Produce Co v Duffy-Mott Co Inc (1927) 155 NE 669).

[10.70] KIRBY J (dissenting): [559] In the hands of the wholesaler, the [sums claimed] represented a windfall. The retailers sued the wholesaler to recover the component of the price paid by them as licence fees unpaid under the Act. However, as was found by the Federal Court (and as was contemplated by the arrangement between the wholesaler and the retailers), the retailers had already passed on to their customers (the ultimate consumers of the tobacco products) the costs of the licence fees paid by them to the wholesaler ((1999) 95 FCR 185, 199). The attempt of the retailers to recover a share of the wholesaler's windfall was not a selfless one, ventured on behalf of their customers. Neither before the proceedings reached this Court, nor in answer to repeated questions asked of their counsel, did the retailers indicate the slightest interest in recovering the whole, or [560] any part, of the windfall for the benefit of the consumers. They wanted the windfall for themselves.

There is nothing unusual in the pursuit of personal gain. Most litigation is motivated by the interests of the parties. However, the question presented by this appeal, as I would approach it, is whether the entitlements asserted by the retailers require, or permit, a disturbance of the status quo as it stood when this Court struck down the Act imposing the tobacco licence fees. Must part of the windfall to the wholesaler, who is undeserving, be passed to the retailers, equally undeserving, without any provision, sought or offered, to recompense the consumers, who are deserving because they ultimately paid amounts towards the unrecovered licence fees? Or should the windfall remain where it is, on the footing that no basis is shown by statute, by equity or by the common law to sustain the recovery claimed by the retailers?

So far as the claim for restitution for mistake is concerned, the Full Court correctly found that the payments made by the retailers to the wholesaler had been made pursuant to valid and enforceable contracts. The payments were therefore not recoverable on the basis that each payment had been made under a mistake either of fact or law. Although the retailers relied on the decision of this Court in David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1992) 175 CLR 353, 376, that case is distinguishable. There, the Income Tax Assessment Act 1936 (Cth) (s 261(1)) had rendered void a borrower's contractual obligation to pay the lender amounts under a loan agreement in respect of income tax on the interest payable. The mistake relied upon was the borrower's ignorance of the statutory provision. In the present case, the decision of this Court invalidating the Act did not, as such, invalidate any contracts to pay sums calculated by reference to licence fees payable under the Act. Indeed, no term of the contracts between the parties was invalidated by any decision of this Court. In every case, the retailers' payments to the wholesaler were thus made in discharge of their obligations to the wholesaler under contracts between them that were incontestably valid. The cause of the payment of the sums by the retailers to the wholesaler was thus the obligation of the former to the latter under binding contracts. It was not any mistake as to the constitutional validity of the Act … This ground of claim was therefore rightly rejected. It too can be disregarded.

… [577]

The claim to restitution for a failure of consideration

[10.75] The final ground upon which the retailers claimed relief was for restitution on the basis of a failure of consideration. The payments made by the retailers to the wholesaler were made in discharge of express contractual obligations agreed between them. The wholesaler discharged its part of such obligations by supplying the goods in question to the retailers. Those goods were supplied in accordance with an agreed price. That price, in each instance, subsumed, and included within it, various component parts, only one of which was that of the licence fees. No doubt it also included component parts for notional charges for acquisition of raw tobacco product, warehousing, packaging, processing, transport, overheads and the like. The separate appearance of the component for the tobacco licence fees on the wholesaler's invoices was doubtless convenient for accounting purposes. It permitted the ready aggregation of the licence fees then thought to be payable under the Act. But the legal obligation of the retailers to the wholesaler was to pay the price of the goods in full….

In the foregoing circumstances, it is impossible to assert that there has been a total failure of consideration. The individual contracts between the wholesaler and the retailers were uncontestably valid. They were not ineffective. Nor were they terminated. Far from attempting to terminate the contracts for the supply of goods by the wholesaler, the retailers actually accepted the goods in every case. They onsold them to consumers, thereby recovering the component for licence fees about which they now complain. The law of restitution [578] only rarely operates in the context of an effective contract (Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 256). The present, in my opinion, is not a case that falls within one of the recognised exceptions.

The retailers nonetheless claimed to recover under a "unifying principle" of restitution for unjust enrichment at their expense. They did so on the basis that, notwithstanding that consideration had not totally failed, some part of the consideration could be separately identified, apportioned and then seen as having failed. This submission should be rejected.

By their terms, the contracts between the wholesaler and the retailers left the obligation of the wholesaler to pay the tobacco licence fee to the government entirely out of account. It was unsurprising that this should have been so. At the time the contracts were agreed to, the obligation to pay the tobacco licence fees arose not by any contractual agreement at all but by the operation of statute law, namely pursuant to the duties purportedly imposed by the Act. As the majority in the Full Court explained, the retailers could succeed in a claim for restitution on the ground of failure of consideration only if the wholesaler was bound to them by the promise to pay the amount identified as being for the licence fees and such promise was wholly unperformed.

In light of the then understanding of the obligations of the Act, it borders on the surreal to suggest that the wholesaler "promised" the retailers that it would pay the licence fees to the government, in default of which payment there would be a failure of consideration in respect of that part of the price paid. Not only does this hypothesis defy the express terms upon which the parties traded with each other. It also contradicts the historical fact that the obligation of the wholesaler to pay the tax was an obligation imposed on the wholesaler not by private contract but by the terms of the Act.

I therefore agree with the Full Court that the basis for asserting a right to recover at common law was not established. The moneys were not had and received by the wholesaler to the use of the retailers. Properly analysed, they were had and received in discharge of a contractually stipulated price payable in full in exchange for the supply of specified goods which were duly delivered.

This is not a surprising conclusion. Nor is it an application of the law of restitution different from the way that body of law has developed in Australia. The ghost of implied contract as the basis for [579] restitution may indeed have been exorcised following the decision of this Court in Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul … But it is still necessary to demonstrate a legal foundation for any enforceable obligation to make restitution. Relevantly, the retailers propounded a partial failure of consideration for the contracts they entered with the wholesaler. But when this proposition fails, by reference to the analysis of the evidence and of the applicable legal principles, what is left? To establish an entitlement to restitution, at the least, some requirement in law and justice must be shown to displace the clear legal obligation that the retailers assumed to pay the wholesaler in full a price, meaning the entire price, for the supply of the goods duly received.

When failure of consideration is seen as inapplicable in this case, no other legal basis of restitution exists to give rise to recovery. Restitution arose as a remedy "to avoid unjust results in specific cases" (Laycock, "The Scope and Significance of Restitution" (1989) 67 Texas Law Review 1277, 1278). By no means does the present case involve an unjust result. The retailers rejected any obligation to reimburse their consumers, who carry the ultimate burden of the licence fees. There has been no unjust enrichment of anyone at the expense of the retailers. It is true that the wholesaler has secured a "windfall". But that is by operation of law upon the consequences of the valid and enforceable contracts agreed between the parties. Those parties should be held to those contracts.

As a matter of legal policy, this Court should be extremely slow before introducing an entitlement to restitution in a case where total failure of consideration cannot be shown but only a partial failure.

The reasons for such caution are obvious. In many bargains, parties recover less than they expected. If in every case (or even many cases) courts could be inveigled into judging an alleged partial failure of consideration, on the footing that it entitles a disappointed contracting party to recover the loss of which it complains by way of restitution, the brake on legal claims that has hitherto been imposed will be released. Even more than at present, and without statutory authority, there will then be transferred into courts of law arguments that are substantially about economic disappointment. Until now, the common law has resisted such claims. The imperium of restitution should not be extended to reverse such settled law.

Conclusion and order

[10.80] The "windfall" should remain with the wholesaler to await the legislative measures (if any) for disgorgement to the benefit of users of tobacco products, or otherwise, as the Federal Parliament may enact. [580] No constructive trust, nor implied term, nor restitutionary principle requires, or permits, disturbance of this position.

[CALLINAN J delivered a separate judgment in which he concluded (at 589) that "the appellants have made out a case for the recovery of the money paid on the basis that relevantly there has been a total failure of consideration, that is to say, a failure in respect of a discrete, clearly identified component of the consideration".]

Appeal allowed.

[10.85] Notes

1. A number of references to cases and academic writing have not been reproduced in these extracts from the judgments.
2. The availability of a restitutionary claim to recover payments made under a valid contract raises important questions about the relationship between the law of contract and the law of restitution. Beatson and Virgo ("Contract, Unjust Enrichment and Unconscionability" (2002) 118 LQR 352, 355–6) doubt that failure of consideration provided a proper basis for ordering restitution of the payments in the Roxborough case:

> The doubtfulness stems from the fact that a fundamental principle relating to the application of the ground of total failure of consideration in particular, and unjust enrichment generally, is that the law of restitution is subordinate to the law of contract. It follows that restitutionary remedies are generally only available in a contractual context once the contract has been set aside, for example for breach, frustration or because it is unenforceable (see … Pavey and Matthews v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 256 …) … [T]here may be exceptional circumstances where restitutionary relief can be awarded even though the contract has not been terminated, but only where this would not subvert the allocation of risk … But there was no evidence in Roxborough that the risk of the licence fee being invalid was placed on the wholesaler rather than the retailers.

Compare Bryan, "Rescission, Restitution and Contractual Ordering: The Role of Plaintiff Election" in Robertson (ed), The Law of Obligations: Connections and Boundaries (2004) 72, who argues that:

> The real focus … should be not upon satisfying any termination requirement, which will at best be a purely formal step, but upon determining whether an order of restitution, > if granted, would be inconsistent with the contractual allocation of risk agreed between the parties.

Bryan and Ellinghaus, "Fault Lines in the Law of Obligations" (2000) 22 Sydney Law Review 636, 663 suggest (quoting Beatson) that:

> In Roxborough it could hardly be claimed that the contract allocated the risk that the tobacco licensing scheme might turn out to be unconstitutional. This was "a gap in the contractual allocation" which allowed room for "applying the principle of unjust enrichment", even if the contract was still operative.

Mann v Paterson Constructions Pty Ltd

[10.87] Mann v Paterson Constructions Pty Ltd [2019] HCA 32 – On Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: The respondent builder contracted to build two townhouses for the appellant owners. When the work was nearing completion, the owners wrongfully repudiated the contract by purporting to terminate it when they had no right to do so. The builder successfully terminated the contract on the basis of that repudiation by the owners. Terminating a contract on the basis of the other party's repudiation is commonly referred to as "accepting" the repudiation. The contract required the owners to pay a fixed price for the building work in accordance with a Progress Payments Table, which set out the amount to be paid on completion of each specified stage of construction. The builder had been paid for some of the work done under the contract but remained unpaid in respect of work falling into three categories: first, work done in respect of completed stages (for which there was an accrued right to payment under the contract); secondly, work done in respect of uncompleted stages (for which a right to payment under the contract had not yet accrued); and thirdly, work done in respect of variations to the contract plans requested by the owners. The builder instituted proceedings in the Victorian Civil and Administrative Tribunal (VCAT), seeking either damages for breach of contract (in the amount of approximately $450,000), or alternatively recovery on a quantum meruit for work done under the contract for which he had not been paid. The builder was awarded $660,000 by VCAT on the quantum meruit claim. An appeal to a single judge of the Supreme Court of Victoria and a further appeal to the Court of Appeal were both unsuccessful. The owners appealed to the High Court of Australia on the grounds that:

(1) the builder was not entitled to recover on a quantum meruit, but only damages for breach of contract;

(2) if the builder was entitled to recover on a quantum meruit, the contract price operated as a cap on the amount recoverable; and

(3) the quantum meruit claim was affected by the Domestic Building Contract Act 1995 (Vic) (the DBC Act), s 38.]

GAGELER J: [57] As [Nettle, Gordon and Edelman JJ] explain, the Builder's claim to recover by way of restitution a sum of money representing the value of work done by the Builder for the benefit of the Owners before the Contract was terminated upon the Builder's acceptance of the Owners' repudiation covered work within three distinct categories:

(1) work done by the Builder in respect of variations to the plans and specifications set out in the Contract which were asked for by the Owners;

(2) work done by the Builder in respect of the plans and specifications set out in the Contract for which the Builder had accrued a contractual right to payment under the Contract at the time of its termination; and

(3) work done by the Builder in respect of the plans and specifications set out in the Contract for > which the Builder had not yet accrued any contractual right to payment under the Contract at the time of its termination.

[58] Section 38 of the DBC Act governs recovery by the Builder for work done within category (1). I agree with the construction of s 38 arrived at by Nettle, Gordon and Edelman JJ and I agree with the substance of their Honours' reasons for arriving at that construction.

[61] The correct outcome in relation to work done within category (2) is that a non-contractual quantum meruit is not available to the Builder. In my opinion, the preferable outcome in relation to work done within category (3) is that a non-contractual quantum meruit is available to the Builder. Although those conclusions accord with the conclusions reached by Nettle, Gordon and Edelman JJ, I reach them by a narrower path of reasoning.

[62] There can be no doubt about the outcome in relation to work done within category (2). The result of the Builder's acceptance of the Owners' repudiation is that the Builder still has in respect of that work the same accrued contractual right to payment under the Contract as the Builder had up until the time of termination of the Contract (McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd (1933) 48 CLR 457 at 476-477; Westralian Farmers Ltd v Commonwealth Agricultural Service Engineers Ltd (1936) 54 CLR 361 at 379-380; GEC Marconi Systems Pty Ltd v BHP Information Technology Pty Ltd (2003) 128 FCR 1 at 155 [651]). The Builder can enforce that accrued contractual right in a common law action in debt (Young v Queensland Trustees Ltd (1956) 99 CLR 560 at 567, 569).

[63] The continuing existence of a contractual right to payment, enforceable by an action in debt, leaves no room to recover payment by another action in debt on a non-contractual quantum meruit. …

[65] More difficulty attends the outcome in relation to work done within category (3). Determining the outcome requires this Court to make a choice. Should the Builder be restricted in respect of that work to enforcing the Builder's undoubted entitlement to recover damages for loss occasioned to the Builder in consequence of the termination of the Contract? Or should the Builder be able to elect to recover instead an amount representing the value of the work by way of restitution on a non-contractual quantum meruit?

[76] To recognise the "unjustness" of the defaulting party having had the benefit of the services rendered by the innocent party in part performance of the contract in a case of a default amounting to a wrongful repudiation, I do not think it necessary to analogise to any other category of case. Nor do I think it appropriate to attempt to discern and apply some other all-embracing criterion of liability in the common law of restitution. By preferring to maintain a narrow focus, I am adhering to the standard common law judicial technique of deciding no more than what needs to be decided.

[78] The concept of "total failure of consideration", renamed as "failure of basis", was invoked in novel circumstances to explain the imposition of an obligation to repay money that had been paid in Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 524-529 [14]-[24], 555-558 [101]-[109], 589 [199] and to explain the imposition of an obligation to pay for services that had been rendered in Barnes v Eastenders Cash & Carry Plc [2015] AC 1 at 41-44 [103]-[115]. Undoubtedly, the concept can help to explain the imposition of obligations to make restitution across a range of established categories of case. The present category is one in which the concept has some explanatory power. … One party has rendered services, from which the other has benefited, on a "basis" that "has failed to sustain itself" in the events that have occurred. That is to isolate an important part of the story. But it is not to tell the whole story. The other important parts that need to be told are that the services were rendered pursuant to a valid contract which the defaulting party has wrongfully repudiated and which the innocent party has terminated so as to result in the innocent party failing to accrue a right to payment for the services under the contract yet having an entitlement to claim damages from the defaulting party for non-completion of the contract.

[79] Useful as the concept of total failure of consideration or failure of basis can be, it is important not to surrender to that one concept the hegemonic status steadfastly denied to the concept of unjust enrichment (cf Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 543-544 [71]-[73]; Barnes v Eastenders Cash & Carry Plc [2015] AC 1 at 41 [102], 43 [113]). The common law method, as Sir Frederick Jordan himself observed extra-judicially, has never purported to be one in which the determination of a particular case has been deduced from supposed "fundamental principles of justice". The general principles of the common law are, in his language, "built up" from the "collation of decided cases" (Jordan, Appreciations (1950) at 58-59). They are monitored by reference to how well they fit within the wider body of the law and how well they work in practice; where problems are revealed, they can be revised or even abandoned at the appropriate level within the judicial hierarchy.

[80] Bearing constantly in mind the adage that the life of the common law has been not logic but experience (Holmes, The Common Law (1881) at 1), there is a need to resist the temptation to intellectual gratification that accompanies any quest to portray cases in which the common law recognises an obligation of restitution as the conscious or unconscious application of one Very Big Idea. The need is to avoid the pitfalls of overgeneralisation (See Smith, "Restitution: A New Start?", in Devonshire and Havelock (eds), The Impact of Equity and Restitution in Commerce (2019) 91 at 95-96), just as it is to ensure that considerations that are practically important but theoretically inconvenient are not overlooked or underappreciated.

[82] The critical question in the present category of case is why the common law should not treat the innocent party as adequately remunerated for the services rendered to the defaulting party by having an entitlement to maintain an action for damages for breach of the contract in part performance of which the innocent party rendered those services. …

[83] My view is that the answer to that critical question cannot lie in the notion of the contracting parties having arrived at a contractual "allocation of risk", which the common law of restitution will not disturb (cf Lumbers v W Cook Builders Pty Ltd (In liq) (2008) 232 CLR 635 at 663 [79]). Contracting parties are, of course, at liberty to determine by contract the "secondary" obligations, which are to arise in the event of breach or termination of the "primary" obligations they have chosen to bind them (Moschi v Lep Air Services Ltd [1973] AC 331 at 350). … However, it would be artificial as a matter of commercial practice and wrong as a matter of legal theory to conceive of contracting parties who have not addressed the consequences of termination in the express or implied terms of their contract as having contracted to limit themselves to the contractual remedy of damages in that event. Parties contract against the background of the gamut of remedies that the legal system makes available to them. The common law gives to them the benefit, and saddles them with the detriment, of what they expressly or impliedly agree in their contract. Outside the scope of what they agree in their contract, the common law gives to them what the common law itself allows them to get.

[84] Nor can I see that the answer is to be found in the notion that overlapping remedies in contract and in restitution are in some way anomalous. Tidiness has never been a feature of a common law system. Overlapping remedies available at the option of an innocent party against another party who is in contractual default are commonplace. Remedies at common law can overlap with those in equity. At common law, causes of action in contract can overlap with causes of action in tort, and the potential for a cause of action in restitution to overlap with a cause of action in damages for breach of contract was recognised in Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344 at 355.

[85] Rather, I consider that answering the critical question needs to be informed by a weighing of the practical consequences of continuing to allow an innocent party to maintain a non-contractual quantum meruit as an alternative to an action for unliquidated damages for breach of contract. To those consequences I now turn.

[86] One practical consequence which flows from a non-contractual quantum meruit being "in the theory of the law" an action for a debt is that the action can have significant procedural advantages to an innocent party over an action for damages for breach of contract under procedural rules in Australian courts. (See generally Mason, Carter and Tolhurst, Mason & Carter's Restitution Law in Australia, 3rd ed (2016) at 1025 [2922].) Typically, those advantages include a capacity to obtain default judgment …

[87] More importantly, a non-contractual quantum meruit has the advantage that proof of the value of services rendered is almost invariably more straightforward than proof of contractual loss. Questions of causation and remoteness play no part. The availability of the action allows the innocent party to choose to adopt the course of quickly and cheaply obtaining judgment for an easily quantifiable liquidated amount instead of embarking on a long and more expensive and more uncertain pursuit of a potentially larger judgment for unliquidated damages. Choice by the innocent party to adopt that course has the flow-on systemic advantage of shortening trial and pre-trial processes.

[88] The practical considerations are not all one way. Against permitting recovery on an action for a non-contractual quantum meruit for the value of services rendered under the contract is the prospect of a party recovering more as a result of termination of the contract than would have been due to that party had the contract been performed. If the value of the services rendered is to be determined independently of the contract, as the common law of Australia as declared by intermediate courts of appeal currently stands, recovery in excess of the contract price has the real potential to occur in two main scenarios. One is where the contract has turned out to be under-priced, with the result that the party faces the prospect of making a loss by going on to complete performance. The other is where the contract has been structured to allocate a higher proportion of the overall contract price to work performed at earlier stages for which the party has already accrued a contractual right to payment (Dennys and Clay, Hudson's Building and Engineering Contracts, 13th ed (2015) at 926 [8-019]).

[89] With the potential to recover more from termination than from completion comes the incentive to terminate: to search out and seize upon conduct able to be characterised as a repudiation with a view to making more out of engaging in the ensuing litigation than is available to be made out of completing the contract. Compounding the incentive for one contracting party to find conduct amounting to repudiation is a corresponding incentive for the counter-party to do whatever can be done to avoid it. The result "is to invert the normal interest of such a party regarding the other's contractual performance" (Kull, "Restitution as a Remedy for Breach of Contract" (1994) 67 Southern California Law Review 1465 at 1472):

> While the performing party's objective is to provoke a default, the recipient's goal is to safeguard a favorable bargain – avoiding the risk of default by excessive precautions and "overperformance". It is difficult to think of a clearer incentive to inefficiency in the contractual relation.

[90] The function of a common law remedy is to remediate an innocent party, not to penalise a defaulting party, and not to distort the incentive of either party to perform the contract. The policy of the common law demands that the problem of distorted contractual incentives be addressed.

[91] In my opinion, the problem is more appropriately addressed by limiting the measure of restitution than by denying the availability of the common law action for restitution. If the measure of the value of the services rendered by the innocent party is capped by reference to the contractually agreed remuneration for those services – the contract price – the distortion is substantially eliminated. …

[102] The common law rule should accordingly be that the amount recoverable on a non-contractual quantum meruit as remuneration for services rendered in performance of a contract prior to its termination by acceptance of a repudiation cannot exceed that portion of the contract price as is attributable to those services. Issues concerning the identification and appropriate method of apportionment of the contract price are best left to be addressed on a case by case basis if and when they arise.

[103] To the extent that they allowed recovery in excess of the contract price for the services rendered, Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works (1992) 26 NSWLR 234, Iezzi Constructions Pty Ltd v Watkins Pacific (Qld) Pty Ltd [1995] 2 Qd R 350 and Sopov v Kane Constructions Pty Ltd [No 2] (2009) 24 VR 510 were, in my opinion, wrongly decided.

[105] The preferable outcome, in my opinion, is accordingly that the Builder can recover from the Owners by way of restitution on a non-contractual quantum meruit an amount in respect of the work done by the Builder for which the Builder had accrued no contractual right to payment under the Contract at the time of its termination. The amount recoverable is a liquidated amount representing reasonable remuneration for the work. That amount cannot exceed the portion of the overall price set by the Contract that is attributable to the work.

[10.88] NETTLE, GORDON and EDELMAN JJ:

Application of s 38 of the DBC Act to variations

[Nettle, Gordon and Edelman JJ began by considering the third ground of appeal set out above, namely, whether the quantum meruit claim – in so far as it related to work done under variations to the building contract – was affected by the DBC Act, s 38. Section 38(6) of the DBC Act provided that, where the plans or specifications set out in a major domestic building contract are varied, a builder "is not entitled to recover any money in respect of the variation" unless, either, (1) certain notice procedures set out in s 38 had been followed, or (2) VCAT is satisfied as to certain matters (essentially that the builder would suffer significant hardship if not allowed to recover and it would not be unfair to the building owner to allow the builder to recover). VCAT had proceeded on the basis that the quantum meruit claim was not affected by s 38, and therefore did not consider the matters set out in s 38(6)(b). Nettle, Gordon and Edelman JJ found that the quantum meruit claim was governed by s 38 in so far as it related to work done under variations to the contract, and therefore held that the case should be remitted to VCAT for consideration of the matters set out in s 38(6).]

Recovery of restitution as an alternative to contractual remedies

[162] As s 38 has no application to that part of the respondent's claim that was not in respect of variations, it is next necessary to determine whether the respondent was entitled to recover restitution for a cause of action in the category of unjust enrichment (rather than for amounts due under the contract or damages for breach of contract) in relation to those aspects of its claim which were for work and labour done otherwise than in response to requested variations within the meaning of s 38.

(i) Restitution upon termination for breach

[164] Where a contract remains "open" – that is, "not discharged" (Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 541 [67]; [2001] HCA 68) – there is generally "neither occasion nor legal justification for the law to superimpose or impute an obligation or promise to pay a reasonable remuneration" (Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 256 …). Such an obligation or promise "would be either inconsistent with the contract or … would duplicate the contractual obligation" (Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 238). But the position at law for contracts that are "closed", including, relevantly, those terminated for repudiation, is different.

[165] At least since the decision of Dixon J in McDonald v Dennys Lascelles Ltd, it has been accepted that, where a party to a contract elects to accept the other party's repudiation of the contract, both parties are released from contractual obligations which are not yet due for performance, but existing rights and causes of action continue unaffected (Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344 at 356, 390 …). Dixon J explained the position thus (McDonald (1933) 48 CLR 457 at 476–477, emphasis added):

> When a party to a simple contract, upon a breach by the other contracting party of a condition of the contract, elects to treat the contract as no longer binding upon him, the contract is not rescinded as from the beginning. Both parties are discharged from the further performance of the contract, but rights are not divested or discharged which have already been unconditionally acquired. Rights and obligations which arise from the partial execution of the contract and causes of action which have accrued from its breach alike continue unaffected. When a contract is rescinded because of matters which affect its formation, as in the case of fraud, the parties are to be rehabilitated and restored, so far as may be, to the position they occupied before the contract was made. But when a contract, which is not void or voidable at law, or liable to be set aside in equity, is dissolved at the election of one party because the other has not observed an essential condition or has committed a breach going to its root, the contract is determined so far as it is executory only and the party in default is liable for damages for its breach. …

[166] As the law stands in Australia, as it does in England, New Zealand, Canada and the United States, upon termination for repudiation of an uncompleted contract containing an entire obligation (or, as will be seen, divisible stages) for work and labour done, the innocent party may sue either for damages for breach of contract or, at the innocent party's option, for restitution in respect of the value of services rendered under the contract (Planché v Colburn (1831) 1 Moo & S 51 … Lodder v Slowey [1904] AC 442; … Renard Constructions (1992) 26 NSWLR 234; Iezzi Constructions [1995] 2 Qd R 350; Sopov v Kane (2009) 24 VR 510. See Mason, Carter and Tolhurst, Mason & Carter's Restitution Law in Australia, 3rd ed (2016) at 482–487 [1166]-[1168]; Mitchell, Mitchell and Watterson (eds), Goff & Jones: The Law of Unjust Enrichment, 9th ed (2016) at 64 [3–36]; Grantham and Rickett, Enrichment and Restitution in New Zealand (2000) at 165–170; Maddaugh and McCamus, The Law of Restitution, 2nd ed (2004) at 586–600 [19:200]; American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law Third, Restitution and Unjust Enrichment (2011) §38).

[167] The availability of restitution, and the form of restitutionary remedy awarded, will depend on the type of enrichment alleged. (See generally Mason, Carter and Tolhurst, Mason & Carter's Restitution Law in Australia, 3rd ed (2016) at 15–16 [115], 1018–1023 [2908]-[2916]; Mitchell, Mitchell and Watterson (eds), Goff & Jones: The Law of Unjust Enrichment, 9th ed (2016) at 9–10 [1-13], 19–20 [1-36]; Birks, Unjust Enrichment, 2nd ed (2005) at 287; Burrows, The Law of Restitution, 3rd ed (2011) at 15–16.) Generally speaking, a personal restitutionary remedy will be assessed as money had and received where the alleged enrichment is the receipt of money; it will be assessed as upon a quantum meruit where the alleged enrichment is the receipt of services; and it will be assessed as upon a quantum valebant where the alleged enrichment is the receipt of goods. Where the alleged enrichment takes more than one form, such as the provision of money and services to a party, the other party is entitled to the money paid together with a reasonable sum for the services, subject, of course, to prohibitions against double recovery. (See Cobbe v Yeoman's Row Management Ltd [2008] 1 WLR 1752 at 1774 [42]-[44]. See also Baltic Shipping (1993) 176 CLR 344 at 354–355).

[168] The "qualifying or vitiating" (Equuscorp (2012) 246 CLR 498 at 516 [30], citing David Securities Pty Ltd v Commonwealth Bank of Australia (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 379) factor giving rise to a prima facie obligation on the part of the enriched party to make restitution is a total failure of consideration, or a total failure of a severable part of the consideration (Steele (1946) 72 CLR 386 at 401; David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 383; Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 524–526 [14]-[17]). In this context, consideration means the matter considered in forming the decision to do the act: "the state of affairs contemplated as the basis or reason for the payment" (David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 382, quoting Birks, An Introduction to the Law of Restitution (1989) at 223). In many cases the relevant basis will be the benefit that is bargained for. In those cases, "[t]he test is whether or not the party claiming total failure of consideration has in fact received any part of the benefit bargained for under the contract or purported contract" (David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 382, quoting Rover International Ltd v Cannon Film Sales Ltd [1989] 1 WLR 912 at 923).

[169] More specifically, a total failure of consideration for work done exists by reason of the termination of a contract for breach where the basis on which the work was done has failed to materialise or sustain itself (See Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 525 [16], 556–557 [103]-[104]; Equuscorp (2012) 246 CLR 498 at 517–518 [31]-[33]; Barnes v Eastenders Cash & Carry Plc [2015] AC 1 at 42–43 [104]-[114]), and the total failure of consideration is seen as the occasion and part of the circumstances giving rise to the other party's obligation to make restitution to the extent of the fair value of that work. (See and compare Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 256 per Deane J.) It is for that reason that no such obligation can arise while the obligation under which the benefit was conferred and accepted remains enforceable, open and capable of performance (Steele (1946) 72 CLR 386 at 402 per Dixon J. See Trimis v Mina (1999) 16 BCL 288 at 296 [54]); Lumbers (2008) 232 CLR 635 at 663).

[170] Where a contractor is only entitled to receive remuneration if the contract is wholly carried into effect, and the other party's wrongful repudiation of the contract has the effect of preventing the contractor from becoming entitled to receive remuneration for services already rendered, the contractor may, after electing to treat the contract as at an end, maintain an action to recover restitution as upon a quantum meruit for those services, instead of suing for damages (Segur v Franklin (1934) 34 SR (NSW) 67 at 72); Horton v Jones [No 2] (1939) 39 SR (NSW) 305 at 319. See also McFarlane and Stevens, "In Defence of Sumpter v Hedges" (2002) 118 Law Quarterly Review 569 at 578).

(ii) Entire obligations and divisible obligations

[172] It follows from what has been said that, where, under a contract for work and labour, a party is entitled to payment upon completion of any part of the work (which is to say that the obligation to complete that work is "infinitely divisible": Steele (1946) 72 CLR 386 at 401), where the contract expressly fixes a price for services, and where the contract is terminated by that party's acceptance of the other party's repudiation of it, the party so terminating the contract will have an accrued right to payment under the contract for that part of the work that has been done. There will have been no failure of consideration. Accordingly, that party's remedy in respect of that part of the work that has been done will generally be restricted to a claim for what has accrued due or damages for breach of contract (Steele (1946) 72 CLR 386 at 402; Baltic Shipping (1993) 176 CLR 344 at 350, 377. See also Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 557–558 [106]) assessed by reference to the contract price less the cost of completing the work (see Edelman, McGregor on Damages, 20th ed (2018) at 979 [31-022]).

[173] By contrast, if the obligation to perform work and labour is "entire", so that nothing is due until all of the work has been completed by the contractor, then, upon termination of the contract by the contractor's acceptance of the other party's repudiation of it, there will be a total failure of consideration (see [168] above). Upon acceptance that the contract is repudiated, either by a renunciation or a manifested unwillingness or inability to perform the contract substantially according to the contract terms (Koompahtoo Local Aboriginal Land Council v Sanpine Pty Ltd (2007) 233 CLR 115 at 135–136 [44]; [2007] HCA 61), the contractor's right to complete the performance and earn the price will have failed, and thus nothing will be due under the contract for such part of the work as has been completed. In that event, the "consideration" – in the sense of the condition or the "basis" (Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 525 [16], 557 [104]; Equuscorp (2012) 246 CLR 498 at 517 [31]; Barnes [2015] AC 1 at 42 [105]-[107]) for the performance by the contractor – will have failed, and restitution will lie as upon a quantum meruit in respect of work and labour done up to the point of termination. In those circumstances, there is a "qualifying or vitiating" factor, namely, a total failure of consideration, giving rise to a restitutionary remedy in the alternative.

[174] By further contrast, if the obligation to perform work is divisible into several entire stages, then, upon termination of the contract for repudiation: (i) the contractor so terminating the contract will have accrued rights under the contract for those stages that have been completed (see generally Steele (1946) 72 CLR 386 at 401; David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 383); (ii) there will be a total failure of consideration in respect of the stages that have not been completed, because the contractor's right to complete the performance and earn the price will have failed and nothing will be due under the contract in respect of those uncompleted stages; and (iii) restitution will lie as upon a quantum meruit in respect of the work and labour done towards completion of the uncompleted stages as an alternative to damages for breach of contract (see David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 383; Goss v Chilcott [1996] AC 788 at 797–798; Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 526–527 [18]-[19], 558 [109]).

[175] The underlying principle concerning restitution of the value of work and labour where the basis for performance has failed is the same as that concerning restitution of money paid where the basis for the payment has failed. Hence, where a contract for the sale and delivery of a dozen bags of cement provides for the price in full to be paid in advance, and, at the point of termination of the contract by the purchaser's acceptance of the supplier's repudiation of it, only four bags have been delivered, the contract may be treated as severable as to the remaining eight bags and eight-twelfths of the price paid in advance recovered by way of restitution as money had and received as upon a total failure of consideration in relation to those eight bags (see Whincup v Hughes (1871) LR 6 CP 78 at 81).

[176] Generally speaking, a construction contract which is divided into stages, and under which the total contract price is apportioned between the stages by means of specified progress payments payable at the completion of each stage, is viewed as containing divisible obligations of performance (GEC Marconi Systems Pty Ltd v BHP Information Technology Pty Ltd (2003) 128 FCR 1 at 164–165 [704], [705], noting that in each case the question is one of construction. See also Furst and Ramsey, Keating on Construction Contracts, 10th ed (2016) at 85–86 [4-007]). In that event, where at the point of termination of the contract by the builder's acceptance of the principal's repudiation some stages of the contract have been completed, such that progress payments have accrued due in respect of those stages, there will be no total failure of consideration in respect of those stages. The builder will have no right of recovery in restitution in respect of those stages, and the builder's rights in respect of those completed stages will generally be limited to debt for recovery of the amounts accrued due or damages for breach of contract. But if there are any uncompleted stages, there will be a total failure of consideration in respect of those stages due to the failure of the builder's right to complete the performance and earn the price. In that event, there will be nothing due under the contract in relation to those stages, and restitution as upon a quantum meruit will lie in respect of work and labour done towards completion of those uncompleted stages.

[177] In this matter, it is apparent from the manner in which the Contract expressly provided for stages, and specified that progress payments were payable upon completion of each stage, that the obligation of performance under the Contract was divisible. Accordingly, for the reasons stated, the respondent's right to recovery in respect of the completed stages (other than for variations) was limited to the amount due under the Contract on completion of those stages or damages for breach of contract, and the respondent's right to recovery in respect of the uncompleted stages (other than for variations) was restricted to restitution for work and labour done in respect of those stages or damages for breach of contract.

[178] As the matter stands, it is not entirely clear which stages had been completed … It is another question which will need to be investigated upon remitter of the matter to VCAT.

[179] What can be said for present purposes, however, is that, as matters stand, it appears that there was at least one stage as specified in the Contract which was not complete as at the time of termination. If so, the respondent may have a claim for restitution of the value of work and labour done towards completion of that stage. But, to repeat, to the extent that there were stages which had been completed at the time of termination, so that the right to progress payments payable in respect of those stages had accrued, the respondent had no right to restitution in respect of work comprised in those stages. The respondent's rights of recovery in respect of those stages are limited to the respondent's rights under the Contract for the progress payments payable in respect of those stages or damages for breach of contract.

(iii) History of restitutionary relief

[Their Honours explored the history of the quantum meruit action and the development of the idea that a contract terminated for breach is terminated de futuro (as to the future), and not ab initio (from the beginning), and continued as follows.]

[188] … [I]t is now recognised that restitutionary obligations are imposed by operation of law in response to circumstances including the retention of a benefit received on a basis which has totally failed to materialise. Of course, as has been observed (see [169] above), it is still the case that no such obligation can arise while the reciprocal obligation for which the benefit was conferred and accepted remains enforceable, open and capable of performance. But circumstances other than the unenforceability or avoidance of a contract ab initio, including frustration and termination, may provide the occasion for, and form part of the circumstances giving rise to, an obligation to pay what is reasonable.

[189] The position which arises upon frustration of a contract is therefore instructive. Under the rule in Taylor v Caldwell (1863) 3 B & S 826; 122 ER 309 it was once the law that, where an entire obligation to perform work and labour became impossible of performance before completion of the work, both parties were excused from further performance of the contract and neither party had any right of recovery in respect of that part of the work which had been completed or moneys paid in anticipation of its completion. (See … Chandler v Webster [1904] 1 KB 493 at 499 …). That changed with the decision of the House of Lords in Fibrosa Spolka Akcyjna v Fairbairn Lawson Combe Barbour Ltd [1943] AC 32 … See Baltic Shipping (1993) 176 CLR 344 at 356), which recognised that it is not necessary that the contract be "wiped out altogether" in order to attract restitutionary relief. As Viscount Simon LC stated (Fibrosa [1943] AC 32, 47-48), where moneys are paid to secure performance of a result, and performance becomes impossible, there is a total failure of consideration in respect of moneys paid because the inducement which brought about the payment is not fulfilled. The same applies to the frustration of a contract for the provision of services. There is a total failure of consideration for the provision of the services where "the state of affairs contemplated as the basis or reason for the [services] has failed to materialise or, if it did exist, has failed to sustain itself" (Barnes [2015] AC 1 at 42 [107]-[108], quoting Birks, An Introduction to the Law of Restitution (1989) at 223. See [188] above).

[190] Principle, coherence and authority dictate that the position in relation to a contract terminated for repudiation be the same. Although it was once thought that the innocent party's right to recover reasonable remuneration for the work done up to the point of termination depended on the notion that termination avoided the contract ab initio – thereby leaving the way clear to imply a quasi-contractual obligation on the part of the other party to pay reasonable remuneration for that work – now it is recognised that there may be a total failure of consideration for the work so done because, by reason of the termination, the basis on which the work was done has failed to materialise or sustain itself, and that total failure of consideration is seen as the occasion and part of the circumstances giving rise to the other party's obligation to make restitution to the extent of the fair value of that work.

[192] Essentially, the arguments against retention of the alternative restitutionary remedy conduce to two principal propositions. The first is that, where a contract is terminated for breach after the innocent party has partially completed the work for which the contract provides, the proper characterisation of the basis or condition on which the work was performed can only ever be the other party's promise to perform the contract (as opposed to the objective basis of the other party's performance of it), and, because the promise is enforceable by an action for damages, there is no failure of consideration. (See, eg, McLure, "Failure of Consideration and the Boundaries of Restitution and Contract", in Degeling and Edelman (eds), Unjust Enrichment in Commercial Law (2008) 209 at 211–215; Raghavan, "Failure of Consideration as a Basis for Quantum Meruit following a Repudiatory Breach of Contract" (2016) 42 Monash University Law Review 179 at 186–187, 197.) The second is that, if it is correct to characterise the basis or condition on which the work has been undertaken as being the other party's performance of that party's contractual obligations (as opposed to being limited to that party's promise to perform them), the other party's failure to perform them yields a contractual remedy which is appropriate and adequate to put the innocent party in the position in which he or she would have been if the contract had been performed; and, therefore, there is no need or justification for the imposition of an alternative restitutionary remedy. (See, eg, Beatson, "The Temptation of Elegance: Concurrence of Restitutionary and Contractual Claims", in Swadling and Jones (eds), The Search for Principle: Essays in Honour of Lord Goff of Chieveley (1999) 143 at 151–152; Jaffey, "Restitutionary Remedies in the Contractual Context" (2013) 76 Modern Law Review 429 at 440–441; Havelock, "A Taxonomic Approach to Quantum Meruit" (2016) 132 Law Quarterly Review 470 at 481.)

[193] The first proposition is at odds with long-accepted learning in England and in this country and should be rejected. (See Fibrosa [1943] AC 32 at 48–49, 72; David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 382; Baltic Shipping (1993) 176 CLR 344 at 350–351, 376, 389. See also Havelock, "A Taxonomic Approach to Quantum Meruit" (2016) 132 Law Quarterly Review 470 at 490–492.) As Viscount Simon LC stated in Fibrosa [1943] AC 32 at 48:

> In English law, an enforceable contract may be formed by an exchange of a promise for a promise, or by the exchange of a promise for an act – I am excluding contracts under seal – and thus, in the law relating to the formation of contract, the promise to do a thing may often be the consideration, but when one is considering the law of failure of consideration and of the quasi-contractual right to recover money on that ground, it is, generally speaking, not the promise which is referred to as the consideration, but the performance of the promise. The money was paid to secure performance and, if performance fails the inducement which brought about the payment is not fulfilled.
> If this were not so, there could never be any recovery of money, for failure of consideration, by the payer of the money in return for a promise of future performance, yet there are endless examples which show that money can be recovered, as for a complete failure of consideration, in cases where the promise was given but could not be fulfilled.

[194] The first proposition should also be rejected for the reason that it is premised on a misconception that an obligation to pay damages for breach of contract is an obligation imposed by the contract as such, which reflects the bargain struck between the parties and which survives termination like a debt due under the contract.

[195] Traditionally, the remedial obligation to pay damages for breach of contract has been understood as an obligation "arising by operation of law" (Concut Pty Ltd v Worrell (2000) 75 ALJR 312 at 317 [23]). Whether or not there is any role for the objective or manifested intention of the parties in ascertaining boundaries of liability in an award of damages (see and compare Transfield Shipping Inc v Mercator Shipping Inc [2009] AC 61 at 68 [12] per Lord Hoffmann. See also Robertson, "The Basis of the Remoteness Rule in Contract" (2008) 28 Legal Studies 172; Lawson, "The Remoteness Rules in Contract: Holmes, Hoffmann, and Ships that Pass in the Night" (2012) 23 King's Law Journal 1; Edelman and Bourke, "F W Guest Memorial Lecture 2017: Hadley v Baxendale" (2018) 15(2) Otago Law Review 1; Edelman, McGregor on Damages, 20th ed (2018) at 196–197 [8-172]-[8-173]), the proposition that the award of damages is somehow a product of the agreement of the parties as an alternative to performance is not easily reconciled with several established notions at law and in equity, including the normative principles which govern the quantification of damages (see Wenham v Ella (1972) 127 CLR 454 at 466–467; Johnson v Perez (1988) 166 CLR 351 at 356) and the grant of specific performance and injunctions on the basis that damages are an "inadequate" remedy (see J C Williamson Ltd v Lukey and Mulholland (1931) 45 CLR 282 at 298; Dougan v Ley (1946) 71 CLR 142 at 150.) The parties contract for performance, not damages. In short, as Windeyer J said in Coulls v Bagot's Executor and Trustee Co Ltd (1967) 119 CLR 460 at 504, "[i]t is … a faulty analysis of legal obligations to say that the law treats a promisor as having a right to elect either to perform his promise or to pay damages. Rather … the promisee has 'a legal right to the performance of the contract'." (See also Zhu v Treasurer of New South Wales (2004) 218 CLR 530 at 574-575 [128]; [2004] HCA 56.)

[198] Theoretically, the second proposition has more to commend it. Arguably, the latter-day developments of the implied contractual obligation of cooperation and the doctrine of anticipatory breach have so much ameliorated the injustice which spawned the quasi-contractual remedy of quantum meruit for work and labour done that a restitutionary remedy is no longer necessary to alleviate the unjust enrichment of the recipient of the benefit of it. But the remedy is one of considerable practical value. A claim for restitution is a liquidated demand which, by contrast to an unliquidated claim for damages, may provide easier and quicker recovery including by way of summary judgment. And as Leeming JA observed in Fistar v Riverwood Legion and Community Club Ltd (2016) 91 NSWLR 732 at 743 [48] …), "there is nothing foreign to the Australian legal system in a plaintiff having alternative claims arising out of the same facts". (See also Barclays Bank Ltd v Quistclose Investments Ltd [1970] AC 567 at 581.) Further, as United Australia Ltd v Barclays Bank Ltd [1941] AC 1 shows, the law has mechanisms for deciding when a plaintiff becomes committed to one rather than the other remedy. The doctrine of election between remedies sits in the wider framework of election and inconsistency which Stephen J considered in Sargent v ASL Developments Ltd (1974) 131 CLR 634 at 641–642.

[199] Moreover, as Gummow J was at pains to point out in Roxborough v Rothmans of Pall Mall Australia Ltd (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 544 [72]-[73] (see also Windeyer, Lectures on Legal History, 2nd ed (rev) (1957) at 5), ours is not a system in which the theory of unjust enrichment comes first and decisions must then be made to comply with it. It is a common law system of stare decisis that develops over time and through which general principle is derived from judicial decisions. (See also Breen v Williams (1996) 186 CLR 71 at 115; D'Arcy v Myriad Genetics Inc (2015) 258 CLR 334 at 350 [26]; [2015] HCA 35.) Unjust enrichment may be conceived of as a "unifying legal concept" (Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 256–257; David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 375; Lumbers (2008) 232 CLR 635 at 665 [85]) which serves a "taxonomical function" (Equuscorp (2012) 246 CLR 498 at 516 [30]; AFSL (2014) 253 CLR 560 at 579 [20], 618 [138]) that assists in understanding why the law recognises an obligation to make restitution in particular circumstances. But it is in no sense an all-embracing theory of restitutionary rights and remedies pursuant to which existing decisions are to be accepted or rejected by reference to the extent of their compliance with its proportions (Roxborough (2001) 208 CLR 516 at 543 [70], quoting Finn, "Equitable Doctrine and Discretion in Remedies", in Cornish et al (eds), Restitution: Past, Present and Future (1998) 251 at 251–252). Consequently, where a doctrine of the common law has grown up over several centuries – as has the availability of restitutionary relief for work and labour done under a partially completed entire obligation following termination of a contract for breach – and the doctrine remains principled and coherent, widely accepted and applied in kindred jurisdictions, it can hardly be regarded as a sufficient basis to discard it that some of the conceptions which historically informed its gestation have since changed or developed over time (See and compare Holmes, The Common Law (1881) at 5; Windeyer, Lectures on Legal History, 2nd ed (rev) (1957) at 109). Whatever doubts might remain about the theoretical underpinnings of the doctrine by reason of the problematic nature of its origins or subsequent developments in the law of contract, it is too late now for this Court unilaterally to abrogate the coherent rule simply in order to bring about what is said to be a greater sense of theoretical order to the range of common law remedies.

The contract price as a limitation on the sum recoverable

[204] … [W]here the claim is founded on an obligation to pay for services rendered under a contract which is unenforceable, it has been held that "[o]rdinarily" the measure of restitution "will correspond to the fair value of the benefit provided (eg remuneration calculated at a reasonable rate for work actually done or the fair market value of materials supplied)" (Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 263). Prices stated in the contract are regarded as relevant, but they remain "evidence only, on the question of amount". (See … Pavey & Matthews (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 236-238, 250, 252, 257, 267-268.) That approach is informed by a legal concern that direct application of the contract price would risk incoherence with the policy of the law rendering the contract unenforceable, although this will always require consideration of that policy. As Mason and Wilson JJ noted in Pavey & Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 228:

> If the effect of bringing an action on a quantum meruit was simply to enforce the oral contract in some circumstances only, though not in all the circumstances in which an action on the contract would succeed, it might be persuasively contended that the action on a quantum meruit was an indirect means of enforcing the oral contract.

[205] By contrast, where a contract is enforceable, but terminated for repudiation, there are no reasons of practicality and few in principle to eschew the contract price. It has been said that "[t]he defendant cannot refuse to abide by the contract and at the same time claim its protection" against the innocent plaintiff (Lord, Williston on Contracts, 4th ed (2003), vol 26, §68:41 at 475). But, as has been seen (see [165] above), where a contract is terminated for breach, it continues to apply to acts done up to the point of termination, and it remains the basis on which the work was done. There is, therefore, nothing about the termination of the contract as such that is inconsistent with the assessment of restitution by reference to the contract price for acts done prior to termination. The contract price reflects the parties' agreed allocation of risk. (See Mason, Carter and Tolhurst, Mason & Carter's Restitution Law in Australia, 3rd ed (2016) at 610 [1430]). Termination of the contract provides no reason to disrespect that allocation. Granted, there may be difficult questions of apportionment of the contract price, such as where performance of a small part of the entire obligation is the most valuable part of the contractor's work. (See, eg, Whincup v Hughes (1871) LR 6 CP 78 at 81.) There may also be difficult questions in identifying the contract price, such as where the expected benefits to the contractor include not only payments of money but also the value of promises or releases. But such difficulties of valuation and apportionment have long been encountered in other areas. (See, eg, Attwood v Maude (1868) LR 3 Ch App 369.)

[Their Honours discussed the acceptance by the English courts of the concept of "subjective devaluation" by which "because of 'the fundamental need to protect a defendant's autonomy', a defendant would be "entitled to prove that he valued the relevant services (or goods) provided by the claimant at less than the market value' " (at [208], quoting Benedetti v Sawiris [2014] AC 938 at 957 [18]). They continued discussing the judgments in that case as follows.]

[210] Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC, although not expressing a concluded view on the subject, stated [2014] AC 938 at 1006 [187], 1007–1008 [191]-[192] as follows:

> In my view, it may well be that, in some cases of unjust enrichment, subjective devaluation could be invoked by a defendant to justify the award of a smaller sum than that which would be prima facie payable …
>
> [I]t may often be unreasonable for a claimant to claim a market-based payment … where there have been prior discussions and the defendant has indicated that he would not be prepared to pay as much as the market price for the benefit.
> It would seem wrong … for the claimant to be better off as a result of the law coming to his rescue, as it were, by permitting him to invoke unjust enrichment, than he would have been if he had had the benefit of a legally enforceable contractual claim for a quantified sum.

[211] Their Lordships' observations in Benedetti accord with the contention in Mitchell, Mitchell and Watterson (eds), Goff & Jones: The Law of Unjust Enrichment, 9th ed (2016) at 51 [3-10], 53–54 [3-16]-[3-17], 71-72 [3-52]-[3-54], and the contentions of other leading academic writers to similar effect (Virgo, The Principles of the Law of Restitution, 3rd ed (2015) at 99-102; Edelman and Bant, Unjust Enrichment, 2nd ed (2016) at 84, 141–151; Mason, Carter and Tolhurst, Mason & Carter's Restitution Law in Australia, 3rd ed (2016) at 95–96 [215], 609-610 [1430]; Furst and Ramsey, Keating on Construction Contracts, 10th ed (2016) at 283-284 [9-062]), that the law of restitution should respect the contracting parties' allocation of risk. In that regard, the learned editors of Goff & Jones > this is not indirectly to enforce the terms of a contract that has been terminated; rather, it is a reflection of the fact that the ground of recovery is failure of basis, and the parties have agreed what the basis of the transfer is to be. The contract price implicitly allocates certain risks to the supplier of the goods or services, such as the risk that the market value of the goods or services will increase before performance, and the risk that the goods or services prove to be more costly to supply than the supplier had anticipated. Allowing a supplier bringing an action in unjust enrichment to recover more than the contract price for any goods or services supplied under the contract would clearly reallocate those risks to the purchaser.

(Mitchell, Mitchell and Watterson (eds), Goff & Jones: The Law of Unjust Enrichment, 9th ed (2016) at 71-72 [3-54]) state that:

[212] Until recently, one view of English restitutionary jurisprudence was to treat the concept of unjust enrichment as if it were a definitive legal principle that supplies a sufficient premise for direct application by rigid, uniform application of questions concerning whether there is (1) an enrichment, (2) at the plaintiff's expense, (3) in circumstances of an unjust factor, and (4) subject to defences. (See, eg, Banque Financière de la Cité v Parc (Battersea) Ltd [1999] 1 AC 221 at 227, 234; Benedetti [2014] AC 938 at 955 [10]; Menelaou v Bank of Cyprus Plc [2016] AC 176 at 187 [18], 197 [61]. See Mitchell, Mitchell and Watterson (eds), Goff & Jones: The Law of Unjust Enrichment, 9th ed (2016) at 8 [1-09].) Within that rigid approach, there was something of a tendency to treat tests for and measures of "enrichment" as governed by a single principle; thus encouraging a view of the benefit abstracted from the contract price. (See, eg, Birks, An Introduction to the Law of Restitution (1989) at 116–117.) More recently, some members of the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom have cautioned against mechanical application of the "four questions" of enrichment, expense, injustice and defences. (See, eg, Investment Trust Companies v Revenue and Customs Commissioners [2018] AC 275 at 295 [40]-[42].) In Swynson Ltd v Lowick Rose Llp [2018] AC 313 at 326 [22], Lord Sumption JSC (Lord Neuberger PSC, Lord Clarke and Lord Hodge JJSC agreeing) denied that English law had a universal theory which explains all of the cases in which restitution is available. In view of those developments, it may be that the law of restitution in the United Kingdom and the law of restitution in Australia are no longer quite as far apart as was previously imagined.

[213] Whether or not that is so, however, in this country restitution arises in recognised categories of case and is not necessarily available whenever, and to the extent that, a defendant is enriched at the plaintiff's expense in circumstances that render the enrichment unjust (David Securities (1992) 175 CLR 353 at 378–379; AFSL (2014) 253 CLR 560 at 595 [73]-[74], 618 [139]). Although, over time, novel categories of case may come to be recognised, or existing categories refined, that must occur in accordance with the common law's ordinary process of incremental development: by analogy with decided cases, albeit that, within that process of development and refinement, the four questions may serve to focus attention on the nature, availability and measure of restitutionary relief, and so assist in structuring understanding as to avoid the development of the law of unjust enrichment degenerating into an exercise in idiosyncratic discretion.

[214] Accordingly, in this country, it has not been found necessary to resort to a generalised approach of so-called subjective devaluation and, at least to that extent, what was held in Benedetti is incapable of direct application. But the concerns which inform the analysis in Benedetti are just as relevant here as they are in England. For just as a contract may inform the scope of fiduciary and other equitable duties (see, eg, Hospital Products Ltd v United States Surgical Corporation (1984) 156 CLR 41 at 97; Bofinger v Kingsway Group Ltd (2009) 239 CLR 269 at 291 [52]; Friend v Brooker (2009) 239 CLR 129 at 150–151 [47]; [2009] HCA 21), the price at which a defendant has agreed to accept the work comprising an entire obligation is logically significant to the amount of restitution necessary to ensure that the defendant's retention of the benefit of that work is not unjust and unconscionable. In point of principle, deference to contract as a reflection of parties' agreed allocation of risk is at least as appropriate in Australia as it is in England. (See and compare Lumbers (2008) 232 CLR 635 at 662–663 [78]-[79])

[215] As has been seen, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom in Benedetti did not go so far as to make the contract price the limit of restitutionary recovery. Although supportive of the conclusion that the amount to be allowed by way of restitution should not ordinarily exceed the contract price, it leaves open the possibility of exception. It is appropriate that this Court adopt a similar approach. It is consistent with the Australian understanding of restitutionary remedies that a contract, although discharged, should inform the content of the defendant's obligation in conscience to make restitution where the failed basis upon which the work and labour was performed was the contractor's right to complete the performance and earn the price according to the terms of the contract. It is, therefore, appropriate to recognise that, where an entire obligation (or entire divisible stage of a contract) for work and labour (such as, for example, an entire obligation under or an obligation under a divisible stage of a domestic building contract) is terminated by the plaintiff upon the plaintiff's acceptance of the defendant's repudiation of the contract, the amount of restitution recoverable as upon a quantum meruit by the plaintiff for work performed as part of the entire obligation (or as part of the entire divisible stage of the contract) should prima facie not exceed a fair value calculated in accordance with the contract price or appropriate part of the contract price.

[216] So to recognise does not exclude the possibility of cases where, in accordance with principle, the circumstances will dictate that it would be unconscionable to confine the plaintiff to the contractual measure. One such possibility is arguably afforded by the infamous case of Boomer v Muir (1933) 24 P 2d 570, which has been explained on the basis of the defendant's continuing breaches being responsible for a cost overrun that rendered the contract unprofitable. (See Cohen, "The Fault Lines in Contract Damages" (1994) 80 Virginia Law Review 1225 at 1304-1305; Gergen, "Restitution as a Bridge Over Troubled Contractual Waters" (2002) 71 Fordham Law Review 709 at 711-712. See and compare Andersen, "The Restoration Interest and Damages for Breach of Contract" (1994) 53 Maryland Law Review 1 at 22–26.) As Dooling J observed in that case, the question whether the plaintiff could recover in excess of the contract price "depends upon whether it is equitable to permit" the plaintiff to depart from the pricing structure agreed with the defendant: (1933) 24 P 2d 570 at 576. Nonetheless, as Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC observed in Benedetti [2014] AC 938 at 1007-1008 [192], in many such cases it would appear wrong that a claimant should be entitled to a better result in restitution than would have been available to him or her under contract.

[217] In this matter, it was not suggested that there are circumstances sufficient to warrant departure from the prima facie position that a claimant should not achieve a better result by way of restitution than under the contract. It follows that VCAT was in error in assessing the amount of restitution otherwise than in accordance with the contract rates. Ground 2 should be upheld.

[222] It follows that the appeal should be allowed with costs … and the matter be remitted to VCAT for further determination according to law.

[KIEFEL CJ, BELL and KEANE JJ delivered a joint judgment in which they held that a restitutionary quantum meruit claim was not available to the builder, who was only entitled to damages for breach of contract. Their Honours held that the idea that following termination for breach the aggrieved party can chose between contract damages and a restitutionary remedy was based on the "rescission fallacy" (ie, the misconception that termination for breach renders a contract void from the beginning rather than prospectively from the date of termination). Moreover, their Honours held, allowing a restitutionary claim in these circumstances was unnecessary and would subvert the contractual allocation of risk. In view of their conclusion as to the availability of a restitutionary claim, it was unnecessary for their Honours to address the second ground of appeal (ie, whether the contract price operated as a ceiling on a restitutionary award). In relation to the third ground of appeal, KIEFEL CJ, BELL and KEANE JJ agreed with NETTLE, GORDON and EDELMAN JJ.]

Appeal allowed.

TA Sundell & Sons v Emm Yannoulatos (Overseas)

[10.90] TA Sundell & Sons Pty Ltd v Emm Yannoulatos (Overseas) Pty Ltd (1956) 56 SR (NSW) 323 (Supreme Court of New South Wales, Full Court) – Appeal from Kinsella J.

[FACTS: The appellant entered into a contract to sell to the respondent galvanized iron of French origin at £109 15s per ton. In accordance with the contract the respondent established a letter of credit in favour of the appellant. Four months later the appellant wrote to the respondent that owing to "fantastic rises in the price of zinc" in France "a price increase is inevitable"; that an increase of £27 per ton was likely; and that the amount of the letter of credit should be increased by the respondent accordingly. On 17 April 1951 the appellant made it clear that if it did not increase its price it would lose the iron, and that it was entitled to pass on the increase because an importer is merely obtaining material for its customer, and that the respondent should also pass it on. The appellant declined to accept an order from the respondent at the increased price, stated to be without prejudice to any rights the respondent had. Finally, Sundell, who was representing the respondent, said he would increase the credit, and the next day the credit was increased. However, the respondent in sending a formal order at £140 per ton stated that it did so for the purpose of obtaining the iron and claimed the right to rely upon the original agreement of £109 15s per ton. The appellant acknowledged this but did not accept it. Later the appellant informed the respondent that the iron had been shipped and the respondent wrote asserting that the letter of credit had been increased without prejudice to its rights. In due course the iron arrived in Australia and was delivered to the respondent, and the appellant collected the full amount under the letter of credit. The respondent sued to recover the amount in excess of the price originally agreed, and succeeded at first instance. The appellant appealed.]

ROPER CJ IN EQ, HARDIE J and MANNING AJ: [326] (T)he respondent asserted that the original contract had never been varied or determined, that the original price had been paid under protest, and that such payment was not voluntary in the sense that it was made in circumstances which have been variously described as under "duress" or "compulsion".

There is no doubt that the respondent urgently required the iron to carry out its commitments and that the arrangement made in April 1951 was made by it under a threat that if it failed to do as it was required to do no iron at all would be delivered. It was by virtue of this threat that the letter of credit was increased and the funds thus provided which enabled the appellant to obtain payment …

[T]he appellant argued that at a time when the appellant did not have the goods, it was made clear that it did not intend to perform the contract because it could get the goods from France only at a greatly increased price; that this amounted to a repudiation of the original contract; that the respondent was then entitled to elect whether to treat the contract as at an end or to treat it as continuing; that the respondent was most desirous of getting delivery of the goods; that a new contract was then entered into which determined the rights and liabilities of the parties under the original contract and that this new contract bound the appellant to supply the same goods but at an increased price; and that the consideration which the appellant gave for the respondent's promise to pay the increased price was that it would do certain things in France which would result in [327] the goods coming forward. It was said that this gave the respondent something more than it previously had. Originally it was left merely with an action for damages. Under the new agreement it would almost certainly get the goods.

We are satisfied that Mr Sundell's promise made on 17 April 1951 that he would increase the amount of the letter of credit and extend the period of its currency, amounted to no more than a promise to provide sufficient funds to enable payment to be made for the goods to the French manufacturer and that any increased price would be payable by his company only if it was ascertained that the appellant was entitled to payment of such increase … But even if such a promise was made as alleged, we are of opinion that it was not binding because there was no consideration for it … In our view every promise allegedly given to the plaintiff by the defendant under the so-called second agreement was identical with a promise given under the original agreement.

One person cannot by any promise or performance which does not go beyond the limits of his pre-existing legal duty to another person provide a new consideration for a promise by that other person in his favour. In contemplation of law it is no detriment to a party merely to perform, and no promise of detriment merely to promise to perform what is already his legal duty to the other party to the alleged contract.

Accordingly we are of opinion that the original contract at all relevant times remained in force and that it was never varied or superseded by what was alleged to have been a new contract.

The second question is within a comparatively narrow compass. [The appellant argued] that the cases relating to the circumstances in which a payment will be said to be made "under compulsion" are limited and should not be extended, and that these cases include instances where the payee has been under a statutory duty; where he has been in possession of the payer's goods; where he has held the legal title to land of which the payer was the equitable owner; and other cases where the "compulsion" was exercised in relation to the property of the payer. But, so the argument went, the principle has never been applied [328] to a case where a compulsive threat has been made to refrain from performing merely a contractual duty as distinct from a threat to refrain from performing a statutory duty or a threat to interfere with a proprietary right of the payer. And it was said that to treat a threat to refrain from performing a contractual duty as a sufficient "compulsion", would be to break new ground, and to extend the principle in this way would be contrary to the rule laid down by Lord Sumner in Sinclair v Brougham [1914] AC 398, 453 and adopted by Knox CJ in Smith v William Charlick Ltd (1924) 34 CLR 38, 51.

In the first place we are of opinion that the statements in the cases on which the appellant seeks to rely do not justify his contention. The authorities were reviewed by Long Innes J in Nixon v Furphy (1925) 25 SR (NSW) 151, 160 and his Honour said:

> "Compulsion" in relation to a payment of which refund is sought … includes every species of duress or conduct analogous to duress, actual or threatened, exerted by or on behalf of the payee and applied to the person or the property or any right of the person who pays or, in some cases, of a person related to or in affinity with him.

This statement is in substance to the same effect as the opinion expressed by Fullagar J in Re Hooper and Grass' Contract (1940) VLR 269. Furthermore, it was adopted by Rich J in White Rose Flour Milling Co Pty Ltd v Australian Wheat Board (1944) 18 ALJ 324 and applied to a similar type of case to that now under consideration …

In our opinion the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

[10.95] Note

The view expressed in the principal case that a promise to perform an existing contractual duty by one party cannot be good consideration for a promise by the other party to the contract must now be considered in the light of Musumeci v Winadell Pty Ltd (1994) 34 NSWLR 723, extracted at [4.125].

PART IV

CHAPTER 11

Privity

[11.10] IDENTIFYING THE CONTRACTING PARTIES 324
[11.10] Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee 324
[11.32] NON-APPLICATION OF THE PRIVITY RULE: AGENCY 332

[11.60] Trident General Insurance v McNiece Bros 342
[11.95] REFORM 361

[11.05] The privity rule stipulates that only a person who is a party to a contract can enforce the contract and incur obligations under it. There are two aspects to the doctrine: a contract cannot confer an enforceable benefit on a non-party, nor can it impose an enforceable burden on a non-party. This chapter will focus on the benefit aspect of the rule. The privity rule is separate from the rule that consideration must move from the promisee. Accordingly, a person who wishes to enforce a contract must establish that he or she (a) is a party to (ie, privy to) the contract, and (b) has provided consideration (see Chapter 4).

The doctrine of privity is often regarded as having been established by the case of Tweddle v Atkinson (1861) 1 B & S 393; 121 ER 762. It was, in any event, approved by the High Court of Australia in Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee Co Ltd (1967) 119 CLR 460 and Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd (1956) 95 CLR 43. In Trident General Insurance Co Ltd v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (1988) 165 CLR 107 at [11.60], the High Court re-examined the doctrine at some length in six separate and varying judgments.

The rule that a contract cannot confer an enforceable benefit on a third party does have its supporters, but is generally seen by most as an unsatisfactory rule. The High Court of Australia and the Supreme Court of Canada have recognised exceptions to the rule. European civil codes generally allow contracts to confer enforceable benefits on third parties, as does the common law and statute in the United States. England and the Northern Territory have followed Queensland, Western Australia and New Zealand in enacting legislation to allow third parties in certain circumstances to sue on contracts made for their benefit (see [11.95]).

The unsatisfactory nature of the rule is illustrated by three examples:

1. If A and B enter into a contract under which A promises B (for consideration) to pay $1,000 to C, and A fails to honour this promise, C has no right to sue A to recover the money.
2. If A and B enter into a contract under which A promises B (for consideration) to perform building work for C, and A fails to honour this promise, C cannot sue A for breach of contract.
3. If A and B enter into a contract which includes a term that A cannot sue C if C incurs liability to A, C nonetheless has no defence if A sues C in respect of liability incurred.

By way of criticism, it is said that the result in each of these examples is inconsistent with the intentions of A and B and the expectations of C. There are, however, a number of ways in which C may obtain relief, directly or indirectly.

First, the contracting party may enforce the contract. In example (1), B may be able to obtain a decree of specific performance ordering A to pay C the promised $1,000. In example (2), a decree of specific performance will not be available (see Chapter 30), so B can only obtain damages. A question then arises as to whether B can obtain substantial (as distinct from nominal) damages, if B (as distinct from C) has suffered no loss.

Secondly, it might be possible to argue that the privity doctrine has no application. The apparent non-party C may be able to claim that despite appearances she was in fact a party to the contract by virtue of the doctrine of agency: B as agent for C entered the contract with A. If this is the case, then C was in fact B's "principal", possibly even a principal whose existence was not disclosed to A. The doctrine of agency has been invoked particularly in the context of limitation of liability clauses in contracts for the carriage of goods by sea: see Port Jackson Stevedoring Pty Ltd v Salmond and Spraggon (Aust) Pty Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 231 at [11.35].

Thirdly, C may be able to establish that in respect of the contract between A and B, B was acting as a "trustee" for C. If so, C can compel B to enforce the contract by proceedings in equity. (See the discussion of the trust concept in Trident General Insurance Co v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (1988) 165 CLR 107 at [11.60]–[11.85].)

Fourthly, C may be able to establish an estoppel against B if B has led C to believe that:

- C would have enforceable rights against B; or
- B would perform a certain promise and C has relied on that assumption in such a way that she would suffer detriment if B were allowed to act inconsistently with the assumption (see the discussion in Trident v McNiece at [11.60]–[11.85]).

Fifthly, if C can establish that B's conduct in making the contract was misleading or deceptive, C may be able to claim damages under the Australian Consumer Law; see Accounting Systems 2000 (Developments) Pty Ltd v CCH Australia Ltd (1993) 42 FCR 470 at [33.150].

IDENTIFYING THE CONTRACTING PARTIES

Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee

[11.10] Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee Co Ltd (1967) 119 CLR 460 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia.

[FACTS: A written agreement provided as follows:

Agreement between Arthur Leopold Coulls and O'Neil Construction Proprietary Limited.

In consideration of the sum of £5 I Arthur Leopold Coulls, Anstey's Hill, Highbury East, give to O'Neil Construction Proprietary Ltd the sole right to quarry and remove stone from an area of approximately 50 acres (fifty acres) situated around blue dolomite hill near homestead of original Newman's Nursery. The approximate 50 acres is detailed in attached map ….

O'Neil Construction Proprietary Ltd agrees to pay at the rate of 3d per ton for all stone quarried and sold, also a fixed minimum royalty of £12 per week for a period of ten (10) years with an option of another ten (10) years at above basis (£12 per week minimum) ….

> I authorise the above Company to pay all money connected with this agreement to my wife, Doris Sophia Coulls and myself, Arthur Leopold Coulls as joint tenants (or tenants-in-common?) (the one which goes to living partner).

The agreement was signed by Arthur Coulls, Doris Coulls and L O'Neil who signed on behalf of the company. It was prepared without professional assistance. When Arthur Coulls died, the question arose as to whether Doris Coulls or Arthur Coulls' estate was entitled to the royalties. Arthur Coulls' two children from a previous marriage stood to benefit if the royalties formed part of his estate. His executors (Bagot's) sought the guidance of the Supreme Court of South Australia on several questions arising out of the agreement. The relevant questions were as follows:

(1) Is O'Neil Construction Pty Ltd entitled or bound to pay the royalties payable under the said agreement to Bagot's?

(2) Is O'Neil Construction Pty Ltd entitled or bound to pay the royalties payable under the said agreement to Doris Sophia Coulls, the deceased's widow?

(3) If the said royalties are paid to Bagot's does it receive and hold the royalties as executor or trustee of the deceased's estate or for or on behalf of the said widow or for the widow and the deceased's estate jointly or in common?

The trial judge declared that (1) O'Neil Construction Pty Ltd was not entitled or bound to pay the royalties under the agreement to Bagot's; (2) O'Neil Construction Pty Ltd was entitled and bound to pay the said royalties to Doris Sophia Coulls. On appeal, the members of the High Court were divided in their views about the proper interpretation of the agreement. McTiernan, Taylor and Owen JJ held that the agreement was one between the company and Mr Coulls and that Mrs Coulls was only a third party beneficiary and not a party to the agreement. As a beneficiary, she only had an interest under a revocable mandate which lapsed on Mr Coulls' death and was not binding on his executor. Barwick CJ and Windeyer J (dissenting on this point) held that the agreement was one between the company on the one hand and Mr and Mrs Coulls on the other.]

BARWICK CJ (dissenting): [478] I have come to the conclusion that not only was the promise to pay, a promise to pay the deceased and [Mrs Coulls] during their joint lifetime and thereafter the survivor of them, but that it was a promise given to both of them to make those payments.

It must be accepted that, according to our law, a person not a party to a contract may not himself sue upon it so as directly to enforce its obligations. For my part, I find no difficulty or embarrassment in this conclusion. Indeed, I would find it odd that a person to whom no promise was made could himself in his own right enforce a promise made to another. But that does not mean that it is not possible for that person to obtain the benefit of a promise made with another for his benefit by steps other than enforcement by himself in his own right: see the recent case of Beswick v Beswick [1966] Ch 538. I would myself, with great respect, agree with the conclusion that where A promises B for a consideration supplied by B to pay C then B may obtain specific performance of A's promise, at least where the nature of the consideration given would have allowed the debtor to have obtained specific performance. I can see no reason whatever why A in those circumstances should not be bound to perform his promise. That C provided no part of the consideration seems to me irrelevant. Questions of consideration and of privity are not always kept distinct. Indeed, on some occasions when lack of privity is the real reason for not allowing a plaintiff to succeed on a promise not made with him, an unnecessary and irrelevant reason is given that the plaintiff was a stranger to the consideration; that is to say, that he was not merely not a party to the agreement but was not a party to the bargain. In Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] AC 847 privity was not lacking because it was assumed, but the promise made by the defendant to the plaintiff was as between them gratuitous. But in this case whether the promise was made by the company to the deceased alone or to the deceased and [Mrs Coulls], it was not as between promisor and promisee a gratuitous promise.

But as I construe this writing, we have here not a promise by A with B for consideration supplied by B to pay C. It was, in my opinion, a promise by A made to B and C for consideration to pay B and C. In such a case it cannot lie in the mouth of A, in my [479] opinion, to question whether the consideration which he received for his promise moved from both B and C or, as between themselves, only from one of them. His promise is not a gratuitous promise as between himself and the promisees as on the view I take of the agreement it was a promise in respect of which there was privity between A on the one hand and B and C on the other. Such a promise, in my opinion, is clearly enforceable in the joint lifetime of B and C: but it is only enforceable if both B and C are parties to the action to enforce it. B, though he only supplied the consideration, could not sue alone. If C were unwilling to join in the action as plaintiff, B no doubt, after suitable tender of costs, could join C as a defendant. And A's promise could be enforced. But the judgment would be for payment to B and C. If B would not join in an action to enforce A's promise, I see no reason why C should not sue joining B as a defendant. Again, in my opinion, A's promise would be enforced and a judgment in favour of B and C would result. In neither of these cases could A successfully deny either privity or consideration. I find nothing in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd to suggest that he could.

Upon the death of one of the joint promisees the promise remains on foot and remains enforceable but it is still the same promise given to B and C though, because of the death of one and the right of survivorship, the promise is now to pay the survivor. C, it seems to me, being the survivor, may enforce the promise by an action to which both B's estate and C are parties. However, C could not, in any event, in my opinion, be the sole plaintiff against A because A's promise was not made with C alone. Consequently, B's personal representative would need to be either a co-plaintiff or joined as a defendant, though in this case the judgment would be for C alone, the promise with B and C being to pay the survivor of them: see Attwood v Rattenbury (1822) 6 Moo CP 579 at 584.

Being of this opinion it is unnecessary for me to discuss the question as to whether and, if so, how [Mrs Coulls] could enforce a promise made to the deceased alone to pay her and the deceased for their joint lives and thereafter the survivor of them. In my opinion, however, the right to quarry being specifically enforceable, the executor could enforce the promise to pay [Mrs Coulls]. If he happened to receive them, he could not retain the proceeds of the action beneficially. The question whether C can require the executor to enforce such a promise, or by any means use the executor's name to do so need not presently be investigated.

[480] In my opinion, questions one, two and three should be answered in the same sense as the first and second declarations made by the primary judge …

[11.15] TAYLOR AND OWEN JJ: [485] It was argued in the court below that the wife of the testator was a party to the contract and, alternatively, that the last paragraph of the contract operated as an equitable assignment to her of the royalties payable thereunder after the death of her [486] husband. For our part we are quite unable to see how the last paragraph of the agreement can operate as an equitable assignment having regard both to its terms and to the fact that, even if its terms had not precluded this result, it was not supported by consideration. If, however, the correct conclusion is that the widow was a party to the contract it is, to our minds, clear that she is entitled to receive the royalties payable after her husband's death notwithstanding that she, personally, gave no consideration for the company's promise. We do not accept the contention advanced on behalf of the appellant that if one, only, of two joint promisees provides the consideration for a promisor's promise the other promisee cannot, in any circumstances, sue to recover moneys payable according to the promise. Indeed it is apparent that in such circumstances at common law an action to recover must have been brought by both promisees and that it would fail if brought by one alone. Further it is established that on the death of one of such joint promisees the right of action against the debtor vests at common law in the survivor though of course this does not necessarily determine the ultimate rights, inter se, of the survivor and of the estate of the deceased promisee (Martin v Crompe (1698) 1 Ld Raym 340; 91 ER 1123; Anderson v Martindale (1801) 1 East 497; 102 ER 191; and Jell v Douglas (1821) 4 B & Ald 374; 106 ER 974). The question to be determined, then, is whether the testator's wife was a party to the contract and whether, upon its true construction, the contract contains a promise by the company to pay to her the royalties falling due under the contract after the testator's death.

We observe first of all that there is nothing whatever in the contract apart from the last paragraph upon which a conclusion could be based that she was a party to the contract. On the contrary the contract purports expressly to be one made between Arthur Leopold Coulls and O'Neil Construction Pty Ltd. It is the testator alone who engaged to give to the company the sole right to quarry and remove stone from the land described, to grant a "permanent right of way" along the original council road of "Watergully" to Perseverance Road and to extend the initial "period" of ten years for another ten years. On its part the company agrees with the testator to pay royalties at the rates specified. But it is said that the only promise to pay royalties made by the company is that contained in the last paragraph and that this is a promise to pay "all money connected with this agreement" [487] to the testator and his wife jointly during their lives and, after the death of one of them, to the survivor. In our view, however, this is not the effect of that paragraph; there was no express promise by the company to pay royalties to the wife nor is it possible to imply such a promise. One cannot doubt, of course, that the testator intended that the royalties should be paid to his wife after his death if she should survive him but it seems to us that the method which he chose to carry this intention into effect miscarried in spite of the fact that his wife's signature appears at the foot of the contract following those of the testator and L O'Neil for the company. The evidence showed that the contract had been written out by the testator's wife at his request and it may have been thought that the effect of the last paragraph was to make her a party and that therefore her signature was necessary. But the mere fact that her signature appears does not make her a party; this is a question to be resolved upon a consideration of the written instrument itself. It seems to us that the terms of the last paragraph do not prescribe the persons who are to be entitled to demand and receive the royalties payable under the agreement and, therefore, do not negative the certain implication which would otherwise arise that it was the testator who was to be so entitled. On what other basis could the husband, alone, "authorise" the survivor to receive them after the death of either himself or his wife? It is, of course, obvious that in the preparation of this informal agreement the persons concerned contemplated, and provided for, the contingency of the death of the testator or his wife during its currency and it is not without significance that, whereas the testator authorized his wife to receive the royalties payable after his death, there is no corresponding authorization by the wife in the event of her husband surviving her. We think it is clear that the only person entitled to demand royalties under the contract was the testator and that his wife was not a party to it. Accordingly we are of the opinion that, since the last paragraph cannot operate as an equitable assignment, the authority which that paragraph gave came to an end on the testator's death. We may say that we come to this conclusion with some regret since it operates to defeat what must, in the circumstances, be presumed to have been the manifest intention of the testator. In our opinion the appeal should be allowed …

[11.20] McTIERNAN J: [482] Because Mrs Coulls signed the document it is argued that she, as well as her husband, are parties to the agreement evidenced by the third memorandum and that the agreement by the company is to pay the royalties to them jointly till one dies and then to pay them to the survivor, the manner of payment being according to the mandate. I am of opinion that this argument is contrary to the whole tenor of the document. The first part of it purports to be a transaction only between AL Coulls and the company. The words of the document including its heading Agreement between Arthur Leopold Coulls and O'Neil Construction Proprietary [483] Limited countervail against the inference that Mrs Coulls is a party, sought to be drawn from the fact that she signed it. It seems to me that the third memorandum evidences an agreement between the company and AL Coulls on the amount of the royalties and the period of the right to quarry.

I am of opinion that the correct view of the first part of the document is that it is a contract to which the only parties are AL Coulls and the company; and it is implied in the contract that the company is liable to pay to AL Coulls the royalties stipulated by the third and fourth memoranda in the document. Accordingly, I hold that the provisions of the document do not impose on the company a contractual obligation to pay to Mrs Coulls any royalty which accrues due from it after the death of the testator or at all.

[11.25] WINDEYER J (dissenting): [490] The appellant contends that it is nothing more than a mandate by the deceased to pay to his wife moneys to which he was to become entitled. If that were all that it was, it was revocable by him at any time, and was revoked on his death in respect of all moneys not already paid pursuant to it …. But, with respect for the opinion of those who hold this view of the document, I have come to the conclusion that it is not what on its true construction it means.

I think that the last clause must be read as part and parcel of a contract by which, in consideration of the grant by the deceased of the sole right to take stone from the land, the construction company promised to pay in the way provided. I think that the promise of the company was to pay for the stone at the rate stipulated, such payments to be made to the husband and wife jointly during their lives and thereafter to the survivor. Several factors lead me to that conclusion. The document was signed not only by the deceased and the representative of the construction company, but also by the wife. I can see no reason for her signature except upon the basis that she had an interest in the performance of the contract. It is not, I think, altogether incongruous that a contractual term as to the manner of payment should be introduced [491] by the words "I authorise". It was the deceased who could stipulate how his stone was to be paid for. His expression, "I authorise", should I consider be read as equivalent to a requirement by him. It can hardly have been intended by him that an arrangement expressed to continue in favour of the survivor of himself and his wife should be destroyed if he died first ….

I therefore conclude that in the present case it was a term of the contract that, as from the death of Coulls (he having predeceased his wife), all moneys becoming due under the agreement should be payable to the respondent, Mrs Coulls. That being so, the answer to the question in the originating summons: "Is O'Neil Construction Pty Ltd entitled or bound to pay the royalties under the agreement to Doris Sophia Coulls the deceased's widow?", must I think be "Yes. It is entitled to do so; and it is bound to do so". That is because that is what it must do to perform its contract.

[492] The transaction can then be analysed, in terms of contract, in either of two ways. One is that the company (by its agent O'Neil) promised Coulls and his wife, for valuable consideration (actually provided by him but on behalf of both of them), that it would pay the royalties to them for their joint lives and afterwards to the survivor.

The other analysis is that the company (by O'Neil) promised Coulls alone for consideration moving from him alone that it would pay the royalties to him and his wife for their joint lives and afterwards to the survivor. In my view, the former analysis is, for reasons I shall give, the correct one. However, as I appreciate that the other is open and derives some support from the heading of the document, I shall consider the consequences of each to show why in my opinion the ultimate answer in this case is the same in whichever way the contract be viewed.

My reasons for saying that the promise by the construction company was made to Coulls and Mrs Coulls as joint promisees are as follows. [His Honour then gave his reasons and continued:]

[493] Still, it was said, no consideration moved from her. But that, I consider, mistakes the nature of a contract made with two or more persons jointly. The promise is made to them collectively. It must, of course, be supported by consideration, but that does not mean by considerations furnished by them separately. It means a consideration given on behalf of them all, and therefore moving from all of them. In such a case the promise of the promisor is not gratuitous; and, as between him and the joint promisees, it matters not how they were able to provide the price of his promise to them. That is the position as I see it. It accords with the very old decision in Rookwood's case (1589) Cro Eliz 164; 78 ER 421, and with general principle.

On this view, that Coulls and Mrs Coulls were joint promisees, an action against the construction company would, during their joint lives, have had to be brought in the names of both. If one had refused to be joined as a plaintiff, he or she could, after an offer of indemnity against costs, have been made a defendant: Whitehead v Hughes (1834) 2 Cr & M 318; 149 ER 782; Cullen v Knowles [1898] 2

QB 380; Rodriguez v Speyer Brothers [1919] AC 59 at 103, 104. After the death of either of two joint promisees an action on a contract can be brought by the survivor alone: see Halsbury's Laws of England (3rd ed), vol 8, p 67. Therefore, Mrs Coulls, on the basis that she is a surviving joint promisee, could now bring an action on the contract; and in respect of moneys becoming due and payable under it since the death of her husband recover them for herself alone.

I turn now to the other view of the transaction – as a contract between Coulls and the construction company that it would pay the royalties to himself and his wife during their joint lives and afterwards to the survivor of them.

[494] By the common law of England only those who are parties to a contract can sue upon it. For us that statement is incontrovertible. But what exactly is meant by it? Is there a useful distinction between denying a right of action to a person because no promise was made to him, and denying a right of action to a person to whom a promise was made because no consideration for it moved from him? The change the learned authors of Cheshire and Fifoot on Contract made in their sixth (1964) edition, p 65, from their earlier editions, illustrates the question. Now, after a recantation of earlier opinion, they say:

> So long as consideration is an essential feature of English law it would seem to be immaterial whether a person is forbidden to sue on the ground that he has given no consideration or on the ground that he is a stranger to the contract. They are but two ways of saying the same thing.

Yet a distinction was from an early date made, verbally at least, between the two matters. Actions of assumpsit were sometimes said to fail because the promise sued on was not made to the plaintiff; a very early example is Jordan v Jordan (1595) Cro Eliz 369; 78 ER 616. In other cases they were said to fail because, as it was put in Bourne v Mason (1669) 2 Keb 457; 86 ER 5: "the plaintiff did nothing of trouble to himself or benefit to the defendant but is a mere stranger to the consideration."

And sometimes it was said of an unsuccessful plaintiff that he was not privy to either the promise or the consideration. The two matters were stated separately, and each was said to be fundamental, by Lord Haldane in the well known passage in his speech in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] AC 847 at 853. And Lord Wright in Vandepitte v Preferred Accident Insurance Corp of New York [1933] AC 70 at 79, also stated them separately when he said: "no doubt at common law no one can sue on a contract except those who are contracting parties and (if the contract is not under seal) from and between whom consideration proceeds."

Doubtless the two requisites merge in the strict view of a contract as a bargain, a promise for which the promisee has paid the price. Yet the question as posed by Williston has perhaps not been firmly and finally answered: "Does the law require that promises shall be paid for by the promisee, or does it merely require that the promise shall be paid for by someone?": Williston on Contracts (3rd ed), vol 1, s 114, p 495.

In the United States the question does not now arise in the same way as it does for us. There, in most but not in all jurisdictions, third persons (both donee-beneficiaries and creditor-beneficiaries as they are called) are now able to sue directly upon contracts made by others for their benefit. This rule, now accepted by the Restatement of the Law of Contracts, was arrived at only after much conflict among courts and commentators, as the following passage, from the judgment in Tweeddale v Tweeddale (1903) 116 Win 517; 93 NW 440, shows:

> It is useless to endeavour to review the authorities touching the subject before us with a view of harmonising them upon any one single theory as to the principle upon which the liability to the third person is based, or as to what are the essential elements to effect it. There is as much confusion, probably, in the judicial holdings in respect of the matter as on any question of law that can be mentioned … There is confusion not only between different courts, but confusion in the decisions in many jurisdictions in the same court.

On whatever foundation the American doctrine be put, it cannot, I think, be accepted as a part of the common law as we have inherited it. For us the rule prevails that a plaintiff who sues on a promise must show a consideration for it provided by him …. [499] Whether we like them or not, the rules relating to consideration seem to me a stubborn part of our law. They cannot be displaced by courts by head-on collision. Fortior et potentior est dispositio legis quam hominis. Where then does the law now stand?

Suppose that A makes a contract with B that, for consideration moving from A, B will pay $500 to C, and B fails to do so, C cannot sue B at law. Nor can he seek relief in equity unless A has become a trustee for him of his, A's, rights under the contract. (I leave out of consideration any statutory modification of these rules.) It is, however, equally certain that A can sue B for damages; for, by not paying C, B has broken his contract with A. (Alternatively, A may sue B for specific performance in a case where that remedy is available.) Two questions arise. If A sues [500] for damages, what damages can he recover from B? Secondly, for whom does he get them, himself or C?

In Beswick v Beswick Lord Denning MR said (at 554): "Although the third person cannot as a rule sue alone in his own name, nevertheless there is no difficulty whatever in the one contracting party suing the other party for breach of the promise."

So far, I suppose no one could disagree. But his Lordship goes on to say: "The third person should therefore bring the action in the name of the contracting party, just as an assignee used to do", and he concludes that by this means the third party can obtain what the promisor had promised to pay him.

That again I must respectfully take leave to doubt. In the first place, it supposes that the damages which the promisee suffered because the contract with him was broken are to be measured by, and equated with, the benefits which the third person would have got had it been performed. In the second place, it assumes that the plaintiff brings his action on behalf of the third person, who becomes entitled to its fruits. For reasons which will appear, I cannot accept either proposition …

[501] The question which presents itself at this point is what is the measure of damages for breach of a promise to confer a benefit upon a third party? Take the case supposed above; a contract by A with B under which B is to pay $500 to C. A sues B for breach of contract. There are authorities which say that he could recover only nominal damages, because it is C who has suffered not he: see West v Houghton (1879) 4 CPD 197; Viles v Viles [1939] SASR 164; but compare Drimmie v Davies [1899] 1 IR 176. As Else-Mitchell J remarked in Cathels v Commissioner of Stamp Duties [1962] SR (NSW) 455 at 472 the cases on this point are "conflicting and unsatisfactory". No difficulty would arise if a statement of Lush LJ in Lloyd's v Harper (1880) 16 Ch D 290 at 321, could be accepted without qualification and regardless of its context. He said: "I consider it be an established rule of law that where a contract is made with A for the benefit of B, A can sue on the contract for the benefit of B and recover all that B could have recovered if the contract had been made with B himself."

But I think we must take it that when the learned Lord Justice spoke of a contract for the benefit of B he was thinking of a contract of which A was a trustee for B; that is to say of a case in which A held his legal rights under a contract as a trustee for B. In such a case of course the question disappears but the case I have supposed, a contract by A with B that B will pay C $500, is a transaction at law devoid of any equity in C. Yet I do not see why, if A sued B for a breach of it, he must get no more than nominal damages. If C were A's creditor, and the $500 was to be paid to discharge A's debt, then B's failure to pay it would cause A more than nominal damage. Or, suppose C was a person whom A felt he had a duty to reward or recompense, or was someone who, with the aid of $500, was to engage in some activity which A wished to promote or from which he might benefit – I can see no reason why in such cases the damages which A would suffer upon B's breach of his contract to pay C $500 would be merely nominal. I think that, in accordance with the ordinary rules for the assessment of damages [502] for breach of contract, they could be substantial. They would not necessarily be $500; they could, I think, be less, or more. That is as I see it. I realise that (as Messrs Goff and Jones mentioned in their work the Law of Restitution and as Mr Treitel has recently emphasised) there are statements in Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 QB 147 (by Lord Esher at 153 and by Fry LJ at 157, 158) which suggests that the promisee could recover not unliquidated damages but the sum which the promisor had agreed he would pay to the third party; but I find difficulty in seeing how this could be so.

Suppose that A does recover substantial damages for B's failure to perform his promise to A to pay C $500 – the next question is, does he recover those damages for himself or for C. Notwithstanding the statements in Beswick v Beswick [1966] 1 Ch 538, suggesting that he would recover them for C, I do not see why this should be. On the hypothesis of a purely contractual right with no trust attached, why should A hold for C the proceeds of his action? He sued at law for damages he himself suffered, not as the representative of C. C had no right of action. A, not being a trustee of his contractual rights, might, had he wished, have released B from his contract, or declined to sue him for breach of it; or by agreement between A and B the contract could have been varied. C could not have complained. Why then is it said that proceedings brought by A to enforce his legal right give C a right against A when previously he had none? (I leave out of consideration the possibility of a bargain between A and C supported by consideration moving from C.) Of course A, whose purpose had miscarried because of B's breach of contract, might make over any damages he recovered to C; but that would not be because C had a right to them, but because A still wished to give effect to his plan to confer a benefit on him. In a case in which specific performance was an available remedy, A might choose to seek that form of redress against B, and thus obtain a judgment that B pay C $500. That, however, would not be because A was enforcing a right of C, but because he was enforcing his own right against B by obtaining an order that B perform his contract with him, A. For this reason – and always on the assumptions that there was no trust and that the transaction was as between A and C wholly gratuitous – I am not persuaded that C could force A to seek redress from B, or dictate to him what form of redress, specific performance or damages, he should seek.

On the interpretation of the royalty agreement now under consideration Coulls, or his executor, could in my opinion obtain an order for specific performance by the construction company [503] of its promise to pay the royalties. This agreement can be regarded as specifically enforceable because of the interests in land involved. That suffices, in this case, but I would be prepared to go further. The decision in Beswick v Beswick [1966] 1 Ch 538 points out the way and, as at present advised, I would follow it. I do not think it is really a new way, although it is perhaps now more easily seen. It seems to me that contracts to pay money or transfer property to a third person are always, or at all events very often, contracts for breach of which damages would be an inadequate remedy – all the more so if it be right (I do not think it is) that damages recoverable by the promisee are only nominal. Nominal or substantial, the question seems to be the same, for when specific relief is given in lieu of damages it is because the remedy, damages, cannot satisfy the demands of justice. "The court", said Lord Selborne, "gives specific performance instead of damages only when it can by that means do more perfect and complete justice": Wilson v Northampton and Banbury Junction Railway Co (1874) 9 Ch App 279 at 284. Lord Erskine in Alley v Deschamps (1806) 13 Ves Jun 225, 227; 33 ER 278, 279 said of the doctrine of specific performance: "This court assumed the jurisdiction upon this simple principle: that the party had a legal right to the performance of the contract, to which right the courts of law, whose jurisdiction did not extend beyond damages, had not the means of giving effect."

Complete and perfect justice to a promisee may well require that a promisor perform his promise to pay money or transfer property to a third party. I see no reason why specific performance should not be had in such cases; but of course not where the promise was to render some personal service. There is no reason today for limiting by particular categories, rather than by general principle, the cases in which orders for specific performance will be made. The days are long past when the common law courts looked with jealousy upon what they thought was a usurpation by the Chancery Court of their jurisdiction.

Nevertheless, I fail to see how allowing a promisee to obtain an order for specific performance by a promisor of his promise to pay moneys or transfer property to a third person can give the third person himself any right to enforce a contract to which he was not a party. The promisee has a choice of remedies. But, unless he be a trustee of his contractual rights, he can, if he chooses, abandon both. On the hypothesis that Mrs Coulls was not a party to the contract, that the contract was only with her husband it seems [504] to me that there is a logical hiatus in saying that she could compel proceedings to enforce it.

The situation thus created does not fit quite neatly into a classification of rights and reciprocal remedies. It suffices, however, to refer to the analysis by du Parcq LJ in Re Schebsman [1944] Ch 83 which I respectfully adopt. The primary obligation of a party to a contract is to perform it, to keep his promise. That is what the law requires of him. If he fails to do so, he incurs a liability to pay damages. That, however, is the ancillary remedy for his violation of the other party's primary right to have him carry out his promise. It is, I think, a faulty analysis of legal obligations to say that the law treats a promisor as having a right to elect either to perform his promise or to pay damages. Rather, using one sentence from the passage from Lord Erskine's judgment which I have quoted above, the promisee has "a legal right to the performance of the contract". Moreover, we are concerned with what Fullagar J once called "a system which has never regarded strict logic as its sole inspiration": Tatham v Huxtable (1950) 81 CLR 639 at 649.

For these reasons I conclude that, even on the hypothesis that Mrs Coulls was a third person to be benefited but not a party to the contract, the answer to the question in the originating summons is still that the construction company is bound to pay the royalties to her, for whatever difficulties she might have in compelling it to do so, it would break its contract if it did not do so.

I sum up my opinion as follows: The construction company was bound by contract to pay the royalties to Coulls and his wife during their lives and to the survivor after the death of either. Whether the contractual promise of the company was with Coulls and his wife jointly or with Coulls alone, the result for the purposes of this originating summons is the same.

Appeal allowed. Declaration that the respondent O'Neil Construction Pty Ltd is entitled and bound to pay the royalties payable under the agreement to the executor.

The joint promisee doctrine enunciated in Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee Co Ltd (1967) 119 CLR 460 was criticised by Professor Coote in "Consideration and the Joint Promisee" [1978] Cambridge Law Journal 300.

NON-APPLICATION OF THE PRIVITY RULE: AGENCY

[11.32] It may be possible to show that a party not directly involved in acts of contract formation is nevertheless a party to the contract. The privity rule does not apply if a person promised a benefit under a contract can show that one of the parties involved in the contractual negotiations entered into the contract as his or her agent. An agent is a person who has power to enter into a contract on behalf of another person. If A, acting as an agent of C (principal), makes a contract with B, then C is a party to that contract. Agency relationships can be created expressly or by implication. To establish the existence of an agency relationship, it is necessary to show that the principal expressly or impliedly consented to the agent acting on his or her behalf so as to effect the principal's relations with third parties.

In addition to establishing that an agency relationship exists, it will also be necessary to show that, with respect to the particular transaction under consideration, the agent was purporting to act on behalf of the principal and not solely on his or her own behalf. Ratification refers to the adoption or confirmation of a contract made without prior authorisation. The concept is considered in detail in Port Jackson Stevedoring v Salmond & Spraggon (Aust) (The "New York Star").

Port Jackson Stevedoring v Salmond & Spraggon (Aust) (The "New York Star")

[11.35] Port Jackson Stevedoring Pty Ltd v Salmond & Spraggon (Aust) Pty Ltd (The "New York Star") (1978) 139 CLR 231 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the New South Wales Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: The Schick Razor Company of Canada shipped a consignment of 37 cartons of razor blades from New Brunswick in Canada to Sydney on the "New York Star" (a ship owned by the Blue Star Line). The bill of lading (which set out the terms of the contract of carriage) was issued by the Blue Star Line to the consignor (Schick) and was transmitted to and accepted by the consignee (the respondent). The appellant was a stevedoring company operating in Sydney. The appellant was 49 per cent owned by the Blue Star Line, commonly acted as its stevedore and was aware of the terms of the bill of lading. The razor blades were unloaded by the appellant on arrival in Sydney and placed in a shed, from which 33 of the 37 cartons were stolen, having been misdelivered by the appellant stevedores. The respondent consignee sued the appellant stevedore in tort. Clause 17 of the bill of lading provided that the carrier was discharged from liability if suit was not brought within one year after the date on which the goods should have been delivered. Clause 2 was a "Himalaya clause", which extended the benefit of defences and immunities conferred on the carrier to every independent contractor employed by the carrier. These provisions were in substance identical to those considered by the Privy Council in New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v AM Satterthwaite & Co Ltd (The Eurymedon) [1975] AC 154, an appeal from the Court of Appeal in New Zealand. The stevedore relied upon these provisions as affording a defence to the consignee's action on the basis that the carrier had entered into the contract as agent for the stevedore.

Before Sheppard J, the two relevant arguments made by the consignee were:

1. that one of the necessary conditions for applying the "Himalaya clause" had not been satisfied, in that it had not been shown that the carrier had authority to act on the stevedore's behalf in accepting the bill of lading (the "agency" point); and
2. that the bill of lading ceased to have any operation after the goods passed over the ship's rail (the "construction" point).

Sheppard J rejected these arguments, but found that the necessary agency was established only by ratification. He gave judgment for the stevedore. In the Court of Appeal, the same arguments were put forward and were rejected by the court. The court found that the necessary agency was directly established by the evidence, so that reliance on ratification was not necessary. In addition, however, the consignee was given leave to take a fresh point, namely:

3. that there was no proof of consideration moving from the stevedore so as to entitle it to the benefit of defences and immunity clauses in the bill of lading (the "consideration" point).

The Court of Appeal accepted that contention, allowed the appeal and gave judgment for the consignee for $14,684.98 damages.

In the High Court of Australia, the "agency" point and the "consideration" point were again argued, but rejected by the majority of the court: Barwick CJ, Mason and Jacobs JJ.

As to the "construction" point, senior counsel for the consignee expressly disclaimed reliance upon it (since Glass JA in the Court of Appeal had described it as "without substance") and argument upon it was not heard. However, the majority of the Court, (Barwick CJ dissenting) decided the appeal in favour of the consignee upon this point.

In the Privy Council their Lordships found in favour of the stevedore on all points, and on the appeal as a whole were in agreement with the judgment of Barwick CJ in the High Court.]

BARWICK CJ (dissenting): [234] The bill … contained the following clauses:

> 2. It is expressly agreed that no servant or agent of the Carrier (including every independent contractor from time to time employed by the Carrier) shall in any circumstances whatever be under any liability whatsoever to the Shipper, Consignee or Owner of the goods or to any holder of this Bill of Lading for any loss, damage or delay of whatsoever kind arising or resulting directly or indirectly from any act, neglect or default on his part while acting in the course of or in connection with his employment and, without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions in this Clause, every exemption, limitation, condition and liberty herein contained and every right, exemption from liability, defense and immunity of whatsoever nature applicable to the Carrier or to which the Carrier is entitled hereunder shall also be available and shall extend to protect every such servant or agent of the Carrier acting as aforesaid and for the purpose of all the foregoing provisions of this Clause the Carrier is or shall be deemed to be acting as agent or trustee on behalf of and for the benefit of all persons who are or might be his servants or agents from time to time (including independent contractors as aforesaid) and all such persons shall to this extent be or be deemed to be parties to the contract in or evidenced by this Bill of Lading …
> 17. In any event the Carrier and the ship shall be discharged from all liability in respect of loss or damage unless suit is brought within one year after the delivery of the goods or the date when the goods should have been delivered. Suit shall not be deemed brought until jurisdiction shall have been obtained over the Carrier and/or the ship by service of process or by an agreement to appear.

[239] There is, in my opinion, no reason not to enforce the time limitation in cl 17, if the appellant (the stevedore) is in a position to take advantage of it. Its enforcement would in no wise defeat any object of the bill, would not lead to any absurdity, nor are its provisions unreasonable. It is commercially acceptable and, indeed, reasonably necessary that time limitations should be imposed if the consignor or the consignee claims recourse against ship or stevedore by reasons of alleged defaults in the performance of obligations borne by the ship either as carrier or as bailee or by the independent stevedore … The respondent (the consignee) knew at the date it sought delivery of the goods that the appellant was in default. A period of 12 months therefrom within which to commence proceedings is not unreasonable in relation to a commercial activity of the subject kind.

[240] Their Lordships in The Eurymedon adopted the dicta of Lord Reid in Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1962] AC 446 at 474. This adoption clearly lays down that the stevedore discharging the ship was entitled to the benefit of clauses such as cll 2 and 17 in the present bill of lading if, (1) the bill of lading made it clear that the carrier intended by its terms to protect the stevedore, (2) the carrier by the bill contracted for the stevedore's protection as well as for his own, (3) the authority of the carrier to act for the stevedore in this respect whether antecedently or by ratification was made out, and (4) that there was consideration moving from the stevedore.

At the trial of the present action, the first two and the last of these requisites were conceded by the respondent, though the third was contested. The learned trial judge, however, found that the appellant had ratified the agreement made by the carrier on its behalf. Accordingly, judgment was given for the appellant.

The terms of cl 2 make it abundantly clear that the carrier purported to contract with the consignor for independent contractors it might engage to handle the consignment …

Thus items (1) and (2) above were in my opinion properly conceded at the hearing of the action.

[241] The appellate court, having reviewed the evidence, found that "the carrier in bargaining for the protection of (the) stevedore was acting with the appellant's authority", that is, with its antecedent authority. In my opinion, this was a correct conclusion of fact …

However, although the contrary was conceded at the trial, the respondent (the appellant before the appellate court) sought to submit to that court that there was no consideration shown to be moving from the appellant to support in its favour the benefit of cll 2 and 17 of the bill of lading …

The appellate court, having allowed the point to be raised before it, thereafter decided it against the appellant. This court must now deal with it.

As appears from the passage quoted below, the appellate court in reaching its conclusion treated the case as one in which an offer at large had been made requiring acceptance by an act done as an acceptance of that offer.

The appellate court found that it had not been established that the appellant had accepted the offer or given consideration to support the agreement with the consignor which it claimed had been made by means of the bill of lading and its own activity in discharging, sorting and stacking the shipment in question. The relevant passage in the judgment of Glass JA, which received the assent of the other members of the appellate court, is as follows:

> The plaintiff [the respondent] then submits that although the stevedore's knowledge of the exempting offer could be inferred, there is no evidence that in performing its stevedoring functions it did so in reliance upon the offer. [242] … I find that the stevedore knew of the shipper's offer to exempt. But it was bound to carry out stevedoring operations under its contract. For all that appears there may have been no relationship whatever between the conduct of the stevedore and its knowledge of the offer: Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424 at 457. It is quite consistent with the facts proved that the stevedore acted as it did solely because of the contract it had made with the carrier. For these reasons I conclude that there is a fatal gap in the stevedore's proofs of the fourth condition on which The Eurymedon doctrine depends.

From this quotation of their reasons it will be observed that the appellate court accepted the view that the bill of lading, in relation both to the activities of the carrier and those of the stevedore was intended to govern those activities taking place after the consignment had left the ship's tackles.

The analysis of the situation which arose on the consignor's acceptance of the bill of lading covering the shipment which found favour with the appellate court is, in my opinion erroneous. It led that court to look for an act of the stevedore in-[243]tended acceptance by the stevedore of a standing offer contained or made in the bill of lading.

I proceed to develop my own view of the consequence of the issue to and acceptance by the consignor of the bill of lading containing the clauses I have quoted. From this my divergence from the basis of the appellate court's decision will become apparent.

As the authority of the carrier to make with the consignor an arrangement for the benefit of the appellant was made out, it cannot be doubted, in my opinion, that the carrier acted with the authority of the appellant as its agent to make an arrangement with the consignor for the protection of the appellant, as an independent contractor participating in the handling of the cargo, again using "handling" in a neutral sense. To that arrangement there were two parties, the consignor and the appellant. By later accepting the bill the consignee became party to the arrangement with the consignor. I can see no validity in a suggestion that the bill of lading could not at the one time contain a contract of carriage between the consignor and carrier and an arrangement between consignor and stevedore, made through the agency of the carrier, to regulate the relationship of consignor and stevedore, when the stevedoring work was undertaken.

For my part, I find no difficulty in interpreting the arrangement made by the bill of lading and its acceptance by the consignor as providing that if, in fact, the appellant stevedored the cargo, leaving aside for the moment what the stevedoring involved, the appellant should have the benefit of the clauses of the bill including the benefit of the time limitation expressed in cl 17 of the bill of lading. I am unable to treat the clauses of the bill of lading as in any respect an unaccepted but acceptable offer by consignor to stevedore. Indeed, I do not think the bill can be interpreted as containing an offer at large by the consignor. The consignor and the appellant as stevedore were ad idem through the carrier's agency upon the acceptance by the consignor of the bill of lading as to the protection the stevedore should have in the event that it stevedored the consignment. But this consensus lacked the essential of consideration. The appellant through the bill of lading made no promise to stevedore the cargo. Thus, whilst I would not analyse the situation obtaining on the acceptance of the bill of lading as an exchange of promises, I would not analyse it as merely the making of an offer susceptible of acceptance by an act of the stevedore done in purported acceptance of the offer. For this reason I have described the bill [244] of lading in so far as the carrier there purports to act for the appellant as an arrangement. To agree with another that, in the event that the other acts in a particular way, that other shall be entitled to stated protective provisions only needs performance by the doing of the specified act or acts to become a binding contract. Whether or not the arrangement is susceptible of unilateral disavowal before the stated act is done need not be discussed. Here the act was done. The performance of the act or acts at the one moment satisfied the need for consideration and attracted the agreed terms. For myself, and with due respect to those who find comfort in them, I find the descriptions "unilateral and bilateral" or "mutual" unhelpful in the resolution of this case. Indeed, the use of them seems to assume that they are mutually exclusive terms and together cover all possibilities. But I do not think they do. Indeed, this bill of lading, as I read it, indicates in my opinion that they do not. As I see it, we have here an arrangement, a compact with agreed conditions to attend the performance of certain acts, which are not promised to be done. True enough that, until such performance, the consensus has nothing upon which to operate. But that is its essential characteristic, to provide an agreed consequence to future action should that action take place: to attach conditions to a relationship arising from conduct. If one desires to use the terms, it could be said that the arrangement is mutual: it is bilateral: to it there are two parties both agreeing to the terms of the intended consequence, on the one hand the consignor and on the other the stevedore acting through its authorised agent, the carrier. The performance of the contemplated act both supplies the occasion for those conditions to operate and the consideration which makes the arrangement contractual. The document containing the basic terms and conditions for stevedoring at Sydney to which I earlier referred is another instance of an arrangement made between parties to regulate their relationship in the event that one of them in fact became the stevedore of the other's ship. Neither promised the other anything: the ship did not engage to employ the stevedore or the stevedore to discharge the ship and stevedore its cargo.

The arrangement in the bill of lading thus being one between consignor and stevedore effected through the authorised agency of the carrier, questions as to how far, if at all, someone not a party to a contract, but for whose benefit it is made, can enforce the agreement made between others, do not arise. Cases such as Tweddle v Atkinson (1861) 1 B & S 393; 121 ER 762 and other cases listed in the notes to paras [245] 315 and 329 of Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed, 1975), vol 9, have no place, in my opinion, in the resolution of the question whether the appellant was a party to the arrangement in the relevant clauses of the bill of lading. The decision in The Eurymedon made the stevedore a party to the relevant parts of the bill of lading. It is, in my opinion, that feature of the decision which is so significant and important for the commercial community, particularly that section which is concerned with the transport of goods …. In this case, it is found as a fact that the carrier, in making the agreement with the consignor through the bill of lading, was indeed contracting for itself and also for the stevedore and with its antecedent authority. There is thus, in my opinion, in this case no need for the stevedore to prove that he was acting on an offer otherwise not accepted in order to establish the existence of an agreement with the consignor. The consensus existed on the consignor's acceptance of the bill apart altogether from any subsequent [246] conduct on the part of the stevedore. It resulted from the carrier's action on behalf of the stevedore and with its authority. This situation is, in my opinion, in high contrast to those in The Crown v Clarke (1927) 40 CLR 227 and Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth. In those cases, what was considered was an offer to be accepted by conduct, a recognised manner of creating the contractual relation by an offer of a promise for an act. Of course, in such a case, the act if done must be capable of being regarded as having been done as an acceptance of the offer. But there is a fundamental difference between providing consideration to support a consensual arrangement otherwise made and the acceptance by performance of an act of an offer not otherwise accepted … [247] …

I would add, however, if contrary to my own opinion the result of the acceptance by the consignor of the bill of lading, containing the "Himalaya clause", were properly analysed as the making of an offer by the consignor susceptible of acceptance by the doing of the work, I should be of opinion that it was established in this case that the appellant had accepted the offer. The knowledge by the stevedore of the terms of the bill, of the ship's manifest and its usual employment in discharging the stevedoring the Blue Star ships would, in my opinion, require the conclusion that the acts of the appellant were done in relation to the bill containing the "Himalaya" clause.

The relationship between the carrier and the stevedore was of long standing. The use of a bill of lading for consignments to Australia containing a "Himalaya" clause was well known between them. The ship's manifest would disclose to the stevedore the shipment in question and the identity of the consignor. The stevedore, in fact, removed from the ship's side into store, sorted and stacked the consignment. Charges for stacking and storing were presented to and paid by the consignee through the ship's agent. In the ordinary course, the goods would have been delivered to the consignee against presentation of the bill of lading. I would find it extremely difficult to fail to conclude in those circumstances that in stevedoring the shipment the stevedore was responding to the terms of the bill of lading, accepting both its obligations and seeking the benefit of its restrictions …

[252] Clause 17 in relation to the carrier's acts is clearly universal in terms, so that it clearly applies to the acts of the carrier as bailee in itself stevedoring the goods from ship's tackles to store, etc. If the clause covers the carrier when acting as stevedore and bailee of the goods, as in my opinion it does, I am unable to discover any reason why it should not cover the independent stevedore in the movement of the cargo. There can, in my opinion, be no justification for refusing to give the carrier the benefit of cl 17 in respect of its own acts or omissions as bailee of the goods following upon their removal from the ship's side. To confine the scope of the agreement with the stevedore to a period ending with the discharge of the goods from the ship's tackles is not only seriously to limit the efficacy of the clauses of the bill of lading and to defeat the reasonable commercial expectation of the consignor and carrier, but it is in my opinion an unwarranted interpretation of the language of the bill of lading. I am unable to discover any reason why it should not cover the independent stevedore in the on movement of the cargo …

Thus, in my opinion, the principle on which The Eurymedon [1975] AC 154 was decided and the clauses of the bill properly construed covered the situation in this case and required that the judgment of the primary judge be supported.

[11.40] STEPHEN J: [254] I would dismiss the appeal, but for reasons other than those which found favour with the Court of Appeal. In my view, the loss of the goods occurred at a time when the stevedore was no longer acting in performance of any of the carrier's obligations under the bill of lading. The benefits of cl 2, if ever available to the stevedore, had for that reason ceased to apply and could no longer be availed of by it.

Why this is so requires close examination of the bill of lading. However, I should first explain the reasons for my qualified acknowledgement of the availability to the stevedore, in any circumstances, of the benefit of cl 2 of the bill of lading. In neither of the Courts below was the decision of the majority of their Lordships in The Eurymedon open to challenge. On the present appeal neither party has sought to cast doubt upon the correctness of what was there decided and I would not be disposed to canvass the decision were it not that my dismissal of this appeal might otherwise be taken as involving the acceptance of that decision. Accordingly I will endeavour to state, as concisely as possible, why, with respect, I take a view different from that of the majority in The Eurymedon.

[255] That case turned upon the view to be taken of the equivalent of cl 2 of the present bill of lading. The effect of these clauses is, first, to exempt the carrier's servants and agents and "every independent contractor from time to time employed by the Carrier" from liability to the shipper, consignee or owner of the goods for loss or damage or delay while acting in the course of or in connexion with their employment. Every exemption and limitation to which the carrier is entitled is then expressly made available to them. Finally, "for the purpose of all the foregoing provisions" of the clause the carrier is "deemed to be acting as agent or trustee on behalf of and for the benefit of all persons who are or might be his servants or agents from time to time (including independent contractors as aforesaid)" all of them being "to this extent" deemed to be parties to the contract in or evidenced by the bill. The latter part of the clause thus acknowledges, as between shipper and carrier, that the carrier is, for the purpose of what goes before, contracting as agent for each of its servants, agents and independent contractors, who are to that extent deemed to be parties to the contract with the consignor. What goes before is the conferring upon each of them of the benefit of every exemption from liability and immunity to which the carrier is entitled under the bill. But for the doctrine of consideration the legal consequence would be clear; a stevedore would be entitled to the benefit of those exemptions in the bill.

However, because, at the date of the bill, the stevedore at the port of discharge had as yet provided no consideration, the learned trial judge in The Eurymedon [1975] AC 154, Beattie J, concluded that that could not be the effect in law of this clause. Nevertheless, he felt able to give the clause effective operation by reading it as an offer of immunity by the shipper to all persons of the class mentioned, including the stevedore, the carrier being their agent to receive that offer. Performance by any of them of services for the consignor was an acceptance of the offer and resulted in a unilateral contract of the familiar Carlill v Carbolic Smoke Ball Co [1893] 1 QB 256 type …

[256] The genesis of The Eurymedon lies in what was said by Lord Reid in Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones [1962] AC 446, 474. Lord Reid there suggested a means whereby a stevedore might possibly be given the benefit of those immunities which by its bill of lading a carrier might secure for itself as against a shipper. In all the successive judgments in The Eurymedon Lord Reid's suggestion was accepted as authoritative and the question was whether the clause in fact answered the description of what Lord Reid had [257] suggested, in particular whether, when applied to a discharging stevedore, Lord Reid's requirement as to overcoming "any difficulties about consideration moving from the stevedore" had been satisfied. Whereas Beattie J overcame these difficulties by discerning a Carlill-type unilateral contract, the majority of their Lordships, while acknowledging no substantially different analysis, preferred to express the relationship as involving an initial "bargain" between and shipper and stevedore, albeit devoid of consideration moving from the latter. That has, no doubt, the advantage that it better accords with the language of the clause, couched as it is in terms of an immediately concluded agreement but, as I would understand it, it differs from a Carlill-type unilateral contract only in that persons to whom the offer is made are present at the time of its making (in the present case, in the shape of the carrier who is their agent to receive the offer). It is their presence and their assent (if that be not too strong a word) to the making of the offer to them that enabled their Lordships to say that although no binding agreement had been concluded a "bargain" had been struck which might mature into a "complete" contract if one to whom the offer was made performs part of the work contemplated under the bill of lading and thereby, at the same time, provides consideration in exchange for the shipper's promise which is involved in the offer.

It is not surprising that there should have been difficulty in reconciling the operation of the clause with Lord Reid's earlier suggestion since, as Lord Simon of Glaisdale points out in his dissenting judgment in The Eurymedon [1975] AC 154, 183, that form of clause was not drawn in the light of what his Lordship had said but, on the contrary, antedates Lord Reid's judgment in Midland Silicones. Indeed I would have thought, from the terms in which Lord Reid speaks in Midland Silicones, that his Lordship cannot have contemplated anything in the way of Carlill-type unilateral contract. His Lordship speaks of the carrier "contracting as agent for the stevedore that these provisions should apply to the stevedore" and of the carrier having authority from the stevedore "to do that", words which contemplate the creation of a contract having immediate effect as binding both parties and which are as inappropriate to an orthodox Carlill-type unilateral contract as they are to the particular formulation favoured by the majority of their Lordships.

[257] In my view cl 2, which was not designed to give effect to Lord Reid's suggestion in Midland Silicones, is not in fact capable of giving effect to it. I respectfully share with those of their [258] Lordships who dissented and with the members of the New Zealand Court of Appeal an inability to read its words as recording anything other than a contract then and there concluded, and which, in relation to the stevedore, necessarily falls foul of the doctrine of consideration. Nor am I, with respect, satisfied that, either in the interests of international commercial comity or upon grounds of public policy, this is a case in which the language of the parties ought to be strained in an endeavour to give it an efficacy which, according to its ordinary meaning, it does not possess.

On the score of public policy the observations of Sheppard J at first instance are of cogency. His Honour thought it proper to refer to aspects of the evidence which had disturbed him, aspects which suggested a lack of effective supervision and perhaps a degree of irresponsibility on the part of those whose task it was to care for goods discharged in the port of Sydney. As his Honour points out, while to enable such persons to contract out of liability may reduce freight and stevedoring rates, it may also tend to increase insurance premiums for consignees. The vice lies in the relative inability of the latter, although bearing the burden of increased premiums, or of their insurers, to insist upon reasonable diligence on the part of the employees of the carrier or its contractors; they wholly lack the power to control those employees. At the same time the carrier and its contractors, in a position to exercise control and supervision, lack the incentive to do so which the sanction of increased premiums or possible liability involves. This divorcing of the power of control from any liability for the consequences of its non-exercise not only attracts that natural antipathy to exemption clauses and to the saving of "grossly negligent people from the normal consequences of their negligence", of which Fullagar J spoke in Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd (1956) 95 CLR 43 at p 71, but may also be thought to be positively undesirable in the public interest.

There is a further public policy consideration which at one and the same time bears upon the question of international commercial comity. While it is in the interests of great fleet-owning nations that their ocean carriers, and the servants and independent contractors which they employ, should be as fully protected as possible from liability at the suit of shippers and consignees, the interests of those nations which rely upon those fleets for their import and export trade is to the contrary. It was in response to such national interests that the United States of America and [259] Australia, which both fell into the latter category, enacted the Harter Act of 1893 and our own Sea Carriage of Goods Act 1904, measures which circumscribed the carrier's freedom to contract out of liability. Each was more stringent than were the subsequent Hague Rules. Many nations, particularly developing nations, have come to regard those Rules as unduly favouring carriers at the expense of cargo owners, especially because of the quite restricted duration of the carrier's compulsory period of responsibility which they impose, ending as it does immediately upon discharge. It is not clear to me that Australian courts should regard it as in any way in the public interest that carriers' exemption clauses, effective before loading and after discharge, should be accorded any benevolent interpretation, either so as to benefit carriers or so as to benefit independent contractors by extending the scope of such clauses to include such contractors. If public policy does not dictate such a course, neither do considerations of comity. To read the transactions of the seminars on International Trade organized by the Attorney-General's Department is to appreciate the powerful movement among trading nations in a contrary direction, towards extension of the period during which both the ocean carrier and its land-based agents are to be denied the ability freely to exclude themselves from liability for damage to or loss of cargo. The draft Convention on carriage of goods by sea adopted at the ninth session of the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law (UNCITRAL) in 1976 provides evidence of this …

[260] If, contrary to the views which I have expressed, cl 2 of the bill of lading is effective to confer immunities upon the stevedore while engaged in the actual discharge of the vessel, does it also afford protection to the stevedore after completion of discharge but before a consignee has actually taken delivery of the goods and removed them from the wharf area? [Stephen J went on to find that it did not and that, accordingly, the appeal should be dismissed.]

[11.45] MASON AND JACOBS JJ: [271] The theory underlying the contract which arises between the shipper and the stevedore is that the carrier contracts on behalf of the stevedore, there being a promise on the part of the shipper to exclude the stevedore's liability in the circumstances envisaged by cl 2. This promise becomes binding on the stevedore's discharging the goods, notwithstanding that he is bound to do that act by virtue of his independent contract with the carrier. So it was held in The Eurymedon.

Despite this decision the Court of Appeal considered itself free to hold that the shipper's offer to exempt the appellant did not give rise to a binding contract in the present case, because the discharge of the goods did not constitute valuable consideration, there being aliunde a binding promise by the appellant to do that work under its contract with the carrier. In arriving at this conclusion the Court of Appeal took the view that the evidence established no more than the appellant discharged the goods from the ship, with knowledge of the shipper's offer to exempt it from liability. The court pointed out that when conduct is relied on as an acceptance of, and as the consideration for, an offer, the acceptor must be shown to have acted in reliance on the offer: The Crown v Clarke (1927) 40 CLR 227. There is nothing in the process of reasoning to this point with which we would disagree. But their Honours appear to have overlooked the circumstance that proof of performance of the conditions to an offer by a person who knows of its existence will in general constitute prima facie evidence of acceptance of the offer. The position in our view is correctly stated by Starke J in The Crown v Clarke (at 244), where his Honour was [272] discussing an offer of a reward for the giving of information, as follows:

> In my opinion the true principle applicable to this type of case is that unless a person performs the conditions of the offer, acting upon its faith or in reliance upon it, he does not accept the offer and the offeror is not bound to him. As a matter of proof any person knowing of the offer who performs its conditions establishes prima facie an acceptance of that offer … It is an inference of fact and may be excluded by evidence.

The observations made by the court in Australian Woollen Mills Pty Ltd v Commonwealth (1954) 92 CLR 424 at 456-7, do not displace what Starke J said. There it was held that an announcement made by the Commonwealth that a subsidy would be paid to manufacturers on wool purchased and used for local manufacture after a certain date did not constitute a request or invitation to purchase wool. Accordingly it was not an offer capable of ripening by acceptance into a contract …

[273] In the Australian Woollen Mills case the court was directing its attention primarily to the character of the statement relied on as an offer. The court did not suggest that oral evidence of reliance on an offer was necessarily or generally required. The point made was that there is no fertile ground for inference of reliance on an offer unless a request, and consequentially an offer, is established by the evidence.

In our view the Court of Appeal in the present case could and should have drawn the inference that the appellant discharged the goods in reliance on the shipper's promise or offer of which it was aware. The contract here is indistinguishable from the contract upheld by the Judicial Committee in The Eurymedon. Of that contract Lord Wilberforce had this to say (at 167):

> If the choice, and the antithesis, is between a gratuitous promise, and a promise for consideration, as it must be in the absence of a tertium quid, there can be little doubt which, in commercial reality, this is. The whole contract is of a commercial character, involving service on one side, rates of payment on the other, and qualifying stipulations as to both. The relations of all parties to each other are commercial relations entered into for business > reasons of ultimate profit. To describe one set of promises, in this context, as gratuitous, or nudum pactum, seems paradoxical and is prima facie implausible.

In such a context an inference that the stevedore has acted in reliance on the shipper's promise or offer is so much more compelling than the inferences which were sought to be drawn in the situations which arose in The Crown v Clarke (where the information for which a reward was offered was given in equivocal circumstances) and in the Australian Woollen Mills case.

Common sense and knowledge of human affairs indicate the evident probability of the appellant acting in reliance on the shipper's promise or offer when he discharges the goods so long as he has knowledge of the existence of that promise or offer. Once accepted by performance of the services, it conferred protection upon the appellant, in terms of cl 2 of the bill of lading, without subjecting the appellant to any countervailing or consequential detriment. There was therefore strong reason for thinking, and no reason for denying, that the stevedore acted in [274] reliance on the offer in performing those services which fell within cl 2 of the bill of lading.

Accordingly, we are unable to share the Court of Appeal's view on this aspect of the case …

[281] In our opinion, the reasoning underlying the implication in The Eurymedon of a contract between shipper and stevedore is that there can be found to exist an agreement between shipper and stevedore that where in particular circumstances the carrier has the benefit of a clause giving immunity or limitation, then in those circumstances the stevedore shall be entitled to rely on that same immunity or limitation to which the circumstances have given rise. The reasoning underlying the finding of a contract between shipper and stevedore is that the immunity or limitation is transferred, that what has been called a vicarious immunity or limitation of action arises in favour of the stevedore. It would be a great extension of The Eurymedon doctrine to apply it to a case where the immunity or limitation of action is not one which the carrier, its servants and agents (including independent contractors) all could claim, but is one where no liability would arise in the circumstances in the carrier. It is not an extension which in our opinion ought to be made. There was something commercially unreal in the way legal principle could be applied to give a sea carrier an immunity but at the same time to deny it to his servant or his agent even though an immunity in their favour was intended. The benefit of the immunity could for instance be lost to the carrier if under the general law or as a result of a particular contract he was bound to indemnify his servant or agent. However, if the negligence of the independent contractor is not negligence for which the carrier would, in the absence of the immunity or limitation clauses, be vicariously liable but is the sole responsibility of the independent contractor, the expressed reasons of the majority in The Eurymedon cease to be applicable …

[283] In the present case the goods were allowed to be loaded on to the thieves' truck but the loading was not an unconditional but mistaken delivery of the goods. The loading was on condition that a delivery order and copy of the bill of lading be exchanged for a gate pass in respect of the goods. The thieves, once the goods had been loaded, drove off and forced their way through the gate. The negligence lay in a system which allowed a conditional loading of the goods, not in delivering the goods without requiring a copy of the bill of lading. It was a failure to keep the goods safely on the wharf and it makes no difference that the loss of the goods occurred, not by pilfering or robbery, but by tricking the servants of the respondent into allowing the goods to be loaded on to a vehicle and then forcing a way out of the wharf. It follows therefore that the appellant stevedore did not as agent for the carrier misdeliver the goods; rather, it as bailee failed to take reasonable care of the goods. This separate act of negligence was not the subject of cl 2 of the bill of lading and therefore the appellant was not entitled to rely on the limitation of action provision in cl 17.

[11.50] MURPHY J: [284] As The Eurymedon shows, there is no great difficulty in finding a theory to justify extending to a stevedore the immunities and other advantages which are expressed to be [285] extended to it by a bill of lading. If the adoption of such a theory as part of our decisional law would serve Australia's interests, this should be done. However, the overseas carriage of goods and the stevedoring industry are enmeshed by restrictive practices. Australian importers have no real freedom in their arrangements; to regard these as being in the area of contract is a distortion. The bill of lading in this case shows that, although there are references to the carrier's obligations, the thrust of the document is to relieve the carrier and its agents from virtually all responsibility. I agree with Stephen J's observations on the aspects of public interest.

My conclusion is that a contract should not be conjured up out of the circumstances in order to extend the exemptions and immunities under the bill of lading to the stevedore. For this reason, I would dismiss the appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

CIRCUMVENTING THE PRIVITY RULE: TRIDENT V MCNIECE

Trident General Insurance v McNiece Bros

[11.60] Trident General Insurance Co Ltd v McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (1988) 165 CLR 107 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: In 1977, Blue Circle Southern Cement Ltd (Blue Circle) entered into a contract of insurance with Trident General Insurance Co Ltd (Trident) in respect of Blue Circle's limestone crushing operation. Trident agreed to indemnify "the Assured against all sums which the Assured shall become legally liable to pay in respect of … bodily injury to … any person". "The Assured" was defined as "Blue Circle, all its subsidiary, associated and related companies, all contractors and subcontractors and/or suppliers". McNiece Bros Pty Ltd (McNiece) was engaged by Blue Circle as principal contractor for construction work being carried out at the limestone crushing plant. In 1979, Gary Hammond, who was working under the direction of the McNiece site engineer, was seriously injured while driving a crane at the construction site. McNiece was held liable to pay damages to Hammond. McNiece sought indemnity from Trident under the insurance policy which Blue Circle had taken out. Trident denied liability on the grounds that McNiece was not a party to the contract between Trident and Blue Circle and had not provided any consideration for the promise to indemnify. The trial judge (Yeldham J) and, on appeal, the Court of Appeal, held in favour of McNiece. In the Court of Appeal ((1987) 8 NSWLR 270), McHugh JA, with whom Hope and Priestley JJA agreed, held that McNiece was not a party to the contract between Blue Circle and Trident but found that McNiece was entitled to sue directly on the policy because:

> this court should now declare that at common law a non-party assured is, and has been for some time at common law, able to sue on a written policy of liability insurance. In truth the > position in respect of liability insurance policies is, and has been for some time, the same as that in respect of bankers' letters of commercial credit … That is to say, although once not enforceable because of the privity of contract doctrine, commercial necessity, practice and widespread use have combined to create an exception which the common law will now enforce.

Trident appealed to the High Court.]

MASON CJ AND WILSON J: [113] Although the principle that only a party to a contract can sue on it is described as fundamental, the early common law permitted third [114] parties to enforce contracts made for their benefit: see Flannigan, "Privity – The End of an Era (Error)" (1987) 103 Law Quarterly Review 564 at 564–5, esp fn 6. The decision in Bourne v Mason (1669) 1 Vent 6; 86 ER 5 marked the beginning of a shift in the attitude of the common law. In that case the third party, who failed in his action on the contract, was described as "a mere stranger to the consideration": at 7. Thereafter, until Tweddle v Atkinson (1861) 1 B & S 393; 121 ER 762, the question whether the third party could bring an action on the contract was the subject of conflicting decisions. Compare, for example, Pigott v Thompson (1802) 3 Bos & Pul 147; 127 ER 80 and Carnegie v Waugh (1823) 1 LJ (KB) 89 (where the court upheld the right of the third party to enforce the contract) with Price v Easton (1833) 4 B & Ad 433; 110 ER 518 (where the court denied the third party's entitlement to sue on the contract). With reference to the common law before 1861, Windeyer J observed in Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee Co Ltd (1967) 119 CLR 460 at 498: "The law was not in fact 'settled' either way during the 200 years before 1861. But it was, on the whole, moving towards the doctrine that was to be then and thereafter taken as settled."

The received doctrine is that Tweddle v Atkinson decided that a third party cannot sue on a contract for his benefit, though Denning LJ considered that it was wrongly decided: Smith and Snipes Hall Farm Ltd v River Douglas Catchment Board [1949] 2 KB 500 at 514; White v John Warwick & Co Ltd [1953] 1 WLR 1285; [1953] 2 All ER 1021. There is much to be said for the view that the ratio of Tweddle v Atkinson was that the plaintiff third party failed because no consideration moved from him. However, this view was not accepted in the years that followed: see, for example, Gandy v Gandy (1885) 30 Ch D 57 at 69. The decision in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] AC 847 firmly entrenched the two principles in the common law of England. So much emerges from the speech of Lord Haldane: at 853. The Privy Council in Vandepitte v Preferred Accident Insurance Corp of New York [1933] AC 70 at 79 subsequently applied to the law as stated in Dunlop by Lord Haldane to a policy of insurance covering a motor vehicle by which the insurer agreed to indemnify the insured and anyone [115] operating the car with the permission of the insured against third party risks. In the result the insurer was not liable under the policy in respect of a judgment obtained against the insured's daughter for damages for personal injury caused by her negligent driving of the motor vehicle. The Privy Council recognised (at 79) that the common law rules are qualified by the equitable principle that a party to a contract can constitute himself a trustee for a third party of a right under a contract so that the third party can enforce the promise, making the promisee-trustee a defendant in an action against the promisor. However, Lord Wright went on to say (at 79–80) that: "the intention to constitute the trust must be affirmatively proved: the intention cannot necessarily be inferred from the mere general words of the policy."

This court has hitherto accepted that a third party cannot sue upon a contract and that a stranger to the consideration cannot maintain an action at law upon it: see, for example, Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd (1956) 95 CLR 43 at 56 per Williams J, 67 per Fullagar J (with whom Dixon CJ agreed), 80 per Kitto J, 91 per Taylor J; Coulls at 478 per Barwick CJ, 482–3 per McTiernan J, 486–7 per Taylor and Owen JJ, 494 per Windeyer J.

So far we have proceeded on the footing that there are two distinct common law rules. This accords with the law as Lord Haldane stated it in Dunlop: at 853. See also Vandepitte (at 79); Kepong Prospecting Ltd v Schmidt [1968] AC 810. However, as Windeyer J noted in Coulls (at 494), there is an opposing view that the two rules are but one. In other words, to say that A is not a party to the contract is to say only that he is not a person who gave a promise in exchange for another: see Coote, "Consideration and the Joint Promisee" [1978] Cambridge Law Journal 301 at 309–10; Furmston, "Return to Dunlop v Selfridge?" (1960) 23 Modern Law Review 373 at 383–5. As a matter of history this view has much to support it. The consideration requirement was the nub of the earlier cases. The privity requirement seems to have gained acceptance either as an alternative way of asserting the consideration requirement or as a byproduct of it. Nevertheless the weight of authority points to the existence of two distinct, albeit interrelated, principles. Thus, if A, B and C are parties to a contract and A promises B and C that he will [116] pay C $1 000 if B will erect a gate for him, C cannot compel A to carry out his promise, because, though a party to the contract, C is a stranger to the consideration: see Law Revision Committee (Eng), Sixth Interim Report, Statute of Frauds and the Doctrine of Consideration (Cmd 5449, 1937), para 37. Contrast para 41 of that report and its discussion of the privity rule. For the purposes of the present case and contracts for the benefit of third parties, however, it is of little consequence whether the rules are in fact separate.

These "fundamental" traditional rules, where they survive, have been under siege throughout the common law world. In the United Kingdom the Law Revision Committee, which included many distinguished lawyers under the chairmanship of Lord Wright, recommended the abolition of the consideration rule and the privity rule in its Sixth Interim Report. The Committee described the consideration rule in its application to the example given in the last paragraph as lacking any reason in logic or public policy: para 37. The Committee stated that the English common law (an expression which, in the context of the report in 1937, may be taken to include the Australian common law) was alone among modern systems of law in its insistence on the privity rule and observed that the United States had taken steps to mitigate the rigour of the rule. Even in England, the Committee noted, Parliament had found it necessary to create legislative exceptions: para 41. The Committee went on to make the point that the trust concept as applied to the promise for the benefit of the third party had not proved to be a satisfactory solution because there was uncertainty surrounding the approach of the courts to the recognition of a trust: para 44. Another criticism of the trust concept was that, once created, the trust was not revocable by the promisor or the promisee: para 47. A third comment was that insistence on the privity rule casts doubts on the enforceability of bankers' commercial credits by sellers of goods as against the banker setting up the credit: para 45. The final point made by the Committee was that the position of the third party is more analogous to that of an assignee of a contractual right than to that of a cestui que trust: para 46.

The Committee recommended that the statutory recognition of third party rights should be carefully limited. The proposed limitations were: (1) no third party right should be acquired unless given by the express terms of the contract; (2) the promisor should be able to raise against the third party any defence available against the promisee; and (3) the right of the promisor and of the promisee to cancel the contract at any time should be preserved unless the third party has received notice of the agreement and has adopted it. It might be noted that this regime is much like that which has [117] developed in the United States. There, the problems arising from the traditional rules have been avoided by not requiring that consideration move from the promisee to the promisor: see Farnsworth, Contracts (1982), ss 2.3, fn 9, 10.2. As it stands now in most American States, third parties can sue directly upon contracts made for their benefit by others: see generally Restatement, Second, Contracts (1979), Ch 14.

Despite the criticisms and the proposals for reform, the traditional rules survive in the United Kingdom: see, for example, Scruttons Ltd v Midland Silicones Ltd [1962] AC 446; Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58; Woodar Investment Ltd v Wimpey Ltd [1980] 1 WLR 277; [1980] 1 All ER 571. Legislative procrastination prompted Lord Reid in 1968 to suggest that, if there were to be a further long delay, then the House of Lords might be compelled to deal with the question: Beswick at 72. Similarly, Lord Scarman, supported by Lord Keith of Kinkel, expressed the view in 1980 that the House of Lords might "reconsider Tweddle v Atkinson and the other cases which stand guard over this unjust rule": Woodar at 300; 591. In Swain v Law Society [1983] 1 AC 598 at 611, Lord Diplock described the doctrine of privity as "an anachronistic shortcoming that has for many years been regarded as a reproach to English private law". And in this country, Windeyer J reflected similar sentiments to those of Lord Scarman when he referred in Olsson v Dyson (1969) 120 CLR 365 at 393 to the possibility "that someday this court too, expounding the common law as Australia has inherited it, will see the way clear" to reform the traditional rules.

In Western Australia dissatisfaction with those rules has resulted in the enactment of s 11 of the Property Law Act 1969 (WA), which confers in certain circumstances a right on a third party to sue on a contract for his benefit. In 1973 the Queensland Law Reform Commission recommended that the law be amended so as to allow that a contract conferring a benefit on a third party should be enforceable by him in his own name: see Report No 16, cl 55 of the draft Bill and the commentary on that provision. The recommendation was adopted and is expressed in s 55 of the Property Law Act 1974 (Qld). And in New Zealand the Contracts (Privity) Act 1982 (NZ), like the Queensland Act, allows the third party to enforce a contract made for his benefit by imposing an obligation on [118] the promisor in favour of the third party where the parties intend that the third party should be able to enforce the provision for his benefit: compare Property Law Act 1974 (Qld), s 55(6)(c)(ii) with Contracts (Privity) Act 1982 (NZ), ss 4, 8.

The Australian Law Reform Commission in its Report No 20 on Insurance Contracts noted (at para 122) that Vandepitte had been legislatively displaced in all Australian jurisdictions in respect of compulsory third party insurance. Otherwise the Commission acknowledged that Vandepitte was alive and well, well enough to cause injustice to third parties. Indeed, as the Commission observed, Vandepitte was invoked by an insurer as a defence to an action on a policy by a person, not a party to the contract, who fell within the class of persons expressed to be insured: Jovanovic v Broers (1979) 25 ACTR 39. The Commission, concluding that the problems could not be solved by the application of the principles of trust and agency, recommended that persons falling within the class of persons expressed by a policy to be entitled to indemnity should be able to sue on the policy. The Commission stated (para 124) that this alteration in the law should be uncontroversial because most insurers already act as though they were under such a liability to such persons. Section 48 of the Insurance Contracts Act 1984 (Cth) gives effect to this recommendation.

There is much substance in the criticisms directed at the traditional common law rules as questions debated in the cases reveal. First, there is the vexed question whether the promisee can recover substantial damages for breach by the promisor of his promise to confer a benefit on the third party. The orthodox view is that ordinarily the promisee is entitled to nominal damages only because non-performance by the promisor, though resulting in a loss of the third party benefit, causes no damage to the promisee: see West v Houghton (1879) 4 CPD 197; Viles v Viles [1939] SASR 164; but compare Drimmie v Davies [1899] 1 IR 176. On the other hand, Lush LJ in Lloyd's v Harper (1880) 16 Ch D 290 at 321 said: "I consider it to be an established rule of law that where a contract is made with A for the benefit of B, A can sue on the contract for the benefit of B, and recover all that B could have recovered if the contract had been made with B himself."

Windeyer J in Coulls (at 501) thought, correctly in our opinion, that Lush LJ was referring to a contract where A was trustee of the promised benefit for B, a view in which Lord Upjohn acquiesced in [119] Beswick: at 101. Windeyer J went on to say that the promisee could recover more than nominal damages in a situation in which he had sustained actual loss or damage by reason of the promisor's breach of his promise to confer a benefit on the third party. Plainly his Honour correctly stated the law in this respect. His Honour then (at 502) expressed his disagreement with suggestions by Lord Esher MR and Fry LJ in Cleaver v Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association [1892] 1 QB 147 at 153, 157, 158 that the promisee could recover not unliquidated damages but any sum which the promisor had agreed to pay to the third party.

It is clear enough that the availability of an action for damages at the suit of the promisee for breach of the promise to benefit the third party is not a sufficient sanction to secure performance of the promise. What is more, the uncertain status of the decision in Jackson v Horizon Holidays Ltd [1975]

1 WLR 1468; [1975] 3 All ER 92 is a telling indictment against the law as it presently stands. There, the plaintiff recovered substantial damages for the travel company's breach of contract to provide a satisfactory family holiday, but the basis on which the decision can be supported is by no means clear, even after the comments by the House of Lords in Woodar (at 283–4, 291, 293, 297; 576–7, 584, 588). Rules which generate uncertainty in their application to ordinary contracts commonly entered into by the citizen call for reconsideration.

Next, there is the question whether the contract to confer a benefit on the third party is capable of specific performance. In Coulls Barwick CJ considered (at 478) that where a promisor promises to make a payment to a third party the promisee may obtain specific performance of the promise, at least where the nature of the consideration would have allowed the remedy. Windeyer J went even further, asserting (at 503) that contracts to pay money or transfer property to a third party are always or very often contracts for breach of which damages are an inadequate remedy and that on this ground such contracts are susceptible of specific performance. We agree with his Honour's comment and with his additional observations (at 503) which point the way to a more general recognition of the availability of specific performance as a remedy. As Lord Upjohn noted in Beswick (at 102): "Equity will grant specific performance when damages are inadequate to meet the justice of the case" (our [120] emphasis). See also the dissenting judgment of Sir Garfield Barwick in Loan Investment Corp of Australasia v Bonner [1970] NZLR 724 at 742. There is no reason to doubt that the courts will grant specific performance of a contract of indemnity or insurance, even if it involves payment of a lump sum, at least where the payment is to be made to a third party, damages being an inadequate remedy. But, even if we assume the availability of specific performance at the suit of the promisee in a wide variety of situations, there are nonetheless situations, such as that in Jackson v Horizon Holidays Ltd, where specific performance is not a suitable remedy and damages are inadequate. In these situations the incapacity of the third party to sue means that the law gives less protection to the promisee and the third party than the promisor: see Collins, The Law of Contract (1986), p 107. And, assuming the availability of specific performance, the third party is nonetheless dependent on the willingness of the promisee to exercise his rights, in the absence of a trust, an agency relationship or an enforceable agreement between the promisee and the third party.

Then there is the trust of the contractual promise on which the appellant places particular reliance as a palliative of the difficulties generated by the common law principles. Despite the insistence in Vandepitte (at 79–80) and Re Schebsman [1944] Ch 83 at 104, on the need for a clear expression of intention to create a trust and the warning that such an intention cannot necessarily be inferred from general words, there are a number of authorities which justify the difficulty expressed by Fullagar J in understanding the reluctance of the courts sometimes to infer trusts: Wilson, at 67. In Robertson v Wait (1853) 8 Ex 299; 155 ER 1360; Lloyd's v Harper; Les Affréteurs Réunis Société Anonyme v Leopold Walford (London) Ltd [1919] AC 801; and Williams v Baltic Insurance Association of London Ltd [1924] 2 KB 282 the courts readily inferred the existence of a trust from the circumstance that the contract was made for the benefit of a third party. The contrast between Vandepitte and Williams is striking. Both cases concerned motor vehicle insurance policies expressed to cover persons driving the vehicle apart from the insured. Fullagar J's comment followed a reference to the two decisions. See also "Notes" (1933) 49 Law Quarterly Review 474. As we have seen, critics of the common law rules have pointed to the uncertainty surrounding the [121] circumstances in which the courts will recognise a trust in contracts for the benefit of third parties as a reason for rejecting the trust concept as a sufficient answer to the difficulties caused by those rules: Corbin, "Contracts for the Benefit of Third Persons" (1930) 46 Law Quarterly Review 12 esp at 17.

This apparent uncertainty should be resolved by stating that the courts will recognise the existence of a trust when it appears from the language of the parties, construed in its context, including the matrix of circumstances, that the parties so intended. We are speaking of express trusts, the existence of which depends on intention. In divining intention from the language which the parties have employed the courts may look to the nature of the transaction and the circumstances, including commercial necessity, in order to infer or impute intention. See Eslea Holdings Ltd v Butts (1986) 6 NSWLR 175 at 189.

But, even if adherence to this approach produces greater consistency of outcome, there are still the cases where the third party has no remedy because there is no sufficient intention to create a trust. And there are other consequences which flow from recognising the existence of a trust. It may circumscribe the freedom of action of the parties to the contract, especially the promisee, to a greater extent than the existence of a right to sue on the part of the third party. How can the promisee terminate the trust once it is created? Lest it be overlooked, we should mention that the creation of a third party trust rests on ascertaining the intention of the promisee, rather than on the intention of the contracting parties. And in the ultimate analysis it seems incongruous that we should be compelled to import the mechanisms of a trust to ensure that a third party can enforce the contract if the intention of the contracting parties is that he should benefit from performance of the contract. A fortiori is that so if the intention common to the parties is that the third party should be able to sue the promisor.

In order to justify the privity and consideration rules in the face of these problems, three practical policy considerations are sometimes invoked. First, they preclude the risk of double recovery from the promisor by the third party as well as the promisee. If the third party is permitted to sue, the risk of double recovery arises from the possibility that the one party may seek specific performance after another has recovered damages. The risk is insignificant; joinder of all parties in the first action will make the resulting decision binding on all.

The second point is that the privity requirement imposes an [122] effective barrier to liability on the part of a contracting party to a vast range of potential plaintiffs. This may be significant in the case of government contracts intended to benefit a class of persons: see, for example, Martinez v Socoma Companies Inc 521 P 2d 841 (1974). But it is difficult to justify the existence of a rule by reference to one of its indirect results, if in other respects its operation is unsatisfactory.

The third matter is more important. The recognition of an unqualified entitlement in a third party to sue on the contract would severely circumscribe the freedom of action of the parties, particularly the promisee. He may rescind or modify the contract with the assent of the promisor, arrive at a compromise or assign his contractual rights. He may even modify the contract so that he diverts to himself the benefit initially intended for the third party. Professor Corbin suggested that any entitlement in the third party to enforce the provision in his favour would necessarily exist at the expense of the rights, privileges and liberties that the contracting parties enjoy under the common law rules: "Third Party Beneficiary Contracts in England" (1968) 35 University of Chicago Law Review 544 at 549. But this does not entirely follow. The entitlement of the third party to enforce the provision in his favour can be subordinated to the right of the contracting parties to rescind or modify the contract, in which event the third party would lose his rights except in so far as he relied on the promise to his detriment: compare Restatement, s 311(3). To subordinate the third party's entitlement in this way would accord with legal principle and with the protection of the interests of the parties to the contract. There is to our minds no compelling reason why the interests of the third party should be preferred, though we acknowledge that in Queensland the parties lose their right to rescind and modify the contract without the third party's consent on the third party's acceptance of it (Property Law Act 1974 (Qld), ss 55(2), 55(3)(d)) and in Western Australia on the third party's adoption of the contract: Property Law Act 1969 (WA), s 11(3); see Westralian Farmers v Southern Meat Packers [1981] WAR 241 at 246, 251. The Queensland and Western Australian qualifications trace back to the recommendations of the English Law Revision Committee in 1937.

Should it be a sufficient foundation for the existence of a third party entitlement to sue on the contract that there is a contractual intention to benefit a third party? Or, should an intention that the third party should be able to sue on the contract be required? Under s 48 of the Insurance Contracts Act 1984 (Cth) and in the United [123] States an intention to benefit a third party alone is necessary and that seems to be the position in Western Australia. But in Queensland (Property Law Act 1974 (Qld), ss 55(1), 55(6)(c)(ii)) and in New Zealand (Contracts (Privity) Act 1982 (NZ), ss 4, 8) an intention that the third party should be able to sue is required. This requirement again seems to have its origin in the recommendations of the English Law Revision Committee. As the contracting parties are unlikely to turn their attention to the enforcement by the third party, the ascertainment of this intention may well be fraught with similar problems to those that have surrounded the trust concept.

The variety of these responses to the problems arising from contracts to benefit a third party indicate the range of the policy choices to be made and that there is room for debate about them. A simple departure from the traditional rules would lead to third party enforceability of such a contract, subject to the preservation of a contracting party's right to rescind or vary, in the absence of reliance by the third party to his detriment, and to the availability in an action by the third party of defences against a contracting party. The adoption of this course would represent less of a departure from the traditional exposition of the law than other legislative choices which have been made. Moreover, as we have seen, the traditional rules, which were adopted here as a consequence of their development in the United Kingdom, have been the subject of much criticism and of legislative erosion in the field of insurance contracts. Regardless of the layers of sediment which may have accumulated, we consider that it is the responsibility of this court to reconsider in appropriate cases common law rules which operate unsatisfactorily and unjustly. The fact that there have been recent legislative developments in the relevant field is not a reason for continuing to insist on the application of an unjust rule as it stood before its alteration by the Insurance Contracts Act 1984 (Cth).

In the ultimate analysis the limited question we have to decide is whether the old rules apply to a policy of insurance. The injustice which would flow from such a result arises not only from its failure to give effect to the expressed intention of the person who takes out the insurance but also from the common intention of the parties and the circumstance that others, aware of the existence of the policy, will order their affairs accordingly. We doubt that the doctrine of estoppel provides an adequate protection of the legitimate expectations of such persons and, even if it does, the rights of persons under a policy of insurance should not be made to depend on the vagaries of such an intricate doctrine. In the nature of things, the likelihood of some degree of reliance on the part of the third party in the case of a benefit to be provided for him under an [124] insurance policy is so tangible that the common law rule should be shaped with that likelihood in mind.

This argument has even greater force when it is applied to an insurance against liabilities which is expressed to cover the insured and its subcontractors. It stands to reason that many subcontractors will assume that such an insurance is an effective indemnity in their favour and that they will refrain from making their own arrangements for insurance on that footing. That, it seems, is what happened in the present case. But why should the respondent's rights depend entirely on its ability to make out a case of estoppel?

In the circumstances, notwithstanding the caution with which the court ordinarily will review earlier authorities and the operation of long-established principle, we conclude that the principled development of the law requires that it be recognised that McNiece was entitled to succeed in the action.

For the foregoing reasons, we would dismiss the appeal.

[11.65] BRENNAN J: (dissenting) [125] The declaration by the Court of Appeal that policies of liability insurance are a common law exception to the doctrine of privity of contract and that the exception has existed for some time may come as a surprise to those who have seen no reference to such an exception in the books ….

If policies of liability insurance are to be recognized as an exception to the doctrine, what are the features which might make them so? Excluding the principles of agency, trust and estoppel from consideration, what makes a "nonparty assured" who has furnished no consideration for a policy of loss insurance different from any other third party mentioned in a contract between promisor and promisee as a party who is to have the benefit of a promise? The difference suggested by McHugh JA was that commercial necessity, practice and widespread use, strengthened by analogy with modern statutes, established policies of loss insurance as exceptions to the doctrine of privity of contract. The fact that policies of loss insurance are frequently expressed to cover losses sustained by persons who are not parties to the contract and the fact that insurers ordinarily honour those contracts do not establish the kind of commercial practice that evokes the creation of a new principle of the common law. It may be that, where the voluntary acceptance of liability by an insurer does not account for the commercial practice and use of which his Honour spoke, those factors are to be accounted for by operation of the law of agency, trusts and estoppel. His Honour's proposition that it is commercially necessary to admit an exception to the doctrine of privity would be more supportable if it were found that those principles when applied in conjunction with the doctrine leave the law powerless to prevent or remedy injustice. But it was impossible to demonstrate such a defect in this case where agency was negatived on the facts and no occasion arose to consider the application of the principle of trust and estoppel.

Nor is the argument for a judicially created exception advanced by considering modern statutory provisions. As Dawson J points out, s 48 of the Insurance Contracts Act 1984 (Cth) weakens rather than strengthens the proposition that a common law exception exists. That section creates in a person who is not a party to a contract of general insurance a statutory right to recover the [127] amount of his loss directly from the insurer if he was specified or referred to in the contract as a person to whom the insurance cover was provided. But the Parliament did not make that provision retrospective, and it cannot be inferred that the Parliament contemplated that cases arising before the Act came into force (this case being one of them) would be governed by provisions of the common law identical with those in the Act. I would add that I respectfully agree with what Dawson J has written about the limited use to which statute can be put in developing the common law.

To hold that policies of liability insurance are an exception to the doctrine of privity, some criterion must be found to distinguish the exception from the general rule. I can find none. Indeed, if the doctrine of privity should be overthrown in its application to policies of liability insurance, no reason either of policy or logic is advanced for retaining the doctrine for application to other contracts. It was acknowledged in the Court of Appeal that the doctrine of privity of contract is a fundamental rule of our common law, but that acknowledgment was followed immediately by an assertion (at 284) that:

> the injustice of the rule in some situations is so obvious that it has been the subject of prolonged and intensive criticism. Few could be found today who would agree with the opinion of Myers AJ, expressed in (1954) 27 ALJ 175, that no change should be made to the rule: although compare Barwick CJ in Coulls (1967) 119 CLR 460 at 478.

I am numbered amongst those who agree with Myers AJ, being fortified in that view by the observations of Barwick CJ (at 478) in the case referred to:

> It must be accepted that, according to our law, a person not a party to a contract may not himself sue upon it so as directly to enforce its obligations. For my part, I find no difficulty or embarrassment in this conclusion. Indeed, I would find it odd that a person to whom no promise was made could himself in his own right enforce a promise made to another.

Barwick CJ treated privity of contract as distinct from the related question of consideration and the distinction is well founded. However, in the same case Windeyer J observed (at 494): "Doubtless the two requisites merge in the strict view of a contract as a bargain, a promise for which the promisee has paid the price."

In this case, as McNiece was not a party to the contract and did not give consideration for Trident's promise, it is not necessary to pursue [128] the inquiry whether the two requisites merge. It is sufficient to focus on the doctrine of privity.

Privity is a doctrine which is both settled and fundamental, though it was not settled in England until the 19th century. In Coulls v Bagot's Executor & Trustee Co Ltd (1967) 119 CLR 460, Windeyer J referred to the uncertainty prior to 1861 about the right of third parties to bring assumpsit. He concluded (at 498):

> The fact is that the early cases are conflicting, because during the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries the doctrine of consideration in the common law was still in process of formation. Whether, and in what circumstances, third parties should be allowed to bring assumpsit was still debatable. The law was not in fact "settled" either way during the 200 years before 1861. But it was, on the whole, moving towards the doctrine that was to be then and thereafter taken as settled.

In 1861, Tweddle v Atkinson was decided. The law was then settled that "no stranger to the consideration can take advantage of a contract, although made for his benefit": at 398; 764 per Wightman J. The rule emerged in consequence of the development of the action of assumpsit, as the judgments of Crompton and Blackburn JJ show. It may be that, at least in the understanding of the profession if not in the reports of cases, the rule was settled before Tweddle v Atkinson was argued. In that case, the general proposition advanced by counsel for the defendant, supporting the demurrer, was: "a stranger to the agreement and to the consideration … cannot sue upon the contract", and that proposition was conceded by counsel for the plaintiff who sought unsuccessfully to bring the case within an exception to the general rule. The rule was affirmed by the House of Lords in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v Selfridge & Co Ltd [1915] AC 847. Viscount Haldane LC said (at 853):

> My Lords, in the law of England certain principles are fundamental. One is that only a person who is a party to a contract can sue on it. Our law knows nothing of a jus quaesitum tertio arising by way of contract. Such a right may be conferred by way of property, as, for example, under a trust, but it cannot be conferred on a stranger to a contract as a right to enforce the contract in personam. A second principle is that if a person with whom a contract not under seal has been made is to be able to enforce it consideration must have been given by him to the promisor or to some other person at the promisor's request. These two principles are not recognised in the same [129] fashion by the jurisprudence of certain Continental countries or of Scotland, but here they are well established. A third proposition is that a principal not named in the contract may sue upon it if the promisee really contracted as his agent. But again, in order to entitle him so to sue, he must have given consideration either personally or through the promisee, acting as his agent in giving it.

… The doctrine of privity has been treated as settled not only by the House of Lords (Beswick v Beswick [1968] AC 58) but also by the Supreme Court of Canada (Greenwood Shopping Plaza Ltd v Beattie (1980) 111 DLR (3d) 257) and by this court. In Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd (1956) 95 CLR 43 Kitto J spoke (at 80) of "the elementary general rule that the only persons entitled to the benefits or bound by the obligations of a contract are the parties to it". See also Birmingham v Renfrew (1937) 57 CLR 666 at 675; Coulls at 478, 494 and Olsson v Dyson (1969) 120 CLR 365 at 392–3 per Windeyer J. The doctrine of privity has long been settled and it was settled as a doctrine of general application …

[131] It is submitted that the doctrine of privity sometimes produces unjust results and that this court should re-examine it in the light of the criticisms the doctrine has attracted. The criticisms, many of which have come from judges of great eminence and some of which may be traceable to the influence of Scots law, are rehearsed in the judgment of McHugh JA. Those criticisms tend to erode the acceptability of the doctrine and to facilitate the postulation of an exception. If it be asserted that the doctrine works injustice, an exception can be seen as a first step on a path leading to the heights of justice and therefore a step to be taken with judicial alacrity. If this case is to be decided not by [132] reference to the law as it is but by reference to the law as it ought to be, it is useful to consider the alternative paths by which the heights of justice might be scaled: the path followed by our law for over a century or a new path of doctrine.

According to the settled law, when A (a promisor) contractually promises B (a promisee) to confer a benefit on C, a third party who is not a party to the contract and who has given A no consideration for the promise, C acquires no right to sue A on the promise. Nor did the classical Roman law admit such a right in the third party: alteri stipulari nemo potest was Ulpian's statement of the law: Dig 45.1.38.17. The law of contract admits the capacity of persons who are sui juris to create by offer and acceptance rights and obligations binding as between each other.

A proposal that a contractual promise in favour of a third party should give rise to a common law right in C to sue A to enforce the promise goes further. The proposal postulates the capacity of the contracting parties to create rights as between the third party and the promisor. Moreover, it precludes application of the principles of trust to any case to which the proposed exception applies. If C's right were held to grow out of a contractual promise by A to B, it is hard to see how B might be the trustee of the promise for C: C could hardly have a legal right to the performance of A's promise while B retained the same legal right as trustee for C. The principles of trust would be irrelevant in such a case. Indeed, the proposal may postulate that B, though the promisee, loses the contractual right to performance of the promise by A, that right being conferred solely upon, or being transferred to, C. And, if the proposal postulates a cause of action in C while leaving B's cause of action intact, it would expose A to double liability. To postulate the creation of a legal right in C to enforce a third party promise against A is to postulate the creation of legal relationships between the three parties which the doctrines of our legal system are not presently able to define.

If a third party promise is to confer on C a common law right enforceable against A, do A and B retain a capacity to defeat C's right by varying or abrogating their contract or is C's right indefeasible on the making of the contract? If C's right becomes indefeasible, what makes it so? Does C become subject to any obligation under the contract? Does C's right or obligation depend on C's acceptance of it? Or does C's acquisition of the right against A automatically impose any associated obligation? Does B retain a right to enforce the promise against A? Can C and A vary the right without B's consent? Does B have any right to contribution from C in respect of the consideration for the promise? If want of consideration moving from C to A is no bar to C's cause of action, is [133] consideration moving from B to A essential? Does C lose his right to enforce the promise if he does not comply with the contractual conditions binding on B? Is B under a common law duty to C to perform the contract? Can A raise against C any defence which would be effective against B, for example, a set off? Legal systems which recognise the effectiveness of a third party promise to create a right in a third party to sue (a jus quaesitum tertio) give different answers to these questions ….

A variety of solutions can be devised for these and other problems raised by admitting a third party's right to sue. That is apparent [134] from the diversity of statutory provisions which have been enacted in order to confer on C a statutory right enforceable directly against A. Those provisions have become increasingly complex. The Property Law Act 1969 (WA), s 11 contains relatively simple provisions; the Property Law Act 1974 (Qld), s 55 is more detailed; and the Contracts (Privity) Act 1982 (NZ) is yet more detailed and sophisticated. Their provisions are not uniform. For example, only Western Australia requires the intention to benefit the third party to be expressed in the contract. Queensland requires the third party to "accept" the contract and upon acceptance, the beneficiary may become subject to a duty enforceable against him. New Zealand alone extends the provisions of its Act to immunities and limitations on liability. Each of the Acts provides for discharge or variation of the promise without the beneficiary's consent in certain circumstances, but the prescribed circumstances are not the same in the respective Acts. It is vain to expect that the common law has a solution for the problems on which Parliaments assisted by Law Reform Commissions have differed. There is no Anglo-Australian common law by reference to which the conditions and incidents of a third party's right to sue can be ascertained. The legal systems which admit a jus quaesitum tertio see the relationships between A, B and C as a triangle … The Anglo-Australian common law is radically different: it sees the relationships as lineal: A and B linked by contract, B and C linked by trust or contract, A and C not linked unless B either proves to be C's agent to contract with A or assigns to C the obligation (debt or other property) owed to B by A. To admit a third party's right to sue into the common law, it would be necessary to postulate a new source of legal rights and obligations arising independently of contract and equity and to create a new set of rules prescribing the availability of the rights and the limits of the obligations to which the third party promise gives rise. And if such a new source of legal rights were postulated, our laws with respect to agency, trusts, estoppel and damages which have been constructed around the doctrine of privity of contract would have to be reworked.

Of course, the problems to which a third party promise gives rise must be addressed by any developed legal system, and the rules to govern these problems may be tentative in the earlier stages of development. Fundamental rules – that is, rules which fix a reference point for the development of subsidiary rules – may take some time to be settled. Once settled, the subsidiary rules can be developed. So it was with the English legal system.

The subsidiary rules which the courts have developed to solve the problems raised by a third party promise are sometimes described as [135] exceptions to the doctrine of privity, but (as Lord Reid suggested) the apparent exceptions are in truth applications of other legal principles to the contractual relationship of promisor and promisee. Fullagar J observed in Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd (at 67): "I doubt if there was any true exception at common law to the rule laid down by Tweddle v Atkinson."

The first so called exception is found in the law of trusts. A promisee may be or become a trustee of the promise for a third party: Les Affréteurs Réunis Société Anonyme v Leopold Walford (London) Ltd [1919] AC 801; Vandepitte v Preferred Accident Insurance Corp of New York [1933] AC 70. Where the promisee is a trustee, the third party acquires only an equitable interest in the promise. The third party does not become a party to the contract: Construction Engineering (Aust) Pty Ltd v Hexyl Pty Ltd (1985) 155 CLR 541. The contract binds only the promisor and promisee and the third party beneficiary cannot enforce the promise as if he were a party to the contract. The third party can enforce the promise indirectly in an action in which the promisee is joined as a defendant (Vandepitte at 79; Birmingham v Renfrew at 686) the promisee being an essential party in an action against the promisor: Harmer v Armstrong [1934] Ch 65. A second so called exception is found in the law of agency. If a putative promisee is merely an agent for a third party, the third party is the promisee and is privy to the contract: Port Jackson Stevedoring Pty Ltd v Salmond & Spraggon (Aust) Pty Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 231 and on appeal to the Privy Council (1980) 144 CLR 300; ITO Ltd v Miida Electronics Inc (1986) 28 DLR (4th) 641. The agency cases show that, unless the third party is in truth a promisee, he cannot take the benefit of the contract: see the discussion by McIntyre J of the cases relating to exemption clauses in ITO Ltd v Miida Electronics Inc, at 663–9; and compare Construction Engineering (Aust) Pty Ltd v Hexyl Pty Ltd. Neither the principles of trust nor the principles of agency are exceptions to the doctrine of privity. In their application to a third party promise, those principles proceed on the footing that the legal contractual right is vested solely in the promisee. There is no true exception to the doctrine of privity. If an exception were now introduced and a jus quaesitum tertio were recognised in respect of some contracts, the exception would raise at least as many [136] problems as it might solve. The field of jus quaesitum tertio may look greener, but the brambles are no fewer.

… As the common law knows of no exception to the doctrine of privity, it has developed no rules to condition the admission of a third party's right to sue …. A basic problem … is whether the third party's right to sue is intended by the parties to the contract to be irrevocable. If one or both of the contracting parties can revoke the third party's right to sue, the right is contingent on the continued will of the parties to the contract. Should this be sufficient to give a third party a common law right to sue? How could it be admitted that the third party has a right to sue on the policy if that right might be abrogated at any time without his knowledge and consent? … [137] If the insurer could be liable at the suit of the promisee, the admission of a third party's right to sue duplicates the causes of action on the promise. Presumably it is thought that the joinder of the parties in whom separate causes of action are vested is effective to extinguish one of the causes of action. But mere procedural steps do not extinguish substantive rights. Joinder of the promisee-party as a defendant would not discharge any cause of action vested in him. And if the proposed exception were treated as no more than conferring on the third party a right to sue on the single cause of action vested in the promisee so that either the beneficiary third [138] party or the promisee-party (but not both) might enforce it, what principle would govern a contest between them? … The difficulties encountered in propounding a set of rules to condition the proposed exception to the doctrine of privity demonstrate the undesirability of endeavouring now to overthrow the doctrine in whole or (what might be more confusing) in part.

If our legal history had taken a different turning in 1861, the problems raised by a third party promise would have been differently addressed. In the United States, two years before Tweddle v Atkinson, it was decided to admit a third party's right to sue when the third party is a creditor of the promisee: Lawrence v Fox 20 NY 268 (1859). The first and second Restatements reveal the great difference between the frames of reference within which American jurisprudence addresses the problems raised by a third party promise and the frames of reference within which Anglo-Australian jurisprudence addresses them. No one would suggest that the Anglo-Australian solutions are perfect. But our legal system has produced a tolerably coherent set of principles operating in conjunction with the fundamental doctrine of privity.

When a third party promise is in a contract to which the third party is not a party, the promise can be enforced only by an action brought by the promisee or to which the promisee is a party. The legal cause of action against the promisor is vested solely in the promisee. Double recovery is impossible. Where the promisor has promised to pay money to or otherwise to confer a benefit on the third party directly, the promisee may compel him specifically to perform his promise, for damages would be an imperfect remedy for the promisee: Coulls at 478, 502–3; Beswick v Beswick at 82, 89, 101–2. The availability of specific performance goes a long way towards shutting out injustice. Where damages are the appropriate remedy for breach of a promise to pay money to the promisee for the benefit of a third party, the promisee may recover the whole of the amount promised where the promisee is a trustee for the third party (Lloyd's v Harper (1880) 16 Ch D 290; Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd at 67; Coulls at 501; [139] Beswick v Beswick at 101) or an agent who is authorised by the contract to sue on behalf of the principal: Lloyd's v Harper; Woodar Ltd v Wimpey Ltd [1980] 1 WLR 277 at 284, 293–4, 297. These may not be the only cases in which a promisee may recover the full amount promised. It is still an open question whether a promisee who is neither a trustee for nor an agent of a third party can recover in some circumstances more than nominal damages if the promisor's breach of a promise which is intended to confer a benefit on a third party causes the promisee no personal loss: Woodar Ltd v Wimpey Ltd at 283–4. The speech of Lord Diplock in The Albazero [1977] AC 774 at 847, raises the question whether a promisee may recover in full what was lost by a third party provided the promisee is accountable to the third party for what he recovers. It is not appropriate in this case to decide the limits of the promisee's remedies. It is sufficient to note that the possibility of injustice which might be thought to flow from the effect of the doctrine of privity on the promisee's remedies depends on the rules relating to the measure of damages. If such a case of injustice should arise, it will be appropriate to consider what Windeyer J said in Coulls (at 504):

> it is, I think, a faulty analysis of legal obligations to say that the law treats a promisor as having a right to elect either to perform his promise or to pay damages. Rather, using one sentence from the passage from Lord Erskine's judgment which I have quoted above, the promisee has "a legal right to the performance of the contract". Moreover, we are concerned with what Fullagar J once called "a system which has never regarded strict logic as its sole inspiration": Tatham v Huxtable (1950) 81 CLR 639 at 649.

A development of the rules relating to damages rather than the acceptance of a third party's right to sue offers the prospect of an orderly development of the law if such a development be needed to avoid injustice.

If a third party were to complain of injustice on the ground that he has no right to cause the promisee to enforce a policy of loss insurance, the supposed injustice must arise because there is no relevant relationship between the third party and the promisee. Such a case can arise only if the third party is one (a) for whom the [140] promisee is not an agent, fiduciary or trustee, (b) who has no relevant contractual relationship with the promisee, and (c) who has not been induced to assume or expect that the policy covers the risk of loss by the third party by any representation made by the promisor or the promisee in circumstances which would entitle the third party to claim the benefit of the policy by estoppel: see Waltons Stores v Maher (1988) 164 CLR 387. Whether an injustice is likely to arise in such a case may be doubted, especially in modern times when the courts no longer feel the reluctance to infer the existence of a trust which courts felt in earlier times: see Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd at 67.

Of course, the question whether a trust has been constituted is related to the question whether the promisee reserves the right to agree with the promisor to vary or abrogate the promise. Consideration of the rights reserved by a promisee against the promisor and of the nature of the obligation accepted by the promisor may indicate that a trust of the benefit of the promise has been constituted. There is no reason to think that a system of law under which a third party's (equitable) right to sue depends on the existence of a trust is less likely to do justice than a system under which a jus quaesitum tertio is admitted. Indeed, it may be that the constitution of a trust as a criterion of a third party's right to sue is capable of adjusting more nicely the rights of promisor, promisee and third party. For example, if a third party's right to sue were admitted only when the terms of the contract show that the promisor and promisee intend the third party's right to be irrevocable, that right would be more inflexible than the right of a beneficiary under a trust who is able to sue even if the trust is revocable so long as it is not revoked: see Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring & Lighterage Co Ltd at 67 per Fullagar J. Indeed, the injustice which could flow from a rigid criterion of irrevocability in Scotland arose in but was avoided by the judgment of the Court of Session in Love v Amalgamated Society of Lithographic Printers (1912) 2 SLT 50 at 52.

This is not the occasion to spell out the developments in the law of trusts, estoppel and damages which are needed if the law is finally to scale the heights of justice. This case did not raise those questions. I have referred to them merely to state my view that the appropriate path of legal development lies in those areas, not in the admission of a third party's right to sue. I think that is the path which accords with the views expressed by Sir Owen Dixon in his paper [141] Concerning Judicial Method which Dawson J cites in his judgment. In this case, McNiece endeavours to turn aside from the familiar path of privity, trust, agency and estoppel. But there is no other path unless we retrace our steps back at least to 1861. That is a course we ought not follow. It is a course we cannot follow. In my opinion, the relief which the Court of Appeal granted to McNiece was misconceived, and the appeal must be allowed.

[11.70] DEANE J: [143] Circumstances can undoubtedly arise in which accepted processes of legal reasoning require a court, usually a final appellate court, to reverse the development of the law by disowning established principle. However, where the established principle is as entrenched, by authority and in legal conception, as is the principle of privity, such a reversal can only be justified by precisely defined and compelling reasons advanced as part of a plainly identified process of legal reasoning. No such reasons are available to justify a wholesale abrogation of the general common law rule of privity of contract. [144] Indeed, I do not understand the contrary to have been suggested in the present case either in the courts below or in argument in this court. The New South Wales Court of Appeal, in upholding the learned trial judge's decision that the third party insured ("McNiece") was entitled to maintain proceedings for indemnity against the insurer ("Trident"), did not purport to displace the requirement of privity as a general rule. In argument in this court, senior counsel for McNiece expressly affirmed that he did "not, of course, invite [the court] to abrogate the doctrine of privity in its totality". What the Court of Appeal has held, and what McNiece has sought to maintain, is that, within the context of the general rule, a limited exception should be recognised in the field of liability insurance to enable a third party, who is specified or referred to (whether by name or otherwise) in the contract of insurance as a person to whom the insurance cover extends, to maintain a common law action against the insurer if "the court is satisfied" that it was "the intention of the parties" that the third party should have enforceable rights under the policy: see the judgment of Hope JA, with which Priestley JA agreed, in the Court of Appeal reported in (1987) 8 NSWLR 270 at 273–4.

It must, of course, be conceded that there has been considerable contemporary criticism by distinguished lawyers of the absence, in common law jurisdictions outside the United States of America, of any general direct right of action in a third party to enforce a promise contained in a contract between others. Much of that criticism has been advanced in the context of a call for legislative reform and has not been directed to seeking to lay a foundation for a judicial reversal of the law by some acceptable process of legal exegesis. Even in that context however, that criticism has (at least if viewed with the benefit of hindsight) often been flawed by an incomplete perception of the extent to which the practical effect of the rule of privity is confined and qualified, and to which the injustice which the rule might otherwise cause is precluded, by the application and development of other principles.

Of its nature, the rule of privity operates within the confines of the law of contract. Within those confines, it neither operates to deny the validity of a promise to benefit a third party nor hinders proceedings by the promisee against the promisor for specific performance of such a contractual obligation. That being so, the chose in action constituted by rights to enforce the promise will, in some circumstances, be susceptible of assignment by the promisee to the third party. Nor does the rule of privity preclude the promisee [145] from undertaking a collateral contractual obligation to the third party to institute and maintain such proceedings against the promisor for specific performance or to authorise the third party to maintain such proceedings for specific performance in the name of the promisee. If the promisee contracts as agent for a disclosed or undisclosed principal, the principal will ordinarily himself be, for the purposes of the requirement of privity, a party to the contract. If the terms of a contract incorporate a promise to benefit a third party in the form of an offer which is susceptible of being accepted by the third party, that third party can, at least if the consideration provided to the offeror under the head contract can be treated as having been provided (jointly or partly) by or on behalf of the third party (compare Coulls at 478–9, 486, 493), acquire direct contractual rights against the promisor by an appropriate acceptance of the offer.

If, within the confines of the law of contract, a third party who would be benefited by the performance of a contractual promise is left without redress, other principles of law operate (unhindered by the rule of privity) upon or within the context of contractual rights and obligations to avoid injustice in particular categories of case. The point can be conveniently illustrated by reference to a contract of the type involved in the present case, namely, a policy of liability insurance which includes a stranger to the contract among the persons whom the insurer promises to indemnify. If the insurer under such a policy induces, by his conduct, the third party to act to his detriment on the assumption that he is effectively indemnified under the policy, the insurer will, in an appropriate case, be estopped from denying the enforceability of such indemnity. Even if, in such a case, the assumption induced by the insurer is, upon analysis, an assumption as to future fact (for example, that the third party will, in the event of liability within the period of the policy, be effectively protected by the policy) the doctrine of estoppel by conduct would, in my view, be applicable to preclude the insurer from raising the requirement of privity of contract (or from denying enforceability or the existence of a trust of the promise) as a basis for a departure from that assumption as to future fact: compare Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher (1988) 62 ALJR 110 at 137–8; 76 ALR 513 at 559–60. Again, if the insurer under such a policy has received the moneys payable for the promised indemnity but has then refused to indemnify the third party on the ground that the third party was not a party to the contract of insurance, the circumstances could conceivably be such as to give rise to a cause of action by the third party against the insurer founded upon principles [146] of unjust enrichment: compare Pavey and Matthews Pty Ltd v Paul (1987) 162 CLR 221 at 227, 256–7; Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd v Westpac Banking Corp (1988) 62 ALJR 292 at 295–6; (1988) 78 ALR 157 at 161–3. The path by which relief would be granted in such a case might well involve some reassessment of the extent of curial powers, both statutory and inherent, to mould the relief appropriate to do justice in the circumstances of a particular case: note, in that regard, the discussion in Birks' article, "Restitutionary Damages for Breach of Contract" (1987) Lloyd's Maritime and Commercial Law Quarterly 421 at 422ff. It is, however, unnecessary in the present case to embark upon a detailed examination of questions of estoppel by conduct or to seek to identify what, if any, circumstances could found an action in unjust enrichment by the third party against an insurer who has refused to honour the indemnity which he has been paid to provide. The reason why that is so is that it has not been suggested in the present case that Trident is estopped by its conduct from relying upon the rule of privity to deny liability to McNiece or that the circumstances are such as might arguably give rise to a right of action (in McNiece) founded on unjust enrichment. Nor has any reliance been placed, either in the judgments in the Court of Appeal or in argument in this court, upon the doctrine of estoppel by conduct or (except to the extent that they are reflected in the law of trusts) upon principles of unjust enrichment. If there be a doctrinal basis for the recognition by the Court of Appeal of a right of action in the third party assured to enforce the insurer's promise of indemnity in the present case, it must be found, either directly or by way of analogy, in the law of trusts.

In the course of his judgment in Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring, Fullagar J (at 67) pointed to the fact that "equity could and did intervene in many cases" involving circumstances in which the common law requirement of privity could operate unjustly "by treating the promisee as a trustee of a promise made for the benefit of a third party, and allowing the third party to enforce the promise, making the promisee-trustee, if necessary, a defendant in an action against the promisor". His Honour went on to comment that it is "difficult to understand the reluctance which courts have sometimes shown to infer a trust in such cases": see, for a helpful discussion of the main earlier decisions, Starke, "Contracts for the Benefit of Third Parties, Pt IV" (1948) 22 Australian Law Journal 67 at 69. That comment of Fullagar J was, in my view, fully justified. [147] Indeed, the "reluctance" of courts to find a trust in such cases seems often to have been caused by a misunderstanding of the nature of equity's requirement of an intention to create an express trust, or put differently, by a failure to appreciate the innate flexibility of the law of trusts: compare Adams v Champion 294 US 231 at 237 (1935) per Cardozo J.

In equity, "intention alone will not constitute a trust obligation [and] … mere conduct without such intention is ineffectual to impose it, or, as Lewin, (12th ed), p 88, says, to 'impute' it": Commissioner of Stamp Duties (Qld) v Jolliffe (1920) 28 CLR 178 at 189 per Isaacs J and see, now, Lewin, (16th ed), at p 35. The requisite intention to create a trust of a contractual promise to benefit a third party can, however, be formed and carried into effect (either by the contract itself or some other act) by a promisee who would be bemused by the information that the chose in action constituted by the benefit of a contractual promise is property and uncomprehending of the distinction between law and equity. In that regard, the analogy of Molière's M Harpagon who unwittingly spoke poetry or "verse" would arguably have been a more instructive one than that of M Jourdain who merely spoke ordinary prose: see Re Schebsman [1944] Ch 83 at 104. In the context of such a contractual promise, the requisite intention should be inferred if it clearly appears that it was the intention of the promisee that the third party should himself be entitled to insist upon performance of the promise and receipt of the benefit and if trust is, in the circumstances, the appropriate legal mechanism for giving effect to that intention. A fortiori, equity's requirement of an intention to create a trust will be at least prima facie satisfied if the terms of the contract expressly or impliedly manifest that intention as the joint intention of both promisor and promisee.

A trust can attach to the benefit of the whole contract or of the whole or part of some particular contractual obligation. In the case of a policy of liability insurance under which the insurer agrees to indemnify both a party to the contract and others, there is no reason in principle or in common sense why the party to the contract should not hold the benefit of the insurer's promise to indemnify him on his own behalf and the benefit of the promise to indemnify others respectively upon trust for those others. Where the benefit of a contractual promise is held by the promisee as trustee for another, an action for enforcement of the promise or damages for its breach can be brought by the trustee. In such an action, the trustee can [148] recover, on behalf of the beneficiary, the damages sustained by the beneficiary by reason of breach. If the trustee of the promise declines to institute such proceedings, the beneficiary can bring proceedings against the promisor in his own name, joining the trustee as defendant.

An intention to create a trust of the benefit of a contractual promise can be evidenced and/or carried into effect by the contract itself or by action of the promisee aliunde. When the trust is created by the actual contract between promisor and promisee, the beneficiary can nonetheless properly be described as a stranger to the creation of the contract. Indeed, he may be quite unaware of its existence. It would, however, be misleading to say that the promisor, in such a case, is a stranger to the creation of the trust in that the overall effect of the contract itself, to which he is a party, may be that the relevant promise is made by him to the promisee in the latter's capacity as trustee for the designated beneficiary or class of beneficiaries and that the intention to create a trust which the contract manifests and carries into effect is a joint intention of both promisor and promisee who might both be regarded as settlors. It is unnecessary to consider here what, if any, rights or obligations in relation to the trust might be enjoyed by or imposed upon the promisor in such a case. What is relevant for present purposes is that, in such a case, there will ordinarily be neither need nor occasion to seek to identify some independent intention (that is, apart from that manifested in the contract) or action of the promisee. That is not, of course, to say that either the third party or the parties to the contract are restricted to the terms of the contract (to which the third party is a stranger) or precluded from relying on other circumstances to establish or negative the existence of a trust in the third party's favour in any dispute between the third party and one or more of the parties to the contract: see, for example, Royal Exchange Assurance v Hope [1928] Ch 179 at 185, 195.

The question whether a particular contract itself creates a trust of the benefit of one or more of the promises which it contains is primarily a question of the construction of the terms of the contract. Those terms must, however, be construed in context and a trust of a contractual promise will obviously be more readily discerned in the terms of some classes of contracts than it will in others. It is difficult to envisage a class of contract in which the creation of such a trust would be more readily discernible than the type of contract which is involved in the present case, namely, a policy of liability [149] insurance indemnifying both a party to the contract and others who are designated either by specific identification or by their membership of an identified group. In the case of such a policy, the terms of the contract itself will, in the context of the nature of insurance, ordinarily manifest an intention to the effect that each non-party assured is to be fully entitled to the benefit of the promisor's promise to indemnify him, that is to say, that the promisee should hold the chose in action constituted by the right to enforce that promise upon trust for the relevant non-party assured: compare Jacobs' Law of Trusts in Australia (5th ed, 1986), pp 24–5. The intention so manifested will commonly be a joint intention of promisor and promisee. It would suffice, however, that it be the intention of the promisee alone.

The relevant terms of the policy of insurance in the present case are set out or summarised in the judgment of McHugh JA in the Court of Appeal and in the joint judgment of Mason CJ and Wilson J in this court. It is unnecessary that I repeat them. It suffices to say that, in the context of the nature of liability insurance, those contractual terms manifest an unmistakeable intention that each assured should be entitled to the benefit of the insurer's promise to indemnify it against the specified loss and should be itself entitled to insist upon enforcement of that promise. That intention is properly to be construed in legal terms as an intention that the chose in action constituted by the benefit of Trident's promise to indemnify each contractor and subcontractor on the identified sites in respect of specified loss should be held by the promisee ("Blue Circle") upon trust for the relevant contractor or subcontractor. Prima facie, the contract operated to give effect to that intention which it manifested. That being so, the prima facie effect of the policy itself in the events which occurred (that is McNiece becoming a designated contractor or subcontractor) was to create a trust for McNiece of the benefit of Trident's promise to indemnify it against relevant loss. There is nothing in the material before the court which could have the effect of negativing or modifying the creation or effect of that trust. Indeed, in the context of the circumstances disclosed by that material, it is difficult to conceive of any real possibility of the existence of circumstances which could have had that effect. There are, however, two related difficulties involved in giving effect on this appeal to a conclusion that Blue Circle holds the benefit of Trident's promise to indemnify McNiece upon trust for McNiece. The first is that Blue Circle is not a party to the appeal. The second lies in the course which the proceedings followed in the courts below …

[His Honour noted that McNiece had not raised the question of whether a trust existed in its favour at trial and the Court of Appeal had refused leave to amend the statement of claim to raise a claim based on trust. After considering the comments made by the members of the Court of Appeal concerning the implication of a trust from a liability insurance policy, his Honour said that he could not accept the conclusion reached by McHugh JA that a trust will invariably be imputed where a third party seeks to rely on a liability insurance policy, nor was he prepared to agree with the conclusion of Hope and Priestley JJA that as the policy of insurance was entered into upon the expressed intention that the parties other than Blue Circle should have enforceable rights under it, McNiece could succeed without joining Blue Circle as a party or providing proof of a trust. His Honour continued:]

[152] My refusal to take the final step of recognising, in a case such as the present and in the absence of some applicable statutory provision, a direct right of action in the third party against the insurer to enforce the contract is not based on an insistence upon matters of form or procedure. It flows from an inability to see such a direct right of action in contract otherwise than as inconsistent with the established legal position. For present purposes, a refusal to take that final step is significant in at least two distinct ways. First, the defeasibility and extent of the third party assured's rights under a trust of the insurer's promise are as defined by the law of trusts and not as laid down by some new judicial prescription. Second, the existence of an intention to create such a trust (manifested by a contract, not directly binding between the parties to it on the one hand and a third party on the other) could be negatived or modified by other circumstances. That being so, it would be unfair to hold in the present case that McNiece was entitled to succeed in an action against Trident on the basis of a trust without extending to Trident any opportunity at all of establishing the existence of further circumstances which could negative or modify the creation or effect of any such trust.

Nor, in my view, does there exist any acceptable justification for the alteration of that established legal position by the creation, by judicial decision as distinct from legislative reform, of a direct right of action in a third party assured under a policy of liability insurance to enforce a contract to which he is not a party. As has been seen, it has long been the settled law of this country that it is of the very nature of a contract that it does not, of itself, confer any direct right of enforcement upon a person who is not a party to it. In the light of the provisions of s 48 of the Insurance Contracts Act 1984 (Cth), the only real point to be served by the judicial creation of such a direct right of enforcement would seem to be its retrospective application to any hard cases that might have arisen before the commencement of that Act. Even that doubtful point is, however, of doubly doubtful validity since it is far from apparent that there are, in fact, any such outstanding cases in which an insurer, who has invoked absence of privity to decline indemnity to a third party assured, is beyond the reach of doctrines of trust and estoppel or the principles of unjust enrichment. Moreover, the consequences of the creation of such an exception to the rule of privity are far from clear even in relation to the present case unless one treats the right of the third party to enforce the contract as being unconditional and indefeasible. If, for example, such a direct right of action of the third party assured could be terminated by the promisee or insurer or both up until the time when the third party had acted on the basis of the [153] promise or when the third party has given notice to the insurer that he has accepted the benefit of the promise, there has been no investigation in the present case of the question whether McNiece ever acted to its detriment on the basis of the policy or gave such notice or, for that matter, was even aware of the existence of the policy at any relevant time.

[Having concluded that the policy itself prima facie created a trust in favour of McNiece by which it was entitled to the benefit of Trident's promise to indemnify it, his Honour decided that the appropriate course was to allow McNiece leave to join Blue Circle as a respondent and to file a notice of contention alleging the existence of a trust. Trident should be allowed, if it could, to place before the court material showing that there were circumstances which had the effect of precluding or modifying the trust. In the absence of such evidence from Trident his Honour was of the view that the appropriate course was for the appeal to be dismissed.]

[11.75] DAWSON J: (dissenting) [158] To say the least, one may question the role of the court below, as an intermediate court of appeal bound by the decisions of this Court, in purporting to determine this case by the abandonment of established doctrine … Like it or not, there can be no doubt, nor did the Court of Appeal entertain any, that this Court has accepted the rule that only those who are parties to a contract can sue upon it. If Wilson v Darling Island Stevedoring (1956) 95 CLR 43 did not establish that to be so, then Coulls clearly did. Indeed, in the latter case Windeyer J described the rule as incontrovertible (1967) 119 CLR at 494. Those decisions, read in the light of Vandepitte, leave no room for argument whether or not the doctrine of privity applies to insurance policies expressed to be for the benefit of third persons ….

[160] This Court, whilst adhering to the doctrine of precedent, has always held itself able to depart from its own decisions when that is required for the proper exposition and development of the law. It is, therefore, not as confined as the court below which is bound by decisions of this Court. The argument before us accordingly took the [161] higher ground that we ought to abandon, at least in the case of contracts of insurance, the rule that only a party to a contract can sue upon it, because it has produced results which are unsatisfactory. But the invitation was not so much to engage in judicial creativity as to engage in the destruction of accepted principle, which is a very different thing ….

[162] Rejection of the doctrine of privity of contract by judicial decision could not be restricted upon any conceptual basis to contracts of insurance. There may be practical reasons for wishing to retain the doctrine in its application to some kinds of contract, but such a choice could not be made by a court by reference to any coherent body of principle. However, the rejection of the doctrine in anything other than a restricted manner requires the elaboration of a number of matters without which the law would be left unacceptably confused and uncertain. A glance at the legislation in those jurisdictions in which the doctrine has been abolished shows that it has been found necessary to provide for such matters as the manner in which the third person is to be specified in the contract, whether the benefit to the third person must be direct, whether any defence which is available against the promisee should be available against the third person and whether the promisee not being a party to any action should nevertheless be bound by the result, whether the third person should be bound by any obligations imposed upon him by the contract, whether acceptance of the contract by the third person is required and whether the contract may be discharged or varied without the consent of the third person. These are things which are beyond the purview of a court in its task of expounding the law in the context of resolving individual disputes ….

I would allow the appeal.

[11.80] TOOHEY J: [171] Certainly a court must look long and hard at the implications of declaring the law to be otherwise than hitherto accepted. In particular the court must consider the impact of any change on existing rights and obligations. But in the present case, to allow the respondent to sue the appellant is to give effect to the presumed intention of the appellant at the time it issued the insurance policy. If that not be the case, then as Prof Flannigan noted (p 579):

> If we are concerned with retaining the status quo in order to protect the planning interest, it is well to point out that those who plan on the basis of the rule are those who contract with the knowledge that they will not have to perform the contract, a very odd position for the common law to support.

When a final court of appeal is minded to change the common law, the notion of prospective overruling aims to deal with problems created by "departures from precedents on which expectations have been built": Stone, Precedent and Law (1985), p 186. It seeks to mitigate the hardship and possible injustice caused by overturning a law on which the parties have reasonably relied when ordering their affairs. The possible application of prospectivity does not arise in the present case for to declare that the law permits the respondent to bring action against the appellant does not frustrate the intentions of those involved; rather it gives effect to those intentions …

[172] [I]t is enough, for present purposes, that the insurance policy was expressed to be and was intended to be for the benefit of others, of which the respondent was one and that the others might be expected to order their affairs accordingly.

The proposition which I consider this court should now indorse may be formulated along these lines. When an insurer issues a liability insurance policy, identifying the assured in terms that evidence an intention on the part of both insurer and assured that the policy will indemnify as well those with whom the assured contracts for the purpose of the venture covered by the policy, and it is reasonable to expect that such a contractor may order its affairs by reference to the existence of the policy, the contractor may sue the insurer on the policy, notwithstanding that consideration may not have moved from the contractor to the insurer and notwithstanding that the contractor is not a party to the contract between the insurer and assured.

No doubt, a decision upholding the Court of Appeal will itself give rise to a number of questions. Are there other situations in which a third party may sue on a contract when consideration has not moved from the third party to the promisor? What defences are available to the promisor in such cases? These are questions which do not now require an answer. Other situations must await another day; the terms on which special leave to appeal was granted preclude a decision in wider terms than have been expressed in these reasons. The defences available to an insurer against whom action may lie at the suit of a third party do not have to be explored for none was advanced on behalf of the appellant before this court.

The appeal should be dismissed.

[11.85] GAUDRON J: [176] In my view it should now be recognised that a promisor who has accepted agreed consideration for a promise to benefit a third party is unjustly enriched at the expense of the third party to the extent that the promise is unfulfilled and the non-fulfilment does not attract proportional legal consequences. Although exceptions to and qualifications of the rules of privity and consideration and the doctrines of trust and estoppel operate in certain circumstances to preclude any unjust enrichment, the exceptions, qualifications and doctrines should not be seen as reasons to impede the development of legal principle which will obviate all possibility of unjust enrichment. Rather, their existence should be seen as demonstrating the necessity for the recognition of such an obligation.

The possibility of unjust enrichment is obviated by recognition that a promisor who has accepted agreed consideration for a promise to benefit a third party owes an obligation to the third party to fulfil that promise and that the third party has a corresponding right to bring action to secure the benefit of the promise. …

[177] On the basis that the appellant received the agreed consideration specified in the policy of insurance – a matter that has not been disputed – it came under an obligation to the respondent to fulfil its promise to indemnify it as provided in the policy. The respondent is entitled to maintain an action to enforce that obligation.

Appeal dismissed.

[11.90] Notes

1. In Silver v Dome Resources NL (2007) 62 ACSR 539, 567 Hamilton J noted that "despite the passage of nearly 20 years since the decision in Trident, I am not aware of any decision, particularly of an appellate court, the ratio decidendi of which would justify the widening of the exception" beyond contracts of insurance.
2. In Gate Gourmet Australia Pty Ltd (in liq) v Gate Gourmet Holding Ag [2004] NSWSC 149, a subsidiary company sought to enforce a letter of guarantee issued by its ultimate holding company. Although Einstein J held that the subsidiary company was a party to the contract, he noted that if this conclusion was incorrect, the subsidiary company could nevertheless enforce the promise. The exception to the privity rule recognised by Mason CJ and Wilson J and Toohey J in Trident could be extended because of the similarities between contracts of insurance and contracts of indemnification and because the parties had a common intention that the subsidiary company would obtain the benefit of the promises contained in the letter and had ordered its affairs accordingly.

3. Gaudron J's reasoning in Trident has been "extensively" and "properly" criticised, and has been held not to represent the law in Australia: Benson v Rational Entertainment Enterprises Ltd [2018] NSWCA 111, [117]–[124]. See also Rail Corporation of New South Wales v Fluor Australia Pty Ltd [2008] NSWSC 1348, [186].

REFORM

[11.95] The privity doctrine has been substantially modified in a number of jurisdictions. Legislation in Queensland (Property Law Act 1974, s 55), Western Australia (Property Law Act 1969, s 11) and the Northern Territory (Law of Property Act, s 56) allows third parties to enforce contracts made for their benefit in certain circumstances, as does legislation in England (Contracts (Rights of Third Parties) Act 1999) and New Zealand (Contract and Commercial Law Act 2017 (NZ), ss 10–20). The arguments in favour of reform were canvassed by the English Law Commission in its 1996 report: Privity of Contract: Contracts for the Benefit of Third Parties, Law Com No 242, and were summarised by Burrows, "Reforming Privity of Contract: Law Commission Report No 242" (1996) Lloyd's Maritime and Commercial Law Quarterly 467. TERMS AND THE COMMUNICATIONS OF THE PARTIES

[12.05] The terms of a contract determine what the parties have agreed to do by way of performance of their contract. This chapter concerns the way in which courts identify the terms of a contract. Chapter 13 looks at the ways in which courts interpret, or construe, those terms. In some cases, a contract may also be supplemented by implied terms, namely terms that are in some way implicit in the contract or recognised as a matter of law. Implied terms are discussed in Chapter 14.

The terms of a contract may be contained in a written and signed contractual document. Contract terms may also be found in unsigned documents, signs, notices, web pages, hypertext links, emails, or in the statements made during negotiations.

The process of identifying the terms seeks to distinguish contractual terms from mere statements of opinion or negotiations. In identifying the terms of a contract, courts seek to give effect to the intentions of the parties. However, as we have already seen, the modern law of contract generally favours an objective approach in assessing the parties' intentions. The objective approach means that courts do not inquire into what the parties actually intended. Rather, courts consider "the intention which reasonable persons would have had if placed in the situation of the parties": Reardon Smith Line v Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, 996 per Lord Wilberforce. See also Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, extracted at [15.35].

WRITTEN TERMS AND THE EFFECT OF SIGNATURE

[12.10] The general rule – laid down in L'Estrange v Graucob [1934] 2 KB 394 – is that a party will be bound by the terms contained in a contractual document which she or he has signed, whether or not she or he has read the document.

L'Estrange v Graucob

[12.15] L'Estrange v F Graucob Ltd [1934] 2 KB 394 (Divisional Court) – Appeal from the County Court.

[FACTS: The plaintiff decided to purchase from the defendant a cigarette vending machine. She signed a form on brown paper which was headed "Sales Agreement" and which was filled in by the defendant's salesperson. The form was an order form which contained printed terms of sale. It was retained by the salesperson, and two days later, the defendant sent to the plaintiff an "order confirmation" signed on behalf of the defendant. When the machine was delivered, it did not work satisfactorily. The plaintiff brought an action for damages for breach of an implied warranty that the machine was reasonably fit for the purposes for which it was required. The defendant relied upon the following clause in the sales agreement: "The agreement contains all the terms and conditions under which I agree to purchase the machine specified above and any express or implied condition, statement, or warranty, statutory or otherwise not stated herein is hereby excluded."

The trial judge held that there had been a breach of the implied warranty and that when she had signed the form, the plaintiff had no knowledge of its contents except for the price, instalments and the arrangements for installing the machine. He held that the type was unreasonably small and that the defendant did not do what was reasonably sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of the conditions. He gave judgment for the plaintiff. The defendant appealed.]

SCRUTTON LJ [referred to the facts and the course of proceedings and continued]: [402] The main question raised in the present case is whether that clause formed part of the contract. If it did, it clearly excluded any condition or warranty …

The present case is not a ticket case, and it is distinguishable from the ticket cases. In Parker v South Eastern Ry Co (1877) 2 CPD 416, Mellish LJ laid down in a few sentences the law which is [403] applicable to this case. He there said (at 421): "In an ordinary case, where an action is brought on a written agreement which is signed by the defendant, the agreement is proved by proving his signature, and, in the absence of fraud, it is wholly immaterial that he has not read the agreement and does not know its contents." Having said that, he goes on to deal with the ticket cases, where there is no signature to the contractual document, the document being simply handed by the one party to the other:

> The parties may, however, reduce their agreement into writing, so that the writing constitutes the sole evidence of the agreement, without signing it; but in that case there must be evidence independently of the agreement itself to prove that the defendant has assented to it. In that case, also, if it is proved that the defendant has assented to the writing constituting the agreement between the parties, it is, in the absence of fraud, immaterial that the defendant had not read the agreement and did not know its content.

In cases in which the contract is contained in a railway ticket or other unsigned document, it is necessary to prove that an alleged party was aware, or ought to have been aware, of its terms and conditions. These cases have no application when the document has been signed. When a document containing contractual terms is signed, then, in the absence of fraud, or, I will add, misrepresentation, the party signing it is bound, and it is wholly immaterial whether he has read the document or not.

The plaintiff contended at the trial that she was induced by misrepresentation to sign the contract without knowing its terms, and that on that ground they are not binding upon her … I have read the evidence with care, and it contains no material upon which fraud [404] could be found. The plaintiff no doubt alleged that the defendants' agent represented to her that the document which was given her to be signed was an order form, but according to the defendants' evidence no such statement was made to her by the agent. Moreover, whether the plaintiff was or was not told that the document was an order form, it was in fact an order form, and an order form is a contractual document. It may be either an acceptance or a proposal which may be accepted, but it always contains some contractual terms. There is no evidence that the plaintiff was induced to sign the contract by misrepresentation. In this case the plaintiff has signed a document headed "Sales Agreement", which she admits had to do with an intended purchase, and which contained a clause excluding all conditions and warranties. That being so, the plaintiff, having put her signature to the document and not having been induced to do so by any fraud or misrepresentation, cannot be heard to say that she is not bound by the terms of the document because she has not read them …

[12.20] MAUGHAM LJ: [405] In the case of a formal contract between seller and buyer, such as a deed, there is a presumption which puts it beyond doubt that the parties intended that the document should contain the terms of their contract. The brown paper document is not a formal instrument of that character, yet, in my opinion having been signed it may well constitute a contract in writing. A reference to any of the textbooks dealing with the law of contract will provide many cases of the verbal acceptance of a written offer, in which the courts have held that the written offer and the acceptance, even though only verbal, together constituted a contract in writing, which could not be altered by extraneous evidence. The rule may not operate equitably in all cases, but it is unquestionably binding in law … In my opinion the contract was concluded not when the brown order form was signed by the plaintiff but when the order confirmation was signed by the defendants. If the document signed by the plaintiff was a part of a contract in writing, it is impossible [406] to pick out certain clauses from it and ignore them as not binding on the plaintiff … The written document admittedly related to the purchase of the machine by the plaintiff. Even if she was told that [407] it was an order form, she could not be heard to say that it did not affect her because she did not know its contents …

[His Lordship considered the possibility of misrepresentation and held that it had not been made out.]

Appeal allowed.

Toll (FGCT) v Alphapharm

[12.25] Toll (FGCT) Pty Ltd v Alphapharm Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 52; (2004) 219 CLR 165 – On Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: EB was the Australian distributor of an influenza vaccine imported from the United Kingdom. The respondent (Alphapharm) was a sub-distributor. An Australian subsidiary of EB, Richard Thomson, agreed with the respondent that it would look after the collection, storage and regulatory approval of the vaccine. The vaccine required constant refrigeration at particular temperatures. Richard Thomson decided to engage a carrier, the appellant (Finemores) to collect the vaccine on arrival at Sydney, transport it to the Finemores' warehouse and to store it. Alphapharm accepted Richard Thomson's suggestion that the Finemores' services be used both to deliver quantities of the vaccine to Alphapharm's customers and to collect and initially store them. Alphapharm had no direct dealings with Finemores. EB was liable for the cost of delivery into store. Alphapharm was liable for the cost of delivery from the warehouse to its customers. Finemores provided a quotation to Richard Thomson under cover of a letter. The letter stated that cartage was subject to the conditions on the reverse side of an attached consignment note. No consignment note was attached. The letter requested Richard Thomson to complete a credit application and to sign a rate schedule accepting certain rates and conditions. The credit application form, immediately above the place for the customer's signature, provided: "Please read 'Conditions of Contract' (overleaf) prior to signing." The representative of Richard Thomson signed without reading the conditions of contract. The conditions provided by cl 5 that the customer entered into the contract on its own behalf and also as agent for the customer's associates, who were defined by cl 3(b) to include persons having an interest in the goods. Clause 6 provided that in no circumstances would the carrier be responsible to the customer for loss and damage in relation to the goods.

The first consignment of the vaccine was rejected by a regulatory authority as the temperature had dropped below the minimum required during transit from the appellant's warehouse. A second consignment was rejected by an authority as the temperature had dropped too low while the consignment was in storage.

Alphapharm sued Finemores for damages for breach of duty as a bailee and in negligence. Finemores relied on the cl 6 exemption from liability. Alphapharm conceded that there was a legally binding agreement between Richard Thomson and Finemores, but denied it was bound by cl 6 or the other conditions, contending first, that the conditions on the reverse side of the application for credit were not part of the contract; and second, that Richard Thomson had not contracted as agent for Alphapharm. Both of Alphapharm's arguments succeeded at trial and on appeal. The trial judge and the Court of Appeal held that for the conditions of contract to be part of the agreement, it was necessary for Finemores to establish that it had done what was reasonably sufficient to give Richard Thomson notice of them and that this had not been done.]

THE COURT (GLEESON CJ, GUMMOW, HAYNE, CALLINAN and HEYDON JJ): [178] The terms of contract issue

A striking feature of the evidence at trial, and of the reasoning of the learned primary judge, is the attention that was given to largely irrelevant information about the subjective understanding of the individual participants in the dealings between the parties. Written statements of witnesses, no doubt prepared by lawyers, were received [178] as evidence in chief. Those statements contained a deal of inadmissible material that was received without objection. The uncritical reception of inadmissible evidence, often in written form and prepared in advance of the hearing is to be strongly discouraged. It tends to distract attention from the real issues, give rise to pointless cross-examination and cause problems on appeal where it may be difficult to know the extent to which the inadmissible material influenced the judgment at first instance.

In Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337 at 352, Mason J observed:

> We do not take into account the actual intentions of the parties and for the very good reason that an investigation of those matters would not only be time consuming but it would also be unrewarding as it would tend to give too much weight to these factors at the expense of the actual language of the written contract.

It is not in dispute that Finemores stored and transported the goods pursuant to a contract made between Finemores and Richard Thomson. The role of Alphapharm in that contract is a matter of dispute, and is the subject of the agency issue. It may be put to one side for the moment. The issue presently under consideration concerns the identification of the terms on which Finemores and Richard Thomson contracted.

It is not in dispute that Mr Gardiner-Garden was authorised by Richard Thomson to sign the Application for Credit, and that when he signed that document he did so intending that it would affect the legal relations between Richard Thomson and Finemores. So much was acknowledged in the course of argument in this Court. Counsel for Richard Thomson said that there was no suggestion that the document that was signed was not intended to create legal relations. In their consideration in Ermogenous v Greek Orthodox Community of SA Inc (2002) 209 CLR 95 at 105-106 [25] of the requisite intention to create contractual relations, Gaudron, McHugh, Hayne and Callinan JJ said:

> Although the word "intention" is used in this context, it is used in the same sense as it is used in other contractual contexts. It describes what it is that would objectively be conveyed by what was said or done, having regard to the circumstances in which those statements and actions happened (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337 at 348-353, per Mason J; Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council (2002) 76 ALJR 436; 186 ALR 289). It is not a search for the uncommunicated subjective motives or intentions of the parties.

[179] The point at issue on this appeal concerns not the creation of legal relations but the nature of the legal relations created.

Any suggestion that the agreement between Richard Thomson and Finemores was vitiated by misrepresentation would be untenable. Mr Gardiner-Garden signed a document which invited him to read the terms and conditions on the reverse before signing. He was not rushed or tricked into signing the document. He chose to sign it without reading it. He could have read it had he wished. Finemores did not set out to conceal from him the terms and conditions on the document, or to encourage him not to read them. Finemores had no way of knowing that he did not read the document. No case of mistake or non est factum is advanced.

This Court, in Pacific Carriers Ltd v BNP Paribas (2004) 218 CLR 451, has recently reaffirmed the principle of objectivity by which the rights and liabilities of the parties to a contract are determined. It is not the subjective beliefs or understandings of the parties about their rights and liabilities that govern their contractual relations. What matters is what each party by words and conduct would have led a reasonable person in the position of the other party to believe. References to the common intention of the parties to a contract are to be understood as referring to what a reasonable person would understand by the language in which the parties have expressed their agreement. The meaning of the terms of a contractual document is to be determined by what a reasonable person would have understood them to mean. That, normally, requires consideration not only of the text, but also of the surrounding circumstances known to the parties, and the purpose and object of the transaction (Pacific Carriers Ltd v BNP Paribas (2004) 218 CLR 451 at 461-462 [22]).

In Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422 at 429, Mason A-CJ, Murphy and Deane JJ explained the significance of the difference between the subjective and objective theories of contractual assent by reference to the impeachment of a contract on the ground of unilateral mistake. They said:

> According to the subjective theory, there is no binding contract either at common law or in equity, equity following the common law in this respect. Of course in deciding whether the contract is void ab initio for the unilateral mistake, regard will be had to the doctrine of estoppel in order to determine whether effect should be given to the claim that there has been unilateral mistake. On the other hand, according to the objective theory, there is a contract which, in conformity with the common law, continues to be binding, unless and until it is avoided in accordance with equitable principles which take as their foundation a contract valid at common law but transform it so that it becomes voidable. The important distinction [180] between the two approaches is that, according to the subjective theory, the contract is void ab initio, whereas according to the objective theory, it is voidable only.

Their Honours went on to say that "the clear trend in decided cases and academic writings has been to leave the objective theory in command of the field".

Consistent with this objective approach to the determination of the rights and liabilities of contracting parties is the significance which the law attaches to the signature (or execution) of a contractual document. In Parker v South Eastern Railway Co (1877) 2 CPD 416 at 421, Mellish LJ drew a significant distinction as follows:

> In an ordinary case, where an action is brought on a written agreement which is signed by the defendant, the agreement is proved by proving his signature, and, in the absence of fraud, it is wholly immaterial that he has not read the agreement and does not know its contents. The parties may, however, reduce their agreement into writing, so that the writing constitutes the sole evidence of the agreement, without signing it; but in that case there must be evidence independently of the agreement itself to prove that the defendant has assented to it.

More recently, in words that are apposite to the present case, in Wilton v Farnworth (1948) 76 CLR 646 at 649 Latham CJ said:

> In the absence of fraud or some other of the special circumstances of the character mentioned, a man cannot escape the consequences of signing a document by saying, and proving, that he did not understand it. Unless he was prepared to take the chance of being bound by the terms of the document, whatever they might be, it was for him to protect himself by abstaining from signing the document until he understood it and was satisfied with it. Any weakening of these principles would make chaos of every-day business transactions.

In Oceanic Sun Line Special Shipping Co Inc v Fay (1988) 165 CLR 197 at 228, Brennan J said:

> If a passenger signs and thereby binds himself to the terms of a contract of carriage containing a clause exempting the carrier from liability for loss arising out of the carriage, it is immaterial that the passenger did not trouble to discover the contents of the contract.

It should not be overlooked that to sign a document known and intended to affect legal relations is an act which itself ordinarily conveys a representation to a reasonable reader of the document. The [181] representation is that the person who signs either has read and approved the contents of the document or is willing to take the chance of being bound by those contents, as Latham CJ put it, whatever they might be. That representation is even stronger where the signature appears below a perfectly legible written request to read the document before signing it.

The statements in the above authorities accord with the well-known principle stated by Scrutton LJ in L'Estrange v Graucob Ltd [1934] 2 KB 394 at 403 that "[w]hen a document containing contractual terms is signed, then, in the absence of fraud, or, I will add, misrepresentation, the party signing it is bound, and it is wholly immaterial whether he has read the document or not". Scrutton LJ, in turn, was repeating the substance of what had been said by Mellish LJ in Parker v South Eastern Railway Co (1877) 2 CPD 416 at 421. The principle was applied in Foreman v Great Western Railway Co (1878) 38 LT 851. A consignor of cattle sent them for transportation by a railway company. They were put in the charge of a drover, who could not read. The drover signed a contract of carriage which contained an exclusion clause. The drover's employer was held to be bound by the clause. The Exchequer Division said that "the plaintiff who sends the [illiterate] servant to sign the document is in no better or worse position than if he had signed it himself without reading it" (Foreman (1878) 38 LT 851 at 853). In his lecture published as "Form and Substance in Legal Reasoning: The Case of Contract" (MacCormick and Birks (eds), The Legal Mind: Essays for Tony Honore (1986), Ch 2, 19, at p 34), Professor Atiyah posed, with reference to L'Estrange v Graucob, the question why signatures are, within established limits, regarded as conclusive. He answered:

> A signature is, and is widely recognized even by the general public as being a formal device, and its value would be greatly reduced if it could not be treated as a conclusive ground of contractual liability at least in all ordinary circumstances.

Professor Atiyah added (MacCormick and Birks (eds), The Legal Mind: Essays for Tony Honore (1986), Ch 2, 19, at p 35):

> However, what is, I think, less clear is what is the underlying reason of substance in this kind of situation. The usual explanation for holding a signature to be conclusively binding is that it must be taken to show that the party signing has agreed to the contents of the document; but another possible explanation is that the other party can be treated as having relied upon the signature. It thus may be a mistake to ask, as H L A Hart once asked, whether the [182] signature is merely conclusive evidence of agreement, or whether it is itself a criterion of agreement (See Hart, "The Ascription of Responsibility and Rights", Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society, vol 49 (1949) 171).

These themes appeared in the judgment of this Court in Petelin v Cullen (1975) 132 CLR 355. There, the Court upheld a plea of non est factum. Under the common law rules, a plea of non est factum was a plea of the general issue which put in issue that the defendant had executed the deed alleged in its declaration (Bullen and Leake, Precedents of Pleadings in Personal Actions in the Superior Courts of Common Law, 3rd ed (1868), pp 467-468). In their joint judgment in Petelin, Barwick CJ, McTiernan, Gibbs, Stephen and Mason JJ said (Petelin (1975) 132 CLR 355 at 359):

> The principle which underlies the extension of the plea to cases in which a defendant has actually signed the instrument on which he is sued has not proved easy of precise formulation. The problem is that the principle must accommodate two policy considerations which pull in opposite directions: first, the injustice of holding a person to a bargain to which he has not brought a consenting mind; and, secondly, the necessity of holding a person who signs a document to that document, more particularly so as to protect innocent persons who rely on that signature when there is no reason to doubt its validity. The importance which the law assigns to the act of signing and to the protection of innocent persons who rely upon a signature is readily discerned in the statement that the plea is one "which must necessarily be kept within narrow limits" … and in the qualifications attaching to the defence which are designed to achieve this objective.

The importance which, for a very long time (see Whelpdale's Case (1604) 5 Co Rep 119a [77 ER 239]; Holdsworth, A History of English Law, 2nd ed (1937), vol 8, pp 50-51), the common law has assigned to the act of signing is not limited to contractual documents. Wilton v Farnworth was not a contract case. The passage from the judgment of Latham CJ quoted above is preceded by a general statement that, where a man signs a document knowing that it is a legal document relating to an interest in property, he is in general bound by the act of signature (Wilton (1948) 76 CLR 646 at 649). Legal instruments of various kinds take their efficacy from signature or execution. Such instruments are often signed by people who have not read and understood all their terms, but who are nevertheless committed to those terms by the act of signature or execution. It is that commitment which enables third parties to assume the legal efficacy of the instrument. To undermine that assumption would cause serious mischief.

In most common law jurisdictions, and throughout Australia, [183] legislation has been enacted in recent years to confer on courts a capacity to ameliorate in individual cases hardship caused by the strict application of legal principle to contractual relations. As a result, there is no reason to depart from principle, and every reason to adhere to it, in cases where such legislation does not apply, or is not invoked (Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] AC 827 at 843, per Lord Wilberforce; at 851, per Lord Diplock; Darlington Futures Ltd v Delco Australia Pty Ltd (1986) 161 CLR 500 at 507-508; Esso Australia Resources Ltd v Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1999) 201 CLR 49 at 62 [24]).

To speak of the operation of the law of contract with respect to the signature of the document containing cl 6 requires attention both to the significance attached by the law to the presence of the signature and also to the absence of any grounds, such as a plea of non est factum, which at common law would render the contract void and of any grounds, such as misrepresentation, which might attract equitable relief, or which might elicit curial dispensation under a statutory regime. This illustrates the cogency of the statement of H L A Hart (Hart, "The Ascription of Responsibility and Rights", Proceedings of the Aristotelian Society, vol 49 (1949) 171, at p 174) that usually it is not possible to define a legal concept such as "contract" merely by specifying certain necessary and sufficient conditions for its application because: "any set of conditions may be adequate in some cases but not in others and such concepts can only be explained with the aid of a list of exceptions or negative examples showing where the concept may not be applied or may only be applied in a weakened form."

An application of settled principle in the present case leads to the conclusion that the terms and conditions on the reverse of the Application for Credit formed part of the contract governing the storage and transportation of the goods.

The reasoning of the primary judge, accepted by the Court of Appeal, was based upon the proposition that, in order for those terms and conditions to be made part of the contract, it was necessary for Finemores to establish that it had done what was reasonably sufficient to give Richard Thomson notice of the terms and conditions (the major premise), and the further proposition that Finemores had not done what was reasonably sufficient to give Richard Thomson such notice (the minor premise).

It would be possible to dispose of the appeal by disagreeing with the minor premise. What more Finemores could have done to give Richard Thomson notice of the terms and conditions than requiring their representative to sign a document, and to place his signature immediately below a request that he read the conditions on the reverse side of the document before signing, is difficult to imagine.

Of wider importance, however, is the major premise. If correct, it involves a serious qualification to the general principle concerning the [184] effect of signing a contract without reading it. The proposition appears to be that a person who signs a contractual document without reading it is bound by its terms only if the other party has done what is reasonably sufficient to give notice of those terms. If the proposition is limited to some terms and not others, it is not easy to see what the discrimen might be.

It appears from the reasoning of the primary judge and the Court of Appeal that the proposition was given a narrower focus, and was limited to exclusion clauses, or, perhaps, exclusion clauses which are regarded by a court as unusual and onerous. The present happens to be a case about exclusion clauses, but there is no apparent reason why the principle, if it exists, should apply only to them. Nor is the criterion by which a court might declare a contractual provision to be unusual or onerous always easy to identify. The origin of the proposition, clearly enough, is in the principles that apply to cases, such as ticket cases, in which one party has endeavoured to incorporate in a contract terms and conditions appearing in a notice or an unsigned document. When an attempt is made to introduce the concept of sufficient notice into the field of signed contracts, there is a danger of subverting fundamental principle based on sound legal policy. There are circumstances in which it is material to ask whether a person who has signed a document was given reasonable notice of what was in it. Cases where misrepresentation is alleged, or where mistake is claimed, provide examples. No one suggests that the fact that a document has been signed is for all purposes conclusive as to its legal effect. At the same time, where a person has signed a document, which is intended to affect legal relations, and there is no question of misrepresentation, duress, mistake, or any other vitiating element, the fact that the person has signed the document without reading it does not put the other party in the position of having to show that due notice was given of its terms. Furthermore, it may be asked, where would this leave a third party into whose hands the document might come?

In L'Estrange v Graucob ([1934] 2 KB 394 at 402-403), Scrutton LJ said that the problem in that case was different from what he described as "the railway passenger and cloak-room ticket cases, such as Richardson, Spence & Co v Rowntree ([1894] AC 217)", where "there is no signature to the contractual document, the document being simply handed by the one party to the other". His Lordship said:

> In cases in which the contract is contained in a railway ticket or other unsigned document, it is necessary to prove that an alleged party was aware, or ought to have been aware, of its terms and conditions. These cases have no application when the document has been signed. [185]

In the same case Maugham LJ (L'Estrange v Graucob [1934] 2 KB 394 at 406-407), who agreed with Scrutton LJ, referred to three possible circumstances in which the party who signed the document might not have been bound by its terms. The first was if the document signed was not a contract but merely a memorandum of a previous contract which did not include the relevant term. The second was a case of non est factum. The third was a case of misrepresentation.

If there is a claim of misrepresentation, or non est factum, or if there is an issue as to whether a document was intended to affect legal relations or whether, on the other hand, it was tendered as a mere memorandum of a pre-existing contract, or a receipt, or if there is a claim for equitable or statutory relief, then even in the case of a signed document it may be material to know whether a person who has signed it was given sufficient notice of its contents. The general rule, which applies in the present case, is that where there is no suggested vitiating element, and no claim for equitable or statutory relief, a person who signs a document which is known by that person to contain contractual terms, and to affect legal relations, is bound by those terms, and it is immaterial that the person has not read the document. L'Estrange v Graucob explicitly rejected an attempt to import the principles relating to ticket cases into the area of signed contracts. It was not argued, either in this Court or in the Court of Appeal, that L'Estrange v Graucob should not be followed.

The reasoning of the primary judge on the matter was as follows:

> The question for decision then is whether the "Conditions of Contract" on the back of the Application for Credit formed part of the contract.
>
> This is not a case where the parties have signed a single formal document which purports to contain all the terms and conditions of the contract between them. The relevant writing forms but part of one document out of a number which partly evidence the contract.
>
> Neither are the facts on all fours with those in Liaweena (NSW) Pty Ltd v McWilliams Wines Pty Ltd ([1991] ASC ¶56-038), where the party receiving a notice knew that it contained conditions which the other party intended to form part of future contracts, but because of an innocent misrepresentation did not read them. In this case I accept that Mr Garden did not realise that there were conditions on the back of the Credit application, especially conditions of a kind which so radically affected the contract. However, I do not think that he was induced not to read them because of any misrepresentation, however innocent. He did not give evidence that he was so misled, because he could not remember the circumstances of his signing the document. [186]
>
> However, I also respectfully accept the statement in that case that the underlying question is whether the defendant "did what was reasonably sufficient to give the plaintiff notice of the condition". I also note the statement in Remath Investments No 6 Pty Ltd v Chanel (Australia) Pty Ltd (unreported; Supreme Court of NSW (Court of Appeal); 24 December 1992 at 4) that this obligation applies not merely to the existence but also to the content of the conditions.
>
> Mr Garden had already read a document containing rates and conditions. He was then presented with another document which on its face related to matters relevant to his company's creditworthiness. All that was done to give him notice was the single sentence above the space provided for his signature which read "Please read 'conditions of contract' (Overleaf) prior to signing." Had he noticed that sentence, he would have been quite justified in assuming that overleaf there were conditions relating to the terms upon which > credit would be extended to his company. Conditions about cartage and storage had been set out in the previous document. There was nothing in the Application for Credit document itself, in the surrounding circumstances or in anything that Finemores had said or done that should have alerted him to the fact that the document contained conditions which so radically affected the contract.

> I am satisfied that Finemores did not do what was reasonably sufficient to give Richard Thomson notice of the existence or of the content of the conditions of contract on the back of the Application for Credit form. Those conditions did not therefore form part of the contract between Finemores and Richard Thomson. (Footnotes omitted.)

Passing over the statement that all that was done to give notice was to provide for signature immediately below a request to read the conditions overleaf before signing (a proposition that goes to the minor premise), the reasoning proceeds upon a transposition to this area of discourse of the reasoning in the ticket cases: the very thing that L'Estrange v Graucob held should not be done.

The case of Remath Investments No 6 Pty Ltd Remath Investments No 6 Pty Ltd (unreported; Supreme Court of NSW (Court of Appeal); 24 December 1992) is clearly distinguishable. Goods were stolen from a bond store. Invoices referred to storage conditions which were said to be available on request. The Court of Appeal held that the storage conditions were not part of the contracts covering the stolen goods. "The contracts did not expressly incorporate those conditions and the invoices were sent too late to have any contractual effect." (Remath Investments No 6 Pty Ltd v Chanel (Australia) Pty Ltd (unreported; Supreme Court of NSW (Court of Appeal); 24 December 1992, at 4) Both parties accepted that the test was whether "the appellant did what was reasonably sufficient to [187] give … notice of the condition[s]" (Remath Investments No 6 Pty Ltd v Chanel (Australia) Pty Ltd (unreported; Supreme Court of NSW (Court of Appeal); 24 December 1992, at 9). That is not the basis on which the present case is to be decided.

All three members of the Court of Appeal accepted the primary judge's erroneous view that the critical question was whether Finemores gave Richard Thomson reasonably sufficient notice of the conditions on the reverse side of the Application for Credit. Bryson J, with whom Sheller JA agreed, was troubled about the negative answer that was given to the question, and said that he may have come to a different conclusion, but held that the conclusion of the trial judge was open to him and should not be disturbed. This led to a submission in this Court that the Court of Appeal had abdicated its responsibility to review the trial judge's reasoning, but it is unnecessary to pursue that point.

Young CJ in Eq referred to the English case of Grogan v Robin Meredith Plant Hire [1996] TLR 93, in which the issue was whether the signature of a plant driver's time sheet by the agent of a company which had hired the driver and plant varied a pre-existing contract of hire so as to incorporate standard conditions of the Contractors Plant Association which were referred to on the time sheet. The English Court of Appeal answered the question in the negative. The question was identified as being whether in the circumstances a reasonable person would have understood the act of signing the time sheet as intended to have the effect of varying a contract that had already been made. The time sheet, the Court of Appeal said, was essentially an administrative and accounting document. That decision has no bearing on the present case, especially in light of the acknowledgment that the Application for Credit was intended to affect legal relations, and the fact that there was no pre-existing contract.

There may be cases where the circumstances in which a document is presented for signature, or the presence in it of unusual terms, could involve a misrepresentation. No such problem exists in the present case. There could also be circumstances in which one party would not reasonably understand another party's signature to a document as a manifestation of intent to enter into legal relations, or of assent to its terms. Again, that is not this case. It was reasonable of Finemores to treat Mr Gardiner-Garden's signature as a manifestation of assent to the conditions he had been invited to read before signing.

There was, in the reasoning of the Court of Appeal, some emphasis on the fact that the document signed by Mr Gardiner-Garden was an Application for Credit, and a suggestion that there is something surprising about such a document containing anything other than terms of payment. Bryson J said that the Application for Credit "was not altogether clearly an indication that the conditions were to be part of [188] the contractual arrangement" and that a condition such as cl 6 or cl 8 was not what might be expected in an Application for Credit. Part of the answer to this has already been mentioned. The Application for Credit was in substance an application by Richard Thomson to become an account customer, and it was to cover all future dealings with Finemores. The Application for Credit had been referred to in the first written communication from Finemores to Richard Thomson. The evidence was against any conclusion that the conditions were abnormal. There was no evidence to support a finding that applications for credit in the transport industry do not normally contain general terms of contract. Such evidence as there was on the matter was to the effect that the terms in question were not abnormal. Furthermore, it should be noted that the commercial context in which the terms and conditions operated included, as a key element, the matter of insurance. Clause 6 is to be understood in the light of cl 9. Alphapharm's later acceptance of the same standard terms was no doubt related to the fact that it had its own insurance. More fundamentally, the concern felt by the Court of Appeal was not addressed under the rubric of misrepresentation. Any suggestion of misrepresentation had been dismissed by the primary judge, and had no basis in fact. Mr Gardiner-Garden was not subjected to any pressure, and there was no element of concealment. There was no evidence that he was induced to sign the document by anything other than the request that he sign it. If the case had been one of misrepresentation, then it would have fallen within the qualification expressed in L'Estrange v Graucob; but it was not.

The Victorian Court of Appeal, in Le Mans Grand Prix Circuits Pty Ltd v Iliadis [1998] 4 VR 661 (Winneke P and Tadgell JA, Batt JA dissenting), considered a case in which a plaintiff, attending a radio station promotional function at a go-kart track, was required to sign a document at the point of entry. He was bustled into signing the document without being given an opportunity to read it. The document was headed, in bold capitals, "TO HELP WITH OUR ADVERTISING". The plaintiff said he thought it was a form for marketing or promotional purposes. It contained an exclusion of liability clause. The plaintiff was injured. The Court of Appeal held that the exclusion clause did not apply. There was no finding that any contract of hire was made between the parties. There was no fee charged for entry, and no contract of entry. No one told the plaintiff he would be required to sign any contractual document.

The defendant conceded that "contractual documents containing an onerous exemptive provision must be brought to the notice of the party against whom they are to be enforced" (Le Mans [1998] 4 VR 661 at 667). Tadgell JA (with whom [189] Winneke P agreed) referred (Le Mans [1998] 4 VR 661 at 667) to the "trenchant" criticism of L'Estrange v Graucob in an article (Spencer, "Signature, Consent and the Rule in L'Estrange v Graucob", [1973] Cambridge Law Journal 104) to which, however, Professor Atiyah had responded as described earlier in these reasons. The defendant, having made the concession above, took its stand on a factual issue, whether in the instant case the exemptive provision had been brought to the notice of the plaintiff (Le Mans [1998] 4 VR 661 at 667). In these circumstances, the decision stands apart from the present appeal. That being so, it is unnecessary to enter upon a question whether the outcome in Le Mans may be supported on the basis of a misrepresentation as to the nature of the document signed.

In this case the printed conditions on the Application for Credit formed part of the contract of storage and transportation.

There is a further point that should be mentioned. In dealing with an argument about when the contract was made, Bryson J referred to one of a number of alternatives advanced by counsel for Finemores, which was that agreement was reached on 24 February 1999, when a letter accepting the Application for Credit was posted. On that basis, his Honour said, the first consignment to

Brisbane pre-dated the contract, and the loss occurred before the conditions of contract were agreed. The alternative argument with which his Honour was dealing was misconceived. Bryson J was right to point out that, if correct, it had the consequence he mentioned, but it was not correct. Finemores acted upon the Application for Credit, and accepted it by conduct, when, on 18 February 1999, it collected the first shipment of vaccine, took it into storage, and sent an invoice referring to Richard Thomson's customer number, being the same number as was confirmed in the later letter welcoming Richard Thomson as an account customer. This occurred before the first loss.

The agency issue

[12.30] … [193] The use of the concept of agency as a method of overcoming the requirements of privity in a commercial context such as the present was suggested by Lord Reid in Midland Silicones Ltd v Scruttons Ltd [1962] AC 446 at 474, and taken up in New Zealand Shipping Co Ltd v A M Satterthwaite & Co Ltd [1975] AC 154, and Port Jackson Stevedoring Pty Ltd v Salmond & Spraggon (Australia) Pty Ltd (1980) 144 CLR 300. The technique was recently described by Lord Bingham of Cornhill as "a deft and commercially-inspired response to technical English rules of contract, particularly those governing privity and consideration" (Homburg Houtimport BV v Agrosin Private Ltd [2004] 1 AC 715 at 744). In the case of a stevedore seeking the benefit of a Himalaya clause, courts have been ready to conclude that the carrier was acting with the stevedore's authority (eg, Port Jackson Stevedoring Pty Ltd v Salmond & Spraggon (Australia) Pty Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 231 at 241, per Barwick CJ). In the present case, the particular clause in question operates against, rather than in favour of, Alphapharm. On the other hand, a conclusion that Richard Thomson was authorised to act on behalf of Alphapharm may be more obvious than a conclusion that a carrier at time of shipment was authorised to act on behalf of an unknown stevedore in a foreign country.

The evidence made it plain that Alphapharm required services of the kind provided by Finemores, that it decided to use the services of Finemores, that it designated Finemores' warehouse as its store for the purpose of the sub-distribution agreement, that it appropriated the goods while they were in Finemores' store, and that it required Finemores to transport the goods to Alphapharm's customers. It is also clear that Alphapharm left it to Richard Thomson to arrange the necessary contract pursuant to which Finemores was to provide those services for the benefit of Alphapharm. The terms on which Richard Thomson contracted were Finemores' standard terms and conditions.

… The evidence compels the conclusion that Alphapharm authorised Richard Thomson to contract with Finemores and to agree upon rates of freight, terms of payment, and such other standard terms and conditions of the contract of storage and transportation as were required by Finemores. So long as the terms and conditions to which Richard Thomson agreed were Finemores' [194] standard terms and conditions then Richard Thomson was acting within its authority.

In the result, Alphapharm was bound by cl 6 of the Conditions of Contract. No issue arises of the indemnity claim made under cl 8 of the Conditions of Contract.

Appeal allowed.

Circumstances in which the effect of signature may be avoided

[12.35] The rule in L'Estrange v Graucob – that a party is bound by the terms of a document which he or she has signed – will not apply where the signature was induced by misrepresentation or fraud, or in some cases of mistake. The rule will also not apply where the document cannot reasonably be considered a contractual document, for example, because it appears to have another function, such as being a receipt.

Curtis v Chemical Cleaning & Dyeing

[12.40] Curtis v Chemical Cleaning & Dyeing Co [1951] 1 KB 805 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Judge Blagden, sitting at Westminster County Court.

[FACTS: Mrs Curtis, the customer/plaintiff, took to the shop of the defendants/cleaners, Chemical Cleaning & Dyeing Co, for cleaning, a white satin wedding dress. The customer was handed by a shop assistant a paper headed "Receipt", which she was asked to sign. Before doing so, the customer asked the assistant why her signature was required and was told (according to the customer) that it was because the cleaners would not accept liability for certain specified risks, including the risk of damage by or to the beads and sequins with which the dress was trimmed. The customer then signed the "receipt", which in fact contained the following condition: "This or these articles is accepted on condition that the [cleaners are] not liable for any damage howsoever arising, or delay."

When the dress was returned to the customer, there was a stain on it which could not be explained, and the customer brought the present action claiming damages. The cleaners denied negligence and also relied on the exemption from liability contained in the signed receipt. The County Court judge held that the onus of showing that the damage was not due to their negligence was on the cleaners; that they had failed to discharge that burden and that because of innocent misrepresentation by the shop assistant, they could not rely on the condition contained in the receipt. He therefore awarded the plaintiff £32 10s damages. The cleaners appealed against the finding of misrepresentation.]

DENNING LJ: [808] This case is of importance because of the many cases nowadays when people sign printed forms without reading them, only to find afterwards that they contain stringent clauses exempting the other side from their common law liabilities. In every such case it must be remembered that, if a person wishes to exempt himself from a liability which the common law imposes on him, he can only do it by an express stipulation brought home to the party affected, and assented to by him as part of the contract: Olley v Marlborough Court [1949] 1 KB 532. If the party affected signs a written document, knowing it to be a contract which governs the relations between them, his signature is irrefragable evidence of his assent to the whole contract, including the exempting clauses, unless the signature is shown to be obtained by fraud or misrepresentation: L'Estrange v F Graucob Ltd [1934] 2 KB 394. But what is a sufficient misrepresentation for this purpose? That is the point which Mr Geoffrey Lawrence has raised in this appeal.

In my opinion any behaviour, by words or conduct, is sufficient to be a misrepresentation if it is such as to mislead the other party about the existence or extent of the exemption. If it conveys a false impression, that is enough. If the false impression [809] is created knowingly, it is a fraudulent misrepresentation; if it is created unwittingly, it is an innocent misrepresentation; but either is sufficient to disentitle the creator of it to the benefit of the exemption. In R v Kylsant (Lord) [1932] 1 KB 442, it was held that a representation might be literally true but practically false, not because of what is said, but because of what is left unsaid; in short, because of what it implied. This is as true of an innocent misrepresentation as it is of a fraudulent misrepresentation. When one party puts forward a printed form for signature, failure by him to draw attention to the existence or extent of the exemption clause may in some circumstances convey the impression that there is no exemption at all, or at any rate not so wide an exemption as that which is in fact contained in the document. The present case is a good illustration. The customer said in evidence: "When I was asked to sign the document I asked why? The assistant said I was to accept any responsibility for damage to beads and sequins. I did not read it all before I signed it."

In those circumstances, by failing to draw attention to the width of the exemption clause, the assistant created the false impression that the exemption only related to the beads and sequins, and that it did not extend to the material of which the dress was made. It was done perfectly innocently, but nevertheless a false impression was created. It was probably not sufficiently precise and unambiguous to create an estoppel (Low v Bouverie [1891] 3 Ch 82); but nevertheless it was a sufficient misrepresentation to disentitle the cleaners from relying on the exemption, except in regard to beads and sequins.

In the present case the customer knew, from what the assistant said, that the document contained conditions. If nothing was said she might not have known it. In that case the document might reasonably be understood to be, like a boot repairer's receipt, only a voucher for the customer to produce when collecting the goods, and not understood to contain conditions exempting the cleaners from their common law liability for negligence. In that case it would not protect the cleaners: see Chapelton v Barry Urban District Council [1940] 1 KB 532. I say this because I do not wish it to be supposed that the cleaners would have been better off if the assistant had simply handed over the document to the customer without asking her to sign it; or if the customer were not so inquiring as the plaintiff, but were an unsuspecting person who signed whatever she was asked without question. In those circumstances the conduct of the cleaners might well be such that it conveyed the impression that the document contained no conditions, or, at any rate, no condition [810] exempting them from their common law liability, in which case they could not rely on it … I therefore agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

[SOMERVELL LJ delivered a judgment holding that because of the misrepresentation, the exception clause never became part of the contract. SINGLETON LJ agreed.]

Appeal dismissed.

INCORPORATION OF TERMS BY NOTICE

[12.45] It is not uncommon for one party to allege that the contract contains terms which have been displayed or delivered before or at the time of the transaction. Whether or not the other party will be bound depends upon whether:

1. the terms were available to the party to be bound by those terms before the contract was made; and
2. reasonable steps were taken to bring the terms to the notice of the party to be bound.

Timing

[12.50] For delivered or displayed terms to form part of a contract, they must be available to the party to be bound before the contract is made.

Oceanic Sun Line Special Shipping Company v Fay

[12.55] Oceanic Sun Line Special Shipping Company Inc v Fay (1988) 165 CLR 197 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Dr Fay, the plaintiff, a resident of Queensland, made a booking in New South Wales for a cruise of the Greek islands on a vessel owned by a Greek company, Oceanic Sun Line Special Shipping Company Inc, the defendant. Upon payment of the fare, the plaintiff was handed an "exchange order" which stated that it would be exchanged for a ticket when he boarded the vessel. In Athens, the plaintiff obtained his ticket, upon which was printed a condition that the courts of Greece should have exclusive jurisdiction in any action against the owner. The plaintiff received serious injuries while taking part in trap shooting on board the ship. The plaintiff sued the defendant for negligence in the Supreme Court of New South Wales. The defendant applied for a stay of the action. The application was refused by the trial judge, and this decision was upheld by the Court of Appeal. The defendant appealed by special leave to the High Court.]

BRENNAN J: [225] The first step in determining whether the contract of carriage contains the exclusive foreign jurisdiction clause set out in cl 13 of the ticket is to determine whether the contract of carriage was [226] entered into when Mary Rossi Travel (as agent for the plaintiff) paid the plaintiff's fare to JMA Tours in Sydney (as agent for the defendant). If, as the defendant submits as one limb of its argument, no contract of carriage was made in Sydney, the contract of carriage must have been made in Greece at or after the time when the ticket was issued to Mrs Rossi as the plaintiff's agent. The defendant's submission that no contract was made in Sydney is based on the indorsement on the exchange order which reserved to Sun Line the "right to cancel any cruise". The reservation of that right, it is said, makes any promise of carriage illusory and thus denies the existence of a contract of carriage.

In MacRobertson Miller Airline Services v Commissioner of State Taxation (WA) (1975) 133 CLR 125, the terms printed on an airline ticket, which had been issued on payment of the fare, reserved to the carrier the right to abandon any flight, to cancel any booking and to refuse to carry the passenger. It was held that the ticket was not liable to stamp duty as an agreement or memorandum of agreement. Barwick CJ said: "The exemption of the ticket in this case fully occupies the whole area of possible obligation, leaving no room for the existence of a contract of carriage." (1975) 133 CLR, at 133.

Jacobs J ((1975) 133 CLR, at 148) also regarded the exemption clause as showing that the carrier "undertakes no executory obligation which creates rights in an obligee". Stephen J did not find it necessary to reach that conclusion ((1975) 133 CLR, at 140). The defendant submits that the exemption clause in the exchange order is comparable with the clauses in the ticket in MacRobertson Miller. As the exemption clause in the exchange order is significantly different from the exemption clauses in the ticket in MacRobertson Miller, it is not necessary to analyse the construction which Barwick CJ and Jacobs J placed on those clauses in that case. The exemption indorsed on the exchange order is not so wide as to preclude the existence of any contractual obligation on the part of the defendant when the exchange order was issued. To the contrary, the exchange order contains promises to refund the fare if the cruise is cancelled and to exchange the exchange order for a "Sun Line ticket when boarding vessel" if the cruise is to proceed. So far as appears from the terms of the exchange order, if the cruise proceeds, the passenger is contractually entitled on presentation of the exchange order to a ticket entitling him to be carried. The defendant reserves no right to cancel any ticket or booking or to refuse to carry the passenger named in the [227] exchange order if the booked cruise proceeds. True it is that cl 3 of the Sun Line ticket purports to reserve those rights but, if the contract is made when the fare is paid, the ticket cannot alter the parties' contractual rights and obligations. If it had been intended that no contract should come into existence before the issue of the ticket "when boarding vessel", no consideration would have moved from the defendant to support the defendant's right (as asserted in the exchange order) to refuse to refund the passage money in the event of a passenger cancelling his passage. The proposition that no contract was made when the exchange order was issued in Sydney must be rejected. Next it is necessary to determine whether the contract then made was the contract of carriage and, if so, whether it contained the exclusive foreign jurisdiction clause.

The contract made when the exchange order was issued obliged the defendant to issue a ticket in exchange for the exchange order when the passenger was boarding the vessel. A ticket containing conditions of carriage is ordinarily treated as an offer by the carrier to carry on those conditions, no contract coming into existence until the offer is accepted by the passenger. This was a ground assigned by each of the judgments in MacRobertson Miller for holding the ticket not to be an agreement or a memorandum of agreement. Their Honours held that there was no contract of carriage until sometime after the ticket had been issued — until the time when the passenger was provided with a seat (per Barwick CJ (1975) 133 CLR, at 134) or when the passenger had intimated his acceptance of the ticket and its conditions or after the passing of a reasonable time during which the passenger has had a reasonable opportunity of reading the ticket and its conditions (per Stephen J (1975) 133 CLR, at 139) or when the passenger presents the ticket and embarks on the carriage (per Jacobs J (1975) 133 CLR, at 146). As Stephen J said ((1975) 133 CLR, at 137):

> The conventional analysis of the formation of contracts for the carriage of passengers in those somewhat more leisurely transactions which involve the issue of a ticket in return for payment of a fare and the subsequent performance of the contract by the act of transportation, is to regard the ticket as the offer, the contract being made upon acceptance of that offer by the passenger.

But the conventional analysis cannot be applied to a ticket which the defendant is obliged to issue in exchange for an exchange order when a passenger is boarding a vessel. It can hardly have been the parties' intention at the time when the passenger pays his fare that the ticket to be given him on boarding should be a mere offer of [228] carriage. Much less could it have been their intention that the offer might contain exemption clauses which were unknown to the passenger when the original contract was made. The arrangements contemplated at the time of the issue of the exchange order for exchanging that document for a ticket cannot reasonably support the hypothesis that when issued the ticket might be a mere offer containing exemption clauses which should bind the plaintiff only upon subsequent acceptance. Apart from the insufficiency of opportunity for the passenger who is boarding a vessel to read the conditions printed on the ticket and to elect whether to accept them, the election could be made only after travelling to Greece and obtaining the ticket, and the terms of the exchange order would require a passenger who then elected to decline the offer to forfeit the fare already paid. The better analysis of the transaction is that the defendant was bound to issue a ticket in exchange for the exchange order in performance of a contract of carriage already made, but the defendant was given no right to introduce new conditions of carriage by printing them on the ticket. The payment of the fare may rightly be regarded as the price of an option to acquire a ticket, but the option was not to acquire a mere piece of paper. It was an option to acquire a voucher or certificate of entitlement to be carried on terms already agreed — not on terms which the parties had yet to agree on. It was too late after the original contract was made to add conditions which were not incorporated in it. The inclusion of cl 13 on the ticket could not alter the terms of a contract already made: Olley v Marlborough Court [1949] 1 KB 532. A condition printed on a ticket is ineffective to alter a contract of carriage if the ticket is issued after the contract is made: Daly v General Steam Navigation Co Ltd (The "Dragon") [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep 257, at 262. Perhaps the defendant expected that the contract made when the exchange order was issued would contain all the terms and conditions which, according to the brochure given to Dr Fay, were printed on "the Passenger Ticket Contract which may be inspected at any Sun Line office". But, as we shall see, that expectation was not fulfilled, and not simply because no copy of the Passenger Ticket Contract was available at JMA Tours in Sydney.

If a passenger signs and thereby binds himself to the terms of a contract of carriage containing a clause exempting the carrier from liability for loss arising out of the carriage, it is immaterial that the passenger did not trouble to discover the contents of the contract. But where an exemption clause is contained in a ticket or other [229] document intended by the carrier to contain the terms of carriage, yet the other party is not in fact aware when the contract is made that an exemption clause is intended to be a term of the contract, the carrier cannot rely on that clause unless, at the time of the contract, the carrier had done all that was reasonably necessary to bring the exemption clause to the passenger's notice: Hood v Anchor Line (Henderson Brothers) Ltd [1918] AC 837, pp 842, 844; McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd [1964] 1 WLR 125, at 129; [1964] 1 All ER 430, at 433; Thornton v Shoe Lane Parking Ltd [1971] 2 QB 163 at 169–70 per Lord Denning MR, and [1971] QB, at 172–3 per Megaw LJ. In differing circumstances, different steps may be needed to bring an exemption clause to a passenger's notice, especially if the clause is an unusual one. In the present case, the only step which the defendant took to bring the exclusive foreign jurisdiction clause to the plaintiff's notice before the fare was paid was the note in the brochure that the conditions of carriage were printed in the (unavailable) Passenger Ticket Contract. In Hollingworth v Southern Ferries Ltd (The "Eagle") [1977] 2 Lloyd's Rep 70, it was held that a mere statement in a carrier's brochure that the carrier contracted on its conditions of carriage was not enough to make those conditions terms of a contract of carriage subsequently made with an intending passenger who had read the brochure.

The exchange order mentions "the Sun Line passage contract" but gives particulars only of Art 2 of that document. It does not bring to the notice of the passenger any exclusive foreign jurisdiction clause. As Dr Fay was unaware of that clause, it did not become incorporated into the contract made when the exchange order was issued. In The "Dragon" [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep, at 262 Brandon J (as he then was) pointed out that, if the carrier's conditions are not incorporated into the contract of carriage when it is made, the carrier cannot subsequently, "by issuing a ticket containing the conditions concerned, however clearly referred to in it, introduce such conditions into the contract when it was not subject to them originally". As the contract of carriage was made when the exchange order was issued and as the exclusive jurisdiction clause contained in cl 13 of the ticket was not then known to Dr Fay and as insufficient was done to bring such a clause to his attention, that clause was not incorporated into the contract of carriage and could not subsequently be incorporated by insertion in the ticket issued pursuant to the original contract. This conclusion differs from the conclusion at which their Honours arrived in the courts below. It [230] will not, I hope, be thought discourteous if I refrain from analysing the differing reasons advanced by their Honours and merely point out that the two factors which lead me to reject the application to this case of the "conventional analysis" of the ticket cases is that the ticket in this case was issued in performance of an antecedent contract and that, if the ticket were a mere offer, a passenger's election to decline carriage subject to an exemption clause could be exercised only after travelling to Greece and only if the fare were forfeited.

[WILSON, TOOHEY, DEANE and GAUDRON JJ agreed that the contract was concluded in New South Wales and that the conditions on the ticket did not form part of the contract. BRENNAN, DEANE and GAUDRON JJ (WILSON and TOOHEY JJ dissenting) held that the action should not be stayed.]

Appeal dismissed.

Knowledge or notice

[12.60] If the timing requirement is satisfied, a party will be bound by delivered or displayed terms if he or she has either knowledge or reasonable notice of the terms. If a party knows that the relevant document contains contractual terms, he or she will be bound by those terms regardless of whether he or she has read them. In the absence of knowledge, a party will be bound by delivered or displayed terms if he or she had reasonable notice of the terms. What will amount to reasonable notice will depend on the type of contract, the nature of the terms and the circumstances of the case.

Thornton v Shoe Lane Parking

[12.65] Thornton v Shoe Lane Parking Ltd [1971] 2 QB 163 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Mocatta J.

[FACTS: The plaintiff, Mr Thornton, parked his motor car at a multi-storey automatic car park owned by the defendant. He had never gone there before. There was a notice on the outside headed "Shoe Lane Parking". It gave the parking charges: "5s for two hours; 7s 6d for three hours", and so forth; and at the bottom: "All Cars Parked at Owner's Risk." There was a traffic light which showed red. As Mr Thornton drove in and got to the appropriate place, the traffic light turned green and a ticket was pushed out from the machine. Mr Thornton took the ticket and drove on into the garage. Mr Thornton then left his car in the garage. When Mr Thornton returned to collect his car, there was an accident, and Mr Thornton was severely injured. The trial judge awarded Mr Thornton £3 637 6s 11d.]

LORD DENNING MR: [167] On this appeal the garage company do not contest the judge's findings about the accident. They acknowledge that they were at fault, but they claim that they are protected by some exempting conditions. They rely on the ticket which was issued to Mr Thornton by the machine. They say that it was a contractual document and that it incorporated a condition [168] which exempts them from liability to him. The ticket was headed "Shoe Lane Parking". Just below there was a "box" in which was automatically recorded the time when the car went into the garage. There was a notice alongside: "Please present this ticket to cashier to claim your car." Just below the time, there was some small print in the left hand corner which said: "This ticket is issued subject to the conditions of issue as displayed on the premises." That is all.

Mr Thornton says he looked at the ticket to see the time on it, and put it in his pocket. He could see there was printing on the ticket, but he did not read it. He only read the time. He did not read the words which said that the ticket was issued subject to the conditions as displayed on the premises.

If Mr Thornton had read those words on the ticket and had looked round the premises to see where the conditions were displayed, he would have had to have driven his car on into the garage and walked round. Then he would have found, on a pillar opposite the ticket machine, a set of printed conditions in a panel. He would also have found, in the paying office (to be visited when coming back for the car) two more panels containing the printed conditions.

The important thing to notice is that the company seek by this condition to exempt themselves from liability, not only for damage to the car, but also for injury to the customer howsoever caused … If the condition is incorporated into the contract of parking, it means that Mr Thornton will be unable to recover any damages for his personal injuries which were caused by the negligence of the company.

[169] We have been referred to the ticket cases of former times from Parker v South Eastern Railway Co (1877) 2 CPD 416 to McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd [1964] 1 WLR 125. They were concerned with railways, steamships and cloakrooms where booking clerks issued tickets to customers who took them away without reading them. In those cases the issue of the ticket was regarded as an offer by the company. If the customer took it and retained it without objection, his act was regarded as an acceptance of the offer. These cases were based on the theory that the customer, on being handed the ticket, could refuse it and decline to enter into a contract on those terms. He could ask for his money back. That theory was, of course, a fiction. No customer in a thousand ever read the conditions. If he had stopped to do so, he would have missed the train or the boat.

None of those cases has any application to a ticket which is issued by an automatic machine. The customer pays his money and gets a ticket. He cannot refuse it. He cannot get his money back. He may protest to the machine, even swear at it. But it will remain unmoved. He is committed beyond recall. He was committed at the very moment when he put his money into the machine. The contract was concluded at that time. It can be translated into offer and acceptance in this way: the offer is made when the proprietor of the machine holds it out as being ready to receive the money. The acceptance takes place when the customer puts his money into the slot. The terms of the offer are contained in the notice placed on or near the machine stating what is offered for the money. The customer is bound by those terms as long as they are sufficiently brought to his notice beforehand, but not otherwise. He is not bound by the terms printed on the ticket if they differ from the notice, because the ticket comes too late. The contract has already been made: see Olley v Marlborough Court Ltd [1949] 1 KB 532. The ticket is no more than a voucher or receipt for the money that has been paid (as in the deckchair case, Chapelton v Barry Urban District Council [1940] 1 KB 532) on terms which have been offered and accepted before the ticket is issued. In the present case the offer was contained in the notice at the entrance giving the charges for garaging and saying "at owner's risk", that is, at the risk of the owner so far as damage to the car was concerned. The offer was accepted when Mr Thornton drove up to the entrance and, by the movement of his car, turned the light from red to green, and the ticket was thrust at him. The contract was then concluded, and it could not be altered by any words printed on the ticket itself. In particular, it could not be altered so as to exempt the company from liability for personal injury due to their negligence.

Assuming, however, that an automatic machine is a booking clerk in disguise — so that the old fashioned ticket cases still apply to it. We then have to go back to the three questions put by Mellish LJ in Parker v South Eastern Railway Co, subject to this qualification: Mellish LJ used the word "conditions" in the plural, whereas it would be more apt to use the word "condition" in the singular, as indeed the [170] Lord Justice himself did on the next page. After all, the only condition that matters for this purpose is the exempting condition. It is no use telling the customer that the ticket is issued subject to some "conditions" or other, without more: for he may reasonably regard "conditions" in general as merely regulatory, and not as taking away his rights, unless the exempting condition is drawn specifically to his attention … Telescoping the three questions, they come to this: the customer is bound by the exempting condition if he knows that the ticket is issued subject to it; or, if the company did what was reasonably sufficient to give him notice of it.

Mr Machin admitted here that the company did not do what was reasonably sufficient to give Mr Thornton notice of the exempting condition. That admission was properly made. I do not pause to inquire whether the exempting condition is void for unreasonableness. All I say is that it is so wide and so destructive of rights that the court should not hold any man bound by it unless it is drawn to his attention in the most explicit way. It is an instance of what I had in mind in J Spurling Ltd v Bradshaw [1956] 1 WLR 461, 466. In order to give sufficient notice, it would need to be printed in red ink with a red hand pointing to it — or something equally startling. But, although reasonable notice of it was not given, Mr Machin said that this case came within the second question propounded by Mellish LJ, namely that Mr Thornton "knew or believed that the writing contained conditions". There was no finding to that effect. The burden was on the company to prove it, and they did not do so. Certainly there was no evidence that Mr Thornton knew of this exempting condition. He is not, therefore, bound by it …

I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal.

[12.70] MEGAW LJ: For myself, I would reserve a final view on the question at what precise moment of time the contract was concluded …

[171] The essence of the decision in Parker v South Eastern Railway Co, was analysed by Lord Hodson in McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd (at 129) as follows:

> That case, affirmed in Hood v Anchor Line (Henderson Bros) Ltd, established that the appropriate questions for the jury in a ticket case were: (1) Did the passenger know that there was printing on the railway ticket? (2) Did he know that the ticket contained or referred to conditions? and (3) Did the railway company [172] do what was reasonable in the way of notifying prospective passengers of the existence of conditions and where their terms might be considered?

[On the first question, his Lordship said that the plaintiff knew that there was writing on the ticket; on the second, that there was no clear finding that the plaintiff knew that the ticket contained conditions but the onus was on the defendants to establish that and they had not done so; on the third, that in view of the nature of the condition there had to be some clear indication to the plaintiff as to its purport and there had not been any; that in any event, the defendants had not taken proper steps to bring to the notice of the plaintiff at the time of making the contract that it was subject to any special conditions. He continued:] [173] I think it is a highly relevant factor in considering whether proper steps were taken fairly to bring that matter to the notice of the plaintiff that the first attempt to bring to his notice the intended inclusion of those conditions was at a time when as a matter of hard reality it would have been practically impossible for him to withdraw from his intended entry upon the premises for the purpose of leaving his car there. It does not take much imagination to picture the indignation of the defendants if their potential customers, having taken their tickets and observed the reference therein to contractual conditions which, they said, could be seen in notices on the premises, were one after the other to get out of their cars, leaving the cars blocking the entrances to the garage, in order to search for, find and peruse the notices! Yet unless the defendants genuinely intended that potential customers should do just that, it would be fiction, if not farce, to treat those customers as persons who have been given a fair opportunity, [174] before the contracts are made, of discovering the conditions by which they are to be bound.

I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

SIR GORDON WILLMER: I have reached the same conclusion, and there is very little for me to add. It seems to me that the really distinguishing feature of this case is the fact that the ticket on which reliance is placed was issued out of an automatic machine. I think it is right to say — at any rate, it is the fact so far as the cases that have been called to our attention are concerned – that in all the previous so called "ticket cases" the ticket has been proffered by a human hand, and there has always been at least the notional opportunity for the customer to say – if he did not like the conditions. "I do not like your conditions: I will not have this ticket." But in the case of a ticket which is proffered by an automatic machine there is something quite irrevocable about the process. There can be no locus poenitentiae …

Appeal dismissed.

Unusual terms

Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon ("The Mikhail Lermontov")

[12.75] Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (The Mikhail Lermontov) (1991) 22 NSWLR 1 (New South Wales Supreme Court, Court of Appeal) – Appeal from Carruthers J.

[FACTS: The respondent made a booking for a cruise with a shipping company, the appellant, through a travel agent and received a booking acknowledgment. Later the respondent received a booking form, which asserted that a contract of carriage was made "only the time of issuing of tickets" and which contained details of penalties for cancellation of the booking. One month later, the respondent paid the balance of the fare and two weeks prior to the commencement of the cruise she received a ticket. The ticket contained terms and conditions limiting the liability of the shipping company, the appellant, for personal injury and personal effects. On the 10th day of the cruise. the ship sank. As a result, the respondent suffered physical injury, nervous shock and the loss of all her belongings. The respondent brought proceedings claiming damages. The appellant eventually admitted liability. However, the appellant argued, inter alia, that provisions in the contract operated to limit its liability for damages.]
KIRBY P:

The contract between the parties

[22] Much time at the trial and before this Court was taken in examining the sequence of events which led to the issue of the passenger ticket with its terms and conditions. The appellant asserted that those terms and conditions were incorporated in the contract between it and the respondent by which she was carried on the cruise. It was not contested that the respondent had received such a passenger ticket. Her copy went down with the "Mikhail Lermontov". But there was no issue about the common form in which the terms and conditions appeared. The issue was whether those terms, including the provision for limitations on liability, had been accepted by the respondent so as to be incorporated in the contract between the parties. The appellant urged that, by a "conventional analysis" of the dealings between them, the terms and conditions had been incorporated. Caruthers J concluded that they had not.

The appellant put its case in various ways. However, principally it suggested that the contract of carriage was made between it and the respondent at the time when the ticket was issued or, alternatively, thereafter when the passenger had been given the opportunity to consider the terms and conditions and opted to commence the carriage: cf Hood v Anchor Lines (Henderson Brothers) Ltd [1918] AC 837 at 841; MacRobertson Miller Airline Services v Commissioner of State Taxation (WA) (1975) 133 CLR 125 at 136, 142; see also Oceanic Sun Line Special Shipping Co Inc v Fay (1988) 165 CLR 197 at 207, 227. Thus, the appellant argued that the contract of carriage in the instant case was made when the ticket was issued by the appellant on or about 24 January 1986 or, at the least, when the respondent commenced [23] the cruise on 7 February 1986, having by then certainly had the opportunity to consider its terms (including the terms of limitation).

The appellant argued that the booking form was not, as its terms clearly showed, the contract of carriage for the cruise. Whether or not it gave rise to other contractual entitlements was irrelevant to the present concern. This was to define the contract between the parties and to ascertain its terms. Upon that question, the appellant urged that the contract of carriage came into existence at the time of the issue of a ticket, just as the booking form said it would. Alternatively, the ticket received by the respondent in late January represented the appellant's "offer". By embarking upon the cruise, the respondent must be taken to have "accepted" that offer and the terms and conditions contained in it. The "conventional analysis" for contracts of carriage such as the present was described in the House of Lords in a Scottish appeal, in Hood v Anchor Line (Henderson Brothers) Ltd. In that case, the question was asked rhetorically what more the shipowner could have done to give reasonable notice to the passenger of the conditions of the proposed contract limiting the shipowner's liability: see, eg, Lord Parmoor (at 848). In the facts of that case their Lordships concluded that "the conditions printed on the face of [24] the ticket were part of the contractual relationship between the parties and, as such, binding on the appellant". However, there had been much development of the law since 1918 in the analysis of contractual relations such as the present arising out of shipping and airline contracts. Brandon J (as Lord Brandon was then) in Daly v General Steam Navigation Co Ltd ("Dragon") [1979] 1 Lloyd's Rep 257 at 262, analysed the conclusion of the contract of carriage in that case between the owners of the "Dragon" and the injured plaintiffs. He held that the contract of carriage was concluded at the time the booking was made and confirmed. But at that time the shippers had taken no steps of any kind to bring to the notice of the passenger the conditions on which they later sought to rely. Accordingly, his Lordship held that the conditions contained in the printed form were not part of the contract. Thus, the shipowners could not subsequently, by issuing a ticket containing the conditions, introduce such conditions into the contract when it was not subject to them originally. Once the contract was entered, it was not possible, without novation and the agreement of the passenger, to add further terms. The decision in the Dragon has been referred to, with apparent approval, in the High Court of Australia in Oceanic Sun Line Special Shipping Co Inc v Fay at 208, 228, 229, 256.

In the present case I am inclined to take the appellant's own form (for I believe that the CTC Cruises form can be so described) and to analyse the entry into an agreement with the passenger in the terms clearly laid down by the appellant itself. This made it plain that the booking document was not the contract of carriage. Instead, that contract would arise "only at the time of the issuing of tickets". At that stage, unless the passenger took certain initiatives of her own, she would have had no knowledge of, or opportunity to influence, the conditions and regulations printed on the tickets. The fact that they were available to passengers at CTC Cruises offices scarcely amounted to a sufficient compliance with the appellant's responsibility to bring unusual conditions at least to the notice of passengers such as the respondent before they would be bound by them. There were a number of unusual conditions in the subject of terms and conditions. They included (by cl

26) reference to "units of account" and "special drawing rights" as defined by the International Monetary Fund. They also included (by cl 27) a duty of passengers to "observe and obey all notices and by-laws of the Soviet Ministry of Merchant Marine displayed on board the ship". They included the limitation of liability for damage expressed not in a dollar sum (which might have been understood) but in terms of the "units of account" which would mean nothing to the ordinary passenger. Thus the liability in respect of death or personal injury was limited to the odd sum of 46,666 units of account. The liability in respect of loss or damage to luggage was limited to 833 units of account per passenger per carriage. There were other unusual terms and conditions. Yet these are the terms and conditions which, by the express language of the agent's booking form were purportedly fixed upon the passenger "at the time of the issuing of tickets". The passenger would have no knowledge of precisely when that time would come about. He or she would have no effective say in the terms then purportedly imposed. In answer to the rhetorical question of Lord Parmoor, I would say that there was more, before the time fixed, that the carrier could have done to bring [25] the unusual provisions at least to the notice of the passenger. At the very least it could have drawn to attention, on its booking form, the fact of the limitation of liability for personal injury and damage to luggage. By doing so it would alert passengers to the obligation to make their own, adequate arrangements. This was not done.

The result is that, applying what I take to be the approach sanctioned by the High Court in Oceanic Sun Line Special Shipping v Fay, the contract of carriage here came into force at the time appointed and notified in the booking form. Yet at that time the respondent had not had a reasonable opportunity to see and agree to the terms and conditions which the appellant sought subsequently to impose upon her by the delivery of the passenger ticket. Once the contract was made, it was not open, without fresh agreement, for further terms and conditions to be imposed by the unilateral action of one contracting party. Thus the mere presentation by the appellant to the respondent of the passenger ticket with its terms and conditions would not fix the respondent with acceptance of those terms and conditions, simply because thereafter she began the cruise. She was entitled, in law, to take the view that she would be issued with a ticket which would contain no unusual provisions, specifically no provisions of which she was not on notice limiting the appellant's liability to her. She was entitled to regard the subsequent purported imposition of such conditions upon her by unilateral acts of the appellant as wholly ineffective. Almost certainly, the respondent gave no thought to these matters. It is probably only bored lawyers or travel executives who, in the solitude of a ship or airline cabin, actually read the fine print of terms and conditions such as those relied upon by the appellant here.

By the foregoing analysis, the respondent is not taken by law to have accepted the terms and conditions contained in the subsequently provided passenger ticket. In the claim in respect of luggage (the only one said to be relevant) she is therefore not limited to the sum specified by reference to "units of account" in cl 3(b). Thus, her entitlement to damages generally may be calculated, as Carruthers J held, without limitation imposed by the contract of carriage.

[GLEESON CJ also held that the limitation clauses did not form part of the contract of carriage. MAHONEY JA dissented on this point.]

Appeal dismissed.

This case was appealed to the High Court on other issues, see Baltic Shipping Co v Dillon (1993) 176 CLR 344, extracted at [27.180].

INCORPORATION BY A COURSE OF DEALINGS

[12.85] Where parties have had a history of dealings, contractual terms introduced in earlier contracts may be incorporated into a subsequent contract. This possibility is illustrated in Balmain New Ferry Co Ltd v Robertson (1906) 4 CLR 379.

Balmain New Ferry v Robertson

[12.90] Balmain New Ferry Co Ltd v Robertson (1906) 4 CLR 379 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The Balmain New Ferry Company Ltd, the company, carried on the business of a harbour steam ferry from the City of Sydney to Balmain, in connection with which they used a wharf. Fares were not taken on the steamers or on the Balmain side but were all collected on the Sydney wharf. The company had placed over the entrance to the wharf a notice stating that a fare of one penny must be paid by all persons entering or leaving the wharf, whether they had travelled by the company's boats or not. Robertson, the plaintiff, paid the fare of one penny and was admitted to the wharf through a turnstile. Having missed his boat, he attempted to leave the wharf by another turnstile which was the only means of exit except by water. When he refused to pay a second penny, the company's officers endeavoured to detain him. The plaintiff eventually succeeded in forcing his way through a small opening beside the turnstile. He brought an action against the company for assault and false imprisonment. At the trial of the action, the plaintiff obtained a verdict for £100 damages. On appeal, the Supreme Court granted a rule nisi for a new trial or a nonsuit or verdict for the company. The rule was subsequently discharged with costs. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.]

O'CONNER J: [390] The fallacy in the plaintiff's legal position lies in the assumption that, immediately he abandoned the contract to be carried to Balmain by the company's steamer, he was in the same position as if the wharf was one to which the public had free right of access, that, finding his exit barred by the turnstiles, he was entitled either to squeeze past them, or to demand from the company's officers that they should be specially released to let him through.

Whether that assumption is or is not justifiable depends upon the terms on which the plaintiff was permitted to enter the wharf. In ascertaining those terms it must be remembered that the wharf was not a place to which the public had free right of access. If it had been so no one could legally place upon the wharf any bar or obstruction to the free entry or exit of any member of the public. But it was not a public place in that sense. It was private property. No one had a right to enter there without the company's permission, and they could impose on the members of the public any terms they thought fit as a condition of entering or leaving the premises.

What were the terms on which the plaintiff entered the company's wharf? There was no express contract, and the terms must therefore be implied from the circumstances. In dealing with the circumstances I leave the question of the notice board out of consideration. In my view, it is immaterial whether the company did what was reasonable to direct public attention to the notice, or whether the plaintiff ever read it until his attention was called to it by the officer at the turnstile. But as to the material facts from which the contract must be implied there is no dispute. The plaintiff was aware that the only entrance to and exit from the wharf on the land side was through the turnstiles … [391] Having travelled on many occasions backward and forward by the company's boats, and, as he says, paid his fare to the officers at the turnstiles, he must have been aware that the company's method of conducting their business was to release the turnstiles only on payment of a penny, and that in every case where there was a departure from that method "the tally of the turnstile," as he terms it, would be thrown out.

Such being the condition of the company's premises, and such being their method of carrying on their business, the plaintiff paid his penny to the officer and went through the entry turnstile on to the wharf. The first question is, what is the contract to be implied from the plaintiff's payment at and passing through the turnstiles under these circumstances? It is that in consideration of that payment the company undertook to carry him as a passenger to Balmain by any of their ferry boats from that wharf. That is the only contract which could be implied from those circumstances, and the plaintiff was permitted to enter the wharf for the purpose of that contract being performed. It is not denied that the company were ready to perform their part, but the plaintiff, as far as one party can do so, rescinded the contract and determined to go back from the wharf to the street. What then were his rights? They were, in my opinion, no more and no less than they would have been if he had landed from his own boat at the company's wharf. He was on private property. He had not been forced or entrapped there. He had entered it of his own free will and with the knowledge that the only exit on the land side was through the turnstile, operated as a part of the company's system of collecting fares in the manner I have mentioned. If he wished to use the turnstile as a means of exit he could only do so on complying with the usual conditions on which the company opened them. The company were lawfully entitled to impose the condition of a penny payment on all who [392] used the turnstiles, whether they had travelled by the company's steamers or not, and they were under no obligation to make an exception in the plaintiff's favour. The company, therefore, being lawfully entitled to impose that condition, and the plaintiff being free to pass out through the turnstile at any time on complying with it, he had only himself to blame for his detention, and there was no imprisonment of which he could legally complain. Next, had he the right to force his way through the narrow space between the turnstile and the bulkhead? Clearly he had not. If the turnstile had filled the whole space between the bulkheads, it could not be contended that the plaintiff would have been entitled to break it open in order to pass through. The company's officers were, in my opinion, entitled to regard the turnstile as blocking the whole space, not only for the necessary protection of the mechanism of the turnstiles from injury, but also because it was a necessary part of their system of collecting fares on entry and exit that the turnstile should be an effective barrier against entry and exit of any person except on the company's conditions. They were therefore entitled to prevent the plaintiff from squeezing through the space in question, and were justified in meeting the plaintiff's forcible attempt with as much force as was reasonably necessary to defeat it. It is not alleged that they did more, and any assault they may have committed on the plaintiff under these circumstances was justified. In this connection I may observe that it is not necessary to determine whether or not this justification is, strictly speaking, open to the company on the pleadings. The case has been conducted all through on the footing that it is open, and, if it were necessary, the Court would make any amendment required to formally shape the issues in accordance with the way in which both parties regarded them at the trial …

[GRIFFITH CJ concurred with the judgment of O'CONNOR J.]

Appeal allowed.

[12.95] For a term to be incorporated by a course of dealings, that course of dealings must have been regular and uniform: Henry Kendall & Sons v William Lillico & Sons Ltd [1969] 2 AC 31; Chattis Nominees Pty Ltd v Norman Ross Homeworks Pty Ltd (1992) 28 NSWLR 338, 343; McCutcheon v David MacBrayne Ltd [1964] 1 WLR 125. Also Hardwick Game Farm v Suffolk Agricultural Poultry Association [1969] 2 AC 31, 104 and 115. In addition, the document relied upon in previous transactions must also reasonably be considered a contractual document, rather than having the appearance of a mere receipt or docket.

Rinaldi & Patroni v Precision Mouldings

[12.100] Rinaldi & Patroni Pty Ltd v Precision Mouldings Pty Ltd (1986) WAR 131 (Supreme Court of Western Australia (Full Court)).

[FACTS: The respondent carried on the business of constructing fishing boats. It agreed with the appellants that the appellants would transport a 42 foot fishing vessel to Melbourne at a price of

$3,200. On the outskirts of Melbourne, the vehicles on which the boat was being transported drove under a low bridge, with which the boat collided. As a result, the boat was extensively damaged.

Similar contracts between the parties had been entered into on nine or 10 previous occasions. The practice between the parties was as follows: the parties would agree orally on the telephone on the cartage of a boat. The cost was subsequently worked out and entered by the appellants' driver in a book of "cart notes" which were carbonised and prepared in triplicate for signature by the consignee (ie the person to whom the boat was being sent). The third copy of the cart note would be stapled to an invoice and sent by the appellants to the respondent for payment. On the face of each note were the words: "All goods are accepted subject to conditions on reverse." On the back of each note was a list of printed conditions. One of these conditions, condition 5, would, if a term of the contract of carriage, protect the appellants from a claim by the respondent for damage done to the boat by the negligence of the appellants or their servants, agents or subcontractors. The respondent brought an action to recover damages for the damage caused to the boat. The appellants relied in defence on condition 5.]

BURT CJ: [135] The appellants … do not assert that the respondent knew of the conditions, particularly condition 5. Their case is that it had constructive knowledge of that condition and that that is enough to sustain a finding that that condition became a term of the contract of carriage. In argument it was conceded that there was no basis upon which the term could be implied in the contract of carriage first entered into which on the facts would appear to be a contract entered into on 30 April 1980 — cart note 13385. The submission is that at some unspecified time thereafter, the oral agreements should be held to have been made upon the terms of the "condition" and it should be so held by reason of "a course of dealing" between the parties. The proposition expressed in general terms is that if it should appear that the parties had over a period of time been conducting business upon terms excluding liability then it should be held that on the occasion in question they contracted upon that basis.

The difficulty in making good that proposition upon the facts of this case is evident enough. Once it is conceded that the use of the cart notes in the way in which they were used could not sustain a finding that the contract first entered into contained as a term cl 5 of the conditions, how does one then establish the relevant course of business which leads to the conclusion that without the respondent being fixed with actual knowledge of that term it is to be implied in subsequent contracts.

In developing his submission counsel for the appellants referred the Court to the following cases which will be considered in these reasons in chronological order. Spurling v Bradshaw [1956] WLR 461. This was a case in which the counterclaiming defendant had left with the plaintiff eight barrels of orange juice for storage. A few days later he received a "landing account" which on its face referred to the conditions in small type on the back. One such condition exempted the plaintiff from liability for any loss or damage. The defendant had received "landing accounts" from the plaintiff on many occasions although he had never taken the trouble to read them. The trial judge held that the conditions on the back of the landing account were incorporated into the contract of bailment and that the defendant was bound by them. And this conclusion was upheld by the Court of Appeal who, as I read the reasons, particularly the reasons of Denning LJ, upon which the appellants in this case particularly rely, dealt with the case as a "ticket case" and so turning upon whether the warehouseman did what was reasonably sufficient to give notice of the conditions within Parker v South Eastern Railway Co (1877) 2 CPD 416. And it was held that he did. The defendant had with respect to earlier contracts of bailment received many landing accounts from the plaintiff and he had been given reasonable notice of the conditions upon which the plaintiff was prepared to warehouse his goods. In addition, the particular contract relative to the orange juice was a continuing contract of bailment apparently requiring the defendant to make payments at regular [136] intervals for so long as the goods were in the plaintiff's possession and the course of dealings was established by the business done between the parties on previous occasions and by the defendant making a number of payments for the storage of his orange juice to cover periods additional to the period covered by the contract made when the goods were first delivered. As Lord Denning expressed it, at 467 of the report:

> Next it was said that the landing account and invoice were issued after the goods had been received and could not, therefore, be part of the contract of bailment: but Mr Bradshaw admitted that he had received many landing accounts before. True he had not troubled to read them. On receiving this landing account, he took no objection to it, left the goods there, and went on paying the warehouse rent for months afterwards. It seems to me that by the course of business and conduct of the parties, these conditions were part of the contract.

As it seems to me, that case was essentially a "ticket case" and the "landing account" was a contractual document. I say that because on the facts the defendant simply sent his orange juice to the warehouseman plaintiff for storage. That was the offer and the offer was accepted by and in the terms of the "landing account" which contained the conditions which when viewed objectively were sufficiently drawn to the attention of the defendant. If that be the case it is of no assistance to the appellant on the facts of this case. It cannot be said here that the cart notes constituted an acceptance of the offer made by the respondent to the appellant whereby the appellant was requested to carry the respondent's boat. And it is not so contended it being conceded that the cart notes were post-contractual. McCutcheon v MacBrayne (David) [1964] 1 WLR 125. This was a case in which there had been a course of dealing, the earlier contracts being in writing. Those contracts contained the protective provision. The contract sued upon was an oral contract and the question was whether it should be agreed that the carrier would carry the plaintiff's car from the Hebrides to the mainland on the terms of the earlier contracts in writing which contained the protective term. The answer given by the House of Lords to that question was in the negative. In the course of his speech Lord Reid said, at 128 of the report that:

> The only other ground on which it would seem possible to import these conditions is that based on a course of dealing. If two parties have made a series of similar contracts each containing certain conditions, and then they make another without expressly referring to those conditions, it may be that those conditions ought to be implied.

And on the facts and for the reasons which he gives he held that there had been no established "constant course of dealing" and hence the implication could not be made. In the same way a course of dealing cannot be established on the facts of the instant case. On the facts of this case, as it seems to me, to contend that the conditions ought to be implied for that reason begs the question he asked because you must first find an earlier contract or contracts containing that term.

Hardwick Game Farm v Suffolk Agricultural and Poultry Producers Association [1969] 2 AC 31. In that case SAPPA had regularly received more than a hundred contract notes from Grimsdale in the course of dealing over three years and SAPPA knew of the conditions on the back of each contract note and never raised any query or objection and [137] > the only reasonable inference from the regular course of dealing over so long a period is that SAPPA were evincing an acceptance of, and a readiness to be bound by, the printed conditions of whose existence they were well aware although they had not troubled to read them.

Per Lord Pearce at 113. That is not a case within which one can find anything to assist the appellants on the facts of this case.

Walter H Wright Pty Ltd v Hill & Co Pty Ltd [1971] VR 749. This case the trial judge held to be on all fours with the present case. The facts of that case can be taken directly from the headnote as follows:

> The defendant, which was a carrying company, contracted in September 1966 to carry machinery for the plaintiff. The contract was made orally by telephone between employees of the respective companies. The machinery was damaged in transit. Upon delivery of the machine two documents one relating to a crane used by the defendant in the course of the > removal, and the other relating to the carriage of the machinery itself, were presented by the defendant's employee to an employee of the plaintiff for signature and were signed.

>
> The latter document was in the form of an instruction to the defendant to carry the machinery from one place to another "Subject to the terms and conditions endorsed on the back". Then followed a description of the goods and other particulars. At the foot were the words: "see over for terms and conditions endorsed on the back hereof". On the back were endorsed a number of "Consignment Conditions" including "All goods are handled, lifted and/or carried entirely at the owner's risk. The carrier shall not be liable for any loss or damage of whatsoever kind, howsoever occasioned at any time and whether caused by any acts, defaults, or negligence of the carrier or otherwise howsoever". The other document was expressed to be a form of request for "Crane Service". On its face certain particulars were stated "Subject to the terms and conditions endorsed on the back hereof" and after the heading "Description of work" were the words in handwriting: "lift, carry and place machinery. Machine damaged when placed on site. Machine tipped over when removing skates". Conditions similar to those in the other document were endorsed on the back of it.
>
> There was evidence that on about ten occasions between February and September 1966 the defendant had carried goods for the plaintiff or associated companies and that on each occasion a document relating to the carriage of goods, in some respects differing on its face from the document in this action, but containing similar conditions on the back had, upon delivery, been presented to and signed by an employee of the plaintiff or associated company. On some occasions a crane service form, similar to the above, had been presented on delivery and signed, and duplicate copies of such documents were left with the plaintiff or associated company. There was no evidence that any employee of the plaintiff or associated company had ever read, or knew the contents of the terms and conditions, and the documents signed were regarded by the signatories as forms of delivery dockets.

Upon those facts it was held > that there was no evidence upon which the jury could find that the terms and conditions endorsed on the back of the documents formed part of the contract, by implication or otherwise ….

Counsel for the appellants contends that this Court should not follow that [138] decision because, he submits, it is based upon obiter dicta of Lord Devlin in the McCutcheon (supra) case and he points out that those remarks have been doubted in later cases. I do not think that the decision of the Full Court is in any way dependent upon anything said by Lord Devlin in the McCutcheon case. The reasoning in Hill's case as I understand it is to be found at 753 of the report. What is there being said is that in every case, as in the instant case, the document containing the exemption clause was presented for signature after the contract had been performed and that it was not a contractual document in that the respondent reasonably regarded it, being presented as it was, as being nothing more than an acknowledgment by it of the delivery of the goods. In that respect, I think that that case is on all fours with the present case. Indeed, that case on its facts would seem to me to be considerably stronger in favour of the importation of the condition. The documents in Hill's case were at least in terms contractual, each taking the form of a request to carry the goods and to provide the crane "subject to the terms and conditions endorsed on the back hereof" and each was after the event signed by an employee of the respondent. In the instant case the cart notes do not take the form of a request to carry the goods. They take the form of a request to accept delivery: "Please receive from Rinaldi & Patroni Pty Ltd." The cart note in its terms is a request by the first appellant to the consignee to carry the goods. The reasoning of the Full Court in Hill's case proceeds to point out that as the documents signed on the earlier occasions were not contractual documents there was > no evidence of any course of prior dealing in which the parties mutually regarded the terms and conditions endorsed on the back of the form as part of the contract between them.

This is the difficulty which I referred to earlier in these reasons.

Hollier v Rambler Motors (AMC) Ltd [1972] 2 QB 71. In this case the plaintiff had had his car repaired at the defendants' garage on three or four occasions over a period of five years and at least on two occasions he had signed a form, which he did not read, containing the printed words: "The company is not responsible for damage caused by a fire to customer's cars on the premises." By an oral agreement made between the plaintiff and the defendants, the defendants agreed to repair the plaintiff's car and while on their premises the car was damaged by a fire caused by the defendant's negligence. On appeal it was held that there was no sufficient course of contract to exempt the defendants from their own negligence. The reason for that as expressed by Salmon LJ at 76 report was that:

> I am bound to say that, for my part, I do not know of any other case in which it has been decided or even argued that a term could be implied into an oral contract on the strength of a course of dealing (if it can be so called) which consisted of at the most three or four transactions over a period of five years.

There is, in my opinion, nothing to be found in that case which in any way supports the appellants' submissions in the instant case.

British Crane Corporation Ltd v Ipswich Plant Hire Ltd [1975] 1 QB 303. This was a case between parties > both in the trade and of equal bargaining power … From the evidence it is clear that both parties knew that conditions were habitually [139] imposed by the supplier of these machines: and both parties knew the substance of those conditions.

per Denning MR at 311 of the report. In those circumstances it was held that the conditions were imported into the contract for the reasons expressed by Denning MR at that page as follows:

> I would not put it so much on the course of dealing, but rather on the common understanding which is to be derived from the conduct of the parties, namely, that the hiring was to be on the terms of the plaintiff's usual conditions.

So understood that case has no bearing upon the question upon which this appeal turns.

Eggleston v Marley Engineers Pty Ltd and BK and JG Mewett (1979) 21 SASR 51. The appellants' counsel places considerable importance upon this case. The case on its facts is not unlike the instant case. A manufacturing firm hired a mobile crane and a driver to lift and transport a large steel cylinder which was to be installed in its factory. And it had hired such a crane for work in its factory on a number of earlier occasions. The crane, it appears, would be supplied on request and on completion of the contract the crane driver would make out a docket in triplicate giving details of the time worked, which would be signed by the hirer to whom the first copy of the docket was given. Upon the front of the docket appeared the words: "This service is provided in accordance with the terms and conditions endorsed on the back hereof"; and upon the back of the first copy (but not upon the other copies) appeared some printed conditions, including a condition that the client indemnified the supplier of the crane against all claims, loss or damage sustained by the supplier as the result of any damage caused to any person or property by the operation of the crane. Upon injury having been caused to a worker by the negligence of the hirer and of the owner of the crane it was held that the hirer was not bound by the condition to indemnify because, although it knew that "there were some conditions on the back of the docket, it had not been proved that the firm was aware of the nature of the conditions …". I do not, with great respect, think that anything said by the Full Court in Hill's case (supra) compelled the trial judge in that case to reach that conclusion. In Eggleston's case (supra) it was held that:

> Mr Marley understood that the printed material on the back of the docket contained conditions applicable to the supply of cranes; but that he had not read them to find out what were the contents of them' at 62 of the report.

But it was not so held in Hill's case. On the contrary, in Hill's case the "respondent had knowledge of the existence of the form, but it was unaware of the content of the terms and conditions on the back of it and regarded it, being presented as it was, as nothing more than an acknowledgment by it of the delivery of the goods" at 753 of the report.

In other words, in that case the hirer did not know and had no reason to know that the words printed on the back of the form "contained conditions applicable to the supply" of the machine which had been hired and it is in that sense and for that reason that the document was said not to be "a contractual document".

And in the present case, the finding was that "both parties regarded the white cart note as no more than identification of the act of delivery for the customer" and counsel for the appellant in his argument before us does not challenge that finding. He said of the white cart note that "its primary [140] function is to record the act of delivery of the goods". And as to the yellow cart note he said:

> Mr Justice Wallace found, and I want to make it perfectly clear, with respect, that I have no quarrel with his findings whatsoever … that the practice of attaching the third yellow copy of the cart note to the first defendant's invoice simply identified the work done and avoided the need to set out particulars in the invoice itself …. He (the trial judge) says it complements the actual invoice which was in fact a separate document. I have no quarrel with that finding because I think it is fundamentally correct.

And if that finding is accepted, and on the evidence I think it must be accepted, then the cart notes are not, in the sense in which the expression is used in Hill's case, "contractual documents" and it is for that reason that the terms printed on the back of them cannot, in my opinion, establish a course of dealing leading to the conclusion that they were incorporated by implication into subsequent contracts.

[BRINSDEN and SMITH JJ also held that the cart notes were not contractual documents and accordingly the terms on them were not incorporated by course of dealing into subsequent contracts.]

Appeal dismissed.

STATEMENTS MADE DURING NEGOTIATIONS

[12.105] Parties negotiating a contract may make a great many statements about matters relating to the contract. Should one of these statements prove false, the party to whom it was made may seek some kind of legal remedy. If the plaintiff can establish that the statement was promissory, and thus a term of the contract, then there will be a remedy for breach of contract. If, on the other hand, the statement is a mere representation and not a part of the contract, relief must be sought under the law relating to misrepresentation, as discussed in Part XIA of this text.

In determining whether an oral or other statement forms part of a written contract, the first issue to consider is whether evidence of the purported term is admissible to the court. The rule of evidence known as the parol evidence rule limits the extent to which extrinsic evidence is available to "add to or vary" the terms of a contract. Secondly, courts must consider whether the parties would have intended the statement to form part of the contract.

Entire agreement clauses

[12.110] Parties may expressly clarify their intention for a contract to be wholly in writing through a merger or entire contract clause, which states that the written contract contains the entire agreement of the parties. See further E Peden and JW Carter, "Entire Agreement – and Similar – Clauses" (2006) 22 Journal of Contract Law 1 and C Mitchell, "Entire Agreement Clauses: Contracting Out of Contextualism" (2006) 22 Journal of Contract Law 222.

The parol evidence rule

[12.115] The evidence available to a court will be important in identifying the terms that form part of the contract and the construction given to those terms. In this inquiry, the common law regards contracts that the parties have reduced to writing as being in a special category, and severely limits the kind of evidence outside the written document (extrinsic evidence) that it will admit to determine what the terms are and what they mean. This rule is known as the parol evidence rule. The parol evidence rule is usually considered to consist of two parts. First, it prevents extrinsic evidence being given to add to, vary or contradict the terms of the contract as they appear in the document – the ambit of the contract. Secondly, the parol evidence rule limits the evidence that might be given to explain the meaning of those terms. The second part of the rule is considered in Chapter 13.

Evidence excluded

[12.120] The parol evidence rule excludes any evidence extrinsic to a contract in writing, including oral conversations, letters or early drafts of the contract.

Can extrinsic evidence be used to determine whether a contract is wholly in writing?

[12.125] In its application to identifying the terms of a contract, the parol evidence rule only applies to contracts wholly in writing. Thus, this aspect of the parol evidence rule will not apply to exclude evidence of the oral terms of a contract that are only partly in writing.

Where the parties have formalised their agreement in a written document which appears complete on its face, it may often reasonably be presumed that the parties intended that document would contain or integrate all of the terms of their bargain. The extracts from Corbin on Contracts and State Rail Authority of New South Wales v Heath Outdoor Pty Ltd (1986) 7 NSWLR 170 deal with the question of whether this presumption should be conclusive or whether extrinsic evidence should be allowed to establish the contrary in a particular case.

Corbin on Contracts

[12.130] Corbin on Contracts (1950), vol 3, pp 215–6.

When two parties have made a contract and have expressed it in writing to which they have both assented as the complete and accurate integration of that contract, evidence, whether parol or otherwise, of antecedent understandings and negotiations will not be admitted for the purpose of varying or contradicting the writing. This is in substance what is called the "parol evidence rule", a rule that scarcely deserves to be called a rule of evidence of any kind, and a rule that is as truly applicable to written evidence as to parol evidence. The use of such a name for this rule has had unfortunate consequences, principally by distracting the attention from the real issues that are involved. These issues may be any one or more of the following: (1) Have the parties made a contract? (2) Is that contract void or voidable because of illegality, fraud, mistake, or any other reason? (3) Did the parties assent to a particular writing as the complete and accurate "integration" of that contract? … No one of these issues can be determined by mere inspection of the written document.

State Rail Authority of NSW v Heath Outdoor

[12.135] State Rail Authority of New South Wales v Heath Outdoor Pty Ltd (1986) 7 NSWLR 170 (Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales) – Appeal from Holland J.

[FACTS: The plaintiff, Heath Outdoor, entered into a number of contracts with the State Rail Authority (SRA) relating to the placing of advertising materials on hoardings on land the property of the authority. Clause 6 of the 1981 contract provided: "The Authority may terminate this contract at any time upon giving to the advertiser one (1) calendar month's notice in writing of its intention to do so, but such action shall not give rise to any claim for compensation whatsoever on the part of the advertiser." In January 1983, the plaintiff contracted with a cigarette manufacturer to display cigarette advertising on the hoardings for a period of five years. In March 1983, the New South Wales government announced a decision to phase out cigarette advertising on government property. The implementation of this decision gave rise to a dispute between the parties which resulted in the SRA terminating the agreement in 1983. The following extract relates to the application of the parol evidence rule.]

MCHUGH JA: [190] It is now convenient to mention the circumstances of the signing of the 1981 contract. Discussions between the plaintiff and Mr Wierzbicki and Mr Newton, two officers of the defendant (SRA), concerning the making of that contract had taken place over a considerable time. The 1981 contract was concerned with a sign which the plaintiff was to erect at Duck Creek. It was for five years. Mr Low [managing director of the plaintiff] said that, when Mr Giles [an officer of the defendant] handed him a letter and a form of contract on 12 October 1981, he said to him: "that cl 6 on the back of the agreement was not in accordance with the agreement with Mr Wierzbicki and Mr Newton in our original undertaking." Mr Giles replied that the document was a standard authority document which could not be changed. Mr Giles said that there was no need for Mr Low to be concerned because he had "five years on the contract and it is very difficult for me to have that clause or any other clause altered". Mr Giles also said: "the only time that that clause is ever invoked is for non-payment of rent or if somebody wants to advertise objectionable advertising content." Mr Low said: "as long as I have your assurance that that is the case we can proceed." Mr Giles replied: "you need not be concerned as the terms of that agreement apply only to hoardings and poster panels that belong to us and where you would be placing your advertising. These don't affect you because you are building the plant and all we are doing is renting you the ground space." In cross-examination Mr Low said that Mr Giles told him that he could not change the standard terms and conditions in the defendant's printed advertising contract. Mr Low said that the reason he did not ask Mr Giles to cross out condition 6 was because "it became very evident to me that he was going to have difficulty having the clauses changed if he had to take them away". Mr Low said that immediately following the statements by Mr Giles he signed the contract.

The first submission of the plaintiff was that the letter dated 12 October 1981, which accompanied the advertising contract, must be regarded as part of the contract. That letter stated, inter alia:

> As agreed at our meeting on 25 September 1981, the contract has been drawn for a five (5) year period (1/12/81 to 30/11/86) and rental of $4,128 per annum for years one and two and $9,000 per annum for years three, four and five …

The construction of the sign must be carried out in accordance with the structural drawings submitted by you on 17 March 1981, and to the satisfaction of this Authority …

The attached indemnity forms and advertising contract will need to be completed and held in this office before approval will be given for this work to commence. The plaintiff says that the matters stated in the letter are part of the contractual terms and that, in the event of doubt as to the meaning of the [191] whole contract, greater weight must be given to the specially selected terms over the printed terms. The plaintiff contends that, if condition 6 is construed literally, it defeats the object and intent of the parties expressed in the special terms which are found in the letter and on the front page of the advertising contract. The defendant replies that the advertising contract stated in terms that it should commence from 1 December 1981 "and shall, unless sooner determined as provided in the said conditions of contract, continue until 30 November 1986". Even if one accepts the plaintiff's argument that the letter of 12 October 1981 is to be regarded as part of the contract, it does not assist the case for the plaintiff. There is no inconsistency between the letter and the conditions of the contract. The letter and the advertising contract when read together indicate that the parties entered upon a contract for a period of five years "until sooner determined". However, condition 6 gave the defendant the right to terminate the contract at any time on one month's notice in writing. The exercise of its right under condition 6 enabled the defendant to determine the contract before the five year period expired.

The next submission of the plaintiff was that the 1981 contract was partly oral and partly written. The plaintiff submitted that it is always open to a party to show that a written document is not the binding record of their contract … It is then said that the statements by Mr Giles about condition 6 were part of the contractual terms between the parties. A preliminary question which arises is whether the so called parol evidence rule prevents reliance on the oral assurances of Mr Giles. Under that rule parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written agreement. But it is a rule whose scope and rationale is often misunderstood. It has no operation until it is first determined that the terms of the agreement are wholly contained in writing. The tendering of oral evidence to prove a contractual term, therefore, cannot be excluded until it is determined that any terms in writing record the whole of the parties' agreement: Corbin on Contracts (1950), vol 3, p 385; Air Great Lakes Pty Ltd v K S Easter (Holdings) Pty Ltd (1985) 2 NSWLR 309 at 337.

When a person alleges that an agreement was partly oral and partly written, it is not always easy to determine whether the writing is the exclusive repository of the bargain. Williston claims that, when a document appears on its face to be a complete record of the parties' contract, it is conclusively presumed to be the contract: Williston on Contracts (3rd ed, 1961), s 633. However, Corbin takes a different view and says that the issue is whether the parties assented to a particular writing as the complete and accurate "integration" of the contract: Corbin on Contracts (1950), vol 3, pp 358–9. Support for Williston's approach is to be found in the judgment of Street CJ in LG Thorne & Co Pty Ltd v Thomas Borthwick & Sons (A/asia) Ltd (1956) 56 SR (NSW) 81 at 88; 73 WN (NSW) 9 at 14. But in my opinion the correct rule is that the existence of writing which appears to represent a written contract between the parties is no more than an evidentiary foundation for a conclusion that their agreement is wholly in writing. [192] In my opinion the English Law Commission correctly stated the law when it said: the mere production of a contractual document, however complete it may look, cannot as a matter of law exclude evidence of oral terms if the other party asserts that such terms were agreed. If that assertion is proved, evidence of the oral terms cannot be excluded because the court will, by definition, have found that the contractual terms are partly to be found in what was agreed orally as well as the document in question. No parol evidence rule could apply. On the other hand, if that assertion is not proved, there can be no place for a parol evidence rule because the court will have found that all the terms of the contract were set out in the document in question and, by implication, will thereby have excluded evidence of terms being found elsewhere: The Law Commission, Law of Contract, The Parol Evidence Rule (Cmnd 9700, January 1986), para 2.12 at 11.

While I think that the plaintiff was entitled to rely on the oral assurances of Mr Giles in support of its claim that the advertising contract and/or letter of 12 October 1981 did not contain the whole terms of the parties' agreement, I am of opinion that on the evidence the submission that the contract was partly oral should be rejected. The proper conclusion to be drawn from the discussion between the parties is that, as a matter of contract, condition 6 was one of the contractual terms and that its literal effect was to give the defendant an unfettered right to terminate the contract. Mr Giles made it plain that he had no authority to change any condition of the contract. Mr Low accepted this. He said that it became apparent to him that Mr Giles was going to have difficulty getting the clauses changed if he had to take them away. Mr Giles also informed Mr Low that the document was a standard authority document which could not be changed. Whatever effect the discussion between Mr Low and Mr Giles had, it did not add to the terms of the contract.

Moreover, it is not possible to conclude that the assurances amounted to a collateral contract, since the terms of the assurances contradict the terms of condition 6: Hoyt's Pty Ltd v Spencer (1919) 27 CLR 133. The main contract can be the consideration for a collateral contract only when the terms of the collateral contract do not reduce or alter the rights created by the main contract.

[KIRBY P and GLASS JA agreed with MCHUGH JA on this issue.]

[12.140] Notes

1. Paragraph 2.7 of the English Law Reform Commission's Report (referred to by McHugh JA in the principal case) stated:

> We have now concluded that although a proposition of law can be stated which can be described as the "parol evidence rule", it is not a rule of law which correctly applied, could lead to evidence being unjustly excluded. Rather it is a proposition of law which is no more than a circular statement: when it is proved or admitted that the parties to a contract intended that all the express terms of their agreements should be recorded in a particular document or documents, evidence will be inadmissible (because irrelevant) if it is tendered only for the purpose of adding to, varying, subtracting from or contradicting the express terms of that contract. We have considerable doubts whether such a proposition should properly be characterised as a "rule" at all, but several leading textbook writers and judges have referred to it as a "rule" and we are content to adopt their terminology for the purposes of this report.

2. Although there is no High Court decision directly on this issue, a number of State courts have followed the views expressed in State Rail Authority of New South Wales v Heath Outdoor Pty Ltd (1986) 7 NSWLR 170 by McHugh JA as the correct approach to the parol evidence rule in identifying the terms of the contract. See, eg, Skyrise Consultants Pty Ltd v Metroland Funds Management Ltd [2011] NSWCA 406, [13].

3. In Masterton Homes Pty Ltd v Palm Assets Pty Ltd [2009] NSWCA 234, [90], Campbell JA described the principles applicable in deciding whether an agreement that parties have entered is one that is wholly in writing, or partly written and partly oral as follows:

> (1) When there is a document that on its face appears to be a complete contract, that provides an evidentiary basis for inferring that the document contains the whole of the express contractual terms that bind the parties: Gillespie Brothers & Co v Cheney, Eggar & Co [1896] 2 QB 59 at 62 per Lord Russell of Killowen CJ; Gordon v Macgregor (1909) 8 CLR 316 at 319-20 per Griffith CJ (with whom O'Connor J agreed), at 322-3 per Isaacs J; Hoyt's Pty Ltd v Spencer (1919) 27 CLR 133 at 143-4 per Isaacs J (with whom Rich J agreed); Maybury v Atlantic Union Oil Co Ltd (1953) 89 CLR 507 at 517 per Dixon CJ, Fullagar and Taylor JJ; State Rail Authority (NSW) v Health Outdoor Pty Ltd (1986) 7 NSWLR 170 at 191G-2C per McHugh JA (with whom Kirby P at 172G-3C and Glass JA at 180G agreed on this point); Branir Pty Ltd v Owston Nominees (No 2) Pty Ltd [2001] FCA 1833; (2001) 117 FCR 424 (FC) at 505-6 [280]-[281], 509 [293] per Allsop J (with whom Drummond and Mansfield JJ agreed); Jessop v McInteer [2003] QCA 170 (FC) at [53] per Muir J (with whom Fryberg J agreed).

(2) It is open to a party to prove that, even though there is a document that on its face appears to be a complete contract, the parties have agreed orally on terms additional to those contained in the writing: Gillespie Brothers at 62 per Lord Russell of Killowen CJ; Gordon v Macgregor at 319-20 per Griffith CJ, at 323 per Isaacs J; Hoyt's v Spencer at 143-4 per Isaacs J; Hope v RCA Photophone of Australia Pty Ltd (1937) 59 CLR 348 at 357 per Latham CJ; Maybury v Atlantic Union Oil at 517 per Dixon CJ, Fullagar and Taylor JJ; Health Outdoor at 191D-F per McHugh JA; Carmichael v National Power Plc [1991] 1 WLR 2042; [1999] 4 All ER 897 (UKHL) at WLR 2047B-D, F-H; All ER 901e-g, 901j-2b per Lord Irvine of Lairg LC (with whom Lords Goff of Chieveley, Jauncey of Tullichettle and Browne-Wilkinson agreed), at WLR 2049C-D, 2050B-D; All ER 903e-g, 904e-h per Lord Hoffmann (with whom Lords Goff of Chieveley and Jauncey of Tullichettle agreed); Saad v TWT Ltd [1998] NSWCA 199 at 6 per Handley JA (with whom Priestley and Powell JJA agreed); Jessop v McInteer at [51] per Muir J; Equuscorp Pty Ltd v Glengallan Investments Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 55; (2004) 218 CLR 471 at 483-4 [35]-[36] per Gleeson CJ, McHugh, Kirby, Hayne and Callinan JJ. Conversely, it is open to a party to prove that the parties have orally agreed that a document should contain the whole of the terms agreed between them: NSW Cancer Council v Sarfaty (1992) 28 NSWLR 68 at 77A-B per Gleeson CJ and Handley JA.

(3) The parol evidence rule applies only to contracts that are wholly in writing, and thus has no scope to operate until it has first been ascertained that the contract is wholly in writing: Turner v Forwood [1951] 1 All ER 746 (EWCA) at 749F per Denning LJ; Heath Outdoor at 191E, 192A-C per McHugh JA; Norwest Beef Industries Ltd v Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Co (1987) 8 NSWLR 568 at 570B-C per Hope JA (with whom Samuels JA agreed); NSW Cancer Council v Sarfaty at 76G per Gleeson CJ and Handley JA; Branir v Owston Nominees at 508 [287] per Allsop J; County Securities Pty Ltd v Challenger Group Holdings Pty Ltd [2008] NSWCA 193 at [8] per Spigelman CJ; Nicolazzo v Harb [2009] VSCA 79 at [90] per Dodds-Streeton JA (with whom Ashley and Neave JJA agreed).

(4) Where a contract is partly written and partly oral, the terms of the contract are to be ascertained from the whole of the circumstances as a matter of fact: Moore v Garwood (1849) 4 Exch 681 at 689-90; 154 ER 1388 at 1391-2; 80 RR 738 at 745-6 per Patteson J delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber; Stones v Dowler (1860) 29 LJ Ex 122 at 124; 121 RR 882 at 884 per Martin B; Bolckow v Seymour (1864) 17 CB NS 107; 144 ER 43; 142 RR 272 at CB NS 121-2; ER 49; RR 282 per Byles J, at CB NS 122; ER 49; RR 282 per Keating J; Palmer v Bank of Australasia (1895) 16 NSWLR (L) 219 at 223-4 per Darley CJ, Windeyer and Cohen JJ (affirmed on a different ground on appeal to the Privy Council in Bank of Australasia v Palmer [1897] AC 540); Deane v The City Bank of Sydney (1904) 2 CLR 198 at 209 per Griffith CJ, Barton and O'Connor JJ; J Evans & Son (Portsmouth) Ltd v Andrea Merzario Ltd [1976] 1 WLR 1078 at 1083E-F; [1976] 2 All ER 930 at 935a-b (EWCA) per Roskill LJ; Handbury v Nolan (1977) 13 ALR 339 (HCA) at 341 per Barwick CJ, 348-9 per Jacobs J, (Aickin J agreed with both Barwick CJ and Jacobs J), at 346 per Stephen J (but dissenting as to whether the evidence established a partly written and partly oral agreement), (Gibbs J agreed with Stephen J); Finucane v NSW Egg Corporation (1988) 80 ALR 486 (FCA) at 520-1 per Lockhart J; Carmichael v National Power at WLR 2049C-50E; All ER 903f-4h per Lord Hoffmann; Lewison, The Interpretation of Contracts, 4th ed (2007) Sweet & Maxwell at [4.02] and cases there cited. Similarly, finding the terms of a wholly oral contract is a question of fact: Gardiner v Grigg (1938) 38 SR (NSW) 524 at 532 per Jordan CJ (with whom Nicholas J agreed); Torbett v Faulkner [1952] 2 TLR 659 (EWCA) at 661 per Romer LJ; Handbury v Nolan at 346 per Stephen J (with whom Gibbs J agreed); Maggs v Marsh [2006] EWCA Civ 1058; [2006] BLR 395 at [26] per Smith LJ (with whom Moses and Hallett LJJ agreed).

(5) In determining what are the terms of a contract that is partly written and partly oral, surrounding circumstances may be used as an aid to finding what the terms of the contract are: Stones v Dowler at LJ Ex 124; RR 884 per Martin B; Deane v The City Bank of Sydney at 209 per Griffith CJ, Barton and O'Connor JJ; Handbury v Nolan at 341-2 per Barwick CJ, at 346 per Stephen J, at 348-9 per Jacobs J; Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239 at 253C-E per Lord Wilberforce. If it is possible to make a finding about what were the words the parties said to each other, the meaning of those words is ascertained in the light of the surrounding circumstances: Deane v The City Bank of Sydney at 209; Handbury v Nolan at 341-2, 346, 348-9. If it is not possible to make a finding about the particular words that were used (as sometimes happens when a contract is partly written, partly oral and partly inferred from conduct) the surrounding circumstances can be looked at to find what in substance the parties agreed: County Securities v Challenger Group Holdings at [7]-[8] per Spigelman CJ.

(6) A quite separate type of contractual arrangement to a contract that is partly written and partly oral is where there is a contract wholly in writing and an oral collateral contract: J Evans & Son v Anthony Merzario at WLR 1083C-E; All ER 934h-5a per Roskill LJ, at WLR 1084H; All ER 936c per Geoffrey Lane LJ; Hoyt's v Spencer at 144-5 per Isaacs J; Equuscorp v Glengallan Investments at 484 [36] per Gleeson CJ, McHugh, Kirby, Hayne and Callinan JJ.

Exceptions to the parol evidence rule in identifying terms

Collateral contracts

[12.145] A collateral contract is the name given to the contract made when one party makes a promise, connected to but independent of a main contract, and as consideration for that promise, the other party agrees to enter into the main contract. As Lord Moulton said in Heilbut Symons & Co v Buckleton [1913] AC 30, 47:

> It is evident, both on principle and on authority, that there may be a contract the consideration for which is the making of some other contract. "If you will make such and such a contract I will give you £100", is in every sense of the word a complete legal contract. It is collateral to the main contract, but each has an independent existence, and they do not differ in respect of their possessing to the full the character and status of a contract.

The parol evidence rule will not apply to exclude evidence of a collateral contract.

Requirements for establishing a collateral contract

[12.150] In Heilbut Symons & Co v Buckleton [1913] AC 30, Lord Moulton warned (at 47) that "collateral contracts must from their very nature be rare … They must be strictly proved". The burden of a party seeking to prove a collateral contract is eased where the alleged contract deals with a subject matter that one would not naturally expect to find in the main contract. In Shepperd v Municipality of Ryde (1952) 85 CLR 1, the plaintiff purchased a house from the defendant corporation, after reading a pamphlet issued by the defendant in which it described its housing program, including the laying of parks, and receiving an assurance that the areas designated as parks would be so laid. The contract of sale made no reference to the park areas. Dixon, McTiernan, Fullagar and Kitto JJ said (at 13):

> The reluctance of courts to hold that collateral warranties or promises are given or made in consideration of the making of a contract is traditional. But a chief reason for this is that too often the collateral warranty put forward is one that you would expect to find its place naturally in the principal contract. In a case like the present it is, we think, otherwise. Doubtless the main contract might have included a clause by which the council undertook not to depart from the housing scheme. But it seems to be not unnatural that the parties > should treat the contract as devoted to the purchase of the lot which the individual purchaser acquired, the existence and stability of the project of which the transaction was an outcome being presupposed as something antecedent upon which the purchaser might implicitly rely. It is the common intention that he would so rely upon it and on that basis proceed to contract to buy the particular lot allocated to him. It is because of this that the assurance which is embodied in the plan, when it is read in the light of the pamphlet, obtains its effect as a collateral promise.

For a statement to give rise to a collateral contract, the statement must be made as a promise and must be intended to induce entry into the contract: JJ Savage & Sons Pty Ltd v Blakney (1970) 119 CLR 435, extracted at [12.195]. The statement must also be consistent with the terms of the main contract. The requirement of consistency is known as the rule in Hoyt's Pty Ltd v Spencer (1919) 27 CLR 133.

Hoyt's v Spencer

[12.155] Hoyt's Pty Ltd v Spencer (1919) 27 CLR 133 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Spencer, the defendant/respondent, was the lessee of premises from the head lessors. By a registered memorandum of lease, the defendant leased to Hoyt's Pty Ltd, the plaintiff/appellant, the premises for a period of four years. The lease contained the following proviso: "Provided always that the said Cosens Spencer may at any time during the currency of the term hereby created terminate this lease by giving to the lessee at least four weeks notice in writing of his intention to do so." During the currency of the term, the defendant gave notice to determine the lease under this proviso and the plaintiff gave up possession of the premises. Subsequently, the plaintiff brought action against the defendant alleging that in consideration of its taking the lease, the defendant agreed that he would not during the currency of the term give notice to his intention to terminate the lease unless requested and required to do so by the head lessor.

On a demurrer, the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (Ferguson J dissenting) gave judgment for the defendant. The plaintiff appealed.]

ISAACS J: [141] In this case it is essential to ascertain and keep steadily in view the cause of action alleged. The declaration is founded on an agreement consisting of a promise of the defendant upon a consideration given by the plaintiff. The consideration is either the promise of the plaintiff to take a lease or the actual taking of the lease. I think it immaterial, but if material it must, I think, be the actual taking of the lease because there could not possibly be any effect given to the promise or any breach of it except after the lease was actually taken. In any case the same result ensues.

Now, the consideration is stated to be that the plaintiff would take a lease and become lessee for the term mentioned "upon certain terms" … The declaration avers that the plaintiff took a lease "upon the said terms", [142] and says "yet" the defendant broke his promise. In other words, it avers that the defendant, being entitled to the consideration agreed upon, received that consideration, and yet broke his promise. There is no denial — in fact it is conceded as the very groundwork of the action, as indeed it must be — that the defendant is entitled to have to the full every part of the consideration mentioned, which by the admission on demurrer includes the terms of the proviso, undiminished, unaltered, and unqualified, by anything which took place up to the time of the making of the lease. Putting the argument in the best form for the appellant, it amounts to this: the respondent Spencer was to have the unqualified right as a matter of property to resume possession whenever he chose to exercise his power in terms of the proviso, but he was under a personal contractual obligation, by virtue of the collateral promise, not to exercise his property right except in accordance with the collateral promise. The answer to that, however, is that the argument rests on a fallacy. A lease is a contract …

[143] The parties here are bound by the terms of the bargain personally, as well as in point of interest in the property; and the terms of the contract regulate and define their respective rights with reference to the property. The promise relied on is itself an open variation or qualification of the right conferred by the proviso in the lease; and it is an undeniable fact that by just so much the rights of the respondent are less than the agreed consideration for the promise. Nevertheless, the appellant insists that the promise must be strictly adhered to, and that the respondent, by exercising the power that incontestably exists under the unqualified proviso, has committed an actionable breach of agreement. The mere statement of the matter seems to me to answer the contention. But as the argument has occupied the attention of two courts and concerns a topic of the law — collateral agreements — which touches every phase of contract — mercantile and otherwise — I think it desirable to state the way in which I view it.

When two parties are entering into contractual relations with respect to a given subject matter, they may (apart from special technical requirements) elect to conclude their bargain without writing, or they may elect to record it in writing, and, if in writing, they may further decide to have it under seal. But in whatever form they determine to leave their bargain, they may further agree to have one contract only, or to have separate and distinct contracts. All that is for the parties themselves to resolve upon. If they determine to make one contract only, then the terms they decide to include are the only terms that affect them contractually. It connotes that all else is abandoned. And that is the case whatever the form of the contract. If the matter is not committed to writing, though the principle is clear, the evidence is manifestly open to great dispute. But if the parties agree to commit their agreement to writing, then what is written is the conclusive record of the terms of their agreement, and, unless it can be shown that the document was not intended as the complete record of their bargain, no oral evidence can be admitted to alter or qualify it. I have [144] stated my views on this point in Gordon v Macgregor (1909) 8 CLR 316 at 322 et seq, citing authorities. This principle applies even to the case where the agreement is partly written and partly verbal. To the extent to which the parties have deliberately agreed to record any part of their contract, that record stands unimpeachable by oral testimony. It may be that the parties have, in their discretion, chosen to record a single bargain in several documents contemporaneously, or so close in point of time that they are treated as being contemporaneously executed. In that case, as Jessel MR says in Re Wedgwood Coal and Iron Co; Anderson's case (1877) 7 Ch D 75 at 99, ambiguities and even inconsistencies have to be resolved and reconciled as best the court can … In such case, if there be an action on the whole agreement as one entire indivisible agreement, the whole of the documents are read together, and the words of one may have to be modified by the words of another. And if in this case the plaintiff were suing on one entire indivisible contract into the composition of which both the proviso in the lease and the promise alleged in the declaration entered, the plaintiff's position would be that the agreement would have to be treated very much as postulated by Sir George Jessel in Anderson's case (at 99).

But the plaintiff is not suing upon such an entire indivisible contract. The contract contained in the lease is one under the Real Property Act 1900 (NSW), and by virtue of s 36 of that Act has the force of a deed. It could not be contended that the promise sued on (assuming, as perhaps by the rules of pleading we may be bound to assume, it was in writing though not under seal and not registered) was intended to be part of the one contract along with the proviso. If such were the appellant's contention the remedy would have been a suit for rectification or injunction at the proper time. At all events this is not the claim in the declaration. The claim is on the basis that there was no mistake in framing the main contract of lease, that that contract is complete in itself and correctly recorded, and that its only function [145] now is as the sole consideration for the independent collateral agreement sued on.

Ferguson J truly says that no question arises here as to admissibility of evidence, such as parol evidence to affect a written document, or evidence of any kind to affect a deed, or evidence proper to found a claim for rectification of the lease, or in any other way. All the observations in the authorities as to parol evidence are beside the question, because it is to be assumed that the "agreement" as pleaded is established in fact. The only question on this demurrer is as to its legal effect; and up to this point I entirely agree with the view taken by Ferguson J. At one point I diverge; and that is, what is the legal force and effect to be given to the promise pleaded, having regard to the consideration on which it is alleged to be based, namely, the making of the lease with all the terms it contains? The contract contained in the lease is, as observed, complete in itself. It contains the mutual covenants and considerations of the parties, and it stands entirely on its own footing. A transferee would take it upon the very terms of the document and upon no others. And in that document the plaintiff says: "I Hoyt's Proprietary Limited the within named lessee do hereby accept this lease as tenant subject to the conditions restrictions and covenants above set forth." But, though complete in itself as a contract, it might well play another part as consideration for another promise. In Heilbut Symons & Co v Buckleton [1913] AC 30 at 47, Lord Moulton states the law in distinct terms. He says:

> It is evident, both on principle and on authority, that there may be a contract the consideration for which is the making of some other contract. "If you will make such and such a contract I will give you £100", is in every sense of the word a complete legal contract. It is collateral to the main contract, but each has an independent existence, and they do not differ in respect of their possessing to the full the character and status of a contract.

Now that passage was read and relied on by Mr Campbell. But though it supports him in principle, yet the same principle destroys his case. The main contract here, when utilised to form the consideration for the collateral contract, must be taken exactly as it is. Its provisions do not change according as it is considered as an independent contract or as a consideration [146] for the collateral contract. A principle that must govern the bargain of a contractual promise made in consideration of entering into the main contract is that the parties shall have and be subject to all (not some only) of the respective benefits and burdens of the main contract. When the collateral promise is truly consistent with the main contract, that principle has full play. The main contract is not then interfered with. The collateral contract alters, as every contract must, the contractual relations of the parties; but it does not alter, and from the simple statement of the bargain is not intended to alter, the contractual relations which are established by the main contract. When both are worked out, it may be that in the final outcome the parties are in the same position as if those contractual relations had been varied. But the practical result cannot affect the independence and legal effect of each contract; and that is what we are here concerned with …

[147] The truth is that a collateral contract, which may be either antecedent or contemporaneous, being supplementary only to the main contract, cannot impinge on it, or alter its provisions or the rights created by it; consequently, where the main contract is relied on as the consideration in whole or part for the promise contained in the collateral contract, it is a wholly inconsistent and impossible contention that the other party is not to have the full benefit of the main contract as made; and the [148] appellant's first contention is therefore unsound. If in any case the court finds two enforceable agreements executed in such circumstances that one is intended to affect the other, no doubt such effect will be given to them as the superimposing operation of the governing contract requires; but in that case it is not collateral, but dominant …

It only remains to consider whether the alleged promise does leave the contractual rights of the respondent under the main contract unimpaired. Ex concessis, it does not. The very argument on which the claim is founded is that but for the additional promise the respondent had the power by virtue of the proviso to do what he did. And the plaintiff's case is that that power was cut down by the further promise. There is at once a conflict between the two, with the result that the appellant, though in one breath conceding the full extent of the proviso as a consideration, yet, in the next, cuts it down almost to the point of rendering it nugatory.

In my opinion the judgment should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed.

[KNOX CJ delivered a judgment to a similar effect and RICH J concurred.]

Appeal dismissed.

[12.160] FERGUSON J [dissenting in the Full Court of the Supreme Court of New South Wales (1919) 19 SR (NSW) 200]: [212] One difficulty that presents itself to my mind is this. If effect is to be given to the contention that the law will not countenance the proof of an inconsistent collateral agreement, then in a case such as the present where each of the conflicting agreements is the consideration or part of the consideration for the other, how is it to be determined which of the two comes under the ban of the law?

It was argued with so force, that in a sense there is no inconsistency between the two provisions in question in this case. The agreement limiting the right to give the notice might have been included in the lease as a proviso to the covenant relating to the notice without giving rise to the slightest incongruity or difficulty in interpretation. In the circumstances it may have been and probably was a very reasonable condition to impose. However, that is not the ground upon which I wish to base my judgment. It is a question not of reasonableness or unreasonableness, but of the right of parties to make any agreement they choose, provided that it does not contravene some law. If by agreement they give themselves certain [213] reciprocal rights, I cannot see why if they choose to do so they should not by another agreement modify those rights, whether the modifying agreement is earlier in date, or later, or contemporaneous. The function of the court is not to dictate to parties what agreement they should make, but to ascertain whether they have made an agreement, and then to interpret it.

Now is there a valid agreement here? If I promise you that in consideration of your signing a document marked "A" I will do or abstain from doing some specified thing, and you do sign that document, have I or have I not succeeded in binding myself to do or abstain from doing that thing? I think I have. Assuming that no question of illegality arises, I am quite unable to see that any element of a complete contract is lacking. But the defendant's case is that the question is one that cannot yet be answered — that the answer must be postponed until document "A" has been examined to see whether it contains anything inconsistent with the terms of my promise.

I cannot bring myself to accept this view; to my mind it involves a radical revision of the accepted definition of a contract. For these reasons I am of opinion that the declaration states a good cause of action, to which the plea supplies no answer, and that our judgment should be for the plaintiff company.

For modern applications of the rule see for example: Mainieri v Cirillo [2014] VSCA 227; (2014) 47 VR 127; Crown Melbourne Ltd v Cosmopolitan Hotel (Vic) Pty Ltd [2016] HCA 26; (2016) 260 CLR 1.

Estoppel

[12.165] Courts remain divided as to whether the parol evidence rule precludes the admission of extrinsic evidence for the purpose of establishing an estoppel. The different views are expressed in the following extracts.

Saleh v Romanous

[12.170] Saleh v Romanous [2010] NSWCA 274 (Supreme Court of New South Wales Court of Appeal) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: The appellants/vendors owned land at 163 Kissing Point Road, Dundas. The neighbouring property at 165 Kissing Point Road was owed by Edmond, the brother of the first appellant. The two brothers obtained development approval for the construction of eight townhouses on the combined site. The respondents/purchasers entered into a contract to purchase the land at 163 Kissing Point Road from the appellants/vendors and paid them a deposit. The purchasers entered into the contract of sale on the assumption, induced by the vendors, that Edmond would participate in a joint venture with the purchasers to develop the two properties. Although the purchasers had not met Edmond before the contract of sale was made, the proposed joint venture with him "provided the genesis and rationale" for the contract of sale. The trial judge found that, before the contract of sale was made, the first appellant said to the first respondent: "Leave Eddie up to me. I'm taking responsibility for Eddie. If Eddie doesn't want to build you don't have to buy and you'll get your money back." The purchasers were unable to negotiate a joint venture with Edmond so they purported to terminate the contract of sale and instituted these proceedings to recover the deposit. The trial judge held that a promissory estoppel arose against the vendors which prevented them from enforcing the contract of sale. He ordered the vendors to repay the deposit. The vendors appealed to the Court of Appeal.]

HANDLEY AJA: [23] The vendors … submitted that the parol evidence rule and cl 10.1.5 of the contract, an "entire agreement" clause, excluded any pre-contractual promissory estoppel. …

[52] Mr Rayment QC for the vendors relied on Johnson Mathey Ltd v AC Rochester Overseas Corp (1990) 23 NSWLR 190 and Australian Co-operative Foods Ltd v Norco Co-operative Ltd [1999] NSWSC 274; (1999) 46 NSWLR 267 for the proposition that the parol evidence and entire contract rules prevented extrinsic evidence being received to establish a pre-contractual estoppel by convention. He submitted that a pre-contractual promissory estoppel was also excluded.

[53] Estoppel by convention is a common law doctrine (MK & JA Roche Pty Ltd v Metro Edgley Pty Ltd [2005] NSWCA 39 at [71]-[72]). It emerged in England during the 19th century as courts of common law extended the principles governing estoppels by deed to other contracts. It was referred to by Latham CJ and Dixon J in Grundt v Great Boulder Pty Gold Mines Ltd [1937] HCA 58; 59 CLR 641, 657, 677, and was recognised as a separate head of estoppel in Amalgamated Investment & Property Co Ltd v Texas Commerce International Bank Ltd [1982] QB 84 CA, 121. It has been applied in many cases since. The history is traced in Handley Estoppel by Conduct and Election 2006 at pp 116-118.

[54] Promissory estoppel is an equitable doctrine recognised in Hughes v Metropolitan Railway Co (1877) 2 App Cas 439, 447 (Hughes). The House of Lords affirmed the decision of the Court of Appeal (1876) 1 CPD 120, 133 where James LJ said:

> This case must be treated in the same way as if a bill in equity had been filed for relief against the forfeiture after a judgment had been obtained at law.

[55] The equitable basis of the doctrine was again recognised in Birmingham & District Land Co v London & North Western Railway Co (1888) 40 ChD 268 CA, 277, 281, 285-7 (Birmingham Land). Like other doctrines developed by the Court of Chancery it imposes equitable restraints on the enforcement of contractual and other rights. The leading promissory estoppel cases before 1973 were based on post-contractual conduct where the parol evidence and entire contract rules did not apply.

[56] There are other equitable restraints on the enforcement of contractual rights based on pre-contractual conduct. They include the equitable remedies for common law and equitable fraud, for innocent misrepresentation and mistake, and some restraints on the enforcement of common law rights by injunction or specific performance: eg Martin v Pycroft (1852) 2 DeGM & G 785, 795 [42 ER 1079, 1083].

[57] These remedies and defences trump the legal rules about parol evidence and entire contracts.

[58] Mr Rayment relied on Hoyts Pty Ltd v Spencer [1919] HCA 64; CLR 133 as authority for the proposition that an informal collateral contract, in consideration for entering into the principal contract, cannot be inconsistent with it. That case, followed in Maybury v Atlantic Union Oil Co Ltd [1953] HCA 89; 89 CLR 507, is clear authority for that proposition. The Judge held, correctly, that a collateral contract based on the pre-contractual promise would be inconsistent with the contract of sale.

[59] In Hoyts' case the alleged contract was collateral to a sub-lease which the sub-lessor could terminate at any time by giving four weeks notice. The sub-lessee alleged a collateral contract that the sub-lessor would not give a notice unless the head lessor gave a similar notice under the head lease. The sub-lessee's action for damages for terminating the sub-lease in other circumstances failed because the collateral contract was inconsistent with the sub-lease. Isaacs J said (ibid at 147):

> … a collateral contract, which may be either antecedent or contemporaneous …, being supplementary only to the main contract, cannot impinge on it, or alter its provisions or the rights created by it; consequently, where the main contract is relied on as the consideration … for the promise contained in the collateral contract, it is a wholly inconsistent and impossible contention that the other party is not to have the full benefit of the main contract as made ….

[60] The sub-lessee's action in the common law jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was based on its rights at law under the collateral contract. Isaacs J referred (ibid at 146-7) to Carter v Salmon (1880) 43 LT 490 CA, where an action for breach of a contract collateral to a lease also failed. He noted however that James LJ had said that the collateral agreement might have supported an injunction "in equity" and Cotton LJ "gave no opinion as to an equity" against the original landlord.

[61] Mr Rayment submitted that the collateral contract in Hoyts' case, like the promissory estoppel in the present case, was an attempt to restrict the exercise of rights under a written contract. He said that a collateral promise which could not be enforced as a contract could not be enforced as a promissory estoppel.

[62] I reject these submissions. A promissory estoppel is not enforced as a contract, but as an equitable restraint on the exercise or enforcement of the promisor's rights. Hoyts' case did not decide that the sub-lessee had no equity, and Isaacs J left that question open.

[63] The purchasers sought restitution, not damages, but their case, and their defence to the vendors' case, depended on their equity to restrain enforcement of the contract for sale. Enforcement of a pre-contractual promissory estoppel is not barred by Hoyts' case.

[64] In Bank Negara Indonesia v Hoalim [1973] 2 MLJ 3 (Bank Negara) the Privy Council held that a pre-contractual promise could support a promissory estoppel. The respondent, a protected tenant, was induced in 1958 to move to other offices in the same building by a promise that he would not be asked to leave while he continued to practise. In 1961 the parties entered into a 3 year lease and the respondent afterwards held over as a monthly tenant. In January 1969 he was given a notice to quit but a promissory estoppel based on the 1958 promise was enforced. Lord Wilberforce said at p 5:

> … it appears to their Lordships that the nature of this assurance and the circumstances in which it was given are such as to bring into play the doctrine of promissory estoppel as classically stated in two well known passages.

[65] He cited the speech of Lord Cairns LC in Hughes (1877) 2 App Cas 439, 448 and the judgment of Bowen LJ in Birmingham Land (1888) 40 ChD 268, 286 and continued:

> Their Lordships do not overlook the point that the rights, which the appellants had against the respondent, and whose enforcement is in question, were not strictly pre-existing rights, but rights coming into existence upon the change in the respondent's situation induced by the appellants' assurance, but in their Lordships' opinion the same equitable principle applies.

[66] The judgment of the Privy Council did not affect the rights of the parties at law. The respondent remained a monthly tenant, but the estoppel prevented the landlord giving a notice to quit. Thus a promissory estoppel dating from 1958 trumped the legal rights of the landlord after the fixed term expired in 1964.

[67] In City and Wesminster Properties (1934) Ltd v Mudd [1959] Ch 129 Harman J upheld a collateral contract that the landlord would not enforce a user covenant against the original tenant. The decision is contrary to Hoyts' case and the English cases there followed and would now be supported on a promissory estoppel. Harman J would have decided the case on that basis but thought that promissory estoppel was confined to existing rights.

[68] Bank Negara was referred to with approval in Waltons Stores (Interstate) Ltd v Maher [1988] HCA 7, 164 CLR 387 by Mason CJ and Wilson J at 399, by Brennan J at 420, and by Gaudron J at 459, and was followed by McHugh JA in State Rail Authority of New South Wales v Heath Outdoor Pty Ltd (1986) 7 NSWLR 170, 193-195. These cases have added pre-contractual promissory estoppel to the grounds on which equity will protect one contracting party from inequitable conduct by the other. In all these cases the legal rights trumped by equity include those protected by the parol evidence and entire contract rules.

[69] This is supported by the dictum of Allsop J in Branir Pty Ltd v Owston Nominees (No 2) Pty Ltd [2001] FCA 1833, 117 FCR 424, at [446] that "it is difficult to see why another remedy in equity … arising out of pre-contractual communications should be defeated by a common law rule about the construction of documents". There are dicta to similar effect in Wright v Hamilton Island Enterprises Ltd [2003] QCA 36 at [13], [37]-[43], [55], [88], although the relief granted should have been negative in substance, restraining the owner from determining the agreements unless the licensees were in breach.

[70] There are further dicta in Franklins Pty Ltd v Metcash Trading Ltd [2009] NSWCA 407, 264 ALR 15. Allsop P said at [34] that "if the estoppel … is equitable … the common law parol evidence rule will not impede its proper operation", and Campbell JA said at [554] that "equity would not permit an entire agreement clause to stultify the operation of its doctrines".

[71] In Equuscorp Pty Ltd v Glengallen Investments Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 55; 218 CLR 471 at [35] the Court, in the joint judgment of Gleeson CJ, McHugh, Kirby, Hayne and Callinan JJ said:

> Where parties entered into a written agreement, the Court will generally hold them to the obligations which they have assumed by that agreement. At least, it will do so unless relief is afforded by the operation of statute or some other legal or equitable principle applicable to the case.

[72] The case is significant because, despite the parol evidence rule, the High Court remitted issues to the Queensland Court of Appeal which included the promissory estoppel pleaded by the borrowers. The judgment of Holmes J on the remitted issues: [2006] QCA 194 at [118]-[119] contains further dicta in support of the views expressed above.

[73] In my judgment the Judge correctly held that the purchasers had established a promissory estoppel which entitled them to restrain the vendors from enforcing the contract of sale. Such an estoppel is not the equitable equivalent of a contract, and cannot give the purchasers positive rights to rescind and recover their deposit that they would have had if the pre-contractual promise had contractual force. A pre-contractual promissory estoppel which conferred positive rights of that nature would be contrary to Hoyts' case.

[74] A promissory estoppel is a restraint on the enforcement of rights, and thus, unlike a proprietary estoppel, it must be negative in substance. In Hughes Lord Cairns LC in his classic statement of principle quoted by Lord Wilberforce in Bank Negara said:

> … the person who otherwise might have enforced those rights will not be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable having regard to the dealings which had thus taken place between the parties.

[75] In Birmingham Land, in the other passage quoted by Lord Wilberforce in Bank Negara, Bowen LJ said:

… those persons would not be allowed by a Court of Equity to enforce the rights …

[76] The topic is considered in Handley Estoppel by Conduct and Election 2006 at pp 201-3, 214-225.

[77] The inherent limitations on the scope of promissory estoppel do not matter in this case because the purchasers can rely on the statutory remedy conferred by s 55(2A) of the Conveyancing Act to recover their deposit without the need to rescind the contract.

[78] This provides:

> In every case where the court refuses to grant specific performance of a contract, or in any proceedings for the return of a deposit, the court may, if it thinks fit, order the repayment of any deposit with or without interest thereon.

[79] The vendors did not seek specific performance and the first limb of subs (2A) does not apply, but the promissory estoppel would have been a defence to such proceedings once it became clear that there would be no joint venture with Edmond.

[80] The second limb is in general terms and confers a wide discretion which can be exercised where it is just and equitable to deprive the vendor of the deposit. The case law was reviewed in Harkins v Butcher [2002] NSWCA 237, 55 NSWLR 558, 571-574.

[81] The Judge held that the promissory estoppel entitled the purchasers to rescind and recover their deposit. In my judgment positive relief was not available on that ground but his decision that the promissory estoppel prevented the vendors enforcing the contract entitled the purchasers to an order under s 55(2A). The Judge's orders (red 84) can be affirmed without a formal order under the section.

[82] In my judgment therefore the appeal fails. The purchasers sought to support the judgment on alternative grounds raised in their notice of contention. These were rightly dismissed by the Judge and may be disposed of without elaboration.

[83] The claim based on an oral collateral contract was rightly rejected in accordance with Hoyts' case. The claims in fraud as pleaded failed on the facts, and other possible claims in fraud were not pleaded. The claim under s 45 of the Fair Trading Act could not fall within the section. The claim that the contract had been abandoned also failed on the facts.

[GILES JA and SACKVILLE AJA agreed.]

Appeal dismissed.

Australian Co-operative Foods v Norco Co-operative

[12.175] Australian Co-operative Foods Ltd v Norco Co-operative Ltd [1999] NSWSC 274; (1999) 46 NSWLR 267 (New South Wales Supreme Court).

BRYSON J: Even if there were a factual basis for an estoppel, whether viewed as an estoppel by convention or a promissory estoppel relating to the manner in which rights under cl 8.4 would be exercised, the estoppel could not be enforced because the new licence agreement is as its terms show intended to be a comprehensive written expression of the parties' agreement, so that its provisions cannot be qualified by evidence of the terms of the parties' negotiations. The estoppels here contended for would be inconsistent with the express terms of cl 8.4 in that they would qualify the power which it confers, and they would be directly contrary to the terms of cl 22 [an entire agreement clause].

In these respects I follow the views of McLelland J in Johnson Matthey Ltd v AC Rochester Overseas Corporation (1990) 23 NSWLR 190. I regard McLelland's views as well founded on the principle of giving effect to the formal, final and considered expression of the parties' contractual intention; the fact that they chose writing to express that intention shows the relative weight they attributed to earlier arrangements and understandings. The view expressed by McHugh JA (dissenting) in State Rail Authority (NSW) v Heath Outdoor Pty Ltd (1986) 7 NSWLR 170 and acted on by Rolfe J in Whittet v State Bank of New South Wales (1991) 24 NSWLR 146 does not, in my respectful opinion, accord appropriate weight to indications of finality and completeness which the parties give when they adopt formal written expression. The judgment of McLelland J was followed by Miles CJ in Skywest Aviation Pty Ltd v Commonwealth (1995) 126 FLR 61: see at 102–6. I respectfully differ from the view of Rolfe J in Whittet and follow the views expressed by McLelland J in Johnson Matthey. I regard McLelland J's view as well founded in principle and I do not regard the decision of the Court of Appeal in State Rail Authority (NSW) v Heath Outdoor Pty Ltd as having established the views expressed by McHugh JA (at 193). My adherence to this view has been reinforced with the passage of time and accumulation of experience of this and many other forensic endeavours to set up estoppels out of the circumstances or terms of pre-contractual exchanges; the evidence offered is often extensive, discursive and inconclusive and, where it is of any value at all, clearly of less value than the considered written expression. Poorly based and incompletely considered forensic attempts to set up pre-contractual estoppels are unfortunately common, and in most cases they are quite unuseful and very wasteful of resources.

[12.180] Note

In Branir Pty Ltd v Owston Nominees [2001] FCA 1833; (2001) 117 FCR 424, 543–4 [444]–[447], Allsop J (with whom Drummond and Mansfield JJ agreed) after expressly declining to decide the issue, stated:

> However, in my view, there appears, if I may say so respectfully, to be great force in the views of McHugh JA in his rejection of the exclusion of a role for estoppel (at least in equity) where the detriment founding the estoppel is, in effect, the entry into an agreement which in turn negates, by its terms, the representation or conduct which was sufficiently clear to found an estoppel and reliance upon which led to the agreement being entered.

WHEN IS A STATEMENT A TERM OF A CONTRACT?

[12.185] For an oral statement to be binding as a term of the parties' contract, the statement must have been made as a promise and intended by the parties to be part of their contractual agreement. Intention is judged objectively. The court will assess whether or not the statement would reasonably be considered a binding contractual promise by a person placed in the situation of the parties.

In assessing the status of an oral statement, courts will consider a number of potentially relevant factors. These include the significance of a written contract, language used, the relevant expertise of the parties, the importance of the statement, the timing of the statement and the form of the written contract. The following cases illustrate the significance, which may (or may not) be given to these various factors.

Equuscorp v Glengallan Investments

[12.190] Equuscorp Pty Ltd v Glengallan Investments Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 55; (2004) 218 CLR 271.

[FACTS: A group of investors subscribed for units in limited liability partnerships formed to develop and operate an aquaculture farm in Queensland. At the same time, the investors entered into written loan agreements with a lender related to the promoter to borrow the subscription moneys and pay the interest in advance. The investors claimed in respect of that financial year a tax deduction for the interest, management fees, rent and licence fees paid, resulting in a minimum deduction of $5,061 for a cash outlay of $781. The project failed and the investors defaulted on the loans. The lender assigned the loan debts, and the assignee sought to enforce the written loan agreements. The investors asserted that earlier oral loan agreements between themselves and the lender limited recourse to the prepaid interest and two capital repayments.]

GLEESON CJ, MCHUGH, KIRBY, HAYNE and CALLINAN JJ:

[482] Written agreements or oral?

Debate in the courts below, about whether the loan agreements were wholly oral, as the respondents alleged, or wholly written, as Equuscorp and Rural Finance contended, proceeded upon the premise that the critical question was whether the primary judge should have acted on his acceptance of oral evidence given on the respondents' behalf of some conversations that were said to have occurred before the written loan agreements were signed. That, in turn, was seen as a question to be decided by reference to whether subsequent events (including those we have mentioned) made it more or less probable that during these conversations some consensus was reached that the loans were "limited recourse". But behind these arguments lies a more fundamental issue which the respondents' contentions did not address, whether in the courts below or on appeal to this Court.

It is, and always has been, common ground that each of the respondents executed a written loan agreement on 30 June 1989. The respondents alleged that the "operative agreement" was not contained in that writing. It was said that the relevant agreement was reached earlier and was wholly oral. Yet it was not said that the written agreement should be rectified. It was not said that a defence of non est factum was available. It was not said that the written agreement was executed by mistake, or that its execution was procured by misrepresentation as to its contents or effect. (The misrepresentation [483] alleged was as to what had been said in the conversations, not what the document was or provided.)

The respondents each having executed a loan agreement, each is bound by it. Having executed the document, and not having been induced to do so by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, the respondents cannot now be heard to say that they are not bound by the agreement recorded in it (L'Estrange v F Graucob Ltd [1934] 2 KB 394). The parol evidence rule (Hoyt's Pty Ltd v Spencer (1919) 27 CLR 133), the limited operation of the defence of non est factum (Petelin v Cullen (1975) 132 CLR 355) and the development of the equitable remedy of rectification (Taylor v Johnson (1983) 151 CLR 422), all proceed from the premise that a party executing a written agreement is bound by it. Yet fundamental to the respondents' case that the operative agreements between the parties were wholly oral, and reached earlier than the execution of the written agreements, was the proposition that the written agreements subsequently executed not only may be ignored, they must be. That is not so. Having executed the agreement, each respondent is bound by it unless able to rely on a defence of non est factum, or able to have it rectified. The respondents attempted neither.

There are reasons why the law adopts this position. First, it accords with the "general test of objectivity [that] is of pervasive influence in the law of contract" (Australian Broadcasting Corporation v XIVth Commonwealth Games Ltd (1988) 18 NSWLR 540 at 549, per Gleeson CJ). The legal rights and obligations of the parties turn upon what their words and conduct would be reasonably understood to convey, not upon actual beliefs or intentions (Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886 at 906, per Lord Diplock; Ashington Piggeries Ltd v Christopher Hill Ltd [1972] AC 441 at 502, per Lord Diplock).

Secondly, in the nature of things, oral agreements will sometimes be disputable. Resolving such disputation is commonly difficult, time- consuming, expensive and problematic. Where parties enter into a written agreement, the Court will generally hold them to the obligations which they have assumed by that agreement. At least, it will do so unless relief is afforded by the operation of statute or some other legal or equitable principle applicable to the case. Different questions may arise where the execution of the written agreement is contested; but that is not the case here. In a time of growing international trade with parties in legal systems having the same or even stronger deference to the obligations of written agreements (and frequently communicating in different languages and from the standpoint of different cultures) this is not a time to ignore the rules of the common law upholding obligations undertaken in written agreements. It is a time to maintain those rules. They are not unbending. They allow for exceptions. But the exceptions must be [484] proved according to established categories. The obligations of written agreements between parties cannot simply be ignored or brushed aside. The conclusion that the respondents are bound by the written loan agreements may leave open the possibility that an earlier consensus reached by the parties was in each case a collateral agreement (made in consideration of the parties later executing the written agreement (Hoyt's Pty Ltd v Spencer (1919) 27 CLR 133; De Lassalle v Guildford [1901] 2 KB 215)), but that has never been the respondents' case. In another case it may leave open the possibility that the contract is partly oral and partly in writing (Maybury v Atlantic Union Oil Co Ltd (1953) 89 CLR 507 at 517). But that cannot be so here. The oral limited recourse terms alleged by the respondents contradict the terms of the written loan agreement. If there was an earlier, oral, consensus, it was discharged and the parties' agreement recorded in the writing they executed (Gordon v Macgregor (1909) 8 CLR 316 at 322-323; Masters v Cameron (1954) 91 CLR 353 at 360-361). It is the written loan agreement which governed the relationship between Rural Finance and each respondent. It is as well to add, however, that it may be doubted that the evidence at trial revealed that the parties reached any consensus about the loan being a "limited recourse" loan that would be sufficiently certain to admit of enforcement. For the reasons given earlier, it is not necessary to reach this point in order to decide this aspect of the case. It is enough to say that the oral evidence given by certain witnesses, which the primary judge accepted as true, was evidence which, when examined in transcript, appears to have been far less than definite about who agreed what, with whom.

JJ Savage & Sons v Blakney

[12.195] JJ Savage & Sons Pty Ltd v Blakney (1970) 119 CLR 435 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: Blakney, the respondent, contemplated buying a motor boat from JJ Savage & Sons Pty Ltd, the appellant, which made and dealt in motor boats. In the course of negotiations concerning the construction of a boat, the respondent asked the appellant's manager to place in writing his views upon various engines that might be used in the boat. The appellant set out in a letter details of the fuel consumption, power output, "estimated speed" and comparative costs of three types of engines. In the letter, the appellant made recommendations in favour of one engine, of which the "estimated speed" was stated to be 15 miles per hour. The respondent replied that he preferred the appellant's advice to the advice of another expert who favoured one of the other engines mentioned in the appellant's letter. He then placed a formal order for a boat. A contractual document was executed. In this contract, there was no reference to the capacity of the boat to attain any particular speed. The boat supplied was not capable of moving faster than 12 miles per hour.

The respondent sued the appellant for breach of warranty, alleging that the representation of the estimated speed of the boat was a condition or warranty of the contract, or that it was a collateral warranty to the contract for the construction and sale of the boat. The trial judge held that the representation was neither a term of the contract nor a collateral warranty. The Full Court of the Supreme Court reversed the decision and held that the representation was a collateral warranty by the appellant that the boat would attain an approximate speed of 15 miles per hour. The appellant appealed to the High Court.]

BARWICK CJ, KITTO, MENZIES, OWEN and WALSH JJ: [441] The facts, as found by the learned trial judge, to which the Full Court referred were, that the appellant had persuaded the respondent to abandon the idea of Twin Clae diesels for one GM diesel; that the appellant had stated that from computations made it was assumed that the boat powered with the 4/53 GM diesel would have an estimated speed of fifteen mph; that the respondent was induced to order the boat with the single diesel engine on the faith of what the appellant had informed him both orally and by letter; that the attainable speed of the boat was an important matter both in the boat building and selling industry and to the respondent. The Court thought that by this material the respondent had established a collateral warranty as to the attainable speed of the boat.

The trial judge was of opinion that the statement in the appellant's letter was an estimate only, expressed as an expectancy, and not an unequivocal promise of a future speed. The Full Court, after referring to a dictionary meaning of the word "estimate", thought the expression "estimated speed 15 mph" in the appellant's [442] letter should be construed as "approximate speed 15 mph". In our opinion, this was an unwarranted substitution which stripped the words of the letter of their most significant meaning. The actual words used by the appellant in the letter should be considered. So far from being a promissory expression, "estimated speed 15 mph" indicates, in our opinion, an expression of opinion as the result "of approximate calculation based on probability" to use the dictionary equivalent of "estimate" referred to by the Full Court. There is no need to resort to cases decided upon different facts and circumstances in order to determine the significance in this case of the actual words used by the respondent. The words in themselves tend, in our opinion, against the inference of a promise that the boat would in fact achieve the nominated speed.

The Full Court seems to have thought it sufficient in order to establish a collateral warranty that without the statement as to the estimated speed the contract of purchase would never have been made. But that circumstance is, in our opinion, in itself insufficient to support the conclusion that a warranty was given. So much can be said of an innocent representation inducing a contract. The question is whether there was a promise by the appellant that the boat would in fact attain the stated speed if powered by the stipulated engine, the entry into the contract to purchase the boat providing the consideration to make the promise effective. The expression in De Lassalle v Guildford [1901] 2 KB 215, at p 222 that without the statement the contract in that case would not have been made does not, in our opinion, provide an alternative and independent ground on which a collateral warranty can be established. Such a fact is but a step in some circumstances towards the only conclusion which will support a collateral warranty, namely, that the statement so relied on was promissory and not merely representational.

When the letter which we have quoted was written, the negotiations for the construction and delivery of the boat were incomplete. On receipt of the letter there were three courses open to the respondent. He could have required the attainment of the speed to be inserted in the specification as a condition of the contract; or he could have sought from the appellant a promise — however expressed, whether as an assurance, guarantee, promise or otherwise — that the boat would attain the speed as a prerequisite to his ordering the boat; or he could be content to form his own judgment as to the suitable power unit for the boat relying upon the opinion of the appellant of whose reputation and experience in the [443] relevant field he had, as the trial judge found, a high regard. Only the second course would give rise to a collateral warranty.

In our opinion, there is nothing in the evidence before the trial judge to support the view that the respondent took either the first or second of these courses: the only conclusion open upon that evidence was that the respondent took the third course; he accepted the appellant's estimate of what the boat would do under the power of the 4/53 GM diesel as sufficient to found his (the respondent's) own judgment as to the powering of the vessel. As he said "I prefer upon your advice the GM 4/53". That the statement actually made by the appellant was intended to have some commercial significance upon a matter of importance to the respondent can be conceded; that the respondent was intended to act upon it, and that he did act upon it, is clearly made out. But those facts do not warrant the conclusion that the statement was itself promissory.

In our opinion, so far from it being shown that the trial judge was wrong in refusing to draw the conclusion that the appellant made a promissory statement as to the attainable speed of the cruiser (which he did by deciding that there was no condition of the contract in the stated terms) we are satisfied that he took the only course permitted by the material before him. In our opinion, the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Oscar Chess v Williams

[12.200] Oscar Chess Ltd v Williams [1957] 1 WLR 370 (Court of Appeal) – Appeal from County Court.

[FACTS: The defendant seller's mother purchased a car in 1954, believing it to be a 1948 model. In fact it was a 1939 model, the appearance of the particular type of car not having changed over that period. The registration book, which presumably had been fraudulently altered, showed that the car had been first registered in 1948. The defendant offered the car as part payment for a new car which he wished to purchase from Oscar Chess Ltd, the plaintiffs. He described the car as a 1948, 10 horsepower Morris and produced the registration book. The plaintiffs allowed £290 against the price of the new car. Ten months later, they discovered that it was a 1939 model on which they would have allowed only £175. They claimed the difference of £115 from the defendant, alleging that it was an express term of the contract that the car was a 1948 model and that the term was a condition or in the alternative a warranty and that in the events which had happened they were entitled to damages for breach of warranty. The trial judge found that the alleged term was a condition and that the plaintiffs would have rescinded the contract if they had known the true facts before the property in the car passed. The defendant appealed.]

DENNING LJ [stated the facts set out above, and continued]: [373] I entirely agree with the judge that both parties assumed that the Morris was a 1948 model and that this assumption was fundamental to the contract. But this does not prove that the representation was a term of the contract. The assumption was based by both of them on the date given in the registration book as the date of first registration. They both believed it was a 1948 model whereas it was only a 1939 one. They were both mistaken and their mistake was of fundamental importance.

The effect of such a mistake is this: It does not make the contract a nullity from the beginning, but it does in some circumstances enable the contract to be set aside in equity. If the buyer had come promptly, he might have succeeded in getting the whole transaction set aside in equity on the ground of this [374] mistake (see Solle v Butcher [1950] 1 KB 671) but he did not do so and it is now too late for him to do it: see Leaf v International Galleries [1950] 2 KB 86. His only remedy is in damages, and to recover these he must prove a warranty. In saying that he must prove a warranty, I use the word "warranty" in its ordinary English meaning to denote a binding promise. Everyone knows what a man means when he says "I guarantee it" or "I warrant it" or "I give you my word on it." He means that he binds himself to it. That is the meaning it has borne in English law for 300 years … During the last 50 years, however, some lawyers have come to use the word "warranty" in another sense. They use it to denote a subsidiary term in a contract as distinct from a vital term which they call a "condition". In so doing they depart from the ordinary meaning, not only of the word "warranty" but also of the word "condition". There is no harm in their doing this, so long as they confine this technical use to its proper sphere, namely to distinguish between a vital term, the breach of which gives the right to treat the contract as at an end, and a subsidiary term which does not. But the trouble comes when one person uses the word "warranty" in its ordinary meaning and another uses it in its technical meaning. When Holt CJ in Crosse v Gardner (1689) Carth 90; 90 ER 656 … made his famous ruling that an affirmation at the time of a sale is a warranty, provided it appears on evidence to be so intended, he used the word "warranty" in its ordinary English meaning of a binding promise … These different uses of the word seem to have been the source of confusion in the present case. The judge did not ask himself: "Was the representation (that it was a 1948 Morris) intended to be a warranty?" He asked himself: "Was it fundamental to the contract?" He answered it by saying that it was fundamental; and therefore it was a condition and not a warranty. By concentrating on whether it was fundamental, he seems to me to have missed the crucial point in the case which is whether it was a term of the contract at all. The crucial question is: was it a binding promise or only an innocent misrepresentation? The technical distinction between a "condition" and a "warranty" is quite immaterial in this case, because it is far too late for the buyer to reject the car. He can at best only claim damages. The material distinction here is between a statement which is a term of the contract and a statement which is only an innocent misrepresentation. This distinction is best expressed by the [375] ruling of Lord Holt: was it intended as a warranty or not? using the word "warranty" there in its ordinary English meaning: because it gives the exact shade of meaning that is required. It is something to which a man must be taken to bind himself.

In applying Lord Holt's test, however, some misunderstanding has arisen by the use of the word "intended". It is sometimes supposed that the tribunal must look into the minds of the parties to see what they themselves intended. That is a mistake. Lord Moulton made it quite clear that "The intention of the parties can only be deduced from the totality of the evidence." The question whether a warranty was intended depends on the conduct of the parties, on their words and behaviour, rather than on their thoughts. If an intelligent bystander would reasonably infer that a warranty was intended, that will suffice. And this, when the facts are not in dispute, is a question of law …

[M]uch depends on the precise words that were used. If the seller says "I believe it is a 1948 Morris. Here is the registration book to prove it," there is clearly no warranty. It is a statement of belief, not a contractual promise. But if the seller says, "I guarantee that it is a 1948 Morris. This is borne out by the registration book, but you need not rely solely on that. I give you my own guarantee that it is," there is clearly a warranty. The seller is making himself contractually responsible, even though the registration book is wrong … [376] I ask myself: What is the proper inference from the known facts? It must have been obvious to both that the seller had himself no personal knowledge of the year when the car was made. He only became owner after a great number of changes. He must have been relying on the registration book. It is unlikely that such a person would warrant the year of manufacture. The most he would do would be to state his belief, and then produce the registration book in verification of it. In these circumstances the intelligent bystander would, I suggest, say that the seller did not intend to bind himself so as to warrant that it was a 1948 model. If the seller was asked to pledge himself to it, he would at once have said: "I cannot do that, I have only the log-book to go by, the same as you." …

[HODSON LJ gave judgment to a similar effect.]

[12.205] MORRIS LJ [dissenting, held that the statement was a term of the contract. He continued]: [383] In the present case there was a statement made at the time of the transaction; there was no written contract; and in so far as there was a document brought into existence, the document consisted of an invoice addressed to the defendant which recorded the complete transaction and which expressly described the car for which an allowance of £290 was being made as a "1948 Morris 10 Saloon". The statement made which described the Morris car was therefore an integral part of the contract. It was, I consider, a condition of the contract, on which the plaintiffs contracted …

In the present case on a consideration of the evidence that he heard, the judge came to the conclusion that the statement which [384] he held to have been made by the defendant at the time of the making of the contract was a statement made contractually. It seems to me that the totality of the evidence points to that view. The statement related to a vitally important matter: it described the subject matter of the contract then being made and the statement directed the parties to, and was the basis of, their agreement as to the price to be paid or credited to the defendant …

Appeal allowed.

Dick Bentley Productions v Harold Smith (Motors)

[12.210] Dick Bentley Productions v Harold Smith (Motors) Ltd [1965] 2 All ER 65 (Court of Appeal) – On Appeal from the Westminster County Court.

[FACTS: Dick Bentley purchased a second hand Bentley car from Smith (a car dealer). Before Bentley purchased the car, Smith told him that the car had done only 20,000 miles since being fitted with a replacement engine and gearbox. Earlier, Bentley had told Smith that he (Bentley) was looking for a "well vetted Bentley car" and Smith had told Bentley that he (Smith) was "in a position to find out the history of cars". The statement about mileage was untrue. Bentley sought damages for breach of warranty and succeeded at first instance. Smith appealed.]

LORD DENNING MR: [67] I endeavoured to explain in Oscar Chess v Williams [1957] 1 All ER 325, at pp 328, 329) that the question whether a warranty was intended depends on the conduct of the parties, on their words and behaviour, rather than on their thoughts. If an intelligent bystander would reasonably infer that a warranty was intended, that will suffice. What conduct, then? What words and behaviour, lead to the inference of a warranty?

Looking at the cases once more, as we have done so often, it seems to me that if a representation is made in the course of dealings for a contract for the very purpose of inducing the other party to act on it, and it actually induces him to act on it by entering into the contract, that is prima facie ground for inferring that the representation was intended as a warranty. It is not necessary to speak of it as being collateral. Suffice it that the representation was intended to be acted on and was in fact acted on. But the maker of the representation can rebut this inference if he can show that it really was an innocent misrepresentation, in that he was in fact innocent of fault in making it, and that it would not be reasonable in the circumstances for him to be bound by it. In the Oscar Chess case the inference was rebutted. There a man had bought a second-hand car and received with it a log-book, which stated the year of the car, 1948. He afterwards resold the car. When he resold it he simply repeated what was in the log-book and passed it on to the buyer. He honestly believed on reasonable grounds that it was true. He was completely innocent of any fault. There was no warranty by him but only an innocent misrepresentation. Whereas in the present case it is very different. The inference is not rebutted. Here we have a dealer, Mr Smith, who was in a position to know, or at least to find out, the history of the car. He could get it by writing to the makers. He did not do so. Indeed it was done later. When the history of this car was examined, his statement turned out to be quite wrong. He ought to have known better. There was no reasonable foundation for it.

… The county court judge found that the representations were not dishonest. Mr Smith was not guilty of fraud. But he made the statement as to twenty thousand miles without any foundation. And the judge was well justified in finding that there was a warranty.

[DANCKWERTS LJ and SALMON LJ agreed.]

Appeal dismissed.

CONSTRUCTION

[13.05] Construction is the process by which a court determines the meaning and legal effect of the terms of the contract agreed by the parties. In construing a contract, the meaning of the words used by the parties is assessed objectively, by reference to "what a reasonable person having all the background knowledge which would have been available to the parties would have understood them to be using the language in the contract to mean" (Chartbrook Ltd v Persimmon Homes Ltd [2009] UKHL 38; [2009] 1 AC 1101, [14]). Courts will have regard to (Arnold v Britton [2015] UKSC 36; [2015] AC 1619, [15]):

(i) the natural and ordinary meaning of the clause;

(ii) any other relevant provisions of the [contract];

(iii) the overall purpose of the clause and the [contract];

(iv) the facts and circumstances known or assumed by the parties at the time the document was executed [to the extent that evidence of these facts and circumstances is admissible];

(v) commercial common sense; but

(vi) disregarding subjective evidence of any party's intentions.

The process of construing a contract is discussed further below. We begin, however, by considering the evidence admissible in construing a contract.

AVAILABLE EVIDENCE

[13.10] In L Schuler AG v Wickman Machine Tool Sales Ltd [1974] AC 235, 261, Lord Wilberforce said:

> The general rule is that extrinsic evidence is not admissible for the construction of a written contract; the parties' intention must be ascertained, on legal principles of construction, from the > words they have used. It is one and the same principle which excludes evidence of statements, or actions, during negotiations, at the time of the contract, or subsequent to the contract, any of which to the lay mind might at first sight seem to be proper to receive. …

> There are of course exceptions. I attempt no exhaustive list of them. In the case of ancient documents, contemporaneous or subsequent action may be adduced in order to explain words whose contemporary meaning may have become obscure. And evidence may be admitted of surrounding circumstances or in order to explain technical expressions or to identify the subject matter of an agreement: or (an overlapping exception), to resolve a latent ambiguity. But ambiguity in this context is not to be equated with difficulty of construction, even difficulty to a point where judicial opinion as to meaning has differed. This is, I venture to think, elementary law.

That first part of that statement was quoted with approval in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, 348. A contentious question has arisen as to whether the exception relating to "surrounding circumstances" is recognised in Australian law.

[13.15] In England, the position is that evidence of the surrounding circumstances should always be admissible in construing a contract. The leading statement of the relevant principles was given by Lord Hoffmann in Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich Building Society [1997] UKHL 28; [1998] 1 WLR 896, 912–3:

> My Lords, I will say at once that I prefer the approach of the learned judge. But I think I should preface my explanation of my reasons with some general remarks about the principles by which contractual documents are nowadays construed. I do not think that the fundamental change which has overtaken this branch of the law, particularly as a result of the speeches of Lord Wilberforce in Prenn v Simmonds [1971] 1 WLR 1381, 1384-1386 and Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Yngvar Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, is always sufficiently appreciated. The result has been, subject to one important exception, to assimilate the way in which such documents are interpreted by judges to the common sense principles by which any serious utterance would be interpreted in ordinary life. Almost all the old intellectual baggage of "legal" interpretation has been discarded. The principles may be summarised as follows:
> 1. Interpretation is the ascertainment of the meaning which the document would convey to a reasonable person having all the background knowledge which would reasonably have been available to the parties in the situation in which they were at the time of the contract.
> 2. The background was famously referred to by Lord Wilberforce as the "matrix of fact", but this phrase is, if anything, an understated description of what the background may include. Subject to the requirement that it should have been reasonably available to the parties and to the exception to be mentioned next, it includes absolutely anything which would have affected the way in which the language of the document would have been understood by a reasonable man.
> 3. The law excludes from the admissible background the previous negotiations of the parties and their declarations of subjective intent. They are admissible only in an action for rectification. The law makes this distinction for reasons of practical policy and, in this respect only, legal interpretation differs from the way we would interpret utterances in ordinary life. The boundaries of this exception are in some respects unclear. But this is not the occasion on which to explore them.
> 4. The meaning which a document (or any other utterance) would convey to a reasonable man is not the same thing as the meaning of its words. The meaning of words is a matter of dictionaries and grammars; the meaning of the document is what the parties using those words against the relevant background would reasonably have been understood to > mean. The background may not merely enable the reasonable man to choose between the possible meanings of words which are ambiguous but even (as occasionally happens in ordinary life) to conclude that the parties must, for whatever reason, have used the wrong words or syntax. (See Mannai Investments Co Ltd v Eagle Star Life Assurance Co Ltd [1997] 2 WLR 945.)

>
> 5. The "rule" that words should be given their "natural and ordinary meaning" reflects the common sense proposition that we do not easily accept that people have made linguistic mistakes, particularly in formal documents. On the other hand, if one would nevertheless conclude from the background that something must have gone wrong with the language, the law does not require judges to attribute to the parties an intention which they plainly could not have had. Lord Diplock made this point more vigorously when he said in The Antaios Compania Neviera SA v Salen Rederierna AB [1985] 1 AC 191, 201:
> > … if detailed semantic and syntactical analysis of words in a commercial contract is going to lead to a conclusion that flouts business commonsense, it must be made to yield to business commonsense.

These principles have been approved in a number of cases, see for example, Bank of Credit and Commerce International SA v Ali [2001] UKHL 8; [2002] 1 AC 251, [8] and [39]; Arnold v Britton [2015] UKSC 36; [2015] AC 1619, [15]. In Arnold v Britton [2015] UKSC 36; [2015] AC 1619, [17], the Supreme Court also noted that:

> … the reliance placed in some cases on commercial common sense and surrounding circumstances (eg in Chartbrook, at [16]–[26]) should not be invoked to undervalue the importance of the language of the provision which is to be construed. The exercise of interpreting a provision involves identifying what the parties meant through the eyes of a reasonable reader, and, save perhaps in a very unusual case, that meaning is most obviously to be gleaned from the language of the provision. Unlike commercial common sense and the surrounding circumstances, the parties have control over the language they use in a contract. And, again save perhaps in a very unusual case, the parties must have been specifically focussing on the issue covered by the provision when agreeing the wording of that provision.

In Australia in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, 352, Mason J stated that "the true rule is that evidence of surrounding circumstances is admissible to assist in the interpretation of the contract if the language is ambiguous or susceptible of more than one meaning". In Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council [2002] HCA 5; (2002) 240 CLR 45, [39], Gleeson CJ, Gaudron, HcHugh, Gummow and Hayne JJ noted that reference had been made in argument to the decisions of the English House of Lords delivered since Codelfa, in which the principles of contractual construction are discussed. The High Court said that:

> It is unnecessary to determine whether their Lordships there took a broader view of the admissible "background" than was taken in Codelfa or, if so, whether those views should be preferred to those of this court. Until that determination is made by this court, other Australian courts, if they discern any inconsistency with Codelfa, should continue to follow Codelfa.

Subsequent decisions of the High Court suggested, without confirming, that evidence of the surrounding circumstances is generally admissible. For example in Maggbury Pty Ltd v Hafele Australia Pty Ltd [2001] HCA 70; (2001) 210 CLR 181, [11], the High Court stated:

> Interpretation of a written contract involves, as Lord Hoffmann has put it: "the ascertainment of the meaning which the document would convey to a reasonable person having all the > background knowledge which would reasonably have been available to the parties in the situation in which they were at the time of the contract."

See also Pacific Carriers Ltd v BNP Paribas [2004] HCA 35; (2004) 218 CLR 451, [22]; Toll (FGCT) Pty Ltd v Alphapharm Pty Ltd [2004] HCA 52; (2004) 219 CLR 165, [40]; International Air Transport Association v Ansett Australia Holdings Ltd [2008] HCA 3; (2008) 234 CLR 151, [8]; Byrnes v Kendle [2011] HCA 26; (2011) 243 CLR 253, [98].

A number of intermediate appellate courts took these statements as confirming that a court does not need to find that the language of a contract is ambiguous before admitting evidence of the circumstances surrounding the contract for the purpose of construing that contract; see, in particular, Franklins Pty Ltd v Metcash Trading Ltd [2009] NSWCA 407; (2009) 76 NSWLR 603. The current position is far from clear. The High Court reaffirmed its view as to the correct approach in Western Export Services Inc v Jireh International Pty Ltd [2011] HCA 45 but then seemed to revert to the more generous approach to extrinsic evidence in Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd [2014] HCA 7; (2014) 251 CLR 640, followed by an affirmation of the need for ambiguity before considering evidence of the surrounding circumstances in Mount Bruce Mining Pty Ltd v Wright Prospecting Pty Ltd [2015] HCA 37; (2015) 256 CLR 104, all extracted below.

Western Export Services v Jireh International

[13.18] Western Export Services Inc v Jireh International Pty Ltd [2011] HCA 45 – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

GUMMOW, HEYDON AND BELL JJ: [1] This is an application for special leave to appeal from a decision of the New South Wales Court of Appeal (Jireh International Pty Ltd v Western Export Services Inc [2011] NSWCA 137), in which Macfarlan JA gave the leading judgment. The dispute concerned the construction of cl 3 of a "Letter of Agreement" concerning the franchising in Australia of Gloria Jean's Gourmet Coffee Stores. In the passage in which he found error in principle in the reasons of the primary judge, his Honour said ([2011] NSWCA 137, [56]):

> A court is not justified in disregarding unambiguous language simply because the contract would have a more commercial and businesslike operation if an interpretation different to that dictated by the language were adopted.

His Honour added ([2011] NSWCA 297, [18]) that the primary judge appeared:

> to have acted on the basis that the provision would make more sense from a commercial point of view

if it were construed as the primary judge did construe that provision. These statements by Macfarlan JA since have been applied by the New South Wales Court of Appeal in Miwa Pty Ltd v Siantan Properties Pte Ltd [2011] NSWCA 297, [18].

[2] The primary judge had referred to what he described as "the summary of principles" in Franklins Pty Ltd v Metcash Trading Ltd [2009] NSWCA 407; (2009) 76 NSWLR 603, 618 [19] and following. The applicant in this Court refers to that decision and to MBF Investments Pty Ltd v Nolan [2011] VSCA 114, [195]–[204] as authority rejecting the requirement that it is essential to identify ambiguity in the language of the contract before the court may have regard to the surrounding circumstances and object of the transaction. The applicant also refers to statements in England said to be to the same effect, including that by Lord Steyn in R (Westminster City Council) v National Asylum Support Service [2002] UKHL 38; (2002) 1 WLR 2956, 2958-2959 [4]–[5].

[3] Acceptance of the applicant's submission, clearly would require reconsideration by this Court of what was said in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337,

352 by Mason J, with the concurrence of Stephen J and Wilson J, to be the "true rule" as to the admission of evidence of surrounding circumstances. Until this Court embarks upon that exercise and disapproves or revises what was said in Codelfa, intermediate appellate courts are bound to follow that precedent. The same is true of primary judges, notwithstanding what may appear to have been said by intermediate appellate courts.

[4] The position of Codelfa, as a binding authority, was made clear in the joint reasons of five Justices in Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council [2002] HCA 5; (2002) 240 CLR 45, 62-63 [39] and it should not have been necessary to reiterate the point here.

[5] We do not read anything said in this Court in Pacific Carriers Ltd v BNP Paribas; Toll (FGCT) Pty Ltd v Alphapharm Pty Ltd (2004) HCA 35; (2004) 218 CLR 451, 461-462 [22]; Wilkie v Gordian Runoff Ltd [2004] HCA 52, [40]; (2004) 219 CLR 165, 179 and International Air Transport Association v Ansett Australia Holdings Ltd [2008] HCA 3; (2008) 234 CLR 151, 160 [8] as operating inconsistently with what was said by Mason J in the passage in Codelfa to which we have referred.

[6] However, the result reached by the Court of Appeal in this case was correct. Further, even if, as the applicant contends, cl 3 in the Letter of Agreement should be construed as understood by a reasonable person in the position of the parties, with knowledge of the surrounding circumstances and the object of the transaction, the result would have been no different. Accordingly, special leave is refused with costs.

FRENCH CJ, HAYNE, CRENNAN and KIEFEL JJ: [35] … The meaning of the terms of a commercial contract is to be determined by what a reasonable businessperson would have understood those terms to mean (McCann v Switzerland Insurance Australia Ltd (2000) 203 CLR 579 at 589 [22] per Gleeson CJ; [2000] HCA 65; Pacific Carriers Ltd v BNP Paribas (2004) 218 CLR 451 at 462 [22] per Gleeson CJ, Gummow, Hayne, Callinan and Heydon JJ; [2004] HCA 35; International Air Transport Association v Ansett Australia Holdings Ltd (2008) 234 CLR 151 at 160 [8] per Gleeson CJ; [2008] HCA 3; see further Maggbury Pty Ltd v Hafele Australia Pty Ltd (2001) 210 CLR 181 at 188 [11] per Gleeson CJ, Gummow and Hayne JJ; [2001] HCA 70, citing Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich Building Society [1998] 1 WLR 896, 912. See also Homburg Houtimport BV v Agrosin Private Ltd [2004] 1 AC 715 at 737 [10] per Lord Bingham of Cornhill.). The Interpretation of Contract and the ICS Decision" (2008) 12 Edinburgh Law Review 374). As Arden LJ observed in Re Golden Key Ltd [2009] EWCA Civ 636 at [28], unless a contrary intention is indicated, a court is entitled to approach the task of giving a commercial contract a businesslike interpretation on the assumption "that the parties … intended to produce a commercial result". A commercial contract is to be construed so as to avoid it "making commercial nonsense or working commercial inconvenience" (Zhu v Treasurer of New South Wales (2004) 218 CLR 530 at 559 [82] per Gleeson CJ, Gummow, Kirby, Callinan and Heydon JJ. Applicable legal principles in these appeals [46] The rights and liabilities of parties under a provision of a contract are determined objectively (Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd [2014] HCA 7; (2014) 251 CLR 640, [35]), by reference to its text, context (the entire text of the contract as well as any contract, document or statutory provision referred to in the text of the contract) and purpose (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, 350, citing Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Yngvar Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, 995-996). See also Sir Anthony Mason, "Opening Address" (2009) 25 Journal of Contract Law 1 at 3).

[47] In determining the meaning of the terms of a commercial contract, it is necessary to ask what a reasonable businessperson would have understood those terms to mean (Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640, [35]). That enquiry will require consideration of the language used by the parties in the contract, the circumstances addressed by the contract and the commercial purpose or objects to be secured by the contract (Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640, [35]).

[48] Ordinarily, this process of construction is possible by reference to the contract alone. Indeed, if an expression in a contract is unambiguous or susceptible of only one meaning, evidence of surrounding circumstances (events, circumstances and things external to the contract) cannot be adduced to contradict its plain meaning (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, 352. See also Sir Anthony Mason, "Opening Address", (2009) 25 Journal of Contract Law 1, 3).

[49] However, sometimes, recourse to events, circumstances and things external to the contract is necessary. It may be necessary in identifying the commercial purpose or objects of the contract where that task is facilitated by an understanding "of the genesis of the transaction, the background, the context [and] the market in which the parties are operating" (Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640, [35], citing Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, 350, in turn citing Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Yngvar Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, 995-996). It may be necessary in determining the proper construction where there is a constructional choice. The question whether events, circumstances and things external to the contract may be resorted to, in order to identify the existence of a constructional choice, does not arise in these appeals.

[50] Each of the events, circumstances and things external to the contract to which recourse may be had is objective. What may be referred to are events, circumstances and things external to the contract which are known to the parties or which assist in identifying the purpose or object of the transaction, which may include its history, background and context and the market in which the parties were operating. What is inadmissible is evidence of the parties' statements and actions reflecting their actual intentions and expectations (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, 352; Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Yngvar Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, 995-996).

[51] Other principles are relevant in the construction of commercial contracts. Unless a contrary intention is indicated in the contract, a court is entitled to approach the task of giving a commercial contract an interpretation on the assumption "that the parties … intended to produce a commercial result" (Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640, [35], citing Re Golden Key Ltd [2009] EWCA Civ 636, [28]). Put another way, a commercial contract should be construed so as to avoid it "making commercial nonsense or working commercial inconvenience" (Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640, [35], citing Zhu v Treasurer of New South Wales [2004] HCA 56; (2004) 218 CLR 530, [82]).

[52] These observations are not intended to state any departure from the law as set out in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales ((1982) 149 CLR 337) and Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640. We agree with the observations of Kiefel and Keane JJ with respect to Western Export Services Inc v Jireh International Pty Ltd [2011] HCA 45.

KIEFEL AND KEANE JJ: [109] In Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd ((2014) 251 CLR 640; [2014] HCA 7, [35]), French CJ, Hayne, Crennan and Kiefel JJ explained that a commercial contract should be construed by reference to the surrounding circumstances known to the parties and the commercial purpose or objects to be secured by the contract in order to avoid a result that could not have been intended.

[110] The "ambiguity" which Mason J said may need to be resolved arises when the words are "susceptible of more than one meaning" (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337, 352). His Honour did not say how such an ambiguity might be identified. His Honour's reasons in Codelfa are directed to how an ambiguity might be resolved.

[111] In reasons for the refusal of special leave to appeal given in Western Export Services Inc v Jireh International Pty Ltd [2011] HCA 45, [2], reference was made to a requirement that it is essential to identify ambiguity in the language of the contract before the court may have regard to the surrounding circumstances and the object of the transaction. There may be differences of views about whether this requirement arises from what was said in Codelfa. This is not the occasion to resolve that question.

[112] It should, however, be observed that statements made in the course of reasons for refusing an application for special leave create no precedent and are binding on no one. An application for special leave is merely an application to commence proceedings in the Court (North Ganalanja Aboriginal Corporation v Queensland (1996) 185 CLR 595, 643 per McHugh J). Until the grant of special leave there are no proceedings inter partes before the Court.

[113] The question whether an ambiguity in the meaning of terms in a commercial contract may be identified by reference to matters external to the contract does not arise in this case and the issue identified in Jireh has not been the subject of submissions before this Court. To the extent that there is any possible ambiguity as to the meaning of the words "deriving title through or under", it arises from the terms of cl 24(iii) itself.

BELL AND GAGELER JJ: [118] These appeals do not raise an important question on which intermediate courts of appeal are currently divided. That question is whether ambiguity must be shown before a court interpreting a written contract can have regard to background circumstances.

[119] Until that question is squarely raised in and determined by this Court, the question remains for other Australian courts to determine on the basis that Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337 remains binding authority. That point, which of itself says nothing about the scope of the holding in Codelfa, was made in the joint reasons for judgment in Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council (2002) 240 CLR 45; [2002] HCA 5, [39]. The point was reiterated, but taken no further, in the joint reasons for refusing special leave to appeal in Western Export Services Inc v Jireh International Pty Ltd [2011] HCA 45, [3]-[4]. It should go without saying that reasons for refusing special leave to appeal in a civil proceeding are not themselves binding authority.

[13.23] Notes

1. These different statements from the High Court on the admissibility of evidence of the surrounding circumstances in construing a contract have created considerable uncertainty as to the correct approach: see Lindgren, "The Ambiguity of 'Ambiguity' in the Construction of Contracts" (2014) 38 Australian Bar Review 153.

2. In McCourt v Cranston [2012] WASCA 60, Pullin JA (with whom Newnes JA and Murphy JA agreed) stated:

> [24] Usually, the meaning of "ambiguous" is taken to include "open to various interpretations": see Macquarie Dictionary, but by using the phrase "ambiguous or susceptible of more than one meaning" perhaps Mason J wished to emphasise that not only a contract open to more than one meaning would allow in evidence of surrounding circumstances but also one where the contract is merely "difficult to understand". Once evidence of surrounding circumstances is allowed in, the restrictions on such evidence are clear. Evidence of subjective opinions are not admissible, nor is evidence of negotiations; the surrounding circumstances have to be objective facts and they have to be known to both parties.
>
> [25] If a trial judge decides that the contract under examination is not ambiguous or susceptible of more than one meaning, and rules that evidence of surrounding circumstances is not admissible, and an appeal court then decides that decision to be in error, then the case will have to be reheard, because relevant evidence will have been excluded. If, however, the trial judge receives evidence of surrounding circumstances and evidence of the object or aim of the transaction, and if the trial judge's construction is found to be in error, then the Court of Appeal will be able to remedy that on appeal without sending it back for retrial.
> [26] Until the High Court says more about the subject, it would be wise for trial judges, in cases where a party reasonably contends that the contract is ambiguous or susceptible of more than one meaning and there is relevant evidence of objective relevant surrounding circumstances known to both parties or objective evidence of the aim or object of the transaction, to allow that evidence in provisionally, even if the trial judge considers that his or her likely conclusion will be to reject the argument of the party contending that the agreement is ambiguous or susceptible of more than one meaning.

3. In Cherry v Steele-Park [2017] NSWCA 295; (2017) 96 NSWLR 548, [71] Leeming JA (with whom Ward and Emmett JJA agreed) adhered to the position adopted in earlier cases (including Mainteck Services Pty Ltd v Stein Heurtey SA [2014] NSWCA 184; (2014) 89 NSWLR 633, [71]–[85]) that, on the Court of Appeal's interpretation of the relevant authorities, regard may be had to surrounding circumstances, "without passing through an 'ambiguity gateway' ". Leeming JA maintained at [79] that "two more recent decisions of the High Court [Victoria v Tatts Group Ltd [2016] HCA 5 and Simic v NSW Land and Housing Corporation [2016] HCA 47, (2016) 260 CLR 85] strengthen the conclusion that 'ambiguity' is a conclusion, rather than a precondition to the admissibility of evidence of surrounding circumstances".

4. That interpretation of the law was rejected by Tate JA in the Victorian Court of Appeal in Apple and Pear Australia Ltd v Pink Lady America LLC [2016] VSCA 280:

> [137] In my view, it follows from what was said in Mount Bruce that it would be wrong to conclude that the High Court has endorsed an approach to the construction of commercial contracts, whereby the surrounding circumstances, including, relevantly, pre-contractual negotiations, can invariably be relied upon to assist construction. This is not to deny that the objective approach to contractual interpretation requires, as confirmed by French CJ, Nettle and Gordon JJ in Mount Bruce, reference to the '"text, context (the entire text of the contract as well as any contract, document or statutory provision referred to in the text of the contract) and purpose".

5. In the same case (ie, Apple and Pear Australia Ltd v Pink Lady America LLC [2016] VSCA 280, [232]) Ferguson and McLeish JJA found it unnecessary to answer the narrower question as to whether or not extrinsic evidence can be relied upon to establish an ambiguity.

THE PROCESS OF CONSTRUCTION

[13.25] In construing a contract, courts consider the meaning that a reasonable person would give to the contract. The cases extracted in this section, Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council [2002] HCA 5; (2002) 240 CLR 45 and Pacific Carriers Ltd v BNP Paribas [2004] HCA 35; (2004) 218 CLR 451, illustrate the courts' approach to this task.

Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council

[13.30] Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council [2002] HCA 5; (2002) 240 CLR 45 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the New South Wales Court of Appeal.

[FACTS: In 1976, the Trustees of the Domain (the lessor) and the Council of the City of Sydney (the lessee) entered into a lease for a term of 50 years for a part of land known of as the Domain containing a "parking station" and a footway leading to the parking station.

Clause 1 of the lease provided that the yearly rent during the first three years of the lease was $2,000. Clause 4(b)(iv) provided that the yearly rent payable during each subsequent three-year period:

> may be determined by the Trustees at the commencement of each of the affected periods … provided that … (iv) in making any such determination the Trustees may have regard to additional costs and expenses which they may incur in regard to the surface of the Domain above or in the vicinity of the parking station and the footway and which arise out of the construction operation and maintenance of the parking station by the Lessee.

The lessee instituted a proceeding in the Supreme Court of New South Wales seeking declaratory relief respecting the construction of cl 4(b). The relief sought was to the effect that the lessor, in determining any amount of yearly rent in excess of the yearly rent payable over the three-year period immediately prior to that in question, was constrained by cl 4(b)(iv) only to do so by having regard to any additional costs and expenses which the lessor might incur during the three-year period for which the yearly rent was being determined in respect of the surface of the Domain above or in the vicinity of the parking station and footway and which arose out of the construction, operation and maintenance of the parking station by the lessee and not by reference to any other considerations.

The primary judge did not accept this construction of the lease. Instead, the primary judge granted a declaration that the lease had "an implied term that in making a determination of rent pursuant to cl 4(b), the lessor must act bona fide for the purposes of determining a rent which is no more than a fair and reasonable rent". This relief did not reflect the constraint which the lessee maintained was imposed by cl 4(b)(iv) and favoured the interests of the lessor. Accordingly, the lessee appealed to the Court of Appeal and was successful. The relief granted by the Court of Appeal included a declaration that cl 4(b)(iv) specified exhaustively the considerations material to a determination by the lessor of the rent payable pursuant to the lease. The lessor was granted leave to appeal to the High Court.]

GLEESON CJ, GAUDRON, MCHUGH, GUMMOW AND HAYNE JJ: [52] In our opinion, the Court of Appeal reached the correct result and the appeal to this court should be dismissed. In his judgment, Fitzgerald JA [the trial judge] referred to well-known passages in the judgment of Mason J in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority (NSW) (1982) 149 CLR 337, 374–5 respecting the admissibility of evidence of surrounding circumstances to assist in the interpretation of a written contract if the language be ambiguous or susceptible of more than one meaning. In the present case, the difficulty concerns the phrase in para (iv) of cl 4(b) "the Trustees may have regard to additional costs and expenses". Does this mean that the trustees, in making a determination, cannot have regard to matters other than those additional costs and expenses? If the trustees may have regard to other matters, what are they? In a context such as cl 4(b), to specify a particular matter to which a party may have regard without expressly stating either that it is the only such matter or, to the contrary, that the specification does not limit the generality of the matters to which regard may be had is likely to result in ambiguity. It does so in the present case. The resolution of the ambiguity requires the application of settled principles of construction.

In Codelfa, Mason J (with whose judgment Stephen J and Wilson J agreed) referred to authorities (in particular, speeches of Lord Wilberforce in Prenn v Simmonds [1971] 1 WLR 1381, 1383–5; L Schuler AG v Wickman Machine Tool Sales Ltd [1974] AC 235, 261; and Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, 995–7) which indicated that, even in respect of agreements under seal, it is appropriate to have regard to more than internal linguistic considerations and to consider the circumstances with reference to which the words in question were used and, from those circumstances, to discern the objective which the parties had in view. In particular, an appreciation of the commercial purpose of a contract (Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen [1976] 1 WLR 989, 995–6): presupposes knowledge of the genesis of the transaction, the background, the context, the market in which the [53] parties are operating. Such statements exemplify the point made by Brennan J in his judgment in Codelfa (1982) 149 CLR 337, 401: "The meaning of a written contract may be illuminated by evidence of facts to which the writing refers, for the symbols of language convey meaning according to the circumstances in which they are used". …

[60] Consideration of the antecedent materials and circumstances respecting the dealings between the predecessors of the present parties before entering into the deed in 1976 indicates various relevant matters: the parties to the transaction were two public authorities, in one of which there had been vested land long dedicated for public recreation; the purpose of their transaction was the provision of a further public facility, in the form of the parking station and the footway, but without disturbing the availability of the surface for continued public recreation and without providing for the obtaining by one public authority of commercial profit at the expense of the other; it was the lessee which was responsible for the substantial cost of construction of the new facility and the concern of the parties had been to protect the lessor from financial disadvantage suffered from the transaction, namely additional expense which the lessor would or might incur immediately or in the future.

In the deed itself, various of these considerations are directly reflected. In particular, to the argument that, to deny to the lease a construction which permits the lessor now to determine a yearly rent at a "commercial" or "market" rate would unduly favour the interests of the lessee, the lessee responds by pointing to the capital investment made by its predecessor, and to the onerous obligations respecting the car park which bind the lessee.

The recital, to which reference has been made earlier in these reasons, refers to the construction by the lessee in the subterranean strata of the parking station and footway; other provisions indicate that [61] it is the lessee who bears all costs of operating the car park, maintaining it and refurbishing throughout its life as necessary and that, at the end of the term, the lessee will be obliged either to give up the car park to the lessor with no compensation in respect thereof or to follow the steps indicated in the proviso to cl 4(c).

These stated:

PROVIDED HOWEVER that:

> (i) the Lessee may upon the expiration or sooner determination of this lease or within six months [thereafter] and with the previous consent in writing of the Trustees remove from the demised land all moveable improvements which may have been placed on the demised land by the Lessee or at the cost and expense of the Lessee; (ii) if the Trustees by notice in writing to the Lessee direct the Lessee so to do the Lessee shall remove any building structure or improvement or any material from the demised land at the expense and cost of the Lessee and the Lessee shall not be entitled to any compensation in respect of such removal …

If the trustees give the consent indicated in (i) or a direction in (ii), cl 4(c)(iii) will require the lessee to:

> remove the movable improvements or the buildings structures or improvements or materials as the case may be from the demised land within such time as may be specified by the Trustees in such permission or direction and [to] leave the land hereby demised in a clean and tidy condition and free from rubbish and debris and restore the surface thereof for use as parkland for public recreation to the satisfaction in all respects of the Trustees.

Moreover, the lease may be brought to a premature determination; the lease is (cl 4(m)):

> subject to the power of the Minister to revoke wholly or in part the dedication of the subject land AND if such [dedication] be revoked in whole or part during the currency of this lease the rights and privileges hereby conferred shall as to the land so revoked absolutely cease and determine and neither the Lessee nor any other person shall be entitled to any compensation on account of such revocation.

The lessee is obliged by cl 2(g) to keep the parking station and the footway and all appurtenances thereto in good and efficient condition and in a thorough state of repair "in all respects to the satisfaction of the Trustees".

The lessee is obliged by cl 2(h) to ensure that the surface of the Domain above the parking station and the footway do not become, in the opinion of the trustees, unsafe for use as parkland for public recreation. Further, it is for the lessee to pay to the proper authorities all charges for services supplied by them to the demised land or the parking station and footway, including charges for gas, electricity, excess water, removal of garbage and the rent of gas and electricity meters: cl 2(p).

[62] It is against that background that para (iv) of cl 4(b) is to be construed. This states that, in making any such determination of the yearly rent payable in respect of the then succeeding three years of the term, the trustees "may have regard to additional costs and expenses" which have a certain character. First, they must be incurred in regard to the surface of the Domain above or in the vicinity of the parking station and the footway; secondly, the additional costs and expenses must arise out of the construction, operation and maintenance of the parking station by the lessee. The word "additional" indicates that para (iv) is concerned with that which has not been taken into account in the immediately prior determination. As the successive determinations were made, each might be expected to include additional costs and expenses identified in para (iv). In the determination for the next succeeding three years, those additional costs and expenses would be measured against what was now said to be "additional". The clause made no provision for the trustees having regard in their determination to any other additional matters. Clause 4(b) read as a whole contained a statement of the totality of the matters to be taken into account in fixing the successive rent determinations. That is the way in which the arrangements between the parties had been agreed some 20 years before the execution of the deed in 1976. There is nothing to suggest that in the intervening period the parties had conducted [301] themselves on any basis other than that the rent was to be computed in this fashion. Moreover, for the purposes of determining the rights and obligations of the parties to the lease, cl 4(b) was to be construed as if it had been executed on 1 May 1958: cl 4(l).

This conclusion is reinforced by the absence from the lease of any mechanism for dispute resolution in relation to periodic rent determinations by the trustees. There are no provisions concerning arbitration, or valuation, of the kind that often appear in rent review clauses in long-term leases. This is consistent with the non-commercial nature of the transaction. If cl 4(b) be construed to the above effect, no question of uncertainty arises (cf Queensland Electricity Generating Board v New Hope Collieries Pty Ltd [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep 205, 210). An implied term in the form favoured by the primary judge and urged by the appellant in this court would contradict the express terms of cl 4(b) (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority (NSW) (1982) 149 CLR 337, 352).

Two further matters should be noticed. First, reference was made in argument to several decisions of the House of Lords, delivered since Codelfa but without reference to it. Particular reference was made to passages in the speeches of Lord Hoffmann in Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich Building Society [1998] 1 WLR 896, 912–13 and of Lord Bingham of Cornhill and Lord Hoffmann in Bank of Credit and [63] Commerce International SA v Ali [2002] 1 AC 251, 259, 269 (cf Melanesian Mission Trust Board v Australian Mutual Provident Society [1997] 1 NZLR 391, 394–5; Yoshimoto v Canterbury Golf International Ltd [2001] 1 NZLR 523, 542), in which the principles of contractual construction are discussed. It is unnecessary to determine whether their Lordships there took a broader view of the admissible "background" than was taken in Codelfa or, if so, whether those views should be preferred to those of this court. Until that determination is made by this court, other Australian courts, if they discern any inconsistency with Codelfa, should continue to follow Codelfa (Garcia v National Australia Bank Ltd (1998) 194 CLR 395, 403).

The second matter concerns the debate in various Australian authorities concerning the existence and content of an implied obligation or duty of good faith and fair dealing in contractual performance and the exercise of contractual rights and powers. (The authorities are collected and discussed by Finn J in Hughes Aircraft Systems International v Airservices Australia (1997) 76 FCR 151, 188–98.) It emerged in argument in this court that both sides accepted the existence of such an obligation in the exercise by the lessor of its rental determination power conferred by cl 4(b). Rather, the dispute between them was directed to the content of that power, in particular the construction of para (iv) of cl 4(b). The result is that, whilst the issues respecting the existence and scope of a "good faith" doctrine are important, this is an inappropriate occasion to consider them.

The Court of Appeal was correct in the declaration made in order 2 of its orders ordered and entered on 31 August 2000. No question for this court arises as to the consequential relief given by the Court of Appeal.

[CALLINAN J agreed that the appeal should be dismissed. KIRBY J dissented.]

Appeal dismissed.

Pacific Carriers v BNP Paribas

[13.35] Pacific Carriers Ltd v BNP Paribas [2004] HCA 35; (2004) 218 CLR 451 – Appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: A cargo of legumes was sold by New England Agricultural Traders Pty Ltd (NEAT) to Royal Trading Co (Royal), a Calcutta grain merchant, and was shipped from Australia to India by Pacific Carriers Ltd (Pacific). NEAT instructed Pacific to deliver the cargo to such persons as might be directed by Royal. NEAT's brokers sent Pacific a letter of indemnity in respect of loss and damage that Pacific might suffer by discharging the cargo to receivers without bills of lading. The letter of indemnity was signed by Royal, and also by Royal's bank, which disclaimed any liability and merely confirmed Royal's signature. Pacific rejected that letter of indemnity. NEAT then signed a letter of indemnity in the same form as the letter provided by Royal but without the disclaimer. NEAT asked its bank, BNP, to add its signature to the letter of indemnity. The bank officer (Ms Dhiri) signed the letter in the space reserved for "Banker's signature" and affixed BNP's stamp to it. NEAT transmitted a copy of the letter to Pacific by facsimile. Ms Dhiri was authorised to verify customers' signatures on letters of indemnity but not to bind the bank to any indemnity. That limitation on Ms Dhiri's actual authority was not known by Pacific. Pacific subsequently suffered loss as a result of its having delivered the cargo without the bills of lading. Pacific sued BNP in the Supreme Court of New South Wales to enforce the letters of indemnity, NEAT being insolvent. Hunter J found that by signing the letters of indemnity BNP had represented that NEAT had the financial capacity to honour the obligations under the letters of indemnity. The Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of NSW (Sheller, Handley and Giles JJA) held that BNP was not liable under the letters because Ms Dhiri had neither actual nor ostensible authority to bind BNP to an indemnity. Pacific appealed to the High Court.]

THE COURT (GLEESON CJ, GUMMOW, HAYNE, CALLINAN and HEYDON JJ):

The construction issue

[461]The nature of the obligations undertaken by BNP in consequence of the signature and transmission to Pacific of the letters of indemnity depends upon the meaning of the documents, the particular problem being the capacity in which, on the true construction of the documents, the bank was involved in the transaction. That question has a factual relationship to the question of Ms Dhiri's authority, in that both she, and her superior, Mr Kavanagh, gave evidence that it was their understanding that all that BNP was doing was authenticating NEAT's execution of the letters of indemnity.

Ms Dhiri gave evidence that she told NEAT that execution by BNP was only for verification of the signatures. That evidence was denied. Hunter J said he had great difficulty in deciding where the truth lay. He accepted that "something must have been said by [Ms Dhiri] at one time or another to a NEAT representative that, in her mind, conveyed the message that she was signing the NEAT LOIs merely for verification of signatures", but he did not accept that any such limitation was effectively communicated to NEAT. More significantly, it was never communicated to Pacific.

What is important is not Ms Dhiri's subjective intention, or even what she might have conveyed, or attempted to convey, to NEAT about her understanding of what she was doing. The letters of indemnity were, and were intended by NEAT and BNP to be, furnished to Pacific. Pacific did not know what was going on in Ms Dhiri's mind, or what she might have communicated to NEAT as to her understanding or intention. The case provides a good example of the reason why the meaning of commercial documents is determined objectively: it was only the documents that spoke to [462] Pacific (Wilson) v Anderson (2002) 213 CLR 401, 417-419 [7]-[10]. The construction of the letters of indemnity is to be determined by what a reasonable person in the position of Pacific would have understood them to mean (Gissing v Gissing [1971] AC 886, 906; Christopher Hill Ltd v Ashington Piggeries Ltd [1972] AC 441, 502; ABC v XIVth Commonwealth Games Ltd (1988) 18 NSWLR 540). That requires consideration, not only of the text of the documents, but also the surrounding circumstances known to Pacific and BNP, and the purpose and object of the transaction (Investors Compensation Scheme Ltd v West Bromwich Building Society [1998] 1 WLR 896). In Codelfa Constructions Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337, 350. See further Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council (2002) 76 ALJR 436, 445 [39]. Mason J set out with evident approval the statement by Lord Wilberforce in Reardon Smith Line Ltd v Hansen-Tangen ([1976] 1 WLR 989, 995-996):

> In a commercial contract it is certainly right that the court should know the commercial purpose of the contract and this in turn presupposes knowledge of the genesis of the transaction, the background, the context, the market in which the parties are operating.

It is not suggested that there is any material difference between the two letters of indemnity. It is convenient to deal with the construction question by reference to the first.

The heading of the document describes it as a "standard form of undertaking" to be given in connection with delivery of cargo "without production of the bills of lading". The reason why a carrier would seek such an undertaking has already been explained. The heading contains a misdescription. It describes the undertaking as being "given by cargo receivers". The body of the document contains an undertaking by the shippers. The explanation is fairly obvious. An abortive attempt had been made earlier by NEAT to provide Pacific with a bank endorsed indemnity from Royal. The same "standard form" was used for NEAT's indemnity. That also accounts for the terms of cl 4.

The primary indemnifying party is NEAT. The question concerns the effect of BNP's signature and stamp (leaving to one side the issue of authority). Pacific argues that it was a bank endorsement under which BNP also accepted liability as an indemnifier. The commercial purpose was plain. Pacific was being requested by NEAT to take a risk by delivering cargo to receivers who could not produce the appropriate bills of lading. Pacific informed NEAT, and NEAT informed BNP, that Pacific would not agree to take that risk unless NEAT's bank also [463] signed the document. Pacific had only limited knowledge of the financial capacity of NEAT to meet its obligations under the indemnity. The terms of the document, understood in the light of the surrounding circumstances and the purpose and object of the transaction, and the market in which the parties were operating, meant that BNP was undertaking an obligation of indemnity. Relevant to the meaning of the document was not only what it said, but also what it did not say. There was nothing in the terms of the document to indicate that BNP was merely authenticating the execution by NEAT, and there was nothing in the surrounding circumstances to suggest that Pacific would accept such authentication only. A reasonable reader in the position of Pacific would have understood the document as a bank endorsed absent bills of lading indemnity, and would have understood that the bank was undertaking liability as an indemnifying party to support the liability undertaken by NEAT. The decision of the Court of Appeal on the construction issue was correct.

[The court also held that it would be unjust to permit BNP to depart from the Pacific's assumption that the letters of credit had been executed with the BNP's authority in circumstances where BNP had placed the officer who dealt with requests for letters of indemnity in a position to sign and stamp them.]

Appeal allowed.

Ecosse Property Holdings v Gee Dee Nominees

[13.37] Ecosse Property Holdings Pty Ltd v Gee Dee Nominees Pty Ltd [2017] HCA 12; (2017) 261 CLR 544 – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Victoria.

[FACTS: Westmelton (Vic) Pty Ltd leased farmland to Morris for a term of 99 years. The land was part of a larger parcel which, under local planning laws, could not be subdivided. Because the land could not be sold to Morris, the parties instead entered into a 99-year lease. Rent for the entire term was paid on signing and was equivalent to the market value of the land. The lease was based on a printed standard form "farm lease" with deletions and typewritten additions. Ecosse later purchased the freehold from Westmelton (and became the lessor) and Gee Dee took an assignment of the lease from Morris (and became the lessee). A dispute arose as to whether cl 4 of the lessee required the lessee to pay all "rates taxes assessments and outgoings" imposed in respect of the land or only those imposed on the lessee itself. Ecosse sought a declaration that the lessee was required to pay all such outgoings and was succeeded at first instance. The Court of Appeal by majority allowed an appeal. Ecosse appealed to the High Court. The main terms of the lease were as follows:

1. THE term of the tenancy hereby created shall be from the First day of November 1988 ~~to the day of~~
2. ~~THAT rent for the said term shall be at the clear rental of the first of the said payments to be made on the day of next. And the said Lessee covenants with the Lessor as follows:-~~
3. THAT the Lessee will pay the rent hereinbefore reserved on the days and in manner hereinbefore appointed for payment hereof. And in the event of the said term being determined by re-entry under the proviso hereinafter contained will pay to the Lessor a proportionate part of the said rent for the fraction of the current year up to the day of such re-entry.
4. AND also will pay all rates taxes assessments and outgoings whatsoever ~~excepting land tax~~ which during the said term shall be payable by the ~~Landlord or~~ tenant in respect of the said premises (~~but a proportionate part to be adjusted between Landlord and Tenant if the case so requires~~).

KIEFEL, BELL AND GORDON JJ: [6] On the appellant's case, cl 4 obliges the lessee to pay all rates, taxes, assessments and outgoings in respect of the land. On the respondent's case, cl 4 obliges the lessee to pay only those imposts that are levied on it in its capacity as the tenant, leaving the lessor liable to pay those imposts that may be levied on it as owner of the land. For the reasons to be given, the appellant's construction is to be preferred and it follows that the appeal must be allowed.

[7] The appellant's argument focuses on cl 13, which is said to identify the genesis and aim of the transaction between the original lessor and lessee (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337, 350 per Mason J). Adopting what was said by Kyrou JA, who dissented in the Court of Appeal (Gee Dee Nominees Pty Ltd v Ecosse Property Holdings Pty Ltd (2016) V ConvR ¶54-879), it is said that it was clearly the intention of the parties to recreate, as far as possible, in a lease, the conditions which would have obtained following a sale. On that approach, the position of the lessee under the lease would have more closely resembled that of a purchaser, upon whom liability for rates, taxes and other outgoings would fall.

[8] The respondent denies cl 13 the effect for which the appellant contends, observing that the clause does not contain a statement that it was the parties' intention to replicate the conditions of sale and purchase. The respondent points to other reasons for inclusion of cl 13: it was necessary to state the amount of the rent (a need created by the deletion of cl 2), and it was prudent to record that the sum had been paid in full. More generally, the respondent's submission, which found favour with the Court of Appeal majority, is that when the lease is read as a whole there is no warrant for treating cl 13 as an instruction as to its interpretation.

[9] It was not disputed in the Court of Appeal that cl 4, as settled by the parties, is ambiguous (at [92]) and argument in this Court proceeded upon that acceptance. And it was not disputed that in the circumstances it is open to the court to take account of the words crossed out of the standard form as an aid to the proper construction of the clause (Postle v Sengstock [1994] 2 Qd R 290, 298 per McPherson JA; Esso Australia Ltd v Australian Petroleum Agents' & Distributors' Association [1999] 3 VR 642, 647-648 [19] per Hayne J; A Goninan & Co Ltd v Direct Engineering Services Pty Ltd [No 2] (2008) 15 ANZ Insurance Cases ¶61-779, 76,946 [38]-[40]; and see Lewison and Hughes, The Interpretation of Contracts in Australia (2012) at 65-66; Timber Shipping Co SA v London & Overseas Freighters Ltd [1972] AC 1, 15-16 per Lord Reid; Mottram Consultants Ltd v Bernard Sunley & Sons Ltd [1975]

2 Lloyd's Rep 197, 209). The deletions do not evidence a prior intent, which could have changed, but rather they identify a matter which, on the face of the document, was rejected by both parties (Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337, 352-353 per Mason J).

[10] The respondent's argument draws on the structure and language of cl 4. The words "Landlord" and "tenant" in the unamended text are not found elsewhere in the lease. Their employment here is suggested to reflect the function of the clause in allocating liability for such enforceable obligations as arise independently of the lease to the lessor and lessee in their respective capacities as landlord and tenant.

[11] In the original form of cl 4, the words "AND also will pay", when read with cl 3, identified the party to whom the obligation applied. The words "all rates taxes assessments and outgoings whatsoever excepting land tax" identified the subject of the clause. The words "which during the said term shall be payable by the Landlord or tenant in respect of the said premises" identified the characteristics of the imposts to which the clause applied. The amendments are said by the respondent not to have altered the grammatical structure of the clause, which remains adjectival. The imposts to which the clause applies must have two characteristics: they must be "in respect of the said premises" and they must be "payable by the tenant". It is said the words "payable by the tenant", in their natural and ordinary sense, convey a liability which the tenant is under an enforceable obligation to pay, and which arises independently of the lease.

[12] The respondent's construction lays emphasis on the deletion of the words "Landlord or" as signifying the parties' intention that the lessee's obligation be confined to those imposts levied on it as tenant. The respondent also contends that, given the land formed part of a larger parcel, it is to be expected that the mechanism for apportionment contained in parentheses would have been retained had it been the parties' intention to make the lessee liable for the payment of all rates, taxes and other outgoings.

[13] The last-mentioned submission directs attention to the concluding words of the clause, "in respect of the said premises". The appellant observes that on the respondent's construction, these words are redundant: if the lessee's liability is confined to the payment of those imposts that are "payable by the tenant" they will necessarily be imposts "in respect of the said premises". The appellant's argument points to the retention of this phrase as a recognised means of conveying that the lessee's liability to pay land tax assessed on the whole of the lessor's landholdings is confined to the demised land (Tooth & Co Ltd v Newcastle Developments Ltd (1966) 116 CLR 167, 170-171; Centrepoint Custodians Pty Ltd v Lidgerwood Investments Pty Ltd [1990] VR 411; 112 Acland Street Pty Ltd v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2002) 4 VR 372, 376 [13] per Ormiston and Phillips JJA; Halsbury's Laws of England, 5th ed, vol 62, par 424). On the appellant's construction, the words "payable by the tenant in respect of the said premises" reiterate the lessee's obligation, tying it to the leased premises. It is a construction which the appellant submits rendered the reference to the landlord and the mechanism for apportionment in parentheses in the standard form unnecessary and confusing.

[14] The choice to amend cl 4 by crossing out words in the printed text is apt to lessen the force of arguments that depend upon analysis of its grammatical structure. This standard form of farm lease imposed liability on the lessee for the payment of all imposts on the land, save for land tax. As amended, cl 4 reads:

> AND [the Lessee] also will pay all rates taxes assessments and outgoings whatsoever which during the said term shall be payable by the tenant in respect of the said premises.

[15] As each of the judges below rightly acknowledged, each of the constructions proposed by the parties is plausible. The determination of the proper construction is not advanced by observing that on the appellant's case the phrase "payable by the tenant" is redundant or that on the respondent's case the phrase "in respect of the said premises" is redundant. The amendments to the standard form of lease were poorly crafted. The only explanation for the deletion of the lessee's covenant to the lessor (in relation to all succeeding covenants) in cl 2 and for the retention of cl 3, which in light of the deletion of cl 2 is redundant, is inadvertence. In the circumstances it hardly assists the determination of the proper construction of cl 4 to observe that the effect for which the appellant contends might have been achieved economically by simply deleting the words "excepting land tax".

[16] It is well established that the terms of a commercial contract are to be understood objectively, by what a reasonable businessperson would have understood them to mean, rather than by reference to the subjectively stated intentions of the parties to the contract (Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640, 656 [35] and the cases at fn 58). In a practical sense, this requires that the reasonable businessperson be placed in the position of the parties. It is from that perspective that the court considers the circumstances surrounding the contract and the commercial purpose and objects to be achieved by it (Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640, 656-657 [35] and the cases at fn 60).

[17] Clause 4 is to be construed by reference to the commercial purpose sought to be achieved by the terms of the lease. It follows, as was pointed out in the joint judgment in Electricity Generation Corporation v Woodside Energy Ltd (2014) 251 CLR 640, 656-657 [35], that the court is entitled to approach the task of construction of the clause on the basis that the parties intended to produce a commercial result, one which makes commercial sense. It goes without saying that this requires that the construction placed upon cl 4 be consistent with the commercial object of the agreement.

[18] Consideration of that object invites attention to cl 13. Clause 13 identifies the term of the lease and the amount of the total rental for that term and contains an acknowledgement that it has been paid in full. These statements form part of the operative terms of the lease. What is said at the commencement of cl 13 stands in a different position. It is an explanation of why the parties entered into a lease rather than a sale and purchase, which had been intended. Although expressed in the past tense it may be understood to convey that the circumstances leading to the lease remained unchanged at the time of its execution. Clause 13 explains that in circumstances in which the parties were unable to convey a freehold estate in the land, they had chosen instead to convey a leasehold estate for almost a century for a fixed sum. It is readily to be inferred that this was as close an approximation to their desired outcome as they thought they could arrange.

[19] Even without cl 13, the surrounding facts and circumstances which a reasonable businessperson in the position of the parties may be taken to have known would have pointed to that conclusion. Clause 13 itself does not explain how the parties' desire for a sale and purchase was thwarted, but it is a fact that it was the impossibility of subdivision of the land the subject of the lease. The length of the term, prepayment of a sum equivalent to the market value of the land, and the removal of the covenants restricting the lessee's user of and capacity to deal with the land (Clause 5, the lessee's covenant to keep the premises in good repair; cl 11, to use the land as a farm in a proper and husband like manner; and cl 13 in its original form, to cultivate the land; see also the addition of cl 16, the lessee's right to repair, rebuild or replace any dwellings or other improvements whether for personal, commercial purposes or otherwise; and cl 15, the lessee's right to assign, transfer, sub-let or grant licences without the consent of the lessor) and the lessor's rights of inspection (Clause 8) and termination for breach and re-entry (Clause 10, deletion of the words "or sooner determination"; see also the addition of cl 14), support the conclusion that the parties' intention was, as Kyrou JA stated it (at [29], [66]), to recreate, as far as possible, in a lease, the conditions which would have existed following a sale. The addition of the words "whatever purpose is allowable by law" to the chapeau also supports that conclusion. Clause 13 puts that conclusion beyond doubt.

[25] Notwithstanding that the consideration was the market value of the land, the lease does not provide an option to renew or to purchase for a nominal sum at the end of the term. The significance of this omission is suggested to favour the conclusion that the parties bargained for the lessor to bear the expense of any imposts levied on it as owner taking into account the value to the lessor of the reversion. An alternative view is the omission was inadvertent; neither the parties nor their advisers turning their minds to how matters might stand in 2087. Kyrou JA was drawn to that explanation

(at [71]). So are we. A surrounding circumstance of which the reasonable businessperson would be aware is that the lessor company was in receivership. It must be accounted highly unlikely that a receiver would agree to burden the lessor company with uncertain financial obligations over the term of a ninety-nine year lease.

[26] The Court of Appeal majority's conclusion failed to give effect to the clear statement of the parties' objective in entering the agreement. It makes no commercial sense, having regard to that objective, for the lessor to remain liable for the payment of rates, taxes and other outgoings over the term of the lease. That is especially so where the lessor has taken as consideration for the lease the land value, with no provision for future adjustments. The lessor would have been exposed to uncertainties including the effect that any change of (lawful) land use by the lessee might have had on the amount of any rates, taxes and other outgoings.

[27] On its proper construction cl 4 imposes on the lessee the obligation to pay all rates, taxes, assessments and outgoings whatsoever that are payable during the term of the lease in respect of the land. This construction accords with the commercial aim of the parties that the lessee assume the position of owner, so far as a lease may provide, with all of an owner's liabilities.

GAGELER J: [51] Clause 4 can only be so construed for what it is: a clumsily tailored variation of an ill-fitting off-the-shelf precedent. To bring linguistic and grammatical precision to its construction would be to burden the clause with more weight than its jumble of words will bear.

[52] The competing constructions of cl 4 being open on its language, and the textual indications in favour of each being at best equivocal and at worst conjectural, the choice between them comes down to deciding which is more reasonable considered as a matter of "commercial efficacy or common sense" (Gollin & Co Ltd v Karenlee Nominees Pty Ltd (1983) 153 CLR 455, 464).

[Gageler J referred to various factors (including the length of the lease, the lack of any restriction on the lessee as to the use of the land or its ability to transfer or sublet, the fact that the lease resulted from an intended sale to Mr Morris and that its purpose was to replicate a sale, that if the land had been sold the lessor would obviously have had no responsibility for outgoings, that Westmelton had been under the control of a receiver at the time of the sale and would therefore have been unlikely to accept ongoing financial burdens) and concluded as follows.]

[57] Having regard to those considerations of commercial purpose and commercial context, I think that the view which makes the most commercial sense is that cl 4 was intended to place Westmelton, as Lessor, in a position in relation to rates, taxes, assessments and outgoings in respect of the land that was as near as possible to the position in which Westmelton would have stood as vendor had it sold and not leased the land to Mr Morris. On that basis, I consider that Ecosse's construction is preferable.

[In a dissenting judgment, NETTLE J agreed with the majority judges in the Court of Appeal below that cl 13 evidenced a past rather than a present intention to sell and purchase the land and did not evidence an intention to replicate a sale and purchase. Moreover, other clauses (cll 6, 7, 10 and 12) were consistent with a landlord and tenant relationship. As a matter of language, the natural and ordinary effect of the deletion of the words "excepting land tax" in cl 4 was to "reverse the exclusion" and subject the lessee to such land tax as was levied on the lessee, and the natural and ordinary effect of deleting the words "Landlord or" was to limit the lessee's liability to those rates and taxes for which the tenant becomes liable during the term. His honour concluded as follows.]

[98] Poor drafting may justify a court in being more ready to depart from the natural and ordinary meaning of the terms of a contract (Arnold v Britton [2015] AC 1619, 1628 [18] per Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC, with whom Lord Sumption and Lord Hughes JJSC agreed, Lord Hodge JSC agreeing at 1637 [66]), and no doubt, the poorer the drafting, the less willing a court should be to be "driven by semantic niceties to attribute to the parties an improbable and unbusinesslike intention" (Mitsui Construction Co Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong (1986) 33 BLR 1 at 14, cited with approval in Gan Insurance Co Ltd v Tai Ping Insurance Co Ltd (No 2) [2001] 2 All ER (Comm) 299, 306 [13] per Mance LJ). But poor drafting provides "no reason to depart from the fundamental rule of construction of contractual documents that the intention of the parties must be ascertained from the language they have used interpreted in the light of the relevant factual situation in which the contract was made" (Mitsui Construction (1986) 33 BLR 1, 14. See also Rainy Sky SA v Kookmin Bank [2011] 1 WLR 2900, 2910 [26] per Lord Clarke of Stone-cum-Ebony JSC, with whom Lord Phillips of Worth Matravers PSC, Lord Mance, Lord Kerr of Tonaghmore and Lord Wilson JJSC agreed; [2012] 1 All ER 1137, 1147-1148). Where there is ambiguity which permits of two alternative and semantically not improbable interpretations, construction in accordance with what it may be supposed would be the approach of honest and reasonable businesspersons may assist in choosing one such alternative over the other. But where, as here, the language and surrounding circumstances of a commercial contract present a choice between, on the one hand, a plain, ordinary and commercially not irrational meaning of a clause and, on the other, a meaning which is significantly removed from the natural and ordinary meaning of the terms of the clause, which ill-accords with other provisions of the agreement, and which in the end produces an outcome that is more commercially acceptable from one of the parties' point of view only, the precept runs out of application. Unless the Anglo-Australian objective theory of contract is now to be cast aside, the commercial approach to construction (Cohen & Co v Ockerby & Co Ltd (1917) 24 CLR 288, 300 per Isaacs J; Upper Hunter County District Council v Australian Chilling and Freezing Co Ltd (1968) 118 CLR 429, 437 per Barwick CJ. Cf Mannai Investment Co Ltd v Eagle Star Life Assurance Co Ltd [1997] AC 749, 770-771 per Lord Steyn; Society of Lloyd's v Robinson [1999] 1 WLR 756, 763 per Lord Steyn (the other Law Lords agreeing at 758, 767-768) is not a licence to alter the meaning of a term that is "clear and fairly susceptible of one meaning only" to achieve a result that the court may think to be reasonable (Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Transport Ltd [1980] AC 827 at 851 per Lord Diplock. See also Arnold v Britton [2015] AC 1619, 1628 [18] per Lord Neuberger PSC, with whom Lord Sumption and Lord Hughes JJSC agreed, Lord Hodge JSC agreeing at 1637 [66]). The court is not authorised under the guise of construction to make a new contract for the parties at odds with the contract to which they have agreed (Johnson v American Home Assurance Co (1998) 192 CLR 266, 272 [19] per Kirby J; Charter Reinsurance [1997] AC 313, 388 per Lord Mustill, Lords Goff, Griffiths and Browne-Wilkinson agreeing at 381). Where, as here, all things considered, the words of a clause are fairly susceptible of only one meaning, they must be given that effect.

Appeal allowed.

Exclusion clauses

[13.40] Greig and Davis, in The Law of Contract (1987), p 597, define an exclusion or exemption clause as follows: a term of a contract that attempts either:

(i) to modify the principal obligation(s) arising under a contract of that particular type; or

(ii) to limit or exclude the liability of a party which would otherwise arise as a result of a breach by that party of his primary obligations to perform the contract in accordance with its terms.

Legislative restrictions on exclusion clauses

[13.45] In considering whether an exclusion or limitation clause is effective, a number of issues must be considered. In some cases, the clause may be void under statute. See the ACL and, in particular, Pts 2-3 (Unfair Contract Terms) and 3-2 (Consumer Guarantees).

The common law approach to exclusion clauses

[13.50] In some cases, there may be an issue as to whether a "third party" can claim the benefit of an exemption clause in a contract made by two other parties: see Port Jackson Stevedoring

Pty Ltd v Salmond & Spraggon (Aust) Pty Ltd (The "New York Star") (1978) 139 CLR 231; (1980) 144 CLR 300, extracted at [11.35]. More generally, before a party can rely on the protection of an exclusion clause, it must be shown that the clause was incorporated into the contract, see Chapter 12. If the clause is incorporated, it must be asked whether, as a matter of construction, the clause applies to exclude or restrict liability in relation to the issue in dispute. An overly broad exclusion clause may even be found to empty a contract of all content: see the judgment of Barwick CJ in MacRobertson Miler Airline Services v Commissioner of State Taxation (WA) (1975) 133 CLR 125, extracted at [3.35].

Does the clause apply to the issue in dispute?

[13.55] In Darlington Futures Ltd v Delco Aust Pty Ltd (1986) 161 CLR 500, the High Court discusses the proper approach to be taken in construing an exclusion clause.

Darlington Futures v Delco Aust

[13.60] Darlington Futures Ltd v Delco Aust Pty Ltd (1986) 161 CLR 500 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of South Australia.

[FACTS: Darlington Futures Ltd, the appellant, a broker dealing on the commodity futures market, entered into a written contract dated 12 June 1981 with Delco Australia Pty Ltd, the respondent. The respondent instructed the appellant to engage in day trading. Day trading leaves the investor exposed to the market for one day in the hope of making profits. Market fluctuations within one day are limited so that losses are confined. Without the authority of the respondent, the appellant left the futures contracts being traded open for a longer period than one day and heavy losses were sustained. The respondent sued to recover $279,715.36 damages from the appellant, claiming that this was the amount of the losses it sustained on contracts as a result of the appellant's breach of duty in trading in futures contracts without the respondent's authority. The appellant relied on the following exclusion clauses in the contract between the parties:

6. … The Client [the respondent] … acknowledges that the Agent [the appellant] will not be responsible for any loss should the Client follow any of the Agent's trading recommendations or suggestions, nor for any loss, in the case of Discretionary Accounts, arising from trading by the Agent on behalf of the Client. The Client finally acknowledges that the Agent will not be responsible for any loss arising in any way out of any trading activity undertaken on behalf of the Client whether pursuant to this Agreement or not …

7. (c) Any liability on the Agent's part or on the part of its servants or agents for damages for or in respect of any claim arising out of or in connection with the relationship established by this agreement or any conduct under it or any orders or instructions given to the Agent by the Client, other than any liability which is totally excluded by paragraphs (a) and (b) hereof, shall not in any event (and whether or not such liability results from or involves negligence) exceed one hundred dollars.

The trial judge found in favour of the appellant. The respondent appealed to the Full Court, which allowed the appeal. The appellant appealed by special leave to the High Court.]

MASON, WILSON, BRENNAN, DEANE AND DAWSON JJ: [507] [The judges agreed with the finding in the lower courts that the appellant had acted beyond the scope of the authority given to it by the respondent.] The question then is whether cl 6 protects the appellant from the consequences of what otherwise would be breaches of contract. Mr Bennett relies on statements in recent decisions of the House of Lords to support the approach that exclusion clauses should be simply construed in accordance with their language and that they should not be subjected to a strained construction in order to reduce the ambit of their operation. These statements have been made in a series of cases beginning with Photo Production Ltd v Securicor Ltd [1980] AC 827 in which the House of Lords rejected the doctrine of fundamental breach previously adopted in Suisse Atlantique

Societe d'Armement Maritime SA v NV Rotterdamsche Kolen Centrale [1967] 1 AC 361. In place of that doctrine their Lordships have stated that, although an ambiguous exclusion clause will be construed contra proferentem, such a clause is to be given its natural construction. So, in Photo Production, a case decided on a contract entered into before the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 (UK) came into operation, Lord Diplock, observing that the court was not [508] entitled to reject the exclusion clause "however unreasonable the court itself may think it is, if the words are clear and fairly susceptible of one meaning only", said [1980] AC, at 851:

> In commercial contracts negotiated between business-men capable of looking after their own interests and of deciding how risks inherent in the performance of various kinds of contract can be most economically borne (generally by insurance), it is, in my view, wrong to place a strained construction upon words in an exclusion clause which are clear and fairly susceptible of one meaning only even after due allowance has been made for the presumption in favour of the implied primary and secondary obligations.

This approach to the construction of exclusion clauses was subsequently reiterated in Ailsa Craig Fishing Co Ltd v Malvern Fishing Co Ltd [1983] 1 WLR 964; [1983] 1 All ER 101 where a distinction was drawn between exclusion and limitation clauses. Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, with whom Lord Elwyn-Jones, Lord Salmon and Lord Lowry concurred, observed that the principles applicable to exclusion clauses do not apply "in their full rigour" to conditions which merely limit liability, though such conditions will be read contra proferentem: [1983] 1 WLR 964, 970. This distinction in the treatment of the two types of clause was subsequently endorsed in George Mitchell (Chesterhall) Ltd v Finney Lock Seeds Ltd [1983] 2 AC 803, 813-814. There the House of Lords concluded that the conditions of a contract for the sale of late cabbage seed limited the liability of the seller to a refund of the price paid or replacement of the seeds and that the ambit of the conditions could not be confined to breaches of contract arising without negligence on the part of the seller. The condition, read as a whole, unambiguously limited the seller's liability to replacement of the seeds or refund of the price. Their Lordships declined to read an ambiguity into it by the process of strained construction deprecated by Lord Diplock in Photo Production [1980] AC 827, 851 and subsequently by Lord Wilberforce in Ailsa Craig [1983] 1 WLR 964, 966. However, the House of Lords held that the limiting condition was unenforceable on the ground that it would not be "fair or reasonable" [1983] 2 AC, at 815 within the meaning of s 55(4) as modified by Sched 1, par 11 of the Sale of Goods Act 1979 (UK) to allow reliance on the condition. This aspect of the decision has no relevance to the present case.

Although these three decisions contain statements giving emphasis [509] to the natural meaning of the words of exclusion and limitation clauses read as a whole, we do not understand the statements to deny the legitimacy, indeed the necessity, of construing the language of such a clause in the context of the entire contract of which it forms part. The formulation by the House of Lords of a new approach to the construction of exclusion and limitation clauses in place of the earlier approach based on the doctrine of fundamental breach explains why the emphasis in these statements is upon the language of the particular clauses rather than upon the context in which they appear.

Be this as it may, this Court has in past decisions authoritatively stated the approach to be adopted in Australia to the construction of exclusion and limitation clauses, without relying on the doctrine of fundamental breach. In Sydney Corporation v West (1965) 114 CLR 481, 488 … Barwick CJ and Taylor J said:

> … in the case where a contract of bailment contains an exempting clause much as we have to consider the protection afforded by the clause will be lost if the goods the subject of the bailment are stored in a place or in a manner other than that authorized by the contract or if the bailee consumes or destroys them instead of storing them or if he sells them.

Their Honours then made it clear that they reached this result by a process of construction of the contract and not by applying the doctrine of fundamental breach. Their Honours continued (26):

> But we would deny the application of such a clause in those circumstances simply upon the interpretation of the clause itself. Such a clause contemplates that loss or damage may occur by reason of negligence on the part of the warehouseman [510] or his servants in carrying out the obligations created by the contract. But in our view it has no application to negligence in relation to acts done with respect to a bailor's goods which are neither authorized nor permitted by the contract …. Negligence in these circumstances would be right outside the purview of the clause.

Windeyer J reached the same conclusion as a matter of interpretation of the contract.

Subsequently in Thomas National Transport (Melbourne) Pty Ltd v May & Baker (Australia) Pty Ltd (1966) 115 CLR 353, Windeyer J, though dissenting in result, stated that the effect of an exclusion clause must be "resolved by construing the language that the parties used, read in its context and with any necessary implications based upon their presumed intention" (1966) 115 CLR, at 376. And later, in H&E Van Der Sterren v Cibernetics (Holdings) Pty Ltd (1970) 44 ALJR 157, at 158, Walsh J, with whom Barwick CJ and Kato J agreed, said:

> The terms of exception clauses must sometimes be read down if they cannot be applied literally without creating an absurdity or defeating the main object of the contract …. But such a modification by implication of the language which the parties have used in an exception clause is not to be made unless it is necessary to give effect to what the parties must be understood to have intended.

See also Port Jackson Stevedoring Pty Ltd v Salmond & Spraggon (Aust) Pty Ltd (1978) 139 CLR 231, at 238.

These decisions clearly establish that the interpretation of an exclusion clause is to be determined by construing the clause according to its natural and ordinary meaning, read in the light of the contract as a whole, thereby giving due weight to the context in which the clause appears including the nature and object of the contract, and, where appropriate, construing the clause contra proferentem in case of ambiguity. Notwithstanding the comments of Lord Fraser in Ailsa Craig [1983] 1 WLR 964, 970, the same principle applies to the construction of limitation clauses. As King CJ noted in his judgment in the Supreme Court, a limitation clause may be so severe in its operation as to make its effect virtually indistinguishable from that of an exclusion clause. And the principle, in the form in which we have expressed it, does no more than express the general approach to the interpretation of contracts and it is of sufficient generality to accommodate the different considerations that may arise in the interpretation of a wide variety of exclusion and [511] limitation clauses in formal commercial contracts between business people where no question of the reasonableness or fairness of the clause arises.

Turning now to cl 6 of the contract between the appellant and the respondent, the question is whether the relevant losses arose "in any way out of any trading activity undertaken on behalf of the Client whether pursuant to this agreement or not". Read in context these words plainly refer to trading activity undertaken by the appellant for the respondent with the respondent's authority, whether pursuant to the agreement or not. It can scarcely be supposed that the parties intended to exclude liability on the part of the appellant for losses arising from trading activity in which it presumed to engage on behalf of the respondent when the appellant had no authority so to do.

The final question is whether the appellant is protected by cl 7(c) of the contract. This provision limits the liability of the appellant to $100 in relation to claims of three kinds:

(1) claims arising out of or in connexion with the relationship established by the agreement;

(2) claims arising out of or in connexion with any conduct under the agreement; and

(3) claims arising out of or in connexion with any orders or instructions given by the client to the broker.

The Full Court of the Supreme Court considered that cl 7(c) by its terms had no application to claims arising out of conduct which is outside the scope of the agreement and the relationship between the parties established by it. This, in our opinion, is to place a more restrictive interpretation on the clause than its language will naturally bear. In particular, it is expressed to comprehend claims arising out of or in connexion with the relationship established by the agreement. A claim in respect of an unauthorized transaction may nonetheless have a connexion, indeed a substantial connexion, with the relationship of broker and client established by the agreement. We are unable to discern any basis on which cl 7(c) can be construed so as not to apply to such a claim. The present case is one in which the respondent's claim arises in connexion with the relationship of broker and client established by the contract between the parties, notwithstanding the finding that the relevant transactions were not authorized.

In the result cl 7(c) operates to limit the appellant's liability to $100 in respect of each of the unauthorized coffee and silver contracts.

Appeal allowed.

WHEN WILL TERMS BE IMPLIED?

[14.05] Contract terms cannot deal comprehensively with every contingency that may affect performance. The common law recognises three main classes of terms which may be implied to fill gaps and deal with matters not addressed by the express contract terms: terms implied in fact (to give business efficacy to a particular contract or make it workable); terms implied in law (as a necessary incident of all contracts falling within a particular class); and terms implied by custom or trade usage. Terms are also in some instances implied by statute. The Sale of Goods Acts, for example, implies various conditions and warranties in contracts for the sale of goods, such as an implied condition that the seller has the right to sell the goods. See also the discussion of the consumer guarantees imposed under the Australian Consumer Law in Chapter 17.

TERMS IMPLIED IN FACT

[14.10] Terms implied in fact are traditionally said to be based on the "presumed" intentions of the parties concerned and accordingly are unique to the contract in question.

The BP Refinery criteria

[14.15] In BP Refinery (Westernport) Pty Ltd v Shire of Hastings (1977) 180 CLR 266, Lord Simon identified the requirements for implication in fact as follows:

for a term to be implied, the following conditions (which may overlap) must be satisfied: (1) it must be reasonable and equitable; (2) it must be necessary to give business efficacy to the contract so that no term will be implied if the contract is effective without it; (3) it must be so obvious that "it goes without saying"; (4) it must be capable of clear expression; (5) it must not contradict any express term of the contract.

Byrne v Australian Airlines

[14.20] Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: The appellants were employed by the respondent as baggage handlers at Sydney Airport. They were dismissed from their employment for pilfering. They sought relief claiming that their dismissal was in breach of cl 11(a) of the Transit Workers (Airlines) Award 1988. That clause provided that termination of employment by an employer should not be harsh, unjust or unreasonable. The appellants each sought damages for breach of statutory duty and for breach of contract.

The trial judge found that the respondent's conduct in terminating the appellants' employment was not harsh, unjust or unreasonable. On appeal, the Full Court of the Federal Court found to the contrary. The requirement that termination not be harsh, unjust or unreasonable carried an obligation on the part of the respondent to afford the appellants procedural fairness. However, the Full Court held that the appellants were not entitled to damages for breach of contract or breach of statutory duty.

The appellants appealed to the High Court against the Full Court of the Federal Court's rejection of their claim for damages. They submitted that cl 11(a) became a term of their contract because: it was imported into their contracts of employment by force of the award; it was an implied term; or it embodied a "crystallised custom" of the industry. The appellants alternatively claimed that the purported terminations of their contracts were illegal and void because they were in breach of cl 11(a). The appellants argued that they were entitled to treat this conduct as a repudiation of their contracts and to sue for damages. The following extracts deal with the arguments about implied terms.]

BRENNAN CJ, DAWSON AND TOOHEY JJ: [421] In a system of industrial regulation where some, but not all, of the incidents of an employment relationship are determined by award, it is plainly unnecessary that the contract of employment should provide for those matters already covered by the award. The contract may provide additional benefits, but cannot derogate from the terms and conditions imposed by the award … and, as we have said, the award operates with statutory force to secure those terms and conditions. Neither from the point of view of the employer nor the employee is there any need to convert those statutory rights and obligations to contractual rights and obligations. There is, therefore, an insuperable obstacle in the way of the appellants' second argument that the terms [422] of an award such as cl 11(a) are implied terms of the contract of employment.

McHUGH AND GUMMOW JJ:

Business efficacy

[441] We turn now to consider the submission that cl 11(a) was implied as a term from the particular circumstances of the case and to give effect to some apparent underlying intention of the parties about providing business efficacy. Reliance here was placed upon the well-known statement of the Privy Council in BP Refinery (Westernport) Pty Ltd v Shire of Hastings (1977) 180 CLR 266 at 283. This has been approved and applied in numerous decisions in this Court. … The Privy Council specified five conditions which, whilst they might overlap, must be satisfied before a court may imply a term in a contract which the parties had not thought fit to express. First, the term must be "reasonable and equitable"; secondly, it must be necessary to give "business efficacy to the contract" so that no term will be implied if the contract is effective without it; thirdly, the term must be so obvious that "it goes without saying"; fourthly, it must be "capable of clear expression"; and, finally, it must not contradict any express term.

In BP itself and in other cases such as Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596, Codelfa [442] Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority (NSW)

(1982) 149 CLR 337 and Adelaide City Corporation v Jennings Industries Ltd (1985) 156 CLR 274, the question was whether a term should be implied in a formal written contract which was complete upon its face.

That is not the present case. We have referred to the exiguous nature of the evidence as to the form taken by, and the express terms of, the contract of employment between the respondent and the appellants. There are two consequences.

First, this species of implication is concerned with the circumstances of the particular case. The primary judge and Black CJ and Gray J in the Full Court referred to the need to prove facts leading to the implication of a term of this nature. Gray J said (Byrne (1994) 47 FCR 300 at 361):

> [T]his Full Court does not know what all of the express terms of the contracts were. It does not know whether they were adequate to make the contracts of employment efficacious or whether any of them would contradict the proposed implied term. An examination of the facts surrounding the creation of each contract of employment might lead to a different result for one appellant from the other.

Secondly, where the contract is not in writing and is oral or partly oral or it appears that the parties themselves did not reduce their agreement to a complete written form, caution is required against an automatic or rigid application of the cumulative criteria identified in BP. We should proceed on the footing that the present case is to be approached in this way. In such situations, the first task is to consider the evidence and find the relevant express terms. Some terms may be inferred from the evidence of a course of dealing between the parties. It may be apparent that the parties have not spelled out all the terms of their contract, but have left some or most of them to be inferred or implied. Some terms may be implied by established custom or usage, as described above. Other terms may satisfy the criterion of being so obvious that they go without saying, in the sense that if the subject had been raised the parties to the contract would have replied "of course" (Hospital Products Ltd v United States Surgical Corporation (1984) 156 CLR 41 at 121). If the contract has not been reduced to complete written form, the question is whether the implication of the particular term is necessary for the reasonable or effective operation of the contract in the circumstances of the case; only where this can be seen to be true will the term be implied (Hawkins v Clayton (1988) 164 CLR 539 at 573).

The contractual term propounded by the appellants would operate in a partisan fashion. It would favour the interests of the employee at the [443] expense of those of the employer. Further, in the operation sought to be given the term by the appellants, so as to require procedural regularity or fairness, the term also would qualify what otherwise has been understood to be the general law of the employment contract.

It is true that, in this country, what one might call the overall relationship between employer and employee includes the effect which by statute must be given to a relevant award made under the federal or a State system ….

There is no reason why an employee might not be engaged upon terms and conditions including some or all of the terms of an award [444] under the legislation …. But these considerations do not, as a matter of imputed intention of the parties to a particular employment contract, render it any more likely that the importation into the contract of a provision such as cl 11(a) of the Award was so obvious that it went without saying, or that it was necessary for the reasonable or effective operation of the contract …. Clause 11(a) is not a free-standing provision in the Award. It is an integral part of a regime which, at the same time, establishes a norm by which an unfair dismissal is to be assessed, and provides for the resolution of disputes as to such dismissals and for the enforcement of the Award by the recovery of penalties. Why should cl 11(a) be severed from that context and given a further and distinct operation as a contractual term? …

[446] In the present case, Beaumont and Heerey JJ (Byrne (1994) 47 FCR 300 at 343) dealt with this particular question of implication by saying that, whilst the employee might have agreed that the terms of cl 11(a) be expressly included in the contract of employment, the employer in all probability would be of the contrary view. There is much to be said for their Honours' hypothesis that the employer would indicate that, whilst bound by the terms of the Award and so subject to the penalties prescribed by the legislation for breach, it would not accept cl 11(a) as a term of the contract. In the event of breach, the employer would be liable not only to the penalty but also to pay damages in contract.

In contracts of this nature, apparently lacking written formality and detailed specificity, it still is necessary to show that the term in question would have been accepted by the contracting parties as a matter so obvious that it would go without saying. That cannot be postulated here.

Nor could it be said that the implication into the contract of employment of a term to the effect of cl 11(a) of the Award would be necessary for their reasonable or effective operation. In the absence of such a contractual provision, there would remain unaffected the entitlement of the employer at general law to terminate at will on giving reasonable notice and to dismiss summarily for misconduct. That this would be the case was accepted in the submissions of both sides to this Court. Thus, there would be no "gap" which it was necessary to fill by a provision such as cl 11(a).

Accordingly, we accept the submissions for the respondent that the term for which the appellants contend is not to be implied as a matter of business efficacy in its contracts of employment with the appellants. [447]

Implications independent of intention

The two species of term considered above, if indeed they be distinct, are concerned with giving effect to what is taken to have been the intentions of the parties. The expression "implied term" suggests imposition in the way in which statutes such as the Trade Practices Act 1974 (Cth), eg ss 66–74, imply conditions or warranties in contracts of a particular description, which may not be excluded or modified. The sense of the matter would have been better served by general adoption of the expression – apparently coined by Sir John Salmond (Salmond and Winfield, Principles of the Law of Contracts (1927), p 47) and used by Dixon J (Shepherd v Felt & Textiles of Australia Ltd (1931) 45 CLR 359 at 378) – "tacit term" to identify the latent unexpressed intentions of the parties.

The third type of term upon which the appellants rely is of a different nature … What, then, is involved in the proposition that a contractual term is [448] implied as a matter of law rather than as the assumed intention of the parties?

There is at least one basic distinction. It is that, as indicated above, terms implied by the application of what one might call the business efficacy test are terms unique to the particular contract in question, depending upon the form of the contract, the express terms and the surrounding circumstances. By contrast, terms implied by law are, in general, implied in all contracts of a particular class or which answer a given description (Esso Australia Resources Ltd v Plowman (1995) 183 CLR 10 at 30).

Further, as Hope JA pointed out in Castlemaine Tooheys Ltd v Carlton & United Breweries Ltd (1987) 10 NSWLR 468 at 487:

> Although the distinction between the two classes of implication has not been and perhaps is still not universally appreciated, classes of contract in respect of which terms will be implied by law, and the terms which will be implied, have in many cases been long established. Typical classes are contracts between master and servant, for the sale of goods, for the provision of work and materials and between landlord and tenant ([a] more detailed description was given by Professor Glanville Williams in his article "Language and the Law", which was published in four parts: Law Quarterly Review, vol 61 (1945) 71, 179, 283, 384, at p 403). However, the classes of contracts in which the law will imply terms are not closed; the difficult question is to determine what test should be applied before the courts imply such a term for the first time.

… [149] There is force in the suggestion that what now would be classified as terms implied by law in particular classes of case had their origin as implications based on the intention of the parties, but thereafter became so much a part of the common understanding as to be imported into all transactions of the particular description. The matter is put as follows in Halsbury (Halsbury's Laws of England, 4th ed (1974) vol 9, par 354, fn 27):

> Perhaps the truth is that the ambiguous terminology enables the courts in the first instance to imply terms on the basis of the intention of the parties … but later there comes a time when the particular implied term has become so much a part of common practice that the courts begin to import it into all transactions of that type as a matter of course; and the result is a rule of law of the type considered in this paragraph.

This understanding of the matter is consistent with the proposition that terms of this kind, although treated as implied by law, may be excluded by express provision made by the parties and also as a result of inconsistency with terms of the contract (Castlemaine Tooheys (1987) 10 NSWLR 468 at 490–3; Devefi Pty Ltd v Mateffy Pearl Nagy Pty Ltd (1993) 113 ALR 225 at 240–1; Glanville Williams, "Language and the Law", Law Quarterly Review, vol 61 (1945) 71, 179, 283, 384 at p 404 …). The result is that, [450] even if treated as rules of law, they only apply in the absence of an expression of contrary intent ….

Many of the terms now said to be implied by law in various categories of case reflect the concern of the courts that, unless such a term be implied, the enjoyment of the rights conferred by the contract would or could be rendered nugatory, worthless, or, perhaps, be seriously undermined (Nullagine Investments Pty Ltd v Western Australian Club Inc (1993) 177 CLR 635 at 647–8, 659). Hence, the reference in the decisions to "necessity". For example, it is established that the mere relationship of landlord and tenant implies a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The reason for this appears to be that, originally, the common law courts would not recognise the tenant as having any estate in the demised land and would not reinstate the tenant if elected by the landlord; the remedy in covenant remedied the position of the tenant who otherwise, if ejected, would have been without recourse (Norton, Treatise on Deeds, 2nd ed (1928), p 547, where the authorities are collected). This notion of "necessity" has been crucial in the modern cases in which the courts have implied for the first time a new term as a matter of law.

Codelfa establishes that the doctrine of frustration is concerned with [451] the termination of the contract by operation of law in particular circumstances, rather than by the operation of an implied condition. In the course of dealing with implied terms, Mason J stated (Codelfa (1982) 149 CLR 337 at 345):

> Of course, I am speaking of an implied term necessary to give business efficacy to a particular contract, not of the implied term which is a legal incident of a particular class of contract, of which Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239 is an example. The difference between the two categories of implied term was mentioned by Viscount Simonds in Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] AC 555 at 576, where he referred to the search for the second category of implied term as being based "upon more general considerations", a comment endorsed by Lord Wilberforce in [1977] AC 239 at 255.

In Liverpool City Council v Irwin, the House of Lords considered the obligations to its tenants of the lessor of a fifteen-storey tower block. The lessor was a public body charged by statute with the duty of providing housing for members of the public, selected because of their need, at rents subsidised by the general body of ratepayers. The matter was approached by identifying the rights conferred upon the tenants and then considering that activity by the lessor which would be necessary to avoid the impairment of the essentials of the grant to the tenant. Lord Wilberforce said ([1977] AC 239 at 254):

> In my opinion such obligations should be read into the contract as the nature of the contract itself implicitly requires, no more, no less: a test, in other words, of necessity. The relationship accepted by the corporation is that of landlord and tenant: the tenant accepts obligations accordingly, in relation inter alia to the stairs, the lifts and the chutes. All these are not just facilities, or conveniences provided at discretion: they are essentials of the tenancy without which life in the dwellings, as a tenant, is not possible. To leave the landlord free of contractual > obligation as regards these matters, and subject only to administrative or political pressure, is, in my opinion, inconsistent totally with the nature of this relationship. The subject matter of the lease (high rise blocks) and the relationship created by the tenancy demand, of their nature, some contractual obligation on the landlord.

A similar approach subsequently was taken by the House of Lords in Scally v Southern Health and Social Services Board [1992] 1 AC 294. (See also the Privy Council decision in Tai Hing Cotton Mill Ltd v Liu Chong Hing Bank [1986] AC 80 at 104–7, dealing with the contract between banker and customer.) In this [452] case, the appellants were medical practitioners whose terms of employment with Northern Ireland health boards had been negotiated by representatives of their professional bodies. They brought actions against their employers alleging, among other things, breach of contract in respect of failure of their employers to inform them of certain rights which they had enjoyed but which had been exercisable only within a particular period. Lord Bridge of Harwich ([1992] 1 AC 294 at 304) identified the issue as follows:

> The problem is a novel one which could not arise in the classical contractual situation in which all the contractual terms, having been agreed between the parties, must, ex hypothesi, have been known to both parties. But in the modern world it is increasingly common for individuals to enter into contracts, particularly contracts of employment, on complex terms which have been settled in the course of negotiations between representative bodies or organisations and many details of which the individual employee cannot be expected to know unless they are drawn to his attention. The instant case presents an example of this phenomenon arising in the context of the statutory provisions which regulate the operation of the health services in Northern Ireland.

The question was whether the law would imply into the contract of employment an obligation on the employer to notify the employees of the rights in question. Was the term a "necessary incident of a definable category of contractual relationship"? The House posed this question and answered it in the affirmative (at 307). Their Lordships held that, where a contract of employment, negotiated between employers and a representative body, contained a particular term conferring upon the employee a valuable right contingent upon his or her acting as required to obtain the benefit, of which the employee could not be expected to be aware unless the term was brought to the attention of the employee, there was an implied obligation on the employer to take reasonable steps to publicise the term. In the present appeal, the appellants relied upon this concept of necessity. Their submission was that employment contracts were a well-recognised "class" of contract. That was conceded by the respondent. So also was the proposition that the law imported various incidents into the relationship of employment, one of them being the entitlement of the employer to terminate the employment at will on giving reasonable notice and to dismiss summarily for misconduct. It was then submitted that the existence of the Award, and in particular cl 11(a), "required" reformulation of that incident of the relationship by importing, in terms, the provisions of cl 11(a).

However, there is no "necessity" for such a step in the sense in [453] which that term was applied in cases such as Irwin and Scally. The contract of employment is not, from the viewpoint of the employee, rendered nugatory if the existing provisions thereof remain, as a matter of contract, to operate concurrently with the regime established by the Award and deriving its authority from statute.

There is nothing to suggest that the contracts of employment were not workable and effective before the introduction into awards of provisions such as cl 11(a). This is not a case where a provision such as cl 11(a) is necessary lest the contract be deprived of its substance, seriously undermined or drastically devalued in an important respect.

Appeal dismissed.

[The High Court granted the respondent special leave to cross appeal against the finding in the Federal Court that the dismissals of the appellants were unreasonable.]

[14.35] Notes

In Attorney General of Belize v Belize Telecom Ltd [2009] UKPC 10; [2009] 1 WLR 1988, the Privy Council doubted the efficacy of relying on formal tests for implying a term. Delivering the judgment of the Board, Lord Hoffmann said:

> [21] It follows that in every case in which it is said that some provision ought to be implied in an instrument, the question for the court is whether such a provision would spell out in express words what the instrument, read against the relevant background, would reasonably be understood to mean. It will be noticed from Lord Pearson's speech that this question can be reformulated in various ways which a court may find helpful in providing an answer – the implied term must "go without saying", it must be "necessary to give business efficacy to the contract" and so on – but these are not in the Board's opinion to be treated as different or additional tests. There is only one question: is that what the instrument, read as a whole against the relevant background, would reasonably be understood to mean?
> [22] There are dangers in treating these alternative formulations of the question as if they had a life of their own. Take, for example, the question of whether the implied term is "necessary to give business efficacy" to the contract. That formulation serves to underline two important points. The first, conveyed by the use of the word "business", is that in considering what the instrument would have meant to a reasonable person who had knowledge of the relevant background, one assumes the notional reader will take into account the practical consequences of deciding that it means one thing or the other. In the case of an instrument such as a commercial contract, he will consider whether a different construction would frustrate the apparent business purpose of the parties. That was the basis upon which Equitable Life Assurance Society v Hyman [2002] 1 AC 408 was decided. The second, conveyed by the use of the word "necessary", is that it is not enough for a court to consider that the implied term expresses what it would have been reasonable for the parties to agree to. It must be satisfied that it is what the contract actually means.
>
> [23] The danger lies, however, in detaching the phrase "necessary to give business efficacy" from the basic process of construction of the instrument. It is frequently the case that a contract may work perfectly well in the sense that both parties can perform their express obligations, but the consequences would contradict what a reasonable person would understand the contract to mean. Lord Steyn made this point in the Equitable Life case (at p 459) when he said that in that case an implication was necessary "to give effect to the reasonable expectations of the parties".
>
> [24] The same point had been made many years earlier by Bowen LJ in his well known formulation in The Moorcock (1889) 14 PD 64, 68:
>
> In business transactions such as this, what the law desires to effect by the implication is to give such business efficacy to the transaction as must have been intended at all events by both parties who are business men.
> [25] Likewise, the requirement that the implied term must "go without saying" is no more than another way of saying that, although the instrument does not expressly say so, that is what a reasonable person would understand it to mean. Any attempt to make more of this requirement runs the risk of diverting attention from the objectivity which informs the whole process of construction into speculation about what the actual parties to the contract or authors (or supposed authors) of the instrument would have thought about the proposed implication. The imaginary conversation with an officious bystander in Shirlaw v Southern Foundries (1926) Ltd [1939] 2 KB 206, 227 is celebrated throughout the common law world. Like the phrase "necessary to give business efficacy", it vividly emphasises the need for the court to be satisfied that the proposed implication spells out what the contract would reasonably be understood to mean. But it carries the danger of barren argument over how the actual parties would have reacted to the proposed amendment. That, in the Board's opinion, is irrelevant. Likewise, it is not necessary that the need for the implied term should be obvious in the sense of being immediately apparent, even upon a superficial consideration of the terms of the contract and the relevant background. The need for an implied term not infrequently arises when the draftsman of a complicated instrument has omitted to make express provision for some event because he has not fully thought through the contingencies which might arise, even though it is obvious after a careful consideration of the express terms and the background that only one answer would be consistent with the rest of the instrument. In such circumstances, the fact that the actual parties might have said to the officious bystander "Could you please explain that again?" does not matter.

[26] In BP Refinery (Westernport) Pty Ltd v Shire of Hastings (1977) 180 CLR 266, 282-283 Lord Simon of Glaisdale, giving the advice of the majority of the Board, said that it was "not … necessary to review exhaustively the authorities on the implication of a term in a contract" but that the following conditions ("which may overlap") must be satisfied:

> (1) it must be reasonable and equitable; (2) it must be necessary to give business efficacy to the contract, so that no term will be implied if the contract is effective without it; (3) it must be so obvious that "it goes without saying" (4) it must be capable of clear expression; (5) it must not contradict any express term of the contract.

[27] The Board considers that this list is best regarded, not as series of independent tests which must each be surmounted, but rather as a collection of different ways in which judges have tried to express the central idea that the proposed implied term must spell out what the contract actually means, or in which they have explained why they did not think that it did so. The Board has already discussed the significance of "necessary to give business efficacy" and "goes without saying". As for the other formulations, the fact that the proposed implied term would be inequitable or unreasonable, or contradict what the parties have expressly said, or is incapable of clear expression, are all good reasons for saying that a reasonable man would not have understood that to be what the instrument meant.

[14.40] In Marks and Spencer plc v BNP Paribas Securities Services Trust Company (Jersey) Ltd [2015] UKSC 72; [2016] AC 742, Lord Neuberger (with whom Lord Sumption and Lord Hodge agreed) made the following comments about the implication of terms in light of the Privy Council's judgment in the Belize Telecom case:

[21] … It could be dangerous to reformulate the principles, but I would add six comments on the summary given by Lord Simon in BP Refinery as extended by Bingham MR in the Philips case [1995] EMLR 472 and exemplified in The APJ Priti [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep 37. First, in Equitable Life Assurance Society v Hyman [2002] 1 AC 408, 459, Lord Steyn rightly observed that the implication of a term was "not critically dependent on proof of an actual intention of the parties" when negotiating the contract. If one approaches the question by reference to what the parties would have agreed, one is not strictly concerned with the hypothetical answer of the actual parties, but with that of notional reasonable people in the position of the parties at the time at which they were contracting. Secondly, a term should not be implied into a detailed commercial contract merely because it appears fair or merely because one considers that the parties would have agreed it if it had been suggested to them. Those are necessary but not sufficient grounds for including a term. However, and thirdly, it is questionable whether Lord Simon's first requirement, reasonableness and equitableness, will usually, if ever, add anything: if a term satisfies the other requirements, it is hard to think that it would not be reasonable and equitable. Fourthly, as Lord Hoffmann I think suggested in Attorney General of Belize v Belize Telecom Ltd [2009] 1 WLR 1988, para 27, although Lord Simon's requirements are otherwise cumulative, I would accept that business necessity and obviousness, his second and third requirements, can be alternatives in the sense that only one of them needs to be satisfied, although I suspect that in practice it would be a rare case where only one of those two requirements would be satisfied. Fifthly, if one approaches the issue by reference to the officious bystander, it is "vital to formulate the question to be posed by [him] with the utmost care", to quote from Lewison, The Interpretation of Contracts 5th ed (2011), para 6.09. Sixthly, necessity for business efficacy involves a value judgment. It is rightly common ground on this appeal that the test is not one of "absolute necessity", not least because the necessity is judged by reference to business efficacy. It may well be that a more helpful way of putting Lord Simon's second requirement is, as suggested by Lord Sumption in argument, that a term can only be implied if, without the term, the contract would lack commercial or practical coherence.

[22] Before leaving this issue of general principle, it is appropriate to refer a little further to Belize Telecom, where Lord Hoffmann suggested that the process of implying terms into a contract was part of the exercise of the construction, or interpretation, of the contract. In summary, he said at para 21 that "[t]here is only one question: is that what the instrument, read as a whole against the relevant background, would reasonably be understood to mean?". There are two points to be made about that observation.

[23] First, the notion that a term will be implied if a reasonable reader of the contract, knowing all its provisions and the surrounding circumstances, would understand it to be implied is quite acceptable, provided that (i) the reasonable reader is treated as reading the contract at the time it was made and (ii) he would consider the term to be so obvious as to go without saying or to be necessary for business efficacy. (The difference between what the reasonable reader would understand and what the parties, acting reasonably, would agree, appears to me to be a notional distinction without a practical difference.) The first proviso emphasises that the question whether a term is implied is to be judged at the date the contract is made. The second proviso is important because otherwise Lord Hoffmann's formulation may be interpreted as suggesting that reasonableness is a sufficient ground for implying a term. (For the same reason, it would be wrong to treat Lord Steyn's statement in Equitable Life Assurance Society v Hyman [2002] 1 AC 408, 459 that a term will be implied if it is "essential to give effect to the reasonable expectations of the parties" as diluting the test of necessity. That is clear from what Lord Steyn said earlier on the same page, namely that "[t]he legal test for the implication of … a term is … strict necessity", which he described as a "stringent test".)

[24] It is necessary to emphasise that there has been no dilution of the requirements which have to be satisfied before a term will be implied, because it is apparent that Belize Telecom has been interpreted by both academic lawyers and judges as having changed the law. Examples of academic articles include C Peters "The implication of terms in fact" [2009] CLJ 513, P Davies, "Recent developments in the Law of Implied Terms" [2010] LMCLQ 140, J McCaughran "Implied terms: the journey of the man on the Clapham Omnibus" [2011] CLJ 607, and JW Carter and W Courtney, "Belize Telecom: a reply to Professor McLauchlan" [2015] LMCLQ 245. And in Foo Jong Peng v Phua Kiah Mai [2012] 4 SLR 1267, paras 34-36, the Singapore Court of Appeal refused to follow the reasoning in Belize at least in so far as "it suggest[ed] that the traditional 'business efficacy' and 'officious bystander' tests are not central to the implication of terms" (reasoning which was followed in Sembcorp Marine Ltd v PPL Holdings Pte Ltd [2013] SGCA 43). The Singapore Court of Appeal were in my view right to hold that the law governing the circumstances in which a term will be implied into a contract remains unchanged following Belize Telecom.

[25] The second point to be made about what was said in Belize Telecom concerns the suggestion that the process of implying a term is part of the exercise of interpretation. Although some support may arguably be found for such a view in Trollope at p 609, the first clear expression of that view to which we were referred was in Banque Bruxelles Lambert SA v Eagle Star Insurance Co Ltd [1997] AC 191, 212, where Lord Hoffmann suggested that the issue of whether to imply a term into a contract was "one of construction of the agreement as a whole in its commercial setting". Lord Steyn quoted this passage with approval in Equitable Life at p 459, and, as just mentioned, Lord Hoffmann took this proposition further in Belize Telecom, paras 17-27. Thus, at para 18, he said that "the implication of the term is not an addition to the instrument. It only spells out what the instrument means"; and at para 23, he referred to "The danger … in detaching the phrase 'necessary to give business efficacy' from the basic process of construction". Whether or not one agrees with that approach as a matter of principle must depend on what precisely one understands by the word "construction".

[26] I accept that both (i) construing the words which the parties have used in their contract and (ii) implying terms into the contract, involve determining the scope and meaning of the contract. However, Lord Hoffmann's analysis in Belize Telecom could obscure the fact that construing the words used and implying additional words are different processes governed by different rules.

[27] Of course, it is fair to say that the factors to be taken into account on an issue of construction, namely the words used in the contract, the surrounding circumstances known to both parties at the time of the contract, commercial common sense, and the reasonable reader or reasonable parties, are also taken into account on an issue of implication. However, that does not mean that the exercise of implication should be properly classified as part of the exercise of interpretation, let alone that it should be carried out at the same time as interpretation. When one is implying a term or a phrase, one is not construing words, as the words to be implied are ex hypothesi not there to be construed; and to speak of construing the contract as a whole, including the implied terms, is not helpful, not least because it begs the question as to what construction actually means in this context.

[28] In most, possibly all, disputes about whether a term should be implied into a contract, it is only after the process of construing the express words is complete that the issue of an implied term falls to be considered. Until one has decided what the parties have expressly agreed, it is difficult to see how one can set about deciding whether a term should be implied and if so what term. This appeal is just such a case. Further, given that it is a cardinal rule that no term can be implied into a contract if it contradicts an express term, it would seem logically to follow that, until the express terms of a contract have been construed, it is, at least normally, not sensibly possible to decide whether a further term should be implied. Having said that, I accept Lord Carnwath's point in para 71 to the extent that in some cases it could conceivably be appropriate to reconsider the interpretation of the express terms of a contract once one has decided whether to imply a term, but, even if that is right, it does not alter the fact that the express terms of a contract must be interpreted before one can consider any question of implication.

[29] In any event, the process of implication involves a rather different exercise from that of construction. As Sir Thomas Bingham trenchantly explained in Philips at p 481:

> The courts' usual role in contractual interpretation is, by resolving ambiguities or reconciling apparent inconsistencies, to attribute the true meaning to the language in which the parties themselves have expressed their contract. The implication of contract terms involves a different and altogether more ambitious undertaking: the interpolation of terms to deal with matters for which, ex hypothesi, the parties themselves have made no provision. It is because the implication of terms is so potentially intrusive that the law imposes strict constraints on the exercise of this extraordinary power.

[31] It is true that Belize Telecom was a unanimous decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and that the judgment was given by Lord Hoffmann, whose contributions in so many areas of law have been outstanding. However, it is apparent that Lord Hoffmann's observations in Belize Telecom, paras 17-27 are open to more than one interpretation on the two points identified in paras 23-24 and 25-30 above, and that some of those interpretations are wrong in law. In those circumstances, the right course for us to take is to say that those observations should henceforth be treated as a characteristically inspired discussion rather than authoritative guidance on the law of implied terms.

TERMS IMPLIED IN LAW

[14.45] Terms that are implied "in law" are implied in contracts falling within a particular class or description on the basis that they are necessary incidents of all contracts falling within the class in question. Traditional examples of terms implied in law include:

> the implied conditions of reasonable fitness and merchantable quality on a contract for the sale of goods, the rule that payment and delivery of goods are concurrent conditions, the implied warranty of seaworthiness, the implied condition on the letting of a furnished house that it is reasonably fit for habitation, the implied promise by one who agrees to build a house that the house will be reasonably fit for habitation, the implied promise by a servant not to disclose secret processes, not to hand over to a rival written work completed for the master, and not, while still in his master's employment, to solicit the master's customers to transfer their custom to himself, the implied promise by an employer (in some cases) to furnish work, the implied duty of care in the carriage of passengers and in looking after bailed goods, and the implied promise by a banker not to disclose the state of his customers' account.

(Williams, "Language and the Law IV" (1945) 61 Law Quarterly Review 384, 403, quoted in Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410, 448 per McHugh and Gummow JJ.)

The judgments in Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (extracted at [14.20]) and Commonwealth Bank of Australia v Barker [2014] HCA 32; (2014) 253 CLR (extracted at [14.158]) discuss the criteria by which the courts decide whether a term will be implied in law for the first time. Those criteria are further discussed in the following extract.

The test of "necessity"

University of Western Australia v Gray

[14.50] University of Western Australia v Gray [2009] FCAFC 116; (2009) 179 FCR 346 (Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia) – Appeal from a single judge of the Federal Court of Australia.

LINDGREN, FINN AND BENNETT JJ: [142] What is clear is that necessity in this context has a different shade of meaning from that which it has in formulations of the business efficacy test: see generally Treitel, The Law of Contract, at 6-042 (12th ed, 2007). The principal reason for this is, as Viscount Simonds indicated in Lister v Romford Ice & Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] AC 555 at 576, that implication in law rests "upon more general considerations", a view endorsed both by Lord Wilberforce in Liverpool City Council [1977] AC 239 at 255 and by Lord Bridge in Scally at 307. Those more general considerations require that regard be had "to the inherent nature of the contract and of the relationship thereby established" as both Lister and Scally make plain. But those very considerations themselves can raise issues of "justice and policy" (cf Star Shipping AS v China National Foreign Trade Transportation Corporation (The Star Texas) [1993] 2 Lloyd's Rep 445 at 452; Hughes Aircraft Systems International (1997) 76 FCR 151 at 194-197) as well as consideration, not only of consequences within the employment relationship, but also of social consequences: see Lister at 579.

[143] Lister illustrates the significant role that public policy can have in the matter. In a passage often referred to in this country when distinguishing implications at law from those necessary to give business efficacy to a particular contract, Viscount Simonds observed (at 576):

> [T]he real question becomes, not what terms can be implied in a contract between two individuals who are assumed to be making a bargain in regard to a particular transaction or course of business; we have to take a wider view, for we are concerned with a general question, which, if not correctly described as a question of status, yet can only be answered by considering the relation in which the drivers of motor-vehicles and their employers generally stand to each other. Just as the duty of care, rightly regarded as a contractual obligation, is imposed on the servant, or the duty not to disclose confidential information …, or the duty not to betray secret processes …, just as the duty is imposed on the master not to require his servant to do any illegal act, just so the question must be asked and answered whether in the world in which we live today it is a necessary condition of the relation of master and man that the master should, to use a broad colloquialism, look after the whole matter of insurance. If I were to try to apply the familiar tests where the question is whether a term should be implied in a particular > contract in order to give it what is called business efficacy, I should lose myself in the attempt to formulate it with the necessary precision. The necessarily vague evidence given by the parties and the fact that the action is brought without the assent of the employers shows at least ex post facto how they regarded the position. But this is not conclusive; for, as I have said, the solution of the problem does not rest on the implication of a term in a particular contract of service but upon more general considerations. (Emphasis added)

Viscount Simonds later went on to discuss – and accept (at 579) – the contention that a term should not be implied "of which the social consequences would be harmful": see the discussion of this case in Treitel, at 6-043 and Gummow J's citation of Treitel's views on implication in Breen v Williams (1996) 186 CLR 71 at fn 192.

[144] The necessary tie between implication in law and considerations of policy has been widely acknowledged in recent times both in English and Australian case law and in scholarly writings. In England in particular this has been associated with an attack on the utility of "necessity" as a descriptor of the test actually being applied in the cases: see eg Crossley v Faithful & Gould Holdings Ltd [2004] 4 All ER 447 at [33]-[36]; Treitel, 6-042; Furmston (ed), 3.24; and see generally, Peden, 465 ff.

[145] In Simonius Vischer & Co v Holt & Thompson [1979] 2 NSWLR 322 at 348, Samuels JA suggested that the imposition of terms as a matter of law amounts to no more than the imposition of a legal duty where the law thinks policy requires it: for subsequent views to the same or like effect see eg Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works (1992) 26 NSWLR 234 at 261; Vodafone Pacific Ltd v Mobile Innovations Ltd [2004] NSWCA 15 at [187]. While Samuels JA's observations provide little guidance in shaping the judicial inquiry in individual cases, they helpfully acknowledge that considerations of policy can, and do, have a part to play in determining whether or not it is necessary that a contractual obligation should be implied in law in a given class of contract. The obligation of secrecy imposed upon professionals by virtue of their relationships with their clients and its varying scope from profession to profession, clearly illustrate this: see eg Tournier v National Provincial and Union Bank of England [1924] 1 KB 461 at 474; Parry-Jones v Law Society [1969] 1 Ch 1 at 7, 9.

[146] There is one matter calling for emphasis. It is that considerations of policy, as Lister illustrates, can be of considerable significance in negativing the making of an implication, or else in demonstrating that the issues raised by the proposed implication are of such a character or complexity as to make it inappropriate for a court, as distinct from a legislature, to impose the obligation in question: see eg Reid v Rush and Tompkins Group plc [1990] 1 WLR 212 at 220. As will be seen, "more general considerations" play an important part in dissuading us from allowing this aspect of the appeal and from making the implication sought.

[147] There are two final comments to be made. The first is that it is not appropriate in this appeal for us to venture a view upon whether the necessity test ought be discarded. That is for the High Court. What we have had to say of its presently permitted latitude is sufficient for present purposes. Secondly, we note that this is an area of law in which little direct assistance can be obtained from United States jurisprudence or from the provisions of transnational instruments: cf Restatements of Contracts, Second, § 204; Farnsworth, "Disputes over Omission in Contracts", (1968) 68 Colum L Rev 860; and see eg UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts, Arts 4.8 and 5.1.2. What can be said, though, is that there is apparent acceptance both in judicial decision and in legal scholarship in the United States that when terms are implied by law (a description which includes what in our jurisprudence are implications in fact: Farnsworth on Contracts, § 7.16 (3rd ed, 2004)), that implication can be for reasons of justice, fairness and policy: see eg NEA-Coffeyville v Unified School District No 445 996 P 2d 821 at 830-832 (Kan 2000); Farnsworth on Contracts, § 7.16 at 351.

TERMS IMPLIED BY CUSTOM

Con-Stan Industries of Australia v Norwich Winterthur Insurance

[14.60] Con-Stan Industries of Australia Pty Ltd v Norwich Winterthur Insurance (Aust) Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 226 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Court of Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

[FACTS: Con-Stan engaged Bedford (a company) as its insurance broker to secure various insurances. Norwich was selected and a proposal was submitted to it which was duly accepted. The premiums were paid by Con-Stan to Bedford but Bedford did not pass them on to Norwich. Bedford was wound up and Norwich sued Con-Stan to recover the premiums. Rogers J found for Con-Stan but his decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal.]

GIBBS CJ, MASON, WILSON, BRENNAN AND DAWSON JJ: [234] In the present case, if Bedford had been an agent of Norwich with authority to receive money on the latter's behalf, the payment by Con-Stan of its premiums to Bedford would have constituted payment to the principal. Norwich's sole recourse would then have been against Bedford for failure to account for moneys received in its capacity as agent. However, under the general principles of the law of agency, a broker is the agent of the assured, not the insurer … [235] This avenue foreclosed, Con-Stan nevertheless seeks to avoid having to pay the premiums a second time on a number of distinct grounds. It was submitted:

(1) there is an implied term in the contract of insurance, arising by virtue of custom or usage in the industry, that a broker alone is liable to an insurer for payment of the premium, or alternatively there is an implied term that payment of the premium to a broker discharges the assured's obligation to the insurer;

(2) alternatively, similar terms should be implied to give business efficacy to the contract; …

Custom

[14.65] The principal submission advanced on behalf of the appellant … is that there is an implied term in the contract of insurance between Con-Stan and Norwich, arising by virtue of custom in the industry, that an insurer is entitled to look only to the broker for payment of the premium. An alternative submission, which was the one accepted by Rogers J at first instance, is that the implied term arising by custom is that payment by an assured to his broker is a good discharge of his obligation to the insurer. The two submissions clearly differ because in the former the existence of an obligation in the assured to pay the premiums to [236] the insurer is denied, whereas in the latter it is accepted but regarded as discharged by payment to the broker. Thus an assured who made no payment of premiums to his broker would not be liable to the insurer under primary submission, but would be if the alternative submission were accepted.

The circumstances in which trade, custom or usage may form the basis for the implication of terms into a contract have been considered in many cases. The cases have established the following propositions:

(1) The existence of a custom or usage that will justify the implication of a term into a contract is a question of fact: Nelson v Dahl (1879) 12 Ch D 568 at 575. The critical dependence of a finding of custom on the facts of the particular case means there is little to be gained by referring (as counsel for the appellant urged us to do) to the practices of the London marine market in the last century, notwithstanding that those practices formed the basis for the implication, in contracts of marine insurance, of a term similar to the first of the terms alternatively contended for in this case.

(2) There must be evidence that the custom relied on is so well known and acquiesced in that everyone making a contract in that situation can reasonably be presumed to have imported that term into the contract. In the words of Jessel MR in Nelson v Dahl (at 575) approved by Knox CJ in Thornley v Tilley (1925) 36 CLR 1 at 8: "[The custom] must be so notorious that everybody in the trade enters into a contract with that usage as an implied term. It must be uniform as well as reasonable, and it must have quite as much certainty as the written contract itself."

However, it is not necessary that the custom be universally accepted, for such a requirement would always be defeated by the denial by one litigant of the very matter that the other party seeks to prove in the proceedings.

(3) A term will not be implied into a contract on the basis of [237] custom where it is contrary to the express terms of the agreement. One explanation of this principle is that, in so far as it relates to written contracts, it is simply an application of the parol evidence rule, by which extrinsic evidence is generally inadmissible to add to, vary or contradict the express terms of a contract which has been reduced to writing. A more fundamental explanation is that the presumed intention of the parties, on which the importation of the custom rests must yield to their actual intention as embodied in the express terms of the contract, regardless of whether the contract is written or oral.

It has sometimes been said that the implication of a term into a contract does not depend on the parties' intention, actual or presumed, but on broader considerations. But these statements are directed to situations in which the courts have been asked to imply terms amounting to rules of law applicable to all contracts of a particular class. The present case is of a different kind in which it may be necessary to speak of presumed intention. In matters of this kind, that phrase means no more than that the general notoriety of the custom makes it reasonable to assume that the parties contracted on the basis of the custom, and that it is therefore reasonable to import such a term into the contract.

(4) A person may be bound by a custom notwithstanding the fact that he had no knowledge of it. Historically the courts approached this question in a rather different way. It was said that, as a general rule, a person who was ignorant of the existence of a custom or usage was not bound by it. To this rule there was a qualification that a person would be presumed to know of the usage if it was of such notoriety that all persons dealing in that sphere could easily ascertain the nature and content of the custom. It would then be reasonable to impute that knowledge to a person, notwithstanding [238] his ignorance of it. In this way, the issue of notoriety discussed in (2) above came to be co-extensive with the question of imputed knowledge. The achievement of sufficient notoriety was both a necessary and sufficient condition for knowledge of a custom to be attributed to a person who was in fact unaware of it. The result is that in modern times nothing turns on the presence or absence of actual knowledge of the custom; that matter will stand or fall with the resolution of the issue of the degree of notoriety which the custom has achieved. The respondent's contention that industry practices unknown to the assured are incapable of forming the basis of an implied term of the contract cannot be sustained.

(5) In order to establish a custom to the effect that a broker is alone liable to an insurer for payment of a premium on a policy of insurance, it is not sufficient to show that in the ordinary course of events the premium is paid to the insurer by the broker, nor is it sufficient to show that where a broker has failed to pay a premium the insurer makes its first demand for payment from the broker. Both circumstances are consistent with the continued liability of the assured. It is necessary to establish a clear course of conduct under which insurers do not look to the assured for payment of the premium. This may be established by proving either an absence of claims by insurers against assured, or the existence of claims directed exclusively to brokers as a practice rarely if ever departed from. Having examined the evidence of custom that was led in the present case, we do not think this requirement is satisfied. The evidence … revealed a number of instances of insurers seeking a second payment from the assured notwithstanding that they had already paid their brokers …

[240] [The] evidence supports the inference that at least since 1973, it was a not uncommon view of those involved in the industry that insurers were entitled to look past the broker for payment of the premium. The fact that several assured were prepared to pay the premiums again, in whole or part, may indicate that that was a view with which they did not entirely disagree. Mr Hoffman [a witness who had "considerable experience in the insurance industry both as insurer and broker"] agreed that the legal obligations of an assured have been a matter of great uncertainty for a number of years. The learned trial judge was prepared to rely on Mr Hoffman's conclusion as to accepted practice in the industry, while acknowledging that the parties involved had not addressed their minds to the legal consequences that were to be accepted as accompanying that practice. But, as Glass JA observed in the Court of Appeal (at p 472), a custom that falls short of involving a recognition of rights and liabilities fails to provide a firm foundation for the implication of terms in a contract.

In our opinion, in the light of this evidence, it is not possible to say that the custom alleged has been proved to the high standard which the law requires. It has not been shown that the custom relied on is so well known and acquiesced in that everyone making a contract in that situation can reasonably be presumed to have imported that term into the contract.

Appeal dismissed.

THE DUTY OF GOOD FAITH

[14.70] There has been increasing willingness among judges to recognize an implied duty of good faith in Australian contract law. The duty would supplement the express terms of a contract by precluding certain sorts of uncooperative or unfair conduct in the performance and enforcement of that contract. While there are many decisions in the lower courts in support of a duty of good faith, the High Court has yet to express a view on whether Australian law recognises an independent implied duty of good faith in contract performance. The issue was expressly left open in Royal Botanic Gardens and Domain Trust v South Sydney City Council [2002] HCA 5; (2002) 240 CLR 45, 63, 76, and 94.

SHOULD A DUTY OF GOOD FAITH BE RECOGNISED?

Renard Constructions v Minister for Public Works

[14.80] Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works (1992) 26 NSWLR 234 (Supreme Court of New South Wales, Court of Appeal) – Appeal from a decision of Cole J.

[FACTS: Renard Constructions, the contractor, and the Minister for Public Works, the principal, entered into a contract for the construction of pumping stations, parts of a sewerage project in the Gosford/Wyong area. The general conditions of contract were in a form known as NPWC Edition 3 (1987). Subclause 44.1 provided that:

> If the Contractor fails within the period specified in the notice in writing to show cause to the satisfaction of the Principal why the powers hereinafter contained should not be exercised the Principal … may (a) take over the whole … of the work … and … exclude from the site the Contractor … or (b) cancel the contract …. The time for completion of the work was extended at the contractor's request several times. During this time the principal had not supplied all the materials it was required to supply under the contract.

The principal's assistant project manager was concerned by what he considered the delay and poor workmanship of the contractor. He recommended to the principal's superintendent for the works that the contractor be called upon to show cause under subcl 44.1. The superintendent acted accordingly. In response the contractor delivered a letter stating that it was willing and able to complete the contract within a reasonable time; it had twenty employees ten hours a day, six and in some cases seven days a week.

The assistant project manager recommended cancellation of both contracts. The superintendent prepared a recommendation for the senior officer of the principal who had an appropriate delegation of authority from the Minister to make final decisions to terminate contracts. That officer, in considering the recommendation, was not aware of the bearing that the non-supply of parts required to be supplied to the contractor by the principal would necessarily have upon the extended date for practical completion, nor was he aware that since the service of the notices to show cause the contractor had increased the work force, was working longer hours and had brought in a new, highly experienced foreman. Notice was then given to the contractor stating that the principal took over the whole of the work remaining to be completed and excluding the contractor from the sites.

The contractor treated the action by the principal as a wrongful repudiation of the contract, advised that it accepted the repudiation, and then asserted that it rescinded the contract. Arbitration proceedings were commenced under cl 45 of the contract. The arbitrator found that the principal had breached the contract by acting unreasonably in exercising the power conferred by cl 44.1. The arbitrator found that the superintendent's recommendation to the senior officer was based to some extent on a misunderstanding of certain relevant matters, and also very largely on "unfairly misleading, incomplete, and prejudicial information" supplied to the superintendent by the assistant project manager. The arbitrator held that the contractor was entitled to recover on a quantum meruit for work done prior to the principal's decision to take over the work. On appeal to the Supreme Court of New South Wales, Cole J held that the principal was not required to act reasonably in exercising its powers under cl 44.1, and that the principal had validly exercised those powers. The contractor appealed the decision of Cole J in relation to cl 44.1. The principal cross-appealed against the amount awarded by the arbitrator on the quantum meruit claim.]

PRIESTLEY JA: … [256]

Implication ad hoc

[257] Brownie J [in Minister for Public Works v Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd (No 1) (Brownie J, 15 February 1989, unreported)] had decided against any implication concerning the way the principal should approach the matter of "satisfaction" under the clause but thought the principal must act reasonably in deciding, in the event of non-satisfaction, whether to exercise any of the powers. Cole J took a different view with regard to both these aspects. He was not prepared to recognise any implication concerning the exercise of the powers but thought the principal could not reach a conclusion the contractor had failed to show cause to the principal's satisfaction, in a case where the contractor had attempted to show cause, without giving bona fide proper and due consideration to the contractor's submissions and to the conclusion that should be reached upon them. For myself, I cannot see why a term should not be implied at both stages; that is, it seems to me relatively obvious that an objective and reasonable outsider to this contract upon reading subcl 44.1 would assume without serious question that the principal would have to give reasonable consideration to the question whether the contractor had failed to show cause and then, if the principal had reasonably concluded that the contractor had failed, that reasonable consideration must be given to whether any power and if any which power should be exercised.

In the case of the implication at each stage it seems to me that all the accepted criteria for an implication ad hoc, set out above, are clearly satisfied, with one possible exception. That is the requirement that the implication must be necessary to give business efficacy to the contract so that no term will be implied if the contract is effective without it. Although I think this requirement also is satisfied, it is one about which minds may differ, and it should be given explicit consideration.

In particular, the content of the word "effective" in the requirement must be considered. Obviously, the contract in the present case could have been fully carried out to the satisfaction of the parties without any reference to or thought of the terms which in my opinion are implied in it. That is, in some circumstances the contract will be effective, in one sense, without any reference to situations said to require implied terms. The question of "effectiveness" will only come up when a dispute has arisen about the way a contract is to work, and one party is saying that a term needs to be implied which will produce what that party claims is a fair (or reasonable, or proper, or just) way of resolving the dispute, and the other party is saying that the contract can work (which implicitly means "for practical purposes" or fairly, reasonably, properly or justly) without the claimed implied term. In such cases the opposing parties will adopt different views of what amounts to effectiveness so far as their contract is concerned.

In the present case for example, the contractor, using the arbitrator's findings would say that there was no business efficacy in a contract which permitted a principal to decide, basing himself on misleading information, to exclude the contractor from completing the contractual work, with no advantage to the principal and considerable detriment to the contractor. The principal would reply by saying (along no doubt with many other things) that his object was to get the particular public works done, he did get them done and the contract worked appropriately for him, and in the way he had bargained for, without the need for implying the terms contended for by the contractor. [258] Although this way of putting the views of the opponents in the present case may be rather rough and ready, it serves to illustrate some of the difficulties in the idea of "business efficacy" and also to prompt the question whether that term may not be directed to business efficacy from the point of view of both parties to the contract. (If the term is so directed, it would not in all cases reduce the difficulties of its meaning, because there is no reason why one competent party to a contract might not, for good reason, expressly or impliedly agree in the contract to subordinate that party's interests in the outcome of the contract to those of the other party; it would however simplify the idea in many cases.)

However, notwithstanding the attraction of following the course mentioned in the previous paragraph, I think it is appropriate to answer the "business efficacy" question by looking at cl 44 in a more general way.

It seems clear that the words of the clause empower the principal to give a notice to show cause upon any default in carrying out any requirement in the contract. Thus for a completely trivial default the principal can give a notice to show cause. It is possible to imagine many situations in which, if a notice for some trivial breach were given the contractor might fail, as a matter of fact, to show cause within the specified period to the satisfaction of the principal why the powers should not be exercised against him. (One obvious example would be where, through some mistake, the contractor's attempt to show cause was delivered late.)

For the principal, in such circumstances, to be able then to exclude the contractor from the site and/or cancel the contract would be, in my opinion, to make the contract as a matter of business quite unworkable. One way of explaining this view is to say that no contractor in his senses would enter into a contract under which such a thing could happen. The reasonable contractor, the reasonable principal and the reasonable looker-on would all assume that such a result could not come about except with good reason.

The over-riding purpose of the contract from both the contractor's and the principal's point of view is to have the contract work completed by the contractor in accordance with the contract, in return for payment by the principal in accordance with the contract. The insertion of a subclause such as subcl 44.1 not subject to the constraint of reasonable use by the principal is quite inconsistent with all the main contractual promises by each party to the contract to the other. The contract can in my opinion only be effective as a workable business document under which the promises of each party to the other may be fulfilled, if the subclause is read in the way I have indicated, that is, as subject to requirements of reasonableness.

Such a reading does not in my opinion detract from the usefulness of the subclause to the principal, to whom it is of obvious practical importance, and for whose benefit it is. If, on the approach I take, there is some significant default by the contractor then the principal can give the notice to show cause. In some cases events from that point will unarguably clearly entitle the principal to exercise one or more of the powers. There will be other cases in which there will be tenable arguments both ways whether the contractor had failed to show cause to the satisfaction of the principal why the powers should not be exercised. In such cases the way the clause is drafted leaves the matter in the hands of the principal; if the principal, acting reasonably, is in fact not satisfied, then the principal has the power to decide whether one or [259] more of the powers should be exercised. On the approach I favour, it will only be if the non-satisfaction of the principal does not have a reasonable basis or the decision to exercise a power or powers has no reasonable basis that the exercise of one or more of the powers will be in breach of one or both the implied obligations. It seems to me that if in such a case (that is, where there is no reasonable basis at either stage) the principal was contractually entitled to exercise one or more of the powers, and did so, the very exercise itself would deprive the contract of its business efficacy.

I think the same point can be made in regard to the example supplied by the facts in Hughes Bros Pty Ltd v The Trustees of the Roman Catholic Church for the Archdiocese of Sydney & Anor (1993) 31 NSWLR 91. There can be no doubt that subcl 44.7 is one which a prudent principal would want to have in a contract such as NPWC Edition 3 (1981). One reason is that the contract involves subcontractors and thus potentially all the difficulties that can beset a principal from that quarter if the contractor gets into financial trouble. The protection of the principal is achieved by the way subcl 44.7 works with subcl 44.1. Yet this protection is only necessary if the contractor is in fact in financial trouble, and the clause also gives the power (if there is no implied term of limitation) to a principal whose contractor is not in financial trouble, but is a company against which a winding up proceeding has been instituted for some reason (simple mistake, or some ulterior motive) by a third party not associated with principal or contractor, and such proceeding is bound to fail. My understanding is that, like it or not, such proceedings are not uncommon. I find it hard to think either that a contractor would agree to giving a principal the unqualified right to exercise the powers in subpar (a) or subpar (b) of subcl 44.1 in the event that a third party instituted a groundless proceeding or that a principal would have the hardihood to insist on such a completely unqualified right.

In explanation of the preceding paragraph I should make it clear that I recognise that the institution even of a groundless winding up proceeding can have consequences for the luckless company respondent to it which will be important to someone in contractual relations with that company. One of the best-known consequences is that the default provisions of many types of securities may be activated by the commencement of such proceedings. I can therefore imagine a principal saying to a contractor that it was essential for the principal to have a subcl 44.7 right, but I also feel sure that the principal would tell the contractor that the contractor could rely on the principal not to exercise it except for a good commercial reason – why should a reasonable businessman insist on anything more? If my reasoning is sound, then it seems to me to follow that there is an implied obligation on the principal to use the subcl 44.7 power reasonably.

This does not mean that a principal who learns of the institution of winding up proceedings against the contractor is obliged to make any detailed inquiry about the likelihood of success of such proceedings. The nature of the problems that subcl 44.7 protects the principal from is such that quick action by the principal will be highly desirable if the power is to be used.

The obligation of reasonableness would usually be discharged, for example, by some inquiry from principal to contractor about the proceedings, and it would require some very conclusive response from the contractor before it could be said the principal was not reasonable in then exercising the [260] power; nevertheless it would not be reasonable, in my opinion, for the principal to exercise the power because of the bare fact of the proceedings having been instituted, and nothing more. More would often be supplied by knowledge the principal had of the contractor's financial position from sources independent of the contractor. In many cases the principal would be quite justified in relying on hearsay information, in some cases perhaps not.

The point is that, in my opinion, the principal would have to consider the matter before acting. The fact that in the case of the subcl 44.7 power, it would not be difficult for the principal to show it had been reasonable in exercising it, is not a reason for saying the obligation does not exist. In Hughes Bros, for example, while I respectfully agree with the result reached by Giles J, I would myself reach that result by saying the principal had been subject to the obligation of reasonableness, but that in the circumstances of the case, the obligation had been complied with.

There is nothing in the slightest novel in the implication of terms requiring reasonableness by parties to a contract in implementing terms of the contract. Two comparatively recent examples of this to which the Court was referred by the appellant are Meehan v Jones (1982) 149 CLR 571, a decision of the High Court, and Progress & Properties (Strathfield) Pty Ltd v Crumblin (1984) 3 BPR 9496, a decision of this Court, in which Meehan was relied on for concluding that a clause in a contract for sale entitling the purchaser to rescind if finance was not obtained within a stated period carried with it an implied term that the purchaser would do all that was reasonable to obtain satisfactory finance.

Certainly in the present case, where subcl 44.1 alone is concerned, the possibility clearly exists of the sort of case mentioned earlier where it would be unreasonable to exercise an otherwise available power; in such a case, it seems to me, the exercise of the power, far from supporting the business efficacy of the contract, would be destructive of its principal purposes and promises.

On the view I take of the implied terms which attach to subcl 44.1, the findings of fact made by the arbitrator were more than sufficient to justify his conclusion that the principal was not entitled to exercise any power under subcl 44.1 in the events that happened after service of the notice to show cause. The principal's announcement to the contractor that the contractor was to be excluded from the site and the remaining work was to be taken over by the principal was therefore a position the principal was not entitled to adopt and was in my opinion undoubtedly repudiatory conduct entitling the contractor to take the step which it then took bringing the contract to an end.

Implication by law

[14.85] Although the authorities … seem to require a sharp distinction to be drawn between implication ad hoc and by law, assigning the former to the facts of a particular contract, and the latter to the legal incidents of contracts of different classes, consideration of the contract in the present case shows there may be a good deal of overlap between the two categories. [263] In my view the particular contract in this case contains the terms implied ad hoc that I have already discussed. The particular contract however is in a standard form, and there is no reason why the same conditions would not be implied in every contract in that form. Further, the standard form contract [261] NPWC Edition 3 (1981) is itself an example of a wider and common class of contract. This is the class of contract in which one party promises to build a work of some size for the other party for a price fixed by the contract, which sets out to regulate the carrying out of the contract, and in doing so provides for a number of eventualities (slow work, unsatisfactory work, financial problems of the contractor, method of payment, settlement of disputes, to name a few) which experience has shown it is prudent to provide for in advance.

Treating the present case as falling in this class, … the matters I have mentioned in dealing with ad hoc implication seem to me to support the view that the law would attach the same implication as a necessary incident of such contracts.

Good faith

[14.90] The kind of reasonableness I have been discussing seems to me to have much in common with the notions of good faith which are regarded in many of the civil law systems of Europe and in all States in the United States as necessarily implied in many kinds of contract. Although this implication has not yet been accepted to the same extent in Australia as part [264] of judge-made Australian contract law, there are many indications that the time may be fast approaching when the idea, long recognised as implicit in many of the orthodox techniques of solving contractual disputes, will gain explicit recognition in the same way as it has in Europe and in the United States.

[Priestley JA went on to discuss in detail the recognition of good faith in other jurisdictions and "the ever growing number of statutes permitting Courts to remould particular kinds of contract in the interests of fairness." He concluded his discussion of good faith as follows at [268]:]

> The result is that people generally, including judges and other lawyers, from all strands of the community, have grown used to the courts applying standards of fairness to contract which are wholly consistent with the existence in all contracts of a duty upon the parties of good faith and fair dealing in its performance. In my view this is in these days the expected standard, and anything less is contrary to prevailing community expectations.

MEAGHER JA:

[14.95] [275] Cole J rejected any submission that reasonableness could be imported as a limitation on the exercise of cl 44 powers. In my opinion he was right to do so. Such a limitation, if it existed, could only arise either from the express words of the contract or by way of an implied term. Obviously enough it does not arise as a matter of construction of cl 44. It is not referred to expressly in that clause, nor is it to be discerned as a matter arising by necessary implication from the words used. Nor, in my view, is there any room to imply a term. Any such attempt could not survive the tests adumbrated by the High Court in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of New South Wales (1982) 149 CLR 337 and Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596.

Clause 44.1 provides that action to take over the contract and exclude the contractor can only be taken if the principal is "satisfied" as to certain matters, namely why the powers referred to should not be exercised. Inherent in the notion of being "satisfied" is an ability to comprehend the factual background on which satisfaction is required. If, for example, as Mr Miller QC senior counsel for the principal conceded, the principal were disabled by drunkenness, insanity or illiteracy from understanding the basic facts of the case, he could never reach an appropriate degree of satisfaction. Likewise here, in my view, when the principal's mind, on the arbitrator's findings, was so distorted by prejudice and misinformation that he was unable to comprehend the facts in respect to which he had to pass judgment. Since he was unable to be "satisfied" – and, if it matters, that inability arose solely through his own fault – his action in taking over the contract and excluding the contractor lacked contractual justification and amounted to a repudiation.

HANDLEY JA:

[14.100] [279] I agree generally with much of what Priestley JA has written on the other issues in the appeal. I also agree with the conclusion by Meagher JA that the principal's "decision was based on a fundamental misunderstanding of relevant matters … and was grounded on misleading, incomplete, and prejudicial information". Meagher JA concludes that these findings demonstrate that the principal could not have given bona fide consideration to the contractor's submissions and therefore could not have been satisfied that the power which had arisen should be exercised. For myself I prefer to regard these matters as demonstrating that the principal's decision, however honest, was objectively unreasonable and therefore an invalid exercise of the power. In agreement with Priestley JA, I would hold that as a matter of construction the power must be exercised reasonably. However I have reached this conclusion by a somewhat different route to those on which he prefers to base his judgment ….

The power conferred on the principal by cl 44.1 is to vary ("take over the whole or any part of the work") or cancel the contract. The power arises on the happening of any breach, however minor, and whenever the breach occurs. It also arises upon the contractor neglecting to comply with any direction given by the principal, however minor, accidental or temporary that neglect might be, and regardless of the importance or otherwise of the subject matter. This express power therefore covers many cases where the principal would have no power to rescind the contract for breach under the general law.

Apart from the great width of these powers, there are three other matters which support the existence of some restraint on their exercise apart from the normal requirement of honesty. The power may only be exercised after the principal has given the contractor "notice in writing to show cause … why the powers … should not be exercised". The notice must state that it is given under the clause and "shall specify the default, refusal or neglect … upon which it is based". It is clear that the power is only exercisable for "cause" and after the contractor has been given an opportunity to be heard. This is some indication that the contractor is entitled to appeal to objective considerations including questions of reasonableness in showing cause against the exercise of the powers. The very notion of showing cause seems inconsistent with the view that the principal will be entitled to act, within the limits of honesty, on his own idiosyncratic opinion. [280] The second matter depends on whether "the satisfaction of the principal" in cl 44.1 refers to an opinion which is reasonable or to one which is merely honest. The implication of reasonableness is readily made: see Hillas and Co Ltd v Arcos Ltd [1932] All ER Rep 494, 507; (1932) 38 Com Cas 23, 43–44, where Lord Wright referred to: "… the legal implication in contracts of what is reasonable, which runs throughout the whole of modern English law in relation to business contracts."

It seems to me that cl 44.1 should be construed as requiring the principal to act reasonably as well as honestly in forming the opinion that the contractor had failed to show cause to his satisfaction and thereafter in deciding whether or not to take over the whole or any part of the remaining work or to cancel the contract: see generally Amann Aviation Pty Ltd v Commonwealth of Australia (1990) 22 FCR 527 at 532, 542–4 and The Commonwealth v Amann Aviation Pty Ltd (1991) 66 ALJR 123; 104 ALR 1.

Service Station Association v Berg Bennett

[14.130] Service Station Association v Berg Bennett (1993) 45 FCR 84 (Federal Court of Australia).

GUMMOW J:

Good faith

[95] [The] various North American jurisdictions have not yet developed "a coherent theory of good faith": HK Lucke, "Good Faith and Contractual Performance" in PD Finn (ed), Essays on Contract (1987), p 155 at p 161, the paper to which counsel for the applicant referred. In Gateway Realty Ltd v Arton Holdings Ltd (No 3) (supra) it was said:

> "Good faith" conduct is the guide to the manner in which the parties should pursue their mutual contractual objectives. Such conduct is breached [sic] when a party acts in "bad faith" – a conduct that is contrary to community standards of honesty, reasonableness or fairness.

Invocation of "community standards" may be no more than an invention by the judicial branch of government of new heads of "public policy", something long ago regarded as a risky enterprise: cf Gollan v Nugent (1988) 166 CLR 18 at 35, per Brennan J. It cannot be less so in the modern administrative state "shaped by explicitly adopted policies, incorporated in legislation and implemented by a large array of large regulatory agencies": N Gunningham, "Public Choice: The Economic Analysis of Public Law" (1992) 21 Fed L Rev 117.

However, in Gateway Realty (at 197) it was then said:

> In most cases, bad faith can be said to occur when one party, without reasonable justification, acts in relation to the contracts in a manner where the result would be to substantially nullify > the bargained objective [96] or benefit contracted for by the other, or to cause significant harm to the other, contrary to the original purpose and expectation of the parties.

That bears a closer relationship to the generally accepted position in Anglo-Australian law. Before looking ahead, it may be wise to look to what has gone before. In the first edition of the Corpus Juris, Vol 13, par 721, published in 1917, the authors wrote: "Each party to a contract impliedly agrees not to prevent the other party from performing or to render performance impossible by any act of his own, and a promise to perform a particular act implies a promise not to perform an inconsistent act."

One of the authorities cited for these propositions was Sprague v Booth [1909] AC 576. In that case (at 580), the Privy Council set out the passage from the speech of Lord Blackburn in Mackay v Dick (supra) to which Mason J was to refer in Secured Income Real Estate. At that stage, therefore, it appears there was not a great deal of difference between the development of the common law on either side of the Atlantic.

In Kirke La Shelle Co v Paul Armstrong Co 188 NE 163 (1933), the New York Court of Appeals was dealing with a contract whereby the plaintiff was to receive half of the profits from the production of a particular play, the contract having been made before the invention of talking pictures. It was held that there was an implied obligation on the part of the licensor not to render valueless the rights conferred by the granting of talking picture rights to a third party. The court referred to various authorities and said (at 167):

> In the last analysis those cases only apply the principle that in every contract there is an implied covenant that neither party shall do anything which will have the effect of destroying or injuring the right of the other party to receive the fruits of the contract, which means that in every contract there exists an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. (Emphasis supplied)

If the passage italicised is read as more than a summary statement of the contents of that which went before it, then it was, one might have thought, a non sequitur. However, one of the cases referred to in Kirke La Shelle was Brassil v Maryland Casualty Co 104 NE 622 (1914). This is another decision of the New York Court of Appeals. There (at 624) the Court had spoken, in fairly general terms, of an "implied obligation of good faith and fair dealing" in contractual performance. Brassil was also cited by the same court, in Wigand (supra) at 619, as authority that every contract "implies good faith and fair dealing between the parties to it". (But, as I have indicated, the result in Wigand is explicable on narrower grounds.) It is from authorities such as these that there existed the germs of the principle now sought to be generally applied by §205 of the Restatement [of] Contract. Anglo-Australian contract law as to the implication of terms has heretofore developed differently, with greater emphasis upon specifics, rather than the identification of a genus expressed in wide terms. Equity has intervened in matters of contractual formation by the remedy of rescission, upon the grounds mentioned earlier. It has restrained freedom of contract by inventing and protecting the equity of redemption, and by relieving against forfeitures and penalties. To some extent equity has regulated the quality of [97] contractual performance by the various defences available to suits for specific performance and for injunctive relief. In some, but not all, of this, notions of good conscience play a part. But it requires a leap of faith to translate these well-established doctrines and remedies into a new term as to the quality of contractual performance, implied by law.

It also is to be borne in mind that treatment of the common law of simple contracts as a coherent whole is of fairly recent origin. There is already a degree of artificiality in forcing the wide range of contractual activities encountered in the community into the framework required by the standard contracts texts. One example is the application of contractual principles to the relations between past, present and future members of property owning unincorporated associations: see, for example, Master Grocers' Association of Victoria v Northern District Grocers Co-operative Ltd [1983] 1 VR 195 at 201–4; Ford and Lee, Principles of the Law of Trusts (2nd ed, 1990), §530. Another example is the classification in terms of offer and acceptance and animus contrahendi of dealings for value between the citizen and a public body, pursuant to statute, for the provision of information held only by that body and vital for the business affairs of the citizen; in one such case it was held there was no contract for the issue of a certificate under s 149 of the Environmental Planning and Assessment Act 1979 (NSW): Lismore City Council v Stewart (1989) 18 NSWLR 718 at 726. The implication of a term by operation of law, applicable across the whole spectrum of the law of contract, is a major step. Further, in deciding to take any such step it is now idle to speak to "the law of contract" without a real appreciation of the deep impact in Australia of various statutory regimes, one of which, of course, gives rise to a most substantial body of work in this Court, and has done so now for many years.

The course of decision in North America may exemplify what the late Professor Stone called a category of indeterminate reference, predicated on a "fact-value" complex, not mere facts: Legal System And Lawyers' Reasonings (1964), Ch 7, §11. It is true that there may be a number of categories of indeterminate reference which already exist in the case law in Australia. However, that is no reason to add to them.

[14.135] Notes

In Esso Australia Resources Pty Ltd v Southern Pacific Petroleum NL [2005] VSCA 228, Warren CJ said:

> [2] The development of the law relating to good faith has travelled an almost full circle. Following initial hesitation, even reluctance (see, for example, Renard Constructions (ME) Pty Ltd v Minister for Public Works (1992) 26 NSWLR 234 at 263-264; also, Service Station Association Ltd v Berg Bennett & Associates Pty Ltd (1993) 45 FCR 84 at 96), by the courts to imply such a duty, there was a discernible preference to imply, instead, a duty of co-operation to secure performance of the contract … However, there has been clear recognition of the doctrine of good faith (see, for example, Hughes Aircraft Systems International v Airservices Australia [1997] FCA 558; (1997) 146 ALR 1, 36; Alcatel Australia Ltd v Scarcella (1998) 44 NSWLR 349, 369; Far Horizons Pty Ltd v McDonald's Australia Ltd [2000] VSC 310). That said, courts have, more often than not, decided these matters on other bases and thereby avoided the conceptual difficulty that can attend the concept of a duty of good faith.
> [3] There has also been consideration of the capacity of a contractual party to look after itself and its own interests rather than turn to concepts of good faith for relief (See, for example, Playcorp Pty Ltd v Taiyo Kogyo Ltd [2003] VSC 108 at [267]). These approaches, more aptly described as judicial reticence, regarding the application of the doctrine of good faith, may be construed as hesitation at the courts' involvement in contractual performance. If a duty of good faith exists, it really means that there is a standard of contractual conduct that should be met. The difficulty is that the standard is nebulous. Therefore, the current reticence attending the application and recognition of a duty of good faith probably lies as much with the vagueness and imprecision inherent in defining commercial morality. The modern law of contract has developed on the premise of achieving certainty in commerce. If good faith is not readily capable of definition then that certainty is undermined. It might be that a duty of good faith is no more than a duty to act reasonably in performance and enforcement, a long established duty (See Electronic Industries Ltd v David Jones Ltd [1954] HCA 69; (1954) 91 CLR 288 at 297). Of course, some commentators have regarded the duty to act reasonably as properly subsumed within the duty of good faith (See NC Seddon & MP Ellinghaus, Cheshire & Fifoot's Law of Contract, (8th ed, 2002) at 428, 10.48).

Buchanan JA (with whom Warren CJ and Osborn AJA agreed) made the following observation by way of obiter dicta (the court having found that any obligation to exercise good faith had not been breached):

> [25] I am reluctant to conclude that commercial contracts are a class of contracts carrying an implied term of good faith as a legal incident (Cf Vodafone Pacific Ltd v Mobile Innovations Ltd [2004] NSWCA 15, [191] per Giles JA), so that an obligation of good faith applies indiscriminately to all the rights and power conferred by a commercial contract. It may, however, be appropriate in a particular case to import such an obligation to protect a vulnerable party from exploitive conduct which subverts the original purpose for which the contract was made. Implication in this fashion is perhaps ad hoc implication meeting the tests laid down in BP Refinery (Westernport) Pty Ltd v Shire of Hastings (1977) 180 CLR 266, rather than implication as a matter of law creating a legal incident of contracts of a certain type.

WHAT DOES GOOD FAITH REQUIRE?

[14.145] Australian courts have commonly drawn upon the statements of Sir Anthony Mason to the effect that the concept of good faith embraces:

> (1) an obligation on the parties to co-operate in achieving the contractual objects (loyalty to the promise itself); (2) compliance with honest standards of conduct; and (3) compliance with standards of contract which are reasonable having regard to the interests of the parties.

(Mason, "Contract, Good Faith and Equitable Standards in Fair Dealing" (2000) 116 Law Quarterly Review 66, 69.)

The third element of Sir Anthony Mason's list is often encapsulated in the idea that each party is required "to exercise the powers conferred upon it by the agreement in good faith and reasonably, and not capriciously or for some extraneous purpose": Far Horizons Pty Ltd v McDonalds Australia Ltd [2000] VSC 310 [120]; see also Burger King Corporation v Hungry Jack's Pty Ltd [2001] NSWCA 187; (2001) 69 NSWLR 558, [171].

Co-operation in contract performance

[14.150] An implied duty to co-operate in performing a contract is well established in Australian contract law, as discussed in Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596. The duty to co-operate may be seen as an aspect of a more general duty of good faith in contract performance. On the overlap between the duty to co-operate and the duty of good faith recognised in the United States, see Service Station Association v Berg Bennett (1993) 45 FCR 84, at [14.130].

Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) v St Martins Investments

[14.155] Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Supreme Court of Queensland.

[FACTS: The vendor, appellant, and the purchaser, respondent, entered into a contract for the sale of land on which there was a large office building. Settlement was made on 26th January 1973 and the respondent then became the registered proprietor of the land. A balance of $170,000 remained owing after settlement which was payable not later than 26th May 1973. The contract provided for the reduction of this sum by a formula if the appellant was unable to provide evidence to the respondent's reasonable satisfaction that aggregate rents under leases of premises in the building had reached a specified figure. It also provided that all leases of the premises after its execution should be approved by the respondent, but approval was not to be capriciously or arbitrarily withheld. There was no requirement that the respondent should grant leases after it became the registered proprietor. (Mason J, at 601, commented that in "all probability the draftsman failed to appreciate that title to the property was to pass on [the settlement date].") On the date of settlement and at all times after that, the aggregate rents were far below the specified figure. The appellant offered to lease so much of the vacant premises as would increase the aggregate rents to the figure but the offer was rejected. On 26th May 1973, the aggregate rentals were so far below the specified figure that the balance of the purchase price was reduced by the operation of the formula to nil.

The appellant sued for damages for breach of an implied term that the respondent would actively co-operate in efforts to secure tenants and would not obstruct them. The appellant alleged that this term had been breached by the respondent's rejection of the appellant as a tenant.]

MASON J:

[607] Was the respondent's rejection of the appellant's offer to take a lease of the vacant space in the building a breach of contract?

This is the next question to be considered. Clause 1 (d), which required the approval of the respondent purchaser to leases after the date of execution of the contract, provided that its approval should not be capriciously or arbitrarily withheld. This sub-clause dealt with the grant of leases before the respondent became the owner, when the appellant was granting leases of parts of the building, subject to the approval of the respondent. But it is common ground that the contract imposed an implied obligation on each party to do all that was reasonably necessary to secure performance of the contract. As Lord Blackburn said in Mackay v Dick (1881) 6 App Cas 251, at p 263:

> as a general rule … where in a written contract it appears that both parties have agreed that something shall be done, which cannot effectually be done unless both concur in doing it, the construction of the contract is that each agrees to do all that is necessary to be done on his part for the carrying out of that thing, though there may be no express words to that effect.

It is not to be thought that this rule of construction is confined to the imposition of an obligation on one contracting party to co-operate in doing all that is necessary to be done for the performance by the other party of his obligations under the contract. As Griffith CJ said in Butt v McDonald (1896) 7 QLJ 68, at pp 70–1: "It is a general rule applicable to every contract that each party agrees, by implication, to do all such things as are necessary on his part to enable the other party to have the benefit of the contract."

It is easy to imply a duty to co-operate in the doing of acts which are necessary to the performance by the parties or by one of the parties of fundamental obligations under the contract. It is not quite so easy to make the implication when the acts in question are necessary to entitle the other contracting party to a benefit under the contract but are not essential to the performance of that party's obligations and are not fundamental to the contract. Then the question arises whether the contract imposes a duty to co-operate on the first party or whether it leaves him at liberty to decide for himself whether the acts shall be done, even if the consequence of his decision is to disentitle the other party to a benefit. In such a case, the correct interpretation of the contract depends, as it seems to me, not so much on the [608] application of the general rule of construction as on the intention of the parties as manifested by the contract itself.

The respondent submitted that there was no implied obligation on the respondent to grant any leases after 26th January 1973. The basis for this submission was that there was no necessity to make the implication because it was as much in the interests of the respondent to lease the premises as it was in the interests of the appellant that the respondent should do so. This argument overlooked the circumstance, vitally important in the present case, that, in the situation which arose, it was in the interests of the respondent not to grant a lease at the relevant time so as to disentitle the appellant to payment of the final balance of the purchase price.

Moreover, the argument overlooked the general tenor of the provisions of the contract to which reference has already been made. They contemplated that leases would be granted of unlet space between 26th January 1973 and the final date for completion and that it would be in the interests of both parties that such leases be granted, in particular so as to entitle the appellant to payment of the final balance of the purchase price. As I read them, they imply an obligation on the respondent to do all things reasonably necessary to enable leases to be granted.

They are certainly inconsistent with the hypothesis that the respondent had an unfettered discretion to decide whether a lease would be granted or not. It is significant that cl 1 (d), which dealt with the grant of leases between the date of contract and 26th January 1973, prohibited the respondent from capriciously or arbitrarily withholding its approval to a lease. As I pointed out earlier, the draftsman failed to appreciate that from 26th January 1973 it was for the respondent and not the appellant to grant leases. Consequently, cl (f) referred to "leases … which shall be approved by the Purchaser" coming into existence between the date of the contract and the date of final completion. However, the serious mistake which the draftsman made does not obscure the evident intention of the parties that the restriction on the respondent's power to withhold approval to a lease contained in cl 1 (d) should be carried through and apply to all leases granted before the date of final completion. It is obvious that had the parties realised the mistake made by the draftsman they would have reformed the contract so that it made accurate provision for the grant of leases by the respondent after 26th January 1973 and restricted the respondent's power to refuse to grant a lease in conformity with the prohibition in cl 1 (d).

[609] This is not rectification. It is a case in which the parties through their draftsman have chosen language which is inappropriate to the circumstances which they have in mind. The misapprehension which they made is obvious, as is their reason for making it. Despite this, there is clearly manifested in the contractual provisions, inaptly expressed in part though they are, the intention that the respondent was not to be entitled before the final date for completion by any capricious or arbitrary decision to prevent the grant of a lease of unlet space in the building.

The question then is whether the respondent capriciously or arbitrarily refused to grant a lease to the appellant, the appellant having the onus of establishing that the refusal was capricious or arbitrary because it was bound to establish the respondent's breach of contract. The respondent was not bound to give reasons for refusing to grant a lease to the appellant, though its failure to do so leads more readily to the inference that the refusal was capricious (Frederick Berry Ltd v Royal Bank of Scotland [1949] 1 KB 619, at p 623). The meaning of the word "arbitrarily" in the context of refusal of consent to an assignment of a lease has been much discussed. In Barrow v Isaacs & Son [1891] 1 QB 417, at p 419, Lord Esher MR thought that it meant "wholly unreasonably". In Mills v Cannon Brewery Co Ltd [1920] 2 Ch 38, at p 45, PO Lawrence J considered the authorities, including Barrow v Isaacs & Son, in which the meaning of the word had been considered, and concluded that the various synonyms assigned to it, "unreasonably", "wholly unreasonably" and "without reasonable cause", practically meant the same thing. I am inclined to agree, though I should prefer to say that "arbitrarily" connotes "unreasonably" in the sense that what was done was done "without reasonable cause". In these circumstances I doubt whether "capriciously" adds anything, except perhaps to direct attention to the motivation of the respondent. In Colvin v Bowen (1958) 75 WN (NSW) 262, at p 264, Walsh J, speaking with reference to a provision that consent to an assignment of a tenancy should not be unreasonably withheld, after referring to the decisions culminating in Houlder Bros & Co Ltd v Gibbs [1925] Ch 575, said:

> According to the view thus preferred the grounds upon which a refusal may be based must be concerned either with the character and personality of the proposed assignee, or with matters affecting the use or occupation of the premises [610] which may result from the proposed assignment. The somewhat less narrow view, to which reference is made by

> Sargant LJ in Houlder's Case [1925] Ch, at p 587, requires that the reason for refusal must be something affecting the subject matter of the contract which forms the relationship between the landlord and the tenant, and not something extraneous and dissociated from the subject matter of the contract. It appears to me to be clear from the judgments in the cases mentioned that the principles contained in those cases would exclude from consideration, as a ground for refusal of consent, the circumstance that the lessor desires to resume possession of the property in order to occupy it. Despite the critical remarks and the expressions of doubt to which those principles were subjected in Tredegar v Harwood [1929] AC 72, at pp 78, 82, the authority of Houlder's Case has been affirmed subsequently, and it must be regarded by me as binding in cases to which the principles it contains are applicable.

Approaching the contract in the present case in the light of these observations, I conclude that the respondent was not entitled to refuse to grant a lease to the appellant so as to deprive the appellant of a benefit which would otherwise accrue to it under the contract. A refusal on that ground would be capricious and arbitrary. On the other hand, a refusal on the ground that there were doubts that the appellant could or would pay the rent promptly would, if the ground were made out, not be capricious or arbitrary. I say "promptly" because the respondent as owner was entitled to look for a tenant who would not only pay the rent, but would pay it promptly and in accordance with the provisions of the lease. If the evidence established that the respondent entertained doubts, reasonably based, that the appellant would pay the rent promptly and without difficulty, then it was reasonable to refuse to grant the lease on that ground (Tredegar v Harwood [1929] AC 72, at p 81).

The findings of the primary judge make it clear that the respondent gave very careful consideration to the question whether the lease should be granted …. [Mason J accepted the finding of the trial judge that the refusal to grant the lease was not motivated by a desire to deprive the appellant of the payment of the final balance of the purchase price and that there were grounds for the respondent to refuse to grant the lease based on the appellant's ability to pay the rental.]

[A ground for criticism of the primary judge's conclusions] was that, had the respondent informed the appellant of its reasons for refusal, the appellant would have been in a position to furnish evidence of its financial position and thereby disabuse the respondent of its erroneous impression. Although there is much to be said for this argument, I do not think that it is correct.

It is important to recall that it was for the appellant to establish that the respondent's refusal was without reasonable cause. The relevant ground taken by the respondent was not that the appellant was financially unsound, but that there was sufficient doubt as to its financial soundness to justify the refusal of the lease. As I observed earlier, the refusal was not without reasonable cause if on the evidence, despite the appellant's soundness, the respondent entertained doubts, which were reasonably based, as to the appellant's willingness or ability to pay the rent promptly in accordance with the terms of the proposed lease. On the findings made by Connolly J and indorsed by the Full Court, the respondent had such doubts.

The only question is whether they were reasonably based. The history of the payments under the deed and the material contained in the mercantile report were quite sufficient to raise a real doubt as to the ability of the appellant to pay the rent promptly. The evidence does not show that the appellant, had it been given the opportunity of presenting evidence to the respondent, would have succeeded in painting a different picture. The truth of the matter was that the appellant would have been forced to disclose the unsatisfactory developments, referred to by Connolly J, which occurred in relation to its profits for the year ended 30th June 1973.

As the appellant has failed to show that the respondent had no reasonable ground for doubting the appellant's ability to pay the rent promptly, it has failed to show that the respondent's refusal to grant the lease was capricious or arbitrary.

I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

[GIBBS, STEPHEN, and AICKIN JJ agreed with Mason J. BARWICK CJ similarly considered that, having regard to the findings concerning the purchaser's apprehension as to the financial capacity of the appellant to perform the obligations of the intended lease, its refusal to accept the vendor as a tenant was reasonable.]

Appeal dismissed.

Commonwealth Bank of Australia v Barker

[14.158] Commonwealth Bank of Australia v Barker [2014] HCA 32; (2014) 253 CLR 169 (High Court of Australia) – Appeal from the Federal Court of Australia.

[FACTS: The employment of Mr Barker, an employee of the Commonwealth Bank of Australia (the Bank), was terminated for redundancy on 9 April 2009. On 2 March 2009, Mr Barker had been told that his position was to be made redundant and that if he was not redeployed within the Bank, which was the Bank's preference, his employment would be terminated approximately four weeks thereafter. He was required to work out the day, clear out his desk, hand in the keys and the mobile phone which the Bank had issued to him and not return to work. His access to his Bank email account, voicemail and the intranet were terminated.

Mr Barker was not informed about an alternative position within the Bank until 26 March 2009. He was not contacted by the recruitment consultant involved in facilitating the recruitment process for that position and the possibility of his being retrained for that position was not mentioned to him. The Bank employees involved in redeployment and the recruitment consultant were not aware that Mr Barker no longer had his Bank mobile phone or email address.

Mr Barker was paid the amount of retrenchment entitlements due to him under his employment contract. He sued the Bank, alleging that there were implied terms in his employment contract that the Bank would maintain trust and confidence with him and that it would not do anything likely to destroy or seriously damage the relationship of trust and confidence without proper cause. Mr Barker alleged that the Bank had acted in breach of those terms by failing to conduct the termination or redundancy process in a bona fide or proper manner; and that he had thereby lost a chance of redeployment.]

FRENCH CJ, BELL AND KEANE JJ:

Introduction

The employment relationship, in Australia, operates within a legal framework defined by statute and by common law principles, informing the construction and content of the contract of employment. This appeal raises the question whether, under the common law of Australia, there is a term of mutual trust and confidence to be implied by law in all employment contracts. For the reasons that follow, that implication is a step beyond the legitimate law-making function of the courts. It should not be taken. This appeal, against a decision of the Full Court of the Federal Court of Australia (Commonwealth Bank of Australia v Barker (2013) 214 FCR 450), which made the implication, should be allowed. …

The question on the appeal

[15] The primary question raised by the appeal is whether, under the common law of Australia, employment contracts contain a term that neither party will, without reasonable cause, conduct itself in a manner likely to destroy or seriously damage the relationship of trust and confidence between them. The answer to that question, being in the negative, is dispositive of the appeal. …

The implication of terms

[19] The common law in Australia must evolve within the limits of judicial power and not trespass into the province of legislative action. This Court and, to a lesser extent, intermediate appeal courts have a law-making function. That function can only be exercised as an incident of the adjudication of particular disputes. The first point of reference in its exercise is "the web of established legal principle" (McHugh, "The Judicial Method" (1999) 73 Australian Law Journal 37 at 48). As Brennan J said in Dietrich v The Queen (1992) 177 CLR 292 at 320:

> There must be constraints on the exercise of the power, else the courts would cross "the Rubicon that divides the judicial and the legislative powers".

[20] A judicial announcement of an obligation of mutual trust and confidence, to be applied as an incident of employment contracts and applicable to employers and employees alike, involves the assumption by courts of a regulatory function defined by reference to a broadly framed normative standard. Broadly framed normative standards are familiar to courts required to apply, in common law or statutory settings, criteria such as "reasonableness", "good faith" and "unconscionability". However, the creation of a new standard of that kind is not a step to be taken lightly. Where the standard is embodied in a new contractual term implied in law, the bases for the implication in law of contractual terms must be considered as the first point of reference.

[21] Courts have implied terms in contracts in a number of ways:

- in fact or ad hoc to give business efficacy to a contract (Such implications are made when the conditions set out in BP Refinery (Westernport) Pty Ltd v Shire of Hastings (1977) 180 CLR 266 at 283 per Lord Simon of Glaisdale, Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Keith of Kinkel are satisfied. These were conditions adopted by this Court in Secured Income Real Estate (Australia) Ltd v St Martins Investments Pty Ltd (1979) 144 CLR 596 at 605–606 per Mason J, Gibbs and Stephen JJ agreeing at 599, Aickin J agreeing at 615; [1979] HCA 51; see also Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW (1982) 149 CLR 337 at 347 per Mason J, Stephen J agreeing at 344, Wilson J agreeing at 392, 404 per Brennan J; [1982] HCA 24);
- by custom in particular classes of contract (The custom or usage must be notorious, certain, legal and reasonable. See Con-Stan Industries of Australia Pty Ltd v Norwich Winterthur Insurance (Australia) Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 226, 236–237; Byrne v Australian Airlines Ltd (1995) 185 CLR 410, 423–424 per Brennan CJ, Dawson and Toohey JJ, 440 per McHugh and Gummow JJ);
- in law in particular classes of contract; or
- in law in all classes of contract.

Contractual terms implied in law may be effected by the common law or by statute. If effected by the common law they may be displaced by the express terms of the contract or by statute.

[22] Implication of a term in fact in a contract, by reference to what is necessary to give it business efficacy, was described in Codelfa Construction Pty Ltd v State Rail Authority of NSW as raising issues "as to the meaning and effect of the contract" ((1982) 149 CLR 337 at 345 per Mason J, Stephen J agreeing at 344, Wilson J agreeing at 392). Implication is not "an orthodox exercise in the interpretation of the language of a contract, that is, assigning a meaning to a particular provision" ((1982) 149 CLR 337 at 345 per Mason J, Stephen J agreeing at 344, Wilson J agreeing at 392). It is nevertheless an "exercise in interpretation, though not an orthodox instance" ((1982) 149 CLR 337 at 345 per Mason J, Stephen J agreeing at 344, Wilson J agreeing at 392). The implication of terms in fact was also characterised in Attorney General of Belize v Belize Telecom Ltd [2009] 1 WLR 1988 as an exercise in construction. Lord Hoffmann, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, said ([2009] 1 WLR 1988 at 1994 [22]):

> it is not enough for a court to consider that the implied term expresses what it would have been reasonable for the parties to agree to. It must be satisfied that it is what the contract actually means.

The distinction thus drawn is appropriate even though the scope of the constructional approach adopted by Lord Hoffmann has been debated (Hooley, "Implied Terms After Belize Telecom" (2014) 73 Cambridge Law Journal 315; Courtney and Carter, "Implied Terms: What Is the Role of Construction?" (2014) 31 Journal of Contract Law 151 at 160–163).

[23] In Codelfa, the implication of a term in law was said to be based upon "more general considerations" than those covered by the concept of business efficacy ((1982) 149 CLR 337 at 345–346 per Mason J citing Lister v Romford Ice and Cold Storage Co Ltd [1957] AC 555 at 576 per Viscount Simonds and Liverpool City Council v Irwin [1977] AC 239 at 255 per Lord Wilberforce). That distinction attracted authoritative support in Con-Stan Industries of Australia Pty Ltd v Norwich Winterthur Insurance (Australia) Ltd (1986) 160 CLR 226 at 237.
